Leslie, LESLY, or LESLEY, THE FAMILY OF, is first found between 1171 and 1199 in possession of the pastoral parish of Lesslyn or Leslie in Aberdeenshire, and was ennobled in 1457, when George Leslie of Rothes was made Earl of Rothes and Lord Leslie. The fourth earl was father of Norman Leslie, Master of Rothes, chief actor in the murder of Cardinal Beaton. John, sixth earl (1600-41), was one of the ablest of the Covenanted leaders. His son John (1630-81) became Lord Chancellor of Scotland in 1667, and in 1680 was created Duke of Rothes, &c. These honours became extinct upon his death without male issue in 1681. The earldom of Rothes went to his elder daughter, in whose family the title has continued. The Balquhain branch gave birth to several men of mark, such as the learned John Leslie (q.v.), Bishop of Ross, the champion of Mary, Queen of Scots; Sir Alexander Leslie of Auchintoul, a general in the Muscovite service (died 1663); and Charles Leslie. Still more distinguished was ALEXANDER LESLIE (c. 1580-1661), who became field-marshal of Sweden under Gustavus Adolphus. Recalled to Scotland in 1639, he took command of the Covenanting army, and in 1641 was made Earl of Leven and Lord Balgony. His honours and lands eventually passed to his great-grandson, David Melville, third Earl of Leven and second Earl of Melville. His descendant succeeded to both titles in 1889.—DAVID LESLIE, fifth son of the first Lord Lindores (a son of the fifth Earl of Rothes), served under Gustavus Adolphus, and, returning to Scotland in 1640, acted as lieutenant-general to the Earl of Leven. He was present at Marston Moor, and routed Montrose at Philiphaugh. Taken prisoner by Cromwell at Worcester in 1651, he was imprisoned in the Tower till the Restoration. He was made Lord Newark in 1661, and died in 1682. The title has been dormant since 1791.—WALTER LESLIE (1603-67), a cadet of the Balquhain line, distinguished himself in the Austrian army, and in 1637 was created a count, as a reward for his services in the murder of Wallenstein. He was succeeded (1667) by his nephew, James, Austrian field-marshal. The title became extinct in 1844.

Leslie, CHARLES, nonjuror, born at Dublin, 17th July 1650, became chancellor of the cathedral of Connor in 1687. Deprived at the Revolution for declining the oath of allegiance, he retired to England and wrote against Papists, Deists, Socinians, Jews, and Quakers, as well as in support of the nonjuring interests. He was mostly with the Pretender in France and Italy (1713-21), and then returning to Ireland, died at Glasgow 13th April 1722. His Short and Easy Method with the Jews appeared in 1684; his Short and Easy Method with the Deists in 1694; he issued a collected edition of his Theological Works in 1721 (new ed. 1832). See Life by R. J. Leslie (1885).

Leslie, CHARLES ROBERT, genre-painter, was born in London, 19th October 1794, of American parentage. Educated from 1800 at Philadelphia, in 1811 he returned to England and entered as a student in the Royal Academy. His first notable picture was 'Sir Roger de Coverley going to Church' (1819). In 1821 'May-day under Queen Elizabeth' secured his election as A.R.A.; and 'Sancho Panza and the Duchess' (1824) as R.A. Other pictures were scenes from Shakespeare, Le Sage, Molière, Addison, Swift, Sterne, Fielding, and Smollett. In 1833 he became professor of Drawing at West Point, New York, but returned to England next year; in 1848-52 he was professor of Painting at the Royal Academy. He died 5th May 1859. His lectures were published in the useful Handbook for Young Painters (1855); he also wrote a Life of Constable (1843; new ed. 1896), and began one of Reynolds, completed by Tom Taylor, who edited his Autobiographical Recollections (1860).—His son, GEORGE DUNLOP LESLIE, born in London, 2d July 1836, whose aim has been 'to paint pictures from the sunny side of English domestic life,' was elected A.R.A. in 1868 and R.A. in 1876. He has written Letters to Marco (1893) and Riverside Letters (1896).

Leslie, FRANK, the name adopted by Henry Carter (1821-80), who was born at Ipswich, and at seventeen entered a London mercantile house. The success of sketches sent by him to the Illustrated London News led him to join its staff. In 1848 he went to the United States, assumed the name Frank Leslie, and in 1854 founded the Gazette of Fashion and the New York Journal. Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper began in 1855 (German and Spanish editions later), the Chimney Corner in 1865; and he also started the Boys' and Girls' Weekly, the Lady's Journal, &c.

Leslie, FRED (1856-92), London burlesque actor and singer. See Recollections by Vincent (1893).

Leslie, GEORGE, 'Father Archangel,' a Capuchin friar, a native of Aberdeenshire, who died in 1697; and of whom many myths are related in Il Capucino Scozzese (1644). See the Collected Essays of Dr T. Graves Law (1905).

Leslie, HENRY DAVID, composer of sacred music, was born in London, 18th June 1822, founded there 'Leslie's Choir' (1856-80 and 1885-87), and died near Oswestry, 4th February 1896.

Leslie, JOHN (1527-96), son of the rector of Kingussie, studied at King's College, Aberdeen, at Paris, and at Poitiers, and in 1566 became Bishop of Ross. A zealous partisan of Queen Mary, he joined her at Tutbury in 1569, suffered imprisonment, and in 1574 went to France. He died in a monastery near Brussels. His Latin History of Scotland (Rome, 1578) was rendered into Scotch in 1596 by a Scottish Benedictine of Ratisbon, Father James Dalrymple (ed. by Father Cody, Scot. Text Soc. 1884-91).

Leslie, SIR JOHN, natural philosopher, born at Largo, 16th April 1766, studied at St Andrews and Edinburgh, and travelled as tutor in America and on the Continent, meanwhile engaging in experimental research. The fruits of his labours were a translation of Buffon's Birds (1793), the invention of a differential thermometer, a hygrometer, and a photometer, and Inquiry into Heat (1804). In 1805 he obtained the chair of Mathematics at Edinburgh, though keenly opposed by the ministers as a follower of Hume. In 1810 he invented artificial refrigeration. Transferred to the chair of Natural Philosophy (1819), he invented the pyroscope, atmometer, and athriroscope. Knighted in 1832, on 3d November he died. See Memoir by Macvey Napier (1838).

Leslie, THOMAS EDWARD CLIFFE (1827-82), born in co. Wexford, qualified for the bar, but in 1853 became professor of Economics and Jurisprudence at Belfast. His writings were published as The Land Systems (1870), studies on the land question in Ireland, Belgium, and France, and Essays in Political and Moral Philosophy (1879), treating of the gold question, economic method, &c.

Leslie, WALTER, COUNT. See LESLIE FAMILY.

Lespinasse, CLAIRE FRANÇOISE, or JULIE JEANNE ÉLÉONORE DE, was born at Lyons, 9th Nov. 1732, an illegitimate daughter of the Countess d'Albon. At first a teacher, she became in 1754 companion to Madame du Deffand, whose friends, especially d'Alembert, she quickly attached to herself, and after the inevitable rupture, she was enabled to maintain a modest salon of her own. The charm she exercised was in no wise due to beauty. Her passion for the Marquis de Mora, and later for M. de Guibert, cost her the deepest pangs, when the first died and the second married. She died 23d May 1776. Many of her letters to her two lovers have been published (1809, 1847, and 1877), and these are aglow with fire and passion. The Lettres inédites (1887) were mostly addressed to Condorcet. See a work by the Marquis de Ségur (1906).

Lesseps, FERDINAND, VICOMTE DE, engineer, born at Versailles, a cousin of the Empress Eugenie, November 19, 1805, from 1825 held diplomatic appointments at Lisbon, Tunis, Cairo, Barcelona, and Madrid. In 1854 he conceived his scheme for a Suez Canal, and in 1856 obtained a concession from the Viceroy. The works were begun in 1860, and completed in August 1869. He received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, an English knighthood, election to the Academy, &c. In 1881 work began on his stupendous scheme for a Panama Canal; but in 1892-93 the management was charged with breach of trust, and five directors were condemned—Lesseps, now a broken old man, to five years' imprisonment and a fine, as was also his son Charles. Charles was released in June 1893; his father, who had been too ill to be taken from his house, died 7th December 1894. Lesseps wrote a Histoire du Canal de Suez (1875-79; trans. 1876) and Souvenirs de Quarante Ans (1887; trans. 1887). See Lives by Bertrand and Ferrier (Par. 1887) and Barnett Smith (2d. ed. 1895).

Lessing, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM, was born, a pastor's son, at Kamenz in Saxony, 22d January 1729, and in 1746 entered as a theological student at Leipzig. Erelong he was writing plays in the French style, and leaving Leipzig in debt, at Berlin joined the unorthodox Mylius in publishing Beiträge zur Historie des Theaters (1750), and independently wrote plays, translated, did literary hack-work; his chief stay, however, was the Vossische Zeitung, to which he contributed criticisms. In 1751 he withdrew to Witteberg, took his master's degree, and produced a series of Vindications of unjustly maligned or forgotten writers, such as Cardan, Lennius, &c. Again at Berlin he in Ein Vademecum für Herrn S. G. Lange (1754) displayed unrelenting hostility to pretentious ignorance; with Moses Mendelssohn he wrote an essay on Pope, ein Metaphysiker (1755). His successful tragedy Miss Sara Sampson (1755) is after English models. In 1758 he was assisting Mendelssohn and Nicolai with a new critical Berlin journal, in which he revolted from the dictatorship of French taste, combated the inflated pedantry of the Gottsched school, and extolled Shakespeare. While secretary to the governor of Breslau he wrote his famous Laocoon (1766), a critical treatise defining the limits of poetry and the plastic arts. The comedy Minna von Barnhelm (1767) is the first German comedy on the grand scale. Appointed playwright to a new theatre at Hamburg in 1767, he wrote the Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1769), in which he overthrew finally the dictatorship of the French drama. The Hamburg theatre failed, and Lessing was soon in the thick of a controversy, this time with Klotz, a Halle professor, producing the Briefe antiquarischen Inhalts (1769) and Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet (1769). In 1769 the Duke of Brunswick appointed Lessing Wolfenbüttel librarian; and he at once began to publish some of the less-known treasures of the library in Zur Geschichte und Literatur (1773-81). In 1772 he wrote the great tragedy Emilia Galotti. Shortly before his marriage he spent eight months in Italy as companion to the young Prince Leopold of Brunswick. In 1774-78 he published the Wolfenbüttelsche Fragmente, a rationalist attack on orthodox Christianity from the pen of Reimarus (q.v.), which, universally attributed to Lessing, provoked a storm of refutations. The best of Lessing's counter-attacks were Anti-Goeze (1778) and the fine dramatic poem, Nathan der Weise (1779), one of the noblest pleas for toleration ever penned. Later works were Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780) and Ernst und Falk (1778-80), five dialogues on freemasonry. Lessing died at Brunswick, 15th February 1781. The best edition of his Sämmtliche Schriften is Lachmann's, reissued by Muncker in 1886-97. His chief works have been translated into English. See Lives by Danzel and Guhrauer (2d ed. 1880), Stahr (9th ed. 1886), Erich Schmidt (1884-92), Sime (1877), Helen Zimmern (1878), and Rolleston (1889)—the last three in English.

Lessing, KARL FRIEDRICH (1808-80), historical painter, nephew of the preceding, was born at Breslau, and died at Carlsruhe.—His son, OTTO, born at Düsseldorf, 24th February 1846, is a sculptor and painter.

L'Estrange, SIR ROGER, born at Hunstanton, 17th December 1616, narrowly escaped hanging as a royalist spy for a plot to seize Lynn in 1644, and was imprisoned in Newgate, whence he escaped after four years. Pardonned by Cromwell in 1653, he lived quietly till the Restoration made him licenser of the press. He fought in all the quarrels of the time with a shower of pamphlets, vigorous, and not coarser than those of his antagonists; and he holds a place in the history of Journalism by his papers, The Public Intelligencer (1663-66) and The Observer (1681-87). He translated Æsop's Fables, Seneca's Morals, Cicero's Offices, the Colloquies of Erasmus, Quevedo's Visions, and Josephus. He was knighted by James II. in 1685, and died 11th December 1704.

Le Sueur, EUSTACHE (1617-55), Paris painter. The Louvre possesses 36 religious pictures by him, and 13 mythological. [Les-ee-eh'.]

Le Sueur, HUBERT (c. 1595-1650), sculptor, born in Paris, came to England about 1628, and in 1633 executed the bronze equestrian statue of Charles I. at Charing Cross, first set up in 1674.

Lethington. See MAITLAND.

Letronne, JEAN ANTOINE (1787-1848), writer on ancient history, geography, inscriptions, &c., was born and died in Paris.

Letts, THOMAS (1803-73), London bookbinder and manufacturer of diaries.

Leuchtenberg. See BEAUHARNAIS.

Leucippus (fl. 500 B.C.), the founder of the Atomic school of Greek philosophy and forerunner of Democritus, was born at Abdera.

Leuckart, RUDOLF (1822-98), zoologist, born at Helmstedt, studied at Göttingen, and in 1850 became professor of Zoology at Giessen, in 1869 at Leipzig. He distinguished himself by his study of the Entozoa—his great work Parasites of Man (trans. 1886). [Loik-art.]

Leutze, EMANUEL, painter, born at Gmünd in Württemberg, 24th May 1816, was brought up in America, and studied in Europe 1841-59, then settled in New York, and died 18th July 1868. One of his works was 'Washington crossing the Delaware.' [Loit'-zeh.]

Levallant, FRANÇOIS (1753-1824), French traveller and ornithologist, was born at Paramibo, Dutch Guiana; studied in Paris; and explored in South Africa 1781-84. [Le-vah-yon'.]

Leven, EARL OF. See LESLIE.

Lever, CHARLES, novelist, was born of purely English parentage in Dublin, on 31st August 1806, graduated at Trinity College in 1827, and then went to Göttingen to study medicine. His most popular work, Charles O'Malley, is a reflex of his own college life in Dublin. About 1829 he spent some time in the backwoods of Canada and North America, and embodied his experiences in Con Cregan and Arthur O'Leary. He practised medicine at various Irish country towns, and in 1840 at Brussels, having ere this written Harry Lorrequer (1840) and Charles O'Malley (1841) for the Dublin University Magazine. Returning to Dublin, he published Jack Hinton in 1843, and from 1842 to 1845 acted as editor of the Dublin University Magazine, and wrote Arthur O'Leary, Tom Burke of Ours, and The O'Donoghue. In 1845 he again went to Brussels, Bonn, Carlsruhe, where he published the Knight of Gwynne, and Florence, where he wrote Roland Cashel. At Spezia Luttrell of Arran, Con Cregan, Sir Jasper Carew, and The Dodd Family Abroad were produced in rapid succession. Then, completely changing his style, he wrote the Fortunes of Glencore, followed by The Murlins of Cro-Martin, and The Daltons. Lever was in 1858 appointed British vice-consul at Spezia, and continued to write, publishing Davenport Dunn, One of Them, Gerald Fitzgerald, A Day's Ride, Sir Brook Frobroke, That Boy of Norcotts, and some racy essays in Blackwood's by 'Cornelius O'Dowd.' In 1867 he was promoted to the consulship at Trieste, where he died 1st June 1872. It is by his brilliant, rollicking sketches of a phase of Irish life which was passing away that Lever lives, and by Hablot K. Browne's illustrations to his novels. No doubt he created a false idea of Irish society and of the Irish character; his caricatures have been taken as representations. His daughter edited his novels (37 vols. 1897-99). The Life and Letters by Downey (1906) superseded Fitzpatrick's memoir (1879).

Leverrier, URBAIN JEAN JOSEPH, astronomer, born at St Lô, Normandy, 11th March 1811, in 1836 distinguished himself by chemical researches, and next year became teacher of astronomy at the Polytechnique. His Tables de Mercure and several memoirs gained him admission to the Academy in 1846. From disturbances in the motions of planets he inferred the existence of an undiscovered planet; and calculated the point in the heavens where, a few days afterwards, Neptune was actually discovered by Galle at Berlin (see also ADAMS, J. C.). For this he received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour and a chair of astronomy in the Faculty of Sciences. At the Revolution of 1848 he was elected in 1849 to the Legislative Assembly, where he became counter-revolutionary; in 1852 Louis Napoleon made him a senator. In 1854 he succeeded Arago as director of the Observatory of Paris. He died 23d Sept. 1877. [Leh-ver-yay'.]

Levi, LEONE (1821-88), born at Ancona, settled in Liverpool in 1844, and in 1852 became professor of the Principles of Commerce in King's College, London. Among his works were Commercial Law of the World (1850, republished as International Commercial Law, 1873), On Taxation (1870), History of British Commerce (1872), War and its Consequences (1881), Wages (1885), and International Law (1887).

Levita, ELIAS (1465-1549), Jewish grammarian and exegete, was born at Neustadt near Nuremberg. An expulsion of Jews forced him to Italy, where he taught successively in Padua (1504), Venice, Rome (1514), and finally (1527) Venice again. He wrote on Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, Amos, and the vowel-points; a Hebrew grammar; and a Talmudic and Targumic Dictionary. See Life by J. Leir (Bresl. 1888). [Le-ve'ta.]

Levizac, JEAN PONS VICTOR LECONTZ DE (c. 1750-1813), French grammarian, was a canon of Yabres, who at the Revolution fled first to Holland and then London, and taught French.

Levy, AMY (1861-89), Jewish poetess, novelist, and suicide, was born at Clapham, and educated at Brighton and Newnham. Her novel Reuben Sachs (1889) showed high promise.

Lewald, FANNY (1811-89), Jewish novelist, born at Königsberg, in 1855 married Adolf Stahr (1805-76), a Berlin critic. She was an enthusiastic champion of women's rights. Her best book is perhaps Von Geschlecht zu Geschlecht (1863-65). An English translation of Stella (1884) appeared in the same year; and she wrote records of travel in Italy (1847) and Great Britain (1852). See her Meine Lebensgeschichte (1861-63.) [Layvall.]

Lewes, GEORGE HENRY, littérateur, was born in London, 18th April 1817, a grandson of the comedian, CHARLES LEE LEWES (1740-1803). Educated partly at Greenwich under Dr Burney, and partly in Jersey and Brittany, he left school early to enter first a notary's office, and then the house of a Russian merchant. He next tried walking the hospitals, but could not stand the operating-room, so in 1838 proceeded to Germany, and remained there nearly two years, studying the life, language, and literature of the country. On his return to London he fell to work writing about anything and everything as a Penny Encyclopædist and Morning Chronicler, as a contributor afterwards to a dozen more journals, reviews, and magazines, and as editor of the Leader (1851-54), and of the Fortnightly (1865-66), which he himself founded. He was married unhappily and had children when his connection with George Eliot (q.v.) began in July 1854; it ended only with his death at their house in Regent's Park, 30th November 1878. Lewes was one of the best of critics and biographers; as a populariser of philosophy he was inferior to none, as a populariser of science inferior to few. His works, besides a tragedy and two novels (1841-48), include the Biographical History of Philosophy (1845; recast in 3d edition of 1867 as The History of Philosophy from Thales to Comte); The Spanish Drama (1846); a Life of Robespierre (1848); Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences (1853), which is more than a translation; the admirable Life and Works of Goethe (1855); Seaside Studies (1858); Physiology of Common Life (1859-60); Studies in Animal Life (1862); Aristotle (1864); On Actors and the Art of Acting (1875); and Problems of Life and Mind (1874-79).

Lewis, CHARLES GEORGE (1808-80), engraver after Landseer, was born at Enfield, and died at Felpham, Bognor.—His brother, JOHN FREDERICK (1805-76), was a water-colour painter of animal, Spanish, and Oriental subjects.

Lewis, SIR GEORGE, criminal solicitor, born in 1833, was made knight in 1893, baronet in 1902.

Lewis, SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL, was born in London, 21st April 1806, son of Sir T. F. Lewis, Bart., of Harpton Court, Radnorshire, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where in 1828 he took a first-class in classics and a second-class in mathematics. He was called to the bar in 1831, and became a Poor-law Commissioner in 1839. He was Liberal M.P. for Herefordshire 1847-52, and for the Radnor Boroughs from 1855. He rose to be financial secretary to the Treasury, Chancellor of the Exchequer under Palmerston 1855-58, Home Secretary 1859-61, and then War Secretary. He succeeded his father as second baronet in 1855, and died at Harpton Court, 13th April 1863. He wrote Origin of the Romance Languages (1835), Inquiry into the Credibility of Ancient Roman History (1855—against Niebuhr), Astronomy of the Ancients (1859), Dialogue on the Best Form of Government (1859), &c. He was editor of the Edinburgh Review from 1852 to 1855. See his Letters (1870) and Bagehot's Literary Studies (1879).

Lewis, MATTHEW GREGORY ('Monk Lewis'), was born in London, 9th July 1775, and educated at Westminster, at Christ Church, Oxford, and at Westmar, where he was introduced to Goethe. In 1794 he went as an attaché to the Hague, and there, inspired by Glanvill and the Mysteries of Udolpho, wrote Ambrosio, or the Monk (1795), the gruesome, unclean romance which made him so famous that in 1798 his invitation to dine at an Edinburgh hotel could elate Scott as nothing before or afterwards. A musical drama, The Castle Spectre (1798), The Bravo of Venice (1804), and a host more of blood-and-thunder plays, novels, and tales are forgotten; but two lines at least survive of one of his ballads, Alonso the Brave. In 1796 he entered parliament as a silent member, and in 1812 he inherited from his father two large estates in Jamaica. So, to better the condition of his slaves there, good-hearted, lachrymose, clever little 'Mat' forsook the society of the Prince Regent, Byron, and all his other great friends, and made the two voyages, in 1815-17, which furnished materials for his one really valuable work, the posthumous Journal of a West India Proprietor (1834). On his way home, in the Gulf of Florida, he died of yellow fever, 13th May 1818, and was buried at sea. See his Life and Correspondence (1839).

Leyden, JOHN, poet and orientalist, was born, a shepherd's son, at Denholm, Roxburghshire, 8th September 1775. In 1790 he entered Edinburgh University, and was licensed as a preacher in 1798. He helped Scott to gather materials for his Border Minstrelsy, especially for the essay on fairy superstitions. He was also a contributor to Lewis's Tales of Wonder. His first prose work was Discoveries of Europeans in Northern and Western Africa (1799). His translations and poems in the Edinburgh Magazine attracted attention; and Scenes of Infancy, descriptive of Teviotdale, was completed in 1803. In that year he sailed for India as assistant-surgeon at Madras; was surgeon and naturalist on the survey of Mysore and Travancore (1804); resided for a time at Penang; was professor in the Bengal College, and afterwards judge, commissioner of the Court of Requests, and assay-master of the mint at Calcutta. Meanwhile he translated the Gospels into five languages. He accompanied Lord Minto as interpreter to Java, and died of fever at Batavia, August 27, 1811. His ballads have taken a higher place than his longer poems. He knew thirty-four languages or dialects, and wrote a preliminary dissertation to the Compliment of Scotland (1801), an essay on Indo-Chinese languages and literature, Memoirs of Baber (completed by Erskine, 1826), and Malay Annals (1821). See his Poetical Remains (1819); Poems and Ballads, with reprint of memoir by Scott (1875); and Poetical Works, with memoir by T. Brown (1875).

Leys, HENRI JEAN AUGUSTE (1815-69), historical painter, was born and died in Antwerp. He was created baron by Leopold I. in 1862. See Sulzberger's Henri Leys (1885). [Lay.]

L'Hôpital, MICHEL DE (1504-73), French statesman, born at Aigueperse in Auvergne, studied law at Toulouse and Padua, and settled as an advocate in Paris at thirty. In 1547-48 he represented Henry II. at the Council of Trent, and then was in the household of the Duchess of Berri. In 1554 he became superintendent of finances, in 1600 chancellor of France. He strove to pacify the religious quarrel by staying the hand of the Catholic persecutors. After 1563 he lost ground, and in 1568 resigning the chancellorship, retired to his estate near Étampes. His Latin poems, speeches, memoirs, &c. were published in 1824-25. See Lives by Villemain (new ed. 1874), Tailandier (1861), and Dupré-Lasale (1875). [Lô-pee-tahl.]

Lhuyd, EDWARD (1660-1709), Welsh antiquary.

Libanius (314-393 A.D.), Greek sophist, born at Antioch, taught at Athens, Constantinople, and Antioch. A pagan, he yet was the instructor and friend of St Chrysostom and St Basil. His orations were edited by Reiske (1791-97), his letters by J. C. Wolf (1738). See Lives by Petit (1866) and Sievers (1868).

Liberius, born in Rome, became pope in 352, but was banished in 355 for refusing to confirm the decree against Athanasius (q.v.). In 358 he regained the papal throne. He died 24th Sept. 366.

Libri-Carrucci, GUILLAUME BRUTUS ICIUS TIMOLÉON, COUNT (1803-69), born at Florence, became professor of Mathematics at Pisa. In 1830, compromised in the Liberal movement, he fled to France, where he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, professor at the Sorbonne, inspector of public instruction, and superintendent of state libraries. He formed a splendid library; but, accused in 1847 of abstracting books and MSS. from public collections, he fled to England. In his absence he was condemned (1850) to ten years' imprisonment. He wrote Histoire des Sciences Mathématiques en Italie (1838-41), Mémoires de Mathématiques et de Physique (1829), &c. He died at Fiesole. [See brée Ka-roof'chee.]

Lichtenberg, GEORG CHRISTOPH (1742-99), physicist and satirist, born near Darmstadt, in 1770 became professor of Mathematics at Göttingen. He visited England, admired Garrick, and wrote a witty commentary on Hogarth's plates (1794). See works by Grisebach (1871), Meyer (1886), and Lauchert (1893).

Lick, JAMES (1796-1876), a Californian millionaire, born at Fredericksburg, Penn., the founder of the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton.

Liddell, HENRY GEORGE, born 6th Feb. 1811, from Charterhouse passed to Christ Church, Oxford, and took a double first in 1833. He became tutor of his college, and in 1845 professor of Moral Philosophy. Head-master of Westminster 1846-55, he returned to Christ Church as dean, was vice-chancellor 1870-74, resigned the deanship in 1891, and died 18th Jan. 1898. The great Greek Lexicon (1843; 7th ed. 1883), based on Passow, was a joint work by him and Robert Scott, D.D. (1811-87), master of Balliol 1854-70, and then Dean of Rochester. Liddell also wrote a History of Rome (1855; abridged as The Student's Rome). See Life by Thompson (1899).

Liddon, HENRY PARRY, D.D., born at North Stoneham, Hampshire, 20th August 1829, the son of a naval captain, at seventeen went up from King's College School, London, to Christ Church, Oxford, where in 1850 he graduated B.A. Ordained in 1852 as senior student of Christ Church, from 1854 to 1859 he was vice-principal of Cuddesdon Theological College, and in 1864 became a prebendary of Salisbury, in 1870 a canon of St Paul's, and Ireland professor of Exegesis at Oxford (till 1882). In 1866 he delivered his Bampton Lectures on the Divinity of Our Lord (1867; 13th ed. 1889). He strongly opposed the Church Discipline Act of 1874, and as warmly supported Mr Gladstone's crusade against the Bulgarian atrocities in 1876. In 1886 he declined the bishopric of Edinburgh, and in 1887 visited the Holy Land. Canon Liddon was the most able and eloquent exponent of Liberal High Church principles. He died suddenly at Weston-super-Mare, 9th Sept. 1890. An Analysis of the Epistle to the Romans was published in 1893; his Life of Pusey (q.v.) was edited by Johnston and Wilson. See his own Life by Johnston (1904).

Lie, JONAS (1833-1908), Norwegian novelist and poet, was born at Eker near Drammen, and abandoned law for literature. His novels, which give realistic pictures of life in Norway, especially of the fisher-folk, include The Visionary (1870; trans. 1894), The Three-master 'Future' (1872), The Pilot and his Wife (1874, trans. 1877), Go on (1882), One of Life's Slaves (1883; trans. 1896), A Whirlpool (1884), The Commodore's Daughters (1886, trans. 1892), Married Life (1887), and Maisa Jons (1889). He also published Short Stories, Poems (1886), and the comedies Grabow's Cat (1880) and Lystige Kmer (1894). [See.]

Lieber, FRANCIS (1800-72), writer on law, government, &c., was born in Berlin, and died in New York, having fought at Waterloo, had to escape to America as a Liberal in 1827, and filled chairs in Columbia, S.C., and New York. See Life by T. Sergeant Perry (Boston, 1882). [See ber.]

Liebig, JUSTUS, FREIHERR VON, chemist, born at Darmstadt, 12th May 1803, studied at Bonn and Erlangen, and in 1822 went to Paris, where Gay-Lussac took him into his laboratory. In 1824 he became professor of Chemistry at Giessen, and in 1852 at Munich. He died 18th April 1873, having in 1845 been created Baron. Liebig was one of the most illustrious chemists of his age; equally great in method and in practical application, he made his mark in organic chemistry, animal chemistry, the doctrine of alcohols, &c. He was the founder of agricultural chemistry, and a discoverer of chloroform and chloral. As inventor of extract of beef and prepared infant food his name is known throughout the world. By him an admirable chemical laboratory—practically the first—was established at Giessen. He vastly extended the method of organic analysis, and invented appliances for analysis by combustion and Liebig's condenser. His most important treatises, mostly translated into English, were on the analysis of organic bodies (1837), Animal Chemistry (1842), Organic Chemistry (1843), Researches on Flesh and its Preparation (1847), Agricultural Chemistry (1855), Chemische Briefe (1844); besides numerous papers in scientific journals (317 in the Royal Society's Transactions). See four volumes of his Correspondence (1884-92), and books by A. W. Hofmann (1876), W. A. Shenstone (1895), and Vollhard (1909). [See big.]

Liebknecht, WILHELM (1826-1900), social democrat, born at Giessen, for his part in the Baden insurrection of 1848-49 had to take refuge in Switzerland and England; returned to Germany in 1862; and during a two years' imprisonment was elected to the Reichstag (1874). With Bebel (q.v.) he edited Vorwärts. See Miss Sellers in the Fortnightly for June 1896. [See liebknecht.]

Liebrecht, FELIX, linguist and folklorist, born at Namslau in Silesia, 13th March 1812, was professor of German at Liège 1849-67. He early made himself known by articles on the origin and diffusion of folk-tales, and by translations enriched with annotations. Among these are Basile's Pentamerone, with a preface by Jakob Grimm (1846); Barloam und Josephat (1847); Dunlop's Geschichte der Prosadichtungen, with large additions (1851); and part of Gervase of Tilbury's Otia Imperialia (1856). He died at St Hubert in Belgium, 3d August 1890. [See liebrecht.]

Lievensz, JAN (1607-74), historical painter and etcher, born at Leyden, died at Amsterdam.

Lightfoot, HANNAH. See GEORGE III.

Lightfoot, JOHN (1602-75), Hebraist, born at Stoke-upon-Trent, studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, and in 1630 became rector of Ashley, Staffordshire, in 1643 of St Bartholomew's, London, and in 1644 of Great Munden, Herts. He was one of the most influential members of the Westminster Assembly, but, as an 'Erastian,' often stood alone. In 1650 he was appointed master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, in 1654-55 vice-chancellor, and in 1668 a prebendary of Ely, where he died. Lightfoot's chief works were the unfinished Harmony of the Four Evangelists (1644-50); Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles (1645); The Harmony, Chronicle, and Order of the Old Testament (1647); of the New (1655); and Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ (1658-74), the great labour of his life. The best edition of his works is by Pitman, with Life (1822-25).

Lightfoot, JOSEPH BARBER, Bishop of Durham, was born at Liverpool, 13th April 1828, and from King Edward's School, Birmingham, passed in 1847 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1851 as thirteenth wrangler, senior classic, and Chancellor's medallist. Elected fellow in 1852, and ordained in 1854, he became tutor of Trinity in 1857, Hulsean professor of Divinity in 1861, canon of St Paul's in 1871, Lady Margaret professor of Divinity at Cambridge in 1875, and Bishop of Durham in 1879. Dr Lightfoot's influence at Cambridge was of incalculable importance. A supreme grammarian and textual critic, he gave the world admirable commentaries on the epistles to the Galatians (1860), Philippians (1868), Colossians and Philemon (1875). His work on the Apostolic Fathers embraces only Clement of Rome (1869-77; new ed. 1890) and Ignatius and Polycarp (1885; 2d ed. 1889). Other works were On a Fresh Revision of the English New Testament (1871), an edition of Mansel's Gnostic Heresies (1875), Leaders in the Northern Church (1890), The Apostolic Age (1892), Biblical Essays (1893), and several volumes of sermons. He contributed to the Journal of Philology, Smith's Dictionaries of the Bible, Christian Antiquities, and Christian Biography, and published in the Contemporary Review a crushing answer to Supernatural Religion (reprinted 1889). The work of the Church Temperance Society and the White Cross Army was furthered by his exertions. He died at Bourne-mouth, Dec. 21, 1889, and was buried at Durham. See short Life by Westcott (1894).

Ligne, CHARLES JOSEPH, PRINCE DE (1735-1814), son of an imperial field-marshal whose seat was at Ligne near Tournai, was born at Brussels, and as an Austrian soldier served at Kolin, Leuthen, Hochkirch, and the siege of Belgrade (1789). A skilful diplomatist, the favourite of Maria Theresa and Catharine of Russia, and the friend of Frederick the Great, Voltaire, and Rousseau, he wrote Mélanges (34 vols. 1795-1811), Œuvres Posthumes (1817), a Life of Prince Eugene (1809), and Lettres et Pensées (1809). See monographs by Thittrhein (Vien. 1876) and Le Bled (Par. 1890), and the Edinburgh Review for July 1890. [Leen-ye.]

Ligonier, JOHN, EARL (1680-1770), born at Castres of Huguenot parentage, escaped to Dublin in 1697, and from 1702 served with high distinction under Marlborough. Colonel from 1720 of a splendid Irish regiment of dragoons, he commanded the foot at Fontenoy (1745), was taken prisoner at Val (1747), was made commander-in-chief and a viscount (1757), an earl and field-marshal (1766). He was buried in Westminster Abbey. [Usually Lig-o-neer.]

Liguori, ST ALFONSO MARIA DE, born at Naples, 27th September 1696, forsook law to take orders, and in 1732 with twelve companions founded the order of Liguorians or Redemptorists. Its object is the religious instruction of the people and the reform of morality by visiting, preaching, and hearing confessions, under the direction of the parish clergy. In 1762 he became Bishop of Sant'Agata de'Goti, and proved an ideal bishop; but he resigned in 1775, and returned to his order. He died 1st August 1787, and was canonised in 1839. His works, which are very popular, embrace divinity, casuistry, exegesis, history, canon law, hagiography, asceticism, even poetry. His Theologia Moralis, a modification of the 'probabilistic system,' is largely used in the direction of consciences. The completest edition of his works is by Monza (70 vols.). See Life by Faber (1849), and a short Life (1880). [Lee-go-o'-ree.]

Li Hung-Chang, Chinese statesman, was born 26th January 1823, and took the Hanlin degree in 1849. In 1853, in the Taiping rebellion, he joined the Imperial army as secretary, was appointed a provincial judge, and in 1861 governor of Kiangsu, out of which, in conjunction with 'Chinese' Gordon, he drove the rebels in 1863. For his services he received the Yellow Jacket and Peacock's Feather, and was made an hereditary noble of the third class. In 1864 he was appointed Governor-general of the Kiang provinces, and in 1872 of Chih-li and senior Grand Secretary. He founded the Chinese navy and promoted a native mercantile marine. On the outbreak of the war with Japan (1894), Li, in supreme command of the military and naval forces in Corea, was thwarted by the incompetence, dishonesty, and cowardice of inferior officers. The Chinese forces were swept out of Corea, and Li, whose policy was that of peace, was deprived of his honours and summoned to Peking. With this last command he refused to comply, and the disastrous course of events soon compelled the emperor to restore him to honour. Through his efforts the war was brought to a termination in 1895, China ceding Formosa and paying a war indemnity of £35,000,000. Professedly friendly to foreigners, and well aware of the value of Western culture and industry, he visited Russia, Germany, France, England, and America in 1896. Intriguing with Russia, he fell in 1898, and died Nov. 1901. See Lives by Douglas (1895) and Mrs Little (1903).

Lilburne, JOHN (c. 1614-57), Leveller or ultra-republican, born at Greenwich, and whipped and imprisoned by the Star Chamber in 1638, rose in the Parliamentary army to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He became an indefatigable agitator, thought Cromwell's republic too aristocratic, and demanded greater liberty of conscience and numerous reforms. Repeatedly imprisoned for his treasonable pamphlets, he died at Eltham.

Lillo, GEORGE (1693-1739), dramatist, born in London of mixed Dutch and English Dissenting parentage, whilst carrying on the business of a jeweller wrote seven plays, of which Fatal Curiosity (1736) and George Barnwell (1732) are both admirably constructed, though the language is inflated and conventional. His Arden of Feversham (brought out 1759) is a weak version of an anonymous play of that title (1592, reprinted by A. H. Bullen 1888). See Life by T. Davies prefixed to his Dramatic Works (2d ed. 1810).

Lilly, WILLIAM, astrologer, born at Diseworth, Leicestershire, 1st May 1602, in 1620 went to London, where for seven years he served an ancient citizen, married his widow, and on her death in 1633 came into £1000. He took up astrology, and soon acquired a considerable fame and large profits. In 1634 he obtained permission to search for hidden treasure in the cloisters of Westminster, but was driven from his midnight work by a storm, which he ascribes to demons. From 1644 till his death he annually issued his Mertinus Anglicus, Junior, containing vaticinations. In the Civil War he attached himself to the Parliamentary party as soon as it promised to be successful, and was rewarded with a pension. After the Restoration he was imprisoned for a little, and was reapprehended on suspicion of knowing something about the great fire of London in 1666. He died at Hershams, 9th June 1681. He wrote nearly a score of works on astrology. See his History of his Life and Times (1715).

Lillywhite, FREDERICK (1792-1854), cricketer, famous as a round-arm bowler, was born near Goodwood, and bred a bricklayer. 'Me bowling, Pilch batting, and Box keeping wicket' was his definition of cricket.

Lily, JOHN. See LYL. Y.

Lilye, or LILY, WILLIAM (c. 1468-1522), classical grammarian, was born at Odiham, Hampshire; studied at Magdalen College, Oxford; visited Jerusalem, Rhodes, and Italy, and learned Greek from refugees from Constantinople. After teaching for a while in London he was appointed (1512) by Dean Colet first head-master of his new school of St Paul's; this post he held till he was carried off by the plague. Lilye, who has good claims to be considered the first who taught Greek in London, had a hand in Colet's Brevissima Institutio, which, as corrected by Erasmus, and redacted by Lilye himself, was known as the Eton Latin Grammar. Besides this he wrote Latin poems (Basel, 1518) and a volume of Latin verse against a rival schoolmaster (1521).

Limborch, PHILIP VAN (1633-1712), was preacher at Gouda and Amsterdam, and became in 1668 professor in the Remonstrant or Arminian college at Amsterdam. Of his numerous works the most valuable are Institutiones Theologicæ Christianæ (1686; Eng. trans. 1702) and History of the Inquisition (trans. 1731). [ch guttural.]

Limousin, or LIMOSIN, LÉONARD (c. 1505-77), painter in enamel, flourished from 1532 to 1574 at the French court.

Lin'acre, THOMAS, born at Canterbury about 1460, studied at Oxford, was elected fellow of All-Souls' in 1484, and went to Italy, where he learned Greek, and took his M.D. at Padua. About 1501 Henry VII. made him tutor to Prince Arthur. As king's physician to Henry VII. and Henry VIII. he practised in London; he also founded the Royal College of Physicians. Late in life he took orders. He died 20th October 1524. Linacre was one of the earliest champions of the New Learning. He translated several of Galen's works into Latin, and wrote some grammatical treatises. See Life by Dr Noble Johnson (1835).

Lincoln, ABRAHAM, sixteenth president of the United States, was born in Hardin co., Ky., 12th February 1809, the son of a restless western pioneer. In 1816 his father made a new home in the forests of Indiana. Abraham learned the little that was taught in the backwoods schools, and was employed in farm-work until at nineteen he took on a flat-boat a cargo to New Orleans. When he was twenty-one his father removed to central Illinois, and the son, after a second voyage to New Orleans, returned to be a clerk in a store at New Salem, Illinois. Defeated as a candidate for the legislature, he purchased a small store, whose failure left him in debt; but, being made village postmaster and deputy county surveyor, he studied law and grammar. Elected to the legislature in 1834, he served until 1842, being leader of the Whigs. At Springfield, in 1842, he married Mary Todd (1818-82). In 1846 he sat in congress; but professional work was drawing him from politics when in 1854 Stephen A. Douglas repealed the Missouri Compromise of 1820, and reopened the question of slavery in the territories. The bill roused intense feeling throughout the North, and Douglas defended his position in a speech at Springfield in October. Lincoln delivered in reply a speech which first fully revealed his power as a debater. He was then elected to the legislature. When the Republican party was organised in 1856 to oppose the extension of slavery Lincoln was its most prominent leader in Illinois, and the delegates of his state presented him for the vice-presidency. In 1858 Douglas, seeking re-election to the senate, began a canvass of Illinois in advocacy of his views of 'popular sovereignty.' Lincoln was also a candidate, and the contest, which gave Douglas the election, attracted the attention of the whole country. In May 1860 the Republican convention on the third ballot nominated Lincoln for the presidency. The Democratic party were divided between Douglas and Breckinridge. After an exciting campaign Lincoln received a popular vote of 1,866,462; Douglas, 1,375,157; Breckinridge, 847,953; and Bell, 590,631. Of the electors Lincoln had 180; Breckinridge, 72; Bell, 39; and Douglas, 12. South Carolina now seceded from the Union, and with the six Gulf states formed, in February 1861, the Confederate States of America. Lincoln, at his inaugural address on 4th March, declared the Union perpetual, argued the futility of secession, and expressed his determination that the laws should be faithfully executed in all the states. On April 12, 1861, the Confederates began the Civil War by attacking Fort Sumter in Charleston harbour. Lincoln called a special session of congress, summoned 75,000 militia, ordered the enlistment of 65,000 regulars, and proclaimed a blockade of the southern ports. The Confederacy soon had control of eleven states, and put in the field 100,000 men. The first important battle was fought at Bull Run, Virginia, July 21, 1861, and resulted in the rout of the Union army. On September 22, 1862, just after McClellan's victory at Antietam, Lincoln proclaimed that on and after January 1, 1863, all slaves in states or parts of states then in rebellion should be free. On the following New-year's Day the final proclamation of emancipation was made. This greatest achievement of his administration, wrung from him by the exigencies of civil war, was completed by the passage (1865) of the Thirteenth Amendment of the Constitution, which he planned and urged. In July 1863 Grant's capture of Vicksburg restored to the Union full control of the Mississippi River, while Meade's defeat of Lee at Gettysburg destroyed the last hope of the Confederates to transfer the seat of war north of the Potomac. General Grant, called to the chief command in March 1864, entered upon that policy of persistent attrition of the Confederate forces which finally brought peace. In the Republican Convention in June Lincoln was unanimously nominated for a second term. The Democrats nominated General McClellan. In November Lincoln received of the popular vote 2,210,000 and McClellan 1,800,000; of the electoral votes Lincoln had 212, McClellan 21. In his second inaugural address, in March 1865, Lincoln set forth the profound moral significance of the war. On 14th April at Ford's Theatre, Washington, he was shot by J. Wilkes Booth, an actor, and died next morning, April 15, 1865. Lincoln was fair and direct in speech and action, steadfast in principle, sympathetic, and charitable, a man of strict morality, abstemious, and familiar with the Bible, though not a professed member of any church. His fame is established as the saviour of his country and the liberator of a race. Of his four sons, only Robert Todd Lincoln, born August 1, 1843, reached manhood. He was secretary of war 1881-85, and U.S. minister to England 1889-93. See Lives of Lincoln by Arnold (1885), Herndon and Weik (1889), Nicolay and Hay (10 vols. 1891), Coffin (1892), Morse (1893), Brooks (1893), Thompson (1895), and Binns (1907).

Lincoln, BENJAMIN (1733-1810), born at Hingham, Mass., in 1776 reinforced Washington after the defeat on Long Island; in 1777 was appointed major-general; in August received command of the southern department; and in 1780 was besieged by Clinton in Charleston, and compelled to capitulate. He took part in the siege of Yorktown, and was secretary of war 1781-84.

Lind, JAMES (1736-1812), Scotch physician and scientist, settled at Windsor about 1777, and is mentioned by Madame D'Arblay and Shelley.

Lind, JENNY. See GOLDSCHMIDT, MADAME.

Lindau, PAUL, born 3d June 1839 at Magdeburg, edited and founded Die Gegenwart and Nord und Süd, and wrote books of travel, Aus Venetien (1864), Aus Paris (1865), and Aus der Neuen Welt (1884). His critical skill is shown in his Harmlose Briefe (1870), Literarische Rücksichtslosigkeiten (1871), Molière (1871) and Alfred de Musset (1877), Dramaturgische Blätter (1875-78), and Aufsätze (1875). But he is better known as a writer of plays and novels; the most successful of the former was perhaps Maria und Magdalena. The novels include Herr und Frau Beyer (1882), Toggenburg (1883), Mayo (1884), Berlin (1886-87), Im Fieber (1889), and Die Gehilfin (1894). In 1895 he became theatre director at Meiningen, and in 1899 in Berlin.—His brother, RUDOLF, author and diplomatist, was born at Gardelegen (1829), lived in Japan, China, Cochin China, and America (1860-70), and wrote travels, novels, &c., in French, English, and German.

Lindenschmit, WILHELM (1829-95), historical painter, was born and died at Munich.

Lindley, JOHN (1799-1865), botanist, was born at Catton near Norwich, the son of a nursery-gardener, author of Orchard and Kitchen Gardens. Appointed assistant-secretary to the Horticultural Society in 1822, he from 1829 to 1860 was professor of Botany in University College, London.

Ling, PEHR HENRIK (1776-1839), Swedish poet and teacher of gymnastics.

Lingard, JOHN, born at Winchester, 5th February 1771, of Catholic parents, was sent in 1782 to the English College of Douay, where he remained till the Revolution. He went with the refugees to the college established at Crookhall, near Durham, and afterwards at Ushaw, becoming vice-president and professor of Philosophy. In 1795 he received priest's orders, and in 1811 accepted the mission of Hornby, near Lancaster, declining the offer of a chair at Maynooth, as fourteen years later of a cardinal's hat. In 1821 he obtained his doctorate from Pius VII., and in 1839 received a crown pension of £300. He died 17th July 1851. His Antiquity of the Anglo-Saxon Church (1806) was the pioneer of what became the labour of his life—a History of England to 1638 (1819-30; 6th ed. 1854-55). This attracted much attention; it was fiercely assailed in the Edinburgh; but Lingard by his replies increased his reputation as a candid and judicious Catholic scholar. See his Life and Letters by M. Haile and E. Bonney (1911).

Linley, THOMAS (1732-95), born at Wells, taught singing and conducted concerts at Bath. In 1775 his son-in-law Sheridan induced him to set his comic opera The Duenna to music. In 1776 they and Ford bought Garrick's share of Drury Lane Theatre. During the next fifteen years Linley was its musical director, composing songs, occasional pieces, and the operas Gentle Shepherd (1781), Carnival of Venice (1781), Selima and Azor (1784), Strangers at Home (1786), Love in the East (1788), &c.—His son THOMAS (1756-78) possessed real musical genius, and WILLIAM (1767-1835) composed glees, songs, &c.

Linnæus, or LINNÉ, CARL, founder of modern botany, was born the son of the parish clergyman of Råshult in South Sweden, 23d May 1707, and studied at Lund and Upsala. In 1730 he was appointed assistant to the professor of botany in Upsala. An exploring trip through Swedish Lapland produced his Flora Lapponica (1737). Then followed a journey of scientific exploration through Dalecarlia; and in 1735-38 he was in Holland, mainly at Leyden, working at botany and arranging gardens. Meanwhile he had visited England and Paris, and published Systema Naturæ Fundamenta Botanica, Genera Plantarum, Critica Botanica, in which he expounded his system of classification, based on sexual characteristics, long the dominant system. He practised as a physician in Stockholm, in 1742 became professor of Botany at Upsala, and greatly increased the fame of the university. In 1745-46 he published Flora Suecica and Fauna Suecica; in 1751 Philosophia Botanica; and in 1753 Species Plantarum, insisting on the identification of plants by a second or trivial name in addition to the generic name. He was ennobled in 1757, and died 10th Jan. 1778. See Life by Stöver (1792; trans. 1794), and Through the Fields with Linnæus by Mrs Florence Caddy (1887).

Linnell, JOHN (1792-1882), artist, was born in London, and studied at the Royal Academy. He painted portraits of Blake, Malthus, Whately, Peel, Carlyle, &c. His landscapes were mostly Surrey scenes—as 'Harvest Showers,' 'A coming Storm,' 'Autumn,' 'The Heath,' and 'Removing Timber.' See Life by A. T. Story (1892).

Linskill, MARY (1840-91), novelist, born at Whitby, was apprenticed to a milliner, but took to writing, and published Tales from the North Riding (1871), Between the Heather and the Northern Sea (1884), The Haven under the Hill (1886), In Exchange for a Soul (1887), &c.

Linton, SIR JAMES DRUMGOLE, painter, born in London, 26th December 1840, laboured with success to elevate the status of painting in water-colours; in 1867 became a member of the Institute of Water-colour Painters, in 1884, and again in 1909, president; and in 1885 was knighted.

Linton, WILLIAM (1791-1876), painter of classic landscapes, born at Liverpool, died in London.

Linton, WILLIAM JAMES (1812-97), wood-engraver, born in London, did some of his finest work for the Illustrated London News. In 1867 he went out to the United States, and settled at New Haven, Conn. A zealous Chartist, he wrote The Plein of Freedom (1852), Claribel and other Poems (1865), Hints on Wood-engraving (1879), Life of Thomas Paine (1879), A Manual of Wood-engraving (1884), Poems and Translations (1889), The Masters of Wood-engraving (1890), and a Life of Whittier (1893). See his Memories (1895).—His wife, ELIZA LYNN, born at Keswick, 10th Feb. 1822, had published her first novel a dozen years before their marriage in 1858. Together they prepared a volume on The Lake Country (1864), he furnishing the illustrations. In 1867 they separated. She died 14th July 1898. Mrs Lynn Linton's numerous novels included Patricia Kemball (1874) and The One Too Many (1894); Joshua Davidson (1872) and Christopher Kirkland (1885) are of more serious purpose than the rest. She did much magazine work, and her 'Girl of the Period' articles in the Saturday were collected in 1883.

Linwood, MARY (1755-1845), worker of worsted-work pictures and musical composer, was born at Birmingham, and died at Leicester.

Lionardo da Vinci. See LEONARDO.

Lippi, FRA FILIPPO, 'Lippo Lippi' (c. 1406-69), religious painter, was born in Florence. His greatest work was on the choir walls of Prato cathedral; and he was working in the cathedral at Spoleto when he died. See Sir J. Crowe in Nineteenth Century (Nov. 1896).—His son, FILIPPINO LIPPI (c. 1458-1504), painted celebrated frescoes in Florentine and Roman churches. Easel pictures by him are 'The Virgin and Saints,' 'The Adoration of the Magi,' and 'The Vision of St Francis.'

Lippincott, JOSHUA BALLINGER (1816-86), born in Burlington, N.J., had charge of a book-seller's business in Philadelphia 1834-36, and then founded his well-known publishing firm. Lippincott's Magazine dates from 1868.

Lipsius, JUSTUS, or JOEST LIPS (1547-1606), a great classical scholar of Louvain, who was successively Catholic, Lutheran, Calvinist, and once more Catholic. See French Lives of him by Gales-loot (1877) and Amiel (1884).

Lipsius, RICHARD ADELBERT, German theologian, born at Gera, February 14, 1830, studied at Leipzig, was called to a chair at Vienna in 1861, at Kiel in 1865, and at Jena in 1871, and died 19th August 1892. In 1875 he founded the Jahrbücher für Protest. Theologie. Among his works are Glaube und Lehre (1871), a book on the legend of Peter at Rome (1872), a manual of dogmatics (1876), Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten und Apostellegenden (1883-87), and Philosophie und Religion (1885).—His brother, JUSTUS HERMANN (born 9th May 1834), in 1869 became professor of Classical Philology at Leipzig, and edited the De Corona of Demosthenes (1876), &c.—Their sister MARIE (born 30th December 1837) has made valuable contributions to music and its history.

Liscow, CHRISTIAN (1701-60), German satirist.

Lisle, ALICIA (c. 1614-85), the widow of one of Cromwell's lords, was beheaded at Winchester for sheltering a rebel fugitive from Sedgewoor. At Charles I.'s execution she had said that her 'blood leaped within her to see the tyrant fall.'

Lisle. See ROUGET DE LISLE.

List, FRIEDRICH (1789-1846), a German political economist, a disciple of Adam Smith, was born at Reutlingen, and died at Kufstein. See Life by Goldschmidt (Berl. 1878).

Lister, JOSEPH, LORD, born 5th April 1827, was the second son of the microscopist, Joseph Jackson Lister, F.R.S. (1786-1869), of Upton, Essex. He graduated at London University in arts (1847) and medicine (1852), and became F.R.C.S. (1852) and F.R.C.S.E. (1855), after being house-surgeon to Syne, whose daughter he married in 1856. He was successively lecturer on surgery, Edinburgh; regius professor of Surgery, Glasgow; professor of Clinical Surgery, Edinburgh (1869), of Clinical Surgery, King's College Hospital, London (1877-93); President of the Royal Society (1895-1900). In addition to important observations on the coagulation of the blood, inflammation, &c., his great work was the introduction (1860) of the antiseptic system, which has revolutionised modern surgery. He was president of the British Association in 1896, received many foreign honours, and was made a baronet in 1883 and a peer in 1897. He died 10th February 1912.

Lister, THOMAS HENRY (1800-42), from 1836 the first registrar-general, published Granby (1826) and five other novels, a tragedy, &c.

Liston, JOHN (1776-1846), low comedian, played from 1805 to 1837 at the Haymarket, Drury Lane, and the Olympic. 'Paul Pry' (1825) was his best creation. He was born and died in London.

Liston, ROBERT, surgeon, born at Ecclesmachan manse, Linlithgow, 28th Oct. 1794, studied at Edinburgh and London, and settled in Edinburgh in 1818 as lecturer on surgery and anatomy. His surgical skill soon won him a European reputation; in 1835 he became professor of Clinical Surgery at University College, London. He died 7th Dec. 1847. His chief works are Elements of Surgery (1831) and Practical Surgery (1837).

Liszt, FRANZ, was born at Raiding near Oedenburg in Hungary, October 22, 1811. At nine he played in public, and was sent to study at Vienna. He afterwards went to Paris, studied and played there. He next made a tour to Vienna, Munich, Stuttgart, and Strasburg; visited England thrice (1824-27); in 1831 heard Paganini, and was fired by the resolve to become the Paganini of the piano. He became intimate with most of the great littérateurs then in Paris, and from 1835 to 1845 lived with the Comtesse d'Agoult (q.v.). In 1849, at the height of popularity, he retired to Weimar to direct the opera and concerts, to compose and teach. Here he brought out Wagner's Lohengrin and Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini; and Weimar became the musical centre of Germany. In 1861 he resigned his appointment, and his life was subsequently divided mainly between Weimar, Rome, and Budapest. In 1865 he received minor orders in the Church of Rome, and was known as Abbé. His visit to London in 1886 was a triumphal progress. He died at Baireuth, July 31, 1886, and there is buried. As a pianist Liszt was unapproachable. His supreme command of technique was forgotten by hearers in admiration of the poetic qualities of his playing. His literary works on music include monographs on Chopin and Franz, and the music of the Gypsies. Some of his transcriptions for the piano are regarded the finest ever made; his Hungarian rhapsodies are marvellous. His pianoforte works are of enormous number. All his original works have a very distinct, sometimes a very strange, individuality. In his twelve symphonic poems he created a new form of orchestral music. One or two masses, the 'Legend of St Elizabeth, and a few other works, embody his religious aspirations. See his Letters (trans. by Constance Bache, 1894); Lives by Ramann (1880-94; trans. 1882), Nohl (trans. Chicago, 1884), Martin (1886), Beanfort (1886), Göllerich (Leip. 1888), and Vogel (Leip. 1888); Janka Wohl, Recollections (1888); Hervey's Liszt and his Work (1911); and Franz Liszt (1911) by Cosima Wagner.

Lithgow, WILLIAM, born at Lanark in 1582, had already visited the Shetlands, Bohemia, Switzerland, &c., when, in 1610, he set out on foot from Paris to Palestine and Egypt. His second tramp led him through North Africa from Tunis to Fez, and home by way of Hungary and Poland. In his last journey (1619-21) to Spain via Ireland he was seized as a spy at Malaga and tortured. At London Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, promised him reparation, but contented himself with promising. So Lithgow assaulted, or by another account was assaulted by, him in the king's ante-room, for which he was clapt into the Marshalsea. He died at Lanark, perhaps in 1645. His interesting Rare Adventures and Painful Peregrinations was published in a complete form in 1632 (new ed. 1906), incompletely in 1614. Besides he wrote The Siege of Breda (1637), Siege of Newcastle (1645), Poems (ed. by Maidment, 1863), &c.

Little, THOMAS. See MOORE.

Little, WILLIAM JOHN KNOX, an eloquent High Church preacher, born in 1839 at Stewartstown, co. Tyrone, in 1832 graduated from Trinity, Cambridge, and in 1881 became a canon of Worcester, in 1902 sub-dean.

Littledale, RICHARD FREDERICK, LL.D., D.C.L. (1833-90), born in Dublin, a Ritualistic clergyman, from 1857 resident in London, who wrote much against Romanism.

Littleton, ADAM (1627-94), compiler of a Latin dictionary (1673), was born at Halesowen, and in 1674 became a prebendary of Westminster.

Littleton, or LYTTLETON, SIR THOMAS (1402-81), jurist, born at Frankley House, Bromsgrove, was recorder of Coventry in 1450, king's sergeant in 1455, in 1466 judge of common pleas, and in 1475 a knight of the Bath. His reputation rests on his treatise on Tenures, written in law French, first printed at London (? 1481), and done into English about 1500. It was the text that Coke (q.v.) commented on in his Coke upon Littleton.

Litton, MARIE (1847-84), an actress, famous in old comedy, was a native of Derbyshire, her real name Lowe, and married a Mr Wybrow Robertson.

Litré, MAXIMILIEN PAUL ÉMILE, born in Paris, 1st February 1801, from medicine turned to philology. His translation of Hippocrates (q.v.) procured his election in 1839 to the Academy of Inscriptions. He fought on the barricades in 1830, was one of the principal editors of the National down to 1851, and became an enthusiastic Comtist. La Poésie Homérique et l'ancienne Poésie Française (1847) was an attempt to render book i. of the Iliad in the style of the Trouvères. In 1854 Litré became editor of the Journal des Savants. His splendid Dictionnaire de la Langue Française (1863-72; supplement, 1878) did not prevent the Academy in 1863 from rejecting its author, whom Bishop Dupanloup denounced as holding impious doctrines. In 1871 Gambetta appointed him professor of History and Geography at the École Polytechnique; he was chosen representative of the Seine department in the National Assembly; and in December 1871 the Academy at last admitted him. He died 2d June 1881. Other works of Litré's were: French translations of Strauss's Life of Jesus (1839-40) and of Pliny's Natural History; Histoire de la Langue Française (1862), Paroles de Philosophie Positive (1859), Auguste Comte et la Philosophie Positive (1863), Auguste Comte et Stuart Mill (1866), Médecine et Médecins (1872), La Science au Point de Vue Philosophique (1873), Littérature et Histoire (1875), Fragments de Philosophie Positive (1876), and Œuvres Complètes d'Armand Carrel (1857). See Sainte-Beuve's Notice sur M. Litré (1863), the Edinburgh Review (1882), and the Century (1884).

Lituprand, or LUITFRAND (c. 922-72), was born of a Longobard family in Italy, passed from the service of Berengar, king of Italy, to that of the Emperor Otto I. Otto made him Bishop of Cremona, and sent him on an embassy to Constantinople. His Antapodosis treats of history from 886 to 950. De Rebus Gestis Ottonis covers 960-964, and De Legatione Constantinopolitana is a satire on the Greek court. See his works in Pertz's Monumenta Germaniæ, and works by Köpke (1842) and Baldeschi (1889).

Liverpool, ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON, EARL OF, statesman, was born 7th June 1770, the son of the first Earl (1727-1808). He was educated at the Charterhouse and Christ Church, Oxford, and entered parliament in 1791 as member for Rye. A Tory with Liberal ideas on trade and finance, in 1794 he became a member of the India Board, and in 1801 as Foreign Secretary negotiated the unpopular treaty of Amiens. In 1803 he was created Lord Hawkesbury, and on Pitt's return to power he went to the Home Office. On the death of Pitt he declined to form an administration. In 1807 he again took the Home Office, and next year succeeded his father as Earl of Liverpool. In Perceval's ministry of 1809 he was Secretary for War and the Colonies. In 1812 he formed an administration which lasted for nearly fifteen years. The attitude of the government to Poland, Austria, Italy, and Naples, coercive measures at home, and an increase in the duty on corn were regarded as reactionary. Lord Liverpool himself was a Free Trader, and ultimately sought to liberalise the tariff. Notwithstanding the blunder of the sinking fund, his financial policy generally was sound, enlightened, and economical. He united the old and the new Tories at a critical period. In Feb. 1827 he was struck with apoplexy, and died 4th December 1828. See Life by C. D. Yonge (3 vols. 1868).

Livingston, an American family, descended from the fifth Lord Livingstone, guardian of Mary, Queen of Scots, and from his grandson, John Livingstone (1603-72), minister of Ancrum, banished for refusing the oath of allegiance to Charles II., and from 1663 pastor of the Scots kirk at Rotterdam. His son Robert (1654-1725) went to America in 1673, settled at Albany, and received a grant of a vast tract of land. One of his grandsons, Philip (1716-78), signed the Declaration of Independence; another, William (1723-90), was the first and able governor of New Jersey 1776-90.—ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, great-grandson of the first Robert, was born in New York, 27th November 1746, and admitted to the bar in 1773. Sent to congress in 1775, he was one of the five charged with drawing up the Declaration of Independence, and till 1801 was chancellor of New York state. As minister plenipotentiary at Paris he negotiated the cession of Louisiana. He enabled Fulton to construct his first steamer, and introduced in America the use of sulphate of lime as a manure, and the merino sheep. He died 26th February 1813. See Life by F. De Peyster (1876). — EDWARD LIVINGSTONE, also a great-grandson of the first Robert, was born at Clermont, N.Y., 26th May 1764, and called to the bar in 1785. He sat in congress from 1795 to 1801, when he became U.S. district attorney for New York, and mayor of New York; but in 1803, owing to a subordinate's misappropriations, he found himself in debt to the federal government. He handed over his property to his creditors, and in 1804 settled in New Orleans, where he obtained lucrative practice at the bar. During the second war with England he was aide-de-camp to Gen. Jackson; and 1822-29 he represented New Orleans in congress. In 1823-24 he systematised the civil code of Louisiana. His criminal code was completed, but not directly adopted. Livingstone was elected in 1829 to the senate, and in 1831 appointed secretary of state. In 1833 he went to France as plenipotentiary. He died at Rhinebeck, N.Y., 23d May 1836. See Life by Hunt (1864).

Livingstone, DAVID, missionary and traveller, was born at Low Blantyre, Lanarkshire, 19th March 1813, and from ten till twenty-four years of age was a worker in a cotton-factory there. The reading of Dick's Philosophy of a Future State kindled the desire to become a missionary; and he resolved to qualify himself in medicine. Having completed his studies in London, he was attracted to Africa by Dr Moffat; and, ordained under the London Missionary Society in November 1840, he set sail for Africa, and reaching the Bechuana country in July 1841, for several years laboured there. Repulsed by the Boers in an effort to plant native missionaries in the Transvaal, he travelled northward, and discovered Lake Ngami; and determined to explore the whole country westwards to the Atlantic and eastward to the Indian Ocean. The journey occupied from June 1852 to May 1856, when he arrived at Quillimane. It was accomplished with a mere handful of followers, amid sicknesses, perils, and difficulties without number. But a vast amount of valuable information was gathered respecting the country, its products, and the native tribes. Not the least among his discoveries was the Victoria Falls of the Zambesi. He was welcomed home with extraordinary enthusiasm. During the fifteen months spent in England and Scotland he published his Missionary Travels (1857), and having severed his connection with the London Missionary Society in order to be free to undertake future explorations, was appointed by government chief of an expedition for exploring the Zambesi. Setting out in March 1858, he explored the Zambesi, Shiré, and Rovuma; discovered Lakes Shirwa and Nyasa, and came to the conclusion that Lake Nyasa and its neighbourhood was the best field for commercial and missionary operations, though he was hampered by the Portuguese authorities, and by the discovery that the slave-trade was extending in the district. His wife, Mary, Moffat's daughter, whom he had married in 1844, died 27th April 1862, and was buried at Shupanga. The expedition was recalled in July 1863. At his own cost he now explored the northern banks of Lake Nyasa on foot; then himself navigated his little steamer to Bombay; and returned to England, 23d July 1864. His second book, The Zambesi and its Tributaries (1865), was designed to expose the Portuguese slave-traders, and to find means of establishing a settlement for missions and commerce near the head of the Rovuma. A proposal was made to him by the Royal Geographical Society to return to Africa and settle a disputed question regarding the watershed of central Africa and the sources of the Nile. In March 1866 he started from Zanzibar, pressed westward amid innumerable hardships, and in 1868 discovered Lakes Moero and Bangweolo. Obligated to return for rest to Ujiji, he struck westward again as far as the river Luabala, thinking it might be the Nile, but far from certain that it was not what it proved afterwards to be, the Congo. On his return after severe illness to Ujiji, Livingstone found there H. M. Stanley (q.v.), sent to look for him by the New York Herald. Determined to make one more effort to solve the problem, he returned to Lake Bangweolo, but fell into wretched health, and in Ilala on the morning of 1st May 1873 he was found by his attendants, dead. His faithful people embalmed his body, and carried it to the coast. It was conveyed to England, and on 18th April 1874 was buried in Westminster Abbey. Livingstone's Last Journals, brought down to within a few days of his death, were published in 1874. See Blaikie's Personal Life of David Livingstone (1880), the short Life by Thomas Hughes (1889), and Sir H. Johnston's Livingstone and the Exploration of Central Africa (1891).

Livius. See LIVY.

Livius Andronicus, the father of Roman dramatic and epic poetry, was a Greek by birth, probably a native of Tarentum, and was carried a slave to Rome in 272 B.C., but afterwards liberated by his master. He translated the Odyssey into Latin Saturnian verse, and wrote tragedies, comedies, and hymns after Greek models. Only fragments are extant (ed. by L. Müller, 1885).

Livy. TITUS LIVIUS (59 B.C.—17 A.D.) was born at Patavium (Padua), of a noble and wealthy family, and on coming to Rome was admitted to the court of Augustus. He never flattered the emperor, but avowed his preference for a republic. He praised Brutus and Cassius, sympathised with Pompey, and stigmatised Cicero, an accessory to the murder of Caesar, as having got from Antony's bravoes only his deserts. Of the great Caesar himself he doubted whether he was more of a curse or a blessing to the commonwealth. Such friendship as they had for each other Livy and Augustus never lost. Livy died at his native Patavium. His history of Rome from her foundation to the death of Drusus, 9 B.C., comprised 142 books, of which those from the 11th to the 20th, and from the 46th to the 142d, have been lost. Of the 35 that remain the 41st and 43d are imperfect. The 'periochæ,' or summaries of the contents of each book, composed in the wane of Roman literature, to catalogue names and events for rhetorical purposes, have all, however, come down to us, except those of books 136 and 137. But what has been spared is more than enough to confirm in modern days the judgment of antiquity which places Livy in the forefront of Latin writers. His impartiality is not less a note of his work than his veneration for the good, the generous, the heroic in man. His style is as nearly perfect as is compatible with his ideal of the historian. For investigation of facts he did not go far afield. Accepting history as fine art rather than as science, he was content to take his authorities as he found them, and where they differed was guided by taste or predilection. Gronovius, Drakenborch, Ruddiman, Madvig, Alschefski, Weissenborn, Luchs, and Zingerle have purified Livy's text and illustrated his meaning. Meritorious versions of parts of his history (that of Church and Brodrigg for example, Books xxi.-xxv.) have been Englished, and Philemon Holland translated the whole in fine Elizabethan English (1600). See book by Capes ('Classical Writers,' 1879), Taine's Essai sur l'Œuvre (5th ed. 1888), and Sealey's introduction to Book i. (1871).

Lizars, JOHN (c. 1787-1860), an Edinburgh surgeon, brother of the Wilkie-like painter and engraver, WILLIAM HOME LIZARS (1788-1859). [Originally Liz'ers, modified to Lt-zahrs.]

Llandarf, LORD. See MATTHEWS.

Llewelyn THE GREAT, Prince of Wales, successfully maintained his independence against King John and Henry III. He died, a Cistercian, at Aberconway, 11th April 1240.—His grandson, LLEWELYN AB GRUFFYDD, the opponent of Edward I., was slain near Builth, 11th December 1282.

Llorente, JUAN ANTONIO (1756-1823), born at Rincon del Soto near Calahorra, took orders early, became vicar-general in 1782, agent of the Inquisition at Logroño in 1785, and secretary to the Inquisition in 1789. In 1806 he was made canon of Toledo. King Joseph gave him sundry posts; and in 1809, when the Inquisition was suppressed, placed all its archives in his hands that he might write its history. After the battle of Vittoria he went to Paris, and there the Histoire Critique de l'Inquisition d'Espagne came out in 1817-18. Its value was recognised at once, but it provoked bitter feeling, to which Llorente added in 1822 by his Portrait Politique des Papes; and at the instance of the clerical party he was ordered to quit France. He died at Madrid. He wrote an autobiography and works on the Basque fueros and on Gül Blas (1822).

Lloyd, CHARLES (1775-1839), poet, the friend of Coleridge and Lamb, was born of Quaker parentage at Birmingham, about 1811 began to become deranged, and died in an asylum near Versailles.

Lloyd, DAVID (1635-92), Welsh clergyman and biographer, State Worthies his best-known book.

Lloyd, EDWARD, the London coffee-house keeper during 1688-1726, after whom is named the great underwriters' association called 'Lloyd's.' See works by Martin (1875) and H. M. Grey (1893).

Lloyd, EDWARD (1815-90), founder in 1842 of Lloyd's Weekly, born at Thornton Heath, Surrey.

Lloyd, EDWARD, a tenor, best known in Handel, was born in London in 1845.

Lloyd George, DAVID, born in 1863 the son of a Welsh schoolmaster in Manchester, practised as a solicitor, was sent to parliament by Carnarvon as an advanced Liberal in 1890, in 1905 became President of the Board of Trade, and in 1908 Chancellor of the Exchequer. He took charge of the Old Age Pensions Act (1908), the National Insurance Act (1911), and the momentous budget of 1909-10, whose rejection by the Lords led to the constitutional crisis and Mr Asquith's Parliament Act of 1911.

Lobatcheffsky, NICHOLAS (1793-1856), a great mathematician, died professor at Kazan.

Lobeck, CHRISTIAN AUGUST (1781-1860), Greek scholar, born at Naumburg, died at Königsberg.

Lobo, JERONIMO (1593-1678), a Jesuit missionary, who was born and died at Lisbon, went to India in 1621, but was superintendent of missions in Abyssinia 1625-34. From a French translation (1728) of the Portuguese MS. account of his travels in Abyssinia Dr Johnson produced an abridged English version (1735).

Locke, JOHN, born at Wrington, Somerset, 29th August 1632, the son of a country attorney, from Westminster passed in 1652 to Christ Church, Oxford, of which at the Restoration he was a senior student. For a time he lectured as a college tutor. Experiments in medicine show his bent to the inductive interpretation of external nature, and aversion to the 'vermiculate' questions of the schools. Before 1666 he was in a sort of amateur practice in Oxford, although he never took a degree; and problems of society, the relations of church and state, and above all the right and duty of religious toleration largely exercised him. He spent the winter of 1665 in Germany. Medical practice brought him into connection with Lord Ashley, soon after first Earl of Shaftesbury (q.v.); and next year Locke became his confidential secretary. A reunion of friends, meeting in 1670-71 for the discussion of problems social and theological, welcomed Locke's suggestion that they should first settle what questions the human understanding was or was not fitted to deal with. This problem, undertaken by Locke himself, occupied his best energies for seventeen years, and issued in 1690 in the famous Essay Concerning Human Understanding. In 1672, when Shaftesbury became Chancellor, Locke was made Secretary to the Board of Trade. The fall of Shaftesbury permitted Locke three years later to retire to France, where he lived till 1679, when he returned to London and to Shaftesbury. But after the earl's flight to Holland in 1682, Locke, under suspicion as his confidant, became for five years an exile in Holland. His friendship with Limborch and Le Clerc strengthened his theological liberalism. The Revolution of 1688-89 opened the way for his return. In February 1689 he declined the post of ambassador at Brandenburg, contented with a Commissionership of Appeals. An Epistola de Tolerantia (1689) was his first appearance as author, published anonymously in Holland, and translated into English by William Popple. A treatise, also anonymous, on Civil Government followed early in 1690; and the Essay Concerning Human Understanding in March 1690. From 1691 Locke lived mostly at Oates in Essex, the country-seat of Sir Francis Masham. Questions of economics and the currency were subjects of tracts in 1691 and 1695. Thoughts on Education came out in 1693. In the anonymous Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) Locke tried to recall Christianity to its original simplicity; and he left Commentaries on St Paul's Epistles. In 1696 he became a Commissioner of the Board of Trade, with an income of £1000 a-year. Successive editions of the Essay, in 1694, 1695, and 1700, with additional chapters and defences of its philosophy, vindications of his letter on toleration and the Reasonableness of Christianity, and the tractate on the Conduct of the Understanding kept him busy; on 28th October 1704 he died at Oates, and was buried in High Laver church. The essence of Locke's Essay is its proof that knowledge cannot be consciously innate in each man, but must be in all cases a gradual growth, dependent on fallible experience. The standard edition of the Essay, with prolegomena, life, &c., is that by Campbell Fraser (2 vols. 1894). See Leibnitz's Nouveaux Essais (1765), Cousin's Lectures on Locke (1829), Webb's Intellectualism of Locke (1857), Life by Fox Bourne (2 vols. 1876), Fowler's Locke (1880), Campbell Fraser's Locke (1890), and German monograph by Fechtner (1898).

Locker-Lampson, Frederick (1821-95), came of naval ancestry, and from Mining Lane and Somerset House passed to the Admiralty, where he became the trusted confidant of three First Lords. London Lyrics (1857) revealed him as a writer of bright and clever vers de société; later books were Lyra Elegantiarum (1867) and Patchwork (1879). In 1850 he married Charlotte, daughter of the seventh Earl of Elgin (d. 1872); and in 1874 Hannah, only daughter of Sir Curtis Lampson, when he added the surname Lampson to his own. See his My Confidences (1896).

Lockhart, George (1673-1731), of Carnwath, Lanarkshire, from 1702 a Jacobite M.P., was killed in a duel. See the Lockhart Papers (1817).

Lockhart, John Gibson, born at Cambusnethan manse, near Wishaw, 14th July 1794, spent his boyhood in Glasgow, where at eleven he passed from the high school to the college, and whence at thirteen, with a Balliol Snell exhibition, he went up to Oxford. In 1813 he took a first in classics; then, after a visit to the Continent (to Goethe at Weimar), studied law at Edinburgh, and in 1816 was called to the Scottish bar. But he was no speaker; and having while still at Oxford written the article 'Heraldry' for the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, and translated Schlegel's Lectures on the History of Literature, from 1817 he took more and more to letters, and with Wilson became the chief mainstay of Blackwood's. In its pages he first exhibited the caustic wit that made him the terror of his Whig opponents. Peter's Letters to His Kinsfolk ('2d ed.' 1819), a clever skit on Scottish society, was followed by four novels—Valerius (1821), Adam Blair (1822), Reginald Dalton (1823), and Matthew Wald (1824). Of these Adam Blair alone retains its vitality—the strong, sad story of a good man's fall and repentance. Ancient Spanish Ballads appeared in 1823; Lives of Burns and Napoleon in 1828 and 1829; and the Life of Scott, Lockhart's masterpiece, in 1837-38. He had met Scott first in May 1818, in April 1820 had married his eldest daughter, Sophia. In 1825 he removed to London to become editor of the Quarterly Review, at a salary of £1100 per annum; and this post he retained till 1853, in 1843 becoming also auditor of the duchy of Cornwall, a sinecure worth £400 a-year. But his closing years were clouded by illness and deep depression; by the secession to Rome of his only daughter, with her husband, Mr Hope-Scott (q.v.); and by the loss of his wife in 1837, of his two boys in 1831 and 1853. The elder was the 'Hugh Littlejohn' of Scott's Tales of a Grandfather; the younger, Walter, was a scapegrace in the army. Like Scott, Lockhart visited Italy in search of health; like Scott, he came back to Abbotsford to die—25th Nov. 1854. He is buried in Dryburgh at Sir Walter's feet. See Life by Andrew Lang (2 vols. 1896).

Lockhart, William Ewart (1846-1900), subject-painter, born in Dumfriesshire, was elected an A.R.S.A. in 1870, an R.S.A. in 1878.

Lockhart, Sir William Stephen Alexander, K.C.B. (1887), K.C.S.I. (1895), born in 1841, had seen service in Bhutan, Abyssinia, Afghanistan, Burma, &c., when in 1897 he commanded the expedition against the Afridis. Commander-in-chief in India from 1898, he died in 1900.

Lockyer, Sir Joseph Norman, K.C.B. (1897), astronomer, born at Rugby, 17th May 1836, became a clerk in the War Office (1857) and in the Science and Art Department (1875). In 1869 he was made F.R.S., and in 1870 lecturer on Astronomy at the Normal School of Science at South Kensington, in 1894 a C.B. He headed many eclipse expeditions. He has written numerous books on solar chemistry and physics, on the meteoritic hypothesis, and on the orientation of stone circles, which he connects with primitive astronomy. On some of these subjects his views have not been generally accepted.

Lodge, Edmund (1756-1839), successively Lancaster, Norroy, and Clarenceux herald, published Illustrations of British History (1791), a Life of Julius Cæsar (1810), &c.; but is best known by his Portraits of Illustrious Personages (1821-34).

Lodge, Henry Cabot, American historian and biographer, was born in Boston, 12th May 1850.

Lodge, Sir Oliver Joseph, F.R.S., physicist and psychologist, born near Stoke-upon-Trent, 12th June 1851, in 1880 became professor of Physics at Liverpool, and in 1900 first principal of Birmingham University. He was knighted in 1902.

Lodge, Thomas, dramatist, romance-writer, and poet, was born at West Ham about 1558. From Merchant Taylors' he passed to Trinity College, Oxford, and thence in 1578 to Lincoln's Inn, but led a wild and rollicking life. In 1589-91 he took part in two sea-expeditions against the Spaniards, and wrote a euphuistic romance, Rosalynde (1590), which supplied Shakespeare with more than the chief incidents of As You Like It, besides two second-rate dramas, The Wounds of Civil War (1594) and A Looking-glass for London and England (with Greene, 1594). He is believed to have taken a medical degree at Avignon (1600), and to have written a History of the Plague (1603). He died in London, a Catholic seemingly, in 1625. Among his remaining writings are A Fig for Momus (1595); translations of Seneca (1614) and Josephus (1602); Life of William Longbeard (1593); Robin the Divell, Wits Miserie, and Glaucus and Silla, a collection of poems (1589; reprinted in 1819). Gosse edited his works for the Hunterian Club (4 vols. 1884). See also Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies (1883).

Loewe, Carl (1796-1869), composer, was born near Halle, studied music and theology at Halle, and in 1822 became a musical teacher at Stettin. In 1847 he sang and played before the court in London. He composed five operas (of which only one, The Three Wishes, was performed), sixteen oratorios, and numerous symphonies, concertos, duets, and other works for the pianoforte, but his ballads, his most notable bequest, are (including the Erlkönig) remarkable dramatic poems. See A. Bach, The Art Ballad (1890); Loewe's Autobiography (1870); and German Lives by Runze (1884-88), Wellmer (1886), and Wossidlo (1894). [Leh-veh.]

Loft, Capell (1751-1824), the patron of Bloomfield, was a Whig barrister with a taste for letters, especially poetry; he wrote some legal treatises and magazine articles, and books on theological, astronomical, political, and poetical subjects. He was born in London, passed from Eton to Peterhouse, Cambridge, lived at Troston near Bury St Edmunds, and died near Turin.—His fourth son, Capell (1806-73), who died at Millmead, Va., wrote poetry, &c.

Loftie, Rev. William John, a high authority on London, Windsor, and architecture, was born at Belfast, 25th July 1839, and studied at Trinity College, Dublin. He died 16th June 1911.

Loftus, Cissie. See M'Carthy, Justin.

Logan, James (c. 1794-1872), Celtic antiquary, author in 1831 of the Scottish Gael, was born in Aberdeen, and lived and died in London.

Logan, John (1748-88), poet, was born, a farmer's son, at Soutra in Midlothian. In 1773 he was chosen minister of South Leith; but in 1786, owing to intemperance and other reasons, he had to resign his charge, and took to literary work in London. Besides two volumes of sermons, he wrote a tragedy, Runnemeid (1783), withdrawn after a single performance at Edinburgh. His Poems (1781) are best known in connection with the claim of Michael Bruce (q.v.) to the authorship of the 'Ode to the Cuckoo' and some of the Paraphrases. But Logan was certainly author of the exquisite 'Braes of Yarrow.'

Logan, JOHN ALEXANDER (1826-86), born in Illinois, served in the Mexican war, was admitted to the bar in 1852, and was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1858. He raised an Illinois regiment in the civil war, and retired at its close as major-general. Returned to congress as a Republican in 1866, he was repeatedly chosen a U.S. senator. See Life by G. F. Dawson (1887).

Logan, SIR WILLIAM EDMOND, geologist, was born, a Scotch baker's son, at Montreal in Canada, 20th April 1798, and in 1814 was sent over to Edinburgh High School and University. After ten years in a London counting-house, he became (1828) bookkeeper at Swansea to a copper-smelting company. There he made a map of the coal-basin, which was incorporated into the geological survey. In 1842-71 he directed the Canadian Geological Survey; knighted in 1856, he died in 1875. See Life by Harrington (1883).

Loisy, ALFRED, born 1857, became abbé and lecturer at the Sorbonne, but resigned after his works on Biblical criticism were condemned by Pope Pius X. in 1903 as too advanced. For subsequent works in the same sense he was visited with the greater excommunication (1908).

Lokmán, the reputed author of Arabic fables, which are now believed to be of Greek origin.

Lombard, PETER (c. 1100-64), born near Novara in Lombardy, studied at Bologna, at Rheims, and (under Abelard) at Paris, and, after filling a chair of theology there, in 1159 became Bishop of Paris. He was generally styled Magister Sententiarum, or the 'Master of Sentences,' from his collection of sentences from Augustine and other Fathers on points of Christian doctrine, with objections and replies. The theological doctors of Paris in 1300 denounced some of his teachings as heretical; but his work was the subject of many commentaries down to the Reformation.

Lombroso, CESARE (1836-1909), founder of the science of Criminology, was born of Jewish stock at Verona, and after acting as an army surgeon, professor of mental diseases at Pavia, and director of an asylum at Pesaro, became professor of forensic medicine and psychiatry at Turin. His great work is L'uomo delinquente (1875); others have been translated—The Man of Genius (1891), The Female Offender (1895), Crime (1911).

Long, GEORGE, scholar, born at Poulton, Lancashire, 4th November 1800, in 1818 entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1822 graduated as wrangler and senior Chancellor's medallist, and in 1823 was made fellow over Macaulay's head. In 1824 he became professor of Ancient Languages at Charlottesville, Va.; in 1828 of Greek in London University. Subsequently he was professor of Latin at University College, London (1842-46), reader in jurisprudence to the Middle Temple (1846-49), and classical lecturer at Brighton College (1849-71). His great work was the editing (1833-46) of the Penny Cyclopaedia. He died at Portfield, Chichester, 10th August 1879.

Longchamp, WILLIAM DE, a low-born favourite of Richard I., who in 1189-90 made him Chancellor, Bishop of Ely, and joint-justiciar of England; in 1191 he was likewise made papal legate. But for his heated arrogance he had to withdraw to Normandy. He regained Richard's favour by raising his ransom, and was made Chancellor again. He died at Poitiers, 31st Jan. 1197. See French monograph by L. Boivin Champeaux (1885).

Longfellow, HENRY WADSWORTH, born at Portland, Me., Feb. 27, 1807, graduated at Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Me. In 1826 the college trustees sent him to Europe to qualify for the chair of Foreign Languages; and in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany he spent nearly two years. After his return he married in 1831 the wife who, dying on a European tour in 1835, is commemorated in The Footsteps of Angels. He had written poems while at college, and now published a version of The Coplas of Don Jorge Manrique. Outre Mer, an account of his first tour, appeared in 1835; and Hyperion, which is a journal of a later one, in 1839. In 1836 he became professor of Modern Languages and Literature in Harvard, and held the chair nearly eighteen years. Voices of the Night (1839), his first book of original verse, made a favourable impression, which was deepened by Ballads (1841), including 'The Skeleton in Armour,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' 'The Village Blacksmith,' and 'Excelsior.' Poems on Slavery appeared in 1842, and in 1843 the drama, The Spanish Student. Longfellow made a third visit to Europe in 1842, and on his return the following year married the lady who became the mother of his five children. He made collections of poems, including some of his own translations, The Waif (1845), The Estray (1847)—both now very scarce—and The Poets and Poetry of Europe (1845). The Belfry of Bruges and other Poems appeared in 1846. Probably his most popular poem is Evangeline (1847), a tale (in hexameters) of the French exiles of Acadia. Kavanagh, a prose tale, appeared in 1849. The Seaside and the Fireside (1850) contains 'The Building of the Ship.' The Golden Legend (1851) is based on Der Arme Heinrich of Hartmann von Aue; Hiawatha (1855), a masterpiece, on legends of the Redskins. The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858) is a story in hexameters of the early days of the Plymouth colony in Massachusetts. Tales of a Wayside Inn is a poem which appeared in parts (1863, 1872, 1874). Flower-de-Luce (1867) shows some of the poet's most exquisite workmanship. The New England Tragedies (1868), in blank verse, treats mainly of Salem witchcraft. The next work was a faithful translation of Dante's Divine Comedy (1867-70). Christus, a Mystery, in blank verse, appeared in 1872. Three Books of Song, containing the conclusion of Tales of a Wayside Inn, Judas Maccabaeus, &c., was published in 1872; Aftermath, in 1874; The Masque of Pandora, in 1875. Keramos (1878) and Ultima Thule (1880) were the last of the long series. The poet paid a last visit to Europe in 1868-69, and died in his home at Cambridge, Mass., 24th March 1882. He was not a profound student of human nature; but of modern poets he is the one who has best expressed the feelings of natural men in regard to love and maternity, peace and goodwill, death and the future life. See Life by his brother, the Rev. Samuel Longfellow (3 vols. 1886-87), and the memorial volume by Dr Underwood (1882).

Longinus, DIONYSIUS CASSIUS (c. 213-272 A.D.),

Neoplatonic philosopher, taught rhetoric in Athens, but settling at Palmyra, became chief counsellor to Queen Zenobia. For this Aurelian beheaded him. His only extant work, the treatise 'On the Sublime,' of doubtful authenticity, has been edited by Egger (1837), Otto Jahn (2d ed. 1887), Rhys Roberts (1899), and Prickard (1906).

Longley, CHARLES THOMAS (1794-1868), born near Rochester, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford; was head-master of Harrow 1829-36; and became Bishop of Ripon (1836), Archbishop of York (1860), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1862).

Longman, THOMAS (1699-1755), son of a Bristol merchant, bought a bookselling business in Paternoster Row in 1724, and shared in publishing Boyle's Works, Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary, Ephraim Chambers's Cyclopædia, and Johnson's Dictionary. His nephew, Thomas Longman (1731-97), brought out a new edition of Chambers's Cyclopædia. Under Thomas Norton Longman (1771-1842) the firm had relations with Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Scott, Moore, Sydney Smith, &c. After Constable's failure in 1826 the Edinburgh Review became the property of the firm, who also published Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia (1829-46). Thomas Longman (1804-79), eldest son of T. N. Longman, issued under his special care a beautifully illustrated New Testament. His brother, William (1813-77), wrote Six Weeks' Tour in Switzerland, Lectures on the History of England (1859), History of Edward III. (1869), and History of the Three Cathedrals of St Paul (1873). The event of this generation was the publication of Macaulay's Lays (1842), Essays (1843), and History (1848-61). The absorption of the Parkers' business in 1863 introduced the works of J. S. Mill, Froude, and Sir Cornwall Lewis and Fraser's Magazine. An early venture of the present (fifth) generation was Lord Beaconsfield's Endymion, for which they paid £10,000. His other works had come into possession of the firm in 1870, when they published Lothair. In 1890 Rivington's business and stock was bought by the Longmans.

Longstreet, JAMES (1821-1904), general, born in South Carolina, fought in the Mexican war, and, as a Confederate, in both battles of Bull Run, at Williamsburg, Richmond, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, and the Wilderness. He was minister to Turkey in 1880-81.

Longueville, ANNE, DUCHESSE DE (1619-79), the soul of the Fronde, was the only daughter of the Prince of Condé, and in 1639 was married to the Duc de Longueville. In the first war of the Fronde (1648) she endeavoured, unsuccessfully, to gain over her brother Louis, the Great Condé. In the second war she won over both him and Turenne. See Life by Cousin (2d. ed. 1859).

Lönnrot, ELIAS (1802-84), Finnish scholar, born at Sammatti in Nyland, practised medicine for twenty years in Kajana, and was professor of Finnish at Helsingfors 1853-62. He published a collection of Finnish folk-songs, Kantele (1829-31), followed in 1835 by his much-cooked version of the Kalevala. His Kanteletar (1840) was a collection of folk-songs; Sanalaskuja (1842), of proverbs; Arvoituksia (1844; 2d. ed., 1861), of riddles. His latest work was the great Finnish Dictionary (1866-80). See Life by Ahlqvist (Hels. 1885).

Loomis, ELIAS, born at Willington, Conn., 7th August 1811, graduated at Yale in 1830, and was tutor there 1833-36. After a year's study in Paris he was professor (1837-44) of Mathematics in Western Reserve College, Ohio, of Natural Philosophy (1844-60) in New York, and of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy (from 1860) at Yale. He died 15th August 1889. He wrote much on mathematics, astronomy, meteorology, &c.

Lope de Vega. See VEGA.

Lopez, FRANCISCO SOLANO (1827-70), a grand-nephew of Francia, succeeded his father as President of Paraguay in 1862. In 1864 he provoked war with Brazil, and fell in a heroic but unavailing fight.

Loreburn, LORD (Sir Robert Threshie Reid), born at Dumfries in 1846, studied at Balliol, was called to the bar in 1871, and became M.P. in 1880, solicitor-general and attorney-general in 1894, and in 1905 Lord Chancellor and a baron, in 1911 an earl. He resigned in 1912.

Lorenzo. See MEDICI.

Lorimer, JAMES (1818-90), born at Aberdalgie, Perthshire, was an eminent authority on international law, and from 1862 professor at Edinburgh. The Institutes of the Law of Nations was his best-known book.—His second son, JOHN HENRY, R.S.A., born 1856, is a clever subject-painter.

Lorraine, CLAUDE. See CLAUDE LORRAINE.

Lorsing, HERBERT DE (c. 1054-1119), Bishop of Thetford from 1091, and from 1094 first Bishop of Norwich, was probably a native of Lorraine. See Life by Goulburn and Symonds (1878).

Loti, PIERRE. See VIAUD.

Lotti, ANTONIO (c. 1665-1740), church and operatic composer, was born and died in Venice.

Lotto, LORENZO (c. 1480-1556), religious painter, was born at Venice, and died at Loretto. See monograph by Berenson (Lond. 1895).

Lotze, RUDOLF HERMANN, philosopher, born at Bautzen, 21st May 1817, studied medicine and philosophy at Leipzig, and became professor of Philosophy there in 1842, at Göttingen in 1844. He died in Berlin, 1st July 1881. It was as a physiologist that he first attracted notice, combating the then accepted doctrine of vitalism. His General Physiology of Bodily Life (1851) led many to rank him with the materialists, though his real views were expressed in his Metaphysik (1841). The most comprehensive statement of his opinions on nature and man is contained in his Microcosmos (1856-64; 4th ed. 1885-88; Eng. trans. 1886). Books on Logic (1874; trans. 1884) and on Metaphysics (1879; trans. 1884) were part of an unfinished exposition of his ideas. His Medizinische Psychologie (1852) and Geschichte der Ästhetik in Deutschland (1868) also deserve mention. His doctrine is a teleological idealism, largely based on ethical considerations. See works by Pfeiderer (2d. ed. 1882), Hartmann (1888), Caspari (2d. ed. 1894), and H. Jones (1895).

Loudon, GIDEON ERNST, FREIHERR VON, Austrian generalissimo, born 2d February 1716, at Tootzen, Livonia, whither his ancestor had migrated from Ayrshire in the 14th century. In 1732 he entered the Russian service, but ten years later exchanged into that of Austria. In the Seven Years' War he won the battle of Kunersdorf (1759); and his loss of the battle of Liegnitz (1760) was due mainly to Lacy and Daun. As field-marshal he commanded in the war of the Bavarian succession (1778), and against the Turks (1788-89), capturing Belgrade and Semendria. He died 14th July 1790. See Life by Malleson (1884).

Loudon, JOHN CLAUDIUS (1783-1843), a gardener, born at Cambuslang, wrote much on horticulture.

Louis I. (778-840), 'the Debonair' of France, was also emperor, and was a son of Charlemagne.—Louis II. (846-879), 'the Stammerer,' was the son of Charles the Bold, and began to reign over France in 877.—Louis III., his eldest son, died 881.—Louis IV. (921-954), grandson of Louis II., began to reign in 936.—Louis V., 'le Fainéant', son of Lothaire III., was the last of the Carolingians.—Louis VI., 'the Fat' (1078-1137), was son of Philip I., and succeeded in 1108.—Louis VII., his son (1120-80), came to the crown 1137, divorced his wife Eleanor of Aquitaine, who afterwards married Henry II. of England, and so gave rise to long wars for the possession of that territory.—Louis VIII. (1187-1226), son of Philip Augustus, came to the throne 1223.

Louis IX., or St Louis, king of France, born at Poissy, April 25, 1215, succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226, and by his victories compelled Henry III. of England to acknowledge French suzerainty in Guienne. During a dangerous illness he made a vow to go as a crusader. Having appointed his mother (the pious Blanche of Castile) regent, he landed with 40,000 men in Egypt in 1249. He captured Damietta, but was afterwards defeated, taken prisoner, and ransomed for 100,000 marks in 1250. He proceeded to Acre with the remnant of his army, and remained in Palestine till his mother's death (1252) compelled his return to France. He did much to strengthen loyalty to his house, determined by the Pragmatic Sanction the relation of the French Church to the pope, founded the Sorbonne, set up in the French provinces royal courts of justice or parliaments, and authorised a new code of laws. He embarked on a new crusade in 1270, and died of plague at Tunis, August 25, 1270. Pope Boniface VIII. canonised him in 1297. See Viè de St Louis by his friend Joinville (q.v.), and modern Lives by Faure (1865), Wallon (4th ed. 1893), and Berger (1893).

Louis XI., eldest son of Charles VII., born at Bourges, July 3, 1423, made unsuccessful attempts against his father's throne, and had to flee to Burgundy. In 1461 he succeeded to the crown. The severe measures which he adopted against the great vassals led to a coalition against him, headed by Burgundy and Brittany. Louis owed his success more to cunning than to arms. His agents stirred up Liège to revolt against Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, and Charles seized Louis, and compelled him to assist in the punishment of Liège. Louis now stirred up against Charles the Flemish towns and the Swiss republics; and the Swiss defeated Charles twice, and killed him (1477). Louis then claimed Burgundy as a vacant fief, but failed, as Mary, the rightful heir, was married to Maximilian of Austria. The latter defeated the French at Guinegate (1479), but after a new war and the death of Mary, a treaty (1482) gave Burgundy and Artois to France. Louis also annexed Provence. In order to weaken his feudal vassals he increased the power and number of parliaments. He spent his later years in great misery, in superstitious terrors and excessive horror of death; his chief advisers the barber Olivier le Dain, Tristan l'Hermite, and Cardinal Baluc. He died at Plessis les Tours, August 30, 1483. He cherished art and sciences, and founded three universities. See the Mémoires of Philippe de Comines (q.v.); works by Legeay (1874), Willert (in English, 1876), Buet (2d ed. 1886), Vaesen and Charvay (1885-90), Sée (1892), Hare (1907); and Scott's Quentin Durward.

in 1498, and by his just and kindly rule became known as the 'Father of the People.' He overran Milan, and helped the Spaniards to conquer Naples. He humbled the Venetians in 1509, was driven out of Italy in 1513, and defeated at the 'Battle of the Spurs' (1513) by the emperor and Henry VIII. of England. He was married to a daughter of Louis XI., to Anne of Brittany, and to a sister of Henry VIII., and was succeeded by his son-in-law Francis I. See works by Seyssel (1558) and Maulde-La Clavière (1890-95).

Louis XIII., son of Henry IV. and Marie de' Medici, born at Fontainebleau, 27th September 1601, succeeded on his father's assassination (1610), his mother being regent. She entered into alliance with Spain and the pope, and betrothed the king to Anne of Austria, daughter of Philip III. of Spain, upon which the Huguenots took up arms; but peace was concluded in 1614. The king, now declared of age, confirmed the Edict of Nantes, and the French États Généraux were summoned for the last time till the reign of Louis XVI. The restoration of Catholic church-rights in Bearn led to the religious war which ended in 1622. After the death of De Luynes, in 1624, Richelieu became chief minister. He obtained complete control over the weak king, and greatly increased monarchical power. The overthrow of the Huguenots was completed by the capture of Rochelle in 1628. Richelieu now led Louis to take part in the Thirty Years' War, supporting Gustavus Adolphus and the Dutch against the Spaniards and Austrians. Louis died 14th May 1643. His eldest son was Louis XIV.; his second, Philip, Duke of Orleans, ancestor of the present House of Orleans. See MARIE DE' MEDICI, RICHELIEU; and works by Bazin (new ed. 1846), Topin (1876), and Zeller (1879-92).

Louis XIV., born at St Germain-en-Laye, 16th September 1638, succeeded Louis XIII. in 1643. His mother, Anne of Austria, became regent, and Mazarin (q.v.) her minister. In 1648 certain of the nobles, aggrieved by being excluded from high offices, rose in rebellion, and began the civil wars of the Fronde, so called from frondeur, a slinger; metaphorically, a grumbler. Peace was concluded in 1659; and in the following year Louis married the Infanta Maria Theresa. On Mazarin's death in 1661 Louis assumed the reins of government, and from that time forth exercised with rare energy a pure despotism. He had a cool and clear head, much dignity and amenity of manners, and indomitable perseverance. He was ably supported by his ministers, and manufactures began to flourish. Colbert restored prosperity to the ruined finances, and provided the means for war; whilst Louvois raised admirably equipped armies. On the death of Philip IV. of Spain Louis, as his son-in-law, claimed part of the Spanish Netherlands; in 1667, with Turenne, he crossed the frontier, and made himself master of French Flanders and Franche Comté. The triple alliance—between England, Holland, and Sweden—arrested his conquests; and the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1668) surrendered Franche Comté. He now made German alliances, purchased the friendship of Charles II. of England, seized Lorraine in 1670, and in 1672 again entered the Netherlands with Condé and Turenne, and conquered half the country in six weeks. The States-General formed an alliance with Spain and the emperor, but Louis made himself master of ten cities of the empire in Alsace, in 1674 took the field with three great armies, and, notwithstanding the death of Turenne and the retirement of Condé, continued to extend his conquests in the Netherlands. The peace of Nimègue in 1678 left him fortresses in the Spanish Netherlands and Franche Comté. He now established in Metz and elsewhere packed courts of law, which confiscated to him territories belonging to the Elector Palatine, the Elector of Trèves, and others; and in 1681 made a sudden and successful descent on Strasburg, a free and powerful German city, which he finally secured by treaty in 1684. Louis had now reached the zenith of his career. All Europe feared him; France regarded him with Asiatic humility; all remnants of political independence had been swept away. Even the courts of justice yielded to the absolute sway of the monarch, who interfered at pleasure with the course of law by commissions, or withdrew offenders by Lettres de Cachet, of which he issued about 9000. The court was the heart of the national life of France, and there the utmost splendour was maintained. In 1685 Louis married his mistress, Madame de Maintenon, who was herself governed by the Jesuits—hence the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) and a bloody persecution of Protestants, which drove half a million of the best and most industrious inhabitants of France to other lands. Yet Louis convened a council of French clergy, which declared the papal power to extend only to matters of faith. The Elector Palatine dying in 1685, Louis claimed part of the territory for the Duchess of Orleans. A French army invaded the Palatinate, Baden, Württemberg, and Trèves in 1688, and in 1689 the Lower Palatinate was laid waste by fire and sword. Success for a time attended the French arms, but reverses ensued, and the war continued for years with varying success. After the French had gained the battle of Neerwinden (1693), the means of waging war were almost exhausted, and Louis concluded the peace of Ryswick (1697) amid universal distress and discontent. Charles II. of Spain at his death (1700) left all his dominions to a grandson of his sister, Louis's queen. Louis supported the claim of his grandson (Philip V.), whilst the Emperor Leopold supported that of his son, afterwards the Emperor Charles VI. The 'War of the Spanish Succession' had to be maintained both in the Netherlands and in Italy. One defeat followed another; Marlborough was victorious in the Low Countries, and Prince Eugene in Italy. In April 1713 peace was concluded at Utrecht, the French prince obtaining the Spanish throne, but at a sacrifice to France of valuable colonies. France, indeed, now was almost completely ruined; but the monarch maintained to the last an unbending despotism. He died 1st September 1715, and was succeeded by his great-grandson, Louis XV. His son and his eldest grandson had both died in 1711. The reign of Louis XIV. is regarded as the Augustan age of French literature and art, producing such writers as Corneille, Racine, Molière, and Boileau, and divines like Bossuet, Fénelon, Bourdaloue, and Massillon. See Voltaire's Siècle de Louis XIV. (1740), the Mémoires of Saint-Simon (1788; in English, abridged, 1876); and works by Gaillardin (1871-76), Cosnac (1874-81), Chérnel (1878-80), Michelet (3d ed. 1875), Michaud (1882-83), Pardoe (English, 1886), Chotard (1890), Gérin (1894), Chérot (1894), Hassall (Eng. 1895), Perkins (Eng. 1897), and R. Waddington (1897).

Louis XV. great-grandson of Louis XIV., born at Versailles, 15th February 1710, succeeded 1st September 1715. The Duke of Orleans was regent, and became infatuated with the financial schemes of the Scotsman Law. All available capital was pocketed by the financial cliques, the court, and the state. At fifteen Louis married Maria Leszczyński, daughter of Stanislas, the dethroned king of Poland. At the death of the regent Louis reigned personally, under the advice of his wise teacher, Cardinal Fleury. In the war of the Polish Succession the duchy of Lorraine was obtained for Louis's father-in-law, and for the French crown after him. In 1740 commenced the war of the Austrian Succession, in which France supported the claims of the Elector of Bavaria to the imperial crown, against those of Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary. After a course of easy conquest in 1741, the French were badly beaten in 1742: regret and worry brought Fleury to the grave next year. But presently France, in alliance with Frederick the Great of Prussia, was repeatedly victorious on land, as at Fontenoy (1745), over English, Austrians, and Dutch, though the English put an end to the French navy and sea-trade. After the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle the king sank under the control of Madame de Pompadour, to whom he gave notes on the treasury for enormous sums. War broke out again with Britain concerning the boundaries of Nova Scotia. In 1756 began the Seven Years' War, and an alliance was formed between France and Austria against Prussia and Britain. In spite of disaster, financial embarrassment, and the misery of the people, the king, governed by his mistress, obstinately persevered in war, even after the terrible defeat of Minden in 1759; whilst the British conquered almost all the French colonies both in the East and West Indies, with Canada. A humiliating peace was concluded in 1763. The Paris parliament secured, after a contest, the suppression of the Jesuits in 1764, and now attempted, ineffectively, to limit the power of the crown by refusing to register edicts of taxation. The Duc de Choiseul was dismissed, a new mistress, Madame du Barry, having taken the place of Madame de Pompadour. The councillors of the parliament of Paris were banished, and a dutiful parliament appointed (1771). The gifts to Madame du Barry in five years amounted to 180 millions of livres. Louis, whose constitution was ruined by a life of vice, was seized with smallpox, and the king once called 'le bien aimé' died unwept, 10th May 1774. See Voltaire's Siècle de Louis XV. (1768-70), and works by Tocqueville (2d ed. 1847), Bonhomme (1873), the Duke de Broglie (Eng. trans. 1879), Pajol (1881-92), Vandal (1882), Carré (1891), and Soulange-Bodin (1894).

Louis XVI. born 23d August 1754, was the third son of the dauphin, Louis, only son of Louis XV., and became dauphin by the death of his father and his elder brothers. He was married in 1770 to Marie Antoinette, youngest daughter of the Empress Maria Theresa. When he ascended the throne (1774) the public treasury was empty, the state was burdened with a debt of 4000 millions of livres, and the people were crushed under the taxes. By advice of Maurepas the king restored to the Paris and provincial parliaments their semi-political rights. Malesherbes and Turgot proposed thorough-going reforms, accepted by the king, but rejected by the court, aristocracy, parliaments, and church. Turgot resigned. Yet Louis remitted some of the most odious taxes, made a few inconsiderable reforms, and was for a time extremely popular, being handsome, healthy, and moral, fond of manly exercises, and of working as a locksmith. In 1777 Necker was made Director-general, and succeeded in bringing the finances to a more tolerable condition; but through France's outlay in the American war of independence he was obliged to propose the taxation of the privileged classes, and their resistance compelled him to resign. The lavish Calonne (1783) renewed for a while the splendour of the court, and advised the calling together of an Assembly of Notables. The noblemen, clergymen, state-officials, councillors of parliaments, and municipal officers thus collected compelled him to fly to London. His successor, Brienne, obtained some new taxes, but the parliament of Paris refused to register the edict. The convening of the States-General was universally demanded. The king registered the edicts and banished the councillors of parliament, but had to recall them. In May 1788 he dissolved all the parliaments and established a Cour Plénière. Matters became still worse when in August appeared the edict that the treasury should cease all cash payments except to the troops. Brienne resigned, and Necker again became minister. An Assembly of the States of the kingdom, in abeyance since 1614, was resolved upon; and by the advice of Necker the Third Estate was called in double number. The States-General met on 5th May 1789 at Versailles. The tiers-état, taking matters into their own hands, formed themselves into a National Assembly, thereby commencing the Revolution; and undertaking to make a new constitution, they called themselves the Constituent Assembly. The resistance of Louis to the demands of the deputies for political independence, equal rights, and universal freedom, led to their declaration of inviolability. The king retaliated by ordering troops under arms, dissolving the ministry, and banishing Necker. The consequence was revolutionary outbreaks in Paris on 12th July 1789. Next day the National Guard of Paris was called out, and on the 14th the people stormed the Bastille. Meanwhile the provinces repeated the acts of Paris. On 4th August feudal and manorial rights were abrogated by the Assembly, which declared the equality of human rights. The royal princes and all the nobles who could escape sought safety in flight. The royal family, having in vain attempted to follow their example, tried to conciliate the people by the feigned assumption of republican sentiments, but on 5th October the rabble attacked Versailles and compelled Louis and his family to return to Paris, whither the Assembly also moved. The next two years witnessed the inauguration and the subsequent withdrawal of various constitutional schemes. Louis alternately made concessions to the republicans, and devised schemes for escaping from their surveillance (in June 1791 the king and queen had got as far as Varennes, whence they were brought back), and each month added to his humiliation and to the audacity of those surrounding him. The Constituent Assembly was succeeded in 1791 by the Legislative Assembly. The king was compelled by the Girondists to a war with Austria in April 1792, and the early defeats of the French were visited on Louis, who was confined, in August, with his family in the Temple. The advance of the Prussians under the Duke of Brunswick into Champagne threw Paris into the wildest excitement. The Assembly dissolved itself in September; the National Convention took its place, and the Republic was proclaimed. In December the king was brought to trial, and called upon to answer for repeated acts of treason against the Republic. On 20th

January 1793 sentence of death was passed, and next day he was guillotined in the Place de la Révolution. See MARIE ANTOINETTE, NECKER, TURGOT, MIRABEAU; and works by Soulavie (1801), Bournisseaux (1829), Droz (2d ed. 1858), Capéfigue (1844), Tocqueville (2d ed. 1850), Jobez (1877-93), Beaucaurt (1892), and Souriau (1893).

Louis XVII., CHARLES, second son of Louis XVI., born 27th March 1785, became dauphin on the death of his brother in 1789. After the death of his father he continued in prison—at first with his mother, but afterwards in the Temple, under the charge of a brutal Jacobin shoemaker named Simon. He died 8th June 1795—an unfounded rumour said by poison. Several persons subsequently claimed to be the dauphin—one of them a half-caste Indian, another a Potsdam watchmaker, Karl Wilhelm Naundorf, who, with a striking resemblance to the Bourbons, found his way to France in 1833, but was expelled in 1836, lived a while in England, and died at Delft, 10th August 1845. His children in 1851 and 1874 raised fruitless actions against the Comte de Chambord. See works by Beauchesne (13th ed. 1884) and Chantelauze (new ed. 1895).

Louis XVIII., STANISLAS XAVIER, younger brother of Louis XVI., was born 17th November 1755, and in his brother's reign opposed every salutary measure of the government. He fled from Paris to Belgium, and assumed the royal title in 1795. The victories of the republic and Napoleon's enmity compelled him frequently to change his place of abode, till in 1807 he found a refuge in England (at Hartwell, Bucks). On the fall of Napoleon (April 1814) he landed at Calais; and then began the ascendancy of the 'legitimist' party. The Napoleonic constitution was set aside, and though a new constitution, with two chambers, was granted, in every essential the king resumed the baneful traditions of the ancient monarchy. The nobles and priests moved him to severe treatment of Imperialists, Republicans, and Protestants. This opened the way for Napoleon's return from Elba, when the royal family fled from Paris, and remained at Ghent till after Waterloo. Louis issued from Cambrai a proclamation in which he acknowledged former errors, and promised an amnesty to all but traitors. But the Chamber of Deputies was so reactionary that the king dissolved it; whereupon arose royalist plots for his dethronement. Assassins slew hundreds of adherents of the Revolution and of Protestants. Driven by royalist fanatics, the king dismissed his too moderate prime-minister Decazes, and sent an army into Spain to maintain absolute kingship. He died 16th September 1824. See works by Petit (1885) and Imbert de Saint-Amant (1891).

Louis I. of Bavaria (1786-1868) came to the throne in 1825, and by his lavish expenditure on pictures, public buildings, and favourites, and by taxes and reactionary policy, provoked active discontent in 1830, and again in 1848, when he abdicated in favour of his son, Maximilian II. See MONTEZ (LOLA).—Louis II. (1845-86), Maximilian's son succeeded in 1864, but took slight interest in affairs of state, devoting himself to fantastic patronage of Wagner and his music. In 1870, however, he decidedly threw Bavaria on the side of Prussia, and offered the imperial crown to William I., though he took no part in the war, and lived the life of a recluse. He was almost constantly at feud with his ministers and family, mainly on account of his insensate outlays on superfluous palaces, was declared insane in June 1886, and a few days later drowned himself (and his physician who tried to rescue him) in the Starnberger Lake near his castle of Berg.

Louis-Philippe, king of the French, born 6th October 1773, was the eldest son of the Duke of Orleans, and was brought up by Madame de Genlis. He entered the National Guard, and, along with his father, renounced his titles, and assumed the surname Egalité. He fought in the wars of the republic, but was included in the order for arrest issued against Dumouriez, and escaped with him into Austrian territory. For a time he supported himself as a teacher in Switzerland; he went in 1796 to the United States, and in 1800 took up his abode at Twickenham near London. In 1809 he married Marie Amélie, daughter of Ferdinand I. of the Two Sicilies. On the Restoration he recovered his estates, and though disliked by the court, was very popular in Paris. After the Revolution of 1830 he was first appointed lieutenant-general, and then accepted the crown as the elect of the sovereign people. The country prospered under the rule of the 'citizen king,' and the middle classes amassed riches. The parliamentary franchise was limited to the aristocracy of wealth and their hangers-on. The political corruption of the bourgeoisie, and its wholesale bribery by the king, united all extremists in a cry for electoral reform. A man of great ability but of little character, Louis-Philippe was by fear carried into paths of reactionary violence. The newspapers were muzzled, and trial by jury was tampered with. Prince Louis Napoleon seized this opportunity of acting twice the part of a pretender (1836, 1840). After the Duke of Orleans's death in 1842, republicans, socialists, communists, became more and more threatening. In vain did Louis-Philippe provide, by campaigning in Algeria, an outlet for the military spirit of his subjects. 'Reform banquets' began to be held. Their repression led to violent debates in the Chamber. The Paris mob rose in February 1848, with the complicity of the regulars, national guards, and municipal police. Louis-Philippe dismissed Guizot (q. v.), and promised reforms; but it was too late. He had to abdicate, and escaped to England as 'Mr Smith.' He died at Claremont, 26th August 1850. See works by Crétineau-Joly (1862), A. Dumas (1852), Nouvion (1861), Villault de Gerainville (1870-75), Vantibault (1889), Villeneuve (1889), Hamel (1890), and Imbert de Saint-Amand (1894).

Louisa, queen of Prussia, born 10th March 1776, at Hanover, where her father, Duke Karl of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, was commandant. She was married to the Crown-prince of Prussia, afterwards Frederick-William III., in 1793, and was the mother of Frederick-William IV. and William III., afterwards emperor. She endeared herself to her people by her spirit and energy during the period of national calamity that followed the battle of Jena, and especially by her patriotic and self-denying efforts to obtain concessions at Tilsit from Napoleon, though he had shamelessly slandered her. She died 19th July 1810. See Lives by Hudson (1874), Horn (1883), Martin (1887), Braun (1888), and Moffat (1900).

Louvel, PIERRE LOUIS. See BERRI.

Louvois, FRANÇOIS MICHEL LE TELLIER, MARQUIS DE (1641-91), war-minister of Louis XIV., born in Paris. His father was Chancellor and Secretary of State in the war department; the son joined him as assistant-secretary in 1662, and became an energetic war-minister in 1668.

His labours bore their fruit in the great war that ended with the peace of Nimeguen (1678). He took a leading part in the capture of Strasburg (1681) and in the persecution of the Protestants. See Life by C. Rousset (6th ed. 1879).

Lovat, SIMON FRASER, LORD, was born about 1676 at Tanich in Ross-shire. In the 14th century his ancestor had migrated from Tweeddale to Inverness-shire; and Hugh, his granduncle, had been made Lord Lovat in 1431. Simon took his M.A. at Aberdeen in 1695, having the year before accepted a commission in a regiment raised for King William. In 1696 his father, on the death of his grand-nephew, Lord Lovat, assumed that title; and Simon next year attempted to abduct the late lord's daughter and heiress, a child nine years of age. Baffled in this, he seized and forcibly married her mother, a lady of the Athole family—a crime for which he was found guilty of high-treason and outlawed. After four years of petty rebellion (during which, in 1699, he succeeded his father as twelfth Lord Lovat), on Queen Anne's accession, in 1702, when the Athole family became all-powerful, he fled to France, but a year later returned to Scotland as a Jacobite agent. He was at the bottom of the 'Queensberry plot,' in which he professed to reveal the policy of the exiled court and a plan for a Highland rising; but the discovery of his duplicity obliged him once more to escape to France. He was still the darling of his clan; and in 1714 they called him over. Next year his cousin's husband, the holder of the estates, having joined the rebellion, Simon took the government side; his clan at once left the insurgents; and for this service he obtained a full pardon, with possession of the Lovat territory. In the '45 Lovat sent forth the clan under his son to fight for the Pretender, whilst he was protesting his loyalty. Culloden lost, he fled, but was captured and brought up to London, being sketched at St Albans by Hogarth. After trial by impeachment before the House of Lords, he was beheaded, 9th April 1747. At his trial he defended himself with ability and dignity, and he met death gallantly. A finished courtier, a good scholar, and a most elegant letter-writer, Lovat was also a ruffian, a liar, a traitor, and a hypocrite. During the lifetime of the lady he had ravished her twice more married. See Lives by Hill Burton (1847) and Mackenzie (1908). Sir W. Fraser's Chiefs of Grant (1883), and Major Fraser's Manuscript, edited by Colonel A. Fergusson (1889).

Lovelace, RICHARD, Cavalier lyricist, was born at Woolwich in 1618, the eldest son of a Kentish knight. He was educated at the Charterhouse and Gloucester Hall, Oxford, found his way to court, and went on the Scotch expedition in 1639. In 1642 he was imprisoned for presenting to the House of Commons a petition from the royalists of Kent 'for the restoring the king to his rights,' and was only released on bail of £20,000. He spent his estate in the king's cause, assisted the French in 1646 to capture Dunkirk from the Spaniards, and was flung into jail on returning to England in 1648. In jail he revised his poems, and in 1649 published Lucasta. He was set free at the end of 1649, and died in poverty in 1658. Next year his brother collected his poems. Most of Lovelace's work is slovenly and insipid, but he is remembered for the faultless lyrics, 'To Althea from Prison' and 'To Lucasta on going to the Wars.' See W. C. Hazlitt's edition of his Poems (1864).

Lover, SAMUEL, artist, novelist, song-writer, and dramatist, born in Dublin, 24th February 1797, in 1818 established himself there as a marine-painter and miniaturist. He published Legends and Stories of Ireland (1831), Rory O'More (1836), and Handy Andy (1842), having in 1835 settled in London, where he wrote for the periodicals, and in 1844 started an entertainment, called 'Irish Evenings,' which was a hit both at home and in America (1846-48). In 1856 he received a pension. He died at St Heliers, 6th July 1868. His songs include 'The Angel's Whisper,' 'Molly Bawn,' 'Low-backed Car,' and 'Four-leaved Shamrock.' See Lives by Bernard (1874) and Symington (1880).

Low, SAMPFSON (1797-1886), publisher, was born and died in London.

Lowder, CHARLES FUGE (1820-80), ritualist, from 1866 vicar of St Peter's, London Docks, was born at Bath, and died in Tyrol. See Life (1881).

Lowe, SIR HUDSON (1769-1844), born at Galway, in 1809 helped to conquer Zante and Cephalonia, and for nearly two years was governor of Santa Maura, Ithaca, and Cephalonia. He was afterwards attached to the Prussian army of Blücher. In April 1816 he became governor of St Helena, where Napoleon had landed in October. Lowe's strictness exposed him to rancorous attacks from Napoleon's admirers, especially O'Meara (q.v.). His defence may be read in Forsyth's Napoleon at St Helena (1853). In 1825-31 he was commander of the forces in Ceylon. See Seaton's Sir H. Lowe and Napoleon (1898).

Lowell, JAMES RUSSELL, was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, February 22, 1819, the son of a minister, and graduated at Harvard in 1838. In 1841-44 he published two volumes of poetry, in 1845 Conversations on the Old Poets; and in 1848 he helped to edit The Pioneer, with Hawthorne, Poe, and Whittier for contributors. In 1846, at the outbreak of the war with Mexico, he wrote a satiric poem in the Yankee dialect denouncing the pro-slavery party and the conduct of the government; and out of this grew the Biglow Papers, perhaps the highest expression of his genius. A great many serious poems were written about 1843, and formed a third volume. The Vision of Sir Launfal is one of the best and most popular of his poems; A Fable for Critics is a series of witty and dashing sketches of American authors. In 1851-52 he visited Europe. In 1855 he was appointed professor of Modern Languages and Literature at Harvard, and went to Europe to prosecute his studies. He also edited the Atlantic Monthly from 1857, and with C. E. Norton the North American Review 1863-67. Commemoration Ode was written in 1865 in honour of the alumni who had fallen in the civil war. The Cathedral (1870) was suggested by a visit to Chartres. Three patriotic odes were written in 1875-76. His prose writings—My Study Windows and Among my Books—have high qualities; the essays on Chaucer, Dante, Shakespeare, and Dryden are masterpieces. Fireside Travels contain his recollections of Cambridge in his youth. The second series of Biglow Papers appeared during the civil war. Lowell was an ardent abolitionist, and from the first gave himself unreservedly to the cause of freedom, as in the poem called The Present Crisis. Though he had never been a politician, he was appointed in 1877 U.S. minister to Spain, and was transferred in 1880 to Great Britain, where he remained until 1885. Democracy (1886) contains some of the brilliant ad-resses he made while in England, and Heartsease and Rue (1888) embraces later poems. He wrote a Life of Hawthorne (1890) and The Old English Dramatists (1893). He died at Cambridge, 12th August 1891. His Collected Writings were published in 1890-91. See his Letters (1893), and Lives by Underwood (1893), Woodberry (1897), Hall (1899), Scudder (1900), Greenlet (1906).

Lowndes, WILLIAM THOMAS (c. 1798-1843), a London bookseller, to whom we owe The Bibliographer's Manual of English Literature (1834; 2d ed. 1857-64) and The British Librarian (1839).

Lowth, ROBERT (1710-87), born at Winchester, was educated there and at New College, Oxford. In 1741 he became professor of Poetry, in 1750 Archdeacon of Winchester, in 1753 rector of East Woodhay, in 1755 a prebendary of Durham and rector of Sedgfield, in 1765 F.R.S., in 1766 Bishop of St Davids and of Oxford, and in 1777 of London. He published De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum (1753), a Life of William of Wykeham, and a new translation of Isaiah. He was one of the first to treat the Bible poetry as literature.

Loyola, IGNATIUS DE, is the name by which history knows Inigo Lopez de Recalde, born in 1491 at his ancestral castle of Loyola in the Basque province of Guipuzcoa. A page in the court of Ferdinand, he then embraced the profession of arms. In the defence of Pampeluna he was severely wounded in the leg. The first setting of the limb having been mismanaged, he had it re-broken in order to be re-set. After this operation his convalescence was slow; and, his stock of romances exhausted, he was thrown upon the Lives of the Saints. The result was the creation of a spiritual enthusiasm as intense as that by which he had hitherto been drawn to chivalry. Renouncing the pursuit of arms, he resolved to begin his new life by a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In 1522 he set out on his pilgrimage, the first step of which was a voluntary engagement to serve the poor and sick in the hospital of Manresa. There his zeal and devotion attracted such notice that he withdrew to a cavern in the vicinity, where he pursued alone his course of self-prescribed austerity, until, utterly exhausted, he was carried back to the hospital. From Manresa he repaired to Rome, whence he proceeded on foot to Venice, and there embarked for Cyprus and the Holy Land. He returned to Venice and Barcelona in 1524. He now resolved to prepare himself for the work of religious teaching, and at thirty-three returned to the rudiments of grammar; followed up by a course at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Paris. In 1534 he founded with five associates the Society of Jesus. The original aim was limited to a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and the conversion of the Infidels; but as access to the Holy Land was cut off by war with the Turks, the associates sought to meet the new wants engendered by the Reformation. Loyola went to Rome in 1539, and submitted to Pope Paul III. the rule of the proposed order, and the vow by which the members bound themselves to go as missionaries to any country the pope might choose. The rule was approved in 1540, and next year the association elected Loyola as its first general. From this time he resided in Rome. At Manresa he wrote the first draft of the Spiritual Exercises, so important for the training of the Jesuits. He died July 31, 1556; was beatified in 1609; and was canonised in 1622. Lubbock, SIR JOHN, created BARON AVEBURY in 1900, is the son of the astronomer, Sir J. W. Lubbock (1803-65), and was born in London, April 30, 1834. From Eton he passed at fourteen into his father's banking-house; in 1856 became a partner; served on several educational and currency commissions; and in 1870 was returned for Maidstone in the Liberal interest, in 1880 for London University—from 1886 till 1900 as a Liberal Unionist. He succeeded in passing more than a dozen important measures, including the Bank Holidays Act (1871), the Bills of Exchange Bill, the Ancient Monuments Bill (1882), and the Shop Hours Bill (1889). He is an honorary graduate of Oxford, Cambridge, Edinburgh, Dublin, and Würzburg; was vice-chancellor of London University 1872-80; and has been president of the British Association (1881), V.P.R.S., President of the London Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the London County Council 1890-92, &c. Best known for his researches on primitive man and on the habits of bees and ants, he has published Prehistoric Times (1865), Origin of Civilisation (1870), Origin and Metamorphoses of Insects (1874), British Wild-flowers in Relation to Insects (1875), Ants, Bees, and Wasps (1882), The Senses and Instincts of Animals (1888), The Pleasures of Life (1887-89), The Beauties of Nature (1892), The Use of Life (1894), and The Scenery of Switzerland (1896).

Lübke, WILHELM (1826-93), writer on art, was born at Dortmund, and died at Carlsruhe.

Lucan, GEORGE CHARLES BINGHAM, EARL OF (1800-88), entered the army, accompanied the Russians as a volunteer against the Turks in 1828, succeeded as third earl in 1839, and as commander of cavalry in the Crimea fought at the Alma, Balaklava, and Inkermann. Made G.C.B. in 1869, he became field-marshal in 1877.

Lucanus, M. ANNÆUS (39-65 A.D.), poet, was born at Corduba (Cordova) in Spain. Annæus Seneca, the rhetorician, had three sons—M. Annæus Seneca, the Gallic of the Acts of the Apostles; L. Annæus Seneca, the philosopher; and M. Annæus Mela, father of Lucan. Rome's attraction had already drawn thither Seneca, the philosopher; and Mela, with his wife, followed, to place their son under his uncle's charge. Young Lucan became proficient in rhetoric and philosophy; and his aptitude for prose and verse was ominous of the fatal fluency which evolved in the first three books of the Pharsalia while yet in his teens. At first the young emperor and the young poet were friends, and Nero's favour had conferred on Lucan the quaestorship. But when, in a great public contest, the palm went over Nero's head to Lucan, the emperor's marked discourtesies were returned by his successful rival with satire and with redoubled efforts to outshine him, till Nero was stung into forbidding Lucan either to publish poems or to recite them. Lucan became a ringleader of the Pisonian conspiracy; it was discovered and he himself betrayed. He was ordered to die, and, having had his veins opened, bled to death in a bath. Except a few fragments, we now have nothing of Lucan's many writings but the Pharsalia, recounting the mighty duel of Pompey and Cæsar for the empire of the world. It is frequently bombastic, sometimes obscure; but its Roman patriotism strikes so true a note that with lovers of liberty it has ever been a favourite. See editions by Oudendorp (1728), Weber (1829), Haskins (1887), Hosius (1893), and Francken (1895-98). There are translations by Marlowe (1st book), Sir F. Gorges, T. May (who continued the poem in Latin verse), Rowe (admirable, 1718), and Ridley (1897), and in prose by Riley (1853).

Lucaris, CYRIL, Greek theologian, born in Crete in 1572, studied at Venice, Padua, and Geneva, where he was influenced by Calvinism. Taking holy orders, he rose by 1621 to be Patriarch of Constantinople. He opened negotiations with the Calvinists of England and Holland with a view to union and the reform of the Greek Church; he corresponded with Gustavus Adolphus, Archbishop Abbot, and Laud; he presented the Alexandrian Codex to Charles I.; and in 1629 he issued a confession of faith of Calvinistic tendency. But his efforts were bitterly opposed by the Jesuits, who five times brought about his deposition, and by the Greeks are supposed to have instigated his murder by the Turks. In June 1637 he was seized, and hurried on ship-board, and it was never ascertained what became of him. See Princeton Review, vol. v. (1833).

Lucas, SIR CHARLES, a royalist, shot, with Sir George Lisle, after the surrender of Colchester to the Parliament, 28th August 1648. Two years before he had been released on parole.

Lucas, JAMES (1813-74), Dickens's 'Mr Mopes,' from 1849 lived as an unwashed hermit on buns and gin at Elmwood, Hertfordshire.

Lucas, JOHN SEYMOUR, historical painter, was born in London, 21st December 1849, and was elected an A.R.A. in 1886, an R.A. in 1897.

Lucas, RICHARD COCKLE (1800-83), sculptor, born at Salisbury, died at Chilworth, Romsey.

Lucas van Leyden or LUCAS JACOBSS (1494-1533), painter and engraver, was born and died at Leyden. He practised almost every branch of painting, and as an engraver ranks but little below Albert Dürer. See French work by Evrard (1883) and German one by Volbehr (1888).

Lucca, PAULINE (1842-1908), Berlin opera singer, born at Vienna, and twice married.

Lucian (c. 125-180 A.D.), Greek writer, was born at Samosata in Syria. Having learned Greek and studied rhetoric, he practised as an advocate in Antioch, and wrote and recited show speeches for a living, travelling through Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and Gaul. Having thus made a fortune and a name, he settled in Athens, and there devoted himself to philosophy. There, too, he produced a new form of literature—humorous dialogue. In his old age he accepted a good appointment in Egypt, where he died. Lucian lived when the old faiths, the old philosophy, the old literature, were all rapidly dissolving. Never was there a fairer field for satire; and Lucian revelled in it. The absurdity of retaining the old deities without the old belief is brought out in the Dialogues of the Gods, Dialogues of the Dead, Prometheus, Charon, Menippus, Icaromenippus, and others. Whether philosophy was more disgraced by the shallowness or the vices of those who now professed it, it would be hard to tell from his Symposium, Haliæus, Bion Praxis, Drapetes, &c. The old literature had been displaced by novels or romances of adventure of the most fantastic kind, which Lucian parodies in his True Histories. Apart from the purity of his Greek, his style is simple, sparkling, delightful. See editions by Hemsterhuis and Reitz (1730-45), Lehmann (1822-29), Bekker (1853), Sommerbrodt (1888); and the translation by Mr and Mrs Fowler (4 vols. 1905).

Lucilius (c. 164-102 B.C.), Roman satirist, was born at Suessa Aurunca in Campania, and died at Naples. He wrote thirty books of Satires, of which only fragments remain; see the editions by Lachmann (1876) and L. Müller (1872).

Lücke, GOTTFRIED CHRISTIAN (1791-1855), professor of Theology at Bonn 1818-29, and at Göttingen, wrote a great commentary on John (1820-25).

Lucretia, wife of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, when outraged by Sextus Tarquinius, summoned her husband and friends, and, making them take oath to drive out the Tarquins, plunged a knife into her heart. See BRUTUS.

Lucretius, TITUS CARUS, Roman poet, lived in the first half of the 1st century B.C., and was said to have died raving mad from the effects of a love-potion administered to him by his wife Lucilia (so in Tennyson's poem). The great work of Lucretius is his hexameter poem De Natura Rerum, in six books. The subject-matter of the work is not generally attractive, nor is the versification for the most part pleasing or harmonious. Lucretius aspired to popularise the philosophical theories of Democritus and Epicurus on the origin of the universe, with the special purpose of eradicating anything like religious belief, which he savagely denounces as the one great source of man's wickedness and misery. A calm and tranquil mind was his summum bonum, and the only way to it lay through a materialistic philosophy which teaches that immortality is an empty dream. All phenomena can be explained by natural causes, and thus the door is closed against belief in the divine or supernatural; he often reminds us of some of the newest theories of modern science. His poem abounds in strikingly picturesque phrases; scattered up and down in it are episodes of exquisite pathos and vivid description, perhaps hardly equalled in Latin poetry; and when he allegorises myths into moral truths, he is one of the sublimest of poets. Lachmann's text (1832) was improved by Munro (1870; 4th ed. 1886), who added a commentary and translation. Creech's verse translation (1714) is good on the whole. See Sellar's Roman Poets of the Republic (1863); Veitch's Lucretius and the Atomic Theory (1875); and Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet, by John Masson (1907).

Lucullus, L. LICINIUS (c. 110-57 B.C.), Roman general, commanded the fleet in the first Mithridatic war, as consul in 74 defeated Mithridates, and introduced admirable reforms into Asia Minor. He twice defeated Tigranes of Armenia (69 and 68). But his legions became mutinous, and he was superseded by Pompey (66). He attempted to check Pompey's power, and was one of the first triumvirate, but soon withdrew from politics. He had acquired prodigious wealth; and spent the rest of his life surrounded by artists, poets, and philosophers, and exhibiting a luxury which became proverbial.

Lucy, Sr, the patron of the blind, was a virgin martyred under Diocletian at Syracuse.

Lucy, SIR HENRY W., Daily News parliamentary reporter, the 'Toby, M.P.' of Punch, and novelist, born at Crosby, Liverpool, 5th Dec. 1845.

Ludd, NED, a Leicestershire idiot who in a passion destroyed some stocking-frames about 1782, and from whom the Luddite rioters (1812-18) took name. See work by F. Peel (2d ed. 1888).

Ludlow, EDMUND (c. 1617-92), regicide, born at Maiden Bradley, Wiltshire, at the Civil War was a student in the Temple. He saw service under Waller and Fairfax, was returned for Wiltshire in 1646, sat among the king's judges, and was elected to the council of state of the Commonwealth. In 1651 he was sent to Ireland as lieutenant-general of horse, but refused to recognise Cromwell's protectorate. Returned to parliament for Hindon in 1659, he urged the restoration of the Rump, held command again for a few months in Ireland, was nominated by Lambert to the committee of safety, and strove in vain to reunite the republican party. After the Restoration he made his way to Vevey in Switzerland. The year after the Revolution he returned to England, but, the House of Commons presenting an address to William III. demanding his arrest, he returned to Vevey. C. H. Firth has edited his valuable Memoirs (2 vols. 1894).

Ludlow, JOHN MALCOLM FORBES, C.B. (1821-1911), Christian socialist, was called to the bar in 1843, and in 1875 became chief registrar of Friendly Societies. His writings deal with capital and labour, India, American history, &c.

Ludmilla, St, Bohemia's patroness, the wife of its first Christian duke, was murdered in 927 by her heathen daughter-in-law, Drahomira.

Ludwig. See LOUIS.

Luni, or LOVINO, BERNARDINO (c. 1477-1533), Lombard painter, born at Luino on Lago Maggiore, was trained in the school of Leonardo da Vinci, to whom many of his works have been attributed. He painted much at Milan. Luni is one of the five painters whose 'supremacy' Ruskin affirmed. [Loo-ee'nee.]

Luke (Loukas—i.e. Lucas), a companion of St Paul, mentioned in Col. iv. 14 as 'the beloved physician'; his name is suggestive of an Italian origin. Church tradition made him a native of Antioch in Syria, one of 'the seventy' mentioned in Luke x., a painter by profession, and a martyr. He is first named as author of the third gospel in the Muratorian canon (2d century); and tradition has ever since ascribed to him both that work and the Acts of the Apostles. With respect to the date and authorship of the latter, most modern critics are of opinion that it cannot have been written by a companion of St Paul—not all of it, at least. As regards the third gospel, its author expressly disclaims to have been an eyewitness of the events he records, and makes no pretension to any special apostolic sanction or authority. He is frankly a compiler. The third gospel must be placed at least later than the destruction of Jerusalem, and probably some years later than the gospel according to Matthew. See commentaries of Lange, Meyer, and Keil.

Luke, SIR SAMUEL. See BUTLER, SAMUEL.

Lully, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1633-87), born in Florence, came as a boy to Paris, and by Louis XIV. was made operatic director (1672). With Quinault as librettist, he composed a great number of operas, in which he made the ballet an essential part; the favourites (till Gluck's time) were Thésée, Armide, Phaëton, Atys, Isis, and Acis et Galathée. See monograph by Radet (1891).

Lully, RAYMOND (1234-1315), 'the enlightened doctor,' born at Palma in Majorca, in his youth served as a soldier and led a dissolute life, but from 1266 gave himself up to asceticism and resolved on a spiritual crusade for the conversion of the Mussulmans. To this end, after some years of study, he produced his Ars Magna, the 'Lullian method'; a mechanical aid to the acquisition of knowledge and the solution of all possible problems by a systematic manipulation of certain fundamental notions (the Aristotelian categories, &c.). He also wrote a book against the Averroists, and in 1291 went to Tunis to confute and convert the Mohammedans, but was imprisoned and banished. After visiting Naples, Rome, Majorca, Cyprus, and Armenia, he again sailed (1305) for Bugia (Bougie) in Algeria, and was again banished; at Paris lectured against the principles of Averroes; and once more at Bugia was stoned so that he died a few days afterwards. The Lullists combined religious mysticism with alchemy. See books by Helfferich (Berl. 1858), Brambach (1898), and Barber (1904); and the editions of his works by Salzinger (1721-42) and Rossello (1886 et seq.).

Lunardi, VINCENTO (1759-1806), a native of Lucca, on 15th September 1784 made the first balloon ascent in England from Moorfields.

Luthardt, CHRISTOPH ERNST (born 1823; died 1902), Lutheran theologian, became professor at Marburg (1854) and at Leipzig (1856). He is best known for his Commentary on John's Gospel (1852-53; 2d ed. 1876), which has been translated, as has also St John the Author of the Fourth Gospel, works on ethics and the truths of Christianity, a handbook of dogmatics (1865; 9th ed. 1893), &c. See his Reminiscences (2d ed. 1891).

Luther, MARTIN, was born at Eisleben, 10th November 1483, the son of a miner, and went to school at Magdeburg and Eisenach. In 1501 he entered the University of Erfurt, and took his degree in 1505. Ere this, however, he was led to the study of the Scriptures, resolved to devote himself to a spiritual life, and spent three years in the Augustinian convent at Erfurt. In 1507 he was ordained a priest, in 1508 lectured on philosophy in the University of Wittenberg, in 1509 on the Scriptures, and as a preacher produced a still more powerful influence. In 1511 he was sent to Rome, and after his return his career as a Reformer commenced. Money was largely needed at Rome; and its emissaries sought everywhere to raise funds by the sale of indulgences. Luther's indignation at the shameless traffic carried on by the Dominican John Tetzel (1517) became irrepressible. He drew out ninety-five theses on indulgences, denying to the pope all right to forgive sins; and these on 31st October he nailed on the church door at Wittenberg. Tetzel retreated from Saxony to Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, where he published a set of counter-theses and burnt Luther's. The Wittenberg students retaliated by burning Tetzel's. In 1518 Luther was joined by Melancthon. The pope, Leo X., at first took little heed of the disturbance, but in 1518 summoned Luther to Rome to answer for his theses. His university and the elector interfered, and ineffective negotiations were undertaken by Cardinal Cajetan and by Miltitz, envoy of the pope to the Saxon court. Eck and Luther held a memorable disputation at Leipzig (1519). Luther meantime attacked the papal system as a whole more boldly. Erasmus and Hutten now joined in the conflict. In 1520 the Reformer published his famous address to the 'Christian Nobles of Germany,' followed by a treatise On the Babylonish Captivity of the Church, which works attacked also the doctrinal system of the Church of Rome. The papal bull, containing forty-one theses, issued against him he burned before a multitude of doctors, students, and citizens in Wittenberg. Germany was convulsed with excitement. Charles V. had convened his first diet at Worms in 1521; an order was issued for the destruction of Luther's books, and he himself was summoned to appear before the diet. His journey thither resembled a triumph; the threats of enemies and the anxieties of friends alike failed to move him; ultimately he was put under the ban of the Empire. On his return from Worms he was seized, at the instigation of the Elector of Saxony, and lodged (really for his protection) in the Wartburg. During the year he spent here he translated the Scriptures and composed various treatises. Disorders recalled Luther to Wittenberg in 1522; he rebuked the unruly spirits, and made a stand against lawlessness on the one hand and tyranny on the other. In this year he published his acrimonious reply to Henry VIII. on the seven sacraments. Estrangement had gradually sprung up between Erasmus and Luther, and there was an open breach in 1525, when Erasmus published De Libero Arbitrio, and Luther followed with De Servo Arbitrio. In that year Luther married Katharina von Bora (q.v.), one of nine nuns who had withdrawn from conventual life. In 1529 he engaged in his famous conference at Marburg with Zwingli and other Swiss divines, obstinately maintaining his views as to the Real (consubstantial) Presence in the Eucharist. The drawing up of the Augsburg Confession, Melancthon representing Luther, marks the culmination of the German Reformation (1530); henceforward Luther's life was uneventful. He died at Eisleben, 18th February 1546, and was buried at Wittenberg. Endowed with broad human sympathies, massive energy, manly and affectionate simplicity, and rich, if sometimes coarse humour, he was undoubtedly a spiritual genius. His intuitions of divine truth were bold, vivid, and penetrating, if not philosophical and comprehensive; and he possessed the power of kindling other souls with the fire of his own convictions. His works are voluminous. Among those of more general interest are his Table-talk, Letters, and Sermons. His Commentaries on Galatians and the Psalms are still read; and he was one of the great leaders of sacred song, his hymns, rugged, but intense and expressive, having an enduring power. The great editions of Luther's works are those of Wittenberg (12 vols. German; 7 vols. Latin, 1539-58); Halle, ed. by Walch (German, 24 vols. 1740-53); Erlangen and Frankfurt (67 vols. German; 33 vols. Latin, 1826-73); and Weimar (1883 et seq.). Of the many Lives the most important are those of Meurer (3d ed. 1870), Jürgens (1846-47), Köstlin (1875) and a popular ed. 1891), Plitt and Petersen (3d ed. 1887), and Kolde (1884-93); and in English by T.M. Lindsay (1903) and Preserved Smith (1911). See also Armstrong's Charles V., Creighton's Papacy, and Lindsay's Reformation (1906).

Luttrell, HENRY (c. 1765-1851), a London wit.

Lützow, LUDWIG ADOLF WILHELM, FRIEHRER von (1782-1834), gave name to a renowned corps of volunteers, 'the Black Jäger,' raised by him during the war of liberation in 1813. See work by Von Jagwitz (Berl. 1892).

Luxembourg, DUC DE. François Henri de Montmorency-Bouteville (1628-95), born in Paris, was trained by his aunt, mother of the Great Condé, and adhered to Condé through the wars of the Fronde. After 1659 he was pardoned by Louis XIV., who created him Duc de Luxembourg (1661)—he had just married the heiress of Luxembourg-Piney. In 1667 he served under Condé in Franche-Comté; in 1672 he himself successfully invaded the Netherlands, and, driven back in 1673, conducted a masterly retreat. During the war he storned Valenciennes and twice defeated the Prince of Orange. Made a marshal in 1675, soon after the peace (1678) he quarrelled with Louvois (q.v.), and was not employed for twelve years. In 1690 he commanded in Flanders, and defeated the allies at Fleurus, and in 1691 twice more routed his old opponent, now William III., at Steinkirk and Neerwinden.

Luynes, CHARLES D'ALBERT, DUC DE (1578-1621), the unworthy favourite of Louis XIII. of France, became in 1619 a peer of France, and in 1621 chancellor. See Life by Zeller (Par. 1879).

Lyall, SIR ALFRED COMYN, P.C. (1835-1911), born at Coulston, Surrey, and educated at Eton and Haileybury, was lieutenant-governor of the North-west Provinces of India (1882-87), having in 1881 been created a K.C.B.; in 1888 he was appointed a member of the Council of India. He wrote Asiatic Studies (1882), Warren Hastings (1889), Rise of the British Dominion in India (1893), &c.

Lyall, EDNA, pen-name of the novelist Ada Ellen Bayly, who died in 1903 (Life by Payne). She wrote Won by Waiting (1879), Donovan (1882), with its sequel We Two (1884), In the Golden Days (1885), Knight Errant (1887), Autobiography of a Slander (1887), Derrick Vaughan and A Hardy Norseman (1889), To Right the Wrong (1893), Doreen (1894), Hope the Hermit (1898), &c.

Lycurgus (c. 896-825 B.C.), Attic orator, supported Demosthenes, and as manager of the public revenue distinguished himself by his integrity and love of splendid architecture. Of his fifteen speeches but one has survived (ed. by Nicolai, 2d ed. 1885). See the full French monograph by Dürrbach (1890).

Lycurgus, lawgiver of Sparta (c. 820 B.C.), was uncle of the young king Charilaos, and governed wisely during his nephew's infancy, then travelled in Crete, Ionia, and Egypt. On his return, finding Sparta in anarchy, he redivided property, and remodelled the constitution, military and civil.

Lydgate, JOHN, an imitator of Chaucer, was born at Lydgate near Newmarket, about 1370, and became a Benedictine monk at Bury St Edmunds. He studied at Oxford, travelled in France and perhaps in Italy, became a court-poet, and wrote poetry upon the most widely different themes. He received a pension in 1439, but died in poverty about 1451. Ritson attributes (wildly) 251 pieces to Lydgate. Lydgate's longer works are the Storie of Thebes, the Troy Book, and the Falls of Princes. The Storie of Thebes is represented as a new Canterbury tale, and was based on Statius and Boccaccio. The versification is rough, and the poem dull and prolix. The Troy Book was founded on Colonna's Latin prose Historia Trojana, and the Falls of Princes on Boccaccio. Other works are the Dauonce of Machabre, translated from the French; Court of Sapience; and Temple of Glas, a copy of Chaucer's House of Fame; also a metrical Life of St Edmund and the Legend of St Alban. Halliwell edited a selection from the minor poems in 1840, and Dr Schick his Temple of Glas (Early Eng. Text Soc. 1891).

Lyell, SIR CHARLES, geologist, born at Kinordy, Forfarshire, 14th November 1797, the eldest son of the mycologist and Dante student, Charles Lyell (1767-1849). Brought up in the New Forest, and educated at Ringwood, Salisbury, and Midhurst, in 1816 he entered Exeter College, Oxford, and took his B.A. in 1819. At Oxford in 1819 he attended the lectures of Buckland, and acquired a taste for the science he afterwards did so much to promote. He studied law, and was called to the bar; but devoting himself to geology, made European tours in 1824 and 1828-30, and published the results in the Transactions of the Geological Society and elsewhere. His Principles of Geology (1830-33) may be ranked next after Darwin's Origin of Species among the books which have exercised the most powerful influence on scientific thought in the 19th century. It denied the necessity of stupendous convulsions, and taught that the greatest geological changes might have been produced by forces still at work. The Elements of Geology (1838) was a supplement. The Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man (1863) startled the public by its unbiased attitude towards Darwin. Lyell also published Travels in North America (1845) and A Second Visit to the United States (1849). In 1832-33 he was professor of Geology at King's College, London. Repeatedly president of the Geological Society, and in 1864 president of the British Association, he was knighted in 1848, and created a baronet in 1864. He died in London, 22d February 1875, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Life, Letters, and Journals (1881), and Prof. Bonney's Charles Lyell and Geology (1895).

Lyly, JOHN, the Euphuist, was born in the Weald of Kent towards the end of 1553. He took his B.A. from Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1578, and studied also at Cambridge. Lord Burghley gave him some post of trust in his household, and he became vice-master of the St Paul's choristers. Having in 1589 taken part in the Marprelate controversy, he was returned to parliament for Aylesbury and Appleby, 1597-1601. He was buried 30th November 1606. His Euphuus, a romance in two parts—Euphuus, the Anatomie of Wit (1579), and Euphuus and his England (1580)—was received with great applause. One peculiarity of his 'new English' is the constant employment of similes drawn from fabulous stories about the properties of animals, plants, and minerals; another is the excessive indulgence in antithesis. But sound advice is offered on the subject of friendship, love, travel, the nature and education of children, morality, and religion. Lyly's earliest comedy was The Woman in the Moone, produced in or before 1583. Campaspe and Sapho and Phao were published in 1584, Endimion in 1591, Gallathea and Midas in 1592, Mother Bombe in 1594, and Love's Metamorphosis in 1601. Though these comedies display little dramatic power, the dialogue is frequently sparkling. The delightful songs were first printed in the edition of 1632. Lyly's plays were edited by Fairholt in 1858, his Complete Works by R. Warwick Bond in 1902; Endimion was edited by George P. Baker (New York, 1895). See books by C. G. Child (Leip. 1894) and Feuillerat (1910).

Lynch, MAYOR, the familiar title of the mayor of Galway, James Lynch Fitzstephen, who in 1493 condemned his own son to death for the murder of a Spaniard, and, to prevent his being rescued, had him hanged from a window of the jail. Hence some have derived 'Lynch law.'

three, with his mother, he followed the painter to London, and in 1790 entered Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1794 he came out second wrangler and second Smith's prizeman, next year got a fellowship, and in 1796 paid a visit to the States. On his return he studied for the bar, and was called in 1804. Success was slow till 1812, when he made a hit by his ingenious defence of a Luddite rioter. In 1817 he obtained the acquittal of Thistlewood and Watson on their trial for high-treason; but for the next state prosecution the government secured him on their side, and in 1818 he entered parliament for a government borough. Henceforward he continued a fairly consistent Tory. In 1819, as Sir John Copley, he became Solicitor-general, in 1824 Attorney-general, and in 1826 Master of the Rolls. As Baron Lyndhurst he was Lord Chancellor under three administrations from 1827 to 1830, when his Whig opponents made him Chief-baron of the Exchequer; that office he exchanged for the woolstack under Peel (1834-35). In 1841-46 he was for the third time Lord Chancellor. He died 12th Oct. 1863. Lyndhurst's judgments have never been excelled for lucidity, method, and legal acumen. See Life by Sir Theodore Martin (1883).

Lyndsay, or LINDSAY, SIR DAVID, OF THE MOUNT, Scottish poet, was born about 1490 probably at one of his father's seats—the Mount near Cupar, or Garmylton (now Garleton) near Haddington. He seems to have entered St. Salvador's College, St. Andrews, in 1509, and in 1512 was appointed 'usher' of the new-born prince who became James V. In 1522 Lyndsay married Janet Douglas, the king's sempstress; in 1526, under the Douglases, he lost his place; in 1538 he was made Lyon King-of-arms, having been knighted. He went on embassies to the Netherlands, France, England, and Denmark. He appears to have represented Cupar in the parliaments of 1542 and 1543. He died in 1555. For two centuries he was the poet of the Scottish people. His poems, often coarse, are full of humour, good sense, and knowledge of the world, and were said to have done more for the Reformation in Scotland than all the sermons of Knox, for Lyndsay shot some of his sharpest shafts at the clergy. The earliest and most poetical of his writings is The Dreme; the most ambitious, The Monarchie; the most remarkable, The Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis; the most amusing, The Historie of Snyger Meldrum. There are editions by Chalmers (1806), David Laing (1879), and Small, Hall, and Murray (Early English Text Soc. 1865 et seq.).

Lynedoch, THOMAS GRAHAM, LORD, son of the laird of Balgowan in Perthshire, born 19th Oct. 1748, raised in 1793 the 90th Regiment of foot, and served at Quiberon and in Minorca (1798). He besieged Valetta in 1800, was at Corunna and in Walcheren (1809), at Barossa defeated the French (1811), fought at Ciudad Rodrigo (1812), Badajoz, and Salamanca, commanded the left wing at Vittoria (1813), captured Tolosa and St. Sebastian, and in Holland conquered at Merxem, but failed to storm Bergen-op-Zoom (1814). Created Baron Lynedoch of Balgowan (1814), he died 18th Dec. 1843. He founded the Senior United Service Club (1817). See Lives by Graham (2d ed. 1877) and Col. Delavoie (1880). [Lin'dokh.]

Lyon, JOHN (d. 1592), yeoman, in 1571 founded the great public school of Harrow.

Lyons, EDMUND, LORD (1790-1858), admiral, commanded in the Dutch West Indies (1810-11) and in Crimean waters, and was made a peer in 1856.—His son, RICHARD BICKERTON (1817-87), ambassador to the United States, Turkey, and France, was made a viscount in 1881, an earl in 1887.

Lyra, NICOLAUS DE (1270?-1340), born at Lyre near Evreux, was a lecturer at Paris, provincial of the Franciscans, and author of very famous Postilla or commentaries on scripture, in which he insisted on the literal meanings and protested against the traditional allegorising method.

Lysaght, EDWARD (1763-1811), barrister and Dublin police magistrate, wrote many well-known Irish lyrics.

Lysander, as commander of the Spartan fleet defeated the Athenians at Egospotami (405), and in 404 he took Athens, thus ending the Peloponnesian war.

Lysias (c. 450-380 B.C.), Greek orator, was the son of a rich Syracusan, who settled in Athens about 440. He was educated at Thurii in Italy. The Thirty Tyrants in 404 stripped him and his brother Polemarchus of their wealth, and killed Polemarchus. The first use to which Lysias put his eloquence was, on the fall of the Thirty (403), to prosecute Eratosthenes, the tyrant chiefly to blame for his brother's murder. He then practised with success as a writer of speeches for litigants. From his thirty-four surviving speeches we see that Lysias is delightfully lucid in thought and expression, and strong in character drawing. See Jebb's Attic Orators.

Lysimachus (c. 361-281 B.C.), a general of Alexander the Great's, afterwards king of Thrace.

Lysippus, of Sicyon, a prolific Greek sculptor, who flourished about 360-316 B.C. See German monograph by Löwy (1891).

Lysons, DANIEL (1762-1834), a clergyman, born in Gloucestershire, wrote The Environs of London (1792-96), &c.—His son, SAMUEL (1806-77), was a Gloucestershire rector and antiquary.

Lyte, HENRY FRANCIS, hymn-writer, born at Ednam near Kelso, 1st June 1793, entered Trinity College, Dublin; took orders in 1815; was for twenty-five years incumbent of Lower Brixham; and died at Nice, 20th November 1847. His Poems, chiefly Religious (1833; reprinted as Miscellaneous Poems, 1868), are well-nigh forgotten; but 'Abide with me,' 'Pleasant are thy courts,' and other hymns keep his memory green. See Life prefixed to his Remains (1850).

Lytelton, GEORGE, LORD (1709-73), son of Sir Thomas Lytelton of Hagley in Worcestershire, entered parliament in 1730, soon acquired eminence as a speaker, held several high political offices, and was raised to the peerage in 1759. His poetry gained him a place in Johnson's Lives of the Poets; his best-known prose works are on The Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul (1747), Dialogues of the Dead (1760), and History of Henry II. (1764). See Memoirs and Correspondence (1845).—His son, THOMAS, LORD LYTTELTON (1744-79), the 'wicked Lord Lytelton,' died three days after a dream of a dove that changed into a white lady. The Poems by a Young Nobleman (1780) may partly have been his, but the Letters of the late Lord Lytelton (1780-82) were probably by W. Combe. See Life by Frost (1876), and Andrew Lang, The Valet's Tragedy (1903).

Lytelton, SIR THOMAS. See LITTLETON.

Lytton, EDWARD BULWER, LORD, novelist, playwright, essayist, poet, and politician, was born in London, 25th May 1803. He was the third and youngest son of General Earle Bulwer

(1776-1807), of Heydon and Dalling in Norfolk, by Elizabeth Barbara Lytton (1773-1843), the heiress of Knebworth in Hertfordshire. As a child a devourer of books, his favourites Amadis de Gaul and the Faery Queen, he took early to rhyming, and went to school at nine, though not to a public one, but to six private tutors in succession (1812-21). In 1820 he published Ismael and other Poems, and about the same time was 'changed for life' by a tragic first love. At Trinity Hall, Cambridge (1822-25), he read English history, political economy, metaphysics, and early English literature; spoke much at the Union; carried off the Chancellor's gold medal for a poem upon 'Sculpture'; but took only a pass degree. His college life ended, he alternated awhile between Paris and London; and in London, in 1825, he met Rosina Wheeler (1802-82), a beautiful Irish girl, whom in 1827, despite his mother, he married. It was a most unhappy marriage. She bore him a daughter, Emily (1828-48), and a son, the future Earl of Lytton; in 1836 they separated. But his marriage called forth a marvellous literary activity, for the temporary estrangement from his mother threw him almost wholly on his own resources. He had only £200 a-year, and he lived at the rate of £3000; the deficiency was supplied by his indefatigable industry. During the next ten years he produced twelve novels, two poems, one play, the whole of England and the English; Athens, its Rise and Fall, and all the essays and tales collected in the Student, to which must be added his untold contributions to the Edinburgh, Westminster, New Monthly (of which he became editor in 1831), Examiner, &c. His Wertherian Falkland (1827) gave little promise of the brilliant success of Pelham (1828). No two readers agree on the relative merit of his books, but certainly Pelham is better than Paul Clifford (1830), an idealisation of the highwayman, as Eugene Aram (1832) is of the murderer; most, however, will rank it as inferior to the Pilgrims of the Rhine (1834) or to one or another of his four historical novels—The Last Days of Pompeii (1834), Rienzi (1835), The Last of the Barons (1843), and Harold (1843). Then, there is his domestic trilogy, The Caxtons (1850), My Novel (1853), and What will he do with it? (1859); and Zanoni (1842), A Strange Story (1862), and, shorter but stronger than either, The Haunted and the Haunters (1859). Of his plays the Lady of Lyons (1838), Richelieu (1838), and Money (1840) still hold the stage; of his poems King Arthur (1848), and even St Stephens (1860) and the Lost Tales of Miletus (1866), will all be forgotten when the New Timon (1846) is still kept in remembrance by the savage answer it provoked from Tennyson. In 1831 he had entered parliament for St Ives, and attached himself to the Reform party; but Lincoln next year returned him as a Protectionist Liberal, and that seat he held till 1841. In 1838 the Melbourne administration conferred on him a baronetcy; in 1843 he succeeded to the Knebworth estate, and assumed the surname of Lytton. He now sought to re-enter parliament, in 1847 contesting Lincoln unsuccessfully; in 1852 he was returned as Conservative member for Hertfordshire. Deafness hindered him from shining as a debater, but he made himself a successful orator. In the Derby government (1858-59) he was Colonial Secretary, and called into existence the colonies of British Columbia and Queensland. In 1866 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Lytton. He died at Torquay, 18th January 1873, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Lord Lytton's works exceed sixty. To those already mentioned may be added The Disowned (1829), Devereux (1829), Godolphin (1833), Ernest Maltravers (1837), Alice (1837), Leila (1838), Night and Morning (1841), Lucretia (1846), Caxtoniana (1863), The Coming Race (anonymous, 1870), Kenelm Chillingly (1873), The Parisians (1874), and Pausanias the Spartan (unfinished, 1876). His Life, Letters, and Literary Remains (vols. i.-ii. 1883) comes down only to 1832, so must be supplemented by the political Memoir, also by his son, prefixed to his Speeches (1874). See Life by Escott (1910).

Lytton, EDWARD ROBERT, EARL OF, poet, diplomatist, and statesman, was born in London, 8th November 1831, and was educated at Harrow and at Bonn. In 1849 he went to Washington as attaché and private secretary to his uncle, Sir Henry Bulwer (q.v.); and subsequently he was appointed attaché, secretary of legation, consul or chargé d'affaires at Florence (1852), Paris (1854), The Hague (1856), St Petersburg and Constantinople (1858), Vienna (1859), Belgrade (1860), Constantinople again (1863), Athens (1864), Lisbon (1865), Madrid (1868), Vienna again (1869), and Paris (1873). In the last year he succeeded his father as second Lord Lytton, and in 1874 became minister at Lisbon, in 1876 Viceroy of India, at the same time receiving the Grand Cross of the Bath. The chief events of his viceroyalty were the proclamation of the Queen as Empress of India (1877), and the outbreak (1879) of the Afghan war. In 1880 he resigned, and was made Earl of Lytton; in 1887 he was sent as ambassador to Paris, and there he died 24th November 1891. His works, published mostly under the pseudonym of 'Owen Meredith,' include Clytemnestra (1855), a dramatic poem; The Wanderer (1859); Lucile (1860), a novel in verse; Serbski pesme (1861), 'translations from the Servian'; The Ring of Amasis (1863), a prose romance; Orval, or the Fool of Time (1869); Fables in Song (1874); Glenaveril (1885), an epic of modern life; After Paradise (1887); Marah (1892); and King Poppy (1892). See his Indian Administration (1899) and his Letters (1906), both by his daughter, Lady Betty Balfour.

MAARTENS, MAARTEN, the pen-name of J. M. W. van der Poorten Schwarz, born at Amsterdam, 15th Aug. 1858, who, having spent part of his boyhood in England and been at school in Germany, studied law at Utrecht University. He is the author of a series of powerful novels in nervous English, including The Sin of Joost Avelingh (1889), A Question of Taste (1892), God's Fool (1893), The Greater Glory (1894), and My Lady Nobility (1895).

Mabillon, JEAN (1632-1707), born at St Pierre-mont in Champagne, in 1653 entered the Benedictine order, in 1663 became keeper of the monuments at St Denis, and from 1664 worked in the abbey of St Germain-des-Prés at Paris, where he died. He edited St Bernard's works (1667); and wrote a history of his order (1668-1702), De Re Diplomatica (1681), Vetere Analecta (1675-85), Museum Italicum (1687-89), &c. See books by Rünart (1709), Chavin de Malan (1843), Jadart (1879), E. de Broglie (1888), and Bänner (Augsb. 1892).

Mably, GABRIEL BONNOT DE (1709-85), born at Grenoble, the elder brother of Condillac, for a time was secretary to the minister Cardinal

Tencin, his uncle, and wrote Entretiens de Phocion (1763), Parallèle des Romains et des François (1740), and Observations sur l'Histoire de la Grèce (1766). His De la Manière d'Écrire l'Histoire (1783) contains severe strictures on Hume, Robertson, Gibbon, and Voltaire. Le Droit Public de l'Europe (1748) was the outcome of his official life. See Guerrier's L'abbé de Mably (1886).

Mabuse, JAN (real name GOSSAERT), Flemish painter, was born at Maubeuge (Mabuse) about 1470, in 1503 entered the painters' guild of St Luke at Antwerp, and was influenced by Menling and Quentin Matsys. In 1508-9 he accompanied Philip of Burgundy to Italy, and returned with his style greatly modified by the Italian masters. Drunken but sumptuous, he lived latterly at Middelburg, but died at Antwerp, 1st Oct. 1532. His works embrace mythological and religious subjects and portraits. [Ma-bees.]

McAdam, JOHN LOUDON, inventor of the 'macadamising' system of road-making, was born at Ayr, 21st Sept. 1756. He went to New York in 1770, became a successful merchant, and on his return to Scotland in 1783 bought the estate of Sauchrie, Ayrshire. Beginning in 1810 experiments in road-making, in 1816 he was appointed surveyor to the Bristol Turnpike Trust, and re-made the roads there cheaply and well. His advice was now sought in all directions. Impoverished through his labours, he petitioned parliament in 1820, and in 1823 was voted £10,000, in 1827 appointed Surveyor-general of Metropolitan Roads. He died 26th Nov. 1836. He published three books on road-making (1819-22).

Macartney, GEORGE, EARL, born at Lisnoure near Belfast, 14th May 1737, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1764 was knighted and sent as an envoy to Russia, in 1769-72 was Chief-secretary of Ireland, and in 1775 was governor of Grenada. There, having three years before been made Lord Macartney in the Irish peerage, he was in 1779 compelled, after an honourable defence, to surrender to Count d'Estaing, and was carried prisoner of war to France. Governor of Madras 1781-86, in 1792 he was made an earl and headed the first diplomatic mission to China. After undertaking a mission to Louis XVIII. at Verona (1795-96), he went out as governor to the Cape; but ill-health compelled him to return in 1798. He died at Chiswick, 31st March 1806. See Life by Mrs Robbins (1908).

Macaulay, CATHARINE, née SAWBRIDGE (1731-91), born at Wye in Kent, married in 1760 George Macaulay, M.D., and in 1778, after twelve years of widowhood, a youthful William Graham. An early Radical, she wrote a History of England, 1685-1715 (8 vols. 1763-83).

Macaulay, JAMES, M.D., born in Edinburgh, 22d May 1817, and educated there at the Academy and university, in 1850 took to journalism, and from 1858 to 1895 was editor of the Leisure Hour, &c.

Macaulay, THOMAS BABINGTON, LORD, was born of Scottish ancestry at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, 25th October 1800. Zachary Macaulay (1768-1838), his father, had a somewhat chequered career as a West India merchant, but was best known as an abolitionist and a member of the 'Clapham Sect.' In 1812 young Macaulay was sent to a private school at Little Shelford near Cambridge, moved in 1814 to Aspenden Hall in Hertfordshire, whence, an exceptionally precocious boy, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1818. He detested mathematics, but twice won the Chancellor's medal for English verse, and obtained a prize for Latin declamation. In 1821 he carried off the Craven, in 1822 took his B.A., and in 1824 was elected to a fellowship. He was one of the most brilliant disputants in the Union. Called to the bar in 1826, he had no liking for his profession—literature had irresistible attractions for him. In 1823 he became a contributor to Knight's Quarterly Magazine, in which appeared some of his best verses—Ivry, The Spanish Armada, and Naseby. In 1825 he was discovered by Jeffrey, and his famous article on Milton in the August number of the Edinburgh Review secured him a position in literature. For nearly twenty years he was one of the most prolific of the writers to the Edinburgh, and far the most popular. In 1830 he entered parliament for the pocket-borough of Calne, and in the Reform Bill debates his great powers as an orator were established. Commissioner, and then Secretary, to the Board of Control, he still wrote steadily for the Edinburgh, and made a great reputation as a conversationalist in society. Mainly for the sake of his family, impoverished by the father's devotion to philanthropy, he accepted the office of legal adviser to the Supreme Council of India, with a salary of £10,000, and sailed for Bengal in 1834. He acted also as chairman of the committee of Public Instruction, and of the committee appointed to prepare a Penal Code and a Code of Criminal Procedure. In the former capacity he successfully counselled the teaching of European literature and science to the natives of India. In 1838 he returned to England. In 1839 he was elected member of parliament for Edinburgh, and entered Lord Melbourne's Cabinet as Secretary at War. The Lays of Ancient Rome (1842) won an immense popularity; so too did his collected Essays (3 vols. 1843). His connection with the Edinburgh ceased in 1845; he had now commenced his History of England from the Accession of James II. Appointed Paymaster-general of the Forces in 1846, he was re-elected for Edinburgh; but his support of the Maynooth Grant led to his defeat at the general election of 1847. In 1852 he was again returned for Edinburgh; in 1856 he retired. The first two volumes of his History appeared in 1848, and at once attained greater popularity than had ever fallen to a purely historical work; the next two followed in 1855, and an unfinished fifth volume was published in 1861. In 1849 he was elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University. In 1857 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Macaulay of Rothley. Among other honours was his nomination to the Prussian Order of Merit. For the Encyclopædia Britannica he wrote important articles on Atterbury, Bunyan, Goldsmith, Johnson, and Pitt. He died in his arm-chair at Holly Lodge, Kensington, 28th December 1859, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Macaulay's reputation is not what once it was—he has been convicted of historical inaccuracy, of sacrificing truth for the sake of epigram, of allowing personal dislike and Whig bias to distort his views of men and incidents. But as a picturesque narrator he has no rival. See his Life and Letters by his nephew, Sir G. O. Trevelyan (1876), Cotter Morison's Monograph (1882), an essay by John Morley (Critical Miscellanies, 1886), and a study by Taine (History of English Literature, vol. ii. 1871).

McAuley, CATHERINE (1787-1841), a Dublin lady, the founder of the Order of Mercy.

Macbeth, Mormaer of Moray, married Gruoch, granddaughter of Kenneth Dubh, king of Alban, and became commander of the forces of Scotland. In 1040 he slew King Duncan, and succeeded him. He seems to have represented a Celtic reaction against English influence; and his seventeen years' reign is commemorated in the chronicles as a time of plenty. Malcolm Canmore, Duncan's son, ultimately defeated and killed him at Lumphanan, 15th August 1057. Shakespeare got his story from Holinshed, who drew on Boece. See Skene's Celtic Scotland (1876).

Macbeth, ROBERT WALKER (1848-1910), etcher and genre-painter, was born in Glasgow, the eldest son of the portrait-painter, Norman Macbeth, R.S.A. (1821-88). He came to London in 1870, was elected A.R.A. (1883), R.A. (1903).

Mac'cabeus, a race of Jewish rulers, of the Hasmonæan family. The founder of the dynasty, Mattathias, a priest, was the first to make a stand against the persecutions of the Jewish nation and creed by Antiochus Epiphanes. He and his five sons, Jochanan, Simon, Jehudah, Eleazar, and Jonathan, together with a handful of faithful men, rose against the national foe, destroyed all traces of heathen worship, and fled into the wilderness of Judah. Their number soon increased; they were able to make descents into the villages and cities, where they restored the ancient worship of Jehovah. At the death of Mattathias (166 B.C.) his son Jehudah or Judas, now called Makkabi (Makkab, 'hammer') or Maccabæus, took the command of the patriots, and repulsed the enemy, reconquered Jerusalem, purified the Temple, and reinaugurated the holy service (164). Having concluded an alliance with the Romans, he fell in battle (161). His brother Jonathan renewed the Roman alliance, acquired the dignity of high-priest, but was treacherously executed by Syrian influence. Simon, the second brother, completely re-established the independence of the nation (141), and 'Judah prospered as of old.' But he was foully murdered (136) by his own son-in-law, Ptolemy. See the articles HYRCANUS, HEROD; the Apocryphal books of the Maccabees; and the histories of the period by De Saulcy (1880), Ewald, and Schürer.

MacCarthy, DENIS FLORENCE, born in Dublin, 26th May 1817, was bred for the priesthood, but from 1843 became known as one of the young poets of the Nation. His 'Bell-Founder,' 'Voyage of St Brendan,' 'Foray of Con O'Donnel,' and 'Pillar Towers of Ireland' carried his fame through the land. In 1853-73 he translated ten of Calderon's dramas in the original metres; in 1872 published Shelley's Early Life. He died 7th April 1882. His poems were collected in 1884.

McCarthy, JUSTIN, born in Cork, 22d November 1830, joined the staff of the Northern Times, Liverpool, in 1853, and in 1860 entered the reporters' gallery for the Morning Star, becoming its chief editor in 1864. He resigned in 1868, and devoted the next three years to a tour of the United States. Soon after his return he became connected with the Daily News, and he contributed to the London, Westminster, and Fortnightly Reviews. He entered parliament in 1879 for Longford, and identifying himself with the Home-rule party, was chairman of the Anti-Parnellite section from Mr Parnell's deposition till 1896. He is better known, however, as a novelist than as a politician. His novels include Paul Massie (1866), The Waterdale Neighbours (1867), My Enemy's Daughter (1869), Lady Judith (1871), A Fair Saxon (1873), Dear Lady Disdain (1875), Miss Misanthrope (1877), Donna Quixote (1879), Maid of Athens (1883), Comiola (1885), The Dictator (1893), and The Riddle Ring (1896). Other works are A History of our Own Times (7 vols. 1879-1905), The Four Georges and William IV. (4 vols. 1889-1901), Queen Anne (1902), books on Peel, Gladstone, Pope Leo XIII., &c. He died 24th April 1912. See his Reminiscences (1899-1911).—His son, JUSTIN HUNTLY, born 1860, was a Nationalist M.P. 1884-92; in 1894 he married that clever music-hall impersonator, Miss Cissie Loftus (born in Glasgow, 22d Oct. 1876, who divorced him 1899). He has written England under Gladstone (1884), Ireland since the Union (1887), The French Revolution (4 vols. 1890-97), A London Legend (1895), &c.

M'Cheyne, ROBERT MURRAY (1813-43), born at Edinburgh, and educated at the university there, in 1836 became a minister at Dundee. In 1839 he visited Palestine as one of a mission sent by the Church of Scotland, and published, with Bonar, the Narrative of a Mission of Enquiry to the Jews (1839). A man of saintly piety, he published hymns and sermons. See his Remains, with Memoir by A. A. Bonar (1848). [Chain.]

McClellan, GEORGE BRINTON, American general, was born at Philadelphia, 3d December 1826, graduated at West Point, served with the engineers through the Mexican war, and taught at West Point. In 1855 he was sent to observe the campaign in the Crimea. At the civil war in 1861, as major-general in the U.S. army, he drove the enemy out of West Virginia, and was called to Washington to reorganise the Army of the Potomac. In November he was made commander-in-chief, but held the honour only five months. His Virginian campaign ended disastrously. He advanced near to Richmond, but was compelled to retreat, fighting the 'seven days' battles' (June 25 to July 1, 1862). After the disastrous second battle of Bull Run (August 29-30), followed by a Confederate invasion of Maryland, he reorganised the army at Washington, marched north, met Lee at Antietam, and compelled him to recross the Potomac. He followed the Confederates into Virginia, but as too slow and cautious was superseded by Burnside. In 1864 he opposed Lincoln for the presidency, and in 1877 was elected governor of New Jersey, and died 29th October 1885. See McClellan's Own Story, edited by Prime (1886).

McClintock, ADMIRAL SIR FRANCIS LEOPOLD (1819-1907), born at Dundalk, entered the navy in 1831, and was knighted in 1860 for discovering the fate of the Franklin (q.v.) expedition. In 1891 he was created a K.C.B.

M'Clure, SIR ROBERT JOHN LE MESURIER, discoverer of the North-west Passage, was born at Wexford, 28th January 1807, entered the navy in 1824, and served in Back's Arctic Expedition in 1836, and Ross's Franklin Expedition in 1848. As commander of another Franklin Expedition (1850-54) he entered the Arctic Ocean by Behring Strait, and penetrated eastwards to the north coast of Back's Land. There he was beset for nearly two years, when, as he was on the point of abandoning his ship, the Investigator, he was rescued by Captain Kellett, who had penetrated to Melville Sound from Baffin's Bay. M'Clure was made K.C.B., and after serving in Chinese waters, an admiral. He died 17th October 1873. See his Voyages (2 vols. 1884).

MacColl, MALCOLM (1838-1907), born at Glenfinnan, Inverness-shire, and educated at Edinburgh, Glenalmond, and Naples, became in 1884 a canon of Ripon, in 1894 Savoy chaplain. A High Churchman and a Liberal in politics, he wrote on the Eastern Question, Armenia, &c.

Maccoll, NORMAN (1843-1904), born at Edinburgh, in 1862 entered Christ's College, Cambridge, and in 1869 was elected a fellow of Downing. Editor of the Athenæum in 1870-1900, he has written Greek Sceptics from Pyrrho to Sextus (1869) and edited four of Calderon's plays, with English introductions and notes (1888).

McCosh, JAMES, a representative of the Scottish philosophy, was born at Carskeoch, Ayrshire, 1st April 1811. A minister of the Church of Scotland at Arbroath and at Brechin, he joined the Free Church, in 1851 was appointed professor of Logic at Belfast, and from 1868 to 1888 was president of Princeton, U.S.A. He died 16th November 1894. His Method of the Divine Government (1850; 9th ed. 1867) was followed by The Intuitions of the Mind (1860); and in these and in his Examination of Mr J. S. Mill's Philosophy (1866) he defended what he considers the unadulterated Natural Realism of Reid against both the empirical school and the relativistic views of Kant, Hamilton, and Mansel. He published The Scottish Philosophy (1875), Realistic Philosophy (1887), Psychology (1886), The Religious Aspect of Evolution (1888), First and Fundamental Truths (1889), and Our Moral Nature (1892).

McCrie, THOMAS, D.D. (1772-1835), Scottish historian and divine, born at Duns, studied at Edinburgh, and was ordained in 1795 pastor of an Anti-burgher congregation there. His works exhibit research, vast and minute, though they are essentially apologetic. He attacked Scott's account of the Covenanters in Old Mortality in the Edinburgh Christian Instructor. His best-known works are Life of Knox (1812), Life of Andrew Melville (1819), and History of the Reformation in Spain (1829). See Life (1840) by his son, Thomas McCrie, D.D., LL.D. (1798-1875), professor in the Presbyterian college at London, and himself author of Sketches of Scottish Church History (1841) and Annals of English Presbytery (1872).

McCulloch, HORATIO, Scottish landscape-painter, born in Glasgow in Nov. 1805, first exhibited in 1829, in 1836 was elected A.R.S.A., in 1838 R.S.A., and then removed to Edinburgh. He died 24th June 1867. He painted Highland landscapes with unrivalled truth, breadth, and imagination, among his pictures being 'Loch-an-Eilan,' 'Cadzow Forest,' 'Misty Corries,' 'Kilchurn Castle,' and 'Bothwell Castle.'

MacCulloch, JOHN, geologist, born in Guernsey, 6th October 1773, studied medicine at Edinburgh, and became an army surgeon. In 1811 he was employed in geological researches in Scotland; in 1820 became physician to Leopold of Saxe-Coburg (king of the Belgians); and was finally professor of Chemistry and Geology at Addiscombe. He died 21st August 1835. He wrote Description of the Western Islands of Scotland (1819), Geological Classification of Rocks (1821), System of Geology (1831), Malaria (1827), and Intermittent and Intermittent Diseases (1828).

McCulloch, JOHN RAMSAY, political economist, born at Whithorn, 1st March 1789, edited the Scotsman 1818-19, and for twenty years contributed almost all the economical articles to the Edinburgh Review. He lectured in London; in 1828 became professor of Political Economy in University College, and in 1838 Comptroller of H.M. Stationery Office; and died 11th November 1864. Among his works are Principles of Political Economy (1820), The Literature of Political Economy (1845), The Rate of Wages (1826), Dictionary of Commerce (1832; new ed. 1875-80), and Statistical Account of the British Empire (1837).

MacCunn, HAMISH, composer, born in Greenock, 22d March 1868, studied at the Royal College of Music, and in 1888-94 was professor of Harmony at the Royal Academy of Music. His works, largely Scottish in character and subject, include the overtures Cior Mhor (1887), Land of the Mountain and the Flood, and The Dowie Dens of Yarrow, choral works, such as The Lay of the Last Minstrel and The Cameronian's Dream, the operas Jennie Deans (1894) and Diarmid (1897; libretto by Marquis of Lorne), and songs.

Macdonald, ÉTIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH ALEXANDRE (1765-1840), marshal of France, was born at Sedan, the son of a Scottish Jacobite schoolmaster. He entered the army in 1785, distinguished himself in the cause of the Revolution, and rapidly rose to high rank. In 1798 he was made governor of Rome, and subjugated Naples. Suvoroff defeated him after a bloody contest on the Trebbia (1799). In 1805 he lost the favour of Bonaparte; but, restored to command in 1809, he took Laidach, distinguished himself at Wagram, and was created marshal and Duke of Taranto. He held a command in Spain in 1810, and in the Russian campaign; and in 1818 he contributed to the successes of Lützen and Bautzen, but was routed by Blücher at the Katzbach. After Leipzig he helped to cover the French retreat. The Bourbons made him a peer, and from 1816 he was Chancellor of the Legion of Honour. He died 25th Sept. 1840. See his Souvenirs (2d ed. 1892; Eng. trans. 1892).

Macdonald, FLORA, born in 1722 in South Uist, lost her father, a tacksman, at two; and at thirteen was adopted by Lady Clanranald, wife of the chief of the clan. To this Flora owed her gentle upbringing, her three years' schooling at Edinburgh. Shortly after her return to the Hebrides the rebellion of the '45 broke out; and in June 1746 she conducted Prince Charles Edward, disguised as 'Betty Burke,' from Benbecula to Portree. Flora was not a Jacobite; but those three short perilous days endeared her to more than Jacobites, and she was much feted during her twelvemonth's captivity on the troopship in Leith Roads and at London. In 1750 she married the son of Macdonald of Kingsburgh, where in 1773 she entertained Dr Johnson, who describes her as 'of middle stature, soft features, gentle manners, and elegant presence.' In 1774 her husband emigrated to North Carolina, and in 1776 in the war of independence became a brigadier-general. He was made prisoner; and Flora returned to Scotland in 1779. After two years she was rejoined by her husband, and they settled again at Kingsburgh. She died 5th March 1790. The Autobiography of Flora Macdonald (1869) is a silly forgery; but see works by Macgregor (1882) and Jolly (1886).

Macdonald, GEORGE, Scottish poet and novelist, born at Huntly in 1824, was educated at Aberdeen and the Congregationalist College at High-bury. He became pastor at Arundel and at Manchester, but ill-health drove him to literature. His first book, Within and Without (1856), a poem, was followed by Poems (1857), and Phantastes, a Faerie Romance (1858). A long series of novels followed, including David Elginbrod (1862), The Portent (1864), Alec Forbes (1865), Annals of a Quiet Neighbourhood (1866), Guild Court (1867), The Seaboard Parish (1868), Robert Falconer (1868), Wilfrid Cumbermeade (1871), Malcolm (1874), St George and St Michael (1875), The Marquis of Lossie (1877), Sir Gibbie (1879), What's Mine's Mine (1886), Lilith (1895), and Salted with Fire (1897). These novels reveal the deep spiritual instincts of their author in his reaction against Calvinism, as well as the nebulousness of his mental atmosphere. He has also published books for the young: Dealings with the Fairies (1867), Ronald Bannerman's Boyhood (1869), At the Back of the North Wind (1870), and The Princess and the Goblin (1871); besides Unspoken Sermons (1866-89), The Miracles of Our Lord (1870), and Poetical Works (1893). In 1872-73 he made a lecturing tour in the United States; in 1877 received a Civil List pension of £100; and died 18th September 1905.—His eldest son, GREVILLE MACDONALD, M.D. (born 1856), is a throat specialist.

Macdonald, SIR JOHN ALEXANDER, Canadian statesman, born in Glasgow, 11th January 1815, with his parents emigrated in 1820 to Kingston in Canada. He was called to the bar in 1836, and appointed Q.C. From 1844 he was conspicuous in the Canada Assembly and the Dominion parliament. Both before and after 1856, when he was leader of the Conservatives and premier, he was Attorney-general. In 1867 he formed the first government for the new Dominion, and was Minister of Justice and Attorney-general of Canada until 1873. He was again returned to power in 1878. He was mainly instrumental in bringing about the confederation of the British North American provinces, and in securing the construction of the Intercolonial and Pacific Railways; and he was a pioneer of imperial unity. A British Commissioner in the Alabama case (1871), he was made privy-councillor in 1872, K.C.B. in 1867, and G.C.B. in 1884; his widow was made a peeress. He died at Ottawa, 6th June 1891. See Lives by Collins (1892) and Pope (2 vols. 1894).

Macdonell, ALASTAIR RUADH (c. 1724-61), was a captain in the French Scots brigade, lay in the Tower of London 1745-47, succeeded his father in 1754 as thirteenth chief of Glengarry, and died with the character of 'one of the best men in the Highlands'; 135 years afterwards Mr Andrew Lang proved him to have been a vile Hanoverian spy on his fellow-Jacobites. See Pickle the Spy (1897) and Companions of Pickle (1899).

Macdougall, FRANCIS THOMAS (1817-86), born at Sydenham, was Bishop of Labuan 1855-68, and from 1870 Archdeacon of Huntingdon, from 1874 of the Isle of Wight. See Life (1889).

Macdowell, PATRICK, R.A. (1790-1870), sculptor, was born at Belfast, and died in London.

Macfarren, SIR GEORGE ALEXANDER, was born in London, March 2, 1813, the son of the playwright and manager, George Macfarren (1788-1843), and studied at the Royal Academy of Music 1829-36. In 1837 he became a professor there, and in 1875 principal, and professor of Music at Cambridge University. Late in life he became blind, and died 31st October 1887. He was knighted in 1883. His earliest dramatic work was The Devil's Opera (1838), followed by Don Quixote (1846), King Charles II. (1849), Robin Hood (1860), Jessy Lea (1863), and She Stoops to Conquer, The Soldier's Legacy, and Helvellyn (1864). His best cantatas were Lenore (1852), May-day (1856), Christmas (1860), and The Lady of the Lake (1877). His oratorios were John the Baptist (1873), The Resurrection (1876), Joseph (1877), and David (1883). He wrote Rudiments of Harmony (1860; 13th ed.

1885), Lectures on Harmony (1867), Counterpoint (1879), Musical History (1885), and Addresses and Lectures (1888); besides editing Old English Ditties (1857-80), Moore's Irish Melodies (1859), Scottish Ditties (1861-80), and the second edition of Day's Treatise (1886). See Life by Banister (1891).

M'Gill, JAMES (1744-1813), born in Glasgow, emigrated to Canada, and made a fortune in the North-west fur-trade and at Montreal. He sat in the local assembly and councils, gave £40,000 to the college in Montreal that bears his name, and was a noted philanthropist.

Macgregor, JOHN, canoeist and philanthropist, eldest son of General Sir Duncan MacGregor, was born at Gravesend, January 24, 1825, and a few weeks later was the first to be handed out of the burning Kent, East Indiaman. He was educated at various private schools, at Dublin, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his B.A. in 1847, and was called to the bar in 1851. He made a tour of Europe, Egypt, and Palestine (1849-50); and a visit to the United States and Canada bore fruit in Our Brothers and Cousins (1859). An account of a canoe voyage on the Rhine, Danube, Seine, &c. (1865) was described in A Thousand Miles in the Rob Roy Canoe (1866). Other narratives of canoe voyages on the Baltic, Zuider Zee, and Jordan followed. 'Rob Roy' was a member of the London School Board in 1870 and 1873; when chairman of the Industrial School Commission, he suggested the founding of the London Shoeblock Brigade; and he gave the profits of his books and lectures—some £10,000—to philanthropic institutions. He died 16th July 1892. See Life by Hodder (1894).

M'Gregor, ROBERT. See ROB ROY.

M'Gregor, ROBERT, subject-painter, born in Yorkshire, 6th July 1848, in 1882 was elected an A.R.S.A., in 1889 an R.S.A.

Macgregor, SIR WILLIAM, M.D., K.C.M.G. (1839), born in 1847, was governor of New Guinea, Lagos, Newfoundland, and Queensland.

M'Grigor, SIR JAMES (1771-1858), an army surgeon, knighted in 1814, was born at Cromdale, Inverness-shire, and died in London. See his unfinished Autobiography (1861).

Machabeus, JOHANNES, a Scottish reformer, one of the clan Macalpine, was Dominican prior at Perth 1532-34, fled then as a heretic to England, married, went on to Germany, and from 1542 was professor of Theology at Copenhagen till his death, 6th December 1557.

MacHale, JOHN (1791-1881), born at Tobbernavine, co. Mayo, studied and taught at Maynooth, was consecrated a bishop in 1825, and from 1834 was Archbishop of Tuam. See Life by O'Reilly (2 vols. New York, 1890).

Machiavelli, NICCOLO DI BERNARDO DEL, born at Florence, 3d May 1469, saw the troubles of the French invasion (1493), when the Medici fled, and in 1498 became secretary of the Ten, a post he held until the fall of the republic in 1512. He was employed in a great variety of missions, including one to Caesar Borgia in 1502, of which an account is preserved in fifty-two letters, one to the Emperor Maximilian, and four to France. His despatches during these journeys, and his treatises on the 'Affairs of France and Germany,' are full of a far-reaching insight. On the restoration of the Medici Machiavelli was involved in the downfall of his patron, the Gonfaloniere Soderini. Arrested on a charge of conspiracy in 1513, and put to the torture, he disclaimed all knowledge of the alleged conspiracy; but, although pardoned, he was obliged to withdraw from public life, and devoted himself to literature. It was not till 1519 that he was commissioned by Leo X. to draw up his report on a reform of the state of Florence; in 1521-25 he was employed in diplomatic services and as historiographer. After the defeat of the French at Pavia (1525), Italy lay helpless before the advancing forces of the Emperor Charles V., and Machiavelli strove to avert from Florence the invading army on its way to Rome. In May 1527 the Florentines again drove out the Medici and proclaimed the republic; but Machiavelli, bitterly disappointed that he was to be allowed no part in the movement for liberty, and already in feeble health, died on 20th June. Through misrepresentation and misunderstanding his writings were spoken of as almost diabolical, his most violent assailants being the clergy. The first great edition of his works was not issued until 1782. From that period his fame as the founder of political science has steadily increased. Besides his letters and state-papers, Machiavelli's historical writings comprise Florentine Histories, Discourses on the First Decade of Titus Livius, a Life of Castruccio Castracani (unfinished), and History of the Affairs of Luca. His literary works comprise an imitation of the Golden Ass of Apuleius, an essay on the Italian language, and several minor compositions. He also wrote Seven Books on the Art of War. But the great source of his reputation, for good or for evil, is De Principibus or Il Principe (Rome, 1532). The broad scheme of the book is, that for the establishment and maintenance of authority all means may be resorted to, and that the worst and most treacherous acts of the ruler are justified by the wickedness and treachery of the governed. In his ardour for the liberation of Italy, Machiavelli had become convinced that strong native governments, even though absolute, must be endured; and, having accepted that of the Medici for Florence, he was content to use all means for its security and consolidation. The Prince was condemned by Pope Clement VIII. The comedies of Machiavelli form an epoch in the history of the Italian theatre; La Mandragola, full of biting humour and shameless indecency, is a masterpiece of dramatic art. See Villari's Niccolò Machiavelli e i suoi tempi (1877-82; 2d. ed. 1895; trans. 1890), Tommasini's Vita e Scritti di Machiavelli (1883), Macaulay's essay, Ranke's study, John Morley's Romanes Lecture (1897), and L. Arthur Burd's edition of Il Principe (Oxf. 1891).

Macintosh, CHARLES (1766-1843), a Glasgow manufacturing chemist, patented (1823) and gave name to Syme's method of waterproofing.

M'Intyre, DUNCAN BAN (1724-1812), the Gaelic poet-gamekeeper of Beinn-dòrain, was born in Glenorchy, fought as a Hanoverian at Falkirk in 1746, and in 1799-1806 was one of the City Guard of Edinburgh.

Mack, KARL, FREIHERR VON (1752-1822), born at Nennslingen in Franconia, in 1770 entered the Austrian service, and, after fighting the Turks and the French republicans, was in 1797 created field-marshal. For the king of Naples he occupied Rome, but had to conclude an armistice with the French, and was driven to seek safety with them by riots in Naples. He was carried prisoner to Paris, but escaped in 1800. Having surrendered with his army to the French at Ulm in 1805, he was tried by court-martial and condemned to death, but the sentence was commuted to twenty years' imprisonment. In 1808 he was liberated, in 1819 fully pardoned.

Mackay, ALEXANDER (1849-90), pioneer missionary to Uganda 1878-87, was born at Rhyndie in Aberdeenshire, and bred for an engineer, but during a residence at Berlin in 1873 was led by the court-preacher Baur to turn to missionary work. See Life by his sister (1891). [Ma-kye'.]

Mackay, CHARLES, LL.D. (1814-89), songwriter, born at Perth, was assistant-editor of the Morning Chronicle 1835-44, editor of the Glasgow Argus 1844-47, of the Illustrated London News 1848-59, and New York correspondent of the Times during the civil war (1862-65). His London Review, a weekly journal (1860) was unsuccessful. Two of Mackay's songs, 'There's a Good Time Coming' and 'Cheer, Boys, Cheer,' had an extraordinary vogue. His prose works included Popular Delusions (1841), Gaelic Etymology (1878), Forty Years' Recollections (1877), and Through the Long Day (1887).—His son, ERIC (1851-98), published Love Letters of a Violinist (1886) and other verse. See CORELLI (MARIE).

Mackay, JOHN HENRY, German anarchist poet and novelist, was born at Greenock, 6th Feb. 1864.

Mackay, ROBERT (1714-78), the Reay country Gaelic poet 'Rob Donn' ('brown'), was a Sutherland herd. See Life by Ilew Morrison prefixed to his Poems (1898).

Mackenzie, SIR ALEXANDER (c. 1755-1820), Canadian fur-trader, born at Inverness, was knighted in 1802, having in 1789 discovered the Mackenzie River, and in 1792-93 crossed the Rockies to the Pacific. He died near Dunkeld.

Mackenzie, ALEXANDER (1822-92), Canadian statesman, born at Logierait, Perthshire, removed to Canada in 1842, and was a mason and contractor. In 1852 he became editor of a Reform paper, from 1867 led the opposition in the Dominion parliament, and in 1873-78 was premier. He thrice declined knighthood, and died at Toronto.

Mackenzie, SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, composer, born in Edinburgh, 22d August 1847, studied music at Sondershausen, and from 1862 at the Royal Academy, London. In 1865-79 he was teacher, violinist, and conductor in Edinburgh. Afterwards in Italy, he gave himself mainly to composition. In 1886 he had the degree of Mus. Doc. from St Andrews, and in 1887 became Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. His opera Colomba (1883) made him well known; The Troubadour (1886) had not the same success; and the comic opera, His Majesty (1897), was a failure. The Rose of Sharon (1884), an oratorio, contains some of his best work; The Lord of Life was produced in 1891 at Birmingham, and Bethlehem at the Chicago Exhibition in 1894. He has written cantatas; Scotch rhapsodies and other orchestral works; a concerto and a piobrach for violin; chamber music, songs, piano-forte and organ pieces, &c. He was knighted in 1895.

Mackenzie, CHARLES FREDERIC (1825-62), born at Portmore, Peeblesshire, graduated in 1848 as second wrangler from Caius College, Cambridge. He went out with Colenso to Natal in 1855, and in 1861 was consecrated Bishop of Central Africa. See Life by Bishop Harvey Goodwin (2d ed. 1865).—His brother, WILLIAM FORBES MACKENZIE, M.P. (1807-62), is remembered solely by his Scottish public-house act of 1853.

Mackenzie, SIR GEORGE, born at Dundee in 1636, studied at St Andrews, Aberdeen, and Bourges; in 1656 was called to the bar at Edinburgh; and in 1661 defended the Marquis of Argyll. He was knighted, entered parliament for Ross-shire in 1669, and in 1677 was named king's advocate. His career up to this point had been patriotic; unhappily in the popular mind he lives as 'Bluidy Mackenzie,' the criminal prosecutor in the days of the persecution. He cultivated literature, was one of the first Scots to write English with purity, and in 1682 founded the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh. He retired at the Revolution to Oxford, and dying in London, 8th May 1691, was buried at Edinburgh in Greyfriars Churchyard. His works, collected by Riddiman (1716-22), include Religio Stoici, Essay upon Solitude, Moral Gallantry, Vindication of the Government of Charles II., treatises on the law of Scotland, and Jus Regium. See his Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, edited by T. Thomson (1821); and Andrew Lang's Sir George Mackenzie (1909).

Mackenzie, GEORGE HENRY (1837-91), chess-player, born at Aberdeen, died in New York.

Mackenzie, HENRY, the 'Man of Feeling,' born in Edinburgh, 26th August 1745, studied there and in London, became crown attorney in the Scottish Court of Exchequer, and in 1804 comptroller of taxes. For upwards of half a century he was 'one of the most illustrious names connected with polite literature in Edinburgh,' where he died 14th January 1831. His Man of Feeling was published in 1771; The Man of the World followed in 1773, and Julia de Roubigné in 1777. The first (reprinted by Morley in 1886), which alone is not forgotten, is perhaps the most namby-pamby effusion that ever 'attained classical celebrity.' His other writings include some Tory pamphlets, Lives of Blacklock and Home, ninety-nine papers in the Mirror and Lounger, and four very weak plays. He deserves remembrance for his recognition of Burns, and as an early admirer of Lessing and of Schiller.

Mackenzie, SIR MORELL (1837-92), a throat specialist, made a knight-bachelor in 1887 for his services to the Emperor Frederick III. (q.v.), was born at Leytonstone and died in London. See Life by Rev. H. R. Haweis (1893).

Mackenzie, WILLIAM LYON (1795-1861), born in Dundee, emigrated to Canada in 1820, and in 1824 established the Colonial Advocate. In 1828 he was elected to the provincial parliament for York, but was expelled in 1830 for libel on the Assembly. In 1837 he published in his paper a declaration of independence, headed a band of insurgents, and after a skirmish with a superior force, for a time maintained a camp on an island. Having fled to New York, he was sentenced by the U.S. authorities to twelve months' imprisonment. He returned to Canada in 1849, was a member of parliament 1850-53, and died at Toronto. See Life (1862).

McKinley, WILLIAM, twenty-fourth president of the United States, was born 29th Jan. 1843 at Niles in Ohio, and served in the Civil War, retiring in 1867 as major to Canton, where he practised law. He was elected to congress in 1877, and repeatedly re-elected. In 1891 he was made governor of Ohio, his name being identified with the high protective tariff carried in the McKinley Bill of 1890, though subsequently modified by the Democrats in 1894. Chosen Republican candidate for the presidency in 1896, he conducted an exciting contest with W. J. Bryan, who advocated the cause of free silver and the repression of monopolies, and was understood to favour labour at the expense of capital. A large section of the Democrats, 'Gold Democrats' or 'Sound Money Democrats,' in spite of their dislike to McKinley's policy on many points, strongly supported him; and he secured (Nov. 1896) a large majority in the electoral college, as the representative of a gold standard and of capital. In his presidency took place the war with Spain (1898), with the conquest of Cuba and the Philippines. He was shot by an anarchist 14th September 1901.

Mackintosh, SIR JAMES, born at Aldourie on Loch Ness, October 24, 1765, studied at King's College, Aberdeen, obtained a medical diploma at Edinburgh, but settled in London as a journalist. His Vindicie Gallicæ (1791) was written in reply to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution; and he became secretary of the 'Friends of the People.' He was called to the bar in 1795. In 1799 he delivered a brilliant series of lectures on the law of nature and of nations at Lincoln's Inn; and his defence of Peltier (1803), charged with a libel on Bonaparte, was a splendid triumph. In 1804 he was knighted, and appointed recorder of Bombay, and in 1806 judge of its Admiralty Court; at Bombay he spent seven years, entering parliament after his return as Whig member for Nairn (1813). He was professor of Law in Haileybury College 1818-24, in 1830 became a member of the Board of Control under the Grey ministry, and spoke in favour of the Reform Bill. He died 22d May 1832. His Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy (1831), written for the Encyclopædia Britannica, is admirable, though incomplete. For Lardner's Cyclopædia he wrote a brief History of England. A fragment of a History of the Revolution in 1688 appeared after his death. See the Memoirs by his son (1835), and the essays of Macaulay and De Quincy.

Mackintosh, WILLIAM (1662-1743), of Borlum, Inverness-shire, was 'out' in 1715 and 1719, and the first time escaped from Newgate, but died after long captivity in Edinburgh Castle. He was an early arboriculturist.

Macklin, CHARLES, actor, born in the North of Ireland about 1697, the son of William M'Laughlin, after a wild, unsettled youth, played in Bristol and Bath, and in 1733 was engaged at Drury Lane. He steadily rose in public favour, till in 1741 he appeared in his great character, Shylock. From this time he was accounted one of the best actors whether in tragedy or comedy, in passion or buffoonery. His last performance was at Covent Garden in 1789; but he survived, with an annuity of £200, till 11th July 1797. He was generous, high-spirited, but irascible: in 1735 he killed a brother-actor in a quarrel over a wig, and was tried for murder. He wrote a tragedy and several farces and comedies; of these Love à-la-Mode (1759) and The Man of the World (1781) were printed. See Lives by Congreve (1798) and Parry (1891).

Macknight, JAMES, D.D. (1721-1800), born at Irvine, and from 1772 a minister in Edinburgh, published Harmony of the Four Gospels (1756), Truth of the Gospel History (1763), &c. (1795).

Mackonochie, ALEXANDER HERIOT, born at Fareham, Hants, 11th August 1825, the son of a Scotch East Indian colonel, studied at Edinburgh, and in 1845 entered Wadham College, Oxford. In 1848 he took a second-class in classics, in 1849 was ordained, and in 1862 became the first vicar of St Alban's, Holborn—the small but crowded slum where he did a great work. His prosecution by the Church Association for ritualistic practices commenced in 1867; and in 1882, in accordance with the dying wish of Archbishop Tait, he sought to withdraw from further conflict by resignation. He accepted the charge of St Peter's, London Docks; that, too, he had to resign. His health broke down; and on 15th December 1887, during a visit to the Bishop of Argyll at Ballachulish, he lost his way in the Mainore deer-forest, and was found two days later lying dead in the snow, a deer-hound and a Skye terrier guarding him. See Life by Mrs Towle (1890).

MacLagan, WILLIAM DALRYMPLE, D.D. (1826-1910), born at Edinburgh, left the army as a lieutenant in 1852, studied at St Peter's College, Cambridge, took orders (1856), and became Bishop of Lichfield in 1878, Archbishop of York in 1891.—His brother, SIR DOUGLAS MACLAGAN (1812-1900), an Edinburgh medical professor 1862-96, was made a knight-bachelor in 1886.

McLaren, DUNCAN (1800-86), Edinburgh draper and Radical M.P. 1865-81, was born at Renton. See Life by J. B. Mackie (2 vols. 1888).

MacLaren, IAN (1850-1907), the pen-name of the Rev. John Watson, D.D., a Liverpool Presbyterian minister, born of Scotch parentage at Manningtree in Essex, who made an amazing success with his Beside the Bonnie Erier Bush (1894), Days of Auld Langsyne (1895), Kate Carnegie (1896), The Mind of the Master (1896), &c. In 1896 he lectured with great acceptance in America.

MacLaurin, COLIN (1698-1746), mathematician, born at Kilmodan, Argyllshire, graduated at Glasgow in 1713, and in 1717 became professor of Mathematics at Aberdeen, in 1725 at Edinburgh. In 1719 he was made F.R.S., and published Geometria Organica. His Treatise on Fluxions (1742) was of great importance. The Treatise on Algebra (1748) was left incomplete, as was also Newton's Philosophical Discoveries (1748).

Macleshoe, AGNES (1759-1841), Burns's 'Clairinda' 1787-91, married a Glasgow lawyer 1776, left him 1780, visited him in Jamaica (1792), then lived in Edinburgh. See book by J. D. Ross (1897).

McLennan, JOHN FERGUSON, born at Inverness, 14th October 1827, graduated at Aberdeen in 1849, then proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, and joined the Scottish bar in 1857. In his Primitive Marriage (1865); reprinted in Studies in Ancient History, 1876) he emphasises the importance of matriarchy among savage peoples; and he wrote papers in the Fortnightly (1869-70) on totemism. He defended his views against Sir Henry Maine in The Patriarchal Theory, finished by his brother Donald in 1884; wrote a Life of Thomas Drummond (1867); was draftsman of parliamentary bills for Scotland; and died 16th June 1881. A second series of Studies in Ancient History appeared in 1896.

Macleod, FIONA. See SHARP (WILLIAM).

Macleod, NORMAN, was born, a minister's son, at Campbeltown, Argyllshire, June 3, 1812. He attended Glasgow University, and was minister of London 1838-43, Dalkeith 1843-45, and the Barony Church, Glasgow, from 1851 till his death, June 16, 1872. He was made a Queen's Chaplain in 1857, and D.D. in 1858. An utterance of his on the Sabbath question in 1865 created much controversy. In 1869 he was moderator of the General Assembly. He visited Canada in 1845, Palestine in 1864-65, and India in 1867. From 1860 till 1872 he edited Good Words, contributing tales, essays, verses, sermons. In book-form he published The Earnest Student (1854), Daily Meditations (1861), The Old Lieutenant (1862), Parish Papers (1862), Wee Davie (1864), Eastward (1866), Reminiscences of a Highland Parish (his grandfather's parish of Morven, 1867), The Stirling (1867), and Peeps at the Far East (1871). See Memoir by the Rev. Donald Macleod (1870).

Maclise, DANIEL, painter, son of a Highland soldier named McLeish, was born at Cork in January 1806, entered the school of the Royal Academy, London, in 1828, and in 1833 made himself famous by his 'All-Hallow Eve.' Many of his pictures are familiar by engraving—'The Banquet Scene in Macbeth,' 'Play Scene in Hamlet' (1842), 'Shakespeare's Seven Ages' (1848), 'The Gross of Green Spectacles' (1850), 'Caxton's Printing-office' (1851), and his great frescoes in the Royal Gallery of the House of Lords, 'The Meeting of Wellington and Blücher' (1861) and 'The Death of Nelson' (1864). He died at Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, 1st April 1870. His sketches of contemporaries in Fraser's Magazine (1830-38) were republished in 1874 and 1883. See the Memoir by O'Driscoll (1871).

Macmahon, MARIE EDMÉ PATRICE MAURICE DE, descended from an Irish Jacobite family, was born at Sully near Autun, 13th June, 1808. Entering the army, he served in Algeria, and distinguished himself at Constantine (1837), commanded at the Malakoff (1855), was again conspicuous in Algeria (1857-58), and for his services in the Italian campaign (1859) was made marshal and Duke of Magenta. He became governor-general of Algeria in 1864. In the Franco-German war (1870-71) he commanded the first army corps, but was defeated at Wörth, and captured at Sedan. After the war, as commander of the army of Versailles, he suppressed the Commune. In 1873 he was elected president of the Republic for seven years, and was suspected, not unjustly, of reactionary and monarchical leanings. He resigned in 1879, and died at Château la Forêt, 17th October 1893. See Lives by Grandin (1893) and Montbrillant (1894).

MacMaster, JOHN BACH, born at Brooklyn, 29th June 1852, studied civil engineering, but in 1883 became professor of American History in Pennsylvania University. He has written a History of the People of the U.S. (1883-85), Franklin as a Man of Letters (1887), and other works.

Macmillan, DANIEL (1813-57), publisher, born at Upper Corrie in Arran, served as a bookseller at Irvine, Glasgow, Cambridge (1833-37), and London (1837-43). He and his brother Alexander opened a small shop in Aldersgate Street in 1843, and the same year established themselves in Cambridge. Their business rapidly extended, and they became prosperous publishers, their first important works being those of Kingsley and Maurice. Under Alexander (1818-96) the business was removed to London (1863). Macmillan's Magazine began in 1859. See Memoir by Hughes (1882), bibliographical catalogue (1891), and Graves's Life of Alexander Macmillan (1910).

Macmillan, JOHN (1670-1753), founder of the Reformed Presbyterians, was born at Minnigaff, Kirkcudbrightshire, and died at Bothwell.

Macnee, SIR DANIEL (1806-82), portrait-painter, born at Fintry, Stirlingshire, became P.R.S.A. in 1876, and next year was knighted.

McNelle, HUGH (1795-1879), Evangelical divine, Dean of Ripon 1868-75, was born at Ballycastle, co. Antrim, and died at Bournemouth.

McNeill, SIR JOHN (1795-1883), Central Asiatic diplomatist, born in Colonsay, died at Cannes.—His brother, DUNCAN (1793-1874), a Scottish judge, born in Oronsay, was created Lord Colonsay and Oronsay in 1867. He died at Pau.

Macpherson, JAMES, a half-Highland, half-Gypsy freebooter, was hanged at Banff, 16th November 1700, having just before played, it is said, 'Macpherson's Rant' on his violin.

Macpherson, JAMES, 'translator' of the Ossianic poems, was born 27th October 1736 at Ruthven in Inverness-shire, where, after studying at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, he became a schoolmaster. He published a poem, the Highlander (1758), and at Moffat in 1759 showed 'Jupiter' Carlyle and John Home some fragments of Gaelic verse, with 'translations,' published in 1760. The Faculty of Advocates now sent Macpherson on a tour through the Highlands to collect more; but his unsatisfactory statements about his originals excited grave suspicions. The result of his labours was the appearance at London, in 1762, of Fingal, an Epic Poem, in Six Books, and, in 1763, Temora, an Epic Poem, in Eight Books. A storm of controversy soon arose in regard to their genuineness, which is hardly yet subsided, although the general verdict is that though Macpherson probably had before him some really ancient Gaelic fragments, the poems of Ossian as he published them are largely his own invention. Macpherson was appointed in 1764 surveyor-general of the Floridas, and in 1779 agent to the Nabob of Arcot, sat in parliament for Camelford 1780-90, and then retired to his Inverness-shire estate of Bellville, where he died Feb. 17, 1796. He was buried at his own cost in Westminster Abbey. He wrote a wretched prose translation of the Iliad, pamphlets, &c. See Lives by Bailey Saunders (1894) and J. S. Smart (1905), and Sharp's edition of Ossian (1897).

Macquarie, LACHLAN, a major-general of old Mull ancestry, who served in the East Indies and Egypt, and was governor of New South Wales 1809-21. He died in London, 1st July 1824.

Macqueen, ROBERT. See BRAXFIELD.

Macquoid, KATHARINE SARAH, author since 1862 of numerous works of fiction and travel, was born in Kentish Town, 26th Jan. 1824, and in 1851 married the black and white artist, Thomas Robert Macquoid (born at Chelsea, 24th Jan. 1820).

Macready, WILLIAM CHARLES, actor, son of W. McCready, actor and provincial manager, was born in London, 3d March 1793, and sent to Rugby. He was intended for the bar, but his father failing, he made his debut at Birmingham in 1810 as Romeo; in 1816 he appeared at Covent Garden. He was long unfortunate in being cast for unsympathetic parts, one of the few exceptions Rob Roy, in which he made a great hit; but it was not till 1837 that he took his position as leading English actor. In 1837 he inaugurated his famous Covent Garden management, during which he produced Shakespeare worthily. After two seasons he took Drury Lane (1841-43), then played in the provinces, Paris, and America. His last visit to the States was marked by terrible riots (10th May 1849) arising out of the ill-feeling borne by the American actor Forrest to Macready. In 1851 Macready took his farewell of the stage, at Drury Lane. He died at Cheltenham, 27th April 1873. See his Reminiscences and Diaries (1875), Lady Pollock's Macready as I knew Him (2d ed. 1885), and memoirs by Archer (1890) and Price (1895).

MacRitchie, DAVID, born at Edinburgh, 16th April 1851, became a chartered accountant, but devoted himself to ethnology and antiquarian folklore, publishing Ancient and Modern Britons (1884); Gypsies of India (1886); Testimony of Tradition (1890); Fians, Fuiries, and Piets (1893); Scottish Gypsies under the Stewarts (1894), &c.

Macrobius, AMBROSIIUS THEODOSIUS, a 5th-century Latin grammarian who wrote a commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, and Saturnalium Conviviorum Libri Septem, a series of historical, mythological, and critical dialogues.

MacWhirter, JOHN (1839-1911), artist, born at Slaford near Edinburgh, was apprenticed to a bookseller, but ran away and turned artist. In 1864 he was elected A.R.S.A., in 1879 A.R.A., and in 1893 R.A. He excels in Highland scenery, but one of his noted works is a view of Constantinople and the Golden Horn (1889).

Madden, SIR FREDERICK (1801-73), antiquary, born at Portsmouth, and knighted in 1832, was keeper of MSS. in the British Museum 1837-66. He wrote in Archæologia, and edited Havelok the Dane (1833), William and the Werwolf (1832), the early English versions of the Gesta Romanorum (1838), The Wycliffite Version of the Bible (1850), Layamon's Brut (1847), and Matthew Paris (1858).

Madden, RICHARD ROBERT (1798-1886), an Irish doctor who travelled much, and wrote much. See Memoirs by his son (1891).

Madison, JAMES, fourth president of the United States, born at Port Conway, Va., March 16, 1751, in 1776 was a member of the Virginia Convention, in 1780 of the Continental congress, and in 1784 of the legislature of Virginia. In the Convention of 1787, which framed the Federal constitution, he acted with Jay and Hamilton, and with them wrote the Federalist. He was the chief author of the 'Virginia plan,' and suggested the compromise by which, for taxation, representation, &c., slaves were regarded as population and not chattels, five being reckoned as three persons, and which secured the adoption of the constitution by South Carolina and the other slave-holding states. Madison was elected to the first national congress, now showed himself anxious to limit the powers of the central government, and became a leader of the Republican or Jeffersonian party. In 1801, Jefferson having been elected president, Madison was made secretary of state. In 1809 he was elected president. The European wars of that period, with their blockades and orders in council, were destructive of American commerce, and brought on a war with England (1812). In 1817, at the close of his second term, Madison retired. He died at Montpelier, Va., June 28, 1836. See Lives by Rives (1859-68) and Gay (1884).

Madoc, a Welsh prince, long believed by his countrymen to have discovered America before Columbus. He was fabled to have sailed westward in 1170 with a small fleet, and reached a country whose productions and inhabitants were unlike those of Europe. Here he lived for a long time; then, returning to Wales, equipped another fleet, set sail again, and was never heard of more. The story is in Lloyd and Powell's Cambria (1584), and in Southey's poem; the essay by Thomas Stephens written in 1858 for the Eisteddfod, and published in 1893, proves it to be baseless.

Mädler, JOHANN HEINRICH VON (1794-1874), astronomer, born at Berlin, died at Hanover.

Madvig, JOHAN NICOLAI (1804-86), Danish classical scholar, in 1829 became professor of Latin at Copenhagen, in 1848 inspector of higher schools. He was one of the chief speakers of the national Liberal party, was minister of religion and education 1848-51, and was repeatedly president of the Danish parliament. Among his works were Opuscula Academica (1834-42), Adversaria Critica (1871-84), the great Latin Grammar (1841), Greek Syntax (1846), Constitution of the Roman State (1881-82), and an Autobiography (1887).

Mæcenas, C. CILNIUS, a Roman statesman and trusted counsellor of Augustus, whose name has become a synonym for a patron of letters. He was immensely rich, and kept open table for men of parts at his house on the Esquiline; Horace he loved best of all. He died 8 B.C. [Mæcæ-nas.]

Maerlant, JAKOB VAN (c. 1235-95), Dutch poet.

Maeterlinck, MAURICE, the 'Belgian Shakespeare,' was born at Ghent in 1864, and became known to the world of Paris in 1890 by a marionette-like play, La Princesse Maleine, to which have succeeded L'Intruse, Les Aveugles, Les Sept Princesses, Pelléas et Mélisande, Aglavaine et Sélysette, and Monna Vanna (all Englished); a Flemish rendering of Ruysbroeck, Le Trésor des Humbles, The Life of the Bee (trans. 1901), The Blue Bird (1909). [Maht'er-link.]

Maffei, FRANCESCO SCIPIONE, MARCHESE DI (1675-1755), born at Verona, served 1703-4 under his brother Alessandro, a field-marshal. His tragedy Merope (1714) ran through seventy editions; the comedy Le Ceremonie (1728) was also successful; and Verona Illustrata (1731-32) was an important work. He visited France, England, Holland, and Germany. [Maf-fay'ee.]

Magee, WILLIAM CONNOR, D.D., born at Cork, 17th December 1821, at thirteen entered Trinity College, Dublin, took orders in 1844, laboured at Bath, in London, and at Enniskillen, and became Dean of Cork in 1864, Dean of the Chapel Royal, Dublin, in 1866, Bishop of Peterborough in 1868, and Archbishop of York in March 1891, but died on the following 5th May. He was a brilliant orator. See Life by Canon MacDonnell (2 vols. 1896).

Magellan, FERDINAND (Portuguese Magalhães or Magalhães), navigator, born about 1470 at Villa de Sabrosa in Tras os Montes, served in the East Indies, and was lamed for life in action in Morocco. Offering his services to Spain, he laid before Charles V. a scheme for reaching the Moluccas by the west, and sailed from Seville, 10th August 1519, with five ships of from 130 to 60 tons. Having coasted Patagonia, he threaded the strait which bears his name (21st October-28th November 1520), and reached the ocean which he named the Pacific. He fell in an expedition in the Philippine Isles (27th April 1521); but his ship, brought safely to Spain, 6th September 1522, completed the first circumnavigation of the world. See Lord Stanley's First Voyage round the World by Magellan (1874), and Guillemard's Magellan and the Pacific (1890).

Magendie, FRANÇOIS (1783-1855), French physiologist and physician, was born at Bordeaux, became prosecutor in anatomy (1804), physician to the Hôtel-Dieu in Paris, and professor of Anatomy in the Collège de France (1831). He made important additions to our knowledge of nerve-physiology, the veins, and the physiology of food, and wrote numerous works, including the Elements of Physiology. In his Journal de la Physiologie Expérimentale are recorded the experiments on living animals which gained for him the character of an unscrupulous vivisector. [Ma-zhon'dee.]

Maginn, WILLIAM, born at Cork, 10th July 1793, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, at twenty-three took his LL.D., taught in Cork for ten years, and in 1823 removed to London. One of his first contributions to Blackwood's Magazine—a doggerel Latin translation of Chevy Chase—appeared in 1819. In 1828 he joined the staff of the Standard, and he was one of the originators of Fraser's Magazine in 1830. He wrote his Shakespeare Papers for Blackwood in 1837, and in 1840 began his Magazine Miscellanies. His life was irregular, and he was often in jail for debt. He died 21st August 1842. His Whitehall, or the Days of George IV. (1827), is a parody on the historical novel; John Manesty (1844) was completed after his death by Charles Ollier. His Homeric Ballads were published in 1849. A collection of his papers was edited by R. S. Mackenzie (New York, 1855-57), and his Miscellanies by Montagu (1885). [g Hard.]

Magliabechi, ANTONIO (1633-1714), bibliophile, born at Florence, was till his fortieth year a goldsmith, but gradually entombed himself among books. His learning and his memory were prodigious and precise. In 1673 he was appointed court-librarian by the Grand-duke of Tuscany; his vanity and intolerance involved him in bitter literary squabbles. His library of 30,000 vols. he bequeathed to the Grand-duke; it is now a free library, and bears its collector's name. See Hill Burton's Book-Hunter (1862). [Mal-ya-beh'okee.]

Magnus, St., a Scandinavian Earl of Orkney, assassinated 1114 in Eglishay by his cousin Haco.

Magnus, or MAGNI, OLAUS (1400-1558), Swedish historian, became secretary to his brother Johannes, Archbishop of Upsala. After the Reformation they settled in Rome. On Johannes' death Olaus became titular archbishop. Both wrote on Swedish history; Olaus' famous work is his Historia de Gentibus Septentrionalibus (1555).

Mahaffy, JOHN PENTLAND, D.D., writer on Greek life, was born near Vevay, Switzerland, 26th February 1839, and in 1871-1900 was professor of Ancient History at Trinity College, Dublin.

Mahan, ALFRED THAYER, born at Westpoint, N.Y., 27th Sept. 1840, was in the U.S. navy (1854-96), and in 1906 was given the rank of rear-admiral retired. He has written Influence of Sea Power upon History, 1660-1812 (3 vols. 1890-92), Lives of Farragut (1892) and Nelson (1897), The Interest of America in Sea Power (1898), &c. [Mahn.]

Mahdi. See MOHAMMED ALI.

Mahmud II. (1785-1839) was Sultan of Turkey from 1808. During his reign the country between the Dniester and the Pruth was ceded to Russia (1812). Greece, after an eight years' struggle (1820-28), established its independence. Russia, after a disastrous war (1827-28), was only prevented from seizing Constantinople by the powers. Yet Mahmud made reforms which checked the decline of the Empire. He shattered the power of the janissaries by a massacre in 1826. Mehemet Ali of Egypt, practically independent, in 1833 thrice defeated the Sultan's troops.

Mahmud of Ghazni (971-1030), sovereign from 997 of Khorasan and Ghazni, repeatedly invaded India, and carried his conquering arms to Kurdistan on the west, to Samarkand on the north.

Mahon, LORD. See STANHOPE.

Mahony, FRANCIS, 'Father Prout,' born at Cork in 1804, and bred a Jesuit in Paris, took priest's orders at Rome in 1832, and became chaplain to a Cork hospital. He settled in London, ceased to exercise the clerical calling, and in 1834 joined the staff of Fraser's Magazine, his contributions to which were republished as Reliques of Father Prout in 1836. He contributed also to Bentley's from 1837. For two years he was Roman correspondent to the Daily News (then edited by Dickens), and his letters were reprinted in 1847 as Facts and Figures from Italy, by Don Jeremy Savonarola, Benedictine Monk. During the last years of his life he lived in Paris, and was correspondent to the Globe. He died May 18, 1866. Mahony possessed great scholarship and a rich fund of genial humour. He made brilliant translations into Greek, Latin, French, and English; his best-known original poems are 'The Bells of Shandon' and 'The Lady of Lee.' A volume of Final Reliques was published in 1876 by Blanchard Jerrold; and an edition of his works, with Memoir, in 1881 by Charles Kent.

Mai, ANOEL, CARDINAL (1782-1854), born at Schilpario in Lombardy, was bred a Jesuit, but became a secular priest at Milan, and keeper of the Ambrosian Library, where he discovered and edited MSS. or fragments of several long-lost works. Transferred to the Vatican, he from the unedited MSS. there edited a series of publications almost unexampled in extent and importance in modern times—Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio (1825-38), Classicum Auctorum Collectio (1828-38), Spicilegium Romanum (1839-44), and Patrum Nova Bibliotheca (1845-53). He left an edition of the Codex Vaticanus unfinished at his death. See Life by Prina (1882). [Mah'-ee.]

Maidment, JAMES (1794-1879), born in London, was called to the Scottish bar in 1817, and became a great authority on genealogical law cases. His most ambitious work was The Dramatists of the Restoration (14 vols. 1872-75), edited with W. H. Logan. Besides some historical and genealogical works, and an account of the Bannatyne Club, he edited A North Countrie Garland (1824), Scottish Pasquils (1827-28), New Book of Old Ballads (1844), Scottish Ballads and Songs (1859-68), and A Packet of Pestilent Pasquils (1869). See bibliography by T. G. Stevenson (1883).

Maimbourg, LOUIS (1610-86), Jesuit church-historian, born at Nancy, was expelled in 1685 from the order for his defence of Gallicanism, but became a pensioner of Louis XIV. He wrote histories of Wyclifism, Lutheranism, Calvinism, and the prerogatives of the Church of Rome.

Maimon, SOLOMON (c. 1754-1800), philosopher, born of Jewish parents in Lithuania, qualified for a rabbi, but at Berlin studied philosophy, languages, and science, and led the life of a hack-writer. Yet this ragged philosopher was highly thought of by Moses Mendelssohn, Kant, and Goethe, and made an ingenious attempt to supplement Kant in his eclectic Versuch einer Transcendentalphilosophie (1790). See his Autobiography (1792; trans. 1888), Wolff's Maimoniana (1813), Life by Witte (1876), and Arvède Barine's Bourgeois et Gens du Peu (1894). [Mi'mon.]

Maimonides, otherwise the Rabbi Moses ben Maimon, was born of Jewish parentage at Cordova, 30th March 1135, and studied the Aristotelian philosophy and Greek medicine under the best Arab teachers. His family had to conform to Mohammedanism, and migrated to Egypt, where he became physician to Saladin, and died at Cairo, 13th December 1204. He has been reckoned next to Moses himself for his influence on Jewish thought. Among his works are a commentary on the Mishna, and the Book of the Precepts, written first in Arabic; and the Mishne Torah or 'Second Law' (in Hebrew); and his greatest achievement, the work (first written in Arabic) known in its Hebrew translation as Moreh Nebokhim, which, in Latin as Doctor Perplexorum, came into use in European universities. The traditionalists were at first startled by the new light and spirituality of Maimonides, but soon the Jewish people came to regard him as the glory of their race. See The Guide of the

Perplexed, translated and annotated by Friedländer (3 vols. 1885). [Mi-mon'-i-deez.]

Maine, SIR HENRY JAMES SUMNER, born 15th August 1822, from Christ's Hospital passed in 1840 to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he won the Craven, and graduated in 1844 as senior classic and Chancellor's medallist. In 1845 he became a tutor of Trinity Hall, in 1847 regius professor of Civil Law, and in 1852 Reader on Jurisprudence to the Inns of Court. He was called to the bar in 1850, and went to India in 1862 as Legal Member of Council. In 1869 he was appointed professor of Comparative Jurisprudence at Oxford, and in 1871 to the Council of the Secretary of State for India, when he was created K.C.S.I. In 1877 he was elected Master of Trinity Hall at Cambridge, and in 1887 Whewell professor of International Law. He died at Cannes, February 3, 1888. It is by his work on the origin and growth of legal and social institutions that Maine will be best remembered. His books were Ancient Law (1861), Village Communities in the East and West (1871), The Early History of Institutions (1875), Early Law and Custom (1883), Popular Government (1885), and International Law (1888). A fundamental idea of Maine's was to make patriarchal power the germ of society. See Memoir by Sir M. E. Grant Duff (1892).

Maintenon, FRANÇOISE D'AUBIGNÉ, MARQUISE DE, daughter of the worthless Constant d'Aubigné, son of the Huguenot, Théodore Agrippa d'Aubigné (q.v.), was born in the citadel of Bordeaux, November 27, 1635. At four years old she was carried to Martinique, whence she returned to France after her father's death (1645), and became a Catholic; her mother's death left her at fifteen in penury. She married the crippled poet Scarron (1652), and on his death (1660) again was reduced to poverty; but her husband's pension was continued to her. In 1669 she was given the charge of the king's two sons by Madame de Montespan, and she displayed a sleepless care that no mother could have surpassed. By 1674 the king's presents enabled her to purchase the estate of Maintenon, and in 1678 she had it made a marquise. She had firmly established her ascendancy over Louis, who, after the queen's death (1683), married her privately in 1685. Her morals were severe, for her heart was cold. Her political influence was supreme in all but important questions of policy; she was a liberal patroness of letters; but, often unhappy, turned for solace to the home for poor girls of good family she had established at St. Cyr. Hither she retired when the king died (1715); and here she died, April 15, 1719. Her pretended Mémoires (1755) are spurious, but her delightful Lettres (1756; ed. Lavallée, 1856; ed. Geffroy, 1887) are genuine. See books by Mme. Suard (1810), Lafont d'Aussonne (1814), the Duc de Noailles (1848-58), Lavallée (2d ed. 1876), Geffroy (1887), Dyson (1909), and Lady Blennerhasset (1910); Ste-Beuve's Causeries du Lundi; studies by Cotter Morison (1885) and E. Bowles (1888); and Döllinger's Studies in European History (trans. 1890).

Mair, JOHN. See MAJOR.

Maistre, JOSEPH MARIE, COMTE DE (1754-1821), born at Chambéry, on the occupation of Savoy in 1792 by the French, accompanied the king of Sardinia to Sardinia; in 1803-17 he was ambassador to St. Petersburg. De Maistre maintained the pope as the source and centre of all earthly authority, and an ordered theocracy as the only protection from social and religious anarchy. His works include Considérations sur la France

(1796), Du Pape (1821), De l'Église Gallicane (1821-22), Soirées de St Petersburg (1822), Examen de la Philosophie de Bacon (1836), and Lettres et Opuscules (1851). See Life by Glaser (1865), Margerie (1886), Lescure (1893), Pailhan (1893), Descotes (1893-95), and Cogordan (1894), Sainte-Beuve's Portraits Cont. (vol. iii.), and John Morley's Critical Miscellanies.—His brother, XAVIER DE MAISTRE, born in October 1763, entered the Sardinian army, followed Suvoroff in 1800 to Russia, where he served with distinction, became a general, and married a Russian lady. He died 12th June 1852. His name is remembered for a few delightfully fresh and simple books—Voyage autour de ma Chambre (1794), Le Lépreux de la Cité d'Aoste, Les Prisonniers du Caucase, and La jeune Sibérienne. His Œuvres appeared at Paris in 1825 (new ed. 1880). See works by Rey (1865), Ungewitter (1892), Cogordan (1894), and Maistre and Perrin (1895).

Maitland, a Scottish family which attained distinction in SIR RICHARD MAITLAND of Lethington (1496-1586), who was knighted, became a Lord of Session in 1551, Lord Privy Seal in 1562, and was conspicuous for his moderation and integrity. His poems—mostly lamentations for the distracted state of his country—were published in 1830 by the Maitland Club. He also made a collection of early Scottish poetry, now forming two MS. vols., which are in the Pepysian collection at Cambridge. He wrote also a Historie of the Hous of Seytoun.—His eldest son was WILLIAM MAITLAND (c. 1528-73), 'Secretary Lethington,' who in 1558 became secretary of state to the Queen-Regent, and in 1559 joined the Lords of the Congregation, then in arms against her. In August 1560 he acted as Speaker in the Convention of Estates, and was sent to the English court to represent the interests of the Protestants. On the arrival of Queen Mary in 1561, Maitland associated himself with Moray in opposing the extreme proposals of Knox. He represented Mary more than once at the court of Elizabeth; but made her his enemy by his connivance at Rizzio's murder (1566), again, however, to become her counsellor. At first he favoured Bothwell, and was privy to the murder of Darnley, yet on Bothwell's marriage with Mary he acted with the insurgents. Nevertheless, after the queen's flight to England, while seeming to side with the new government, he secretly favoured the exiled queen. One of the commissioners who accompanied Moray to present to Elizabeth their indictment against Mary (1568), he was plotting against his colleagues; and the formation of a party in favour of Mary was mainly his work. Shut up in Edinburgh Castle, Maitland and Kirkaldy of Grange surrendered, 29th May 1573. Maitland died in prison in Leith on 9th June. See Buchanan's Chamæleon, and Skelton's Maitland of Lethington (1887-88). See also LAUDERDALE.

Maitland, SAMUEL ROFFEY, F.R.S. (1792-1866), born in London, was educated at Westminster and Cambridge, was called to the bar in 1816, but in 1821 took orders. Editor of the British Magazine 1839-49, he wrote an admirable History of the Albigenes (1832), The Dark Ages (1844), &c.—His grandson, FREDERICK WILLIAM MAITLAND (1850-1906), educated at Eton and Trinity, Cambridge, was a barrister (1876), reader in English law at Cambridge (1884), and Downing Professor (1888). He wrote a History of English Law (1895, with Sir F. Pollock, q.v.), Domesday Book and Beyond (1897), and other brilliant works on legal antiquities and history.

Maj'endie, SIR VIVIAN DERING (1836-98), from 1871 chief inspector of explosives, born near Lichfield, entered the artillery, served in the Crimea and Mutiny, and was made a K.C.B. in 1895.

Major, or MAIR, JOHN (c. 1470-1550), born near North Berwick, studied at Oxford, Cambridge, and Paris, lectured on scholastic logic and philosophy, and gained a reputation second to none. He also wrote voluminous commentaries on Peter Lombard, and a History of England and Scotland. In 1518 he was teaching in the college of Glasgow; at St Andrews (1523-25) he had Patrick Hamilton, George Buchanan, and John Knox among his pupils. In 1525 Major returned to Paris, where he remained till about 1530, admired and honoured by all who still maintained scholasticism against the new light of the Renaissance. In 1533 he became provost of St Salvator's College, St Andrews, an office which he held till his death. See Arch. Constable's translation of his History (Scottish Hist. Soc. 1892).

Makart, HANS (1840-84), Austrian painter, born at Salzburg, studied at Munich and in Italy, settled in Vienna in 1869, and in 1879 became professor at the academy there. He painted spectacular and historical genre pictures, gorgeous with colour and of gigantic size. See the Life of him by Von Lützw (1886).

Makkari, AHMED EL. (c. 1585-1631), Moorish historian, born at Makkara in Algeria, from 1618 made pilgrimages to Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem, and died at Cairo. He wrote a History of the Mohammedan Dynasties of Spain, partly Englished by Gayangan (1843), and edited by Dozy, Wright, &c. (Leyden, 1855-61). [Mak-kah'-ree.]

Makrizi, TAKI-ED-DIN AHMED EL. (1364-1442), born at Cairo, was secretary of state, inspector of markets, preacher, and lecturer there, and wrote sixteen works on Egyptian history, Arab migrations, coins, and measures, &c. [Mak-kree'zee.]

Malachy, ST (c. 1095-1148), born at Armagh, became abbot of Bangor (1121), Bishop of Connor (1125), and Archbishop of Armagh (1134). In 1140 he journeyed to Rome, visiting St Bernard at Clairvaux. In 1148 he once more repaired to France, and died at Clairvaux in St Bernard's arms. The curious 'Prophecies of St Malachy' were first published in his Lignum Vitæ (1595) by the Flemish Benedictine, Arnold Wion. They consist of 111 Latin mottoes, forecasting as many pontiffs from 1143 to about 1996. The first 74 (down to 1590) are almost without exception transparent indications of the individuals to whom they apply; some of the rest, on popes long after the date of publication, are wonderfully lucky shots. See St Bernard's Vita Malachie (in Migne's Patr. clxxi.); Stokes's Ireland and the Celtic Church (2d ed. 1888); and, for the 'Prophecies,' Lord Bute in Dublin Review for Oct. 1855.

Malan, CÉSAR HENRI ABRAHAM (1787-1864), Swiss Protestant divine, born in Geneva, became pastor of the state church and a regent in the college, and was latterly devoutly evangelical. Many of his works were translated into English—The Church of Rome (1844), Stories for Children (1852), Pictures from Switzerland (1854), &c. See Life (1869) by his son SOLOMON CÉSAR, D.D. (1812-94), who, born at Geneva, studied at Oxford, and was vicar of Broadwindsor (1845-86), and prebendary of Sarum (1870-75). He wrote on British Birds, the Holy Land, the Armenian and Coptic Churches, &c. See Life by his son (1897).

Malcolm I., son of Donald, king of Alban 942-954; MALCOLM II., son of Kenneth, king of Scotia 1005-34; MALCOLM IV. (1141-65), Malcolm the Maiden, king of Scotland from 1153.

Malcolm, SIR JOHN, G.C.B. (1769-1833), born at Burnfoot near Langholm, at thirteen entered the Madras army; distinguished himself at Seringapatam (1799) and in the wars with the Pindaris and Holkar; and besides holding minor political appointments in Mysore, the Deccan, &c., was thrice ambassador to Persia (1800, 1807, 1810), and governor of Bombay (1827-30). In 1812-17 and again in 1822-30 he was in England, and was knighted in 1812. He entered parliament in 1831, opposing the Reform Bill. He published Sketches in Persia (1827), A History of Persia (1815), Memoir of Central India (1823), Political History of India 1784-1823 (1826), and Life of Clive (1836). See Life by Kaye (1856).

Malcolm Canmore (Gael. Ceanann-mor, 'great head') was a child when his father, King Duncan, was slain by Macbeth (1040). He spent his youth in Northumbria with his uncle, Earl Siward, who in 1054 established him in Cumbria and Lothian. In 1057, after Macbeth was slain, he became king of all Scotland. His first wife, Ingibiorg, widow of Thorfinn of Orkney, had died; and in 1069 Malcolm wedded Margaret (q.v.), sister of Edgar the Atheling, whose cause he made his own. Five times he harried Northumbria (1069, 1070, 1079, 1091, 1093); and there were counter-invasions by William the Conqueror and Prince Robert, in 1072 and 1080. In 1092 Rufus wrested from Scotland all Cumbria south of the Solway; and next year Malcolm marched into England, but was entrapped and slain at Alnwick, 13th November 1093. He left five sons, of whom four succeeded him, Duncan, Edgar, Alexander, and David. His reign marks the transition of Scotland, Celtic and Culdee, to Scotland, feudal and Roman Catholic; but the change was mainly due to his saintly queen.

Malden, HENRY (1800-76), born at Putney, was elected a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1824, and from 1831 was Greek professor at University College, London.

Malebranche, NICOLAS, born at Paris, August 6, 1638, joined the Oratorians, and studied theology till Descartes's works drew him to philosophy. His famous De la Recherche de la Vérité (1674); 6th ed. 1712) combines a psychological investigation of the causes of error with a mystic idealism—'the vision of all things in God,' the intervention of God being necessary to bridge over the gulf between things so unlike as the human soul and the body. Other works are Conversations Métaphysiques et Chrésiennes (1683) and Traité de la Morale (1684). He died October 13, 1715—according to a disproved legend, from the consequences of a dispute with Bishop Berkeley. His works have been edited by Genoude and Lourdoueix (1837) and Jules Simon (1859-71). See Life by André (1886), and the Studies by Blampignon (1861), Ollé-Laprune (1870), Novaro (Berl. 1893), and Pillon (1895). [Mahl-bronsh.]

Malesherbes, CHRÉTIEN GUILLAUME DE LA MOIGNON DE, born at Paris, December 6, 1721, became in 1750 president of the Cour des Aides. He was a determined opponent of government rapacity and tyranny; as censor of the press he showed himself tolerant, and to him we may ascribe the publication of the Encyclopédie. In 1771 his remonstrances against royal abuses of law led to his banishment to his country-seat of Ste Lucie; at Louis XVI.'s accession (1774) he was recalled, and took office; but retired on the dismissal of Turgot, and, save a short spell in office in 1787, spent his time in travel or in the improvement of his estates. Under the Convention he came to Paris to defend the king, and from that day himself was doomed. He was arrested in December 1793, and guillotined, April 22, 1794, along with his daughter and her husband. Malesherbes was a member of the Academy, and brought an able pen to the discussion of agriculture and botany as well as political and financial questions. His Œuvres Choieses (1809) contains his most interesting writings. See Lives by Dubois (3d ed. 1806), Gaillard (1805), Boissy d'Anglas (1818), Rozet (1831), Dupin (1841), and Vignaux (1874). Malet, LUCAS. See KINGSLEY.

Malherbe, FRANÇOIS DE (1555-1628), born at Caen, ingratiated himself with Henri IV., and received a pension. He was an industrious writer, producing odes, songs, epigrams, epistles, translations, criticisms, &c. His own poetry is colourless and insipid, but he founded a literary tradition; he led his countrymen to disdain the richly-coloured and full-sounding verses of Ronsard, and to adopt a style clear, correct, and refined, but cold and prosaic. See Sainte-Beuve's Causeries du Lundi, vol. viii.; and works by Gournay (1852), Laur (Heid. 1869), Johannesson (Halle, 1881), Basset (3d ed. 1890), Brunot (1890), Allais (1892), and the Duc de Broglie (1896). [Ma-layrb.]

Malibran, MARIA FELICITA, mezzo-soprano singer, born at Paris, March 24, 1808, was the daughter of the Spanish singer Manuel Garcia (q.v.). She made her début in London in 1825, and soon won a European reputation. Her father unsuccessfully attempted to establish Italian opera in New York; and in March 1826 she married M. Malibran, a French merchant there, who became bankrupt. Thereupon she returned to the stage and to Europe, and was received with enthusiasm. Her first marriage having been dissolved, she married M. de Bériot, violinist, in 1836; but on 23d September of that year she died at Manchester. [Mah-lee-bronsh.]

Mallarmé, STÉPHANE (1842-98), 'decadent' poet, born at Paris, taught English in various lycées and colleges, and became known by a translation of Poe's Raven (1875). Both in his prose and verse he was a representative of the 'Decadent' school, defying the accepted laws of prosody, and delighting in bizarre words and constructions. Divagations appeared in 1896.

Malleson, COL. GEORGE BRUCE (1825-98), military historian, born in London, served in India from 1842, edited the Calcutta Review 1864-69, and came home 1877. He wrote on the French in India, the Mutiny, Prince Eugene, &c.

Mallet, or MALET, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS DE (1754-1812), conspirator, born at Dôle, rose by 1799 to be brigadier-general. Twice detected in revolutionary conspiracy against Napoleon, he was a prisoner from 1808 to 1812, when he escaped (October 22-23), circulated false news of Napoleon's death in Russia, won over some of the National Guards, but was captured and shot, with several accomplices, 29th October. See works by Lafon (1814), Saulnier (1834), and Dourille (1840).

Mallet, DAVID, was born in 1698 near Crieff, the son of a farmer. Janitor at Edinburgh High School in 1717-18, he then studied at the university; in 1720 became a tutor, from 1723 to 1731 in the family of the Duke of Montrose, living mostly in London and changed his name 'from Scotch Malloch to English Mallet.' In 1723 the adaptation of two old ballads into

'William and Margaret' gained him a reputation as a poet, which he enhanced by The Excursion (1728). To please Pope, Mallet reviled Pope's critics in Verbal Criticism (1738). In 1740 he published a mediocre Life of Bacon; in 1742 another poem, The Hermit, or Amyntor and Theodora, and the same year became under-secretary to Frederick, Prince of Wales. To gratify Bolingbroke he heaped abuse upon his dead friend Pope in a preface to Bolingbroke's Patriot King, and he edited Bolingbroke's works; at the bidding of the ministry he directed the popular rage for the loss of Minorca upon Admiral Byng, and the 'price of blood,' says Dr Johnson, 'was a pension which he retained till his death.' He received a legacy of £1000 from the Duchess to write a Life of Marlborough, but never penned a line. He also tried his hand at play-writing, Mustapha pleased for a while in 1739; Eurydice (1731) and Elvira (1763), tragedies, were failures. Alfred, a Masque (1740), was written in conjunction with Thomson, and one of its songs, 'Rule Britannia,' was claimed for both. Mallet died 21st April 1765. See memoir by Dinsdale prefixed to his Ballads and Songs (1857).

Mallet, PAUL HENRI (1780-1807), writer on Scandinavian antiquities, was born and died at Geneva, and filled a chair at Copenhagen 1752-60.

Mallet-du-Pan, JACQUES (1749-1800), Constitutional Journalist in the French Revolution, was born at Celigny on the Lake of Geneva, and died at Richmond. See Life by his great-grandson (1902).

Mallock, WILLIAM HURRELL, born in 1849 at Cockington Court, Devon, won the Newdigate in 1871 whilst at Balliol, Oxford. He made a hit with The New Republic (1877) and The New Paul and Virginia (1878), and has written Aristocracy and Evolution, Religion a Credible Doctrine, The Veil of the Temple (1904), &c.

Malmesbury, JAMES HARRIS, EARL OF (1746-1820), son of 'Hermes' Harris (q.v.), held posts at Madrid (1768), Berlin, Petersburg, and the Hague (1784), and was made K.C.B. (1778), Baron (1788), and Earl of Malmesbury (1800). In 1793 he had seceded from Fox to Pitt, and in 1795 had married by proxy and conducted to England the Princess Caroline. See Diaries and Correspondence (1844) and Lord Malmesbury and his Friends (1870), both edited by his grandson, JAMES HOWARD HARRIS, third EARL OF MALMESBURY (1807-89). He had just been returned to the House of Commons (1841) when his father's death called him to the Upper House. In 1852 and 1858-59 he was Foreign Secretary; in 1866-68 and 1874-76, Privy Seal. See his Memoirs of an Ex-Minister (1884).

Malmesbury, WILLIAM OF (c. 1095-1143), chronicler, became a monk in the monastery at Malmesbury, and in due time librarian and precentor. He took part in the council at Winchester against Stephen in 1141. His Gesta Regum Anglorum gives the history of the kings of England from the Saxon invasion to 1128; the Historia Novella brings down the narrative to 1142 (both ed. by Hardy, 1840; trans. by Sharpe, 1847). The Gesta Pontificum gives an account of the bishops and chief monasteries of England to 1123 (ed. by Hamilton, 1870). Other works are an account of the church at Glastonbury and a Life of St Dunstan. See Bishop Stubbs's edition of the Gesta Regum (Rolls series, 1887-89).

Malone, EDMUND (1741-1812), editor of Shakespeare, born in Dublin, graduated at Trinity College, was called to the Irish bar in 1767, but from 1777 devoted himself to literary work in London.

his first work being a 'supplement' to Steevens's edition of Shakespeare (1778). Malone's own edition of the great dramatist (1790) was warmly received. He had been one of the first to express his disbelief in Chatterton's Rowley Poems, and in 1796 he denounced the forgeries of Ireland. He left behind a large mass of materials for 'The Variorum Shakespeare,' edited in 1821 by James Boswell the younger. See Life by Sir James Prior (1860).

Malory, SIR THOMAS, immortal in his work, the Morte Darthur. We learn from Caxton's preface that Malory was a knight, that he finished his work in the ninth year of the reign of Edward IV. (1469-70), and that he 'reduced' it from some French book—Bale says he was a Welshman. Of Caxton's black-letter folio but two copies now exist (reprinted by Oskar Sommer with essay by A. Lang, 1889-91); see also editions by Southey (1817), Thomas Wright (1856; new ed. 1897), and Sir E. Strachey (1868). The Morte Darthur 'is indisputably,' says Scott, 'the best prose romance the English language can boast of,' and was a happy attempt to give epic unity to the whole mass of French Arthurian romance. Tennyson, Swinburne, Matthew Arnold, and William Morris are all debtors to Malory. See preface by Prof. Rhys to a modernised version of Malory (1894).

Malot, HECTOR HENRI (1830-1907), born near Rouen, lived in London as a newspaper correspondent, and wrote many novels. See his autobiographical Le Roman de mes Romains (1896).

Malpighi, MARCELLO (1628-94), Italian anatomist, was professor at Pisa, Messina, and Bologna, and from 1691 chief physician to Pope Innocent XII. A pioneer in microscopic anatomy, animal and vegetable, he wrote a series of works on his discoveries. See Italian essays on him by Virchow, Haeckel, &c. (Milan, 1897). [Mal-pee'-ghee.]

Malthus, THOMAS ROBERT, social economist, was born at The Rookery near Dorking, 17th February 1766. He was ninth wrangler at Cambridge in 1788, was elected fellow of his college (Jesus) in 1793, and in 1797 became curate at Albury, Surrey. In 1798 he published anonymously his Essay on the Principle of Population, of which in 1803 he brought out a greatly enlarged and altered edition. In it he maintained that the optimistic hopes of Rousseau and Godwin are rendered baseless by the natural tendency of population to increase faster than the means of subsistence. The only limit to its increase is the want of room and food. With man, the instinct of propagation is controlled by reason; but even in his case the ultimate check to population is the want of food, though there are both preventive and positive checks—the preventive being moral restraint or prophylactic methods. The positive checks include unwholesome occupations, severe labour, extreme poverty, bad nursing, large towns, excesses of all kinds, diseases and epidemics, wars, plague, and famine. Malthus gives no sanction to the theories and practices currently known as Malthusianism. An amiable and benevolent man, he suffered much misrepresentation and abuse at the hands of both revolutionaries and conservatives. The problem had been handled by Franklin, Hume, and many other writers, but Malthus crystallised the views of those writers, and presented them in systematic form with elaborate proofs derived from history. Darwin saw 'on reading Malthus On Population that natural selection was the inevitable result of the rapid increase of all organic beings,' for such rapid increase necessarily leads to the struggle for existence.

In 1804 Malthus married happily, and next year was appointed professor of Political Economy and Modern History in the East India college at Haileybury, a post which he occupied till his death near Bath, 23d December 1834. He wrote other two important works, An Inquiry into the Nature and Progress of Rent (1815), largely anticipating Ricardo, and Principles of Political Economy (1820). See Bonar's Malthus and his Work (1885).

Mamæa, mother of Alexander Severus (q.v.).

Mamiani della Rovere, TERENZIO, COUNT (1799-1885), a Liberal Italian statesman, who wrote on philosophy, religion, &c., was born at Pesaro, and died at Rome. See Life by Gaspari (1887). [Mah-mee-ah'nee del-la Raw' ve-rah.]

Manasseh (1), eldest son of Joseph, and founder of a tribe; (2) the son of pious Hezekiah, succeeded him as king of Judah (697-642 B.C.), but earned an evil name for idolatry and wickedness till, a captive in Babylon, he repented. The Prayer of Manasseh is apocryphal.

Manasseh ben Israel (1604-57), Jewish scholar, born at Lisbon and taken early to Amsterdam, at eighteen became chief rabbi of the synagogue there. In 1655-57 he was in England, securing from Cromwell the readmission of the Jews. He wrote works in Hebrew, Spanish, and Latin, and in English a Humble Address to Cromwell, A Declaration, and Vindicie Judeorum (1656).

Manby, GEORGE WILLIAM, F.R.S. (1765-1854), barrack-master at Yarmouth from 1803, showed in 1807 how to save shipwrecked persons by firing a rope to the ship from a mortar on shore. He wrote on this method, on lifeboats, on criminal law, and on other subjects.

Manchester, EDWARD MONTAGU, EARL OF (1662-71), after leaving Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, accompanied Prince Charles to Spain (1623), and in 1626 was raised to the House of Lords as Baron Montagu of Kimbolton, but was better known by his courtesy title of Viscount Maudeville. Siding with the popular party, and an acknowledged leader of the Puritans in the Upper House, he was charged by the king (3d January 1642) with entertaining traitorous designs, along with the five members of the House of Commons. He succeeded his father as second earl in the same year. On the outbreak of hostilities he of course fought for the parliament. He served under Essex at Edgehill, then held the associated (eastern) counties against Newcastle, took Lincoln (1644), and routed Prince Rupert at Marston Moor—that is to say, he nominally commanded; the real fighting was done by Cromwell and his Ironsides. He then marched to oppose the royalists in the south-west, and defeated them at Newbury (the second battle). But after this battle he again showed slackness in following up the victory, a fault that had been noticed after Marston Moor. In consequence Cromwell accused him of military incompetency in the House of Commons, and the two had a downright quarrel. The Self-denying Ordinance deprived Manchester of his command (1645), and this did not allay his bitterness against Cromwell. He opposed the trial of the king, and protested against the Commonwealth. Afterwards, having been active in promoting the Restoration, he was made Lord Chamberlain, a step designed to conciliate the Presbyterians.—His grandson, CHARLES MONTAGU (c. 1660-1722), succeeded as fourth earl in 1682, supported William of Orange in Ireland, was sent as ambassador extraordinary to Venice (1696), Paris (1699), and Vienna (1707), and was made

Duke of Manchester in 1719 for having favoured the Hanoverian succession.

Mandeville, BERNARD (1670-1733), satirist, born at Dort in Holland, took his M.D. at Leyden in 1691, immediately settled in London in medical practice, and died there. He is known as the author of a short work in doggerel verse originally entitled The Grumbling Hive (1705), and finally The Fable of the Bees (1723). Writing in a vein of acute paradox, he affirms that 'private vices are public benefits,' and that every species of virtue is at bottom some form of gross selfishness, more or less modified. The book was condemned by the grand jury of Middlesex, and was attacked by Law the nonjuror, by Berkeley, Brown, Warburton, Hutcheson, and others. Other works in an unpleasant tone are The Virgin Unmasked, Free Thoughts on Religion, &c.

Mandeville, GEOFFREY DE, Earl of Essex (died 1144), succeeded his father as Constable of the Tower about 1130, proved a traitor alternately to King Stephen and the Empress Matilda, and taking finally to open brigandage, was driven to bay in the Cambridgeshire fens and slain. See monograph by J. H. Round (1892).

Mandeville, JEHAN DE, the name assumed by the compiler of a famous book of travels, published between 1357 and 1371, and soon translated from the French into all European tongues. It seems to have been written under a feigned name by the physician Jehan de Bourgogne, otherwise Jehan à la Barbe, who died at Liège in 1372, and who, according to an unproved statement, revealed on his death-bed his real name of Mandeville (or Maundevelyll), explaining that he had had to flee from his native England for a homicide. An English Jean de Burgoyne has been traced, who may possibly be identical with the Liège physician. Three English versions were made early in the 15th century; the first was printed in 1499 from a defective MS. The old translations are an admirable monument of English, but it is absurd to speak of Sir John Mandeville as the 'father of English prose.' In the preface the compiler describes himself as a knight born at St Albans, who left his native country in 1322, travelled by way of Turkey, Armenia, Tartary, Persia, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, Libya, Ethiopia, Amazonia, and India, often visited Jerusalem, and wrote in Romance as better understood than Latin. We are told further that he had served the sultan of Egypt and the emperor of China, had seen Prester John, and returned home unwillingly owing to gout in 1357. By far the greater part of the book has now been proved to be borrowed, with interpolations, usually extravagant, from the narrative of Friar Odoric (1330), from a French work on the East (1307) by an Armenian monk, from the Franciscan Carpin, from Vincent de Beauvais, from the 12th-century Latin itineraries of Palestine, and from many other sources. A small portion of the book may still represent actual travels and personal knowledge, especially in the part relating to the Holy Land. Among the wonders reported we find anthropophagi and men whose heads grew beneath their shoulders, the phoenix, the vegetable lamb, and the weeping crocodile. See G. F. Warner's Introduction to his edition for the Roxburghe Club (1889) and Cordier's Jean de Mandeville (Leyden, 1891).

Manet, ÉDOUARD (1832-82), a French painter, the founder of Impressionism, was born and died in Paris. See his Life by Bazire (1884).

Manetho, Egyptian historian, was high-priest of Heliopolis in the 3d century B.C. Only epitomes of his history of the 30 dynasties are given by Julius Africanus (300 A.D.), Eusebius, and George Syncellus (800 A.D.). The monuments have so far confirmed Manetho's story.

Manfred (1232-66), king of Sicily, was a natural son of the Emperor Frederick II., and was made prince of Tarentum. For his half-brother, Conrad IV., he acted as regent in Italy (especially Apulia), and subsequently for his nephew Conradin (q.v.) bravely defended the interests of the empire against the aggression of Pope Innocent IV., who, however, compelled Manfred to flee for shelter to the Saracens. With their aid he defeated the papal troops, and became, in 1257, master of the whole kingdom of Naples and Sicily. On the (false) rumour of Conradin's death (1258) he was crowned king at Palermo, and, in spite of excommunication by Pope Alexander VI., occupied Tuscany. His brief government was mild and vigorous; but Pope Urban IV. renewed the excommunication, and bestowed his dominions on Charles of Anjou, brother of Louis IX. of France. Manfred fell in battle at Benevento, 26th Feb. 1266. His widow and three sons died in prison; his daughter was confined by the French for twenty-two years.

Mangan, JAMES CLARENCE (1803-49), an Irish poet and attorney's clerk, whose life was a tragedy of hapless love, poverty, and intemperance, till his death in a Dublin hospital. There is fine quality in his original verse, as well as in his translations from old Irish and German. See John Mitchell's edition of his Poems (New York, 1870), Life by O'Donoghue (1897), and Imogen Guiney's study prefixed to his Poems (1897).

Mangnall, RICHMAL, of Irish extraction, but born in Manchester, 7th March 1769, was the head-mistress of a ladies' school near Wakefield, and died there 1st May 1820. Her redoubtable Questions, the pride and terror of generations of school-girls, reached an 84th edition in 1857, and was even reprinted in 1892.

Manicheus, or MANI (c. 215-76 A.D.), the founder of the heretical Manicheans, was born at Ecbatana, and about 245 began to proclaim his new religion at the court of the Persian king, Sapor (Shahpur) I. Bahram I. abandoned him to his enemies, who crucified him.

Manin, DANIELE (1804-57), born of Jewish ancestry at Venice, practised at the bar, and became a leader of liberal opinion; made president of the Venetian republic (1848), he was the soul of the heroic five months' defence against the Austrians. When Venice capitulated (24th August 1849), Manin, with thirty-nine others, was excluded from the amnesty, but escaped to Paris, where he taught Italian, and died of heart-disease. His bones were brought to free Venice in 1868. See Lives by Henri Martin (Paris, 1859), Hugh Martin (Lond. 1862), and Errera (1875).

Manley, MARY DE LA RIVIERE (c. 1672-1724), author of plays, the scandalous anti-Whig New Atalantis (1709), &c., was born in Jersey, about 1688 married a married cousin, John Manley of Truro, M.P., and died at Lambeth.

Mann, SIR HORACE (1701-86), Horace Walpole's lifelong correspondent, from 1740 was British plenipotentiary at Florence, and in 1755 was created a baronet, in 1768 a C.B. See Dr Doran's Mann and Manners (1876).

Mann, HORACE (1796-1859), born at Franklin, Mass., graduated at Brown University in 1819, and, having commenced lawyer, was elected to the Massachusetts legislature in 1827, and was president of the state senate. After editing the revised state statutes, he was for eleven years secretary of the Board of Education. In 1848 he was elected to congress, and from 1853 was president of Antioch College in Ohio. See Life and Works (1891) and book by Hinsdale (1898).

Mann, TOM, labour leader, by calling an engineer, was born at Foleshill, Warwickshire, 15th April 1856.

Manners. See RUTLAND and GRANBY.

Manners-Sutton, CHARLES (1755-1828), became Bishop of Norwich in 1792, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1805. He was a High Churchman.

Manning, ANNE (1807-79), in 1877 moved from Reigate to Mickleham. She wrote Mary Powell (1850), The Household of Sir Thomas More (1851), Cherry and Violet (1853), and over forty more historical tales, &c.

Manning, HENRY EDWARD, CARDINAL, born 15th July 1808 at Totteridge, Hertfordshire, from Harrow passed in 1827 to Balliol College, Oxford, and, after taking a classical first in 1830, was in 1832 elected a fellow of Merton. An eloquent preacher and a High Churchman, but not a contributor to the Tracts for the Times, in 1833 he became rector of Woollavington and Graffham, Sussex, and in 1840 Archdeacon of Chichester. In 1833 he had married Caroline Sargent, a lady whose sisters married Samuel and Henry Wilberforce; she died in 1837. On 6th April 1851, deeply moved by the 'Gorham Judgment,' he joined the Church of Rome. He studied two years in Rome, in 1857 founded the congregation of the Oblates of St Charles Borromeo at Bayswater, London; and in 1865 succeeded Cardinal Wiseman as Archbishop of Westminster. At the Ecumenical Council of 1870 Manning was one of the most zealous supporters of the infallibility dogma; and, named cardinal in 1875, he continued a leader of the Ultramontanes. He was a member of the Royal Commissions on the Housing of the Poor (1885) and on Education (1886), and took a prominent part in temperance and benevolent movements. Before his secession he published several volumes of powerful sermons; amongst his later writings are discussions of the temporal power, infallibility, the Vatican Council, Ultramontanism, the Four Great Evils of the Day (1871), Internal Mission of the Holy Ghost (1875), The Catholic Church and Modern Society (1880), Eternal Priesthood (1883), Characteristics (1885), and Towards Evening (1889). He died 14th January 1892, and was buried at Kensal Green. See Life by E. S. Purcell (2 vols. 1896).

Manning, ROBERT. See BRUNNE, ROBERT DE.

Manning, THOMAS (1772-1840), born at Broome rectory, Suffolk, in 1790 entered Caius College, Cambridge; stayed there some years, studying Chinese; in 1799 formed his friendship with Lamb; in 1806 went out as a doctor to Canton; in 1811-12 visited Lhasa in Tibet, the first Englishman ever there; returned in 1817 to England; visited Italy 1827-29; and died at Bath. See Memoir by Sir C. R. Markham (1876).

Manns, SIR AUGUST (1825-1907), born in Prussia, in 1855 became musical director at the Crystal Palace, and in 1883-1902 conducted the Handel Festivals. He was knighted in 1903.

Manny, SIR WALTER DE, born in Hainault, followed Queen Philippa to England in 1327, and fought splendidly for Edward III. by land and sea against the Scots, Flemings, and French. He was knighted and made Lord de Manny, received broad lands, founded the Charterhouse monastery, and died in London, 15th Jan. 1372.

Mannyng, ROBERT. See BRUNNE, ROBERT DE.

Mansel, HENRY LONGUEVILLE, Dean of St Paul's, was born at Cosgrove rectory, Northamptonshire, October 6, 1820. Educated at Merchant Taylors' and St John's College, Oxford, he became reader in Philosophy in 1855, Waynflete professor in 1859, professor of Ecclesiastical History and canon of Christ Church in 1867, and Dean of St Paul's in 1869. He died at Cosgrove Hall, 31st July 1871. The pupil and part-editor of Hamilton (q.v.), he went beyond his master in emphasising the relativity of knowledge—alleging, to the consternation of many, that we have no positive conception of the attributes of God. His works are Aldrich's Logic (1849), Prolegomena Logica (1851), article 'Metaphysics' in 8th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica (1857), The Limits of Religious Thought (Bampton Lectures, 1858), The Philosophy of the Conditioned (1866), and The Gnostic Heresies (with Life, 1874). See Dean Burgon's Twelve Good Men (1888).

Mansfeld, COUNTS OF, a noble German family (founded circa 1060), whose castle stood near the Harz Mountains, 14 miles NW. of Halle.—COUNT PRERER ERNST I. (1517–1604), afterwards prince, took part in Charles V.'s expedition against Tunis, and was made governor of Luxemburg. He fought against the French, made a name as one of the most brilliant Spanish generals in the Low Countries, was sent by Alva to the assistance of the French king against the Protestants (1569), and acted as governor of the Spanish Low Countries.—His illegitimate son, COUNT ERNST VON MANSFELD (1580–1626), was a soldier of fortune in the Thirty Years' War. Refused his father's possessions, the promised reward for his brilliant services in Hungary and elsewhere, he went over to the Protestant princes. After defending the Count-Palatine Frederick for a time (1618–20), he was driven by the disaster of the Weissenberg to retreat to the Palatinate, from which he carried on for two years a predatory war on the imperialists, defeating Tilly in 1622. He afterwards took service with the United Netherlands, beating the Spaniards at Fleurus (1622). At Richelieu's solicitation he raised an army of 12,000 men (mostly in England), but in 1626 he was crushed by Wallenstein at Dessau. With another force he was marching to join Bethlen Gabor of Transylvania, but fell sick and died near Sarajevo in Bosnia. See Lives by Villermont (Brus. 1866) and Utterodt zu Scharfenberg (Gotha, 1867).

Mansfield, WILLIAM MURRAY, EARL OF (1705–93), born at Perth, the fourth son of Viscount Stormont, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford, graduating B.A. in 1727. Called to the bar, he soon acquired an extensive practice; was appointed Solicitor-general in 1743; entered the House of Commons as member for Boroughbridge; in 1746–47 was counsel against the rebel lords Balmerino, Kilmarnock, and Lovat; was appointed Attorney-general in 1754; and became Chief-justice of the King's Bench in 1756, a member of the cabinet, and Baron Mansfield. He was impartial as a judge, but his opinions were unpopular; Junius bitterly attacked him, and during the Gordon riots of 1780 his house was burned. Made Earl of Mansfield in 1776, he resigned office in 1788. See Life by Holliday (1797).

Manson, GEORGE (1850–76), water-colour painter, born in Edinburgh, in 1866 became a wood-engraver with Messrs W. & R. Chambers. In 1871

he devoted himself wholly to painting, but his youthful hard study had permanently injured his health, and he died at Lymington in Devon. His pictures are mostly from humble life; beauty and refinement of drawing and colour their great charm. See Memoir by J. M. Gray (1880).

Mansur. See ALMANSUR.

Mant, RICHARD (1776–1848), born at Southampton, from Winchester passed to Trinity College, Oxford, was elected a fellow of Oriel, and became Bishop of Killaloe (1820) and of Down and Connor (1823), with Dromore attached (1842). He published an annotated Bible (with D'Oyly, 1814), an annotated Book of Common Prayer (1825), History of the Church of Ireland (1840), &c. See Memoirs by Berens (1849) and W. Mant (1857).

Mantegazza, PAOLO (1831–1910), physiologist, born at Monza, practised medicine in Argentina and at Milan, and became professor in 1860 of Pathology at Pavia, in 1870 of Anthropology at Florence. He wrote largely on the physiology of pleasure, pain, and love, on spontaneous generation, and on physiognomy, as well as books of travel and novels. See Memoir by Raynaldi (Milan, 1894). [Man-tay-ga'za.]

Mantegna, ANDREA, painter, born in or near Padua in 1431, was the favourite pupil and adopted son of Squarcione, the tailor-painter; a precocious genius, he set up a studio of his own when only seventeen years. Having married a sister of the Bellinis and quarrelled with Squarcione, he was in 1460 induced by Lodovico Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, to settle in his city. There he remained, with the exception of a visit to Rome (1488–90) to paint a series of frescoes (now destroyed) for Pope Innocent VIII., until his death on 13th September 1506. His greatest works at Mantua were nine tempera pictures representing the 'Triumph of Cæsar' (his masterpieces), now at Hampton Court. Mantegna was also engraver, architect, sculptor, and poet. He did not aim at grace and beauty in his pictures—some of them are ugly; but his technical excellences greatly influenced Italian art. See books by Julia Cartwright (1881), Maud Cruttwell (1901), and Kristeller (trans. Armstrong, 1901). [Man-tayn'ya.]

Mantell, GIDEON ALGERNON (1790–1852), paleontologist, born at Lewes, practised as a doctor there and at Brighton, Clapham, and London, where he died. He wrote 67 works and memoirs, mostly geological. Very important were his investigation of the Wealden fossils and his discovery of four great dinosaurians.

Manteuffel, EDWIN HANS KARL, FREIHERR VON (1809–85), born at Dresden of old Pomeranian family, was colonel of the Prussian guards by 1854. As commander of the Prussian troops in Sleswick he began the war with Austria in 1866, helped to reduce the Hanoverians to capitulation, and defeated the Bavarians in four battles. In 1870 he first commanded the army of the north, then in command of the army of the south drove Bourbaki and 80,000 men into Switzerland. As viceroy of Alsace-Lorraine (from 1879) he was very unpopular. See Life by Keck (1889). [Man-toif-fel.]

Manton, JOE (c. 1766–1835), London gunmaker.

Manuel, NIKOLAUS, called DEUTSCH (1484–1530), portrait-painter and reformer, was born and died at Bern. See works by Schaffroth (1885) and Händelke (1889).—His son, HANS RUDOLF (1525–71), was also a portrait-painter.

Manuzio. See ALDUS MANUTIUS.

Manzoni, ALESSANDRO, nobly born at Milan,

March 7, 1785, published his first poems in 1806, married happily in 1810, and spent the next few years in writing sacred lyrics and a treatise on the religious basis of morality. His first tragedy, Il Conte di Carmagnola (1819), was a trumpet-blast of romanticism; but the work which gave Manzoni European fame is his historical novel, I Promessi Sposi, a Milanese story of the 17th century (1825-7), the noblest novel in all Italian literature. Manzoni's noble ode, Il Cinque Maggio, was inspired by the death of Napoleon. Spite of his Catholic devoutness, he was a strong advocate for a united Italy. His last years were darkened by the frequent shadow of death within his household. He himself died at Milan, 23d May 1873, leaving the memory of a great writer and singularly noble man. See edition of his works by Tommaseo (5 vols. 1829; new ed. 1843), and books on him by De Gubernatis (1879), Stampa (1885-88), and Bonghi (1889).

Map or MAPES, WALTER (c. 1137-1209), was born, of Welsh family, apparently in Herefordshire, studied at Paris, became a clerk of the royal household, went on a mission to Rome, and after holding minor preferments became canon of St Paul's and archdeacon of Oxford. He was certainly the author of the De Nugis Curialium (see Wright's edition, 1850), a kind of note-book of the court-gossip and events of the day, interspersed with theological polemics, anecdotes, and accounts of miracles and fairy legends; probably reduced the Arthurian romances (especially Lancelot of the Lake, the Saint Graal, and the Morte Arthur, in Anglo-French verse) to their existing shape; and may have written some part of the Latin poems (see Wright's edition, 1841), in connection with which his name is best known. The Confessio Goliae and other Goliardic poems, whoever wrote them, are savage satire against self-indulgent churchmen; and to treat 'Meum est propositum in taberna mori,' extracted from parts of the Confessio, as a jovial drinking song is rather unkind to the author—though it has been so translated in verse by Leigh Hunt, Sir Theodore Martin, and J. A. Symonds.

Mapleson, J. H. See ROZE, MARIE.

Mar, JOHN, EARL OF (1675-1732), began life as a Whig, and by his frequent change of sides earned the nickname of 'Bobbing Joan,' headed the Jacobite rebellion of 1715, and died in exile at Aix-la-Chapelle. See his Legacy, with introduction by the Hon. Stuart Erskine, published by the Scottish History Society in 1896. The attainder was removed in 1824; and a long dispute as to the succession, which began in 1866, ended (1875-85) by leaving two earls—an Earl of Mar and Kellie and an earlier Earl of Mar. See the Earl of Crawford's Earldom of Mar in Sunshine and Shade (1882).

Marat, JEAN PAUL, revolutionist, was born at Boudry near Neuchâtel, May 24, 1743, son of an Italian physician Mara, who had settled and married there. He studied medicine at Bordeaux, next went to Paris, Holland, and London, practised there with success, and published a materialistic Philosophical Essay on Man (1773), and an essay, The Chains of Slavery (1774). In 1775 he paid a visit to Edinburgh, and was made M. D. of St Andrews; and he cannot have been the Le Maître or Mara condemned to five years' imprisonment at Oxford in March 1777 for stealing coins and medals, as in June he was made brevet-physician to his guards by the Comte d'Artois, afterwards Charles X.—an office which he held till 1786. Meantime he continued work in optics and electricity, writing also a Plan de Législation Criminelle (1780), a translation of Newton's Optics (1787), and Découvertes sur la Lumière (1788). But now revolution was in the air, and Marat, flinging himself into the war of pamphlets, established his infamous paper, L'Ami du Peuple. Throughout he fought ever for his own hand, denouncing with feverish suspiciousness in turn Necker, Bailly, Lafayette, the king, Dumouriez, and the Girondins. His virulence provoked the most vehement hatred, and covered him with calumnies; but it made him the darling of the scum of Paris, and placed great power in his hands. Twice at least he had to flee to London, and once he was forced to hide in the sewers of Paris. His misadventures increased his frenzied suspicion and hatred of constituted authority, and on his head rests in great measure the guilt of the infamous September massacres. He was elected to the Convention as one of the deputies for Paris, but was one of the least influential and most unpopular men in the House. After the king's death his last energies were spent in a mortal struggle with the Girondins. But he was dying fast of a disease contracted in the sewers, and could only write sitting in his bath. There his destiny reached him through the knife of Charlotte Corday (q. v.) on the evening of 13th July 1793. His body was committed to the Panthéon with the greatest public honours, to be cast out fifteen months later amid popular execration. See the histories of the French Revolution (Mignet, Thiers, Michelet, Blanc, Carlyle, Morse Stephens); and Lives of Marat by Boyleau (1864), Chèvremont (1881), and Cabanès (1890). [Ma-rah.]

Marbeck, or MERBECKE, JOHN, organist of St George's Chapel, Windsor, was condemned to the stake in 1544 as a Reformer, but pardoned by Bishop Gardiner. In 1550 he published his famous Boke of Common Prayer Noted, an adaptation of the plain chant to the first Prayer-book of Edward VI. He prepared the earliest concordance to the whole English Bible, and wrote several theological works. He died about 1585.

Marcantonio, or in full MARCANTONIO RAIMONDI (c. 1488-1534), an engraver on copper, born at Bologna, was at first a goldsmith. At Rome, where he worked from 1510, he was chiefly engaged in engraving Raphael's works; and he is reckoned the best amongst the engravers of the great painter. The capture of Rome by the Constable Bourbon in 1527 drove him back to Bologna, where he seems to have died. See Fisher's essay prefixed to the catalogue of his engravings exhibited in London in 1868, and Delaborde's monograph (Paris, 1887).

Marceau, FRANÇOIS SÉVERIN DESGRAVIERS (1769-96), French general, born at Chartres, helped in 1792 to defend Verdun with a body of volunteers, and for his services with the republican army in La Vendée was made general of division. He commanded the right wing at Fleurus, and in 1796 the first division of Jourdan's army, investing Mainz, Mannheim, and Coblenz. But whilst covering the French retreat at Altenkirchen he was shot, 19th Sept., and died four days later. His body was brought from Coblenz to the Panthéon in Paris in 1889. See Lives by Doublet de Boisthibault (1851), Maze (1888), Parfait (1892), and T. B. Johnson (1896). [Mar-so.]

Marcello, BENEDETTO (1686-1739), musical composer, was a judge of the Venetian republic, and a member of the Council of Forty, and afterwards held offices at Pola and Brescia. He composed church music, concertos, cantatas, a pastoral, an oratorio, &c., and wrote Il Teatro alla Moda (1720). See Life by Busi (1884).

Marcellus, the name of two popes, the first martyred in 310; the second as Cardinal Marcello Cervini presided over the Council of Trent, was elected pope in 1555, but survived his elevation only three weeks.

Marcellus, M. CLAUDIUS, a Roman general of plebeian family. In his first consulship (222 B.C.) he defeated the Insubrian Gauls, and slew their king, Britomartus or Viridomarus, whose spoils he dedicated as spolia optima—the third and last time in Roman history. In the second Punic war he checked Hannibal at Nola (216). Again consul in 214, he conducted the siege of Syracuse, which yielded only in 212. In his fifth consulship, 208, he fell in a skirmish against Hannibal.

Marcet, JANE, née HALDIMAND (1769-1858), born at Geneva, the daughter of a rich Swiss London merchant, in 1799 married Alexander Marcet (1770-1822), a Genevan, who had just started a medical practice in London, and became lecturer on chemistry at Guy's Hospital. Besides Conversations on Chemistry (1806; 16th ed. 1853), through which Faraday made his first acquaintance with the subject, she wrote Conversations on Political Economy (1816; 7th ed. 1839), which was warmly praised by J. B. Say, M'Culloch, and Lord Macaulay; Conversations on Natural Philosophy (1819; 14th ed. 1872), and similar books on Botany, Vegetable Physiology, &c., besides really charming Stories for very Little Children. See Harriet Martineau's Biographical Sketches (1869).

March, FRANCIS ANDREW, LL.D., Anglo-Saxon scholar and lexicographer, born at Millbury, Mass., 25th Oct. 1825, graduated at Amherst 1845, and in 1856-1906 was professor of English and Comparative Philology at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa.

Marchetti, FILIPPO (1831-1901), operatic composer, born at Bologna, became in 1881 president of a music college in Rome. He wrote Romeo e Giulietta (1865), Ruy Blas (1869), Don Giovanni d'Austria (1880), &c. [Mar-ke'tee.]

Marconi, GIULIELMO, inventor of wireless telegraphy, was born at Bologna in 1875.

Mardonius, a Persian general, defeated and slain at Plataea (479 B.C.).

Margaret, St., Scottish queen, was born about 1045 in Hungary; when she first came to England is not known (hardly with her father in 1057; more likely not till 1066). In 1068, with her mother and sister and her boy brother, Edgar the Atheling (q.v.), she fled from Northumberland to Scotland. Young, lovely, learned, and pious, she won the heart of the rude Scottish king, Malcolm Canmore (q.v.), who next year wedded her at Dunfermline. She did much to civilise the northern realm, and still more to assimilate the old Celtic Church to the rest of Christendom on such points as the due commencement of Lent, the Easter communion, the observance of Sunday, and marriage within the prohibited degrees. She built, too, a stately church at Dunfermline, and re-founded Iona. She bore her husband six sons and two daughters, and died three days after him, in Edinburgh Castle, 16th November 1093. Innocent IV. canonised her in 1251. See the Latin Life ascribed to her confessor Turgot (trans. by Forbes-Leith, 3d ed. 1896).

Margaret (1353-1412), queen of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, was the daughter of Waldemar IV. of Denmark, and wife of Haco VIII. of Norway. On the death of her father without male heirs in 1375, the Danish nobles offered her the crown in trust for her infant son Olaf (who died 1387). By Haco's death in 1380 Margaret became ruler of Norway; and in 1388 the Swedish nobles, disgusted with their king, Albert of Mecklenburg, offered her his crown, whereupon she invaded Sweden, and took Albert prisoner. She got her grand-nephew Eric of Pomerania crowned king of the three Scandinavian kingdoms (1396), the power remaining in her own hands. In 1397 the Union of Calmar stipulated that the three kingdoms should remain for ever under one king, each retaining its laws. See Life by M. Hill (1899).

Margaret of Anjou (1429-82), daughter of René of Anjou, in 1445 was married to Henry VI. (q.v.) of England. Owing to his weak intellect she was the virtual sovereign; and the war of 1449, in which Normandy was lost, was laid by the English to her charge. In the Wars of the Roses, Margaret, after a brave struggle of nearly twenty years, was finally defeated at Tewkesbury (1471), and lay in the Tower four years, till ransomed by Louis XI. She then retired to France, and died at the castle of Damperre near Saumur. See Life by Mrs Hookham (1872).

Margaret of Austria (1480-1580), daughter of Maximilian I., was twice married, to the Spanish Infante Juan and Duke Philibert II. of Savoy, both of whom died young; in 1507 she became the wise regent of the Netherlands. See French Lives by Altmeyer (1841) and Quinsonas (1860).

Margaret of Navarre (1492-1549), in her youth known as Marguerite d'Angoulême, was the sister of Francis I. of France. In 1509 she was married to the Duke of Alençon, who died in 1525; and in 1527 to Henri d'Albret, titular king of Navarre, to whom she bore Jeanne d'Albret, mother of the great Henry IV. She encouraged agriculture, the arts, and learning, and sheltered religious reformers like Marot. Her writings include Letters (ed. by Génin, 1843), poems entitled Les Marguerites de la Marguerite (ed. by Frank, 1873), and especially the famous Heptaméron des Nouvelles (1558; ed. by Leroux de Lincy, 5 vols. 1855; trans., with critical essay by Sainsbury, 1894). Modelled on Boccaccio, the Heptaméron reflects the strange combination of religious fervour with refined voluptuousness so characteristic of the time; Des Periers or other wits may have amended it a little. In 1895 were discovered in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris two dramas, letters, dialogues, and Le Navire and Les Prisons, written in the last four years of her life, many of them in mental anguish. See Lives by Durand (Paris, 1848), Miss Freer (Lond. 1854), Lotheisen (2d ed. Berl. 1885), and de la Ferrière (Par. 1891).

Margaret of Parma (1522-86), natural daughter of Charles V., married in 1536 Alessandro de' Medici, and in 1538 Ottavio Farnese, Duke of Parma and Piacenza, to whom she bore Alessandro Farnese. From 1559 to 1567 she was regent of the Netherlands, manly, masterful, able, a staunch Catholic. Her correspondence with Philip II. has been edited by Reiffenberg (1842) and Gachard (1867-81).

Margaret of Scotland (1424-44), poetess, eldest daughter of James I., in 1436 married at Tours the Dauphin Louis (Louis XI.), who hated and neglected her. See CHARTIER; and Jusserand's English Essays from a French Pen (1895).

Margaret of Valois (1553-1615) daughter of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici, in 1572 became the first wife of Henry IV. (q.v.) of France—a childless marriage, dissolved in 1599. See her Mémoires (trans. by Violet Fane 1892) and Life by Saint-Poncy (1887).

Margaret Tudor (1489-1541), eldest daughter of Henry VII., in 1503 married James IV. (q.v.) of Scotland, in 1514 Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, and, having divorced him, in 1527 Henry Stewart, Lord Methven. See vol. iv. of Mrs Green's Princesses of England.

Margaret, Lady. See BEAUFORT, MARGARET.

Margary, Augustus Raymond (1846-75), born, the son of an English officer, at Belgaum in Bombay, was educated in France, at North Walsham, and at University College, London, became a student-interpreter in China, where (1867-74) he served at Peking, in Formosa, at Shanghai, and at Chefoo. Sent to cross south-west China to meet a British mission from Burma, he made the journey successfully, but on the way back was murdered by Chinese at Manwein. See his Journey (1876).

Marheineke, Philipp Conrad (1780-1846), professor of Theology at Erlangen (1805), Heidelberg (1807), and Berlin (1811), represented orthodox Hegelianism. He wrote on dogmatics, Christian ethics, and the Reformation. [Mar-hi-nē-keh.]

Maria Christina (1806-78), daughter of Francis I., king of the Two Sicilies, and fourth wife of Ferdinand VII. of Spain, was left by Ferdinand at his death regent for their daughter Isabella II. A Carlist war broke out, but she seemed indifferent to everything except Don Fernando Muñoz, with whom she was united, in 1833, in a morganatic marriage. She bore him ten children. In 1836 she was forced to grant a constitution; in 1840 was driven to France, whence she returned in 1843. Her share in the schemes of Louis-Philippe as to the marriage of her daughters (Isabella and Maria Louisa, Duchess of Montpensier) in 1846, and her reactionary policy, made her hateful. In 1854 a revolution again drove her to France, where, except in 1864-68 (when she was in Spain), she afterwards lived; and she died at Havre.

Maria Louisa (1791-1847), daughter of Francis I. of Austria, was married to Napoleon in 1810 (after the divorce of Josephine), and in 1811 bore him a son, who was called King of Rome. On Napoleon's abdication, not being permitted to follow him into exile, she went with her son to Schönbrunn. In 1822 she contracted a morganatic marriage with Count von Neipperg. See Lives by Helfert (1873) and Imbert de Saint-Amant (Eng. trans. 1886), her Correspondance (1887), and the Mémoires of Mme. Durand, her maid of honour (1885).

Maria Theresa, empress, daughter of the Emperor Charles VI., was born at Vienna, 13th May 1717. By the 'Pragmatic Sanction,' for which the principal European powers became sureties, her father appointed her heir to his hereditary thrones. In 1736 she married Francis of Lorraine, afterwards Grand-duke of Tuscany; and at her father's death in 1740 she became queen of Hungary and of Bohemia, and Archduchess of Austria. At her accession the monarchy was exhausted, the people discontented, and the army weak; whilst Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, and Sardinia, abetted by France, put forward claims to her dominions. Frederick II. of Prussia claimed Silesia, and poured his armies into it; Spain demanded the Austrian dominions in Italy; and the Bavarians, assisted by the French, invaded Bohemia, the Elector of Bavaria being crowned emperor as Charles VII. (1742). The young queen was saved by the chivalrous fidelity of the Hungarians, supported by Britain. The war of the Austrian succession (1741-48) was terminated by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. The empress-queen lost Silesia to Prussia, Parma and Piacenza to Spain, and some Milanese districts to Sardinia, but her rights were admitted and her husband was recognised as emperor. Maria Theresa instituted financial reforms, fostered agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and nearly doubled the national revenues, while decreasing taxation. Marshal Daun reorganised her armies; Kánnitz (q.v.) took charge of foreign affairs. But the loss of Silesia rankled in her mind; and, with France as an ally, she renewed the contest with the Prussian king. But the issue of the Seven Years' War (1756-63) was to confirm Frederick in the possession of Silesia. After the peace the empress renewed her efforts to ameliorate the condition of the peasantry, mitigating the penal code, founding schools, and organising charitable societies; her son Joseph, after the death of her husband (1765), being associated with her in the government. She joined with Russia and Prussia in the first partition of Poland (1772), securing Galicia and Lodomeria; while from the Porte she obtained Bukowina (1777), and from Bavaria several districts. She died 29th November 1780. A woman of majestic figure and an undaunted spirit, she combined feminine tact with masculine energy; and not merely won the affection and even enthusiastic admiration of her subjects, but raised Austria from a wretched condition to a position of assured power. Although a zealous Roman Catholic, she sought to correct some of the worst abuses in the church. Of her ten surviving children, the eldest son, Joseph II., succeeded her; Leopold, Grand-duke of Tuscany, succeeded him as Leopold II.; Ferdinand became Duke of Modena; and Marie Antoinette was married to Louis XVI. of France. See Lives by Arneht (Vienna, 10 vols. 1863-79) and Dr Bright (1897); works by Duller, Ramsborn, and A. Wolff; Frederick the Great and Maria Theresa, by the Duc de Broglie (trans. 1883); and other works cited under FREDERICK II.

Mariana, Juan (1536-1624), Spanish historian, born at Talavera, taught in Jesuit colleges at Rome, in Sicily, and at Paris. His last years of ill-health he spent in literary labour at Toledo. His invaluable Historia de Rebus Hispaniæ (1592) he afterwards continued down to the accession of Charles V., in 1605; and his own Spanish translation (1601-9) is a classic. His Tractatus VII. Theologici et Historici (1609) roused the suspicion of the Inquisition. But his most celebrated work is the De Rege et Regis Institutione (1599), which answers affirmatively the question whether it be lawful to overthrow a tyrant, even if he is a lawful king. The tyrannicide doctrine brought much odium on the Jesuits, though propounded also by contemporary Protestants, and though condemned by Acquaviva, the general of the order.

Marianus Scotus (c. 1028-83), Irish chronicler, was a Benedictine monk at Cologne 1052-58, and then a recluse at Fulda and at Mainz. His Chronicon Universale, from the creation to 1082, was printed in 1559, 1601, and 1706, but first correctly by Waitz in Monumenta Germaniae.—Another MARIANUS SCORUS, also Irish, came to Bamberg in 1067, became a Benedictine, was founder and abbot of the monastery of St Peter's at Ratibon, and died about 1088. He was a great calligraphist, copied the whole Bible repeatedly, and left commentaries on Paul's Epistles and on the Psalms.

Marie Amélie, queen of Louis-Philippe (q.v.).

Marie Antoinette, JOSEPHÉ JEANNE, the ill-fated queen of France, was born 2d November 1755, the fourth daughter of Maria Theresa and the Emperor Francis I.; and was married to the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XVI., on 16th May 1770. The beautiful but ill-educated young dauphiness soon found her position full of difficulties, and the stiff and stately etiquette of the old French court wearied her to death. A mere child in years, married to a dull and decorous husband, she found relief in capricious recklessness and disregard for conventions. Her appearance at masked balls, her extravagance and undisguised love for the card-table, and her open favour to handsome and profligate young men were misread into shameless immoralities. In May 1774 the death of Louis XV. made her actual queen of France, and she soon deepened the dislike of her subjects by her devotion to the interests of Austria, as well as by her opposition to all the measures devised by Turgot and Necker for relieving the financial distress of the country. The miseries of France became identified with the extravagant pleasures of the queen, and in the affair of the Diamond Necklace (1784–86) her guilt was taken for granted. Meantime the joyous frivolity of the girl had changed into the courage and obstinacy of the woman who made herself a centre of opposition to all new ideas, and prompted the poor vacillating king into a retrograde policy to his own undoing. She was capable of strength rising to the heroic, and she possessed the power of inspiring enthusiasm. Amid the horrors of the march of women on Versailles (1789) she alone maintained her courage. But to the last she failed to understand the troublous times; and the indecision of Louis and his dread of civil war hampered her plans. She had an instinctive abhorrence of the liberal nobles like Lafayette and Mirabeau, but was at length prevailed on to make terms with Mirabeau (July 1790). But she was too self-willed and independent frankly to follow his advice, and his death in April 1791 removed the last hope of saving the monarchy. Less than three months later occurred the fatal flight to the frontier, intercepted at Varennes. The storming of the Tuileries and slaughter of the brave Swiss guards, the trial and execution of the king (21st January 1793), quickly followed, and ere long she herself was sent to the Conciergerie like a common criminal (2d August 1793). After eight weeks more of insult and brutality, the 'Widow Capet' was herself arraigned before the Revolutionary Tribunal. She bore herself with dignity and resignation. Her answers were short with the simplicity of truth. After two days and nights of questioning came the inevitable sentence, and on the same day, October 16, 1793, she died by the guillotine. See the Histories of the French Revolution by Thiers, Mignet, Michelet, Louis Blanc, Carlyle, Von Sybel, and H. Morse Stephens; works on her life or letters by Madame Campan (1823), de Lescure (1863), d'Hunolstein (1864), Feuillet des Conches (1865), C. D. Marie de France, a poetess who lived in England under Henry III., and translated into French from an English version of a Latin translation of the Greek the Ysopet, a collection of 103 moralised fables, in octosyllabic couplets. But her greatest work was the twelve (or fourteen) poetic narrative Lais, in octosyllabic verse (best ed. by Warnke, 1885; paraphrased by O'Shaughnessy as Lays of France, 1872).

Marie de' Medici (1573–1642), daughter of Francis I., Grand-duke of Tuscany, was married to Henry IV. of France in 1600, and gave birth to a son, afterwards Louis XIII., in 1601. She was an obstinate and passionate woman, greatly under the influence of favourites; and the murder of her husband (1610) did not greatly grieve her. She proved as worthless a regent (1610–17) as she had been a wife; and when (1617) young Louis XIII. assumed royal power the queen-mother was confined to her own house. She made her submission to her son in 1619. Failing to win over Richelieu, she tried to undermine his influence with the king, failed, was imprisoned, but escaped to Brussels in 1631. Her last years were spent in utter destitution, and she is said to have died in a hayloft at Cologne. See Life by Miss Pardoe (1852; new ed. 1902). [Ma-ree' day Meh'-di-chee.]

Mariette Pasha, AUGUSTE ÉDOUARD (1821–81), Egyptian explorer, was born at Boulogne, became French master at Stratford-on-Avon in 1839, and in 1840 a pattern-designer at Coventry, but after taking his degree at Donay (1841) was appointed professor at his own college of Boulogne. In 1849 he entered the Egyptian department of the Louvre, and in 1850 was despatched to Egypt, where he brought to light a host of important monuments and inscriptions in Memphis, Sak-kara, and Gizeh. In 1858 he was appointed Keeper of Monuments to the Egyptian government, and excavated the Sphinx, the temples of Dendera and Edfu, and made discoveries at Meydûm, Medinet Habu, Deyr-el-Bahri, Karnak, Abydos, and Tanis. He wrote Sérapéum et Memphis (1856–57), Aperçu de l'Histoire d'Égypte (1864), and a long series of beautifully illustrated works on the temples at Denderah, Karnak, &c. His Itinéraire de la Haute Égypte was translated by his brother (Monuments of Upper Egypt, 1877). He was raised to the rank of a pasha in 1879, and he died at Cairo. See monograph by Deselle (1882).

Marini, GIAMBATTISTA (1569–1625), an Italian poet who was born and died at Naples, was ducal secretary at Turin, and wrote his best work, the Adone (1622) at the court of France. See Lives by Vallauri (1865) and Menghini (1888). [Mar-ee'nee.]

Mario, GIUSEPPE (1808–83), tenor, by birth the Cavaliere di Candia and son of a general, was born at Cagliari, and served in the army, from which a youthful escapade made him withdraw. At Paris he quickly won his way into the most exclusive circles; but having contracted debts, he became first tenor of the Opera, changing his name to Mario. After two years' study he achieved a long series of operatic triumphs in Paris, London, St Petersburg, and America. By the famous singer Giulia Grisi (q.v.) he was the father of six daughters. He was much esteemed for liberality. After his retirement he lost his fortune through disastrous speculations. He died at Rome. See Engel's Musical Celebrities (1886). [Mah'-ree-o.] early in the 17th century, was prior of St Martinus-Beaune, and died at Paris, 12th May 1684. One of the earliest members of the Academy of Sciences, he wrote on percussion, air and its pressure, the movements of fluid bodies and of pendulums, colours, &c. What is on the Continent called Mariotte's Law is rather Boyle's Law (as to pressure and volume of gases).

Maris, JAKOB (1837-90), Dutch painter of landscape and genre, was born at the Hague, and studied there, at Antwerp, and 1866-71 in Paris, coming under the influence of Diaz, Corot, and Millet.—Two brothers, MATTHIJS (b. 1835) and WILLEM (1843-1910), are also famous as painters. Marius, CAIUS, born at Cereata, near Arpinum, 157 B.C., served with distinction at Numantia (134) under the younger Scipio Africanus, and in 119 was tribune of the plebs. In 114 he went to Spain as propretor. He now married Julia, the aunt of Cæsar. He served in Africa during the war against Jugurtha, and, elected consul in 105, closed the Jugurthine war in 106. Meanwhile an immense horde of Cimbri and Teutons had burst into Gaul, and repeatedly defeated the Roman forces. Marius, consul for the second, third, fourth, and fifth times (104-101), annihilated them after two years' fighting in a terrible two days' battle near Aix, in Provence, where 100,000 Teutons were slain; and turning to the Cimbri in north Italy, crushed them also near Vercellæ (101). Marius was declared the saviour of the state, the third founder of Rome, and was made consul for the sixth time in 100. When Sulla as consul was entrusted with the conduct of the Mithridatic war, Marius, insanely jealous of his patrician rival, attempted to deprive him of the command, and a civil war began (88). Marius was soon forced to flee, and after frightful hardships and hairbreadth escapes made his way to Africa. Here he remained until a rising of his friends took place under Cinna. He then hurried back to Italy, and, with Cinna, marched against Rome, which had to yield. Marius was delirious in his revenge upon the aristocracy: 4000 slaves carried on the work of murder for five days and nights. Marius and Cinna were elected consuls for the year 86, but Marius died a fortnight afterwards.

Mariiaux, PIERRE CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN DE (1688-1763), born at Paris of a good Norman family, published L'Honière Travesti, a burlesque of the Iliad, in 1716, and brought out his best comedy, Le Jeu de l'Amour et du Hasard in 1730. His romance of Marianne (11 parts, 1731-41) was never concluded by him; it is one of the best novels of the 18th century. His numerous comedies are the work of a clever analyst rather than a dramatist. His other romances, Pharamond and Le Paysan parvenu, are greatly inferior to Marianne. See works by Fleury (1881), Larroumet (1894), and Deschamps (1897). [Ma-ree-vo'.]

Mark, more fully, 'John, whose surname was Mark' (Acts, xii. 12, 25), is named by the oldest tradition as the author of the second canonical gospel. Mark accompanied Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey, but quitted them at Perga, was later reconciled with Paul, and, according to tradition, was the 'disciple and interpreter' of Peter in Rome. He is also said to have gone to Alexandria as preacher. In medieval art Mark is symbolised by the lion.

Mark Antony. See ANTONIUS.

Markham, Mrs. See PENROSE.

Markham, SIR CLEMENTS ROBERT, F.R.S., son of a canon of Windsor, was born 1830 at Stillingfleet near York, educated at Westminster, was in the navy 1844-51, and in 1855 became a clerk in the Board of Control. In 1863 he was elected secretary to the Royal Geographical Society, and in 1867-77 was in the India Office. He served in the Franklin search. He explored (1852-54) Peru, introduced (1860) cinchona culture from South America into India, and was geographer (1867-68) to the Abyssinian expedition. Besides works on Peru, Tibet, Persia, and the Abyssinian war, he wrote The Threshold of the Unknown Region (1874), Lives of Fairfax, the fighting Veres, Davis the navigator, Columbus (1892), &c. He edited the Geographical Magazine 1872-78, and in 1896 was created K.C.B.—His brother, SIR ALBERT HASTINGS MARKHAM, Arctic voyager and writer on polar research, &c., was born 11th November 1841, and rose to be rear-admiral in 1891.

Marks, HENRY STACY, painter of medieval and animal subjects, born in London, 13th Sept. 1829, entered the Royal Academy schools in 1851, and was elected A.R.A. in 1871, R.A. in 1879. He retired in 1896, and died 9th Jan. 1897.

Marlborough, JOHN CHURCHILL, DUKE OF, was born 24th June 1650, at the manor-house of Ashe in Devon, the son of an impoverished royalist. First a page to the Duke of York, he next secured an ensigncy in the Guards, and in 1667 was sent to Tangiers—perhaps on account of the king's jealousy of his favour with the Duchess of Cleveland, who presented him with £5000. Recalled to England, he was promoted to a captaincy, and was with Turenne at the reduction of the Dutch fortresses. Here his courage and ability—backed by the influence of his sister, Arabella, mistress of the Duke of York—gained him a colonelcy. His prosperity was further advanced by his clandestine marriage in 1675 with the imperious and beautiful Sarah Jennings. In 1682 he was created Baron Churchill of Eye-mouth in Scotland, in 1685 Baron Churchill in the English peerage. He helped to quell Monmouth's rebellion; but on the landing of the Prince of Orange he stole away to the invader, who showed his gratitude by creating him Earl of Marlborough. Notwithstanding his conspicuous service in Ireland, and in command of the troops employed against the French in the Netherlands in 1689-91, he fell into disfavour in 1692, and was dismissed from all his offices, being even imprisoned for ten days in the Tower on a false charge of plotting. On the death of Mary he was restored to the king's favour. Queen Anne gave him the command of the British army in the Netherlands in the war of the Spanish succession, and he was made a knight of the Garter, Commander-in-chief, and Master General of the Ordnance, while his lady (the queen's bosom friend) was appointed Groom of the Stole, Mistress of the Robes, and Keeper of the Privy Purse. Marlborough was regent in all but name. His wife governed the queen, and he himself directed Godolphin. As commander-in-chief of the combined English and Dutch forces, with a pay of £10,000, he made the campaign one long series of triumphs for the allies. In 1702, for driving the French out of Spanish Guelders, the reward was a dukedom and £5000 per annum 'from the post-office.' In 1704, supporting the emperor, and joining Prince Eugene of Savoy, he in July stormed the French and Bavarian lines at Donauwörth, and on 13th August gained the bloody victory of Blenheim, which stamped him the first general in Europe. Parliament gave him the estate of Woodstock, the queen caused Blenheim Park to be built for him, and the Emperor created him a prince of the Holy Roman Empire. On 23d May 1706 he broke the power of Louis XIV. at Ramillies; and in 1708 Vendôme's attempt to recover Flanders led to the defeat of Oudenarde (July 11) and the surrender of Lille and Ghent. Marlborough's fourth great victory at Malplaquet (11th Sept. 1709) did not bring about peace; and in 1711 he was afield again, taking town after town from the French, till the treaty of Utrecht gave thirty years of peace to Europe. Meanwhile the queen, tired of the tyranny exercised by the Duchess of Marlborough, dismissed Godolphin and Sunderland, and called to power Harley and the Tories. Thereupon a charge was preferred against Marlborough of having embezzled public money, and he was deprived of his offices till the accession of George I., when, in a day, he was restored to his honours. A stroke of apoplexy on 28th May 1716 impaired his speech, but did not preclude his attendance in parliament till within six months of his death—on 16th June 1722. His funeral obsequies in Westminster Abbey were celebrated with great magnificence. Charges of avarice and peculation have been brought against Marlborough, and it is certain that he thought more of his own interest than of the cause in which he was engaged. But he was generous in action, gentle in temper, a devoted husband, and a man of strong religious feelings.—His wife, SARAH JENNINGS, born at Holywell near St Albans, 29th May 1660, when in the service of the Duchess of York became the chosen friend of her step-daughter the Princess Anne. On Anne's accession the duchess's influence was almost boundless; the Whig ministry relied upon her support, and she disposed of places and offices at her pleasure. Her rule at last became unbearable, and she was superseded (1711) by her own cousin, Mrs Masham. For nearly a quarter of a century she survived her husband, living in complete retirement. She died on 29th October 1744, leaving a fortune of three millions. As the only son of the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough died in 1703 aged 17, the title passed to the eldest son of their second daughter. See the Memoirs by Coxe (1819), the short Life by Saintsbury (1885), and the Life by Lord Wolseley (2 vols. 1894).

Marlitt, E., the pseudonym of the German novelist EUGENIE JOHN (1825–87), who was born and died at Arnstadt in Thuringia, and who was compelled to leave the operatic stage at Vienna by an ear-ailment. From 1863 on she wrote a long series of romances and novels.

Marlowe, CHRISTOPHER, the greatest of Shakespeare's predecessors, was born, a shoemaker's son, at Canterbury, and baptised 26th February 1564. From the King's School there he was sent to Benet (now Corpus) College, Cambridge; how he employed himself after taking his B.A. in 1583 is not known. His Tamburlaine the Great, in two parts, was first printed in 1590, and probably produced in 1587. In spite of its bombast and violence it is infinitely superior to any tragedy that had yet appeared on the English stage. Earlier dramatists had employed blank verse, but it had been stiff and ungainly, and Marlowe was the first to discover its strength and variety. The Tragical History of Dr Faustus was probably produced soon after Tamburlaine; the earliest edition is dated 1604. Faustus is rather a series of detached scenes than a finished drama; some of these scenes are evidently not by Marlowe; but the nobler scenes are marvellously impressive. The Jew of Malta, produced after 1588, and first published in 1633, is a very unequal play. The first two acts are conducted with masterly skill and vigour; but the last three are absurdly extravagant, degenerating into vulgar caricature. Edward II., produced about 1590, is the maturest of Marlowe's plays. It has not the magnificent poetry that we find in Faustus and in the first two acts of The Jew of Malta, but it is planned and executed with more firmness and solidity. The various characters are skillfully discriminated, and the action is never allowed to flag. Many critics have preferred it to Shakespeare's Richard II.; it is certainly no whit inferior. The Massacre at Paris, the weakest of Marlowe's plays, has descended in a mutilated state. It was written after the assassination of Henry III. of France (2d August 1589), and was probably one of the latest plays. The Tragedy of Dido (1594), left probably in a fragmentary state by Marlowe and finished by Nash, is of slight value. Marlowe had doubtless a hand in the three parts of Henry VI., and probably in Titus Andronicus. A wild, shapeless tragedy, Lust's Dominion (1657), may have been adapted from one of Marlowe's lost plays. The unfinished poem, Hero and Leander, composed in heroic couplets of consummate beauty, was first published in 1598; a second edition, with Chapman's continuation, followed the same year. Shakespeare quoted in As You Like It the line, 'Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?' and feelingly apostrophised the poet as 'Dead Shepherd.' Marlowe's translations of Ovid's Amores and of the first book of Lucan's Pharsalia add nothing to his fame. The pastoral ditty, 'Come, live with me and be my love,' to which Sir Walter Raleigh wrote an Answer, was imitated, but not equalled, by Herrick, Donne, and others. It was first printed in The Passionate Pilgrim (1599), without the fourth and sixth stanzas, with the author's name, 'C. Marlowe,' subscribed. Another anthology, Allot's England's Parnassus (1600), preserves a fragment by Marlowe, beginning 'I walked along a stream for pureness rare.' Marlowe led an irregular life, and in May 1593, at the age of twenty-nine, he met a violent death in a quarrel (about a courtesan, it is stated) with one Francis Archer, a serving-man. In tragedy he prepared the way for Shakespeare, on whose early work his influence is firmly stamped. See the editions by Dyce (1850 and 1858), Cunningham (1872), Bullen (1888), and Tucker-Brooke (1910). The best plays are in the 'Mermaid' series (ed. Havelock Ellis, 1887), Dr Faustus was elaborately edited by Ward, and Tamburlaine by Wagner (1885). See the monograph by J. H. Ingram (1904).

Marmion, SHACKERLEY (1603–39), minor dramatist, was born at Aynho, Northamptonshire, studied at Wadham College, Oxford, squandered his fortune, and fought in the Low Countries. He left behind an epic, Cupid and Psyche, and three comedies, Holland's Leaguer, A Fine Companion, and The Antiquary. The Marmions of Scrivelsby, long the hereditary champions at English coronations, came in with the Conqueror, but became extinct under Edward I.

Marmont, AUGUSTE FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS VIESSE DE, Marshal of France, was born 20th July 1774 at Châtillon-sur-Seine, went with Napoleon to Italy, and fought at Lodi, in Egypt, and at Marengo. He was sent to Dalmatia in 1805, defeated the Russians there, and was made Duke of Ragusa. In 1809 he was entrusted at Wagram with the pursuit of the enemy, won the battle of Znaim, and earned a marshal's baton. He was next governor of the Illyrian provinces, and in 1811 succeeded Massena in Portugal. A severe wound at Salamanca compelled him to retire to France. In 1813 he fought at Lützen, Bautzen, and Dresden, and maintained the contest in France in 1814 till further resistance was hopeless, when he concluded a truce with the Russians, which compelled Napoleon to abdicate, and earned Marmont from the Bonapartists the title of the traitor. The Bourbons loaded him with honours. At the Revolution of 1830 he endeavoured to reduce Paris to submission, and finally retreating with a few faithful battalions, conducted Charles X. across the frontier. Thenceforward he resided chiefly in Vienna or in Venice, and there he died, 2d March 1852. See his Esprit des Institutions Militaires (1845) and his Mémoires (9 vols. 1856-57). [Mar-mont'.]

Marmontel, JEAN FRANÇOIS (1723-99), author, was born at Bort in the Limousin, and studied in a Jesuit college. Settling in Paris in 1745 by advice of Voltaire, he wrote successful tragedies and operas, and in 1753 got a secretaryship at Versailles through Madame de Pompadour. In the official journal, Le Mercure, now under his charge, he began his oft-translated Contes Moraux (1761). Elected to the Academy in 1763, he became its secretary in 1783, as well as Historiographer of France. His most celebrated work was Bélisaire, a dull and wordy political romance, containing a chapter on toleration which excited furious hostility. His uncritical Éléments de Littérature (1787) consist of his contributions to the Encyclopédie. See his Mémoires (1805), and Prof. Saintsbury's edition of the Moral Tales (1895).

Marnix, PHILIP VAN (1538-98), Lord of St Aldegonde, born at Brussels, studied under Calvin and Beza at Geneva, and at home was active in the Reformation, and in 1566 in the revolt against Spain. An intimate friend of William of Orange, he represented him at the first meeting of the Estates of the United Provinces, held at Dort in 1572, and was sent on special missions to the courts of France and England. As burgomaster of Antwerp, he defended the city thirteen months against the Spaniards; but having then capitulated, he incurred so much ill-will that he retired from public life. From his pen came the patriotic Wilhelmus song; the prose satire, The Roman Beehive (1569); a metrical translation of the Psalms (1580); and part of a prose translation of the Bible. See Lives in Dutch by Broes (1840) and Frédéricq (1882), and in French by Juste (1856).

Maro. See VIRGIL.

Marochetti, CARLO, BARON, sculptor, born at Turin in 1805, and trained at Paris and in Rome, settled at Paris, and at the revolution of 1848 came to London, where he produced many fine statues (Queen Victoria, Cour-de-Lion, &c.). He died at Passy, 29th Dec. 1867. [Ma-ro-ket'lee.]

Marot, CLÉMENT, poet, born at Cahors about 1496, entered the service of the Princess Margaret, afterwards Queen of Navarre. He was wounded at the battle of Pavia in 1525, and soon after imprisoned on a charge of heresy, but liberated next spring. He made many enemies by his witty satires, and in 1535 fled first to the court of the Queen of Navarre, and later to that of the Duchess of Ferrara. He returned to Paris in 1536, and in 1538 began to translate the Psalms, which, in their French dress and sung to secular airs, helped to make the new views fashionable; but the part published in 1541 having been condemned by the Sorbonne, he had again to flee in 1543. He made his way to Geneva, but, finding Calvin's company uncongenial, went on to Turin, where he died in 1544. His poems consist of elegies, epistles, rondeaus, ballads, sonnets, madrigals, epigrams, nonsense verses, and longer pieces; his special gift lay in badinage and graceful satire. Probably, like many of his friends, he had no very definite theological beliefs. See Œuvres Complètes (4 vols. 1873-75), and Guiffrey's edition (1876-90); Œuvres Choiesies (1826); Life by Vitet (1868); and Douen's Clément Marot et le Psautier Huguenot (1879).

Marioza, a Roman lady of noble birth, but of infamous reputation, was thrice married, the mistress of Pope Sergius III., and mother and grandmother of three popes (John XI., John XII., and Leo VII.). She had influence enough to secure the deposition of Pope John X., her mother's lover, and the election of her own son, John XI. She died in prison at Rome in 938.

Marriott, CHARLES (1811-58), Tractarian, born at Church Lawford, Rugby, became a fellow of Oriel (1833). See Burgon's Twelve Good Men (1888).

Marryat, FREDERICK, born in Westminster, 10th July 1792, the son of an M.P., in 1806 sailed as midshipman under Lord Cochrane, and spent some years of dangerous service off the French and Spanish coasts and in the Mediterranean. After visiting West Indian waters, he cruised as Lieutenant (1812-15) on the north coast of South America, and was twice invalidated home. Now a commander, he had command of a sloop cruising off St Helena to guard against the escape of Napoleon (1820-21); he also did good work in suppressing the Channel smugglers, and some hard fighting in Burmese rivers. On his return to England (1826) he was made C.B., and was given the command of the Ariadne (1828). He resigned in 1830, and thenceforth led the life of a man of letters. Frank Mildmay, his first novel, appeared in 1829, and the King's Own in 1830. In 1832-35 he was editor of the Metropolitan Magazine, to which he contributed Newton Forster (1832), Peter Simple (1833), Jacob Faithful, Japhet in Search of a Father, and Mr Midshipman Easy (1834). Snarley-ow and The Pasha of Many Tales came out in 1836, and in 1837 Marryat set out for a tour through the United States, where he wrote The Phantom Ship (1839) and a drama, The Ocean Waif. He received £1200 for Mr Midshipman Easy and £1600 for his Diary in America (1839), but was extravagant and unlucky in his speculations, and at last was deeply embarrassed. Poor Jack, Masterman Ready, The Poacher, and Percival Keene appeared before he settled (1843) on his small farm of Langham, Norfolk, where he spent his days in farming and in writing stories for children, including Settlers in Canada, The Mission, The Privateer's Man, and the Children of the New Forest (Valerie was only partly Marryat's; and Rattlin the Reefer was written by E. Howard). He died at Langham, 9th August 1848. For improvements in signalling, &c., he had been made F.R.S. (1819) and a member of the Legion of Honour (1833). As a writer of sea-stories Marryat has no superior; his sea-fights, his chases and cutting-out expeditions, are told with irresistible gusto. See the Life and Letters by his daughter (1872) and Life by Hannay (1889).—That daughter, FLORENCE (1838-99), successively Mrs Ross Church and Mrs Lean, was born at Brighton, and from 1865 published about eighty novels, besides a drama and many articles in periodicals. She edited London Society (1872-76).

Marschner, HEINRICH (1795-1861), operatic composer, born at Zittau, died at Hanover.

Marsh, GEORGE PERKINS (1801-99), diplomatist and philologist, was born at Woodstock, Vermont; studied law; was elected to congress in 1842; and was U.S. minister to Turkey (1849-53) and Italy (1861-82). He was made LL.D. of Harvard in 1859. He died at Vallombrosa in Italy, July 23, 1882. He wrote Lectures on the English Language (1861), Origin and History of English (1862), Man and Nature (1864; largely recast, 1874), &c. See Life by his widow (1888).

Marsh, Mrs, née ANNE CALDWELL (1791-1874), born at Linley Wood, Staffordshire, married in 1817 the junior partner of the forger Fauntleroy; and in 1834-57 produced a score of novels—the best Two Old Men's Tales, Emilia Wyndham (1846; new ed. 1888), and Norman's Bridge. In 1858 she succeeded a brother in the Linley Wood property, and resumed the name Caldwell.

Marsh, OTHNIEL CHARLES, LL. D., Ph. D., palæontologist, born at Lockport, N.Y., 29th Oct. 1831, studied at Yale, at New Haven, and in Germany, and became first professor of Palæontology at Yale 1866. He discovered (mainly in the Rocky Mountains) over a thousand new species of extinct American vertebrates, and described them in monographs (published by government) on Odontornithes (1880), Dinocerata (1884), Sauropoda (1888), &c. He died 18th March 1899.

Marshall, ALFRED, economist, born in London, 26th July 1842, and educated at Merchant Taylors' and St John's, Cambridge, became a fellow (1865), principal of University College, Bristol (1877), lecturer on political economy at Balliol (1883), and professor of Political Economy at Cambridge (in succession to Fawcett, 1885). Of his works, his Principles of Economics (1890) is the best known.

Marshall, JOHN (1755-1835), born in Fauquier county, Virginia, was studying law when the Revolution began. He served as an officer 1775-79, in 1781 settled down to his profession, and soon rose to be head of the Virginia bar. In 1788 he was elected to the state convention, which adopted the new United States constitution. In 1797 he and his fellow-envoys to France indignantly declined Talleyrand's overtures for a loan. In 1799 he was elected to congress; in 1800-1 he was Secretary of State; and from 1801 he was Chief-justice of the United States. His decisions are a standard authority on constitutional law; a selection was published at Boston in 1839. He wrote a Life of Washington (1807; new ed. 1832). See monograph by Magruder (1885).

Marshall, WILLIAM CALDER (1813-94), sculptor, was born in Edinburgh, and trained under Chantrey. He became A.R.S.A. in 1842, A.R.A. in 1844, and R.A. in 1852.

Marshman, JOSHUA, D. D. (1768-1837), orientalist, born at Westbury Leigh, Wilts, had been a bookseller's apprentice, a weaver, and a schoolmaster, when in 1799 he went as a Baptist missionary to Serampur, where he died.—His son, JOHN CLARK MARSHMAN (1794-1877), made much by publishing, and spent much on native education, returning to England in 1852. He wrote History of India (1842; 5th ed. 1860), Life and Times of the Serampore Missionaries (1859), &c.

Marston, JOHN WESTLAND, LL. D., dramatic poet, born at Boston, 30th January 1820, gave up law for literature; and in 1842 his Patrician's Daughter was brought out at Drury Lane by Macready. It was the most successful of more than a dozen plays (Strathmore, Philip of France, &c.), collected, with his poems, in 1876, all Sheridan-Knowlesian, and all forgotten. He wrote a novel (1860), a good book on Our Recent Actors (1888), and a mass of poetic criticism; and died in London, 5th January 1890.—His son, PHILIP BOURKE MARSTON, the blind poet, was born in London, 13th August 1850, and died there on 14th February 1887. His life was a series of losses—of eyesight at three, and afterwards of his sister, his promised bride, and his two dear friends, Oliver Madox-Brown and Rossetti. His memory will survive through his friendships with Rossetti, Watts-Dunton, and Swinburne rather than through his sonnets and lyrics—exquisite some of them, but too sad for a world that sees. Song-tide, All in All, and Wind Voices were the three volumes of poetry he published between 1870 and 1883; to a posthumous collection of his stories (1887) is prefixed a memoir by Mr W. Sharp.

Marston, JOHN, dramatist and satirist, a son of John Marston of Gayton in Salop, by his wife, daughter of an Italian surgeon, was born about 1575, probably at Coventry, and studied at Brasenose, Oxford. Except The Insatiate Countess (which is of doubtful authorship), all his plays were published between 1602 and 1607. He then gave up play-writing, and in 1616 was presented to the living of Christ Church, Hampshire, which he resigned in 1631. He died 25th June 1634 in London. His first work was The Metamorphosis of Pigmalion's Image: and Certain Satires (1598). The licentious poem was condemned by Archbishop Whitgift. Another series of unepoch and obscure satires, The Scourge of Villany, appeared in the same year. Two gloomy and ill-constructed tragedies, Antonio and Mellida and Antonio's Revenge, were published in 1602; they contain passages of striking power, and a deal of intolerable fustian. The Malcontent (1604), more skilfully constructed, was dedicated to Ben Jonson, between whom and Marston there were many quarrels and reconciliations. The Dutch Courtezan (1605) is full of life and spirit; Eastward Ho (1605), written in conjunction with Chapman and Jonson, is far more genial than any comedy which Marston wrote single-handed. For some reflections on the Scots the authors were committed to prison. Parasitaster, or the Fawn (1606), in spite of occasional tediousness, is an attractive comedy; but Sophonisba (1606) appeals us with its horrors. What You Will (1607) has many flings at Ben Jonson. The rich and graceful poetry scattered through The Insatiate Countess (1613) is unlike anything that we find in Marston's undoubted works. Probably Marston left the play unfinished when he took orders, and William Barkstead took it in hand. An indifferent anonymous comedy, Jack Drum's Entertainment (1600), may be assigned to Marston; and he appears to have had some share in another poor play, Histriomastix. See the editions by Halliwell-Phillipps (1856) and A. H. Bullen (1887).

Martel, CHARLES. See CHARLES MARTEL.

Martel de Janville, COMTESSE DE. See GYP.

Marten, HARRY (1602-80), regicide, elder son of the civilian, Sir Henry Marten (c. 1562-1641), was born and educated at Oxford. He was a prominent member of the Long Parliament, but was expelled from it 1643-46 as an extremist, and fought meantime in the great Rebellion. He sat on Charles I.'s trial, led an immoral life and fell into debt, had his life spared at the Restoration, but died still a prisoner at Chepstow. See Forster's Lives of British Statesmen (vol. iv. 1837).

Martensen, HANS LASSEN (1308-84), metropolitan of Denmark, became professor of Philosophy at Copenhagen, and in 1845 court-preacher also. In 1840 he published a monograph on Meister Eckhart, and in 1849 the conservative Lutheran Christian Dogmatics (trans. 1866). This gained him in 1854 the primacy, but provoked a powerful attack by Kierkegaard. His Christian Ethics (1871-78; trans. 1881-82) made his influence more dominant than ever. See his Autobiography (1883; Ger. trans. 2d ed. 1891).

Martial. Marcus Valerius Martialis, Latin poet and epigrammatist, was born 1st March 38 or 41 A.D., in Celtiberian Spain, at Bilbilis, a steel factory and centre of Roman culture. At Rome (64 A.D.) he became a client of the influential Spanish house of the Senecas, through which he found a patron in L. Calpurnius Piso. The tragic failure of the Pisonian plot lost Martial his warmest friends—Lucan and Seneca. He courted imperial and senatorial patronage by his vers de circonstance. When (80 A.D.) Titus dedicated the Colosseum, Martial's epigrams brought him equestrian rank; his flattery of Domitian was gross and venal. By degrees the capital became irksome to him; he suffered from pecuniary embarrassment; advancing years bereft him of Domitian and his friends of the palace. In a fit of home-sickness he borrowed from his admirer, the younger Pliny, the means of returning to Bilbilis. Here again his good genius found him patrons—among them Marcella, who presented him with an estate, on which he led an idyllic life, though even here we find him fretting for the joys of life in Rome. He died, at latest, in 104. Much of his best work, unfortunately, is his least pure. If, however, we excise 150 epigrams from the 1172 of the first twelve books, his writings are free from licentiousness. His genius and skill in verse it were hard to over-estimate. See the edition of Martial by Friedländer (1886).

Martin, the name of five popes.—MARTIN I., a Tuscan, became pope in 649, held the first Lateran Council (against the Monothelites), and was banished by Constans II. in 653 to the Crimea, where he died in 655.—MARTIN II. was pope 883-884.—MARTIN III. in 942-946.—MARTIN IV. (c. 1210-85), a native of Brie in Touraine, elected pope in 1281, was a mere tool of Charles of Anjou.—MARTIN V., the pontiff in whose election the Western Schism was finally extinguished, was a Colonna, and was elected in 1417 during the Council of Constance, over whose remaining sessions he presided. He died suddenly in 1431, just after the opening of the Council of Basel.

Martin, ST (c. 316-400), Bishop of Tours, was born, a military tribune's son, at Sabaria in Pannonia, was educated at Pavia, and served in the army under Constantine and Julian. He became a disciple of Hilary of Poitiers, and, returning to Pannonia, was so persecuted by the Arian party that he removed first to Italy, then to Gaul, where about 360 he founded a monastery near Poitiers; but in 375 he was drawn by force from his retreat, and made Bishop of Tours. The fame of his sanctity and his repute as a worker of miracles attracted crowds of visitants; and to avoid distraction he established the monastery of Marmoutier near Tours, in which he himself resided. His Life by his contemporary, Sulpicius Severus, teems with miraculous legends. See books by Reinkens (Gera, 3d ed. 1876), Chamard (Poitiers, 1873), J. G. Cazenove (St Hilary and St Martin, 1883), and H. H. Scullard's Martin of Tours (1891).

Martin, BON LOUIS HENRI, historian, was born at St Quentin, 20th February 1810, and educated for a notary. Wolfthurm (1830) was followed by three other historical romances treating of the period of the Fronde. He next joined Paul Lacroix, the 'Bibliophile Jacob,' in his vast project for a History of France in 48 vols. of extracts from old histories and chronicles. He published the first volume in 1833, and henceforward toiled alone at the work, which was completed on a reduced scale in 1836. He now set himself to his great Histoire de France (15 vols. 1833-36). A third and much improved edition (19 vols. 1837-54) earned the Gobert prize; the fourth (17 vols. 1855-60) was awarded by the Institute in 1869 the great prize of 20,000 francs. This magnificent work comes down only to 1789; its continuation forms the less admirable Histoire de France Moderne (2d ed. 5 vols. 1878-85). Martin was chosen deputy for Aisne in 1871, senator in 1876, and a member of the Academy in 1878. He also wrote Histoire de Soissons (1837), Daniel Manin (1859), Jeanne d'Arc (1872), &c.; and died at Paris, 14th December 1883. As sensitive to the romantic as Michelet, he kept his imagination in check by his learning, solid sense, and respect for documents. His great History is beyond doubt the best work dealing in detail with the history of France as a whole. See Life by Hanotaux (1885), Mulot's Souvenirs Intimes (1885), and Jules Simon's Mignet, Michelet, Henri Martin (1889).

Martin, JOHN, painter, was born at Haydon Bridge near Hexham, 19th July 1789. After a struggling youth in London (from 1806) as an heraldic and enamel painter, he in 1812 exhibited at the Royal Academy the first of his sixteen 'sublime' works, displaying 'immeasurable spaces, innumerable multitudines, and gorgeous prodigies of architecture and landscape.' Their memory is kept lurid by the coloured engravings of the 'Fall of Babylon' (1819), 'Belshazzar's Feast' (1821), 'The Deluge' (1826), &c. He died at Douglas, Isle of Man, 17th February 1854.—His brother, JONATHAN (1782-1838), in a fit of insanity fired York Minster, 1st February 1829.

Martin, MARTIN, a Skye factor, who took his M.D. at Leyden, and died in London in 1719. He wrote Voyage to St Kilda (1698) and A Description of the Western Isles of Scotland (1703).

Martin, SIR THEODORE, born in Edinburgh, 16th September 1816, was educated there at the High School and university, and in 1846 settling in London, became a prosperous parliamentary solicitor. Among his earliest writings were the well-known Bon Gaultier Ballads (1855), written in conjunction with Professor Aytoun. This was followed by verse translations from Goethe, Henrik Hertz, and Oehlenschläger; also Horace's Odes (1860), his whole works (1882), Catullus (1861), the Vita Nuova of Dante (1862), Faust (1865-86), and Heine's Poems and Ballads (1878). In 1863 he issued a volume of poems, and in 1870 an admirable little book on Horace. In 1875 he was made C.B., in 1880 K.C.B. and Lord Rector of St Andrews. He died 18th August 1909. He wrote Lives of Aytoun (1867), the Prince Consort (5 vols. 1874-80), Lord Lyndhurst (1883), the Princess Alice (1885), and his wife (1900), well known as the actress, Helen Faucit, who, born 11th Oct. 1820, made her debut as Julia in the Hunchback at Covent Garden, 5th Jan. 1836. See took a leading part in Macready's Shakespearian revivals, in the first representation of Lytton's plays, and in Browning's Blot in the Scutcheon and Stratford. As an interpreter of Shakespear's heroines, she stood first among the actresses of her day. On her marriage in 1851 she left the stage. In 1855 she published On Some of Shakespear's Female Characters. She died at Llangollen, 31st Oct. 1898.

Martin, THOMAS (1697-1771), 'honest Tom Martin of Palgrave', antiquary, was born at Thetford, and was by calling a lawyer.

Martin, WILLIAM (1801-67), author as 'Peter Parley,' 'Chatty Cheerful,' &c., of over forty boys' books, was born and died at Woodbridge.

Martineau, HARRIET, born at Norwich, 12th June 1802, in 1821 wrote her first article for the (Unitarian) Monthly Repository, and next produced Devotional Exercises and short stories about machinery and wages. In 1829 the failure of the house in which she, her mother, and sisters had placed their money obliged her to earn her living. In 1830 she wrote Traditions of Palestine, and gained three prizes with three Theological Essays for the Unitarian Association. In 1832 she became a 'lion' and a successful authoress through Illustrations of Political Economy (repeatedly refused by publishers), and settled in London. After a visit to America (1834-36) she published Society in America and a novel, Deerbrook, in 1839. As an invalid (1839-44) at Tynemouth she wrote The Hour and the Man and Life in the Sick-room. She recovered through mesmerism (her subsequent belief in which alienated many friends), and fixed her abode at Ambleside in 1845, the year of Forest and Game-law Tales; after visiting Egypt and Palestine she issued Eastern Life (1848). In 1849 she completed (in a 'philosophical radical' spirit) Knight's History of the Thirty Years' Peace; in 1851, in conjunction with Mr H. G. Atkinson, she published Letters on the Laws of Man's Social Nature (so agnostic as to give much offence); and in 1853 she translated and condensed Comte's Philosophie Positive. She also wrote Household Education, Biographical Sketches, and much for the daily and weekly press and the larger reviews. Always delicate, and after 1820 very deaf, she died 27th June 1876, and was buried at Birmingham. See her Autobiography (1877).

Martineau, JAMES, theologian, brother of the preceding, was born at Norwich, 21st April 1805. He was educated at the grammar-school there and under Dr Lant Carpenter at Bristol, and had been a Unitarian minister at Dublin and Liverpool, when in 1841 he was appointed professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy at Manchester New College. He removed to London when that institution was transferred thither in 1857, becoming also a pastor in Little Portland Street Chapel. He was principal of the college 1868-85. As one of the profoundest thinkers and most effective writers of his day, he received degrees from Harvard, Leyden, and Edinburgh; and on his 90th birthday (1895) was presented with an address from a very wide circle of disciples and admirers. His works include The Rationale of Religious Inquiry (1836), Hymns for the Christian Church and Home (1840), Endeavours after the Christian Life (1843-47), Miscellanies (1852), Studies of Christianity (1858), Hymns of Praise and Prayer (1874), Hours of Thought on Sacred Things (1876-80), A Study of Spinoza (1882), Types of Ethical Theory (1885), A Study of Religion (1888), The Seat of Authority in Religion (1890), and Studies, Reviews, and Addresses (1891). He died 10th January 1900. See his Life and Letters by Drummond and Upton (1902), and the shorter work by Estlin Carpenter (1905).

Martinez Campos, ARSENIO (1834-1900), Spanish general, put down a Cuban rebellion in 1877, and was minister of war, but failing to end another Cuban rebellion, was recalled (1896).

Martini, FREDERICK (1832-97), a Hungarian by birth and Swiss by adoption, served as engineer officer in the Austrian army in the Italian war of 1859, and establishing machine-works at Frauenfeld in Switzerland, invented the breech-action, which, with the Henry barrel, constituted the Martini-Henry rifle (1871). He was a lyric poet.

Martius, CARL FRIEDRICH PHILIPP VON (1749-1868), naturalist, born at Erlangen, studied medicine there, and in 1817-20 made important researches in Brazil, described in books on the journey and on the plants, aborigines, and languages of the country. He was professor of Botany (1826-64) at Munich, where he died.

Martyr, HENRY, missionary, born at Truro, February 18, 1781, graduated from St John's College, Cambridge, as senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman in 1801, and in 1802 became a fellow. Through the influence of Charles Simeon he sailed in 1805 for India as a chaplain under the Company. He was stationed successively near Serampore, at Dinapore, and at Cawnpore, and greatly overtaxed his strength. He translated the New Testament into Hindustani, Hindi, and Persian, as well as the Prayer-book into Hindustani and the Psalms into Persian; and after a missionary journey in Persia, died of fever at Tokat in Asia Minor, 16th Oct. 1812. See Journals and Letters (1837), and Lives by Sargent (1819; new ed. 1885) and G. Smith (1892).

Marvell, ANDREW, born March 31, 1621, at Winstead rectory, S.E. Yorkshire, and educated at Hull and Trinity College, Cambridge, travelled (1642-46) in Holland, France, Italy, and Spain. Lord Fairfax in 1650 engaged him as tutor to his daughter. At Fairfax's Yorkshire seat, Nun Appleton, Marvell wrote his topographical poems, pastorals, and 'Mower Songs,' as well as the garden poems upon which his fame as a nature poet chiefly rests. To his next period belong the magnificent 'Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland,' and other poems glowing with admiration of Cromwell's character and work. Milton in February 1653 recommended him (at first without effect) to Bradshaw as assistant Latin secretary. In July Cromwell appointed him tutor to his ward, William Dutton; and in 1657 he became Milton's assistant, in January 1659 took his seat in Richard Cromwell's parliament as member for Hull, for which he was returned again in 1660 and 1661. In 1663-65 he accompanied Lord Carlisle as secretary to the embassy to Muscovy, Sweden, and Denmark, but the rest of his life was devoted to his parliamentary duties, doing battle against intolerance and arbitrary government. His republicanism was less the outcome of abstract theory than of experience. He accepted the Restoration without ceasing to praise Cromwell. His writings show him willing to give Charles II, a fair chance, but convinced at last that the Stuarts must go. His last satires are a call to arms against monarchy. Though circulated in manuscript only, they were believed to endanger his life. He died August 18, 1678, through the stubborn ignorance of his physician—a baseless rumour suggested poison. Marvell's works are divided by the Restoration into two very distinct groups. After 1660 his pen was given up to politics, except when his friendship for Milton drew from him the lines prefixed to the second edition of Paradise Lost. In 1672-73 he wrote the Rehearsal Transposed against religious intolerance; and in 1676 a similar work, Mr Smirke, or the Divine in Mode, to which he added an Historical Essay on General Councils. In 1677 his most important tractate, the Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government, was printed at 'Amsterdam'; and in 1678 his defence of the Nonconformist John Howe. As a poet Marvell belongs to the pre-Restoration period. 'A witty delicacy,' in Lamb's phrase, and a genuine enjoyment of nature and of gardens mark his poetry; Birrell recognises his 'glorious moments' and 'lovely stanzas'; and Canon Beeching protests against his being put below Cowley or Waller as a master of the art. There was an (incomplete) edition of the works in 1726, a very complete one by Grosart (4 vols.) in 1872-75, and one (verse only) by Aitken in 1892. See Birrell's Marvell (1905), and Poscher's Marvell's Poetische Werke (1908).

MARVIN, CHARLES (1854-90), born at Plumstead, spent much of his youth in Russia, and in 1875-78 was a copyist in the Foreign Office, but was discharged and prosecuted for disclosing to the Globe an Anglo-Russian agreement. He repeatedly went to Russia as a newspaper correspondent. He wrote a series of Russophobic books and pamphlets on the Russians in Central Asia (e.g. Merv, 1881), and on Russia's petroleum supplies.

MARX, KARL, the founder of international socialism, was born at Trèves, 5th May 1818. His father was a lawyer of Jewish extraction (the name being originally Mordechai), and young Marx was sent to Bonn and Berlin to study law, but seems to have turned to history and philosophy. He was apparently a disciple of Hegel; for a time proposed to settle at Bonn as a lecturer on philosophy; but in 1842 became editor of the democratic Rhenish Gazette. Convinced that his economic knowledge required enlarging, after his marriage he proceeded in 1843 to Paris, the headquarters of revolutionary economics. In the Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher (Paris, 1843) and Vorwärts (1844) he entered on that course of literary activity which, varied by agitation, constituted the work of his life. Expelled from France in 1845, he settled in Brussels, where he wrote his attack on Proudhon's Philosophie de la Misère, entitled Misère de la Philosophie. But his chief work at Brussels was the reorganising, along with Engels, of the Communist League, for which he wrote the famous Manifesto (1848). He took an active part in the revolutionary movement on the Rhine, and after its failure finally settled in London in 1849. Here at the British Museum he acquired his marvellous knowledge of economic literature and of the economic development of modern Europe. The firstfruits of his labour appeared in Zur Kritik der politischen Oekonomie (1859), whose theories were carried forward into vol. i. of his Kapital (1867). Before that year Marx had, in 1864, resumed his work as agitator. He had the foremost part in founding and directing the International Working-men's Association—usually called the International, for some years a great socialist organisation, which in 1873 split into two parties, one anarchist; and after Lassalle's death he won practical control of the social-democratic movement in Germany. He died in London, 14th March 1883. Marx was a man of extraordinary knowledge, which he handled with masterly skill. Incomparably more than any other man he has influenced the labour movement all over the civilised world; his theories have in a thousand ways penetrated the different strata of society, but most of all the working-classes. The development of capitalism, he thinks, depends on the appropriation and accumulation of surplus value. The poor sell their labour for a wage which represents the average subsistence required to continue the supply of labour. Their labour, however, when utilised by the capitalist, produces a value greater than their wage—Marx's surplus value; and the history of modern society is a history of the antagonism of the capitalist class, who absorb surplus value, and of the proletariat, who produce it. Marx's aim is not to propound utopian schemes, nor even to offer programmes of social reform, but to elucidate an historical process which is inevitable, to make it clear to the consciousness of the class most profoundly interested (the proletariat), and as far as possible to shorten and alleviate the pangs of travail of the new era, which in any case will come to the birth when its time is fulfilled. A third edition of Kapital, vol. i., appeared in 1883; vols. ii.-iii. were edited by Fr. Engels in 1885-95. See Dr Aveling's Student's Marx (1892), a refutation by Bauwerk (tr. 1898), and a book by Spargo (1911).

Mary (Heb. Miriam, Gr. Maria), the Blessed Virgin, the mother of our Lord. The genealogy of Jesus in St Matthew is traced through Joseph; and it is assumed that Mary was of the same family; the genealogy in St Luke is held to be that of Mary. The incidents in her personal history will be found in Matt. i., ii., xii.; Luke, i. ii.; John, ii., xix.; and Acts, i. The apocryphal gospels contain unauthentic particulars. The date of her death is often given as 63 A.D.; the tradition of her having been assumed into heaven is celebrated in the festival of the Assumption.

Mary I., queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by his first wife, Catharine of Aragon, was born at Greenwich, 18th February 1516. She was well educated, a good linguist, fond of music, devoted to her mother, and devoted to her church. With the divorce of her mother her troubles began. Henry forced her to sign a declaration that her mother's marriage had been unlawful. During the reign of her half-brother Edward she lived in retirement, and no threats could induce her to conform to the new religion. On his death (1553) she became entitled to the crown by her father's testament and the parliamentary settlement. The Duke of Northumberland had, however, induced Edward and his council to set Henry's will aside in favour of his daughter-in-law Lady Jane Grey (q.v.), but the whole country favoured Mary, who without bloodshed entered London on 3d August in triumph. Northumberland and two others were executed, but Lady Jane and her husband were, for the present, spared. The queen proceeded very cautiously to bring back the old religion. She reinstated the Catholic bishops and imprisoned some of the leading Reformers, but dared not restore the pope's supremacy. The question upon which all turned was the queen's marriage; and she, in spite of the protests of the nation, obstinately set her heart on Philip of Spain. The unpopularity of the proposal brought about the rebellion of Wyatt, quelled mainly through the courage and coolness of the queen. Lady Jane was now, with her husband and father, brought to the block; the Princess Elizabeth, suspected of complicity, was committed to the Tower. Injunctions were sent to the bishops to restore ecclesiastical laws to their state under Henry VIII. In July 1554 Philip was married to Mary, remaining in England for over a year. In November Pole entered England as papal legate, parliament petitioned for reconciliation to the Holy See, and the realm was solemnly absolved from the papal censures. Soon after, the persecution which gave the queen the name of 'Bloody Mary' began. In 1555 Ridley and Latimer were brought to the stake; Cranmer followed in March 1556; and Pole, now Archbishop of Canterbury, was left supreme in the councils of the queen. How far Mary herself was responsible for the cruelties practised is doubtful; but during the last three years of her reign 300 victims perished in the flames. Broken down with sickness, with grief at her husband's heartlessness, with disappointment at her childlessness, and with sorrow for the loss of Calais to the French, Mary died 17th November 1558. See the histories of Lingard and Froude; England under Edward VI. and Mary, by Tytler; Privy Purse Expenses of the Princess Mary, with a memoir by Sir F. Madden (1831); and M. Hume's Two English Queens and Philip (1908).

Mary of Modena (1658-1718), only daughter of the Duke of Modena, in 1673 became the second wife of the Duke of York, who in 1685 succeeded as James II. (q.v.). Five daughters and one son had all died in infancy, when on 10th June 1688 she gave birth to Prince James Francis Edward, and six months later escaped with him to France. She bore another daughter in 1692, and spent her last days at St Germain.

Mary Queen of Scots was the daughter of James V. of Scotland by his second wife, Mary of Guise, and was born at Linlithgow, 7th or 8th Dec. 1542, while her father lay on his deathbed at Falkland. A queen when she was a week old, she was promised in marriage by the Regent Arran to Prince Edward of England, but the Scottish parliament declared the promise null. War with England followed, and the disastrous defeat of Pinkie (1547); but Mary was offered in marriage to the eldest son of Henry II. of France and Catharine de' Medici. The offer was accepted; and in 1548 Mary sailed from Dumbarton to Roscoff, and was affianced to the Dauphin at St Germain. Her next ten years were passed at the French court, where she was carefully educated; and in 1558 she was married to the Dauphin, who was six weeks younger than herself. Mary was induced to sign a secret deed, by which, if she died childless, both her Scottish realm and her right of succession to the English crown (she was the great-granddaughter of Henry VII.) were conveyed to France. In 1559 the death of the French king called her husband to the throne as Francis II., and the government passed into the hands of the Guises; but the sickly king died in 1560, when the reins of power were grasped by Catharine de' Medici as regent for her next son, Charles IX. The young queen's presence was already urgently needed in Scotland, which the death of her mother had left without a government, while convulsed by the throes of the Reformation; and she sailed from Calais on the 14th, and arrived at Leith on the 19th August 1561. Her government began auspiciously. The Reformation claimed to have received the sanction of the Scottish parliament, and Mary was content to leave affairs as she found them, stipulating only for liberty to use her own religion. Her chief minister was a Protestant, her illegitimate brother, James Stuart, whom she created Earl of Moray. Under his guidance, in the autumn of 1562, she made a progress to the north, which ended in the defeat and death of the Earl of Huntly, the chief of the Roman Catholic party (and see CHASTELARD). Meanwhile the kings of Sweden, Denmark, and France, the Archduke Charles of Austria, Don Carlos of Spain, the Dukes of Ferrara, Nemours, and Anjou, the Earl of Arran, and the Earl of Leicester were proposed as candidates for her hand. Her own preference was for Don Carlos, and only after all hopes of obtaining him were quenched, her choice fell, somewhat suddenly (1565), on her cousin, Henry Stewart, Lord Darnley, son of the Earl of Lennox, by his marriage with a granddaughter of Henry VII. of England. He was thus among the nearest heirs to the English crown; and this and his good looks were his sole recommendation. He was weak, needy, insolent, and vicious; he was a Roman Catholic; and he was three years younger than Mary. The marriage was the signal for an easily quelled insurrection by Moray and the Hamiltons. But Mary almost at once was disgusted by Darnley's debauchery, and alarmed by his arrogance. She had given him the title of king, but she hesitated to grant his demand that the crown should be secured to him for life, and that, if she died without issue, it should descend to his heirs. Her chief minister since Moray's rebellion had been David Rizzio (or Riccio), a mean-looking Italian of many accomplishments. The king had been his sworn friend, but now suspected in him the real obstacle to his designs upon the crown. In this belief, he entered into a formal compact with Moray, Ruthven, Morton, and other Protestant chiefs, and himself led the way into the queen's cabinet and held her while the murderers dragged the Italian into an antechamber, and despatched him there (9th March 1566). Dissembling her indignation, Mary succeeded in detaching her husband from his allies, and escaped with him from Holyrood to Dunbar; Ruthven and Morton fled to England; Moray was received by the queen; and Darnley, who had betrayed both sides, became an object of mingled abhorrence and contempt. A little before the birth (19th June 1566) of the prince who became James VI., the queen's affection for her husband seemed to revive; but the change was only momentary; and before the boy's baptism, in December, her estrangement was greater than ever. Divorce was openly discussed, and Darnley spoke of leaving the country, but fell ill of the small-pox at Glasgow about 9th January 1567. On the 25th Mary went to see him, and brought him to Edinburgh on the 31st. He was lodged in a small mansion beside the Kirk o' Field, just outside the southern walls. There Mary visited him daily, slept for two nights in a room below his beichamber, and passed the evening of Sunday, 9th February, by his bedside in kindly conversation. She left him between ten and eleven o'clock to take part in a masque at Holyrood, at the marriage of a favourite valet; and about two hours after midnight the house in which the king slept was blown up by gunpowder, and his lifeless body was found in the garden. The chief actor in this tragedy was undoubtedly the Earl of Bothwell (q.v.), who had of late enjoyed the queen's favour; but there were suspicions that the queen herself was not wholly ignorant of the plot. On 12th April Bothwell was brought to a mock-trial, and acquitted; on the 24th he intercepted the queen on her way from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, and carried her, with scarcely a show of resistance, to Dunbar. On 7th May he was divorced from his comely and new-married wife; on the 12th Mary publicly pardoned his seizure of her person, and created him Duke of Orkney; and on the 15th, three months after her husband's murder, she married the man every one regarded as his murderer. This fatal step at once arrayed her nobles in arms against her. Her army melted away without striking a blow on the field of Carberry (15th June), when nothing was left but to surrender to the confederate lords. They led her to Edinburgh, where the insults of the rabble drove her well-nigh frantic. Hurried next to Lochleven, she was constrained (24th July) to sign an act of abdication in favour of her son, who, five days afterwards, was crowned at Stirling. Escaping from her island-prison (2d May 1568), she found herself in a few days at the head of an army of 6000 men, which was defeated (13th May) by the Regent Moray at Langside, near Glasgow. Three days afterwards Mary crossed the Solway, and threw herself on the protection of Queen Elizabeth, only to find herself a prisoner for life—first at Carlisle, then at Bolton, Tutbury, Wingfield, Coventry, Chatsworth, Sheffield, Buxton, Chartley, and Fotheringhay. The presence of Mary in England was a constant source of uneasiness to Elizabeth and her advisers. A large Catholic minority naturally looked to Mary as the likely restorer of the old faith. Plot followed plot; and that of Antony Babington had for its object the assassination of Elizabeth and the deliverance of Mary. It was discovered; letters of Mary approving the death of Elizabeth fell into Walsingham's hands; and, mainly on the evidence of copies of these letters, Mary was brought to trial in September 1586. Sentence of death was pronounced against her on 25th October; but it was not until 1st February 1587 that Elizabeth took courage to sign the warrant of execution. It was carried into effect on the 8th, when Mary laid her head upon the block with the dignity of a queen and the resignation of a martyr, evincing to the last her devotion to the church of her fathers. Her body, buried at Peterborough, was in 1612 removed to Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster, where it still lies in a sumptuous tomb erected by James VI. The statue there and the contemporary portraits by Clouet (q.v.) are the best representations of Mary.

The preponderance of authority seems now to be on the side of those who believe in Mary's criminal love for Bothwell and her guilty knowledge of his conspiracy against her husband's life. Her beauty and accomplishments have never been disputed. The charm of her soft, sweet voice is described as irresistible; and she sang well, accompanying herself on the harp, the virginal, and the lute. She spoke three or four languages, was well and variously informed, talked admirably, and wrote both in prose and in verse. Of six extant pieces of her poetry (less than 300 lines) the best is the poem of eleven stanzas on the death of her first husband. The longest is a Meditation of a hundred lines, written in 1572. All are in French, except one sonnet in Italian. The sweet lines beginning 'Adieu, plaisant pays de France,' are not hers. A volume of French verse on the Institution of a Prince has been lost since 1627, along with a Latin speech in vindication of learned women, delivered in the Louvre. Besides the Histories of Scotland by Keith, Robertson, Laing, Tytler, Burton, &c., and Knox's Reformation, see works by Jebb (1725), Anderson (1728), Goodall (1754), Tytler (1759, 1790), Chalmers (1818), Miss Strickland (1850-51; new ed. 1873), Montaignon (1855), Labanoff (1856), Mignet (1852), Teulet (1859), Cheruel (1858), Joseph Robertson (1863), Hosack (champion of her innocence, 1870-74; a popular ed. 1888), Petit and De Flandre (1874), Chantelauze (1876), Claude Nau (ed. by Father Stevenson, 1883), Leader (1881), De Ruble (1891), Kervyn de Lettenhove (1889), Henderson (The Casket Letters, 1890), Philippson (1891-92), Skelton (1893), Hay Fleming (1897), Samuel Cowan (1901), Andrew Lang's Mystery of Mary Stuart (1901), and the volume of Papal Negotiations edited in 1901 for the Scottish History Society.

Masaccio ('shiftless'), the nickname of TOMMASO GUIDI, a Florentine painter, born 21st December 1401 in the Arno valley. See German monograph by Schnursov (Cassel, 1895).—Masaccio was also the nickname of a humble Florentine sculptor, MASO DI BARTOLOMMEO (1406-67), the subject of a French monograph by Yriarte (1895). [Mas-at'cho.]

Masaniello (properly TOMMASO ANIELLO), a fisherman of Amalfi, born in 1623, led the successful revolt by the exasperated Neapolitans against their Spanish oppressors on 7th July 1647. Palaces and public buildings were plundered, mostly for arms; a bloody popular justice was executed; and the Spanish viceroy was forced into a regular treaty. But success turned the fisherman's head; he gave himself up to excess and despotism, and was assassinated by agents of the viceroy on 16th July. [Ma-zan-ee-ll'lo.]

Mascagni, PIETRO, composer, born a baker's son at Leghorn, 7th December 1863, produced in 1890, after a somewhat irregular musical education, the brilliantly successful one-act opera, Cavalleria Rusticana, in competition for a prize, the plot being taken from a story by Verga. Later operas were L'Amico Fritz (1891, based on Erckmann-Chatrian), I Rantzau (1892), Nerone (1894), William Ratcliff (1895), and Zanetto (1896), besides songs, &c. In 1896-1903 he was director of the Conservatorium at Pesaro. [Mas-kan'yee.]

Masham, ABIGAIL, LADY, née HILL, cousin to the Duchess of Marlborough (q.v.), whom she superseded as Queen Anne's favourite. She married in 1707, and died 6th December 1734.

Masinissa (c. 238-149 B.C.), king of the Eastern Numidians, helped the Carthaginians to subdue the Massylli or Western Numidians, accompanied his allies to Spain, and fought valiantly against the Romans. But about 210 going over to them, he received as his reward Western Numidia and large portions of Carthaginian territory.

Maskelyne, NEVIL, D.D., born in London, 6th October 1732, and educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1758 was elected F.R.S., went to Barbadoes to test the chronometers (1763), and in 1765 was appointed astronomer-royal. During the forty-six years that he held this office he improved methods and instruments of observation, invented the prismatic micrometer, and made important observations. In 1774 he measured the earth's density from the deflection of the plumb-line at Schiehallion in Perthshire. The first of his very numerous publications was the British Mariner's Guide (1763), followed by the Nautical Almanac (1765-67). His Tables for computing the Places of the Fixed Stars, &c., were published by the Royal Society in 1774. In 1776 he produced the first volume of the Greenwich Astronomical Observations. He was rector from 1775 of Shrawardine, Salop, and from 1782 of North Runcton, Norfolk, and died 9th February 1811. — MERVIN HERBERT NEVIL STORY-MASKELYNE (1823-1911), Waynflete professor of Mineralogy at Cambridge 1856-95 and F.R.S., was a descendant.

Mason, GEORGE HEMING, A.R.A. (1818-72), born near Stoke-upon-Trent, studied medicine, but in 1844 established a studio in Rome, returning to England only in 1858. His best-known works were 'The Evening Hymn' (1868), 'Girls Dancing by the Sea' (1869), and 'The Harvest Moon' (1872).

Mason, SIR JOSIAH (1795-1881), born at Kidderminster, began life as a hawker, after 1822 manufactured split-rings, and in 1829 began to make pens for Perry & Co., becoming ere long the greatest pen-maker in the world. He was partner with Elkington in electro-plating (1842-65), and had smelting-works for copper and nickel. He endowed almshouses and an orphanage at Erdington at a cost of £260,000, and gave £180,000 to found the Mason College (now Birmingham University). See Memoir by Buice (1890).

Mason, WILLIAM (1724-97), minor poet, was the son of a Hull clergyman, took his B.A. from St John's College, Cambridge, in 1745, and was elected fellow of Pembroke through the influence of Gray, who had been attracted to him by his Musæus (1747), a lament for Pope in imitation of Milton's Lycidas. He published two poor tragedies, Elfrida and Caradacus; the English Garden (1772-82), a tedious poem in blank verse; and, as Gray's executor, the Memoirs of Gray in 1775. He became vicar of Aston in Yorkshire in 1754, and canon of York in 1762.

Maspero, SIR GASTON, Hon. K.C.M.G. (1909), born at Paris, of Italian parents, 23d June 1846, in 1874 became professor of Egyptology at the Collège de France, and after 1881 keeper of the Boulak Museum and director of explorations in Egypt, making valuable discoveries at Sakkara, Dahshûr, Ekhmin, and elsewhere. He retired in 1886. Among his many works on Egyptology are his Guide to the Boulak Museum (1885), Histoire Ancienne (trans. as Dawn of Civilisation, 1895, and Struggle of the Nations, 1896), L'Archéologie Égyptienne (1887; trans. 1887), and Contes Populaires de l'Égypte Ancienne (1882).

Masséna, ANDRÉ, greatest of Napoleon's marshals, was born at Nice, it is said of Jewish origin, 6th May 1758. He served fourteen years in the Sardinian army, and in the French Revolution rose rapidly in rank, becoming in 1793 a general of division. He distinguished himself greatly in the campaigns in Upper Italy, especially at Rivoli (1797); and in command of the army in Switzerland gained his crushing victory over Suvaroff's Russians at Zurich (1799), becoming marshal of the empire in 1804. In Italy he kept the Archduke Charles in check, crushed him at Caldiero, and overran Naples. In 1807, after Eylau, he commanded the right wing, and was created Duke of Rivoli. He lost his left eye at a hunting-party. In the campaign of 1809 against Austria he covered himself with glory at Landslut and Eckmühl, and at Aspern or Essling earned the title of Prince of Essling. In 1810 he compelled Wellington to fall back upon his impregnable lines at Torres Vedras, was forced after five months, by total lack of supplies, to make a masterly retreat, but was recalled with ignominy by his imperious master. At the Restoration he gave in his adhesion to the Bourbons, and was made a peer. On Napoleon's return from Elba Masséna refused to follow him; he died 4th April 1817. See his Mémoires (7 vols. 1849-50) and Life by Toselli (1869). [Mas-say'na.]

Massenet, JULES, born at Montaud near St Étienne in 1842, studied at the Paris Conservatoire, where in 1878-96 he was professor. He made his fame by the comic opera Don César de Bazan in 1872. Other operas are Le Roi de Lahore, Manon Lescaut, Sapho, Chérubin, and Roma (1912); and among his works are oratorios, orchestral suites, music for piano, and songs. [Mass-nay.]

Massey, GERALD (1820-1907), born near Tring, became a Christian Socialist, edited a journal, lectured, and between 1851 and 1869 published eight or nine volumes of poetry (Babe Christabel and other Poems, Craigcrook Castle, &c.), mostly collected in My Lyrical Life (1890). He wrote also mystical and speculative theological or cosmogonic works (Concerning Spiritualism, A Book of the Beginnings, The Natural Genesis, &c.), and discovered a 'Secret Drama' in Shakespeare's Sonnets. See a book on him by Flower (1895), and Churton Collins's Studies (1905).

Massillon, JEAN BAPTISTE, preacher, born at Hyères in Provence, 24th June 1663, was trained for the church in the Oratory. He preached before Louis XIV. in 1699 and 1704. In 1717 he became Bishop of Clermont, and next year preached before Louis XV. his celebrated Petit Carême—a series of ten short Lenten sermons. In 1719 he was elected to the Academy; in 1723 he preached the funeral oration of the Duchess of Orleans, his last public discourse in Paris. From this time he lived almost entirely for his diocese, where his charity and gentleness gained him the love of all. He died of apoplexy, 28th September 1742. Bossuet and Bourdaloue contest with Massillon the palm of oratory, yet it is not too much to say that he was a greater preacher than either. See Blampignon's monograph (1884) and Sainte-Beuve's Causeries du Lundi, vol. ix. [Mas-see-yonô'.]

Massinger, PHILIP, dramatist, baptised at St Thomas's, Salisbury, 24th November 1583, was a son of a retainer of the Earl of Pembroke. In 1602 he entered St Alban's Hall, Oxford, but left without a degree in 1606. It has been supposed that at Oxford he became a convert to Catholicism; his plays somewhat support this view. Massinger was writing for the stage during the lifetime of the manager Philip Henslowe, who died in 1616. In later years he wrote many plays single-handed; but much of his work is mixed up with that of other men, particularly Fletcher. Fletcher was buried in St Saviour's Church, Southwark, 29th August 1625; and Massinger was laid in the same grave, 18th March 1639. Probably the earliest of Massinger's extant plays is The Unnatural Combat, a repulsive tragedy, printed in 1639. The first in order of publication is The Virgin Martyr (1622), partly written by Dekker. In 1623 was published The Duke of Milan, a fine tragedy, but too rhetorical. The Bondman, The Renegado, and The Partisment of Love were licensed in 1623-24. The Roman Actor (1626) abounds in eloquent declamation, but is somewhat stiff. The Great Duke of Florence, produced on 5th July 1627, has a delightful love-story, whereas Massinger's female characters are usually unattractive and sometimes odious. The Maid of Honour (1628) is—like The Bondman—full of political allusions. The Picture, licensed in 1629, has an improbable plot, but is well written. The Emperor of the East (1631) bears some resemblance to The Duke of Milan. Nathaniel Field joined Massinger in writing the fine tragedy The Fatal Dowry, printed in 1632. The City Madam, licensed in 1632, and A New Way to pay Old Debts, printed in 1633, are Massinger's most masterly comedies—brilliant satirical studies, though without warmth or geniality. A Very Woman (1634) is Fletcher's Woman's Plot revised by Massinger. The Guardian dates from 1633, The Bashful Lover from 1636. Believe as you List (1631) was first printed from MS. in 1844. The powerful and stately Tragedy of Sir John Van Olden Barnavelt (1619), by Massinger and Fletcher, was first printed in vol. ii. of Bullen's Old Plays (First Series). Some of Massinger's plays are (as Coleridge said) as interesting as a novel; others are as solid as a treatise on political philosophy. His verse, though fluent and flexible, lacks the music and magic of Shakespeare's. No writer repeats himself more frequently. It is difficult to say how far Massinger was concerned in the authorship of plays that pass under the name of 'Beaumont and Fletcher.' There are editions (none complete) by Gifford (1805; new ed. 1813), Hartley Coleridge (with Ford's works, 1840), Cunningham (1867), and Symons (1887-89).

Masson, DAVID (1822-1907), the biographer of Milton, was born at Aberdeen, and educated at Marischal College there and the University of Edinburgh. In 1847 he settled in London, writing for reviews, encyclopædias, &c., and editing Macmillan's Magazine 1859-68. In 1852 he became professor of English Literature in University College, London, and in 1865 in Edinburgh University; he resigned in 1895. His Essays, Biographical and Critical (1856), were extended in 1874-76. His Life of John Milton (6 vols. 1859-80) is the most complete biography of any Englishman. Other works are British Novelists (1859), Recent British Philosophy (1865), Drummond of Hawthornden (1873), three editions of Milton's poems, De Quincey (1878), an edition of De Quincey's works (14 vols. 1889-91), and Sketches and Memories (1892). After 1879 he edited the Registers of the Privy-council of Scotland, and in 1893 became Historiographer Royal for Scotland.

Masûdi, ABUL HASSAN ALI, Arab traveller (d. 957), born at Bagdad, visited Egypt, Palestine, the Caspian, India, Ceylon, Madagascar, perhaps even China. His chief works are the Annals, Meadows of Gold (printed with French transl. 1861-77, and at Boulak in 1867), and Indiator.

Matejko, JAN ALOIS (1838-93), a Polish painter born at Cracow. [Mu-ti'-ko.]

Mather, INCREASE, American divine, was the sixth son of an English Nonconformist minister who emigrated in 1635. He was born at Dorchester, Mass., June 21, 1639, and graduated at Harvard in 1656, and again at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1658. His first charge was Great Torrington in Devon; but in 1661, finding it impossible to conform, he returned to America, and from 1664 till his death, 23d August 1723, was pastor of the North Church, Boston, and from 1681 president also of Harvard. He published no less than 136 separate works, including Remarkable Providences (1684) and a History of the War with the Indians (1676). Sent to England in 1689 to lay colonial grievances before the king, he obtained a new charter from William III. He was far less an alarmist about witchcraft than his son, and his Causes of Conscience concerning Witchcraft (1693) helped to cool the heated imaginations of the colonists.—His son, COTTON MATHER, born in Boston, February 12, 1663, graduated in 1678 at Harvard, and became colleague to his father at Boston. He published as many as 382 books, and his Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft and Possessions (1685) did much to fan the cruel fury of the New Englanders. During the Salem witchcraft mania Mather wrote his Wonders of the Invisible World (1692), and on the head of none rests a heavier burden of bloodguiltiness. His Magnalia Christi Americana (1702) is an undigested mass of materials for the church history of New England. The Essays to do Good (1710) are feeble. He died February 13, 1728. See his Life by his son (1729); Upham, The Salem Delusion (1831); and Lives by Barrett Wendell (1891) and Marvin (1892).

Mathers, HELEN BUCKINGHAM, novelist, was born 26th August 1853 at Misterton, Crewkerne, and since 1875, when Comin' thro' the Rye appeared, has issued more than a score of novels and a volume of poems. In 1876 she married Dr Henry Reeves, a distinguished surgeon.

Mathew, THEOBALD ('Father Mathew'), apostle of temperance, was born at Thomastown in Tipperary, October 10, 1790. He took priest's orders in the Capuchin order in 1814; and in his ceaseless labours at Cork, seeing how much of the degradation of his people was due to drink, became (1836) an ardent advocate of total abstinence. His crusade extended to Dublin, to the North, to Liverpool, Manchester, London, Glasgow, and even to the chief seats of the Irish in the New World. His success was marvellous, and everywhere he roused enthusiasm and secured warm affection. But overwork (especially during the potato-famine) ruined his health, his mission schemes were costly, and he was only saved from serious pecuniary distresses by a Civil List pension of £300 (1847) and a private subscription. Worn out by his labours, he died at Queenstown, 8th December 1856. See Lives by Maguire (1863), Wells (1867), and F. J. Mathew (1890).

Mathews, CHARLES, comedian, the son of a bookseller, was born in London, 28th June 1776, and educated at Merchant Taylors'. He made his debut as an amateur at Richmond in 1798; and after a regular training played in London in 1803, at the Haymarket, Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and Lyceum; but he was not satisfied with the class of part given to him, and in 1818 took up with immense success the profession of 'entertainer,' visiting America twice. He died at Plymouth, 28th June 1835. See his Memoirs by his wife (4 vols. 1839).—His son, CHARLES JAMES (1803-78), was a delightful light comedian, of charming grace and delicacy. In 1838 he married Madame Vestris (q.v.). See his Life, edited by the younger Dickens (1879).

Mathias Corvinus. See MATTHIAS.

Mathilda, Countess of Tuscany (d. 1115), the supporter (with money and men) of Pope Gregory VII. in his long struggle with the Empire, was a daughter of the Count of Tuscany, and married first Godfrey, Duke of Lorraine, and then the young Welf of Bavaria. In 1077 she made a gift of all her vast possessions to the church. It was at her castle of Canossa that Henry IV. did penance to Pope Gregory.

Matilda (1102-67), 'the Empress Mand,' who carried on the civil war in England with Stephen (q.v.), was the only daughter of Henry I. In 1114 she was married to the Emperor Henry V., and in 1128 to Geoffrey of Anjou, by whom she became the mother of Henry II.

Matsys, or MASSYS, QUENTIN (c. 1466–1531), Flemish painter, born at Louvain, was, according to legend, a blacksmith who turned artist. It is certain that in 1491 he was admitted a member of the painters' guild of St Luke in Antwerp, and died in that city. His pictures are mostly religious, treated with a reverent spirit, but with decided touches of realism, and of exquisite finish. Such genre-pieces as 'The Money-changers' and 'The Gaoler' exhibit his realistic tendencies. He ranks high as a portrait-painter.

Mattei, COUNT CESARE (1810–96), was born and died at Bologna, and in 1847 was made a count for his generous support of the Holy See. Before 1866 he invented a series of secret remedies or patent medicines, which were alleged to cure not merely fevers, &c., but scrofula, dysentery, elephantiasis, and cancer, and were advocated and denounced in England in 1890–95. [Mat-tay-ee.]

Matthew of Westminster, long the supposed author of the Flores Historiarum (first printed by Archbishop Parker in 1567; ed. by Luard in 1890; trans. by Yonge, 1853), is of doubtful existence, the work being perhaps merely an abridgment of Matthew Paris (q.v.) or of Roger of Wendover, named from a copy at Westminster.

Matthew Paris. See PARIS.

Matthews, HENRY, LORD LLANDAFF, son of a judge in Ceylon, was born in 1826, and studied at Paris and University College, London. In 1850 he was called to the bar, in 1868 was made a Q. C., and was Conservative M. P. for Dungarvan 1868–74, and for East Birmingham 1886–95. In 1896–92 he was Home Secretary, and in 1895 was created Lord Llandaff.

Matthias Corvinus (1443–90), king of Hungary, the second son of John Hunyady (q.v.), was elected in 1458. But it cost him a six years' hard struggle against Turks, Bohemians, the Emperor Frederick III., and disaffected magnates before he could have himself crowned. He drove the Turks back across the frontiers; made himself master of Bosnia (1462) and of Moldavia and Wallachia (1467); and in 1478 concluded peace with Ladislaus of Bohemia, obtaining Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia. Out of this war grew another with Frederick III., in which Matthias besieged and captured Vienna (1485), and took possession of a large part of Austria proper. He greatly encouraged arts and letters: he founded the university of Budapest, built an observatory, summoned scholars and artists to his court, adorned his capital with the works of renowned sculptors, employed a staff of literary men in Italy to copy manuscripts, and so founded a magnificent library. At the same time the finances were brought into order, industry and commerce were promoted, and justice was administered strictly. But his rule was arbitrary and his taxes were heavy. See Life by Fraknoi (Ger. trans. 1891).

Maturin, CHARLES ROBERT, dramatist and romancer, was born in 1782, waged war with poverty as curate of St Peter's, Dublin, and died there, October 30, 1824, after making his name known by a series of extravagant novels that outdid Mrs Radcliffe. These were The Fatal Revenge, The Wild Irish Boy, The Milesian Chief; and later, Women, Melmoth (1820), and The Albigenes. His tragedy, Bertram, had a success at Drury Lane in 1816; its successors, Manuel and Fredolpho, were promptly damned. See memoir prefixed to new edition of Melmoth (1892).—His son, WILLIAM (1808–87), was a High Churchman, perpetual curate from 1844 of Grangeorgman; and his son, 'FATHER MATURIN,' was one of the Cowley brotherhood, and a well-known pulpit orator, when in 1897 he 'went over' to Rome.

Maud. See MATILDA.

Maudsley, HENRY, mental pathologist, born near Giggleswick, W.R. Yorkshire, Feb. 5, 1835, was educated there and at University College, London. He graduated M. D. in 1857, was physician to the Manchester Asylum, settled in London in 1862 as a consulting physician, and filled the chair of Medical Jurisprudence at University College 1869–79. His works are Physiology and Pathology of the Mind (1867), Responsibility in Mental Disease (1872), Body and Will (1883), Natural Causes and Supernatural Seemings (1886), and Life in Mind and Conduct (1903).

Maule, FOX (1801–74), served in the army, sat in parliament as a Liberal, succeeded his father as second Lord Panmure in 1852, and his cousin in 1860 as eleventh Earl of Dalhousie.

Mauder, SAMUEL (1785–1849), assisted his brother-in-law, William Pinnock, in the preparation of his catechisms, and compiled Biographical Treasury, Scientific and Literary Treasury, Treasury of Knowledge, Treasury of History, &c.

Maudiville. See MANDEVILLE.

Maudrell, HENRY (1665–1701), born at Compton Bassett near Calne, became a fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and in 1696 chaplain at Aleppo. He wrote Journey to Jerusalem (1703).

Maupassant, GUY DE, novelist, was born 5th August 1850, at the Norman château of Miromesnil, and, after fighting in the Franco-German war, wrote stories, a play, and lyrics (1880). But he won his real reputation as a novelist with La Maison Tellier (1881), Les Sœurs Rondoli (1884), Contes du Jour (1885), Contes et Nouvelles (1885), Monsieur Parent (1885), Bel-Ami (1885), La petite Roque (1886), Pierre et Jean (1888), and Fort comme la Mort (1889). He became insane in 1892, and died 6th July 1893. See books on contemporary French writers by De Velde (1891), Delille (1893), and Mellé (Boston, 1894). [Mo'-pas-song.]

Maupeou, NICOLAS AUGUSTIN DE (1714–92), succeeded his father as chancellor of France in 1768, and incurred great unpopularity by suppressing the parlements and establishing new courts. On Louis XV.'s death (1774) he was banished. See work by Flammernont (1884). [Mo-poo'.]

Maupertuis, PIERRE LOUIS MOREAU DE (1698–1759), mathematician, was born at St Malo, served in the army, and as a strenuous supporter of Newton's physical theories was made a member of the Royal Society of London in 1728. In 1736–37 he was at the head of the Academicians sent to Lapland to measure a degree of longitude. Frederick the Great made him president of the Berlin Academy. But his temper provoked general dislike and the special enmity of Voltaire, who satirised him in Micromégas, &c., driving him to Basel, where he died. See Lives by Beaumelle (1856) and Lesueur (1897). [Mo-per-twee'.]

Maurepas, JEAN FRÉDÉRIC PHÉLIPPEUX, COMTE DE (1701–81), statesman, displeased the all-powerful Pompadour, and was banished from court in 1749. Recalled and made first minister in 1774, he sought to humiliate England by recognising the United States. See his Mémoires (4 vols. 1792). [Môre-pah.]

Maurice, PRINCE OF ORANGE and COUNT OF NASSAU (1567-1625), general, was the son of William the Silent, and on his father's assassination in 1584 was chosen stadtholder by Holland and Zealand, and afterwards by the other provinces. Great part of the Netherlands was still in the hands of the Spaniards; but Maurice, aided by an English contingent under Leicester and Sidney, rapidly wrested from them the cities and fortresses. In 1597 he defeated the Spaniards at Turnhout, and in 1600 at Nieuwpoort; and for more than three years baffled all the power of Spain by his defence of Ostend. Finally, in 1609, Spain was compelled to acknowledge the United Provinces as a free republic. From this time keen dissension grew up between the Orange party, who favoured the Gomarists, and the Remonstrants or Arminians (see BARNEVELDT, ARMINIUS), and the former triumphed. See Groen van Prinsterer, Maurice et Barneveldt (1876).

Maurice, PRINCE (1620-52). See RUPERT.

Maurice, JOHN FREDERICK DENISON, theologian, the son of a Unitarian minister, was born at Normanston near Lowestoft, 29th August 1805, and studied at Trinity College and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, but as a dissenter, left in 1827 without a degree, and commenced a literary career in London. He wrote a novel, Eustace Conway, and for a time edited the Athenæum. Influenced by Coleridge, he resolved to take orders in the Church of England, at Oxford took his M.A., and was ordained a priest in 1834. He became chaplain to Guy's Hospital (1837), to Lincoln's Inn (1841-60); in 1840 professor of Literature at King's College, London, where he was professor of Theology 1846-53. In 1860 he accepted the incumbency of Vere Street Chapel, which he held until his election to the chair of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge in 1866. He died in London 1st April 1872. The publication in 1853 of his Theological Essays, dealing with the atonement and eternal life, lost him the professorship of Theology in King's College. His principal books are Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, Religions of the World, Prophecy and Kings of the Old Testament, Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the Old Testament, The Kingdom of Christ, The Doctrine of Sacrifice, Theological Essays, Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First and Second Centuries, Gospel of St John, The Conscience, and Social Morality. Maurice strenuously controverted Mansel's views on our knowledge of God, and denounced as false any political economy founded on selfishness and not on the Cross as the ruling power of the universe. He was the mainspring of the movement known as Christian Socialism; and was the founder of the Working-man's College and of the Queen's College for Women, in both of which he taught. Commonly regarded as a head of the 'Broad-church' movement, he vehemently repudiated the position of a party-leader, and his influence extended throughout all parties in the church. See Life (1884) by his son, Sir John Frederick Maurice, K.C.B. (1841-1912), professor of Military History at the Staff College, and author of a System of Field Manœuvres (1872), The Ashantee War (1874), The Campaign of 1882 in Egypt (1887), The Balance of Military Power in Europe (1888), and War (1891).

Maury, JEAN SIFFREIN, was born 26th June 1746 at Valréas (dep. Vancluse). Eloquent éloges on the dauphin, &c., gained him in 1784 admission to the Academy. In 1789 he was sent to the States-general, where as an orator he rivalled Mirabeau. At the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly he withdrew to Rome, and was made an archbishop in partibus, and cardinal (1794); but he made his submission in 1804 to Napoleon, who appointed him in 1810 Archbishop of Paris. He died 11th May 1817. See Lives by his nephew (1827), Poujoulat (1835), and Ricard (1887). [Mo-reé'].

Maury, MATTHEW FONTAINE, born near Fredericksburg, Va., January 14, 1806, entered the U.S. navy in 1825, and during a voyage round the world commenced his well-known Navigation (1834). Lamed for life in 1839, he was appointed superintendent in 1842 of the Hydrographical Office at Washington, and in 1844 of the Observatory. Here he wrote his Physical Geography of the Sea (1856), and his works on the Gulf Stream, Ocean Currents, and Great Circle Sailing. He became an officer of the Confederate navy, and died 1st Feb. 1873, professor of Physics at Lexington. See Life by daughter (1888).

Mauve, ANTON (1838-88), born at Zaandam, became one of the greatest Dutch landscape-painters of his time.

Mavor, WILLIAM FORDVCE (1758-1837), an Oxfordshire clergyman and schoolmaster, born at New Deer, Aberdeenshire, the compiler of a well-known spelling-book.

Maxim, SIR HIRAM STEVENS (knighted 1901), born 5th February 1840, at Sangersville, Maine, U.S., was bred a coachbuilder. From 1867 he took out patents for gas apparatus, electric lamps, &c. His machine-gun was perfected in London in 1883; he has since invented a pneumatic gun, a smokeless powder, and a flying machine (1894).

Maximilian I., German emperor, the son of Frederick III., was born 22d March 1459. By his marriage with Mary, heiress of Charles the Bold, he acquired Burgundy and Flanders; but this involved him in war with Louis XI. of France, and in 1482 he was forced to give Artois and Burgundy to Louis. In 1486 he was elected king of the Romans. In 1490 he drove out the Hungarians who, under Matthias Corvinus, had seized (1487) great part of the Austrian territories; at Villach in 1492 he routed the Turks; and in 1493 he became emperor. Having next married a daughter of the Duke of Milan, he turned his ambition towards Italy. But after years of war he was compelled (1515) to give up Milan to France and Verona to the Venetians; and in 1499 the Swiss completely separated themselves from the German Empire. The hereditary dominions of his house, however, were increased by the peaceful acquisition of Tyrol; the marriage of his son Philip with the Infanta Joanna united the Houses of Spain and Hapsburg; whilst the marriage in 1521 of his grandson Ferdinand with the daughter of Ladislaus of Hungary and Bohemia brought both these kingdoms to Austria. He also improved the administration of justice, greatly encouraged the arts and learning, and caused two works to be written under his own personal direction, Theuerdank in verse and Weisskunig in prose, of both of which himself is the hero. 'The foremost knight of the age,' he died 12th January 1519. See Lives by Klüpfel (1864) and Ulmann (1884-91).

Maximilian, EMPEROR OF MEXICO, was born 6th July 1832, the younger brother of Francis-Joseph I., and became an Austrian admiral. In 1863 the French called together a Mexican assembly, which offered the crown of Mexico to Maximilian; he accepted it, and in June 1864 entered Mexico. But Juárez (q.v.) again raised the standard of independence, and Napoleon III. had to withdraw his troops. In vain the Empress Charlotte (b. 7th June 1840), a daughter of Leopold I. of Belgium, went to Europe to enlist support for her husband; her reason gave way under grief and excitement. Maximilian felt bound to remain and share the fate of his followers. With 8000 men he made a brave defence of Queretaro, but in May 1867 was betrayed, and on July 19 shot. Seven volumes of his sketches of travel, essays, &c. (Aus Meinem Leben) were published in 1867. See J. M. Taylor's Maximilian and Carlotta (1894).

Max-Müller, FRIEDRICH, philologist, was born 6th December 1823, at Dessau, where his father, Wilhelm Müller (1794-1827), lyric poet, was ducal librarian. He studied at Dessau, Leipzig, and Berlin, devoting himself to Sanskrit; and his translation of the Hitopadesa appeared in 1844. In Paris he began (1845), at the instigation of Burnouf, to prepare an edition of the Rig-Veda, coming to England in 1846 to examine the MSS. in the East India House and the Bodleian; and the East India Company commissioned him (1847) to edit it at their expense (6 vols. 1849-74; new ed. 1890). For a time Taylorian professor of Modern Languages at Oxford, he was in 1866 appointed professor there of Comparative Philology, a study he did more than any one else to promote in England. He published The Languages of the Seat of War in the East (1854), Comparative Mythology (1856), History of Sanskrit Literature (1859), Science of Language (1861-63), Science of Religion (1870), Chips from a German Workshop (1868-75), Origin and Growth of Religion (Hibbert Lectures, 1878), Biographical Essays (1883), The Science of Thought (1887), Biographies of Words (1888), Natural, Physical, Anthropological, and Psychological Religion (Glasgow Gifford Lectures, pub. 1889-93), Vedanta Philosophy (1894), and Science of Mythology (1897)—not to speak of Deutsche Liebe and Auld Lang Syne (1899). He edited the Sacred Books of the East. A foreign member of the French Institute, knight of the Ordre pour le Mérite, commander of the Legion of Honour (1896), LL.D. of various universities, and P.C. (1896), he died 28th October 1900. His widow edited his Life and Letters (1902).

Maxwell, JAMES CLERK, physicist, born at Edinburgh, June 13, 1831, was educated there at the Academy and the university, and ere he was fifteen wrote papers of scientific value. At Cambridge he was (1854) second wrangler and bracketed with the senior wrangler for the Smith's prize. In 1856 he became a professor in Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1860 in King's College, London, and in 1871 professor of Experimental Physics at Cambridge. He died November 5, 1879. In the great work of his life, Electricity and Magnetism (2 vols. 1873), he constructed a theory of electricity in which 'action at a distance' should have no place. He was the first to make colour-sensation the subject of actual measurement. He obtained the Adams prize for his splendid discussion of the dynamical conditions of stability of the ring-system of Saturn. But he was best known to the public by his investigations on the kinetic theory of gases. His Bradford 'Discourse on Molecules' is a classic. Besides many papers, he published a text-book of the Theory of Heat and a little treatise on Matter and Motion. In 1879 he edited Cavendish's Electrical Researches. See his Scientific Papers, edited by Niven (2 vols. 1890); his Life by Lewis Campbell and Garnett (1882); and Glazebrook's Clerk-Maxwell and Modern Physics (1896).

Maxwell, SIR WILLIAM STIRLING, of Keir near Dunblane, was born at Kenmure House, Glasgow, in 1818. Graduating in 1839 from Trinity College, Cambridge, he travelled in Italy and Spain, and wrote Annals of the Artists of Spain (1848), Cloister Life of Charles V. (1852), Velazquez (1855), and the sumptuous Don John of Austria (1883). In 1866 he succeeded to the baronetcy, surname, and estates of his uncle, Sir J. Maxwell of Pollok. His second wife (1877) was the Hon. Mrs Norton (q.v.). Besides representing Perthshire as a Conservative 1852-67, and again in 1872, he was Rector of St Andrews (1863) and Edinburgh (1871), and in 1875 Chancellor of Glasgow University. He died at Venice 15th Jan. 1878. A new edition of his Works appeared in 1891.

May, PHIL (1864-1903), caricaturist, born at Wortley near Leeds, was left an orphan at nine, and had had but a twelvemonth's schooling when he took to grinding colours for a scene-painter, drawing shilling portraits of actors, and himself playing small parts. At seventeen he came up penniless to London, and slept on the Embankment, until he got work on the St Stephen's Review, and then went to Australia as cartoonist on the Sydney Bulletin. In 1890 he returned to London, and leapt into fame with his Annual, his contributions to Punch and the Graphic, &c.

May, THOMAS (1594-1650), the son of Sir Thomas May of Mayfield, Sussex, was educated at Cambridge, and became a member of Gray's Inn and a courtier. He wrote dramas, comedies, poems, and translations of the Georgics and Lucan. As secretary and historiographer to the Parliament he produced a History of the Parliament of England 1640-1643 (1647), and a Breviary thereof (1650).

May, SIR THOMAS ERSKINE (1815-86), educated at Bedford School, became assistant-librarian of the House of Commons in 1831, clerk-assistant in 1856, and clerk of the House in 1871. Successively C.B. and K.C.B., he was on his retirement (1886) created Baron Farnborough. His Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament (1844; 11th ed. 1906) has been translated into various languages; his Constitutional History of England 1760-1860 (1861-63; 3d ed. 1871) is a continuation of Hallam; his Democracy in Europe (1877) shows great learning and impartiality.

Mayer, JOSEPH (1803-86), antiquary, born at Newcastle-under-Lyme, was a Liverpool jeweller.

Mayer, JULIUS ROBERT VON, physicist, was born at Heilbronn, 25th November 1814, studied medicine at Tübingen, Munich, and Paris, and settled as physician in his native town in 1841. In 1842 he published a preliminary statement of the mechanical theory of heat (worked out independently by Joule, q.v.), and in 1845 restated his views with a great wealth of illustration, forecasting also the meteoric origin of the sun's heat. He was ennobled by the king of Württemberg two years before his death, on 20th March 1878. Mayer's papers were collected as Mechanik der Wärme (2d ed. 1874), and his Correspondence appeared in 1889. See monographs by Dühring (1879) and Weyrauch (1889). [M̄ver.]

Mayhew, HENRY (1812-87), journalist and litterateur, was born in London, ran away from Westminster School, and was articled to his father, a solicitor. He had started with Gilbert & Beckett three short-lived papers, and had written a farce, when he and his brother Augustus ('the Brothers Mayhew') combined to produce some remarkably clever works of fiction, the best of which are The Good Genius that turned Everything to Gold (1847), The Greatest Plague of Life (1847), The Image of His Father (1848), Whom to Marry (1848), The Magic of Kindness (1849), and Living for Appearances (1855). An originator and a joint-editor of Punch, Mayhew was from early in the 'forties' a voluminous writer on many subjects—as on The Peasant Boy Philosopher (1854), The Wonders of Science (1855), Shops and Companies of London (1865), London Characters (1874), Criminal Prisons of London, and Living for Appearances (1855). See Athol Mayhew's Jorum of Punch (1895), and Spielmann's History of Punch (1895).—HORACE MAYHEW (1816-72), a brother, also made some mark in literature, and was a constant contributor to Punch.—AUGUSTUS MAYHEW (1826-75), besides the work done in partnership with Henry, wrote separately several stories—Paved with Gold (1857), The Finest Girl in Bloomsbury (1861), Faces for Fortunes (1865), &c.

Mayo, RICHARD SOUTHWELL BOURKE, EARL OF, Indian statesman, was born in Dublin 21st February 1822, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He entered the House of Commons as a Conservative in 1847, and was appointed Chief-secretary of Ireland by Lord Derby in 1852, 1858, and 1866. Sent out in 1868 to succeed Lord Lawrence, he was eminently successful as Viceroy of India, but was fatally stabbed by a convict whilst inspecting the settlement at Port Blair on the Andaman Islands. See Life by Sir W. W. Hunter (2 vols. 1875).

Mazarin, JULES (Giulio Mazarini), cardinal and minister of France, was born 14th July 1602 at Piscina in the Abruzzi, studied under the Jesuits at Rome and at Alcalá in Spain. He accompanied a papal legate to the court of France, was papal nuncio there (1634-36), entered the service of Louis XIII. as a naturalised Frenchman (1639), and two years later received a cardinal's hat through the influence of Richelieu, who before his death in 1642 recommended Mazarin to the king as his successor. Louis died in 1643, but Mazarin knew how to retain his power under the queen-regent, Anne of Austria; she certainly loved him, even if it cannot be proved that there was a private marriage between them (the cardinal had never taken more than the minor orders). He ruled with more smoothness than Richelieu, and had almost as supreme power. The parliament resisted the registration of edicts of taxation; but Mazarin caused the leaders of the Opposition to be arrested (August 1648), upon which the disturbances of the Fronde began. The court retired to St Germain, but at length triumphed by the aid of Condé. The hatred against Mazarin, however, blazed out anew in the provinces, when at his instigation the queen-regent arrested Condé, Conti, and Longueville in January 1650. Mazarin triumphed at Rethel, but soon had to succumb and retire to Brühl. Meantime the press teemed with pamphlets and satires against him—the Mazarinades. The cardinal now bent all his powers to form a new royal party, won the support of Turenne, and in February 1653 returned in triumph to Paris, regaining all his power and popularity. He acquired the alliance of Cromwell at the price of Dunkirk; and by the marriage of Louis XIV. with the Infanta Maria Theresa (1659), brought the succession to the throne of Spain within range. Mazarin died at Vincennes, 9th March 1661, leaving an immense fortune. His magnificent library was bequeathed to the Collège Mazarin, and his name lives in the rare 'Mazarin Bible.' His seven celebrated nieces whom he brought from Italy to the French court varied in character and ultimate fate, but all married counts, dukes, or princes, though more than one died in poverty or obscurity. See Chéruel's Hist. de France pendant la Minorité de Louis XIV. (4 vols. 1879-80), its sequel, Hist. de France sous le Ministère de Mazarin (2 vols. 1881-82), and his edition of the Lettres de Mazarin pendant son Ministère (6 vols. 1879-91); also works by Renée (1850), Cousin (1865), G. Masson (1886), Comte de Cosnac (1892), and A. Hassall (1903). [Ma-zar-in']

Mazeppa, IVAN STEPHANOVICH, (1644-1709), hetman of the Cossacks, was born of poor but noble family, and became a page at the court of Poland. A nobleman, having surprised him in an intrigue with his wife, caused him to be bound naked upon his horse, which, let loose, carried him, torn and bleeding, to its native wilds of the Ukraine—or, in another story, to his own home. Mazeppa now joined the Cossacks, and in 1687 was elected hetman. He won the confidence of Peter the Great, who made him Prince of the Ukraine; but when Peter curtailed the freedom of the Cossacks, Mazeppa entered into negotiations with Charles XII. of Sweden. His hopes of an independent crown perished in the disaster of Pultowa (1709), and he fled with Charles to Bender, where he died miserably the same year. His story is the theme of poems (Byron), novels, and paintings, and of a masterly historical work by Kostomarov (1882).

Mazzinghi, JOSEPH, COUNT (1765-1844), operatic composer and director, was born in London.

Mazzini, GIUSEPPE (or JOSEPH), Italian patriot, was born at Genoa, 22d June 1805, studied at the university there, and at nineteen was practising as an advocate. In 1821 his heart was stirred by the sight of refugees from the unsuccessful rising in Piedmont. He wrote in favour of romanticism, became a more and more ardent champion of liberalism, and joining the Carbonari in 1829, was betrayed (1830) to the Sardinian police, and imprisoned in Savona. Released next year, he organised at Marseilles the Young Italy Association, which sought to create a free and united nation of Italians—republican from the nature of the case—and to work for the governance of the world by the moral law of progress. In 1831 he addressed to Charles Albert of Piedmont an appeal, urging him to put himself at the head of the struggle for Italian independence; the answer, under Metternich's influence, was a sentence of perpetual banishment, and in 1832 the French authorities expelled him from France. Henceforward he was the most untiring political agitator in Europe. He wrote incessantly with fervid eloquence and intense conviction. In 1834 he organised an abortive invasion of Savoy. The next two years Mazzini spent in Switzerland, scattering broadcast through Europe the seeds of republican revolt. Banished from Switzerland, he found a refuge in London in 1837; and, struggling with poverty, contrived to teach and civilise many of his poorer countrymen the organ-boys of London. In 1844 he made good his charge against the British government of opening his letters and communicating their contents to the rulers in Italy—a charge which raised a storm of indignation throughout the country. He threw himself into the thick of the Lombard revolt in 1848. After Milan capitulated he tried with Garibaldi to keep the war alive in the valleys of the Alps. Leghorn received him with wild enthusiasm in February 1849, just before the republic was proclaimed at Rome, where in March Mazzini, Saffi, and Armellini were appointed a triumvirate with dictatorial powers. In April the French arrived; after a struggle the republic fell; and the triumvirs indignantly resigned (June). From London Mazzini planned the attempted risings at Mantua (1852), Milan (1853), Genoa (1857), and Leghorn (1857). Here also he founded, along with Kossuth and Ledru-Rollin, the republican European Association, and organised the Society of the Friends of Italy. In 1859 Mazzini condemned the alliance between Piedmont and Napoleon III. He supported Garibaldi in his expedition against Sicily and Naples; and when Piedmont defeated and took him prisoner at Aspromonte (1862), Mazzini broke finally with the monarchical party. In 1866-67 Messina in protest elected him its deputy to the Italian parliament four times in succession. Again expelled from Switzerland, he was (1870) arrested at sea and imprisoned for two months at Gaeta. He settled at Lugano, but died at Pisa, 10th March 1872. Utopian idealist, political dreamer, apostle of the democratic evangel, and restless conspirator, Mazzini was also a man of great organising power; thoroughly sincere and disinterested, he felt only impatience and scorn of moderates and opportunists. It was inevitable that he and Cavour should dislike and distrust one another. Yet it was Mazzini who prepared the soil and sowed the seed of Italian unity, Garibaldi who did most of the harvesting, and Cavour who entered into their labours. Mazzini's writings are mostly political. On the Duties of Man contains a noble outline of ethical theory; Thoughts upon Democracy in Europe is a discussion of economics and socialism. See the collected edition of his Scritti, Editti ed Inediti (16 vols. 1861); the English Life and Writings (6 vols. 1864-70; new ed. 1890-91); the Selected Essays (edited by Clarke, 1887); the selections by Stubbs (1891); Memoir by Vinturi (1874); Marriott's Makers of Modern Italy (1889); Linton's European Republicans (1892); and the Life of him by Bolton King (1902). Mead, RICHARD, M.D., F.R.S. (1673-1754), a London physician, a Whig, a man of many friends. See Memoirs by Maty (1755) and Gosse's Eighteenth Century Vignettes (3d ser. 1896).

Meade, GEORGE GORDON (1815-72), American general, born at Cadiz in Spain, where his father was a merchant, graduated at West Point in 1835, served against the Seminoles and in the Mexican war, but was mostly employed on surveys and in lighthouse-building. In 1861 he distinguished himself at Antietam and Fredericksburg, and in 1863 he commanded the Army of the Potomac and defeated Lee at Gettysburg.

Meagher, THOMAS FRANCIS, Irish patriot, was born in Waterford, 3d August 1823, son of a wealthy merchant and M.P. Partly educated at Stonyhurst, he became a prominent member of the Young Ireland party, and in 1848 was sentenced to death, but transported for life to Van Diemen's Land instead. He made his escape in 1852, studied law in the United States, in 1861 organised the 'Irish brigade' for the Federals, and distinguished himself at Richmond, Bull Run, Fredericksburg, and Antietam. While secretary of Montana territory, and keeping the

Indians in check, he was drowned in the Missouri, 1st July 1867. [Mah-er or Mar.]

Medhurst, GEORGE (1759-1827), an engineer at Battle Bridge, born at Shoreham, in 1810 first suggested the pneumatic despatch.

Med'ici, a Florentine family which attained to sovereign power in the 15th century, having acquired wealth by commerce (not as apothecaries). From the 13th century the Medici took part in the government of the republic; but it was Giovanni (born 1360) who amassed the immense fortune and gained the influence to which his sons Cosimo and Lorenzo succeeded. With Cosimo (1389-1464), surnamed 'Pater Patrie,' began the glorious epoch of the family; while from Lorenzo was descended the branch which in the 16th century obtained absolute rule over Tuscany. Cosimo procured for Florence (nominally still republican) security abroad and peace from civil dissensions. He employed his wealth in encouraging art and literature. He made Florence the centre of the revival of learning, and enriched her with splendid buildings and great libraries. His feeble son Pietro I. was assisted by the precocious talents of his own son Lorenzo (1448-92), called 'the magnificent.' On his father's death (1469) Lorenzo and his brother Giuliano were recognised as 'principi dello stato.' The growing power of the Medici had roused much envy; and in 1478 the malcontents, headed by the Pazzi and in league with the pope, Sixtus IV., formed a plot to overthrow them. Giuliano fell a victim to the assassins; Lorenzo increased his popularity by the courage and judgment that he showed in this crisis. He was just in his government, magnanimous to his enemies, a munificent patron of art and literature, a man of wide culture, a distinguished lyric poet, and one of the most zealous promoters of the art of printing. Yet he sapped the existing forms of government, and by seeking only the advancement of his family, left Florence a ready prey to her enemies. Lorenzo had three sons, Pietro, Giuliano, and Giovanni. His eldest son, Pietro II. (1471-1503), allied himself with the king of Naples against Lodovico Sforza of Milan; and when the latter in 1492 called to his aid Charles VIII. of France, Pietro surrendered Pisa and Leghorn to the French. The magistrates and people, incensed at his cowardice, drove him from Florence and declared the Medici traitors and rebels. All efforts of the Medici to regain their power were vain until in 1512 a Spanish papal army invaded Tuscany, Prato was taken and sacked, and the Florentines, helpless and terrified, recalled the Medici, headed by Giuliano II. (1478-1516). In 1513 the elevation of Giovanni de' Medici to the papal chair as Leo X. (q.v.) completed the restoration of the family to all their former splendour and reduced Florence to a papal dependency. Giuliano II. surrendered the government to Lorenzo II. (1492-1519), son of Pietro II., who, feeble, arrogant, and licentious, left only one legitimate child, a daughter, Catharine (q.v.), afterwards wife of Henry II. of France. The power now passed into the hands of Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, a natural son of the first Giuliano, who was created pope in 1523 as Clement VII. During the invasion of Italy by the Emperor Charles V. Florence rebelled against the regents imposed on her by the pope, and expelled them and Alessandro, illegitimate son of Lorenzo II.; but after a famous siege of ten months surrendered (August 1530), when Alessandro was proclaimed hereditary duke. After a reign of unparalleled license and tyranny he was assassinated in 1537 by his cousin Lorenzo, a descendant of Lorenzo, brother of Cosimo 'Pater Patrie.' To this younger branch belonged also the next ruler of Florence, Cosimo I. (1519-74), son of the famous captain of free-lances, Giovanni. Cosimo, sometimes called the Great, possessed the astuteness of character, the love of art and literature of his greater predecessors, but was cruel and relentless in his enmities, though a just ruler; he was grand-duke of Tuscany from 1570. His son and most of his successors were insignificant; in the 17th century the race rapidly degenerated; and, after several of its representatives had been mere puppets in the hands of Austria or Spain, the family became extinct at the death of Gian Gastone, the seventh grand-duke (1737), and his only sister, the Electress Palatine (1743). See Roscoe's works, and books by Reumont (trans. 1876), Horsburgh (1908), and J. Ross (1910).

Medina, SIR JOHN BAPTIST (1659-1710), a portrait-painter, born in Brussels of Spanish parentage, came to London in 1686, in 1688 settled in Edinburgh, and was knighted in 1707. [Me-dée-na.]

Medwin, THOMAS (1788-1869), author of Conversations of Byron (1824), a memoir of his cousin Shelley (1833), &c., served in the army, lived much in Italy, at Heidelberg, &c., and was born and died at Horsham in Sussex.

Megasthenes, a Greek ambassador (306-298 B.C.) at the Indian court of Sandrocottus or Chandra Gupta. Here he gathered materials for his Indiae, from which Arrian, Strabo, &c. borrowed. The fragments were edited by Schwanebeck (1846) and Müller (1848).

Mehemet Ali, better MOHAMMED 'ALI, Viceroy of Egypt, was born in Albania in 1769, became an officer of militia (as well as a tobacco-dealer), and was sent to Egypt with a Turkish-Albanian force on the French invasion in 1798. After the departure of the French he, at the head of his Albanians, supported the Egyptian rulers in their struggles with the Mamelukes, practically an independent military caste. Having become the chief power in Egypt, he in 1805 had himself proclaimed Viceroy by his Albanians, and was confirmed in this post by the Sultan. He secured for Egypt a galvanic prosperity by the merciless destruction of the Mamelukes, the formation of a regular army, the improvement of irrigation, and the introduction of the elements of European civilisation. In 1816 he reduced part of Arabia to his sway by the generalship of his son Ibrahim; in 1820 he annexed Nubia and part of the Soudan; and from 1821 to 1828 his troops, under Ibrahim, occupied various points in the Morea and Crete, to aid the Turks in their war with the insurgent Greeks. The Egyptian fleet was annihilated at Navarino, and Ibrahim remained in the Morea till forced to evacuate by the French in 1828. In 1831 Ibrahim began the conquest of Syria, and in 1832 totally routed the Ottoman army at Koniya, after which the Porte ceded Syria to Mehemet Ali on condition of tribute. War breaking out again, the victory of Nisib in 1839 might have elevated him to the throne of Constantinople; but the quadruple alliance in 1840, the fall of Acre to the British, and the consequent evacuation of Syria compelled him to limit his ambition to the pashalik of Egypt. In 1848 he became imbecile, and he died 21 August 1849, being succeeded by Ibrahim.

Méhul, ÉTIENNE NICOLAS (1763-1817), operatic composer, born at Givet, studied in Paris, and in 1795 became professor at the Conservatoire. See the Life of him by Pongin (1889). [May-eel.]

Meikle, ANDREW (1719-1811), a millwright near Dunbar, invented the drum thrashing-machine.

Meilhac, HENRY (1831-97), playwright, born in Paris, from 1855 produced a long series of light comedies—some in conjunction with Halévy, and some well known through Offenbach's music. His chef-d'œuvre is Frou-Frou (1869). In 1888 he was elected to the Academy. [May-lak.]

Meinhold, JOHANN WILHELM (1797-1851), born in the island of Usedom, and Lutheran pastor there and at Krummin and Rehwinkel, published poems and dramas, but is best known by his Amber Witch (trans. by Lady Duff Gordon, 1844) and Sidonia the Sorceress (trans 1894). [Mine-holt.]

Meissonnier, JEAN LOUIS ERNEST, born at Lyons, 21st February 1813, came to Paris and studied art, and about 1833-34 was employed on designs for a Bible and other works. He made a mark in 1838 by his illustrations to Paul and Virginia and the Charmière Indienne. In 1834 he began to contribute to the Salon with a water-colour and an oil-picture; in 1836 he exhibited the first of his 'Chess-players.' It was followed by a long series of elaborate genre-pictures, in which, with the most finished execution, he depicted the civil and military life of the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries. His 'Napoleon I.,' a small single-figure picture, Mr Ruskin sold in 1882 for £6090; 'Friedland or 1807' was bought in 1873 for 400,000 francs. Not less fascinating are his simpler groups of students, artists, collectors, &c. He also executed some striking portraits. He became a Commander of the Legion of Honour in 1867, Grand Cross 1889, and a member of the Institute in 1861. He died 31st January 1891. In 1884 146 of his works were exhibited at Paris. See French monographs by Claretie (1881), Larroumet (1893), Greard (trans. 1897), Formentin (1901). [Mayss-on-yay.]

Mela, POMPONIUS, the first Latin writer who was strictly a geographer, was born in S. Spain, and lived under the Emperor Claudius. His work, an unsystematic compendium, is entitled De Situ Orbis. The text is very corrupt. See a German work on him by Fink (1881).

Melanchthon, PHILIP (Melanchthon is a Greek rendering of Schwarzerd, 'black earth'), reformer, was born, February 16, 1497, at Bretten in the Palatinate (now in Baden), was educated at Heidelberg and Tübingen, and in 1518 was appointed professor of Greek at Wittenberg, where he soon became Luther's fellow-worker, invaluable alike for his great learning, his Latinity, the sweetness of his temper, and the habitual moderation of his views. In 1521 he published Loc Communes, the first great Protestant work on dogmatic theology. The Augsburg Confession (1530) was composed by him. In 1541 he went to Worms, and soon after to Ratisbon. After Luther's death, Melanchthon lost the confidence of some Protestants by peace-loving concessions to the Catholics; whilst the zealous Lutherans were displeased at his approximation to the doctrine of Calvin on the Lord's Supper. His conditional consent to the introduction of the stringent Augsburg Interim (1549) in Saxony led to painful controversies. He died at Wittenberg, 19th April 1560. A happy combination of humanist and reformer, Melanchthon ranks with the very highest names in the history of learning and education. His works, which comprise a Greek and Latin Grammar, editions of and commentaries on classics and the Septuagint, correspondence, &c., were edited by Bretschneider and Bindsell in Corpus Reformatorum (28 vols. 1834-60). See English Lives by Cox (1817), Ledderhose (1855), Schaff (1887), Bailey Saunders (1897), and G. Wilson (1897), besides German ones by Matthes, Nitzsch, Schmidt, and Hartfelder.

Melba, MME NELLIE (Mrs Armstrong), Australian prima donna, born May 19, 1865, appeared at Brussels in 1887, Covent Garden in 1888.

Melbourne, WILLIAM LAMB, VISCOUNT, born in London, 15th March 1779, and educated at Eton, Trinity, Cambridge, and Glasgow, became Whig M.P. for Leominster in 1805, but accepted in 1827 the chief-secretaryship of Ireland in Canning's government, and retained it under Goderich and Wellington. Succeeding as second Viscount (1828), he returned to the Whigs, became Home Secretary in 1830, for a few months of 1834 was premier, and, premier again in 1835, was still in office at the accession of Queen Victoria (1837), when he showed remarkable tact in introducing her to her duties. In 1841 he once more passed the seals of office to Sir Robert Peel, and thenceforward took little part in public affairs. He died Nov. 24, 1848. His wife (1785-1828), a daughter of the Earl of Bessborough, attained some celebrity as a novelist under the title of Lady Caroline Lamb, besides notoriety from her nine months' devotion (1812-13) to Lord Byron. The charge brought against Melbourne in 1836 of seducing the Hon. Mrs Norton (q.v.) was thrown out at once. See Lives by Torrens (1878) and Dunckley (1880; new ed. 1906), and his Papers, edited by Sanders (1889).

Melcombe, LORD. See DODINGTON.

Meleager, author of 128 exquisite epigrams, &c., in the Greek Anthology, flourished 80 B.C. at Gadara in Palestine. See Headlam's translation of fifty of his poems (1891), with French and German works by Ouvré (1894) and Radinger (1896).

Mellon, HARRIOT (c. 1777-1837), born in London, had played comic parts in travelling companies when in 1795 she came out at Drury Lane. In 1815 she married her elderly protector, Thomas Contts (q.v.), who left her all his money, and in 1827 the ninth Duke of St Albans.

Melville, ANDREW, born 1st August 1545, at Baldowie, Montrose, and educated at St Andrews and Paris, in 1566 became regent in the college at Poitiers, and in 1568, through Beza's influence, professor at Geneva. On his return to Scotland (1574) he rendered eminent service as Principal of the college of Glasgow. He had a very important share in drawing up that charter of the Presbyterian polity, the Second Book of Discipline. Chosen Principal of St Mary's College, St Andrews (1580), besides lecturing on theology, he taught Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac. In 1582 he preached boldly against absolute authority before the General Assembly; in 1584 was summoned before the Privy-council on account of a sermon at St Andrews; and to escape imprisonment removed to London, resuming work after an absence of nearly two years. He was repeatedly moderator of the General Assembly. In 1596 he headed a deputation to 'remonstrate' with James VI.; and in 1606, with seven other ministers, was called to England to confer with him. Having ridiculed the service in the Chapel Royal in a Latin epigram, he was summoned before the English Privy-council, and sent to the Tower, where he lay for more than four years. In 1611 he was released on the solicitation of the Duke of Bouillon, who wanted his services as a professor in his university at Sedan. He died about 1622. See the Life by M'Crie (2 vols. 1819).—His nephew, JAMES MELVILLE (1556-1614), became successively regent or tutor in the college of Glasgow, professor of Oriental Languages at St Andrews, and minister in 1586 of Kilsenny, Fife, whence he was ejected in 1606. He is best remembered for his Diary, edited for the Bannatyne Club (1829) and the Wodrow Society (1842).

Melville, HERMAN, was born in New York city, August 1, 1819. He became a sailor, but in 1842, disliking the captain's harshness, deserted from a whaling-ship at the Marquesas Islands, where he was kept four months as the prisoner of a savage tribe in the Typee Valley. His Typee (1846) and Omoo (1847) record his adventures; Murray published new editions of both in 1893. He died 28th September 1891.

Melville, SIR JAMES, of Halhill (1535-1617), went to France as page to the young Queen Mary, and subsequently undertook missions to the courts of England and the Palatinate. See his interesting Memoirs (Bannatyne Club, 1827).

Mening, or MEMPLING, HANS (c. 1440-94), Flemish religious painter, was born at Mainz of Dutch parents, and lived mostly at Bruges. See Lives by Weale (1901) and Michiels (French, 1883); also the Art Journal for 1885.

Ménage, GILES (1613-92), born at Angers, gave up the bar for the church, but chiefly spent his time in literary pursuits. He founded, in opposition to the Academy, a salon, the Mercuriales, which gained him European fame and Molière's ridicule as Vadius in Femmes Savantes. His Dictionnaire Étymologique de la Langue Française (1650; best ed. 1750) and his Origini della Lingua Italiana (1669) are erudite but fanciful. See Life by Baret (1859). [May-nazh'.]

Menander (342-291 B.C.), the greatest Greek poet of the New Comedy, was born at Athens, and was drowned at the Piræus. His comedies were more successful with cultured than with popular audiences; but Quintilian praised him without reserve, and Terence imitated him closely. Only a few fragments of his work were known till 1906, when Lefebvre discovered in Egypt a papyrus containing 1328 lines from four different plays. See the discoverer's text (1907), and the English version and notes by 'Unus Multorum' (1910).

Menchikov. See MENSCHKOFF.

Mencius (Latin for MENG-TSE), a Chinese sage, born in Shan-tung in 372 B.C., who founded a school on the model of that of his great predecessor Confucius. When forty years of age he led forth his disciples and travelled from one princely court to another for more than twenty years, seeking a ruler who would put into practice his system of social and political order. But, finding none, he again withdrew into retirement, and died in 289 B.C. After his death his disciples collected his conversations and exhortations, and published them as the Book of Meng-tse. The aim of his teaching was practical: how men, especially rulers, shall best regulate their conduct. The philosophic root of his system is belief in the ethical goodness of man's nature. From this root grow the cardinal virtues of benevolence, righteousness, moral wisdom, and propriety of conduct. It should be the aim of the individual to perfect himself by practising these virtues in all the relations of his social and political life. In his liberal and enlightened system of political economy, he advocated freedom of trade, the deposition of unworthy rulers, division of labour.

inspection of work by government, maintenance of good roads and bridges, poor-laws, education, and the abolition of war. Chinese ethics are based on his. See Life by Legge (1875).

Mendel, GREGOR JOHANN (1822-84), abbot of Brunn in Moravia, made valuable researches on hybridity in plants.

Mendeleëff, DMITRI IVANOVITCH, chemist, was born at Tobolsk, 7th February 1834, and was professor of Chemistry at St Petersburg from 1866 till his death in 1907. He enriched every section of chemical science, especially by his contributions to physical chemistry and chemical philosophy. See his Principles of Chemistry (trans. 1892; 3d Eng. ed. from 7th Russian one, 1905).

Mendelssohn, Moses, philosopher, was born at Dessau, 6th September 1729. His father, whose name was Mendel, was a Jewish schoolmaster and scribe. In spite of poverty he went to Berlin at thirteen, and devoted himself to Latin, modern languages, and philosophy; and at last became the partner of a rich silk-manufacturer, whose children he had educated. The intimate friend of Lessing and Nicolai, he did much to diminish Christian contempt for Jews; while he roused his own co-religionists from apathy by waging war against their prejudices, and bringing them into contact with modern culture. He died 4th January 1786. He was a diligent student of Locke, Shaftesbury, and Pope; and as a zealous defender of enlightened Monotheism, was an apostle of Deism, and the prototype of Lessing's Nathan. His principal works are on Pope as a philosopher (conjointly with Lessing, 1755), on the Sensations (1755), on Evidence in Metaphysics (1763); Phædon (1767), a Platonic dialogue on the immortality of the soul; Jerusalem (1783), a defence of Judaism; and Morgenstunden, essays against Pantheism and Spinozism. See Life by Kayserling (2d ed. 1887).

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, FELIX, composer, was born at Hamburg, 3d February 1809. His father was Abraham, the second son of Moses Mendelssohn, and founder of an eminent Berlin banking firm (first at Hamburg), who resolved to bring up his children as Protestant Christians, and added the name of Bartholdy to that of Mendelssohn. As a child Felix was carefully educated, especially in music; at ten he made his first public appearance, playing the piano-forte part in a trio at a concert in Berlin. With 1820 began that period of prolific production which lasted almost till his death. At the same time he entered upon a ceaseless round of social gaiety and activity. Within the next few years he formed the acquaintance of Goethe, Weber, and Moscheles, and had composed his Symphony in C minor and the B minor Quartet. The August of 1825 saw the completion of his opera, Cunachio's Wedding. With the Midsummer Night's Dream overture (1826) Mendelssohn may be said to have attained his musical majority. Out of humour with the musical world of Berlin, he resolved to travel. He arrived in London in April 1829, and conducted his Symphony in C minor at a concert of the Philharmonic Society. A tour through Scotland in the summer inspired him with the Hebrides overture and the Scotch Symphony. Next year he visited Munich, Vienna, Venice, and Rome, and by Paris he returned to London in 1832. Thence he went back to Berlin. His success in conducting the Lower Rhine festival at Düsseldorf in 1833 led to his being offered the entire direction of the music for three years. But his stay at Düssel-dorf was full of responsibilities and worries, and in 1835 he left to conduct the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig. At Birmingham in 1837 he conducted his St Paul, first heard at Düsseldorf the previous year. September 1840 found him again at Birmingham conducting the Lobgesang. The king of Prussia requested him to assist in the foundation of an Academy of Arts, and, though loth to leave, he removed to Berlin in 1841. In 1843 the new music-school at Leipzig was opened for him, with Schumann and David among his associates. He was in London in 1844; and on August 26, 1846, produced his Elijah at Birmingham. But hard work was now beginning to tell on him, for, although his Berlin duties and his position as chief of the Leipzig Conservatorium entailed constant labour and anxiety, he persisted in carrying out all his engagements. He had scarcely returned from his tenth and last visit to England, in May 1847, when the news of his sister Fanny's death reached him. Periods of illness and depression followed rapidly; and on November 4, 1847, he expired at Leipzig. He was buried at Berlin. Mendelssohn was eminent both as pianist and organist, especially in his rendering of the works of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven. He moreover possessed a remarkable facility of improvisation and a talent for landscape-drawing. His music rarely if ever reaches the innermost depths of passion and feeling; but though lacking the profounder beauties and more pathetic qualities, has always the power to imbue us with his own spirit of habitual cheerfulness. See several collections of Mendelssohn's Letters (1861, 1863, 1893-94); Lives by Benedict (1850), Moscheles (1873); trans. by Coleridge, Lampadius (1886), and Reissmann (3d ed. 1892); Reminiscences by Devrient (3d ed. 1891), Hiller (2d ed. 1878), Horsley (1873), and Marx (1865); and Hensel, Die Familie Mendelssohn (8th ed. 1895; trans. 1882).

Mendès, CATULLE (1841-1909), born at Bordeaux of Jewish parentage, passed from the Parnassians to the Romantics, and wrote poems, romances, dramas, and libretti, as well as journalistic articles and criticisms. [Man's days.]

Mendoza, an illustrious family of Basque origin, one of whose members, Iñigo Lopez de Mendoza, created Marquis of Santillana by John II. of Castile in 1445 for his services on the field, was a wise statesman, a sturdy patriot, and an admired poet. He further left an excellent account of the Provençal, Catalan, and Valencian poets, and was the first of folk-lorists, a collector of popular proverbs ('such as the old women repeat over the fire.' The most famous of his six sons was Pedro, Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, the trusted prime-minister of Ferdinand and Isabella. —The marquis's great-grandson, DIEGO HURTADO DE MENDOZA (1503-75), to whom Charles V. entrusted the conduct of his Italian policy and the representation of his views at the Council of Trent, inherited his gifts as a statesman and man of letters. He did conspicuous service in grafting Italian poetry on the Spanish stem; and his War of Granada, a history of the revolt of the Moriscos in 1568-70 against Philip II., is a masterpiece of Spanish prose. Greater glory yet would surround his name if his right to the little tale of Lazarillo de Tormes could be clearly made out.

Mendoza, DANIEL (1764-1836), Jewish prize-fighter, was born and died in London.

Mengs, ANTON RAPHAEL, artist and art-critic, was born, the son of a Danish artist, at Aussig in Bohemia, March 12, 1728, and studied three years at Rome. In 1744 he was named court-painter to the king of Saxony, but settled at Rome, where he turned Catholic, married, and was appointed (1754) director of a school of painting. By royal invitation he twice visited Spain (1761-70 and 1773-76), where he did some of his best work. He died at Rome, 29th June 1779.

Ménier, ÉMILE JUSTIN (1826-81), established at Noisiel the great chocolate factory, with a branch in London, chemical-works at St Denis, and a sugar factory at Roze, besides a caoutchouc factory, and in Nicaragua a cocoa plantation. A keen free-trader, he wrote Économie Rurale (1875), L'Avenir Économique (1875-79), &c.

Menken, ADAH ISAACS, née ADELAIDE McCORD (1835-68), actress and poetess, was born in Louisiana, appeared in London with immense success as Mazeppa (1864), and died a professed Jewess in Paris. She was at least four times married—to a Jew, Menken; Heenan, the 'Benicia Boy'; R. H. Newell, 'Orpheus C. Kerr'; &c.; and among her friends were Charles Reade, Mr Swinburne, and Dickens, to whom is dedicated her Infelicia (1868).

Menschikoff, ALEXANDER DANILOVITCH, Russian field-marshal and statesman, was born of humble parentage at Moscow, 16th November 1672, but entering the army, distinguished himself at the siege of Azov, and afterwards accompanied Peter the Great in his travels to Holland and England. During the war with Sweden (1702-13) he played an important part at Pultowa—Peter made him a field-marshal there—Riga, Stettin, &c. At the capture of Marienburg the girl who became Catharine I. fell into Menschikoff's hands, and was through him introduced to the czar. Towards the end of Peter's reign Menschikoff lost favour owing to extortions and suspected duplicities. But when Peter died he secured the succession of Catharine, and during her reign and that of her young successor, Peter II., he governed Russia with almost absolute authority. He was about to marry his daughter to the young czar when the jealousy of the old nobility led to his banishment to Siberia and the confiscation of his immense estates. He died 2d November 1729. — His great-grandson, ALEXANDER SERGIEVITCH (1789-1869), rose to the rank of general in the campaigns of 1812-15, was severely wounded at Varna in the Turkish campaign of 1823, and was made head of the Russian navy. His overbearing behaviour as ambassador at Constantinople brought about the Crimean war, when he commanded at Alma and Inkermann, and defended Sebastopol, but in 1855 was recalled because of illness. Till his death he was a prominent member of the old Russian party.

Menteith, SIR JOHN DE, the betrayer in 1304 of Wallace (q.v.), rejoined the national party.

Menzel, ADOLF (1815-1905), painter, illustrator, and engraver, born at Breslau, is everywhere known for his drawings illustrating the times of Frederick the Great and William I. His 80th birthday was publicly celebrated in 1895. See works by Wessely (1873), Jordan and Dohme (1890-95), and Sondernmann (1895).

Menzel, WOLFGANG (1798-1873), born at Waldenburg in Silesia, studied at Jena and Bonn, and for four years schoolmaster at Aarau in Switzerland, but from 1825 lived mainly in Stuttgart. He edited magazines, and wrote poems, romances, histories, literary criticism, and polemics. His chief works were histories of Germany (1825; Eng. trans. 1848), German literature (1827; trans. 1840), German poetry (1858), Europe (1853-57), and the world (16 vols. 1862-72), and autobiographical Denkwürdigkeiten (1876). He attacked both rationalists and radicals. [Ment.-sel.]

Meopham, SIMON, born probably at Meopham near Rochester, studied at Oxford, and was Archbishop of Canterbury from 1328 till his death, 12th October 1333. [Meep'am.]

Mercadante, SAVERIO (1797-1870), a Neapolitan composer, who produced some sixty operas, and was blind from 1861. [Mer-ca-dan'-teh.]

Mercator (the Latinised form of KREMER), a Flemish mathematician, geographer, and map-maker, of German extraction, who lived 1512-92.

Meredith, GEORGE, novelist and poet, was born in Hampshire, 12th February 1828, and made his first appearance as a poet with 'Chillianwallah' in Chambers's Journal for July 1849. This was followed in 1851 by a little volume of Poems, and in 1855 by The Shaving of Shagpat, a highly original burlesque of the Eastern story. Farina: a Legend of Cologne (1857), parodies German romance. Of the greater works The Ordeal of Richard Feverel (1859) is a tragic romance, dealing with the larger problems of education. Evam Harrington (1861) is an amusing novel of social ambitions. Modern Love, and Poems of the English Roadside, with Poems and Ballads (1862), tell their story in a somewhat dark and fragmentary manner, but with great truth of observation and strength of pathos. Emilia in England (1864; in 1886 renamed Sandra Belloni) is continued in Vittoria (1866), the scene of which is laid in Italy during the rising of 1848. In 1865 appeared Rhoda Fleming, a tragedy; the romantic Adventures of Harry Richmond followed in 1871. Beauchamp's Career (1875) is perhaps the most perfectly constructed of all the series. The Egoist (1879) is a searching and remorseless study of a single aspect of refined selfishness. The Tragic Comedians (1881) is a somewhat close rendering of the Countess Racowitza's painful story of Lassalle's tragic end. Diana of the Crossways (1885), the Hon. Mrs Norton her prototype, is by general consent the most charming of Mr Meredith's novels. Three small volumes of verse were entitled Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth (1883), Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life (1887), and A Reading of Earth (1888). One of our Conquerors (1891), Lord Ormont and his Aminta (1894), and The Amazing Marriage (1895) deal more or less directly with the great problems of politics, sociology, and ethics. Critics rank Meredith as the foremost novelist of his day, as well as one of the most invigorating and stimulative thinkers of his generation; but the voice of the great public has not as yet been unanimously given in his favour, and 'his most resolute partisans are those of his own household—journalists, poets, and novelists.' Among the elements of his power are his wide, accurate, and sympathetic observation of nature and of life, his inventive resource, his analytic and synthetic power, and his singular mastery of words. His descriptions of scenery are varied, vivid, and poetical, his delineations of phases of feeling those of a master. Among the 'defects of his qualities' are a certain intricacy of plot, a love for elliptical statement and unexplained allusion, a frequent over-elaboration of style, and a strained wit that fatigues rather than exhilarates. Meredith, who was for thirty years literary reader to Chapman & Hall, died 18th May 1909. He was LL.D., and O.M. (1905). An edition of his novels, much recast, appeared in 1896-1902 (32 vols.; also a popular ed. in 16 vols.). His verse is remarkable rather for its revelation of beauty in nature and life, its imaginative suggestion, than for its simplicity or melody. See books by Lynch (1901), Jerrold (1903), Trevelyan (1906), Henderson and Selincourt (1907).

Mérimee, PROSPER, born at Paris, 28th September 1803, the son of a painter, studied law, visited Spain in 1830, and held posts under the ministries of Marine, Commerce, and the Interior. Admitted to the Academy in 1844, he became a senator in 1853. His last years were clouded by ill-health and melancholy, and the misfortunes of his country and the downfall of the empire hastened his death, at Cannes, 23d September 1870. He began his career as a writer at twenty-two by plays professing to be translated from the Spanish, followed by a pretended translation of Illyrian folk-songs. His more important works embrace novels and short stories, archaeological and historical dissertations, and travels, all of which display exact learning, keen observation, strong intellectual grasp, real humour, and an exquisite style. Of his more erudite works may be named Histoire de Père I. de Castille (1848; Eng. trans. 1849), Études sur l'Histoire Romaine (1844), Les faux Démétrius (1852), Monuments historiques (1843), and Mélanges historiques et littéraires (1855). Of his twenty tales, some are among the rarest masterpieces: Colomba, Mateo Falcone, Carmen, La Venus d'Ille, Lokis, Arsène Guillot, La Chambre Bleue, and L'Abbé Aubain. Few lives have been more unhappy and melancholy than Mérimee's. But in the famous Lettres à une Inconnue (1873) we find a man affectionate, delicate, and touched with poetry despite his scepticism. Only less interesting are the Lettres à une autre Inconnue (1875), and the Letters to Panizzi (1881). See works by Tamisier (1875), Tournoux (1879), Haussonville (1888), Filon (1894-98). Merivale, JOHN HERMAN (1779-1844), translator, was born at Exeter, educated at St John's College, Cambridge, called to the bar in 1805, and in 1831 made a Commissioner of Bankruptcy. He contributed to Bland's Greek Anthology (1813), brought out a second edition in 1833, and published Poems Original and Translated (1841) and Minor Poems of Schiller (1844).—CHARLES, his son, born in 1808, and educated at Harrow, Haileybury, and St John's College, Cambridge, took his degree in 1830, and became fellow and tutor. Successively Hulsean lecturer (1861), Boyle lecturer (1864), and rector of Lawford, he was appointed Dean of Ely in 1869, and died 26th Dec. 1893. His eloquent Fall of the Roman Republic (1853) and History of the Romans under the Empire (7 vols. 1850-62) are both over-kind to imperialism. Later books are a General History of Rome (1875), Early Church History (1879), and Pagan and Christian Society (1880). See Autobiography and Letters (priv. printed, 1898).—Another son, HERMAN (1806-74), educated at Harrow and Trinity, Oxford, elected fellow of Balliol, and called to the bar in 1832, became professor of Political Economy at Oxford in 1837, and, later, Under-secretary of State first for the colonies, next for India, and C.B.—His son, HERMAN CHARLES (1839-1906), wrote some successful plays, including Forget-Me-Not, The Butler, The Don, and The Master of Ravenswood; a novel, Faucit of Balliol (1882; in its stage form, The Cynic); and The White Pilgrim and other Poems

Merlin, an ancient British prophet and magician, supposed to have flourished during the decline of the native British power in its contest with the Saxons, and a hero of Arthurian romance. There may have been two real Merlins—a 5th-century Welsh Merlin and a Caledonian 6th-century duplicate.

Merriman, HENRY SETON (pen-name of Hugh Stowell Scott; died 1903), author of The Phantom Future (1889), Prisoners and Captives (1891), With Edged Tools (1894), The Sowers (1896), Flotsam (1896), In Kedar's Tents (1897), &c.

Mersenne, MARIN (1588-1648), a friend of Descartes, took the habit of a Minim Friar in 1611, and spent his life in study, teaching in convent-schools, and travel. He was a profound mathematician and musician, and stoutly defended the orthodoxy of the Cartesian philosophy.

Merton, WALTER DE, the founder in 1264-74 of Merton College, Oxford, the first of our English colleges, was probably born at Merton in Surrey, and was Bishop of Rochester from 1274 till his death on 27th October 1277.

Méryon, CHARLES (1821-68), a Parisian etcher, known by his sombre and imaginative etchings of Paris streets and buildings. See Wedmore in Art Journal (1881), and Burty's monograph (1879).

Mesdag, HENDRIK WILLEM (1831-1902), marine painter, born at Groningen, settled at the Hague. See monograph by Zilcken (trans. 1896).

Mesmer, FRIEDRICH ANTON OR FRANZ, the founder of mesmerism, was born near Constance, 23d May 1734, and bred for the priesthood, but studied medicine at Vienna, and about 1772 took up the opinion that there exists a power of extraordinary medicinal influence on the human body, which he called animal magnetism. In 1778 he went to Paris, where he created a great sensation. He refused an annual pension of 20,000 livres to reveal his secret; but in 1785 a commission of physicians and scientists (Baillly, Franklin, Lavoisier, &c.) reported on him unfavourably. He fell into disrepute, and after a visit to England, spent the rest of his life in obscurity at Meersburg in Switzerland. He died 5th March 1815. See Life by Kerner (Frankf. 1856), and Graham's Mesmer the Magnetiser (1890).

Messalina, VALERIA, the wife of the Roman emperor Claudius, a woman infamous for her avarice, lust, and bloodthirsty cruelty. Among her victims were the daughters of Germanicus and Drusus, Valerius Asiaticus, and her confederate Polybius. During an absence of the emperor she went so far in shamelessness as publicly to marry one of her favourites. The emperor's eyes were at last opened, and he had her executed (48 A.D.).

Metastasio, the Grecised name of PIETRO TRAPASSI, an Italian poet, who was born of humble parents at Rome, 6th January 1698. A precocious gift for improvising verses and reciting them on the street gained him a patron in Gravina, a lawyer, who educated him, and left him (1718) his fortune. At Naples after 1722 Metastasio wrote for the singer Bulgarini a series of opera-libretti, all on classical subjects, which were set to music by composers such as Pergolese, Scarlatti, Durante, and Paisiello, and sung by the greatest singers. In 1729 he was appointed court-poet to the Vienna theatre, for which he wrote several of his best pieces. His reputation stood high throughout Europe, but from 1825 to 1865 his name, as of a recreant to the national cause, was anathema in Italy. He died in Vienna 12th April 1782, having for nearly forty years suffered from 'mental and moral ennui.' See his Letters, edited by Carducci (1883); Vernon Lee's Studies (2d ed. 1886); and Lives by Burney (Lond. 1796), Mussafia (1882), and Falconi (1883).

Metcalfe, JOHN (1717-1810), 'Blind Jack of Knarsborough,' lost his eyesight at six, but, tall and vigorous, fought at Falkirk and Culloden, smuggled, drove a stage-coach, and from 1765 took to road-making with great success.

Metcalfe, CHARLES THEOPHILUS, LORD (1785-1846), Indian and colonial administrator, born at Calcutta, succeeded as third baronet in 1822, and was made a peer in 1845. See Life by Kaye (new ed. 1858).

Metchnikoff, ELIAS (1845-1906), Russian naturalist, was born in Kharkoff govt., and in 1870 became professor at Odessa. The Nature of Man was translated in 1903.

Methuen, SIR PAUL (1672-1757), a diplomatist, ambassador to Portugal and Spain.

Metsu, GABRIEL (1630-67), born at Leyden, studied under Gerard Dow, and settled as painter of genre pictures at Amsterdam.

Metternich, CLEMENS LOTHAR WENZEL, PRINCE, diplomatist, nobly born at Coblenz, 15th May 1773, studied at Strasburg and Mainz, was attached to the Austrian embassy at the Hague, and at twenty-eight was Austrian minister at Dresden, two years later at Berlin, and in 1805 (after Austerlitz) at Paris. In 1807 he concluded the treaty of Fontainebleau; in 1809 was appointed Austrian foreign minister, and as such negotiated the marriage between Napoleon and Marie Louise. In 1812-13 he maintained at first a temporising policy, but at last declared war; the grand alliance was signed at Teplitz; and Metternich was made a prince of the empire. He took a very prominent part in the Congress of Vienna, rearranging a German confederation (while disavouring German unity under Prussian influence), and guarding Austria's interests in Italy. From 1815 he was the most active representative of reaction all over Europe, persistently striving to repress all popular and constitutional aspirations. As the main supporter of autocracy and police despotism at home and abroad he is largely responsible for the tension that led to the upheaval of 1848. The French Revolution of that year, which overturned for a time half the thrones of Europe, was felt at Vienna, and the government fell. Metternich fled to England, and in 1851 retired to his castle of Johannisberg on the Rhine. He died at Vienna 11th June 1859. A brilliant diplomatist, a man of iron nerve and will, though personally kindly, he had few deep convictions, no warm sympathies, and no deep insight into the lessons of history. See his not too trustworthy Autobiography (French, 1879-82; Eng. trans. 1880-83), edited by his son, and works by Binder (1836), Gross-Hoffinger (1846), Schmidt-Weissenfels (1861), Beer (1877), Col. Malleon (1888), Mazade (Par. 1889), Demeitsch (vol. i. 1898), and Sandeman (1911).

Meulen, ADAM FRANÇOIS VAN DER (1632-90),

Flemish painter, born at Brussels, was in 1666 appointed battle-painter to Louis XIV. [Mehlen.]

Meung, JEAN DE, or JEAN CLOPINEL (c. 1250-1305), satirist, flourished at Paris under Philip the Fair. He translated many books into French, and left a witty Testament. But his great work is his lengthy continuation of the Roman de la Rose, which substituted for tender allegorising satirical pictures of actual life. [May-ans.]

Meursius, JOHANNES or JAN DE MEURS (1579-1639), born at Loosduinen near the Hague, became in 1610 professor of History, and in 1611 of Greek, at Leyden, Historiographer to the States-general, and in 1625 professor of History at Sorø in Denmark, where he died. His industry was portentous. He edited Cato's De Re Rustica, Plato's Timæus, Theophrastus's Characters, and a long series of the later Greek writers; besides writing on Greek antiquities and Dutch and Danish history.—His son, JOHANNES (1613-54), wrote antiquarian works of value, but his name has oddly been connected with the filthy Elegantie Lingue Latine (probably by Chorier of Vienne, 1609-92), with which he had nothing to do.

Meyer, CONRAD FERDINAND (1825-98), Swiss poet and novelist, was born at Zurich. His historical novels Jürg Jenatsch (1876) and Der Heilige (1880) have passed through many editions, as has his poem Huttens letzte Tage (1872). See a Memoir by Reiter (1885). [Mi-er.]

Meyer, HEINRICH AUGUST WILHELM (1800-73), commentator, born at Gotha, was pastor in several cures, and wrote New Testament Commentaries—a monument of exegetical science re-edited by Weiss, Wendt, Beyschlag, &c. The translation in Clark's series is in 20 vols. (1873-82).

Meyer, JOSEPH (1796-1856), publisher, was born at Gotha, and issued many important serial works, editions of German classics, the encyclopædia known as Konversations-lexikon, historical libraries, &c. His business, the 'Bibliographical Institute,' was in 1828 transferred from Gotha to Hildburghausen, in 1874 (by his son) to Leipzig.

Meyer, LOTHAR VON (1830-95), chemist, professor at Eberswalde, Carlsruhe, and (1876) Tübingen.

Meyerbeer, GIACOMO, operatic composer, was born at Berlin, September 5, 1791. Originally Jakob Beer, son of a Jewish banker, he adopted the name Meyer from a benefactor, and reconstructed and Italianised the whole. At seven he played in public Mozart's D minor concerto, and at fifteen was received into the house of Abt Vogler at Darmstadt, where Weber was his fellow-pupil. His earlier works were unsuccessful, but in Vienna he obtained fame as a pianist. After three years' study in Italy he produced operas in the new (Rossini's) style, which at once gained a cordial reception. From 1824 to 1831 he lived mostly in Berlin. He next applied himself to a minute study of French opera. The result of this was seen in the production at Paris in 1831 of Robert le Diable (libretto by Scribe), whose totally new style secured unparalleled success over all Europe. It was followed in 1836 by the even more successful Huguenots. Appointed Kapellmeister at Berlin, he wrote the opera Ein Feldlager in Schlesien. Le Prophète appeared at Paris in 1849, with fair success. His first comic opera, L'Étoile du Nord, carried the day in 1854, and was succeeded in 1859 by Dinorah. A musical drama, La Jeunesse de Goethe (words by Blaze de Bury), never saw the light. L'Africaine, in hand since 1838, was produced with triumphant success after his death at Paris, May 2, 1864.

Praised extravagantly by Fétis and others, Meyerbeer was severely condemned by Schumann and Wagner on the ground that, inspired by no deeply-rooted artistic principle, he made everything subsidiary to theatrical effect. His successive adoption of widely-different styles bears this out. But even opponents concede the power and beauty of some of his pieces. His grand operas—splendid, spectacular, melodramatic—hit the taste of the public. See Lives by Mendel (Berl. 1868), Schucht (Leip. 1869), and by Bennett in Novello's series. [Meyer-beir.]

Meynell, ALICE. See BUTLER, SIR W. F.

Meyrick, SIR SAMUEL RUSH (1783-1848), an ecclesiastical lawyer, a great authority on armour, was born in London, and died at Goodrich Court, Ross, having been knighted in 1832.

Mezzofanti, GIUSEPPE (1774-1849), born at Bologna, was professor of Arabic there, but in 1833 became Vatican librarian at Rome, and in 1838 a cardinal. His reputation rested solely on his marvellous linguistic acquirements; he spoke fifty-eight tongues. See Life by Russell (1857).

Miall, EDWARD (1809-81), apostle of disestablishment, born at Portsmouth, was an Independent minister at Ware and Leicester. In 1840 he founded the Nonconformist newspaper; in 1844 helped to establish the Liberation Society; and was M.P. for Rochdale 1852-67, for Bradford 1869-74. See Life by A. Miall (1884).

Micah, the sixth of the twelve minor prophets, was a native of Moresheth Gath in SW. Judah, and prophesied during the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, being a younger contemporary of Isaiah, Hosea, and Amos. On the book of Micah, see works by Caspari (1852) and Ryssel (1889), in German; and Cheyne, in English (1882).

Michaëlis, JOHANN DAVID (1717-91), biblical scholar, was born at Halle, the son of a theologian, travelled in England and Holland, and became professor of Philosophy (1746) and in addition of Oriental Languages (1750) at Göttingen, where he helped to found the Göttingen Academy. A man of vast attainments, and of wide and lasting influence, he was one of the first to study the biblical narratives as a part of oriental history. Of his many works, his Introduction to the New Testament was translated into English (1801; 4th ed. 1823), as was the Mosaic Law (1814). The Orientalische und exegetische Bibliothek appeared 1775-91; other works were on Hebrew geography and in Hebrew and Syriac lexicography. See his Autobiography (1793). [Mee-kay-lis.]

Michel, FRANCISQUE (1809-87), antiquary, born at Lyons, from 1839 a professor at Bordeaux, earned a reputation by researches in Norman history, French chansons, argot, the Basques, the history of medieval commerce, and the byways of learning. Among his books were Histoire des Races Maudites (1847), Histoire des Hôtels des Races (1854), Les Écossais en France et Les Français en Écosse (1862), and A Critical Inquiry into the Scottish Language (Edin. 1882). [Mee-shell.]

Michel, LOUISE (1830-1905), a French Anarchist, long resident in London, was born at Vroncourt.

Michelangelo (or MICHAEL ANGELO) was in full called Michelangelo Buonarroti, and was born March 6, 1475, the son of a poor gentleman of Florence, at that time mayor of Caprese and Chiusi in Tuscany. At school the boy's best energies were devoted to drawing, though to his father's aristocratic prejudice art seemed a calling unworthy of a gentleman; and at thirteen, resolute in his choice, he was bound apprentice to Ghirlandajo. By his master he was recommended to Lorenzo de' Medici, and entered the school for which the 'Magnifico' had gathered together a priceless collection of antiques. Lorenzo soon gave the gifted student a room in his house and a seat at his table. In the 'Battle of the Centaurs' (a relief of this period) the classical influence of Lorenzo's garden is strikingly apparent, though the straining muscles and contorted limbs, which mark the artist's mature work, are already visible. A marvellous contrast to the 'Centaurs' is the 'Madonna,' conceived and executed in the spirit of Donatello, which, though not consciously antique, is far more classical. After Lorenzo's death in 1492, Piero, his son and successor, is said to have treated the artist with scant courtesy; and Michelangelo fled to Bologna for a time, but in 1495 he returned to Florence, and produced a marble 'Cupid.' Its purchaser, Cardinal San Giorgio, summoned the sculptor to Rome, and in 1496 Michelangelo arrived in the Eternal City. The influence of Rome and the antique is easily discernible in the 'Bacchus,' now in the National Museum at Florence. To the same period belongs the exquisite 'Cupid' of the South Kensington Museum. The 'Pieta' (1497), now in St Peter's, shows a realism wholly at variance with the antique ideal. For four years the sculptor remained in Rome, and then returning to Florence, fashioned the 'David' out of a colossal block of marble. 'David' is the Gothic treatment of a classic theme; in pose and composition there is a stately grandeur, a dignified solemnity. A second 'David' (this time of bronze) was commissioned and sent to France, where all trace of it is lost. The 'Holy Family of the Tribune' and the 'Manchester Madonna' in the National Gallery belong to the same time, and, like a cartoon (now lost) for a fresco never completed in the Great Hall of the Council, prove that Michelangelo had not wholly neglected the art of painting. His genius, however, was essentially plastic; he had far more interest in form than in colour. In 1503 Julius II., succeeding to the pontificate, again summoned the painter-sculptor to Rome. Michelangelo could as little brook opposition as the pope, and their dealings were continually interrupted by bitter quarrels and recriminations. The pope commissioned the sculptor to design his tomb, and for forty years Michelangelo clung to the hope that he would yet complete the great monument; but intrigue and spite were too strong for him. Other demands were continually made upon his energy, and the sublime statue of Moses is the best fragment that is left to us of the tomb of Julius. Bramante, if Vasari's account be true, poisoned the pope's mind against the sculptor; instead of being allowed to devote himself to the monument, which he deemed the work of his life, he was ordered to decorate the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel with paintings. In vain he protested that sculpture was his profession, in vain he urged Raphael's higher qualifications for the task; the pope was obdurate, and in 1508-12 Michelangelo achieved a masterpiece of decorative design. Almost superhuman invention, marvellous variety of attitude and gesture, place this marvellous work among the greatest achievements of human energy. No sooner had he finished his work in the Sistine Chapel than he returned with eagerness to the tomb. But in 1513 Pope Julius II. died, and the cardinals, his executors, demanded a more modest design. Next, before the work could be undertaken Pope

Leo X., of the Medici family, commissioned Michelangelo to rebuild the façade of the church of San Lorenzo at Florence and enrich it with sculptured figures. The master reluctantly complied, and set out for Carrara to quarry marble; from 1514 to 1522 his artistic record is a blank, as the elaborate scheme was ultimately given up, though the sculptor, distracted by ever-new demands, remained in Florence. But in 1528 the danger of his native city forced him to the science of fortification, and when in 1529 Florence was besieged Michelangelo was foremost in its defence. After the surrender he completed the monuments to Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici, which are among the greatest of his works. In 1533 yet another compact was entered into concerning Pope Julius's ill-fated sepulchre; whereupon he was once again commissioned to adorn the Sistine Chapel with frescoes. After a delay of some years he began in 1537 to paint 'The Last Judgment,' which, finished at Christmas 1541, was the master's last pictorial achievement. Next year he was appointed architect of St Peter's, and devoted himself to the work with loyalty until his death, on 18th February 1564. Michelangelo is by far the most brilliant representative of the Italian Renaissance. He was not only supreme in the arts of sculpture and painting—in which grandeur and sublimity rather than beauty was his aim—but was learned in all the learning of his age, a poet of powerful individuality, an architect and military engineer. See the old Lives by Vasari and Condivi (1553); works by Springer (3d ed. 1895), Hermann Grimm (7th ed. 1894; trans. 1897), Von Scheffler (1892), Gabriel Thomas (1891), and J. A. Symonds (2 vols. 1892); also Milanese's Lettere di Michelangelo (1873). The sonnets were Englished by J. A. Symonds in 1878.

Michelet, Jules, historian, was born, a printer's son, at Paris, 21st August 1798, lectured on history at the École Normale, after the Revolution of 1830 held a post at the Archives, and became assistant to Guizot at the Sorbonne, and tutor to the Princess Clémentine. In 1838 he was elected to the Academy, and appointed professor of History at the Collège de France. Already he had made his name known by admirable handbooks, and had commenced his monumental Histoire de France (18 vols. 1833-67; new ed. 1879). Other works were Origines du Droit Français (1837), Mémoires de Luther (1845), and Procès de Templiers (1841-51). He showed his keen dislike for priests and Jesuits in Des Jésuites (jointly with Quinet, 1843), Le Prêtre, la Femme, et la Famille (1845), and Le Peuple (1846). His famous Histoire de la Révolution (7 vols. 1847-53; centenary ed. 1889) is hardly a good history with all its eloquence and enthusiasm. By refusing to swear allegiance to Louis Napoleon he lost his appointments, and henceforth worked mostly in Brittany and the Riviera. More valuable as literature than as science were L'Oiseau (1856), L'Insecte (1857), La Mer (1861), and La Montagne (1868). Other books were L'Amour (1858), La Femme (1860), La Sorcière (1862), La Bible de l'Humanité (1864), and Nos Fils (1869). In his last years he set himself to complete his great Histoire, but he did not live to carry it beyond Waterloo (3 vols. 1872-75). He died at Hyères, 9th February 1874. See books by G. Monod (1875 and 1905), Corréard (1886), J. Simon (1889), and Mine Quinet (1900). [Meesh-lay.]

Mickiewicz, Adam, Polish poet, was born near Novogrodek in Lithuania (Minsk), 24th December 1798, and educated at Vilna. He published his first poems in 1822, and as founder of a students' secret society was banished to Russia (1824-29); there he produced three epic poems, glowing with patriotism. After a journey in Germany, France, and Italy appeared (1834) his masterpiece, the epic Pan Tadeusz (Thaddeus; Eng. trans. 1886)—a brilliant delineation of Lithuanian scenery, manners, and beliefs. After teaching at Lausanne, he was appointed Slavonic professor at Paris in 1840, but deprived in 1843 for political utterances. He went to Italy to organise the Polish legion, but in 1852 Louis Napoleon appointed him a librarian in the Paris Arsenal. He died 28th Nov. 1855 at Constantinople, whither the emperor had sent him to raise a Polish legion for service against Russia. His body, first buried at Montmorency in France, was in 1890 laid beside Kosciusko's in Cracow cathedral. Mickiewicz, the national poet of the Poles, is after Pushkin the greatest of all Slav poets. See Lives by his son (1888) and M. M. Gardner (1911). [Mis-ke-ay'vitch.]

Mickle, William Julius (1735-88), born in Langholm manse, and educated at Edinburgh High School, failed as a brewer, and turned author in London. In 1765 he published a poem, The Concubine (or Syr Martyr), and in 1771-75 his version rather than translation of the Lusid of Camoens. In 1779 he went to Lisbon as secretary to Commodore Johnstone, but his last years were spent in London. His ballad of Cumnor Hall (which suggested Kenilworth to Scott) is poor stuff, but 'There's nae luck about the house' is assured of immortality. See Life by Sim prefixed to Mickle's Poems (1806), and ADAM (JEAN).

Middleton, Conyers (1683-1750), controversialist, born at Richmond in Yorkshire, became a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, librarian to the university, and rector of Hascombe in Surrey. He died at his seat at Hildersham in Cambridgeshire. All his life through Middleton was busy in controversy, and in bitterness of tone he was a match for any of his contemporaries. Though at first successful with Bentley, he afterwards had to apologise to him for libel. His later theological controversies gained him great distinction, but left his own sincerity under grievous suspicion. His Letter from Rome, showing an exact Conformity between Popery and Paganism (1729), was an attack on the Catholic ritual. He next assailed the orthodox Waterland, giving up literal inspiration and the historical truth of the Old Testament. He professed to be answering Tindal and other Deists, but it is none too certain that he was not himself a freethinker. In 1747-48 he published his Introductory Discourse and the Free Inquiry into the miraculous powers claimed for the post-apostolic church. His famous Life of Cicero (1741) was largely borrowed from Bellenden (q.v.).

Middleton, Sir Huoh (c. 1560-1631), a London goldsmith, born at Galch Hill near Denbigh, in 1609-13 carried out the New River for supplying London with water. He represented Denbigh from 1603, and was made a baronet in 1622.

Middleton, Thomas (c. 1570-1627), dramatist, is first mentioned in Henslowe's Diary in 1602, when he was engaged with Munday, Drayton, and Webster on a lost play, Cæsar's Fall. First on the list of his printed plays is Blurt, Master Constable (1602), a light, fanciful comedy. Two interesting tracts, Father Hubbard's Tale and The Black Book, exposing London rogues, were published in 1604, to which year belongs the first part of The Honest Whore (mainly written by Dekker, partly by Middleton). The Phoenix and Michaelmas Term (1607) are lively comedies; even more diverting is A Trick to catch the Old One (1608); and A Mad World, my Masters, from which Aphra Behn pilfered freely in The City Heiress, is singularly adroit. The Roaring Girl (1611; written with Dekker) idealises the character of a noted cut-purse and virago. Middleton was repeatedly employed to write the Lord Mayor's pageant. A Chaste Maid in Cheapside was probably produced in 1613, as was No Wit, No Help Like a Woman's. A Fair Quarrel (1617) and The World Tost at Tennis (1620) were written in conjunction with Rowley, as was probably More Dissemblers besides Women (1622?) and The Mayor of Quinborough. In 1620 Middleton was appointed City Chronologer, and a MS. Chronicle by him was extant in the 18th century. The delightful comedy, The Old Law, first published in 1656, is mainly the work of Rowley, with something by Middleton, all revised by Massinger. In the three posthumous plays, The Changeling, The Spanish Gypsy, and Women beware Women, Middleton's genius is seen at its highest. Rowley had a share in the first two and probably in the third. A very curious and skilful play is A Game at Chess, acted in 1624. The Widow, published in 1652, was mainly by Middleton. Anything for a Quiet Life (c. 1619) may have been revised by Shirley. Middleton was concerned in the authorship of some of the plays included in the works of Beaumont and Fletcher. Middleton's works have been edited by Dyce (5 vols. 1840) and Bullen (8 vols. 1885-86).

Mieris, FRANS VAN (1635-81), who was born and died at Leyden, painted small genre-pictures and portraits like his son, WILLEM (1662-1747), and his son, FRANS (1689-1763). [Meer-ess.]

Migne, JACQUES PAUL (1800-75), born at St Flour in Cantal, and educated at Orleans, was ordained priest in 1824, and served as curate at Puisieux. A difference with his bishop drove him to Paris in 1833, where he started the Catholic L'Univers. In 1836 he sold the paper, and soon after set up a great publishing house at Petit Montrouge near Paris, which gave to the world Scripturæ Sacre Cursus and Theologic Cursus (each 28 vols. 1840-45), Collection des Orateurs Sacrés (100 vols. 1846-48), Patrologiæ Cursus (383 vols. 1844 et seq.), and Encyclopédie Théologique (171 vols. 1844-66). None of these possess critical value. The Archbishop of Paris, thinking that the undertaking had become a commercial speculation, forbade it to be continued, and when Migne resisted, suspended him. A great fire put an end to the work in Feb. 1868. [Meen'ye.]

Mignet, FRANÇOIS AUSTOUSTE ALEXIS, historian, was born 8th May 1796, at Aix in Provence, and there studied law with Thiers. Both were admitted to the bar in 1818, but Mignet's true vocation was apparent in his prize-essay for the Academy of Inscriptions on French institutions in the time of St Louis. In 1821 he went to Paris, wrote for the Courrier Français, and lectured on Modern History. His Histoire de la Révolution Française (1824) was the first, a sane and luminous summary. With Thiers he signed the famous protest of the journalists in 1830, and after the Revolution became Keeper of the Archives at the Foreign Office (till 1848). In 1833 he explored the famous Simancas Archives. Elected to the Academy of Moral Sciences at its foundation in 1832, he succeeded Comte as its perpetual secretary in 1837, and was elected to fill Raynouard's chair among the Forty in 1836. He died 24th March 1884. His works include La Succession d'Espagne sous Louis XIV. (1836-42), Antonio Perez et Philippe II. (1845), Franklin (1848), Marie Stuart (1851), Charles Quint (1854), Éloges Historiques (1843-64), and François I. et Charles V. (1875). See works by Trefort (Budapest, 1885), E. Petit (Par. 1889), and Jules Simon (1889).

Miguel, MARIA EVARIST, born at Lisbon, 26th October 1802, the third son of King John VI., plotted (1824) to overthrow the constitutional form of government granted by his father; but with his mother, his chief abettor, was banished. At John's death in 1826 the throne devolved upon Miguel's elder brother, Pedro, emperor of Brazil; he, however, resigned it in favour of his daughter, Maria, making Miguel regent; but Miguel summoned a cortes, which proclaimed him king in 1828. In 1832 Pedro captured Oporto and Lisbon, and Charles Napier destroyed Miguel's fleet off Cape St Vincent (1833). Next year Maria was restored, and Miguel withdrew to Italy. He died 14th November 1866 at Bronnbach in Baden.

Miklosich, FRANZ VON (1813-91), Slavonic scholar, born at Luttenberg in Slovenian Styria, studied at Graz, practised as a barrister at Vienna, held a post in the Imperial library, and was professor of Slavonic 1850-85, being elected to the Academy in 1851, and knighted in 1869. His thirty works include Lexicon Lingue Palæoslovenicæ (1850), Vergleichende Slawische Grammatik (1852-74), works on the Gypsies (1872-80), and the great Etymological Slav Dictionary (1886).

Mill, JAMES, born, a shoemaker's son, near Montrose, 6th April 1773, studied for the ministry at Edinburgh, but in 1802 settled in London as a literary man. He edited and wrote for various periodicals, and in 1806 commenced his History of British India (1817-18). In 1819 the directors of the East India Company made him (though a Radical) assistant-examiner with charge of the revenue department, and in 1832 head of the examiner's office, where he had the control of all the departments of Indian administration. Many of his articles (on government, jurisprudence, colonies, &c.) for the Encyclopædia Britannica were reprinted. In 1821-22 he published Elements of Political Economy, in 1829 Analysis of the Human Mind, and in 1835 the Fragment on Mackintosh. He was no mere disciple of Bentham, but a man of profound and original thought, as well as of great reading. His conversation gave a powerful stimulus to many young men like his own son and Grote. He took a leading part in founding University College, London. He died at Kensington, 23d June 1836. See J. S. Mill's Autobiography and Prof. Bain's James Mill (1882).

Mill, JOHN (1645-1707), New Testament critic, born at Shap in Westmorland, entered Queen's College, Oxford, as servitor in 1661, and was fellow and tutor, rector of Blechington, Oxfordshire (1681), principal of St Edmund's Hall (1685), and prebendary of Canterbury (1704). His Novum Testamentum Græcum, the labour of thirty years, appeared a fortnight before his death.

Mill, JOHN STUART, eldest son of James Mill, was born in London, 20th May 1806, and was educated by his father, who subjected him to a careful and systematic training. He began Greek at three, and before he was fourteen had read extensively in Greek, Latin, mathematics, and English, and begun logic and political economy. As he says himself, he 'never was a boy.' In 1820 he went to France on a visit to Sir S. Bentham (Jeremy's brother); but his studies were never intermitted. The visit gave him a keen interest in French politics and social conditions, and stimulated his love of scenery and travel. After his return he worked at history and law, and read English and French philosophy. In 1823 he obtained an appointment under his father at the India Office, from which he retired as head of his department in 1858. In 1823-26 he was a member of a small Utilitarian society which met at Jeremy Bentham's house. The word 'Utilitarian' occurred in one of Galt's novels, and was seized upon by him 'with a boy's fondness for a name and a banner.' In the Speculative Society (1825-29) he formed an intimate friendship with Coleridgean Liberals like Maurice and Sterling. Before he was twenty Mill was recognised as the champion of the Utilitarian School, and had become the chief contributor to the Westminster Review. But a 'mental crisis' (1826-27) led to a modification of his attitude. Bentham's Treatise on Legislation till then had been the keystone of his philosophy. But that crisis, accompanied by depression and painful self-analysis, forced the conviction upon him that happiness—although the test of all rules of conduct and the end of life—was only to be obtained by not making it the direct end, but by having one's mind fixed on some such ideal as the improvement of mankind, or even some art or pursuit. He further ceased to attach almost exclusive importance to the ordering of outward circumstances, and to the forced training of the human being for thought and action. And soon after he found in Wordsworth's poems 'the very culture of the feelings' he was in quest of. His wider appreciation of speculation and literature may be seen in his reviews of Tennyson's poems (1835) and of Carlyle's French Revolution (1837), as well as in his article on Coleridge (1840). His article on Bentham (1838) made clear the extent of his divergence from his inherited creed. Perhaps the reaction would have gone further had it not been for the friendship with Mrs John Taylor (whom he first met in 1830, and whom he married in 1851), which formed the romance of his life. She exerted great influence on the expression of his views, and had a steady effect on his philosophical position. Mill never forsook, though he modified, the leading principles of the philosophy in which he was educated. He held that knowledge could be analysed into impressions of sense, and that the principle of association was the great constructive force which combined these sensations and their copies, or ideas, into systems of thought, modes of feeling, and habits of acting. His System of Logic (1843) traces the way in which the real, disjointedly given in sensation, is combined into scientific knowledge; its treatment of the methods of inductive science has become classical. His Examination of Sir W. Hamilton's Philosophy (1865) and edition of James Mill's Analysis of the Human Mind (1869) contain a polemical defence and exposition of the association-psychology. His essay on Utilitarianism (1861) defends the greatest-happiness theory, but suggests modifications inconsistent with it. He held that government was to be made into a utilitarian instrument by means of representative institutions; but he had less confidence than Bentham in the effect of reason and argument, disapproved of an equal suffrage, distrusted the ballot, and argued eloquently for individual liberty of thought and action against the tyranny of the majority (Considerations on Representative Government, 1861; Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform, 1859; On Liberty, 1859). In his Principles of Political Economy (1848) he in the main follows Ricardo's abstract theory; but recognises more clearly its hypothetical character, and discusses the social applications of economic doctrines.

M.P. for Westminster 1865-68, Mill voted with the advanced Radical party, and zealously advocated women's suffrage. Other works were Essays on Political Economy (1844), Comte and Positivism (1865), England and Ireland (1868), The Subjection of Women (1869). Mill died at Avignon, 8th May 1873, and was buried there. After his death were published his Autobiography (1873), Three Essays on Religion (1874), and more Essays (1897). His occasional writings are collected in Dissertations and Discussions (4 vols. 1859-75). See biographies by Bain (1882) and Courtney (1889), and a study of his philosophy by C. M. Douglas (1895).

Millais, SIR JOHN EVERETT, P.R.A., born at Southampton, 8th June 1829, of an old Jersey family, studied in the schools of the Royal Academy, and at seventeen exhibited his 'Pizarro seizing the Inca of Peru.' He now became associated with the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, especially with Dante Gabriel Rossetti and Holman Hunt, and was markedly influenced by them and by Mr Ruskin, their literary ally. His first Pre-Raphaelite picture, a scene from the Isabella of Keats, figured in the Academy in 1849, where it was followed in 1850 by 'Christ in the House of His Parents' ('The Carpenter's Shop'), in 1851 by 'The Woodman's Daughter,' in 1852 by 'The Huguenot' and 'Ophelia,' and in 1853 by 'The Order of Release' and 'The Proscribed Royalist,' which sold for £5250 and £2100 in 1898 and 1897. A.R.A. since 1856, he exhibited 'Autumn Leaves' in 1856, the 'Sir Isumbras at the Ford' in 1857, and 'The Vale of Rest' in 1859. Pre-Raphaelite methods survive in 'Charlie is my Darling' (1864)—that year he was elected R.A.—'The Minnet' (1866), and 'Rosalind and Celia' (1868). But the exquisite 'Gambler's Wife' (1869) and 'The Boyhood of Raleigh' (1870) mark the transition of his art into its final phase, displaying brilliant and effective colouring, effortless power of brushwork, and delicacy of flesh-painting. The interest and value of his later works lie mainly in their splendid technical qualities. In great part they are portraits (Bright, Beaconsfield, Newman, Gladstone, &c.), varied by a few such important landscapes as 'Chill October' (1871), and by such an occasional figure-piece as 'The North-west Passage' (1873) and 'Effe Deans' (1877). Millais executed a few etchings, and his illustrations in Good Words, Once a Week, the Cornhill, &c. (1857-64) place him in the very first rank of woodcut designers. He became a baronet in 1885, P.R.A. in Feb. 1896; and, dying on 13th August, was buried in St Paul's. See Ruskin's Notes on his Grosvenor Exhibition in 1886, Spielmann's Millais and his Works (1898), and Lives by Armstrong (new ed. 1896) and the painter's fourth son (1899).—That son, CAPTAIN JOHN GUILLE MILLAIS, born 24th March 1865, and educated at Trinity, Cambridge, is a clever animal-painter, and has published Game Birds and Shooting Sketches (1892), A Breath from the Veldt (1895), and The Mammals of Great Britain (3 vols. 1904-6).

Miller, HUGH, born at Cromarty, Oct. 10, 1802, from sixteen to thirty-three worked as a common stone-mason, devoting the winter months to writing, reading, and natural history. In 1829 he published Poems written in the Leisure Hours of a Journeyman Mason, followed by Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland (1835). His Letter to Lord Brougham on the 'Ancliterarder Case' brought him into notice. In 1834-39 he acted as bank-accountant; in 1839 was invited to Edinburgh to edit the Non-intrusion Witness; and in 1840 published in its columns the geological articles afterwards collected as The Old Red Sandstone (1841). At the British Association of 1840 he was warmly praised by Murchison and Buckland; and Agassiz proposed that a fossil discovered by him in a formation thought to be non-fossiliferous should be named Pterlichthys Milleri. Miller's editorial labours during the heat of the Disruption struggle were immense; he used the term 'Free Church' before 1843. Worn out by overwork, he shot himself, 23d December 1856. Miller contributed to Wilson's Tales of the Borders (1835) and to Chambers's Journal. His First Impressions of England (1847) is the record of a journey in 1845; in Footprints of the Creator (1850) he combated the evolution theory; My Schools and Schoolmasters (1854) is the story of his youth; and Testimony of the Rocks (1857) is an attempt to reconcile the 'days' of Genesis with geology. Posthumous were The Cruise of the Letsey (1858), geological investigations among the islands of Scotland; Sketch Book of Popular Geology (1859); The Headship of Christ (1861); Essays, Historical and Biographical (1862); Tales and Sketches (1863); and Edinburgh and its Neighbourhood (1863). Miller, JOAQUIN, the pen-name of Cincinnatus Heine Miller, an American poet. Born in Indiana in 1841, he became a miner in California, fought in the Indian wars, was an express messenger, practised law in Oregon, edited a paper suppressed for disloyalty, in 1866-70 was a county judge in Oregon, was a Washington journalist, and in 1887 settled in California as a fruit-grower. His poems include Songs of the Sierras (1871), of the Sunlands (1873), of the Desert (1875), of Italy (1878), and of the Mexican Seas (1887), and In Classic Shade (1890); his prose works, The Danites in the Sierras (1881), Shadows of Shasta (1881), and '49, or the Goldseekers of the Sierras (1884). He also wrote The Danites, a successful play. See his My Life among the Modocs (1873) and My Own Story (new ed. 1891).

Miller, JOSEPH (1684-1738), a Drury Lane comedian, who gave name to Joe Miller's Jests (1739).

Miller, PATRICK (1731-1815), a chief shareholder in the Carron Iron Company, in 1785 purchased Dalswinton near Dumfries, where on 14th Nov. 1788, with Symington (q.v.), he launched one of the earliest steam-boats on the little loch.

Miller, WILLIAM (1781-1849), the founder of the American Second Adventists.

Miller, WILLIAM (1810-72), Glasgow wood-turner, contributed 'Wee Willie Winkie' and other children's lyrics to Whistle Binkie (1832-53).

Miller, WILLIAM HALLOWS (1801-80), professor of Mineralogy at Cambridge, crystallographer.

Millet, JEAN FRANÇOIS, painter, born at Gruchy near Gréville, 4th October 1814, worked as a farm-labourer, but was in 1832 placed under a painter at Cherbourg, who induced the municipality to grant his pupil an annuity. In 1837 Millet came to Paris, worked under Delaroche, and studied the great masters. He painted little subjects for the dealers, and in 1840 sent a portrait to the Salon. In 1848 he fought on the barricades, and next year settled at Barbizon near the Forest of Fontainebleau, living much like the peasants around him, and painting the life of rustic France with sympathetic power. His famous 'Sower' was completed in 1850. In 1855 his 'Peasants Grafting' was bought by an American for 4000 francs. It was followed by 'The Gleaners'

(1857), 'The Angelus' (1859), 'Waiting' and 'The Sheep-shearers' (1861), 'The Man with the Hoe' and 'Women Carding' (1863), 'Shepherdess and Flock' (1864). He also produced many charcoal drawings of high quality, and etched a few plates. All his life long he fought with poverty, though he was repeatedly awarded medals, and received the ribbon of the Legion of Honour. He died at Barbizon, 20th January 1875. At the Secrétan sale (1889) 'The Angelus' sold for £23,226. See works by Piedagnel (1876), Sensier (Eng. trans. 1881), Yriarte (1884), Ménard (1890), Roger-Miles (1895), Julia Cartwright (1896), and Rolland (1902); and D. C. Thomson's Barbizon School (1890).

Milman, HENRY HART, poet and church historian, the youngest son of Sir Francis Milman (1746-1821), physician to George III., was born in London, 10th February 1791. He was educated at Greenwich, Eton, and Brasenose College, Oxford, where in 1812 he won the Newdigate with his Belvidere Apollo, best of Oxford prize poems. In 1815 a fellow, in 1816 he became vicar at Reading; in 1821-31 professor of Poetry at Oxford, where in 1827 he delivered the Bampton Lectures on The Character of the Apostles as an Evidence of Christianity; in 1835 rector of St Mary's, Westminster, and a canon of Westminster; and in 1849 Dean of St Paul's. He died 24th September 1868, and was buried in St Paul's. His Poems and Dramatic Works (3 vols. 1839) comprise Fazio, a Tragedy (1815), Samor (1818), The Fall of Jerusalem (1820), Belshazzar (1822), &c. The poems, forgotten as a whole, live through the hymns—'When our heads are bowed with woe,' 'Brother, thou art gone before us,' and 'Ride on, ride on in majesty.' To the Historical Works (15 vols. 1866-67) belong the History of the Jews (1829), History of Christianity to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire (1840), and—his masterpiece—the History of Latin Christianity to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. (1854-56). Milman also edited Gibbon and Horace, and wrote much for the Quarterly. After his death appeared the delightful Annals of St Paul's (1868) and Savonarola, Erasmus, and other Essays (1870).—His nephew, ROBERT MILMAN (1816-76), educated at Westminster and at Exeter College, Oxford, held English cures till 1867, and then became Bishop of Calcutta. He published a Life of Tasso (1850), poems, and theological works. See Life by his sister (1879).

Miln, JAMES (1819-81), a Scottish antiquary, made excavations at Carnac in Brittany, 1872-80.

Milne, JOHN, seismologist, was born at Liverpool in 1850, worked in Newfoundland as a mining engineer, was for twenty years mining engineer and geologist to the Japanese government, married a Japanese wife, became a supreme authority on earthquakes, travelled widely, and finally established a private seismological observatory at Newport, Isle of Wight. He has published important works on earthquakes, seismology, and crystallography.

Milne-Edwards, HENRI, naturalist, was born at Bruges, 23d October 1800, his father being English, studied medicine at Paris, became professor at the Jardin des Plantes, and wrote a famous Cours Élémentaire de Zoologie (1834; rewritten 1851; trans. 1863), works on the crustacea, the corals, physiology and anatomy, researches on the natural history of the French coasts (1832-45) and the coasts of Sicily, and on the natural history of the mammalia (1871). In his later works he was assisted by his son and successor, Alphonse (1835-1900). He himself died on 29th July 1885.—His elder brother, FREDERIC WILLIAM (1777-1842), was a great physiologist.

Milner, LORD, made a baron in 1901 when his trying work before and during the Boer war began to bear fruit, was born Alfred Milner, son of the university lecturer on English at Tübingen, in 1854, studied at King's College, and concluded a brilliant career at Oxford with a New College fellowship. For a time he was assistant-editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and then private secretary to Mr Goschen, who recommended him for the under-secretaryship of state for Finance in Egypt, whose duties he discharged with such signal success as to earn a C.B. (1894) and K.C.B. (1895). In 1892-97 he was chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, in 1897-1901 governor of the Cape Colony, in 1901-5 High Commissioner for South Africa. His barony was made a viscountcy in 1902. In 1892 he wrote England in Egypt.

Milner, JOHN (1752-1826), called by Newman 'the English Athanasius,' was born in London and educated at Edgbaston, Sedgley Park, and Douay. Catholic priest at Winchester from 1779, in 1803 he was made a bishop in partibus and vicar-apostolic of the Midlands. He wrote a great history of Winchester (1798-1801) and much polemical theology. See Life by Husenbeth (1862).

Milner, JOSEPH (1744-97), church historian, was born at Leeds, studied at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and became head-master of Hull grammar-school, and in 1797 vicar of Holy Trinity at Hull, dying on 15th November of that year. His History of the Church of Christ, written from the evangelical point of view, was completed to 1530 by his brother, ISAAC (1750-1820), a mathematician, who became Dean of Carlisle and Luccasian professor at Cambridge. He edited his brother's works and wrote his life, besides works on mathematics, physics, chemistry, and church history. See his Life by a niece (1842).

Milo, of Crotona in Magna Græcia, twelve times victor for wrestling at the Olympic and Pythian games, commanded the army which defeated the Sybarites in 511. He carried a live ox upon his shoulders through the stadium of Olympia, and afterwards, it was said, ate the whole of it in one day. In old age he attempted to split up a tree, which closed upon his hands, and held him fast until he was devoured by wolves.

Miltiades, tyrant of a colony in the Thracian Chersonesus, when Attica was threatened by the Persians, was chosen one of the ten generals. He prevailed upon the polemarch Callimachus to give his casting vote in favour of risking a battle, and drew up his army at Marathon. The victory of the Athenians and one thousand Plataeans over the Persian host of Datis and Artaphernes (490 B.C.) was one of the decisive battles of the world. Miltiades attacked the island of Paros to gratify a private enmity, but, failing in the attempt, was on his return to Athens condemned to pay a fine of fifty talents, and, unable to do this, was thrown into prison, where he died of a wound received in Paros. [Mil-ti'-a-deez.]

Milton, JOHN, after Shakespeare the greatest English poet, was born in Bread Street, Cheap-side, on December 9, 1608, the son of a prosperous scrivener, a Puritan but a musical composer. At St Paul's School he distinguished himself as a scholar and poet. In 1625 he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, where he seems to have been chastised by his tutor, and was certainly rusticated for a short time in 1626. After his return he went through the university course with credit, proceeding M.A. in 1632. Laud's rule deterred the young Puritan from taking orders; and at Horton in Bucks, whither his father had retired, he settled with the distinct purpose of making himself a poet by study and self-discipline. His poetical genius had already been attested by the noble 'Hymn on the Nativity' and 'At a Solemn Music,' as well as much admirable Latin verse; and at Horton he produced the Allegro and the Penseroso (c. 1632), Comus, and Lycidas. Comus was written at the instance of the musician Henry Lawes to celebrate Lord Bridgewater's assumption of the wardenship of the Welsh marches, and was performed at Ludlow in 1634. Lycidas was evoked by the loss at sea of his friend, Edward King (q.v.), in 1637. And these four works were of themselves sufficient to place him in the first rank of English poets. In 1638-39 he paid a fifteen months' visit to Italy, where he was cordially received by the Italian literati. His return was saddened by tidings of the death of his friend Diodati, whom he celebrated in 'Damon,' the finest and last of his Latin poems. He settled in St Bride's Churchyard, afterwards in Aldersgate Street, and devoted himself to the education of his widowed sister's children, the two young Phillises. Paradise Lost as a mystery or miracle play gradually dawned upon his mind; but the Civil War long silenced Milton's muse, except for an occasional sonnet. The tracts which he now poured forth (three in 1641, two in 1642, all on church government) are as truly lyrical inspirations as any of his poems; by no means masterpieces of reasoning, but dithyrambic ecstasies of love or hate. In 1643 he married Mary Powell, daughter of an Oxfordshire squire, a debtor of his father's. The poor girl was naturally shocked at the sudden transfer from a jovial, cavalier country household to the apartments of an austere Puritan scholar; and after a few weeks' trial of matrimony she went back to her friends. Milton's Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce was written and printed at this very time. He replied to his opponents, mainly the Presbyterians, in three supplementary pamphlets, and a threat of prosecution by a parliamentary committee occasioned (November 1644) his most famous prose-work, Areopagitica, a Speech for the liberty of Unlicensed Printing. A Tractate of Education is full of suggestion. In 1645 he was taking serious steps to carry out his views on divorce by paying his addresses to 'a very handsome and witty gentlewoman,' when the absent wife thought it time to return; and by September his household was re-established in the Barbican. She bore him three daughters, and died in 1652. He lost his father in 1647. Meanwhile, other pupils, mostly sons of friends, had been added to his nephews, and to the world Milton seemed a schoolmaster; but his defence of the execution of Charles I. (Jan. 1649), The Tenure of Kings, was followed (March) by his appointment as 'Secretary of Foreign Tongues,' whose duty it was to draft diplomatic correspondence with foreign powers, then carried on in Latin. His Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio (1651), in reply to Salmasius, made him famous all over Europe, but cost him his eyesight. By 1652 the impaired vision had wholly failed. He married again (1656), and again lost his wife (1658). The magnificent sonnet on the massacre of the Vaudois was written in 1655. Several controversial pamphlets with Alexander Morus followed. Milton had supported Cromwell in all his extra-legal measures, though his early republican hopes must have been bitterly disappointed. He remained secretary until the abdication of Richard Cromwell, when he again turned pamphleteer. His writings of this period are greatly inferior in splendour of diction, and are conclusive of his lack of practical statesmanship. The Restoration drove him into hiding, for few had more bitterly exasperated the Royalist party. The Defensio was burnt by the hangman, and Milton was arrested but soon released; about the beginning of 1661 he was settled in Jewin Street, and afterwards in Artillery Walk, Bunhill Fields.

Paradise Lost was probably commenced some time before the Restoration, dictated to an amanuensis (usually a daughter), and completed about 1663. Plague and fire warred against the publication, which, after some difficulty on the licenser's part, took place in August 1667. The copyright was sold for five pounds, a sum of about three times its present value, with contingencies which, had Milton lived, would have amounted to £70 of our money. The sale of thirteen hundred copies within twenty months seems to show that Milton's claim to a place among the great poets was admitted from the first. The year 1671 witnessed the publication of Paradise Regained, probably written in 1665-66, and of Samson Agonistes, written later still. Samson, dramatic in form, is lyrical in substance, a splendid lament over the author's forlorn old age and the apostasy, as he deemed it, of his nation. Meanwhile the poet's daughters were very impatient at their heavy task as his readers and amanuenses; and the history of his household is one of sordid sadness up to his marriage (1663) with Elizabeth Minshull, the daughter of a Cheshire yeoman. She restored comfort to his house, but failed to conciliate his daughters, who, after being taught embroidery at their father's expense, left to set up for themselves. Milton now addressed himself vigorously to other unfulfilled designs of his youth, the early history of England and works upon grammar and logic—of little value. His Latin Treatise of Christian Doctrines proves he was now an Arian, indifferent to all rites and ceremonies, as anti-Sabbatarian as Luther, and willing to tolerate polygamy. The MS., confiscated and mislaid, was not to see the light for a hundred and fifty years. Reduced in means by the great fire of 1666, but still above want, execrated as a regicide by the majority of his countrymen, but acclaimed by the discerning as the first poet of his age, worn by attacks of gout, but cheerful and even joyous in the intervals of pain, he closed his chequered life on November 8, 1674. He was buried in St Giles's, Cripplegate. The biographical labours of Milton's nephew, Edward Phillips, of Toland, Symmons, Mitford, and Todd, have been superseded by Masson's Life of the poet (6 vols. 1859-80). Johnson's sketch must always be read for its literary merit, and there are short Lives by Mark Pattison (1880) and Dr Garnett (1889). The standard edition of Milton's works is Masson's (3 vols. 1874; new ed. 1890).

Minghetti, MARCO (1818-86), Cavour's successor, was born in Bologna, studied there, and travelled in France, Germany, and Great Britain. Pope Pius IX. in 1846 made him, now a journalist, minister of Public Works. But under Austrian pressure the pope's reforming zeal was short-lived, and Minghetti entered the Sardinian army, and at Custoza earned a knighthood. After Novara he settled at Turin, an ardent student of economics, a free-trader, and a devoted friend of Cavour. In 1859-60 he was his secretary for foreign affairs. His next post was that of minister of the Interior; premier in 1863, he concluded with the Emperor Napoleon the 'September Convention' in 1864. In 1868 he was Italian minister in London, and thereafter minister of Agriculture. At Rome in 1873-76 he was prime-minister for the second time, and till his death was still the most prominent member of the Italian parliament. He wrote lectures and essays on Raphael and Dante, Economia Publica (1859), and La Chiesa e lo Stato (1878). See his Ricordi (1888). [Min-ge'tee; g hard.]

Minié, CLAUDE ÉTIENNE (1814-79), born in Paris, from a private became colonel, and in 1849 invented the Minié rifle. He was for a time at Cairo in the Khedive's service.

Minsheu, JOHN, a foreign master in London, who during 1599-1617 published a dictionary in eleven languages, &c., of high value for Elizabethan English.

Minto, SIR GILBERT ELLIOT, EARL OF (1751-1814), born at Edinburgh, was educated in France and at Edinburgh and Oxford, in 1769 entered Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1774. In parliament he supported Fox and Burke. In 1794-96 he was viceroy of Corsica. He was governor-general of India in 1806-14, and was successively Baron Minto (1797) and Earl of Minto. See Life by his great-niece (1874-80).—The 4th Earl, born 1847, served in the army, was governor-general of Canada 1898-1904, and viceroy of India in 1905-10.

Minto, WILLIAM (1845-93), literary critic, born near Alford, Aberdeenshire, from 1880 was professor of Logic and English at Aberdeen, having edited the Examiner 1874-78.

Minucius Felix, an early Latin apologist whose Octavius is a dialogue between a pagan and a Christian. See Holden's edition (1853); Kühn's monograph (1882); Brodrick's translation (1903).

Mirabeau, HONORÉ GABRIEL RIQUETI, COMTE DE, was born at Bignon in Provence, 9th March 1749, a younger son of the self-willed, tyrannical Marquis de Mirabeau (1715-89), who expounded physiocratic political economy in Ami des Hommes (1755) and La Philosophie Rurale (1763), and took out over fifty lettres de cachet against his wife and children. The son's ugly face, scarred with smallpox and crowned with a mane of black hair, bore unmistakably the stamp of power. At seventeen he entered a cavalry regiment, and lived a life of such recklessness that his father imprisoned him in 1768 on the Île de Rhé, and next sent him with the army to Corsica. But his father refusing to purchase him a company, he left the service in 1770. He married (1772), but lived extravagantly and unhappily; and on account of his debts his father confined him (1773-75) at Manosque, the Château d'I, and the castle of Joux near Pontarlier. Hence he fled with the young wife of the gray-haired Marquis de Monnier to Amsterdam, where for eight months he earned his bread by laborious hack-work for the booksellers. His Essai sur le Despotisme made a sensation by its audacity. Meantime the parlement of Besançon sentenced him to death; and in May 1777 he was handed over by the States-general and flung into the castle of Vincennes, where, in a close imprisonment of three years and a half, he wrote Érotica Biblion, Ma Conversion, and his famous Essai sur les Lettres de Cachet (2 vols. 1782). In 1780 he was released, and in 1782 he got his sentence annulled. Drowned in debt, he made for some years a shifty living by compiling innumerable books and pamphlets against speculation, stock-jobbing, &c.; and his life was stained by countless liaisons. In England he was intimate with the Earl of Minto, Lord Lansdowne, and Romilly, and his close observation of English politics taught him the good of moderation, compromise, and opportunism. In 1786 he was sent on a secret mission to Berlin, and there obtained the materials for his work, Sur la Monarchie Prussienne sous Frédéric le Grand (4 vols. 1787). Rejected by the nobles of Provence as candidate for the States-general, he turned to the tiers état, and was elected by both Marseilles and Aix. When the tiers état constituted itself the National Assembly, Mirabeau's political sagacity made him a great force, while his audacity and volcanic eloquence endeared him to the mob. He it was who proposed the establishment of a citizen-guard, but he trembled at the revolutionary legislation of August 4, 1789. None of his contemporaries equalled him in breadth of view, temperance, and freedom from prejudice; hatred of anarchy was his deepest-rooted principle. As early as May 1789 he had tried in vain to come to terms with Necker and Lafayette. In conjunction with the Count de la Marck, a friend of Marie Antoinette, he drew up a memoir, setting forth the necessity for a new constitution, with a responsible ministry after the English pattern. But the infatuated queen detested the great tribune, and the Assembly passed a self-denying ordinance that no member should take office under the crown. Mirabeau surrounded himself with a group of friends who provided him with his facts, and even wrote his speeches and articles; he fused the materials so prepared for him in the alembic of his own genius. In the spring of 1790 communication opened anew with the court; Mirabeau was mortified to find himself mistrusted; but the court provided money to pay his debts (208,000 livres), and promised a monthly allowance of 100 louis. He risked all his popularity by successfully opposing Barnave's motion that the right of peace and war should rest not with the king but the Assembly. The queen gave him an interview in the gardens at Saint-Cloud, and Mirabeau assured her that the monarchy was saved. But as the popular movement progressed his dream of placing the king at the head of the Revolution became hopeless, and he found that the court did not grant him its full confidence, though he showed himself a really great financier in his measures to avert national bankruptcy. His secret aim was now to undermine the Assembly and compel it to dissolve, hoping that he might guide a new Assembly to wise concessions. But the queen would not commit herself to his guidance. In 1790 he was president of the Jacobin Club; on January 30, 1791, he was elected president of the Assembly for the fortnight. He defeated the proposed law against emigration, and successfully resisted Sieyès' motion that in the event of the king's death the regent should be elected by the Assembly. But his health had been sinking, though he refused to abate his giant labours; and he died 2d April 1791. His writings were collected by Blanchard (10 vols. 1822). For his life, see Mémoires de Mirabeau écrits par Lui-même, par son Père, son Oncle, et son Fils Adoptif (8 vols. 1834; partly trans. 1835-36); Loménie, Les Mirabeau (5 vols. 1878-91); sketches by Rousée (1891), Mézières (1892), and Willert (1898); the German Life by Stern (1889);

also the various histories of the Revolution, and essays by Carlyle and Henry Reeve (1872).—ANDRÉ BONIFACE RIQUETI, VICOMTE DE MIRABEAU (1754-92), brother of the preceding, was notorious for his ill-regulated life, but fought with distinction in the American war, and at the outbreak of the Revolution was returned to the States-general by the nobility of Limoges. A fierce aristocrat, he raised on the Rhine a legion of embittered émigrés, with whom he began in 1792 warfare against the republic. He was killed accidentally at Freiburg in Breisgau.

Miranda, FRANCISCO DE (1495-1558), a Portuguese poet, best known by his epistles in verse.

Mirandola. See PICO.

Misson, FRANÇOIS MAXIMILIEN (c. 1650-1722), a French Huguenot, driven to London by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He published Travels in Italy (1691) and England (1698).

Mistral, FREDERICK, Provençal poet, was born, a peasant's son, near Maillane (dep. Bouches-du-Rhône), on 8th September 1830, and studied law at Avignon, but went home to work on the land and write poetry. In 1859 his epic Mirèio (Eng. trans. 1890) gained him the poet's prize of the French Academy and the Cross of the Legion of Honour. In 1867 he published a second epic, Calendou; in 1876 a volume of poems, Lis Iselo d'Or; in 1884 a novel, Nerto; and in 1878-86 a Provençal lexicon. See Daudet in Century (1885).

Mitchel, JOHN (1815-75), was born, the son of a Presbyterian minister, near Dungiven, co. Derry. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, practised as an attorney, and in 1845 became assistant-editor of the Nation, the organ of the Young Ireland party. In 1848 he started the United Irishman, for his articles in which he was tried on a charge of 'treason-felony' and sentenced to fourteen years' transportation; but in 1853 he escaped from Van Diemen's Land to the United States, and published his Jail Journal (1854). In a series of short-lived newspapers he enthusiastically defended slavery and the South. Returning in 1874 to Ireland, he was next year elected to parliament for Tipperary, declared ineligible, and re-elected, but died the same month. He published a Life of Hugh O'Neill (1845) and a History of Ireland from the Treaty of Limerick (1868), besides editions of the poems of Thomas Davis (1856) and Mangan (1859). See Life by W. Dillon (1888).

Mitchel, WILLIAM (1672-1740), the 'Tinklarian Doctor,' an Edinburgh tinker and lamp-lighter, author of a score of prophetic pamphlets.

Mitchell, DONALD GRANT, 'Ik Marvel' (1822-1908), born in Norwich, Conn., was in 1853 appointed U.S. consul at Venice, and edited the Atlantic Monthly 1868-69. He also wrote books about his farm of Edgewood near New Haven; Reveries of a Bachelor and Dream Life (1850-51; new eds. 1889); a novel, Dr Johns (1866); and English Lands, Letters, and Kings (2 vols. 1889-95).

Mitchell, JAMES, an Edinburgh Covenanted tobaccoconist, hanged 18th January 1678 for shooting ten years before, at Archbishop Sharp.

Mitchell, SIR THOMAS LIVINGSTONE (1792-1855), born at Craighend, Stirlingshire, served in the Peninsular War, and from 1828 was surveyor-general of New South Wales. In four expeditions (1831, 1835, 1836, 1845-47) he did much to explore Eastern Australia ('Australia Felix') and Tropical Australia, especially the Murray, Glenelg, and Barcoo rivers. He was knighted in 1839.

Mitford, JOHN (1781-1859), born at Richmond, Surrey, took his B.A. from Oriel College, Oxford, in 1804, and from 1810 was vicar of Benhall near Saxmmdham, &c., a very free-thinking pluralist. He edited the Gentleman's Magazine 1834-50, and Gray, Cowper, Milton, &c. for the 'Aldine Poets.' See his Letters, by Mrs Houstoun (new ed. 1891).

Mitford, MARY RUSSELL, born at Alresford, Hants, 16th December 1787, was the only child of a selfish, extravagant physician. On Mary's tenth birthday he bought her a lottery-ticket which drew a prize of £20,000; whereupon she was sent to school in Chelsea, and Dr Mitford built himself a large house near Reading. Here Mary returned when she was fifteen; her first volume of poems appeared in 1810, and was followed by two more in 1811-12. In 1820 the family had to move to a cottage at Three Mile Cross, and Miss Mitford had to write to earn money. Four of her tragedies, Julian (1823), The Foscari (1826), Rienzi (1828), and Charles I. (1834), were acted, but have not kept the stage. Her charming sketches of country manners, scenery, and character were rejected by several editors, but at length found a place in the London Magazine, and were collected as Our Village (5 vols. 1824-32). When Dr Mitford died in 1842, a subscription was started to pay his debts, which was supplemented by a pension to Miss Mitford of £100. In 1852 she published Recollections of a Literary Life, and in 1854 Atherton, and other Tales. She died 10th January 1855 at Swallowfield, whither she had moved in 1851. See Life by L'Estrange (3 vols. 1869), and his Friendships of Mary Russell Mitford (1882).

Mitford, WILLIAM (1744-1827), born in London, studied at Queen's College, Oxford, in 1761 succeeded to the family estate of Exbury, and in 1769 became a captain in the South Hampshire Militia, of which Gibbon was major. By Gibbon's advice he undertook his pugnacious anti-democratic History of Greece (5 vols. 1784-1818), which, in virtue of careful research, held the highest place in the opinion of scholars until the appearance of Thirlwall and Grote. He sat in parliament 1785-1818. See Memoir prefixed to 7th edition of his History (1838), by his brother JOHN FREEMAN MITFORD (1748-1830), who, Lord-chancellor of Ireland 1802-6, was created Lord Redesdale.

Mithridates (Grecised from the Persian, 'gift of [the God] Mithras'), the name of several kings of Pontus, Armenia, and Parthia. Mithridates VI. of Pontus, surnamed Eupator, is known as Mithridates the Great. Succeeding to the throne about 120 B.C., a boy of barely thirteen, he soon subdued the tribes who bordered on the Euxine as far as the Crimea, and made an incursion into Cappadocia and Bithynia, then Roman. In the First Mithridatic War, commenced by the Romans (88), Mithridates' generals repeatedly defeated the Asiatic levies of the Romans, and he himself occupied the Roman possessions in Asia Minor. But in 85 he was defeated by Flavius Fimbria, and compelled to make peace with Sulla, relinquishing all his conquests in Asia, giving up 70 war-galleys, and paying 2000 talents. The wanton aggressions of the Roman legate gave rise to the Second Mithridatic War (83-81), in which Mithridates was wholly successful. In the Third Mithridatic War (74) he obtained the services of Roman officers of the Marian party, and at first prospered; but Lucullus compelled him to take refuge with Tigranes of Armenia (72), and defeated both of them at Artaxata (68). In 66 Pompey defeated Mithridates on the Euphrates, and compelled him to flee to his territories on the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Here his new schemes of vengeance were frustrated by his son's rebellion, and he killed himself (63 B.C.). He had received a Greek education, spoke twenty-two languages, and made a great collection of pictures and statues.

Mitscherlich, EILHARD (1794-1868), professor of Chemistry at Berlin from 1822, studied Persian at Heidelberg and Paris, medicine at Göttingen, and geology, mineralogy, chemistry, and physics at Berlin and Stockholm. His name is identified with the laws of isomorphism and dimorphism, and with artificial minerals, benzene, and ether.

Mivart, ST GEORGE, F.R.S. (1827-1900), was educated for the bar, but devoted himself to the biological sciences, and before his death was by Cardinal Vaughan debarred from the sacraments for his liberalism. In 1874-84 he was professor of Zoology and Biology at the Roman Catholic University College in Kensington, and in 1890 accepted a chair of the Philosophy of Natural History at Louvain. An evolutionist save as regards the origin of mind, he was yet an able and zealous opponent of the 'Natural Selection' theory. Among his works are The Genesis of Species (1871), Man and Apes (1873), Contemporary Evolution (1874), Lessons from Nature (1876), The Cat (1881), Nature and Thought (1883), The Origin of Human Reason (1889), Birds (1892), Essays and Criticisms (1892), Types of Animal Life (1893).

Moberly, GEORGE (1803-85), from Winchester passed to Balliol College, Oxford, was a tutor there, head-master of Winchester 1835-66, and from 1869 Bishop of Salisbury.

Modjeska, HELENA (1844-1909), Polish actress, born in Cracow, began to act in 1861, made a great name at Cracow in 1865, and 1868-76 was the first actress of Warsaw. Then she and her second husband made a brief and unlucky experiment in farming in California, but in 1877 she returned to the stage, and at San Francisco won a complete triumph as Adrienne Lecouvreur, although she acted in English—to her till of late an unknown tongue. Subsequently she was acknowledged one of the best of actresses, achieving her greatest triumphs, both in the United States and in Great Britain, in such rôles as Juliet, Rosalind, Beatrice, and in the Dame aux Camélias. After 1895 she again took to farming near Santiago Peak in California, keeping sheep, angora goats, and bees.

Moe, JÖRGEN (1815-82). See ASEBJÖRNSEN.

Moffat, ROBERT, missionary, was born at Ormiston, East Lothian, 21st December 1795, and when working as a gardener in Cheshire, in 1815, offered his services to the London Missionary Society. Arriving at Capetown in January 1817, he began his labours (1818) in Great Namaqualand. He finally settled at Kuruman (1826-70) in Bechuanaland, which ere long became, through his marvellous success, a centre of Christian light and civilisation. He printed both New (1840) and Old (1857) Testaments in Sechwana. In England (1838-43) he had an enthusiastic reception, and published his Labours and Scenes in South Africa (1842). In 1873 he was presented with £5000 in recognition of his fifty-four years of noble work in South Africa. He died at Leigh near Tunbridge, 9th August 1883, and was buried at Norwood. Livingstone married his daughter. See Life by J. S. Moffat (1885).

Mogridge, GEORGE (1787-1854), author of many children's books, as 'Old Humphrey' and 'Peter Parley', was born at Ashted near Birmingham, and died at Hastings.

Mohammed (Muhammad, and less correctly

Mahomet; Arab., 'Praised'), was born about 570 A.D. at Mecca, the son of Abdallâh, a poor merchant (though of the powerful tribe of the Koreish), who died soon after the child's birth; the mother died when he was six years old, and the boy was brought up by his uncle, Abu Tâlib. For a time he gained a scanty livelihood by tending sheep; but in his twenty-fifth year he entered the service of a rich widow, named Khadija, who, fifteen years his senior, by-and-by offered him her hand, and, a faithful wife, bore him two sons (who died early) and four daughters. Mohammed continued his merchant's trade at Mecca, but spent most of his time in solitary contemplations. About 600 A.D. Christianity had penetrated into the heart of Arabia; its northern parts were dotted over with Jewish colonies; and round about Medina were remnants of ancient sects, such as Sabians and Mandæans. Just before Mohammed's time some earnest men in the Hedjaz denounced the futility of the ancient pagan creed, and preached the unity of God; and many, roused by their words, turned either to Judaism or to Christianity, especially about Medina, Taif, and Mecca—the last being the centre of pilgrimage to most of the Arabian tribes, with its sacred Kâaba, Mount Arafat, &c., which were specially under the protection of the Koreish. Mohammed felt moved to teach a new faith, which should dispense equally with idolatry, narrow Judaism, and corrupt Christianity. He was forty years of age when, at the mountain Hirâ near Mecca, Gabriel appeared to him, and in the name of God commanded him to preach the true religion. His poetical mind had been profoundly impressed with the doctrine of the unity of God and the moral teaching of the Old Testament, as well as with the legends of the Midrash. His whole knowledge of Christianity was confined to a few apocryphal books, and with all his deep reverence for Jesus, whom he calls the greatest prophet next to himself, his notions of the Christian religion were excessively vague. His first revelation he communicated to no one but his wife, daughters, stepson, and one friend, Abu Bekr. In the fourth year of his mission, however, he had made forty proselytes, chiefly slaves and very humble people; and now some verses were revealed to him, commanding him to come forward publicly as a preacher. He inveighed against the superstition of the Meccans, and exhorted them to a pious and moral life, and to the belief in an all-mighty, all-wise, everlasting, indivisible, all-just, but merciful God, who had chosen him as He had chosen the prophets of the Bible before him, so to teach mankind that they should escape the punishments of hell and inherit everlasting life. God's mercy was principally to be obtained by prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. The Kâaba and the pilgrimage were recognised by the new creed. The prohibition of certain kinds of food belongs to this first period, when Mohammed was under the influence of Judaism; the prohibition of gambling, usury, and wine came after the Hegira. His earliest Koranic dicta, written down by amanuenses, consisted of brief, rhymed sentences, and for a time the Meccans considered him a common 'poet' or 'soothsayer,' perhaps not in his right senses. Gradually, however, fearing for the sacredness of Mecca, they rose in fierce opposition against the new prophet and his growing adherents. Many of the converted slaves and freedmen underwent terrible punishments; some suffered so much that they abjured their creed. Mohammed's faithful wife Khadija died, and his uncle and protector, Abu Tâlib; and he was reduced to utter poverty. An emigration to Taif proved a failure; he barely escaped with his life. About this time he converted some pilgrims from Medina. The next pilgrimage brought twelve, and the third more than seventy adherents to the new faith from Medina; and now he resolved to seek refuge in their friendly city, and about June 622 A.D. (the date of the Mohammedan Era, the Hegira) fled thither. A hundred families of his faithful followers had preceded him. Heretofore a despised 'madman or impostor,' he now assumed at once the position of highest judge, lawgiver, and ruler of the city and two powerful tribes. He failed in securing the support of the Jews in the city, and became their bitter adversary. The most important act in the first year of the Hegira was his permission to go to war with the enemies of Islam—especially the Meccans—in the name of God. The first battle, between 314 Moslems and 600 Meccans, was fought at Badr, in December 623; the former gained the victory and made many prisoners. A great number of adventurers now flocked to Mohammed, and he successfully continued his expeditions against the Koreish and the Jewish colonies. In January 625 the Meccans defeated him at Ohod, where he was dangerously wounded. The siege of Medina by the Meccans in 627 was frustrated by Mohammed's ditch and earthworks. In 628 he made peace with the Meccans, and was allowed to send his missionaries all over Arabia; in 629 he celebrated the pilgrimage with 2000 followers for three days at Mecca. His missionaries began to carry his doctrines abroad. He wrote letters demanding the conversion of Chosroes II., of Heraclius, of the king of Abyssinia, the viceroy of Egypt, and the chiefs of several Arab provinces. Some Meccans having taken part in a war against a tribe in Mohammed's alliance, he marched at the head of 10,000 men against Mecca; it surrendered, and Mohammed was recognised as chief and prophet. With this the victory of the new religion was secured in Arabia (630). From all parts flocked deputations to do him homage, either as God's messenger or as the Prince of Arabia; and he prepared for a war against the Syrian province of the Eastern Empire. In March 632 he undertook his last pilgrimage to Mecca, and there on Mount Arafat fixed for all time the ceremonies of the pilgrimage (Hajj). He fell ill soon after his return, and when too weak to visit the houses of his nine wives, chose as his last sojourn that of Ayesshah, his best-beloved, the daughter of Abu Bekr. He took part in the public prayers as long as he could, and died in Ayesshah's lap about noon of Monday the 12th (11th) of the third month in the year 11 of the Hegira (8th June 632). Spite of his many defects of character—deceitfulness, revengefulness, sensuality, faults of his time and race—the history of humanity has seen few more earnest, noble, and sincere 'prophets.' See German Lives by Weil (1843), Sprenger (1861-65), Nöldeke (1863), Krehl (vol. i. 1884), and Grimme (1892-95); French by Delaport (1874); Sir W. Muir's Life of Mahomet (4 vols. 1858-61; 3d ed. 1894), and Mahomet and Islam (new ed. 1887); also books by Syed Ameer Ali, C.I.E. (1890), and Prof. Margoliouth (1905).

Mohammed, the name of five sultans of Turkey, of whom MOHAMMED II. (1430-81), born at Adrianople, succeeded his father, Murad II., in 1451, and took Constantinople in 1453—thus extinguishing the Byzantine Empire and giving the Turks their commanding position on the Bosphorus. Checked by Hunyady at Belgrade, he yet annexed most of Servia, all Greece, and most of the Egean Islands, threatened Venetian territory, was repelled from Rhodes by the Knights of St John, took Otranto in Italy, and died in a campaign against Persia.

Mohammed Ali, the Mahdi (or Moslem Messiah), born in Dongola about 1843, was for a time in the Egyptian Civil Service, then a slave-trader, and finally a relentless and successful rebel against Egyptian rule in the Eastern Soudan. He made El Obeid his capital in 1883, and on 5th November defeated Hicks Pasha and an Egyptian army. On 26th January 1885 Khartoum was taken, and General Gordon (q.v.) killed. The Mahdi died 22d June 1885, the victim of vice and self-indulgence. See books by Wingate (1891), Ohrwald (1892), and Slatin Pasha (1896).

Mohl, JULIUS (1800-76), orientalist, was born at Stuttgart, and bred for the Lutheran Church, but from 1823 devoted himself at Paris to oriental studies, becoming a member of the Institute in 1844, and professor of Persian at the Collège de France in 1847. He was secretary to the Société Asiatique, and his annual reports were collected as Vingt-sept Ans d'Histoire des Etudes Orientales (1879-80). His great edition of the Shâh Nâmeh was published in 1838-78. The salon of his accomplished wife, née Mary Clarke (1793-1883), was a centre of high thinking, refinement, and brilliant talk. See Kathleen O'Meara's Madame Mohl (1885) and Mrs Simpson's Letters and Recollections of Julius and Mary Mohl (1887).

Möhler, JOHANN ADAM (1796-1838), professor of Roman Catholic theology at Tübingen and Munich, besides works on the unity of the church, Athanasius, &c., wrote Symbolik (1832), on the doctrinal differences of Catholics and Protestants. See Life by Friedrich (Mun. 1894).

Mohn, HENRIK, meteorologist, was born 15th May 1835 at Bergen, studied at Christiania, and became keeper of the university observatory and director of the meteorological institute. He superintended a scientific expedition off the northern coasts of Norway in 1876-78, has written on meteorology, on the climate of Norway, on The North Ocean, its Depths, Temperature, and Circulation (1887), and was the first to work out the theory of Arctic drift and currents from Siberia towards Greenland that Nansen utilised.

Mohun, CHARLES, LORD (c. 1675-1712), dicer, brawler, and duellist, was tried in 1693 by his peers as an accomplice in the murder of the actor William Mountford, and killed and was killed by the fourth Duke of Hamilton. [Moon.]

Moir, DAVID MACBETH, a minor Scottish poet and humorist, was born at Musselburgh, January 5, 1798, and from 1817 practised there as a physician till his death, July 6, 1851. Under his pen-name of Delta (Δ) he contributed verses to Blackwood's Magazine (collected in 1852, with memoir by Aird), and is remembered for his humorous Autobiography of Mansie Wauch (1828).

Mokanna. HAKIM BEN ATTA, called AL-MOKANNA, 'The Veiled,' was the founder of a sect in the Persian province of Khorassan. To conceal the loss of an eye he wore a veil, a habit ascribed by his followers to the necessity of shrouding from beholders the dazzling rays which issued from his divine countenance. He set himself up as an incarnation of God, and his followers increased so that he seized several fortified places. But the caliph Almahdi, after a long siege, took his stronghold of Kash (780 A.D.), when, with the remnant of his army, Mokanna took poison.

Molé, MATTHIEU LOUIS, COMTE (1781-1855), was a descendant of Matthien Molé (1584-1656), mediator between the king of France and the parlement of Paris during the Fronde. In his Essai de Morale et de Politique (1806) he vindicated Napoleon's government on the ground of necessity, and was made a count. Louis XVIII. made him a peer and minister of Marine; and Louis-Philippe foreign minister and, in 1836, prime-minister, but his ministry was unpopular.

Moleschott, JAKOB, physiologist, born at Boisle-Duc in Holland, 9th August 1822, studied medicine at Heidelberg, and taught there physiology, anatomy, and anthropology from 1847 until 1854, when he resigned, the university having 'warned' him on account of the materialistic tendency of his writings. In 1856 he became professor of Physiology at Zurich, in 1861 at Turin, and in 1878 at Rome, where he died 20th May 1893. He wrote some twenty works, in German and Italian, including one on the Natural History of Man and Animals (1855). See his autobiographical Für meine Freunde (1894).

Molesworth, JOHN EDWARD NASSAU (1790-1877), born in London, and educated at Greenwich and Trinity College, Oxford, from 1840 was High Church vicar of Rochdale.—His eldest son, WILLIAM NASSAU MOLESWORTH, LL.D. (1816-90), born at Millbrook near Southampton, and educated at Canterbury and Cambridge, held a living near Rochdale 1844-89. He wrote a History of England from 1830 (1871-73), &c.

Molesworth, Mrs (Mary Louisa Stewart), born, of Scotch parentage, at Rotterdam, 29th May 1839, passed her childhood in Manchester, Scotland, and Switzerland; she has since lived a good deal abroad. She began as a novelist under the pen-name of Eunice Graham, writing Lover and Husband (1869), She was Young and He was Old (1872), Hathcourt Rectory (1878), Miss Boverie (1880), &c. But she is best known as a writer of stories for children—Tell Me a Story (1875), Carrots (1876), Tapestry Room (1879), Herr Baby (1881), Rectory Children (1890), Red George (1891), Robin Redbreast (1892), Next Door House (1893), Olivia (1894), Carved Lions (1895), Philippa (1896), Uncanny Tales (1896), Meg Langholme (1897), &c.

Molesworth, SIR WILLIAM (1810-55), born in London of an old Cornish family; succeeded as eighth baronet in 1823; studied at Cambridge and Edinburgh; and sat in parliament from 1832, from 1845 for Southwark. He was First Commissioner of Public Works in 1853 and Colonial Secretary in 1855; and as the friend of Bentham and James Mill, was the parliamentary representative of the 'philosophical Radicals,' whose organ, the Westminster Review, he purchased in 1836. He edited Hobbes (16 vols. 1839-45), denounced transportation, and promoted colonial self-government. See Life by Mrs Fawcett (1901).

Molière (JEAN BAPTISTE POQUELIN, who took this stage-name for reasons not apparent), was born in Paris, 15th January 1622, the son of a well-to-do furniture dealer. He studied under the Jesuits at the Collège de Clermont, under Gassendi the philosopher, and under the regular teachers of law. He may have been called to the bar. His mother, who had some property, died when he was ten years old, and thus when he came of age he received his share of her fortune at once. He declined to follow his father's business, hired a tennis-court, and embarked in a theatrical venture (1643) with the Béjart family and others, under the style of L'illustre Théâtre, which lasted for over three years in Paris and failed. The company then proceeded to the provinces (from Lyons to Rouen), and had success sufficient to keep going from 1646 to 1658. The Prince de Conti took it under his protection for a time; and when he took to Catholic Methodism, Molière obtained the patronage of the king's brother, Philippe d'Orléans, so that his troupe became the servants of Monsieur. He played before the king on October 24, 1658, and organised a regular theatre, first in the Petit Bourbon; then, on its demolition, in the Palais Royal. In the provinces Molière had acquired experience as a comic writer, mostly in the style of the old farces. But he had also written L'Étourdi and the Dépit Amoureux. As a theatre manager he had to give tragedy as well as comedy. Corneille's Nicomède, with which he opened, was not a success; and though the other great tragedian of the day, Racine, was a personal friend of Molière's, their connection as manager and author was brief and unfortunate. But Molière soon realised his own immense resources as a comic writer. Les Précieuses Ridicules was published in November 1659; and from that time to his death no year passed without at least one of the greatest achievements in their own line that the world has seen. In the spring of 1662 Molière married Armande Béjart, an actress in his own company, probably about nineteen, and the youngest member of the Béjart family, whereof two other sisters, Madeleine and Geneviève, and one brother, Joseph, had been members of the illustre Théâtre. It has been asserted, in the face of such evidence as exists, that Madeleine Béjart and Molière were lovers, that Armande was Madeleine's daughter, even that Molière was the father of his own wife! It seems true that Armande was unfaithful to her husband. In August 1665 the king adopted Molière's troupe as his own servants. In 1667 symptoms of lung disease showed themselves; on 17th February 1673, the night after having acted as the Malade in the seventh representation of his last play, Molière died in his own house in the Rue de Richelieu of hæmorrhage from the bursting of a blood-vessel. His character would appear to have been generous and amiable; nor are there sufficient grounds for the accusations of irreligion brought against him. The dates and titles of Molière's plays are: L'Étourdi, Le Dépit Amoureux (1658; in the provinces 1656); Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659); Sganarelle (1660); Don Garcie de Navarre (1661); L'École des Maris, Les Fâcheux, L'École des Femmes (1662); La Critique de l'École des Femmes, Impromptu de Versailles (1663); Le Mariage Forcé, La Princesse d'Élide, Tartuffe (partially, 1664); Le Festin de Pierre (Don Juan), L'Amour Médecin (1665); Le Misanthrope, Le Médecin Malgré Lui, Mélicerte, Le Sicilien (1666); Tartuffe (1667); Amphitryon, George Dandin, L'Avare (1668); Monsieur de Pourceaugnac (1669); Les Amants Magnifiques, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1671); Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671); La Comtesse d'Escarbagnas, Les Femmes Savantes (1672); Le Malade Imaginaire (1673). To this must be added part of Psyché (1671) in collaboration with Quinault and Corneille, two farces, a few court masques, and some miscellaneous poems. In France he is called a poet; but, though he could manage verse well enough, he is best almost always in prose. It is as a comic dramatist of manners, satirising folly and vice, yet without sacrificing the art to the purpose, that he is absolutely unrivalled. Romantic or poetical comedy he hardly ever tried. It is instructive to compare Les Précieuses Ridicules, almost his first play, with Les Femmes Savantes, almost his last. Amusing as Les Précieuses Ridicules is, it is not much more than farce of the very best sort; Les Femmes Savantes is comedy of the highest kind. It is not till L'École des Femmes, perhaps not till Le Misanthrope, that the full genius of the author appears; and these two, with Tartuffe, Le Festin de Pierre, Les Femmes Savantes, Le Malade Imaginaire, and perhaps the admirable Bourgeois Gentilhomme as an example of the lower kind, may be said to be Molière's masterpieces. But from the Dépit Amoureux onward no play of his, not even the slightest, is without touches of his admirable wit, his astonishing observation, his supreme power over his own language, his masterly satire. Of all French writers he is the one whose reputation stands highest by the combined suffrage of his own countrymen and of foreigners, and after more than two hundred years, his best plays still hold the stage. The first complete edition of Molière's works was that in 1682 by La Grange and Vinot; by far the best as to text, life, lexicon, &c., is that of Despois and Mesnard in the series of Les Grands Écrivains Français (13 vols. 1873-96). There are also excellent editions by Anatole France in the 'Collection Lemerre' (7 vols. 1876-91), and with notes by G. Monval in the 'Bibliothèque des Bibliophiles' (8 vols. 1882). See also the Lives by Taschereau (4th ed. 1851), Claretie (1873), Moland (1886), and Mahrenholtz (German, 1881); the elaborate Life by H. M. Trollope (1906), and the smaller one by Chatfield Taylor (1907); Mantzius's History of Theatrical Art (trans. 1906); and studies by Brunetière and others. There are English translations by Van Lann (1875-77) and Wall (1876-77). [Mol-i-eh-ur.]

Molina, LUIS (1535-1600), Jesuit theologian, was born at Cuenca, studied at Coimbra, was professor of Theology at Evora for twenty years, and died at Madrid. His principal writings are a commentary on the Summa of Aquinas (1593); a treatise, De Justitia et Jure (1592); and the celebrated treatise on grace and free-will, Liberté Arbitrii cum Gratia Donis . . . Concordia (1588). Molina asserts that predestination to eternal happiness or punishment is consequent on God's foreknowledge of the free determination of man's will. This view was assailed as a revival of Pelagianism, and hence arose the dispute between Molinists and Thomists. A papal decree in 1607 permitted both opinions; and Molinism has been taught by the Jesuits. See French works by Régnon (1890) and Gayraud (1890). See also TELLEZ.

Molinus, MIGUEL DE, born, of noble parentage, near Saragossa, December 21, 1640, was educated at Pampeluna and Coimbra. At Rome (1669) he soon acquired a high reputation as a director of conscience. An ascetical treatise, Guida Spirituale, added largely to his fame; but in it some discovered the seeds of a dangerous error, and in 1685 he was cited before the Holy Office. Molinus had publicly to abjure sixty-eight propositions, and was imprisoned until his death, 28th Dec. 1697. His doctrine was an exaggeration of quietism. See Bigelow's Molinus the Quietist (New York, 1882), and J. H. Shorthouse's Golden Thoughts from the Spiritual Guide (1884). [Mo-lee'-nose.]

Moltke, HELMUTH, COUNT VON, field-marshal, was born 26th October 1800 at Parchim in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, his father being a general in the Danish army. In 1812-18 he studied at the military academy at Copenhagen, in 1819 became lieutenant in a Danish regiment, but in 1822 entered the Prussian service. In 1832 he was appointed to the staff, and in 1835 obtained leave to travel. Asked by the sultan to remodel the Turkish army, he did not return to Berlin till 1839. From 1858 to 1888 he was chief of the general staff in Berlin, and reorganised the Prussian army. His wonderful strategical power was displayed in the successful wars with Denmark in 1863-64, with Austria in 1866, and with France in 1870-71. He married in 1841 his step-sister's daughter by an English father, Marie von Burt (1825-68). Known as 'The Silent,' he was a man of great modesty and simplicity of character. He died in Berlin 24th April 1891. He wrote a series of letters from Turkey, and an account of the Russian campaign in Turkey in 1839. His Letters from Russia, written in 1856 to his wife, were published in 1877 (Eng. trans. 1878). Histories of the Danish-German, Austro-Prussian, and Franco-German wars were prepared by the general staff under his direction. In 1891-93 an edition of his works in eight vols. was published. See Lives by Wilhelm Müller (Eng. trans. 1879), Von Köppen (1888), Mary Herms (Lond. 1892), Müller-Bohn (3d ed. 1893), Jähns (1894), and Buchner (1894); his Essays, Speeches, and Memoirs (trans. 1893); and his Letters to his Mother, &c. (trans. 1891-96). Mommsen, THEODOR, historian of Rome, was born, the son of a pastor, at Garding in Sleswick, 30th November 1817. He studied at Kiel for three years, examined Roman inscriptions in France and Italy for the Berlin Academy (1844-47), and in 1848 was appointed to a chair of law at Leipzig, of which two years later he was deprived for the part he took in politics. In 1852 he became professor of Roman Law at Zurich, and in 1854 at Breslau, in 1858 of Ancient History at Berlin. He edited the monumental Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, helped to edit the Monumenta Germaniæ Historica, and from 1873 to 1895 was perpetual secretary of the Academy. In 1882 he was tried and acquitted on a charge of slandering Bismarck in an election speech. His fine library was burned in 1880. His greatest work remains his Römische Geschichte (vols. i.-iii. 1854-55; vol. v. 1885), trans. by Dickson as History of Rome to the Time of Augustus (4 vols. 1862-66), and The Roman Provinces (to Diocletian, 2 vols. 1886). Freeman characterises Mommsen as 'the greatest scholar of our times, well-nigh the greatest scholar of all times . . . language, law, mythology, customs, antiquities, coins, inscriptions, every source of knowledge of every kind—he is master of them all.' Yet he was defective in moral insight, and too prone to worship mere force and success. He died 1st November 1903. Amongst his 920 separate publications were works on the Italic dialects (1845, 1850), Neapolitan inscriptions (1857), Roman Coins (1850), Roman constitutional law (1871), and an edition of the Pandects (1866-70).—Of his brothers, TYCHO (1819-1900) was rector of Frankfurt gymnasium 1864-85, and edited Pindar (1864).—AUGUST, born 1821, was school-rector at Sleswick 1864-83, and wrote on Greek and Roman chronology.

Mompesson, WILLIAM (1639-1709), was the brave rector of Eyam, Derbyshire, in 1665-66, when the plague carried off 267 out of 350 parishioners, and from 1669 was rector of Eakring, Notts. See Wood's History of Eyam (4th ed. 1863).

Monboddo, JAMES BURNETT, LORD (1714-90), born at Monboddo House, Kincardineshire, and educated at Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Groningen, in 1737 was called to the Scottish bar, and was counsel for Mr Douglas in the great Douglas cause. In 1764 he became Sheriff of Kincardineshire, and in 1767 was raised to the bench as Lord Monboddo. His Origin and Progress of Language (6 vols. 1773-92) is a very learned and acute but eccentric production. Its theory of human affinity with monkeys seems less laughable now than it did to Monboddo's contemporaries; and in his study of man as one of the animals, and of civilisation by the light of savagery, he anticipated the modern science of anthropology. He further published, also anonymously, Ancient Metaphysics (6 vols. 1779-99).

Moncrieff, ASCOTT ROBERT HOPE, born at Edinburgh in 1846, and educated chiefly there with a view to the bar, was for three years a master at Lincoln grammar-school, and then took to literature. Since 1865 he has published (largely as Ascott R. Hope) a hundred to two hundred volumes of boys' books, &c.—A Book about Dominies (1867), The Men of the Backwoods (1879), and Cap and Gown Comedy (1893).

Moncrieff, COLONEL SIR ALEXANDER (1829-1906), created a K.C.B. in 1890, invented about 1857-65 the Moncrieff Pits, excavations in which heavy guns are placed in coast batteries or other places where it is specially necessary to protect them from hostile artillery fire.

Moncrieff, COL. SIR COLIN CAMPBELL SCOTT, K.C.S.I. (1903), K.C.M.G. (1887), born in 1836, had a great hand in Egyptian irrigation, and in 1892-1902 was Under-secretary for Scotland.

Mond, LUDWIG, F.R.S. (1839-1909), born at Cassel, studied under Bunsen, and settling in England in 1864, perfected at Widnes his sulphur recovery process. He founded in 1873 great alkali-works at Winnington, Cheshire, made discoveries in nickel manufacture, &c., and in 1896 gave to the Royal Institution for the nation a physico-chemical laboratory costing £100,000.

Monet, CLAUDE JEAN, impressionist painter, born at Paris, 14th November 1840. [Mo-nay.]

Monge, GASPARD (1746-1818), mathematician and physicist, born at Beaune, studied at Lyons and Mézières, in 1780 became a member of the French Academy, and during the Revolution was minister of Marine, but soon took charge of the national manufactories of arms and gunpowder. After he had helped to found the École Polytechnique, he was sent by the Directory to Italy. Here he formed a close friendship with Bonaparte, followed him to Egypt, and was made professor in the École Polytechnique and Count of Pelusium. He wrote Traité Élémentaire de Statique (1788), Leçons de Géométrie (1795), &c. [Monzh.]

Monk, or MONCK, GEORGE, Duke of Albemarle, was born, the second son of a knight, at Potheridge near Torrington, 6th Dec. 1608. He was at Rochelle (1627), was nine years in the Dutch service, and in 1642-43 commanded a regiment against the Irish rebels. Taken prisoner by Fairfax in 1644, he lay two years in the Tower, whence he freed himself by taking the Covenant. As major-general in Ulster and at Dunbar (1650) he so commended himself to Cromwell that next year he was left to complete the subjection of Scotland. In 1653 he won two great sea-fights over Tromp (q.v.); in 1654 Cromwell sent him back to Scotland as governor. After Cromwell's death, seeing everything in confusion, on New-year's Day 1660 he crossed the Border with 6000 men, and five weeks later entered London unopposed. His own wish was to bring back the Stuarts; and before long he saw that the nation was with him. The freeing of the Rump parliament from the army and the election of a new parliament were his wary steps towards the Restoration; on 23d May he welcomed Charles II. at Dover. Monk, now made Duke of Albemarle, was entrusted with the highest offices in the state, but soon retired from political affairs. In 1665, when the plague ravaged London, as governor of the City 'Old George' did his best to allay the panic. In 1666, under the Duke of York, he was defeated by De Ruyter off Dunkirk, but soon after gained a bloody victory over him off the North Foreland. He died 3d January 1670, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Lives by Gumble (1671), Skinner (1723), Guizot (trans. 1851), and Corbett (1889), the last a eulogy.

Monk, MARIA (c. 1817-50), an impostor who pretended in 1835 to have escaped from a nunnery at Montreal, and published Awful Disclosures.

Monk, WILLIAM HENRY (1823-89), a London organist and musical editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern (1861), composed the tunes to 'Abide with me' and many favourite hymns.

Monkhouse, WILLIAM COSMO (1840-1901), official of the Board of Trade, poet, and art-critic, wrote on Turner, the Italian Pre-Raphaelites, contemporary British artists, &c.

Monmouth, JAMES, DUKE OF, was born at Rotterdam, 9th April 1649, the son of Lucy Walter by Charles II. (q.v.), she said, but more likely by Colonel Robert Sidney. Charles committed the boy to the care of Lord Crofts; and in 1662 'Mr James Crofts' came to England with the queen-dowager. In 1663 he was created Duke of Monmouth, wedded to a rich heiress, Anne Countess of Buccleuch (1651-1732), and also made Duke of Buccleuch; in 1670 he succeeded Monk as captain-general. A weak, pretty, affable libertine, he became the idol of the populace, thanks to his humanity at Bothwell Bridge (1679), to the Popish Plot and the Exclusion Bill, and to his two semi-royal progresses (1680-82). Shaftesbury pitted the 'Protestant Duke' against the popish heir-presumptive, and enmeshed him in the Rye-house Plot (1683), on whose discovery Monmouth fled to the Low Countries. At Charles's death, in concert with Argyll's Scotch expedition, he landed (11th June 1685) at Lyme-Regis with eighty-two followers, branded James as a popish usurper, and asserted his own legitimacy and right to the crown. At Taunton he was proclaimed King James II.; and on 6th July he attempted with 2600 foot and 600 horse (peasants mostly and miners) to surprise the king's forces, 2700 strong, encamped on Sedgemoor near Bridgwater. His men were mowed down by the artillery, 300 falling on the field, 1000 more in the pursuit. Monmouth fled, but on the 8th was taken in a ditch near Ringwood. Brought before James, he wept and crawled, and even offered to turn Catholic; but on 15th July he was beheaded upon Tower Hill. In his 'Bloody Assize,' Judge Jeffreys hanged 331 rebels and transported 849. See Life by Roberts (1844), and Fa's King Monmouth (1901).

Monnier, MARC (1829-85), French writer of novels, comedies, historical works, &c., was born at Florence and died at Geneva.

Monod, ADOLPHE (1802-54), Reformed theologian, born of Swiss parentage at Copenhagen, laboured as a preacher or professor at Naples, Lyons, Montauban, and Paris, and published sermons, &c.—His brother, FRÉDÉRIC (1794-1868), was thirty years a prominent pastor in Paris, and helped (1849) to found the Free Reformed Church of France. See Adolphe's Life and Letters (Eng. trans. 1885). [Mon-oh.]

Monro, ALEXANDER, primus (1697-1767), was born in London, grandson of Sir Alexander Monro, a colonel in Charles II.'s army at Worcester, and studied at London, Paris, and Leyden under Boerhaave. From 1719 he lectured at Edinburgh on anatomy and surgery, and was professor of these subjects 1725-59. He helped to found the Infirmary, and gave clinical lectures there. He wrote Osteology (1726), Essay on Comparative Anatomy (1744), Observations Anatomical and Physiological (1758), and Account of the Success of Inoculation of Smallpox in Scotland (1765).—ALEXANDER MONRO, secundus (1733-1817), his youngest son, studied at Edinburgh, Berlin, and Leyden, succeeded to his father's chair, and wrote on the nervous system (1783), the physiology of fishes (1785), and the brain, eye, and ear (1797).—He again was succeeded by his son, ALEXANDER MONRO, tertius (1773-1859), who wrote on hernia, the stomach, and human anatomy.

Monro, EDWARD (1815-66), Tractarian, author of allegories, &c., born in London and educated at Harrow and Oriel, from 1842 was incumbent of Harrow Weald, from 1860 of St John's, Leeds.

Monroe, JAMES, fifth president of the United States, was born of Scottish stock in Westmoreland county, Va., April 28, 1758. He left William and Mary College to join Washington's army, was wounded at Trenton, and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1782 he was elected to the assembly of Virginia and in 1783 to congress, where he sat for three years. He was chairman of the committee (1785) that prepared the way for framing the constitution, which, however, as a States' Rights man, he disapproved. As a member of the United States senate 1790-94, he opposed Washington and the Federalists; the government recalled him in 1796 from the post of minister to France for displaying too decided French sympathies. On his return he published (1797) an attack on the executive, and became the darling of the Democrats. He was governor of Virginia 1799-1802, and then Jefferson sent him as an extra plenipotentiary to France for the purchase of Louisiana. The next four years were spent in less successful diplomacy at London and Madrid. In 1811 he was again governor of Virginia, in 1811-17 secretary of state, and in 1814-15 also secretary of war. In 1816 he was elected president of the United States, and in 1820 re-elected almost unanimously. His most popular acts were the recognition of the Spanish American republics, and the promulgation in a message to congress (1823) of the 'Monroe Doctrine,' embodying the principle 'that the American continents . . . are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonisation by any European power,' though existing colonies were not to be interfered with. In 1825 Monroe retired to his seat at Oak Hill, Va., but profuse hospitality overwhelmed him with debt, and he found refuge with relations in New York, where he died, 4th July 1831. See Lives by J. Q. Adams (1850) and Gilman (1883); also Tucker's History of the Monroe Doctrine (1885).

Monson, SIR WILLIAM (1569-1643), an admiral who fought with the Spaniards 1585-1602, and was a prisoner on Spanish galleys 1591-93, was born at South Carlton, Lincolnshire, and died at Kinnersley, Surrey. [Mun'son.]

Monstrelet, ENGUERRAND DE (c. 1390–1453), born near Boulogne, was provost of Cambrai. His Chronicle, 1400–44, written from the Burgundian standpoint, was edited by Douet d'Arceq (1857–62); and a continuation by Mathieu d'Escochy to 1461 by Beaucourt (1863). [Monstr'-lay.]

Montagu. See HALIFAX, MANCHESTER, and SANDWICH.

Montagu, BASIL (1770–1851), a natural son of Lord Sandwich and Miss Ray (see HACKMAN), was educated at Charterhouse and Christ's College, Cambridge, and was accountant-general in bankruptcy 1835–46. He wrote much on bankruptcy, Lord Bacon, &c. His third wife, a Mrs Skepper, Mrs Procter's mother, was 'the noble lady' of Edward Irving and Carlyle.

Montagu, ELIZABETH, née ROBINSON (1720–1800), a blue-stocking and lion-hunter, with £10,000 a-year, who entertained everyone from king to chimney-sweeps, and wrote against Voltaire an Essay on Shakespeare. See books by Doran (1873), Climençon (1903), and Huchon (1907).

Montagu, LADY MARY WORTLEY, baptised in London, 26th May 1689, was the eldest daughter of the Earl (later Duke) of Kingston, who, losing his wife in 1694, made his clever daughter preside at his table at a very early age. In 1712 she married Edward Wortley Montagu. On the accession of George I. Montagu obtained a commissionership of the Treasury, and from this time Lady Mary lived in London, where she gained a brilliant reputation by her wit and beauty, and was the intimate of Addison, Pope, and other notables. In 1716 Montagu was appointed ambassador at Constantinople, and there till 1718 he and his wife remained. There Lady Mary wrote her sprightly and entertaining Letters describing Eastern life. Hence she introduced into England the practice of inoculation for smallpox, having first tried it on her own lunatic, bigamous, much-travelling son, Edward Wortley Montagu (1713–76). For the next twenty years her abode was at Twickenham. Pope quarrelled with her in 1722, but not over her six satirical Town Eclogues, which had been published surreptitiously six years before. In 1739, for reasons unknown, she left England and her husband, parting from him, however, on very good terms, though they never met again. She lived at Florence, Avignon, the Lago d'Iseo, and Venice till 1761, when, at the request of her daughter, the Countess of Bute, she returned to England. She died August 21, 1762. A collected edition of her works, with Life, was published by her great-grandson, Lord Wharncliffe (3 vols. 1837; 3d ed. 1887).

Montagu, RICHARD (1577–1641), a High Church controversialist, born at Dorney, Bucks, and educated at Eton and Cambridge, became Bishop of Chichester in 1628, of Norwich in 1638.

Montaigne, MICHEL EYQUEM DE, third son of the Seigneur de Montaigne, was born at the Château de Montaigne in Périgord, 28th Feb. 1533. Till the age of six the boy spoke no language but Latin; and at the Collège de Guienne in Bordeaux he remained for seven years, boarding in the rooms of his famous teachers, George Buchanan and Muretus. He subsequently studied law; but from the age of thirteen to twenty-four he is almost lost sight of, though it is certain that he was frequently in Paris, knew something of court life, and took his full share of its pleasures. By-and-by he obtained a post in connection with the parlement of Bordeaux, and for thirteen years was a city counsellor. He was familiar with the court of Francis II., saw and admired Mary Queen of Scots, and for a time was 'gentleman of the bed-chamber in ordinary.' At the age of thirty-four he married Françoise de la Chassaine, daughter of one of his fellow-counsellors in Bordeaux. A translation (1569) of the Natural History of a 15th-century professor at Toulouse was his first effort in literature, and supplied the text for a famous essay, the Apologie de Raymond Sebond, in which he exhibits the full scope of his own sceptical philosophy. In 1571, his two elder brothers being dead, Montaigne succeeded to the family estate, and here till his death on 13th Sept. 1592 he lived the life of a country gentleman, varied only by visits to Paris and a tour in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy; here, too, he began those Essais which were to give him a place among the first names in literary history. The record of his journey (1580–81) in French and Italian was first published in 1774. Unanimously elected mayor of Bordeaux (against his wish), he performed his duties to the satisfaction of the citizens, and was re-elected. Notwithstanding the free expression of scepticism in his writings, he devoutly received the last offices of the church. From the very first men, like Pascal, profoundly separated from him on all the fundamental problems of life (as in his inconclusive philosophy, his easy moral opinions, his imperfect sense of duty), have acknowledged their debt to his fearless and all-questioning criticism, expounded mainly in haphazard remarks, seemingly inspired by the mere caprice of the moment, but showing the highest originality, the very broadest sympathies, and a nature capable of embracing and realising the largest experience of life. There are translations by Florio (q.v.; new ed. by Saintsbury, 1892–93); by Charles Cotton (q.v.), revised by W. C. Hazlitt (1865; new ed. 1902); by J. H. McCarthy (1890); and of the Journals by Waters (1903–4). See books by St John (1857), Collins (1879), Lowndes (1898), and Dowden (1905); in French by Grün (1857), Payen (1847), Malvezin (1870), Leveaux (1874), Réanme (1886), Bonnefon (1893, 1897), and Stapfer (1895); essays by Sainte-Beuve, Emerson, Dean Church, Pattison, &c.; and editions of the Essais by Courbet and Royer (5 vols. 1873–91), and by Moutheau and Jouaust (7 vols. 1886–88).

Montalembert, CHARLES FORBES RENÉ DE, born in London, May 15, 1810, the eldest son of a noble French émigré—afterwards a peer of France and ambassador—and his English wife, was educated at Fulham and the Collège Ste Barbe. He followed his father to Stockholm (1829), and after a visit to Ireland (1830) eagerly joined the Abbé Lamennais and Lacordaire in the Avenir, a High Church Liberal newspaper. In 1831 Montalembert and Lacordaire opened a free school in Paris, which was immediately closed by the police. Montalembert, who had succeeded to his father's peerage, pleaded with great eloquence the cause of religious liberty, and a fine of 100 francs had the effect of a victory. When the Avenir, being condemned by the pope (1831), was given up, Montalembert lived for a time in Germany, where he wrote the Histoire de Ste Elizabeth. In 1835 again in Paris, he spoke in the Chamber in defence of the liberty of the press. In his Devoir des Catholiques dans la Question d'Enseignement he pleaded for religious education. A famous protest against tyranny was his great speech in January 1848 upon Switzerland. After the Revolution he was elected a member of the National Assembly; and he supported Louis Napoleon till the confiscation of the Orleans property, when he became a determined opponent of the imperial régime. He was elected to the Academy in 1852, visited England in 1855, and wrote L'Avenir politique de l'Angleterre. In 1858 an article in the Correspondant made such exasperating allusions to the imperial government that he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of 3000 francs—a sentence remitted by the emperor. Besides his great work, Les Moines d'Occident (5 vols. 1860-67; 5th ed. 1893), he wrote Une Nation en Deuil: la Pologne (1861), L'Église libre dans l'État libre (1863), Le Pape et la Pologne (1864), &c. He died in Paris, 13th March 1870, sixteen days after writing a celebrated letter on papal infallibility. See Memoir by Mrs Oliphant (1872), and French works by Foisset (1877), Lecanuet (1895), and the Viconte de Meaux (1897). [Monv-tu-lons-bair'.]

Montcalm, Louis Joseph, Marquis de Montcalm Gezan de Saint Véran, was born in the château of Candiac near Nîmes, 29th February 1712. In 1746 he was severely wounded and made prisoner at the battle of Piacenza. In 1756 he assumed command of the French troops in Canada, and captured the British post of Oswego, and also Fort William Henry, where the prisoners (men, women, and children) were massacred by the Indian allies. In 1758 he, with a small force, successfully defended Ticonderoga against 15,000 regulars and provincial troops under Abercromby. After the loss to the French of Louisburg and Fort Duquesne, Montcalm removed to Quebec, and with 16,000 troops—mainly militia and Indians—prepared to defend it against a British attack. In 1759 General Wolfe (q.v.) ascended the St Lawrence with about 8000 troops and a naval force under Admiral Saunders. After repeated attempts to scale the heights of Montmorency, he, before dawn on 13th September, with 5000 men, gained the plateau, and in a battle on the Plains of Abraham drove the French in disorder on the city. Montcalm tried in vain to rally his force, was borne back by the rush, and, mortally wounded, died next morning (14th September 1759). See Parkman's Montcalm and Wolfe (1884), and Falgairolle's Montcalm devant la Posterité (1886).

Montecuculi, RAIMONDO, COUNT (1608-81), born near Modena, entered the Austrian service in 1625, and distinguished himself during the Thirty Years' War, against the Turks (1664), and against the French on the Rhine (1672-75). He was made a Prince and Duke of Melfi. See his Opere Complete (new ed. 1821), and the Lives by Campori (1876) and Grossmann (1878).

Montefiore, SIR MOSES HAIM, philanthropist, was born in Leghorn, October 24, 1784, son of a banker whose parents had emigrated from Italy to London. He retired with a fortune from stockbroking in 1824, and from 1829 was prominent in the struggle for removing Jewish disabilities. After long exclusion and repeated re-election, he was admitted Sheriff of London in 1837, being knighted the same year, and made a baronet in 1846. Between 1827 and 1875 he made seven journeys in the interests of his oppressed countrymen in Poland, Russia, Roumania, and Damascus. He was presented with the freedom of the City of London in 1873. In memory of his wife he endowed a Jewish college at Rainsgate in 1865. In his hundredth year he was still hale and well, but died at Rainsgate 28th July 1885. See the Diaries of Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore (1890). [Mon-tay-fo'reh.]

Montégut, ÉMILE (1826-95), French critic, born at Limoges, contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes, and published books of travel, a study of Marshal Davout, works on Italian and English literatures, and translations of Shakespeare, Macaulay, and Emerson. [Mon-tay-ghee.]

Montelius, OSKAR, Swedish archaeologist, born at Stockholm, 9th September 1843, became Director of Archaeology at Stockholm.

Montespan, FRANÇOISE ATHÉNAÏS, MARQUISE DE (1641-1707), daughter of the Duc de Mortemart, married in 1663 the Marquis de Montespan, and became attached to the household of the queen. Her beauty and wit captivated the heart of Louis XIV., and about 1668 she became his mistress. The marquis was flung into the Bastille, and in 1676 his marriage was annulled. Montespan reigned till 1682, and bore the king eight children, which were legitimised, but was supplanted by Madame de Maintenon, the governess of her children. In 1687 she left the court, and by-and-by found relief in devotion. See her Mémoires (1829; trans. 1895), and studies by A. Houssaye (6th ed. 1864) and Clément (1868). [Monv-es-pan.]

Montesquieu, CHARLES DE SECONDAT, BARON DE LA BRÈDE ET DE, was born 18th January 1689 at the château La Brède near Bordeaux, and became counsellor of the parlement of Bordeaux in 1714, and its president in 1716. He discharged the duties of his office faithfully, but, till defective eyesight hindered him, by preference devoted himself to researches on the weight and transparency of bodies, the use of the renal glands, the causes of echoes, &c. His first great literary success was the Lettres Persanes (1721), containing a satirical description, put in the mouths of two Persian visitors to Paris, of French society, the libertinage, political decadence, and irreligious insincerity of the regency. Weary of routine work, he sold his office in 1726, and then settled in Paris. He travelled for three years to study political and social institutions, visiting Vienna, Venice, Rome, Switzerland, Holland, and England, whither he came with Lord Chesterfield. He remained in England two years (1729-31), mixing with its best society, frequenting the Houses of Parliament, studying the political writings of Locke, and analysing the English constitution. Causes de la Grandeur des Romains et de leur Décadence (1734) is perhaps the ablest of his works. His monumental De l'Esprit des Loix (1748) was published anonymously and put on the Index, but passed through twenty-two editions in less than two years. By the spirit of laws he means their raison d'être, and the conditions determining their origin, development, and forms; the discussion of the influence of climate was novel. The work, which held up the free English constitution to the admiration of Europe, had an immense influence. In 1750 he published a Défense de l'Esprit des Loix, followed afterwards by Lysimaque (1748), a dialogue on despotism, Arsace et Isménie, a romance, and an essay on taste in the Encyclopédie. He died, totally blind, at Paris, 10th February 1755. See books on him by Vian (1879), Sorel (1887), Zevort (1887), Churton Collins (1908). [Monv-es-k'yuh.]

Monteverde, CLAUDIO (1567-1643), composer, born at Cremona, from 1613 lived at Venice.

Montez, LOLA, adventuress, was born in 1818 at Limerick, and was christened Marie Dolores Eliza Rosanna, her father being an Ensign-Gilbert, her mother of Spanish descent. Taken out to India, she there lost her father by cholera; and, her mother having remarried, Dolores ('Lola') was brought up from 1826 at Montrose, Paris, and Bath. To escape a match with a gouty old judge, she eloped with a Captain James (1837); but the marriage ended in a separation (1842). She now turned dancer at Her Majesty's Theatre; and after visits to Dresden, Berlin, Warsaw, St Petersburg, and Paris, came to Munich (1846), where she soon won an ascendancy over the eccentric artist-king, Louis I., who created her Countess of Landsfeld, and allowed her £5000 a year. For a twelvemonth she exercised enormous influence in favour of Liberalism and against the Jesuits; but the revolution of 1848 sent her adrift. Again she made a marriage—as unlucky as the first—and, after touring (1851-56) through the States and Australia, and after two more 'marriages' in California, in 1858 she delivered in New York a series of lectures written for her by C. C. Burr. She died, a penitent, at Astoria, Long Island, 17th Jan. 1861. See her Autobiography (1858), and her Life by E. B. D'Auvergne (1909).

Montezuma I., Mexican emperor, ascended the throne about 1437, annexed Chalco, crushed the Tlascalans, and died in 1471. Montezuma II., last Mexican emperor, succeeded in 1502, and was a distinguished warrior and legislator. (See CORTES.) One of his descendants was viceroy of Mexico 1697-1701. The last, banished from Spain for liberalism, died at New Orleans 1836.

Montfort, SIMON DE, Earl of Leicester, born about 1208, was the third son of Simon IV. (c. 1160-1218), Comte de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, and Comte de Toulouse, who undertook in 1208 the crusade against the Albigenses, and fell at the siege of Toulouse. Young Simon was well received by Henry III. of England in 1230, was confirmed in his title and estates in 1232, and in 1233 married the king's youngest sister Eleanor, who, on the death of her betrothed, had taken a vow of chastity—hence the marriage provoked not merely the barons but the church. In June 1239 Simon was godfather at the baptism of Prince Edward, but three months later was driven from his presence by the king. Simon crossed to France, but, soon nominally reconciled, was again in England by 1242. Meantime the whole community was exasperated by the misgovernment of the king, the exactions of the pope, and the influx of alien favourites at court. In 1248, sent as king's deputy to Gascony, Simon put down disaffection with a heavy hand. But his jealous master listened eagerly to complaints against his rule, and arraigned him. Earl Simon, acquitted, resigned his post in 1253, and returned to England. Bad harvests, famine, fresh exactions of Rome, and the rapacity of foreign favourites had exhausted the endurance of the country, and in 1258 the barons appeared in arms at the parliament at Westminster, demanding the expulsion of all foreigners, and the appointment of a committee of twenty-four to govern the realm. Later, at Oxford, the parliament drew up the Provisions of Oxford, which the king swore solemnly to observe. A council of fifteen with a baronial majority was formed to advise the king; the old parliaments were superseded by a body of twelve chosen by the barons; and foreigners were to surrender their castles—Simon himself surrendering accordingly Kenilworth and Odiham. Prince Edward intrigued with the subtenants, and the barons quarrelled among themselves; and in 1261 the king announced that the pope had declared the Provisions null and void.

All men now looked to Earl Simon as leader of the barons and the whole nation, and he at once took up arms. After some varying success, both sides sought an arbitrator in Louis IX. of France, who decided in the Mise of Amiens for surrender to the royal authority. London and the Cinque Ports repudiated the agreement, and Simon, collecting his forces, surprised the king's army at Lewes, and captured Prince Edward (1264). The Mise of Lewes arranged that there were to be three electors, Earl Simon, the Earl of Gloucester, and the Bishop of Hereford, who were to appoint nine councillors to nominate the ministers of state. To aid these councillors in their task a parliament was called, in which, together with the barons, bishops, and abbots, there sat four chosen knights from each shire, and for the first time two representatives from certain towns. This may be looked upon as the germ of our modern parliaments. But the great earl's constitution was premature; the barons soon grew dissatisfied with the rule of Simon the Righteous; and his sons' arrogance injured his influence. Prince Edward, escaping, combined with Gloucester, and defeated Simon at Evesham, 4th August 1265. The earl fell, crying 'God's grace!' people and clergy cherished him as a saint; and miracles were ascribed to him. See Blaauw, Barons' War (1844; 2d ed. 1871); Stubbs's Constitutional History; and Lives by Pauli (1867; Eng. trans. 1876), Creighton (1876), and Prothero (1877).

Montgolfier, JOSEPH MICHEL (1740-1810), and JACQUES ETIENNE (1745-99), sons of a paper-manufacturer at Annonay, invented balloons in 1783.

Montgomerie. See EGLINTON.

Montgomerie, ALEXANDER (c. 1545-c. 1611), Scottish poet, born probably at Hessilhead Castle near Beith, was 'maister poet' to James VI. He was detained in a Continental prison, and embittered by the failure of a law-suit involving loss of a pension. Implicated in Barclay of Ladyland's Catholic plot, he was denounced as a rebel in 1597. His fame rests on the Cherrie and the Slae, which, partly a love-piece, partly didactic, has real descriptive power, with dexterous mastery of rhyme. See edition by Cranston (Scot. Text Soc. 1886-87; supplement by Stevenson, 1910).

Montgomery, FLORENCE SOPHIA, born in 1843, the second daughter of a Donegal baronet, has written A Very Simple Story (1867), Misunderstood (1869), Thrown Together (1872), Seaforth (1878), The Blue Veil (1883), Transformed (1886), The Fisher's Daughter (1886), Colonel Norton (1895), &c.

Montgomery, GABRIEL, COMTE DE (c. 1530-74), an officer in the Scottish Guard of the king of France, at a tournament (30th June 1559) had the misfortune to pierce with a splinter from his lance the eye of Henry II., who died eleven days after. Montgomery, though blameless, retired to his estate in Normandy, and to England, where he turned Protestant. In 1562 he returned to support the Huguenot cause, and was a leader in the third religious war. On St Bartholomew's night he escaped from Paris to Jersey and England; in 1573 he appeared off Rochelle with a small fleet, but had to retire. Landing next year in Normandy, he was compelled to surrender the castle of Domfront, carried to Paris, and beheaded. See Life by Marlet (1890).

Montgomery, JAMES, poet, was born at Irvine, Ayrshire, 4th November 1771, the eldest son of a Moravian pastor (afterwards missionary in Barbadoes), and was educated at Fulneck in Yorkshire. After four years with a baker at Mirfield, a general dealer at Wath, and a bookseller in London, in 1792 he became clerk to the editor of the Radical Sheffield Register. In 1794 he started the Sheffield Iris, which he edited till 1825. In 1795 he was fined £20, and got three months in York Castle for printing a 'seditious' ballad; in 1796 it was £30 and six months for describing a riot. Yet by 1832 he had become a moderate Conservative, and in 1835 accepted from Peel a pension of £150. He died at Sheffield, 30th April 1854. His 'bland and deeply religious' Poetical Works (4 vols. 1849) include The Common Lot (1805), The Wanderer of Switzerland (1806), The West Indies (1809), The World before the Flood (1813), Greenland (1819), and The Pelican Island (1827). Ten of his hymns keep their place in the hymnals. There is a prolix Life by Holland and Everett (7 vols. 1854-56).

Montgomery, ROBERT, poetaster, was born at Bath in 1807, the natural son of one Gomery, a clown. In 1830 he entered Lincoln College, Oxford; in 1833 took his B.A. with a fourth class; in 1835 was ordained; and from 1843, after some years in Glasgow, was minister of Percy Chapel, London, until his death, at Brighton, on 3d December 1855. Of his thirty-one works in verse and prose, two—The Omnipresence of the Deity (1828; 29th ed. 1855) and Satan (1830)—are remembered by Macaulay's onslaught in the Edinburgh Review for April 1830.

Monthonol, CHARLES TRISTAN DE, Comte de Lee (1783-1853), born at Paris, served in the navy and cavalry, was wounded at Wagram, and in 1809 was made Napoleon's chamberlain. He accompanied him to St Helena, and with Gourgaud published Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France sous Napoléon, écrits sous sa dictée (8 vols. 1822-25). Condemned in 1840 to twenty years' imprisonment as Louis Napoleon's proposed chief of the staff, he was liberated in 1848, having published in 1846 Récits de la Captivité de Napoléon. [Mont-to-lonv.]

Monti, RAFFAELLE (1818-81), sculptor of 'The Veiled Vestal,' &c., was born at Milan, and lived much and died in London.

Monti, VINCENZO (1754-1828), an Italian poet, remarkable for his political tergiversation, who was professor at Pavia and historiographer to Napoleon. See works by Cantù (1879), Vicchi (1885-87), and Zumbini (3d ed. 1894).

Monticelli, ADOLPHE (1831-85), a painter, 'creator of the phantom genre,' was born at Marseilles, studied at Paris, where he lived mainly till 1870, returned to Marseilles, and died there in poverty. His paintings fall into three periods, of which the last and most characteristic is notable for masses of warm and gorgeous colouring, with vague, almost invisible figures—nymphs dimly discernible in luxuriant green meadows against a background of glorious cloud-masses.

Montluc, BLAISE DE (1502-77), a French marshal, who fought in Italy, and as governor of Guienne treated the Huguenots with great severity. His Mémoires (best ed. 1865-72) by Henry IV. were called 'la bible du Soldat.'

Montmorency, ANNE, DUC DE (1493-1567), Marshal and Constable of France, distinguished himself at Marignano (1515), Mézières, and Bicocca, was taken prisoner along with Francis I. at Pavia (1525), defeated Charles V. at Susa (1536), and became Constable (1538). Suspected by the king of siding with the Dauphin, he was banished from court in 1541. He was restored to his dignities by Henry II. (1547), commanded at the disaster of St Quentin (1557), and was taken prisoner by the Spaniards. He opposed the influence of Catharine de' Medici, commanded against the Huguenots at Dreux (1562), and was taken prisoner a third time. In 1563 he drove the English out of Havre. He again engaged Condé at St Denis (1567), but received his death-wound. See Life by Decrue (1885-89).—His grandson, HENRI (1595-1632), Duc de Montmorency, commanded the Catholics of the old in the religious wars (1621-30), took Ré and Orléon (1625), and penetrated into Piedmont (1630). But provoked into rebellion by Richelieu, he was defeated at Castelnaudary, sentenced to death at Toulouse, and beheaded. [Mont-mo-ronv-see.]

Montrose, JAMES GRAHAM, MARQUIS OF, belonged to an old family settled since 1325 at Old Montrose near the town of Montrose, and ennobled with the titles of Lord Graham (1451) and Earl of Montrose (1505); three of its members fell at Falkirk, Flodden, and Pinkie; and the third earl was Chancellor and Viceroy of Scotland. His successor, John, married the eldest sister of the unfortunate Earl of Gowrie, and had five daughters and one son, James, the 'great marquis,' born in 1612 at Old Montrose. After his father's death (1626) the young earl was sent to St Andrews, and was an apt if not ardent student. In 1629 he married a daughter of the Earl of Southesk, and in 1633 went to travel in Italy, France, and the Low Countries. He returned in the very year (1637) of the Service-book tumults in Edinburgh, and he was one of the four noblemen who drew up the National Covenant. In 1638 he was despatched to Aberdeen, to coerce it into subscription; and in 1639 he made three military expeditions thither. On the first occasion (30th March) he employed conciliation; on the second (25th May) he imposed a fine of 10,000 merks. The arrival by sea of the Earl of Aboyne with reinforcements caused Montrose to retreat; but at Meagra Hill near Stonehaven, on 15th June, he won a complete victory, and four days later was once more master of Aberdeen. When Charles invited several Covenanting nobles to meet him at Berwick, Montrose was one of those who went; and the Presbyterians dated his 'apostasy' from that interview. In the General Assembly of 1639 he showed disaffection towards the Covenant. In the second Bishops' War Montrose was the first of the Scottish army to ford the Tweed (20th August 1640); but that very month he had entered into a secret engagement against Argyll. It leaked out that he had been communicating with the king; he was cited before a committee of the Scottish parliament, and next year was confined five months in Edinburgh Castle. In 1644 he quitted his forced inaction at Oxford, and, disguised, made his way into Perthshire as lieutenant-general and Marquis of Montrose. At Blair-Athole he met 1200 Scotch-Irish auxiliaries under Macdonell ('Colkitt'), and the clans quickly rallied round him. On 1st September he routed the Covenanters under Lord Elcho at Tippermuir near Perth. He next gained a victory at Aberdeen (13th September), and took the city, which was this time abandoned for four days to the horrors of war. The approach of Argyll with 4000 men compelled Montrose to retreat into the wilds of Badenoch; but recrossing the Grampians, he suddenly appeared in Angus, where he wasted the estates of the Covenanting nobles. With fresh supplies, he returned to Aberdeenshire, narrowly escaped defeat at Fyvie (October), and again withdrew into the mountains; Argyll threw up his commission. Montrose, receiving large accessions from the clans, marched into the

Campbell country, devastated it frightfully, drove Argyll himself from his castle at Inveraray, and then wheeled north towards Inverness. The 'Estates' placed a fresh army under Baillie, who was to take Montrose in front, while Argyll should fall on his rear; but Montrose instead surprised and utterly routed Argyll at Inverlochry, 2d February 1645. He then passed with fire and sword through Moray and Aberdeenshire, eluded Baillie at Brechin, captured and pillaged Dundee (3d April), and escaped into the Grampians. On 4th May he defeated Baillie's lieutenant at Auldearn near Nairn, and on 2d July routed Baillie himself at Alford; towards the end of the month he marched southward with over 5000 men. Baillie, following, was defeated with a loss of 6000 at Kilsyth (15th August); this, the most signal of Montrose's six victories, seemed to lay Scotland at his feet, but the clansmen slipped away home to secure their booty. Still, with 500 horse and 1000 infantry, he had entered the Border country, when, on 13th September, he was surprised and routed by 6000 troopers under David Leslie at Philiphaugh near Selkirk. Escaping to Athole, he endeavoured, vainly, to raise the Highlands; on 3d September 1646 he sailed for Norway, and so passed to Paris, Germany, and the Low Countries. When news of Charles's execution reached him, he swore to avenge the death of the martyr, and, undertaking a fresh invasion of Scotland, lost most of his little army by shipwreck in the passage from Orkney to Caithness, but pushed on to the borders of Ross-shire, where, at Invercharron, his dispersed remnant was cut to pieces, 27th April 1650. He was nearly starved to death in the wilds of Sutherland, when he fell into the hands of Macleod of Assynt, who delivered him to Leslie, and, conveyed with all contumely to Edinburgh, he was hanged in the Grassmarket, 21st May 1650. Eleven years afterwards his mangled remains were collected from the four airts, and buried in St Giles's, where a stately monument was reared to him in 1838. He left a son, James, the 'good Marquis' (c. 1631-69), whose grandson in 1707 was created Duke of Montrose. Montrose's few passionately loyal poems are little known, save the one stanza, 'He either fears his fate too much,' &c.; even its ascription to Montrose (first made in 1711) is doubtful. See Latin Memoirs by his chaplain, Dr Wishart (Amst. 1647; Eng. trans. 1756; complete trans. 1893); Mark Napier's Memoirs of Montrose (1838; 4th ed. 1856); Lady Violet Greville's Montrose (1886); that by Mrs Hugh Pryce (1912); and the relevant portions of Gardiner's History of England, Great Civil War, and Commonwealth.

Montyon, JEAN BAPTISTE AUGET, BARON DE (1738-1820), a French lawyer, founded the Prize de Vertu, &c. See Life by Labour (1881). [Montyon on Prize.]

Moody, DWIGHT LYMAN, born at Northfield, Mass., 5th February 1837, was a shopman in Boston, and in 1856 went to Chicago, where he engaged in missionary work. In 1870 he was joined by IRA DAVID SANKEY (1840-1908), who was born at Edinburgh, Pennsylvania. In 1873 and 1883 they visited Great Britain as evangelists, Moody preaching and Sankey singing; afterwards they worked together in America. Moody, who died in 1899, published twenty volumes of sermons and addresses. See the Life by his son (1900).

Moore, EDWARD (1771-1848), an East India Company major, author of the Hindu Pantheon (1810), Suffolk Words and Phrases (1823), &c.

Moore, ALBERT JOSEPH (1841-93), a painter chiefly of pretty Hellenic pictures, was born at York, one of the fourteen children of the portrait and landscape painter, WILLIAM MOORE (1790-1851); he came to London in 1855. See his Life by Baldry (1894).—His elder brother, HENRY MOORE (1831-95), landscape and marine painter, was elected an A.R.A. in 1886, an R.A. in 1893.

Moore, ANNE, née PEGO, born in 1761 at Rosliston, Derbyshire, from 1807 to 1813 the 'fasting woman of Tutbury,' then proved an impostor.

Moore, EDWARD (1712-57), a London linen-draper, born at Abington, of dissenting parentage, who, going bankrupt, took to writing plays, &c., the Gamester (1753) his best-known production.

Moore, FRANCIS (1657-1715), born at Bridgnorth, practised physic in London, and in 1700 started 'Old Moore's' astrological almanac.

Moore, GEORGE (1806-76), born at Mealsgate, Cumberland, of statesman ancestry, came up to London in 1825, and, after sixteen years as draper and laceman, devoted all his energies to philanthropy. He died at Carlisle, knocked down by a runaway horse. See Life by Smiles (1878).

Moore, GEORGE, is the son of George Henry Moore, M.P. (1811-70), of Moore Hall, co. Mayo, was born in 1852, was educated at Oscott College, and studied art in Paris. He is the author of A Mummer's Wife (1884), Esther Waters (1894), Evelyn Innes (1898), and other realistic novels, besides several volumes of verse and criticism.

Moore, JOHN, M.D. (1729-1802), born at Stirling, a minister's son, studied medicine and practised in Glasgow, travelled with the young Duke of Hamilton 1772-78, and then settled in London. His View of Society in France, Switzerland, Germany, and Italy (1779-81) was well received; but the novel Zeluco (1789), which suggested Byron's Childe Harold, is to-day the least forgotten of his works. These include two other novels, Medical Sketches, and books on the French Revolution. Moore died at Richmond. See Memoir by Anderson prefixed to his Works (7 vols. 1820).

Moore, SIR JOHN, born at Glasgow, 13th November 1761, the eldest son of the preceding, distinguished himself in the descent upon Corsica (1794) and served in the West Indies (1796), in Ireland (1798), and in Holland (1799). He was in Egypt in 1801, obtaining the Order of the Bath; and in 1802 served in Sicily and Sweden. In 1808 he was sent with a corps of 10,000 men to strengthen the English army in Spain, and in August assumed the chief command. In October he received instructions to co-operate with the Spanish forces in the expulsion of the French from the Peninsula, and moved his army from Lisbon towards Valladolid. But Spanish apathy, French successes elsewhere, and the intrigues of his own countrymen soon placed him in a critical position. When the news reached him that Madrid had fallen, and that Napoleon was marching to crush him with 70,000 men, Moore, with only 25,000, was forced to retreat. In December he began a disastrous march from Astorga to Cornuá, nearly 250 miles, through a mountainous country, made almost impassable by snow and rain, and harassed by the enemy. They reached Coruña in a lamentable state; and Soult was waiting to attack as soon as the embarkation should begin. In a desperate battle on 16th Jan. 1809 the French were defeated with the loss of 2000 men. Moore was mortally wounded by a grape-shot in the moment of victory, and was buried early next morning (as in Wolfe's poem). See Lives by his brother (1835) and Gen. Maurice (1897), and Maurice's reply in his edition of Moore's Diary (1904) to strictures in Oman's Peninsular War.

MOORE, THOMAS, was born at Dublin, 28th May 1779, son of a Catholic grocer. From Trinity College he went in 1799 to London and the Middle Temple. His translation of Anacreon (1800) proved a great hit, and, with his musical talent, procured him admission to the best society. In 1801 followed the Poetical Works of the late Thomas Little. In 1803 appointed registrar of the Admiralty court at Bermuda, he went there to arrange for a deputy, and, after a tour in the States and in Canada, returned in a twelvemonth to England. For his Odes and Epistles (1806) he was sharply taken to task in the Edinburgh, and a bulletless duel with Jeffrey was the consequence. In 1811 he married an actress, Bessy Dyke (1793-1865), and in 1817 they settled at Sloperton Cottage, near Bowood in Wiltshire. Meanwhile Moore had published the earlier of the Irish Melodies (1807-34) and The Twopenny Post-bag (1812), whose tropes at once glittered and stung. In 1817 the long-expected Lalla Rookh appeared, dazzling as a firefly. In Paris he wrote The Fudge Family (1818). For Lalla Rookh the Longmans paid him 3000 guineas; the Irish Melodies brought in £500 a-year; but Moore had 'a generous contempt for money,' his Bermuda deputy embezzled £6000, and in 1819, to avoid arrest, he went to Italy with Lord John Russell. He spent five days at Venice with Byron, went on with Chantrey to Rome, and then with his family fixed his abode in Paris, where he wrote The Loves of the Angels (1823) and a prose romance, The Epicurean (1827). He returned in 1822 to Sloperton; and here, except for 'junketings' to London, Scotland, and elsewhere, he passed his last thirty years. To those years belong the Memoirs of Captain Rock (1824), History of Ireland (1827), and Lives of Sheridan (1825), Byron (q.v., 1830), and Lord Edward Fitzgerald (1831). In 1835 he received a pension of £300, but his last days were clouded by the loss of his two sons and mental decay. He died 25th Feb. 1852. Moore in his lifetime was popular as only Byron; but to-day he ranks far below Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats. His muse was light, airy, graceful, but soulless. He is best in his lyrics; and even in them there is a certain sameness. See his Memoirs, 'edited' by Lord John Russell (8 vols. 1852-56), and Vallat's Thomas Moore, sa Vie et ses Œuvres (1886).

MORANT, PHILIP (1700-70), an Essex clergyman, born in Jersey, wrote History of Essex (1760-8), &c.

MORA'TA, OLYMPIA (1526-55), scholar, was born at Ferrara, the daughter of the poet Fulvio Pellegrino Morato. In her sixteenth year she gave public lectures; but, having in 1548 married the German physician Andreas Grundler, she followed him to Germany, became a Protestant, and, reduced to penury, died at Heidelberg, leaving numerous Latin and Greek poems, a treatise on Cicero, dialogues, letters, &c. See the Monograph by Bonnet (4th ed. Paris, 1865).

MORATIN, LEANDRO DE (1760-1828), comic poet, born at Madrid, became Joseph Bonaparte's librarian, and after 1814 took refuge in Paris.

MORAY, JAMES STUART, EARL OF, by Protestants called the 'Good Regent,' was the natural son of James V. of Scotland, by a daughter of Lord Erskine. Born in 1531, in 1558 he was made prior in commendam of St Andrews, in 1556 joined the Reformers. In 1561 he was despatched to France to invite his half-sister, Queen Mary, to return to her kingdom; and on her arrival he acted as her prime-minister. In 1562 she created him Earl of Moray, and also of Mar; and he put down for her the Border banditti, and defeated Huntly at Corrichie. On her marriage to Darnley (1565) he appealed to arms, but was forced to take refuge in England. He did not return to Edinburgh till the day after Rizzio's murder (in 1566), to which he was privy. In April 1567 he withdrew to France, but next August was recalled by the nobles in arms against Mary, to find her a prisoner at Lochleven, and himself appointed regent of the kingdom. On Mary's escape he defeated her forces at Langside (13th May 1568), and was one of the commissioners sent to England to conduct the negotiations against her. After his return to Scotland, by his vigour and prudence he succeeded in securing the peace of the realm and settling the affairs of the church. But on 20th Jan. 1570 he was shot at Linlithgow by James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, who was instigated by Mary's adherents, and prompted also, it may be, by personal enmity. See also RANDOLPH, SIR THOMAS.

MORDAUNT. See PETERBOROUGH.

MORE, MORO, or MOR, SIR ANTHONY (c. 1512-76), a great portrait-painter, born at Utrecht, in 1547 entered the Antwerp guild of St Luke; in 1550-51 visited Italy, in 1552 Spain, and in 1553 England, where he was knighted, and painted Queen Mary. From about 1568 he lived at Antwerp.

MORE, HANNAH, fourth daughter of the village schoolmaster of Stapleton near Bristol, was born 2d Feb. 1745, and at twelve was sent to a boarding-school opened by her sisters at Bristol. She wrote verses at an early age, and in 1762 published The Search after Happiness, a pastoral drama. In 1774 she was introduced to the Garricks, Johnson, Burke, Reynolds, and the best literary society of London. During this period she wrote two tales in verse, and two tragedies, Percy and The Fatal Secret, both of which were acted. Led by her religious views to withdraw from society, she, on the publication of her Sacred Dramas, retired to Cowslip Green near Bristol, where she did much to improve the condition of the poor, and still helped by her writings to raise the tone of English society. Her essays on The Manners of the Great and The Religion of the Fashionable World, her novel Celebs in Search of a Wife (1809), and a tract called The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain were her most popular works. In 1828 she settled at Clifton, where she died, September, 7, 1833. See Lives by Miss Harland (1901) and Miss Meakin (1911).

MORE, HENRY (1614-87), 'Cambridge Platonist,' born at Grantham, was educated at Eton and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he became fellow in 1639, and remained all his life. He gave himself entirely to philosophy, especially to Plato and the Neoplatonists; and his earlier rationality gradually gave place to hopeless mysticism and theosophy. His Divine Dialogues (1668) is a work of unusual interest; his Philosophicall Poems were edited by Dr Grosart ('Chertsey Library,' 1878). See Life by Ward (1710), and Tulloch's Rational Theology (1874).

MORE, SIR THOMAS, was born in London, 7th February 1473, the son of Sir John More, Justice of the King's Bench. He was placed at fifteen as page in the household of Archbishop Morton, and by him was sent to Oxford, where the Renaissance was now represented by such men as Colet and Linacre. Having completed his legal studies at New Inn and Lincoln's Inn, he was for three years reader in Furnival's Inn, and spent the next four years in the Charterhouse in 'devotion and prayer.' During the last years of Henry VII. he became under-sheriff of London and member of parliament. On the accession of Henry VIII. (1509) a brilliant prospect was opened up to More, though he had no natural inclination for public life. Introduced to the king through Wolsey, he became Master of Requests (1514), Treasurer of the Exchequer (1521), and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1525). He was Speaker of the House of Commons, and was sent on missions to Francis I. and Charles V. On the fall of Wolsey in 1529, More, against his own strongest wish, was appointed Lord Chancellor. In the discharge of his office he displayed a primitive virtue and simplicity. The one stain on his character as judge is the harshness of his sentences for religious opinions. He sympathised with Colet and Erasmus in their desire for a more rational theology and for radical reform in the manners of the clergy, but like them also he had no promptings to break with the historic church. He saw with displeasure the successive steps which led Henry to the final schism from Rome. In 1534 Henry resigned the Chancellorship. In 1534 Henry was declared head of the English Church; and More's steadfast refusal to recognise any other head of the church than the pope led to his sentence for high-treason after a harsh imprisonment of over a twelvemonth; he cheerfully met his fate by beheading on 7th July 1535. More was twice married; his daughter Margaret, the wife of his biographer Roper, was distinguished for her high character, her accomplishments, and her pious devotion to her father. By his Latin Utopia (1516; Eng. trans. 1556; ed. by Lupton, 1895) More takes his place with the most eminent humanists of the Renaissance. In his History of King Richard III. (1513) he produced the first book in classical English prose. From Erasmus's Encomium Morice we realise all his virtues and all his attractions, but realise also that he was a winning rather than an imposing figure. In 1886 he was beatified. See Lives by Roper (first printed 1626), Lord Campbell (Lives of the Chancellors), Seböhm (Oxford Reformers), Father Bridgett (1891), and Hutton (1895); also Nisard's Renaissance et Réforme (1855; 3d ed. 1877).

Moreau, JEAN VICTOR, French general, was born 11th August 1761 at Morlaix in Brittany. The son of an advocate, he studied law, but at the Revolution commanded the volunteers from Rennes, served under Dunois in 1793, and in 1794 was made a general of division; he took part, under Pichegru, in reducing Belgium and Holland. Appointed in 1796 to the chief command on the Rhine and Moselle, he crossed the Rhine at Kehl, defeated Latour at Rastatt and the Archduke Charles at Ettlingen, and drove the Austrians back to the Danube. After the defeat of Jourdan, he made a brilliant retreat to the Rhine; but supposed complicity with Pichegru led to his being deprived of his command. In 1798 he took command of the army in Italy, then hard pressed by the Russians and Austrians, which he saved from destruction by a skilful retreat. Superseded by Joubert, he remained with him, and on his death in battle resumed command and conducted the defeated troops to France. The party of Sieyès, which overthrew the Directory, offered him the dictatorship; he declined it, but lent his assistance to Bonaparte on 18th Brumaire. In command of the army of the Rhine, he gained victory after victory over the Austrians in 1800. drove them back behind the Inn, and at last won the decisive battle of Hohenlinden. Napoleon, grown very jealous of Moreau, accused him of sharing in the plot of Cadoudal (q.v.); and a sentence to two years' imprisonment (1804) being commuted to banishment, Moreau settled in New Jersey. In 1813 he accompanied the Emperor of Russia in the march against Dresden, where (27th August) a French cannon-ball broke both his legs. Amputation was performed, but he died at Laun in Bohemia, 2d Sept. He was buried in St Petersburg. See work by Beauchamp (trans. 1814). [Mor-o'.]

Morell, JOHN DANIEL (1816-91), born at Little Baddow, Essex, was a Congregational minister at Gosport 1842-45, and a school-inspector 1848-76. He wrote twenty-five works on philosophy, grammar, &c. See sketch by Theobald (1891).

Morel, LOUIS (1643-80), born in Provence, took orders, and was a noted preacher at Lyons, where he published his Grand Dictionnaire Historique (1674; 20th ed. 1759; Eng. trans. 1694), a historical, biographical, and geographical encyclopædia. In 1675 he went to Paris, and laboured at its expansion till his death. [Mor-ay'ree.]

Moretto da Brescia, properly ALESSANDRO BONVICINO (1498-1554), religious painter, was born and died in Brescia. See Pater's Miscellaneous Studies (1895).

Morfill, WILLIAM RICHARD (1835-1909), Slavonic scholar, graduated from Oriel in 1857, and from 1889 was reader in Russian at Oxford.

Morgagni, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1682-1771), founder of pathological anatomy and professor at Padua. [Mor-gan'-yee.]

Morgan, AUGUSTUS DE. See DE MORGAN.

Morgan, SIR HENRY (c. 1635-88), born in Glamorganshire of good family, seems to have been kidnapped at Bristol, and shipped to Barbadoes. Joining the buccaneers, he, sometimes with a regular privateer's commission, conducted brilliant expeditions against Spanish possessions (Porto Bello, Maracaybo, Panama, &c.), giving after conquest free rein to the license of his piratical swashbucklers. He died lieutenant-governor of Jamaica. See Life by J. C. Hutcheson (1890), and Haring's Buccaneers in the West Indies (1910).

Morgan, LADY, novelist, was born (Sydney Owenson) in Dublin on the Christmas Day probably of 1780. Her father, a theatrical manager, fell into difficulties; and the clever, bold, lively young woman resolved to support the fortunes of the family, first as governess, next as author. In 1812 she married Thomas Charles Morgan, M.D. (1783-1843), whom the Lord-lieutenant knighted. In 1837 Lord Melbourne gave her a pension of £300, and in 1838 the pair removed from Dublin to London. Here she died 16th April 1859. Her twenty-two works—rattling novels, verse, travels, &c.—include St Clair (1804), The Wild Irish Girl (1806), O'Donnel (1814), France (1817), and Italy (1821). Hepworth Dixon edited her silly but amusing Memoirs (1862).

Morgan, LEWIS HENRY (1818-81), archaeologist, was born at Aurora, N.Y., became a lawyer at Rochester, and served in the state assembly (1861) and senate (1868). He wrote The League of the Iroquois (1851), The American Beaver (1868), Consanguinity and Affinity (1869), Ancient Society (1877), House-life of the American Aborigines (1881), &c.

Morghen, RAPHAEL, engraver, was born at Naples, June 19, 1758, the son of a mediocre engraver of German origin. Raphael's 'Poetry' and 'Theology' in the Vatican were engraved by him in 1781, as were later 252 works, including Raphael's 'Madonna della Seggiola' and 'Transfiguration,' the 'Madonna del Sacco' by Andrea del Sarto, and Da Vinci's 'Last Supper.' The grand-duke gave him a pension at Florence, and there he died, April 8, 1833. See work by Fred. R. Halsey (New York, 1855).

Morier, JAMES JUSTINIAN, novelist, born probably in 1780, son of the consul at Smyrna, served at the court of Persia as secretary of legation and envoy 1809-15. He retired on a pension in 1816, and gave himself to literature. In 1812 and 1818 he published two books of travel in Persia, Armenia, and Asia Minor. But his great work is that inimitable picture of Persian life, The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan (1824), with the less brilliant Hajji Baba in England (1828). He died in 1849.

Mörrike, EDUARD (1804-75), poet of the Swabian school, was born at Stuttgart, became pastor, then teacher. His poems, mainly lyrical, are graceful and tender. He also wrote novels.

Morin, or MORINUS, JEAN (1591-1659), French theologian, wrote on ecclesiastical antiquities, and was a founder of biblical criticism.

Morison, JAMES, D.D. (1816-93), a Kilmarnock United Secession minister, born at Bathgate, who in 1843, with three other ministers, founded the Evangelical Union, its system a modified independency. He removed to Glasgow in 1851.

Morison, JAMES COTTER (1832-88), author and Positivist, was the son of James Morison of the 'Hygeist' (1770-1840), inventor and proprietor of 'Morison's Pills,' and was educated at Highgate grammar-school and Lincoln College, Oxford. His first work was his masterpiece, The Life and Times of St Bernard (1863). His latest, The Service of Man, an Essay towards the Religion of the Future (1887), attracted much attention. He was one of the founders of the Fortnightly Review.

Morison, ROBERT (1620-83), botanist, a native of Aberdeen, having borne arms as a royalist, retired to France, took his M.D. at Angers (1648), and had charge of the garden of the Duke of Orleans. Charles II. made him one of his physicians, 'botanist royal,' and professor of Botany at Oxford. His chief work is Plantarum Historia Universalis Oxoniensis (1680).

Morland, GEORGE, painter, was born in London, 26th June 1763, the eldest son of the crayonist Henry Morland (1712-97), who brought him up with extreme rigour. From the time he was his own master, his life was a downward course of drunkenness and debt. Yet in the last eight years of his life he turned out nearly nine hundred paintings and over a thousand drawings. His strength lay in country subjects (pigs, Gypsies, and stable interiors). His 'Visit to a Child at Nurse' fetched 1050 gs. in 1895. He died of brain-fever in a Holborn sponging-house, 27th Oct. 1804. See works by Dawe (1807), Ralph Richardson (1895), and J. T. Nettlehip (1899).

Morland, SIR SAMUEL (1625-95), born at Sulhamstead-Barnister rectory, Berks, and educated at Winchester and Magdalene College, Cambridge, from 1653 was a Cromwellian diplomatist; published History of the Evangelical Churches of Piemont (1658); and, having forwarded the Restoration, was made a baronet and mechanician to Charles II.—his forte hydrostatics.

Morley, HENRY, was born in London, September 15, 1822, and educated at the Moravian school of Newviad-on-the-Rhine and King's College, London. After practising medicine at Madely 1844-48, and keeping school at Manchester and Liverpool, he settled down in London in 1850 to literary work, became editor of the Examiner (1859-64), English lecturer at King's College (1857-65), and professor of English Language and Literature at University College (1865-89). He published How to make Home Unhealthy (1850); Lives of Palissy (1852), Cardan (1854), and Cornelius Agrippa (1856); Memoirs of Bartholomew Fair (1857); Fairy Tales (1859-60); English Writers (carried down in 10 vols. to Shakespeare, 1864-94); Clément Marot and other Studies (1871); A First Sketch of English Literature (1873, reached before his death its 34th thousand); Library of English Literature (5 vols. 1876-82); English Literature in the Reign of Victoria (1881); and several 'libraries' of standard literature. He died 14th May 1894. See Life by Solly (1899).

Morley, JOHN, journalist, biographer, philosophical critic, Radical politician and statesman, who took his seat in the House of Peers as Viscount Morley in 1908, was born at Blackburn, 24th December 1838, educated at Cheltenham and Lincoln College, Oxford, and called to the bar, but chose literature as a profession. His best-known books are Edmund Burke (1867), Critical Miscellanies (1871-77), Voltaire (1872), On Compromise (1874), Rousseau (1876), Diderot and the Encyclopedists (1878), Richard Cobden (1881; new ed. 1896), and Studies in Literature (1891). From 1867 till 1882 he edited the Fortnightly Review; and he has edited the 'English Men of Letters' series, writing the volume on Burke, whilst for the 'English Statesmen' he wrote Walpole (1889). A pronounced Radical and decided agnostic, he unsuccessfully contested Blackburn in 1865, and Westminster in 1880. From 1880 to 1883, when he was elected for Newcastle-on-Tyne, he edited the Pall Mall Gazette. His articles then in favour of Home Rule, followed up by speeches in 1885, made him Mr Gladstone's most conspicuous supporter. In 1886 he was a successful Irish Secretary, and again in 1892-95. Defeated at Newcastle in 1895, he was returned for Montrose Burghs in 1896, was Secretary for India in 1905-10, and from 1910 Lord President of the Council. He wrote the authoritative Life of Gladstone (4 vols. 1903).

Morley, SAMUEL (1800-86), born in Homerton, became the head of his father's great hosiery business, employing 3000 persons, was a zealous philanthropist, and sat as Liberal M.P. for Bristol 1868-85. See Life by Hodder (1887).

Mornay, PHILIPP DE (1549-1623), Seigneur du Plessis-Marly, a French statesman, converted to Protestantism in 1560, and nicknamed the 'Pope of the Huguenots.' His treatise on Christianity was translated into English in 1589 at the instance of his dead friend, Sir Philip Sidney.

Morny, CHARLES AUGUSTE LOUIS JOSEPH, DUC DE (1811-65), was believed to be the son of Queen Hortense and the Comte de Flahault, and so half-brother of Louis Napoleon. Born in Paris, and adopted by the Comte de Morny, he served in Algeria; but soon quitted the army, and in 1838 turned a manufacturer of beet-root sugar. Ever after he was mixed up in all sorts of speculations. Chosen a deputy in 1842, he quickly became prominent in financial questions. After 1848 he supported his half-brother, took a prominent part in the coup d'état, and became minister of the Interior. In 1854-65 he was president of the Corps Législatif, and was ambassador to Russia in 1866-67. He is the 'Duc de Mora' in Daudet's Nabab. See Bingham's Recollections of Paris (1896).

Moroni, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, portrait and religious painter, was born at Bondo near Albino, in the territory of Bergamo, about 1525. A splendid example of his style is the 'Tailor' in the National Gallery, London, where are four other pictures by him. He died 5th February 1578.

Morphy, PAUL (1837-84), advocate and greatest of chess-players, was born at New Orleans.

Morris, FRANCIS ORPEN (1810-93), the 'Selborne of the North,' graduated at Oxford in 1833, and became rector of Nunburnholme. See Life by Don (1896).

Morris, GEORGE PERKINS (1802-64), author of 'Woodman, spare that Tree,' was born in Philadelphia, edited magazines, and died in New York.

Morris, GOUVERNEUR, born in Morrisania, N.Y., 31st Jan. 1752, was admitted to the bar in 1771. In 1780 he lost a leg by an accident. Assistant in the finance department 1781-84, in 1787 he took his seat in the convention that framed the U.S. constitution, and in 1788 sailed for Paris. The greater part of 1791 he spent in England as Washington's agent, and then till 1794 was U.S. minister to France. Returning to America in 1798, he sat in the Senate 1800-3, and died 6th Nov. 1816. See Memoirs by Jared Sparks (1832), monograph by Roosevelt (1888), and Morris's Diary and Letters (1889).

Morris, SIR LEWIS, writer of verse, was born in Carnarthen, Jan. 23, 1833, and educated at Sherborne and Jesus College, Oxford, where in 1855 he took a first in classics and won the Chancellor's prize. He practised at the bar 1861-81. Songs of Two Worlds (3 vols. 1871-75) by 'A New Writer' was followed in 1876 by The Epic of Hades, which ran into several series. Before his death (in Nov. 1907) he had published Gwen, a Drama; The Ode of Life; Songs Unsung; Gycia, a Tragedy; A Vision of Saints (1890), Idylls and Lyrics (1896), &c. In 1895 he was made a knight-bachelor.

Morris, RICHARD, LL.D. (1833-94), Early English and Pali philologist, was born at Bermondsey, in 1871 took Anglican orders, and was head-master of the Masonic School at Wood Green 1875-91.

Morris, ROBERT (1734-1806), the 'Financier of the Revolution,' went early from Lancashire to Philadelphia, and in old age was a prisoner for debt. See Life by W. G. Sumner (1892).

Morris, THOMAS (1821-1908), 'the Nestor of golf,' was born in St Andrews, and served an apprenticeship as golf-club maker with the celebrated Allan Robertson. He went to Prestwick as green-keeper in 1850, where he several times won the championship belt, and returned to St Andrews as green-keeper in 1864. His son 'Tommy,' who died young in 1875, was the best player of his time, and carried off the champion belt by winning it three times in succession.

Morris, WILLIAM, poet, was born at Walthamstow, 24th March 1834, and educated at Marlborough and Exeter College, Oxford. The close friend of Burne-Jones, he first tried painting, but in 1858 published The Defence of Guenevere and other Poems, in 1867 The Life and Death of Jason. The Earthly Paradise, twenty-four legendary poems recited by Norsemen who had sailed westward on the quest (3 vols. 1868-70), confirmed his high reputation. Other works were Love is Enough (1873), a translation, the Aeneid (1876), Stuard the Volsung (1876), and The Fall of the Niblungs, a Poem (1877). In collaboration with Magnusson he translated from the Icelandic Grettir the Strong, The Story of the Volsung and Niblungs, and Three Northern Stories. His translation of the Odyssey (1887) was more successful than his Aeneid. The House of the Wolfings (1889) was in prose; as was also The Roots of the Mountains (1890), a fine story of primitive Northern life, in artificially archaic language, afterwards much affected by him. The Glittering Plain and News from Nowhere (1891)—a Utopian romance—followed, and in the same year Poems by the Way, his last volume of original verse. Later were The Wood beyond the World (1895), Child Christopher (1895), a verse translation of Beowulf (1895), The Well at the World's End (1896), The Water of the Wondrous Isles (1897), and Sundering Floods (1898). In 1863 Mr Morris and others founded the establishment for the manufacture of wall-papers, stained glass, tiles, and artistic household decorations, which has largely contributed to reform English taste in colour and design. Latterly a pronounced socialist, fervid in his sympathy with the poor, but by no means systematic in his theory, he wrote and lectured much in support of his views, and edited the Commonweal. Hopes and Fears for Art (1892) were lectures. Latterly much of his energy was devoted to his Kelmscott Press, which in 1891-97 published in special typography and with beautiful adornments forty-nine works (priced at £650), including translations of medieval French romances, Shelley, Keats, Rossetti, Herrick, parts of Shakespeare, Coleridge, and Swinburne, his own Beowulf, &c., and a magnificent Chaucer. He died 3d Oct. 1896, and was buried at Kelmscott, near the old Oxfordshire house that he occupied after Rossetti. See Bibliography by Temple Scott (1897), works by Vallance (1897) and Buxton Forman (1898), and Life and Letters by Mackail (1899).

Morrison, ARTHUR, born 1st November 1863, is the author of the powerful realistic Tales of Mean Streets (1894) and A Child of the Jago (1896).

Morrison, CHARLES, a Renfrew surgeon, born at Greenock, and said to have died in Virginia, in 1753 suggested the electric telegraph.

Morrison, RICHARD JAMES. See ZADKIEL.

Morrison, ROBERT, founder of Protestant missions in China, was born, of Scottish parentage, at Morpeth, 5th January 1782, and in 1807 was sent to Canton by the London Missionary Society. In 1809-14 he translated and printed the New Testament. By 1819, with some help, he had done the same with the Old Testament; and in 1823 he completed his great Chinese Dictionary. In 1818 he established an Anglo-Chinese College at Malacca. After a visit to Europe (1824-26) he returned to China. In 1834 he was interpreter to Lord Napier, and he died at Canton, 1st August. He was also author of Horae Siniticae (1812), Chinese Grammar (1815), and Chinese Miscellany (1825). See Lives by his widow (1839) and Townsend (1888).

Morritt, JOHN BACON SAWREY (1772-1843), of Rokeby Park, N.R. Yorkshire, traveller, writer on the topography of Troy, and Conservative M.P., is best remembered as Sir Walter Scott's friend.

Morse, SAMUEL FINLEY BREESE, inventor, the eldest son of Rev. Dr Jedidiah Morse, geographer, was born at Charlestown, Mass., April 27, 1791. He graduated at Yale in 1810, went to England to study painting, and in 1813 received a gold medal for his statue, the 'Dying Hercules.' In 1826-42 he was the first president of the National Academy of Design at New York. He studied chemistry and electricity, and on a voyage from Havre to New York in 1832 conceived the idea of a magnetic telegraph, which he exhibited to congress in 1837, and vainly attempted to patent in England. His claims to priority over Wheatstone (q.v.) were the subject of controversy. He struggled on heroically against scanty means until 1848, when congress appropriated 30,000 dollars for an experimental telegraph line between Washington and Baltimore. Morse lived to see his system widely adopted, and honours and rewards were heaped upon him. He died in New York, 1872. See Life by Prime (1875).

Mortara, EDGAR, a Jewish boy who in 1858 was carried off from his parents by the Archbishop of Bologna, on the plea that he had, when an infant, been baptised by a Catholic maid-servant. The refusal of the authorities to give him up to his parents excited great indignation in England. He became an Augustinian monk.

Mortimer. See EDWARD II. and III.

Mortimer, FAVELL LEE, née BEVAN (1802-78), author of Peep of Day, Near Home, Far Off, and other children's books, was born in London, and married in 1841 a clergyman, who died in 1850.

Morton, JAMES DOUGLAS, EARL OF, regent of Scotland, was born early in the 16th century, the younger son of Sir George Douglas of Pittendriech near Edinburgh. In 1553, in right of his wife, daughter of the third Earl of Morton, he succeeded to that title and the estates. He joined the Reformers in 1557, in 1561 was sworn a privy-councillor, and in 1563 was made Lord High Chancellor. Conspicuous in Rizzio's assassination (1566), he fled to England, but obtained his pardon from the queen. He was privy to the design for Darnley's murder, but purposely absented himself from Edinburgh (1567); and, on Bothwell's abduction of Mary, he joined the confederacy of the nobles against them. He figured prominently at Carberry Hill; discovered the 'Casket Letters'; led the van at Langside (1568); and, after the brief regencies of Moray, Lennox, and Mar, in November 1572 was himself elected regent. His policy was in favour of Elizabeth, from whom in 1571 he was receiving bribes; and his high-handed treatment alike of the nobles and of the Presbyterian clergy, his attempts to restore episcopacy, and the rapacity imputed to him swelled the number of his enemies. He seemed to have retrieved his temporary downfall by the seizure two months later of Stirling Castle (May 1578); but Esme Stuart in 1580 completely supplanted him in young King James's favour; and on 2d June 1581, as 'art and part' in Darnley's murder, he was beheaded with his own 'Maiden' in the Edinburgh Grassmarket.

Morton, JOHN (c. 1420-1500), cardinal, was born at Milborne St Andrew in Dorsetshire, studied at Cerne Abbey and Balliol College, and practised as advocate in the Court of Arches. He adhered with great fidelity to Henry VI., yet by Edward IV. was made Master of the Rolls and Bishop of Ely. Richard III. imprisoned him, but he escaped, and joining Henry VII., was made Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor (1486). In 1493 he became a cardinal. See Gairdner's Henry VII. (1889), and a Life of Morton by Woodhouse (1895).

Morton, JOHN M. See MORTON, THOMAS.

Morton, LEVI PARSONS, born at Shoreham, Vt., 16th May 1824, was a country storekeeper's assistant, and in 1863 founded banking-houses in New York and London. In 1878-80 he was returned to congress as a Republican, in 1881-85 was minister to France, in 1889-93 was vice-president of the U.S., and in 1895-96 was governor of New York State.

Morton, SAMUEL GEORGE (1799-1851), cranialist, born in Philadelphia, studied medicine

there and at Edinburgh, and in 1839 was appointed professor of Anatomy in the Pennsylvania Medical College. His great works are Crania Americana (1839) and Crania Egyptica (1844).

Morton, THOMAS, dramatist, was born in 1764 in Durham, quitted Lincoln's Inn for play-writing, and produced Speed the Plough (1798, with its invisible 'Mrs Grundy'), The Blind Girl (1801), Town and Country (1807), School for Grown Children (1826), &c. For thirty-five years he lived at Pangbourn near Reading, till in 1828 he removed to London, where he died 28th March 1838.—His son, JOHN MADDISON MORTON, born at Pangbourn, 3d January 1811, from 1832 to 1840 held a clerkship in Chelsea Hospital, and between 1835 and 1885 wrote close on a hundred farces (mostly from the French), of which Box and Cox (1847) brought him £7000. But the rise of burlesque was his ruin, and in 1881 he became a 'poor brother' of the Charterhouse. He died Dec. 19, 1891. See the memoir by Clement Scott prefixed to Plays for Home Performance (1889).

Morton, THOMAS (1781-1832), a Leith ship-builder, inventor about 1822 of the patent slip.

Morton, WILLIAM THOMAS GREEN (1819-68), a Boston dentist, born at Charlton, Mass., in 1846 was the first to employ in operations anæsthesia produced by sulphuric ether.

Moryson, FYNES (1566-c. 1617), born at Cadeby, Lincolnshire, became a fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, travelled over Europe and the Levant, and published his Itinerary (1617).

Moscheles, IGNAZ, pianist and composer for the piano, born at Prague, 30th May 1794, of Jewish parents, was by 1808 the favourite musician and music-master of Vienna. From 1825 he taught at the London Academy of Music, and directed at the Philharmonic Concerts. From 1844 he laboured at the Leipzig conservatory until his death, 10th March 1870. He edited in English Schindler's Life of Beethoven (1841). See Life by his wife (Eng. trans. 1873), and his Correspondence with Mendelssohn (trans. 1888). [Mosh'e-lex.]

Moschus, of Syracuse, Greek bucolic poet, flourished circa 150 B.C. His works are generally printed along with those of Theocritus and Bion, and there is a fine prose translation of the three by Andrew Lang (1889). [Mos'kus.]

Moser, MARY, flower-painter, the only woman, besides Angelica Kauffmann, elected an Academician. Her father, a Swiss, George Michael Moser (1704-83), was an enameller and gold-chaser, the first keeper of the Royal Academy; and she died Mrs Lloyd at a great age in 1819.

Moses (Heb. Moshel), born probably in the first half of the 14th century B.C., led the people of Israel out of Egypt by way of Sinai, Kadesh, and Moab (where he died) towards the Holy Land. The Pentateuch used to be regarded as his work; but most modern critics agree that its historical portions, as well as most of the legislative documents, belong to a much later time. See Rawlinson's Moses: his Life and Times (1887); Wellhausen's History of Israel (1885); Reuss's Geschichte des Alten Testaments (2d ed. 1890); Renan's Histoire du Peuple d'Israël (Eng. trans. 1887); and Kittel's Geschichte der Hebräer (1888).

Mosheim, JOHANN LORENZ VON (1694-1755), born at Lübeck, became in 1723 professor of Theology at Helmstedt, and in 1747 at Göttingen. His Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ (1726; new ed. 1755) proved him, in Gibbon's phrase, 'full, rational, correct, and moderate,' and was translated into English. He wrote other books on church history and theology, his standpoint that of liberal orthodoxy. [Mos-kime.]

Motherwell, WILLIAM, poet and antiquary, was born in Glasgow, 13th October 1797, and educated in Edinburgh and Paisley, where, at twenty-one, he was appointed sheriff-clerk depute of the county of Renfrew. In 1819 he published the Harp of Renfrewshire, containing biographical notices of the poets of that district. This was but the prelude to his Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern (1827). In 1828 he commenced the Paisley Magazine, and became editor of the Conservative Paisley Advertiser, in 1830 of the Glasgow Courier. In 1832 he published a collection of his best poems, entitled Poems Narrative and Lyrical. He died in Glasgow, November 1, 1835. His Jeanie Morison is unsurpassed for pathos and picturesque beauty; 'My heid is like to rend, Willie,' has seldom been read without tears. See memoir prefixed to his Poetical Remains (1848; new ed. 1881).

Motley, JOHN LOTHROP, was born in Dorchester, Mass., 15th April 1814, and studied at Harvard and several German universities. In 1839 he published an historical novel, Morton's Hope; another, Merrymount, a protest against the gloom of Puritanism, was better received. Fully ten years were spent on his History of the Dutch Republic (1856), which established his fame. In 1857 he was once more in Boston, but soon returned to Europe, as the materials for European history were not accessible in the States. The History of the United Netherlands appeared in 1860-69. His letters to the Times on the civil war were probably the most important of all the efforts made by patriotic Americans to enlighten the British public upon the issues involved. In 1861-67 he was minister to Austria, in 1869-70 to Great Britain, being summarily recalled through a feud between Grant and Sumner. His last work was The Life and Death of John Barneveld, a biography which is virtually a part of his main theme. After his wife's death in 1874 Motley paid another visit to the States; and on his return to England in 1876 he gradually sank, and died at Kingston Russell, the Dorsetshire residence of his son-in-law, Sir William Harcourt, May 29, 1877. See Memoir by O. W. Holmes (1878), his Correspondence edited by G. W. Curtis (1888), and short Life by Prof. Jameson (1897).

Motteux, PETER ANTHONY (1660-1718), playwright and translator of Rabelais and Don Quixote, left Rouen for London on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685). See Life by Van Laan (1860).

Moulton, LOUISE CHANDLER (1835-1908), poetess, was born in Pomfret, Conn., married at twenty W. U. Moulton, a Boston publisher, and has published children's stories, novels, essays, and poems; among them Bedtime Stories (3 series, 1873-80), Some Women's Hearts (1874), Miss Eyre from Boston (1889), and In the Garden of Dreams (1890), a volume of tender verse.

Moultrie, JOHN (1799-1874), minor poet, born in London, a great-nephew of William Moultrie who fought for America in the war of independence, was educated at Eton and Trinity, Cambridge, and in 1825 became rector of Rugby. Some little poems in My Brother's Grave (1837) and The Dream of Life (1843) have kept his name from being quite forgotten. See Memoir by Derwent Coleridge prefixed to his Poems (1876).

Moxon, EDWARD (1801-58), born at Wakefield, came to London about 1817, and in 1830 started as a publisher (for Lamb, Wordsworth, Tennyson, &c.). He wrote verses himself.

Mozart, WOLFGANG AMADEUS CHRYSOSTOM, was the younger child of Leopold Mozart, Kapellmeister to the Archbishop of Salzburg, and was born in Salzburg, 27th January 1756. He made his first professional tour through Europe when he was six years old. In 1781 he followed the archbishop to Vienna, but soon quarrelled with him. He married a loving wife, who was a wretched manager; and debts and difficulties increased. The charming little opera Die Entführung aus dem Serail paved the way for the Marriage of Figaro (1786), which created a furor. The extraordinary success of Don Giovanni (1787) made it impossible for the court still to overlook the composer, and he was appointed 'Kammer-Musicus' to Joseph II., at a salary of £80 a-year. The emperor ordered a new opera, Così fan Tutti, but owing to his death and the indifference to art of Leopold II., the composer reaped no pecuniary benefit. His carelessness, improvidence, and senseless generosity overwhelmed him with endless embarrassments. In 1791 Schikaneder, a theatre manager, begged of him a new opera on an incoherent subject of his own, The Magic Flute, which, at first coldly received, ended by making Schikaneder's fortune. In writing the noble Requiem Mass commissioned for Count Walsegg, he felt he was writing his own requiem; and he died 5th December 1791. He was buried in the common ground of St Mark's Churchyard. Mozart wrote 624 compositions; he left no branch of the art unenriched by his genius. Gifted with an inexhaustible vein of the richest, purest melody, he is at once the glory and the reproach of the Italian school; for, while he surpasses all Italians on their own chosen ground, his strict training in the German school placed at his service those wonderful resources of harmony and instrumentation in which the southerners have always been deficient. Of forty-one symphonies three hold pre-eminence—the C major (called the 'Jupiter'), G minor, and E flat. The quartets are very beautiful and exceedingly original. His pianoforte sonatas, and those for the violin and piano, are few of them of great importance except in the development of musical form. See Lives by Otto Jahn (1856-59; 2d ed. 1867; Eng. trans. 1882), Nohl (trans. 1877), Meinardus (1882), and Holmes (Lond. 1845; 2d ed. 1878); the Correspondence edited by Nohl (2d ed. 1877); and the Life by Fischer (1888) of Mozart's second son, Wolfgang Amadeus (1791-1844), who wrote a few compositions of slight importance.

Mozley, JAMES BOWLING, High Church divine, was born at Gainsborough, 15th September 1813. Educated at Grantham and Oriel College, Oxford, he became a fellow of Magdalen, vicar of Old Shoreham, canon of Worcester, and in 1871 regius professor of Divinity at Oxford. His chief books are Predestination (1855), Baptismal Regeneration (1856), The Baptismal Controversy (1863), Miracles (Bampton Lectures, 1865), Oxford University Sermons (1876), Ruling Ideas in Early Ages (1877), Theory of Development (in answer to Newman, 1878), Essays Historical and Theological (1878), and Sermons Parochial and Occasional (1879). He died at Shoreham, 4th January 1878. See his Letters (1884), and Liddon's Pusey (1893-94).—His elder brother, THOMAS (1806-93), rector of Plymtree, Devon, was a Times leader-writer, and published Reminiscences of Oriel and the Oxford Movement (1882) and Reminiscences, chiefly of Towns, Villages, and Schools (1885).

Mudie, CHARLES EDWARD, born at Chelsea, 18th Oct. 1818, after some experience as a bookseller, established his library in 1842, which became a limited company in 1864. He published poetical Stray Leaves (1873), and died 28th Oct. 1890.

Muggleton, LODOWICK (1609-98), a London Puritan tailor, who, with his cousin, John Reeve (1608-58), founded about 1651 the sect of Muggletonians. See Jessopp's Coming of the Friars (1888).

Muir, JOHN, Sanskritist, was born in Glasgow, 5th February 1810, studied at the university there and at Haileybury, and spent twenty-five years in the East India Company's Civil Service in Bengal. He then settled in Edinburgh, where he died, 7th March 1882. He founded a chair there of Sanskrit. His great work was his Original Sanskrit Texts (5 vols. 1858-70; 2d ed. 1868-73). Another book is Metrical Translations from Sanskrit Writers (1878).—SIR WILLIAM MUIR, his brother, was born in 1819, and joined the Bengal Civil Service after studying at Edinburgh and Glasgow. Made K.C.S.I. in 1867, he was lieutenant-governor of the North-west Provinces 1868-74, and Financial Minister of India 1874-76. He for nine years sat on the Council of India, and in 1885-1902 was Principal of Edinburgh University. He died 11th July 1905. He published a Life of Mahomet (4 vols. 1858-61; abridged ed. 1877), Annals of the Early Caliphate (1883), The Corân (1878), Extracts from the Corân (1880), and The Mameluke or Slave Dynasty (1896).

Muir, THOMAS (1705-98), an advocate, born in Glasgow, who in 1793 was transported for sedition to Botany Bay, escaped in 1796, but died at Bordeaux of a wound received on a Spanish frigate in a fight with the English.

Mukaddasi, an Arab geographer, born at Jerusalem, travelled much and described Moslem lands in a work published in 985 A.D. De Goeje edited it in 1877, and the part on Syria and Palestine was translated in 1887 by Guy Le Strange.

Mulcaster, RICHARD (c.1530-1611), educationist, born in Cumberland, in 1548 became a scholar of King's College, Cambridge; in 1555 a student of Christ Church, Oxford; in 1561 master of Merchant Taylors' School, in 1590 vicar of Cranbrook, in 1594 a prebendary of Sarum, in 1596 master of St Paul's School, and in 1598 rector of Stanford Rivers in Essex, where he was buried. He was a great Greek and oriental scholar. His English and Latin educational works were celebrated; the Positions (1581) was re-edited by Quick in 1888, with a biography.

Mulder, GERARD JOHANNES (1802-80), professor of Chemistry at Utrecht, made investigations on protein and vegetable physiology.

Mulhall, MICHAEL GEORGE (1836-1900), writer on statistics, the Argentina, &c., was born in Dublin, and educated at the Irish College, Rome, and founded a newspaper in Buenos Ayres.

Müller, F. MAX. See MAX-MÜLLER.

Müller, SIR FERDINAND (1823-96), Australian botanist, was born at Rostock, and emigrated to Australia in 1847. He was director of the Melbourne Botanic Gardens 1857-73.

Müller, GEORGE, born near Halberstadt, September 27, 1805, studied theology at Halle. He came to London in 1829, desiring to be a missionary to the Jews, but was called to a Nonconformist chapel in Teignmouth, where he abolished collections and depended on voluntary gifts. In 1836 he founded an Orphan House at Ashley-down, Bristol; and by 1856, through 'prayer to God,' without collections or appeals, had received £84,441 on behalf of 297 orphans. He died 10th March 1898, leaving £100. See The Lord's Dealings with George Müller (1887-56) and Life by A. T. Pierson (1899). [Nearly Meel'er.]

Müller, JOHANNES (1801-58), the founder of modern physiology, born at Coblenz, studied at Bonn and Berlin, and was professor of Physiology and Anatomy first at Bonn and then from 1833 at Berlin. His Handbuch der Physiologie des Menschen (1833-40; Eng. trans. 1840-49) exercised a great influence. In comparative anatomy, his most famous memoirs were those on the Amphioxus, Fishes, Echinoderms, and Cælians.

Müller, JOHANNES VON (1752-1809), Swiss historian, was born at Schaffhausen, and studied at Göttingen. In 1774-80 he taught in Geneva, wrote his Allgemeine Geschichte (3 vols. 1810), and commenced his Geschichte der schweizerischen Eidgenossenschaft (5 vols. 1786-1808; new ed. 1826). He held posts at Cassel, Mainz, and Vienna. At Berlin in 1804 he was installed as royal historiographer; and Napoleon appointed him (1807) secretary of state for Westphalia. He died at Cassel. See Lives by Heeren (1820), Döring (1835), Monnard (French, 1839), and Thiersch (1881).

Müller, KARL OTFRIED (1797-1840), born at Brieg in Silesia, was in 1819 appointed professor of Archæology at Göttingen, and died at Athens, having written much on the geography, literature, grammar, mythology, and customs of the ancients. His great work is Geschichte Hellenischer Stämme und Städte (new ed. 1844); the part on the Dorians was translated in 1839. Similar are the treatises on the Macedonians (1825) and Etruscans (1828; new ed. 1877-78). Other valuable works are System of Mythology (1825, trans. 1844), Ancient Art (1830; new ed. 1878; trans. 1847), and History of the Literature of Ancient Greece (1841; new ed. 1884; trans. 1846). See Memoirs by Lücke (1841) and F. Ranke (1870).—His brother JULIUS (1801-78), a devout theologian, studied at Breslau and Göttingen, and from 1839 was professor of Theology at Halle. He wrote Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde (1839; 7th ed. 1889; trans. 1868). See Life by Kähler (1878) and a study by Schultze (1879).

Müller, WILLIAM JOHN (1812-45), a painter, chiefly of landscapes in both oil and water-colour, was born at Bristol of Prussian and English parentage, and visited Greece and Egypt (1838). See Life by N. Neal Solly (1875).

Mullinger, JAMES BASS, born in 1834, had a distinguished career at Cambridge, where in 1890 he became a lecturer on history. He has written a history of his university (vols. i.-iii. 1873-1911), The Schools of Charles the Great, and other works.

Mulock, MISS. See CRAIK.

Mulready, WILLIAM, genre-painter, born at Ennis in Ireland, 1st April 1786, at fifteen entered as a student in the Royal Academy in London. He soon found his true sphere in such subjects as 'A Roadside Inn,' 'Horses Baiting,' the 'Barber's Shop,' and 'Punch' (1812), 'Boys Fishing' (1813), and 'Idle Boys' (1815). He was elected A.R.A. in 1815, and R.A. in 1816. He also worked at portrait-painting and book-illustration, and designed the 'Mulready envelope.' 'The Truant' (1835), 'The Seven Ages' (1838), 'The Sonnet' (1839), 'First Love' (1840), are famous; and his illustrations to the Picar of Wakefield are well known. He died in London, 7th July 1863. See Life by Stephens (1890).

Münchhausen, KARL FRIEDRICH HIERONYMUS, BARON VON, a member of an ancient Hanoverian house, proverbial as narrator of ridiculously exaggerated exploits, was born 11th May 1720 at Bodenwerder in Hanover, served in Russian campaigns against the Turks, and died 22d February 1797. A collection of marvellous stories attributed to him was first published in English as Baron Münchhausen's Narrative of his Marvellous Travels and Campaigns in Russia (Lond. 1785; final form, 1792). The best of it was written by Rudolf Erich Raspe (1737-94), a scholarly and versatile author of poems and books on Ossian, Percy's Reliques, geology, mineralogy, painting, and music. He was born in Hanover, and educated at Göttingen and Leipzig, and became professor of Archeology and keeper of the gems and medals at Cassel. Found to be stealing and selling the medals, he fled to England, held a post in a Cornish mine, catalogued Tassie's collections in Edinburgh, as a mining expert swindled Sir John Sinclair (suggesting to Scott his Doncaster-swivel), and died of fever skulking in Donegal. Munchausen is based partly on 16th-century German jokes, partly on hits at Bruce and other travellers. The book went rapidly through several editions; the first German version was edited in 1786 by Bürger. See Secombe's edition (1895).—A Freiherr von Münchhausen (1813-86) became in 1850 head of the government of Hanover; after 1866 he was a champion of the national party.

Munday, ANTHONY (1553-1633), translator of chivalry romances and maker of ballads, plays, pageants, &c., was born and died in London, and was also an actor, a stationer, and a spy on the English Catholics at Rome.

Mundella, ANTHONY JOHN, P.C., F.R.S. (1825-97), was Liberal M.P. for Sheffield from 1868.

Mungo, Sr. See KENTIGERR.

Munkacsy, or LIEB, MICHAEL (1846-1900), born at Munkacs, went a turner's apprentice to Vienna, studied painting there, at Munich, and at Düsseldorf, and in 1872 settled in Paris. His pictures depict Hungarian or Parisian life, or are historical pieces like 'Milton dictating Paradise Lost,' 'Christ before Pilate,' 'Ecce Homo,' and 'Calvary.' In 1897 he became insane.

Munro, SIR HECTOR, of Novar (1726-1805), was victor at the decisive battle of Buxar in Behar, and in other hard-won Indian battles.

Munro, HUGH ANDREW JOHNSTONE, born at Elgin, 19th Oct. 1819, was educated at Shrewsbury and Trinity, Cambridge, became a fellow in 1843, and Latin professor in 1869 (he resigned in 1872), and died at Rome, 30th March 1885. His greatest achievement was an edition of Lucretius (1864; 4th ed. 1885). Other works were Horace (1869) and Elucidations of Catullus (1878).

Munro, ROBERT, M.D., born in Ross-shire, 21st July 1835, retired from practice in Kilmarnock (1876) to devote himself to archaeology. His works include Lake-Dwellings of Scotland (1882), Lake-Dwellings of Europe (1890), Bosnia (1896), and Prehistoric Problems (1897).

Munro, SIR THOMAS, K.C.B. (1761-1827), born at Glasgow, after serving from 1780 as soldier and administrator in Madras, was governor from 1819. See Lives by Gleig (1830) and Bradshaw (1894).

Münster, SEBASTIAN (1489-1552), born at Ingelheim in the Palatinate, became a Franciscan monk, but after the Reformation taught Hebrew and theology at Heidelberg, and from 1536 mathematics at Basel. He brought out a Hebrew Bible (1534-35), a Hebrew grammar and dictionary, and a Chaldee grammar and lexicon, and wrote a famous Cosmographia (1544). [Nearly *Meen's*ter.]

Münzer, THOMAS (c. 1489-1525), Anabaptist, was born at Stolberg, studied theology, and in 1520 began to preach at Zwickau. His socialism and mystical doctrines soon brought him into collision with the authorities. After preaching in Bohemia, Silesia, Brandenburg, Thuringia, Nuremberg, and Basel, he was in 1525 elected pastor of the Anabaptists of Mühlhausen, where his communistic ideas soon had the whole country in insurrection. But in May 1525 he and his men were totally routed at Frankenhausen by Philip of Hesse, and he was executed a few days after. See Lives by Melancthon (1525), Strobel (1795), and Seidemann (1842). [*Meen's*ter.]

Murat, JOACHIM, born, an innkeeper's son, at La Bastide-Fortunière near Calors, 25th March 1771 at the Revolution entered the army, and soon rose to be colonel. He served under Bonaparte in Italy and in Egypt, rose to be general of division (1799), returned with Bonaparte to France, and on 18th Brumaire dispersed the Council of Five Hundred at St Cloud. Bonaparte gave him his sister, Caroline, in marriage. In command of the cavalry at Marengo he covered himself with glory, and in 1801 was nominated governor of the Cisalpine Republic. He contributed not a little to the victories of Austerlitz (1805), Jena, and Eylau. In 1806 the grand-duchy of Berg was bestowed upon him, and in 1808 he was proclaimed king of the Two Sicilies as Joachim I. Napoleon. He took possession of Naples, though the Bourbons, supported by Britain, retained Sicily, and won the hearts of his subjects. In the Russian expedition he commanded the cavalry, and indeed the army after Napoleon left it. He crushed the Austrians at Dresden (1813), fought at Leipzig, and concluded a treaty with Austria and a truce with the British admiral; but, on Napoleon's escape from Elba, he commenced war against Austria, and was twice defeated. With a few horsemen he fled to Naples, and thence to France. After Napoleon's final overthrow, he proceeded with a few followers to the coast of Calabria, and proclaimed himself king; but was taken, court-martialled, and shot 13th October 1815. See books by Gallois (1828), Coletta (1821), Helfert (1878), Hilliard-Atteridge (1911).—His widow (1782-1839) assumed the title of Countess of Lipona, and lived near Trieste. His two sons went to the United States, where the elder, NAPOLÉON ACHILLE (1801-47), settled in Florida, married a niece of Washington, and published a work on American government (1833). The younger, NAPOLÉON LUCIEN CHARLES (1803-78), suffered reverses in fortune, but, returning to France after 1848, attached himself to Louis Napoleon, who in 1849 sent him as ambassador to Turin, and in 1852 made him a senator. [*Meen's*ter.]

Muratorì, LODOVICO ANTONIO (1672-1750), born at Vignola in Modena, in 1695 was appointed Ambrosian librarian at Milan in 1700, and ducal librarian and archivist at Modena. He published Rerum Italicarum Scriptores (29 vols. fol. 1723-51), Annali d'Italia (12 vols. 1744-49), and Antiquitates Italice (6 vols. 1738-42, containing the 'Muratorian Fragment,' a canon of the New Testament books, apparently written by a contemporary of Irenæus). In later years he was attacked by the Jesuits for teaching heresies, but found a protector in Pope Benedict XIV. See Life by his nephew (1756).

Murchison, SIR RODERICK IMPEY, born at Tarradale, Ross-shire, 19th February 1792, was educated at Durham and the Military College, Great Marlow. He served in Spain and Portugal, and was present at Vimeiro and Corunna. Quitting the army in 1816, he devoted himself to geology, and travelled widely. His establishment of the Silurian system won him the Copley Medal and European fame, increased by his exposition of the Devonian, Permian, and Laurentian systems. He explored parts of Germany, Poland, and the Carpathians; and in 1840-45, with others, carried out a geological survey of the Russian empire. Struck with the resemblance between the Ural Mountains and Australian chains, Murchison in 1844 foreshadowed the discovery of gold in Australia. He was president of the British Association in 1846, and for many years of the Royal Geographical Society. In 1855 he was made director-general of the Geological Survey and director of the Royal School of Mines. His investigations into the crystalline schists of the Highlands led him to a theory (not without error) of regional metamorphism on a large scale. A vice-president of the Royal Society and a foreign member of the French Academy, he was made K.C.B. in 1846, and a baronet in 1863. In 1870 he founded the Edinburgh chair of Geology. He died 22d October 1871. His principal works were The Silurian System (1839) and The Geology of Russia in Europe and the Urals (1845; 2d ed. 1853). See Life by Sir Arch. Geikie (1875).

Murdock, WILLIAM, inventor of coal-gas, was born 21st August 1754, near Anchinleek, Ayrshire, the son of John Murdock, a millwright. He worked with his father, and then with Boulton & Watt of Birmingham, by whom he was sent to Cornwall to erect mining engines. At Redruth he constructed in 1784 the model of a high-pressure engine to run on wheels. He introduced labour-saving machinery, a new method of wheel rotation, an oscillating engine (1785), a steam-gun, &c.; and he also improved Watt's engine. His distillation of coal-gas began at Redruth in 1792; successful experiments were made at Neath Abbey in 1796; but it was not till 1803 that the premises at Soho were lighted with gas. He died 15th Nov. 1839. See Life by A. Murdock (1892).

Mure, SIR WILLIAM (1594-1657), of Rowallan in Ayrshire, poet, was wounded at Marston Moor, and wrote The True Crucifix for True Catholics (1629), a fine version of the Psalms (1639), &c.

Mure, WILLIAM (1799-1860), born at Caldwell in Ayrshire, and educated at Westminster, Edinburgh, and Bonn, represented Renfrewshire 1846-55, was Lord Rector of Glasgow University 1847-48, and died in London. He wrote A Critical Account of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece (5 vols. 1850-57), Journal of a Tour in Greece (1842), &c.

Muret (MURETUS), MARC ANTOINE (1526-85), humanist, born at Muret near Limoges, lectured on civil law, but in Italy devoted himself to literature till 1576, when he took orders, residing in Rome till his death. He wrote orations, poems, &c. See monograph by Dejob (Paris, 1881).

Murfree, MARY. See CRADDOCK.

Mürger, HENRI, born in Paris, March 24, 1822, began life as a notary's clerk, and, giving himself to literature, led the life of privation and adventure described in his first and best novel, Scènes de la Vie de Bohême (1845). During his later years his popularity was secure; every journal was open to him, but he wrote slowly and fitfully in the intervals of dissipation, and died in a Paris hospital, January 28, 1861. Le Manchon de Francine is one of the saddest short stories ever penned. Other prose works are La Vie de Jeunesse, Les Buveurs d'Eau, Madame Olympe, Le Dernier Rendez-vous, Scènes de Campagne, Le Pays Latin, Le Sabot Rouge, Les Vacances de Camille, &c. His poems, Les Nuits d'Hiver, are graceful and often deeply pathetic; several were translated by Mr Andrew Lang in his Lays of Old France. [Meerzhay.]

Murillo, BARTOLOMÉ ESTEBAN, was born, of humble parentage, at Seville, and baptised January 1, 1618. He learned to paint, and produced stiff and rough religious pictures for the fairs of Seville and for exportation to South America. At Madrid (1641), by favour of his townsman Velasquez, he was enabled to study the chefs-d'œuvre of Italian and Flemish art in the royal collections. In 1645 he returned to Seville, and painted eleven remarkable pictures for the convent of San Francisco, became famous, and was soon the head of the school there. In 1648 he married a lady of fortune, and maintained a handsome establishment. He now passed from his first or 'cold' style—dark with decided outlines—to his second or 'warm' style, in which the drawing is softer and the colour improved. In 1656 he produced the first examples of his third or 'vaporous' manner, the outlines vanishing in a misty blending of light and shade. The Academy of Seville was founded by him in 1660. After this came Murillo's most brilliant period; eight of the eleven pictures painted in 1661-74 for the almshouse of St Jorge are accounted his masterpieces. He executed some twenty pieces for the Capuchin Convent after 1675. He frequently chose the Immaculate Conception or Assumption of the Virgin as a subject, and treated them much alike; the 'Conception' in the Louvre was bought (1852) at the sale of Marshal Sout's pictures for £24,000. In 1681 he fell from a scaffold when painting an altarpiece at Cadiz, and died at Seville, April 3, 1682. His pictures naturally fall into two great groups—scenes from low life, as Gypsies and beggar children (mostly executed early in his life), and religious works. See E. E. Minor's Murillo (1882), and C. B. Curtis's Velasquez and Murillo (1883).

Murphy, ARTHUR (1727-1805), dramatic writer, born at Clomquin, Roscommon, and educated at St Omers, in 1752-74 he published the weekly Gray's Inn Journal, and so got to know Dr Johnson. By going on the stage he paid his debts, and entered Lincoln's Inn in 1757. In 1758 he produced The Upholsterer, a successful farce; in 1762 he was called to the bar, but continued to write for the stage. His translation of Tacitus (1793) is excellent; not so his Essay on Johnson and Life of Garrick. See Life by Jesse Foot (1811).

Murray, ALEXANDER (1775-1813), philologist, was born, a shepherd's son, in Urr parish, Kirkcudbright, and by omnivorous reading of all such books as could be borrowed, acquired, while a shepherd, a mastery of the classics, the chief European tongues, and Hebrew, and after 1794 studied at Edinburgh. In 1806 he became minister of Urr, in 1812 professor of Oriental Languages at Edinburgh. He left a History of the European Languages (1823).

Murray, DAVID, R.A., A.R.S.A., painter, was born at Glasgow in 1849, and was originally educated there for commerce.

Murray, DAVID CHRISTIE (1847-1907), novelist, was born at West Bromwich, and had served as reporter and war-correspondent (1877-78), when in 1879 he published A Life's Atonement in Chambers's Journal. Other works are Val Strange, John Vale's Guardian, By the Gate of the Sea, Aunt Rachel, Old Blazer's Hero, A Dangerous Catpaw, A Wasted Crime, The Making of a Novelist (1894), The Bishop's Amazement (1896), &c.

Murray, EARL OF. See MORAY; RANDOLPH.

Murray, EUSTACE CLARE GRENVILLE, was born 21 Oct. 1819, a natural son of the second Duke of Buckingham. After studying at Oxford he served in the Austrian army, in 1851 joined the British embassy at Vienna, in 1853-54 went on a mission to the Egean Islands, in 1857 was attached at Teheran, and in 1858 consul-general at Odessa. For exposing in the press (1866) some abuses in the foreign office he was dismissed. He spent the rest of his life in Paris, and died at Passy, 20th Dec. 1881. He is known for his brilliant papers in the Daily News and Pall Mall, and by The Ioving Englishman (1854-55), Embassies and Foreign Courts (1855), History of the French Press (1874), Men of the Second Empire (1872-74), and a few clever novels, including The Member for Paris (1871) and Young Brown (1874).

Murray, LORD GEORGE (c. 1700-60), a son of the Duke of Athole, was 'out' in the Jacobite risings of 1715, 1719, and 1745, the soul of the last movement. He died an exile in Holland.

Murray, SIR JAMES AUGUSTUS HENRY (knighted 1908), born at Denholm in 1837, was a schoolmaster at Hawick, foreign correspondent in the Oriental Bank at London, and then master at Mill Hill school. His Dialects of the Southern Counties of Scotland (1873) established his reputation as a philologist. The great work of his life, the editing of the Philological Society's New English Dictionary, was begun at Mill Hill (1879), and continued at Oxford; Mr Henry Bradley (1879) and Mr W. A. Craigie (1901) becoming joint-editors. LL.D. and president of the Philological Society, he received a civil list pension of £250 in 1884.

Murray, SIR JOHN, F. R. S., LL. D., K. C. B. (1898), born 3d March 1841 at Colbourn, Ontario, Canada, studied in Canada and at Edinburgh University, and after a voyage on a whaler, was appointed one of the naturalists to the Challenger Expedition (1872-76), and successively assistant editor and editor-in-chief (1882) of the Reports. He wrote a Narrative of the expedition and a report on deep-sea deposits, and has published innumerable papers on oceanography and biology, and on fresh-water lakes, &c.

Murray, SIR JOHN (1715-77), of Broughton, Peeblesshire, was Prince Charles Edward's secretary during the '45, but, captured after Culloden, saved his life by betraying his fellow-Jacobites. He succeeded as baronet in 1770. See his Memoirs, edited by Fitzroy Bell (Scot. Hist. Soc. 1898).—A son, CHARLES (1754-1821), was a middling actor and worse playwright; and his son, WILLIAM HENRY (1790-1852), born at Bath, was an Edinburgh actor and manager, associated with the dramatisations of the Waverley novels.

Murray, JOHN (1745-93), publisher, originally M'Murray, was born in Edinburgh, became an officer in the Royal Marines in 1762, but in 1768 bought Sandby's bookselling business in London, and published the English Review, Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature, &c.—His son, JOHN (1778-1813), who carried the business from Fleet Street to Albemarle Street, projected the Quarterly Review (1802-9). First and last he paid Byron nearly £20,000 for his works, and his dealings with Crabbe, Moore, Campbell, and Irving were princely. His 'Family Library' was begun in 1823, and he issued the travels of Mungo Park, Belzoni, Parry, Franklin, &c.—His son, JOHN MURRAY the third (1808-92), issued Livingstone's Travels and Last Journals, the works of Borrow, Darwin, and Smiles, Smith's dictionaries, and the Handbooks for Travellers (begun 1836), of the first five of which he was author.—The fourth JOHN MURRAY succeeded his father. See S. Smiles, A Publisher and his Friends (1891).

Murray, JOHN (1741-1815), was the founder of Universalism in America.

Murray, LINDLEY (1745-1826), grammarian, was born at Swatara, Penn., the eldest of twelve children, and was educated at a Quaker school at Philadelphia. At first in a New York counting-house, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar; but during the revolutionary war he amassed a fortune in commerce. In 1767, his health failing, he came to England and purchased an estate near York; from 1785 he was crippled by a fever. In 1787 he published his Power of Religion on the Mind. His English Grammar, long a standard (1795), was followed by English Exercises, the English Reader, &c., besides A Compendium of Faith and Practice, The Duty and Benefit of a Daily Perusal of the Scriptures, and an autobiography.

Musæus, an ancient mythical Greek poet, reputed author of oracles, hymns, &c., of which we possess but a few doubtful fragments.—A 5th-century Musæus wrote a beautiful little Greek poem, Hero and Leander.

Musæus, JOHANN KARL AUGUST, born 29th March 1735 at Jena, studied theology there, in 1763 was appointed tutor at the ducal court of Weimar, and in 1770 became professor at the gymnasium. His first book (1760) was a parody of Richardson's Sir Charles Grandison; in 1798 he satirised Lavater in Physiognomische Reisen. But his fame rests on his German popular tales, which professed, falsely, to be a collection taken down from the lips of old people. Their chief note is artificial naïveté, but they are a blending of satirical humour, quaint fancy, and graceful writing. He continued to work the satirical vein in Freund Heins Erscheinungen in Holheins Manier (1785), and had begun a series of tales, Straussfedern, when he died at Weimar, 28th October 1787. See Lives by M. Müller (1867) and Ad. Stern (in Literatur fragmente, 1893).

Musa Ibn Nosair (640-717), the Arab conqueror of northern Africa in 699-709 and of Spain in 712, fell under the displeasure of the Calif of Damascus, and died in poverty in Hedjaz.

Musset, ALFRED DE, was born in Paris, 11th December 1810, the son of an official in the War Office; and after thinking of law, of medicine, and of art, published in his twentieth year his Contes d'Espagne et d'Italie, a collection of unequal poems. Warmly received by Victor Hugo into the inner shrine of Romanticism, he wrote La Nuit Vénitienne, which failed at the Odéon in 1830. In 1832 he published Un Spectacle dans un Fauteuil, comprising two short plays—La Coupe et les Lèvres and À quoi rêvent les Jeunes Filles, as well as the poem of Namouna. Next year followed in the Revue des Deux Mondes two of his very greatest works, the tragical comedies André del Sarto and Les Caprices de Marianne. Then came the fatal journey to Italy with George Sand; they set out for Venice at the beginning of winter, and on 10th April he reappeared alone, broken in health and sunk in the deepest depression. A quarter of a century later she gave the world, in the guise of a novel, Elle et Lui, her version of the events; Paul de Musset at once retorted with Lui et Elle (1859), asserting that she had been grossly unfaithful. Despite or in consequence of his sufferings, the five years that followed his return were the poet's best years of production. Another love quickly followed, only to end as unhappily; and that again was succeeded by a series of unworthy engagements. His appointment in 1838 to the librarianship at the Home Office did something to take him out of himself; still, even his famous Confession d'un Enfant du Siècle (1835) was begun, laid aside, and then finished under a cloud of sorrow. The success of Un Caprice at the Théâtre Français in 1847 recalled him for some time to life and hope. He was elected to the Academy in 1852. He died of heart-disease, May 1, 1857. Of De Musset's poetry the four Nuits mark his lyrical zenith; the Nuit de Mai and the Nuit d'Octobre are perfect and immortal. The Ode à la Malibran is a splendid tribute; L'Espoir en Dieu a noble expression of the longing of the human soul for certainty; the famous Rhin Allemand a spirited retort to Becker's patriotic German lay. De Musset's dramatic work is unique for originality, intensity, and variety, linked to brilliant wit and real dramatic genius. It consisted of comédies, or regular dramas, and proverbes, short dramatic illustrations of some common saying. His Mélanges and Œuvres Posthumes are less valuable, and his whole work fills but ten small volumes (Lemerre, 1876). See Life by his brother Paul (3d ed. 1877); a good study by Paul Lindau (Berl. 1876); French Poets and Novelists (1884), by Henry James; the study by C. F. Oliphant (1890); the monograph by 'Arvédé Barine' (1893); the translation of four of the Comédies by Gwynn (1890); and W. H. Pollock's Old and New (a trans. of the Nuits, 1890).

Muzio, SIGNOR, a 17th-century chess-player who did not invent the 'Muzio gambit.'

Myddelton, SIR HUGH. See MIDDLETON.

Myers, FREDERIC WILLIAM HENRY (1843-1901), the son of the Rev. Frederic Myers of Keswick (author of four series of Catholic Thoughts), passed from Cheltenham to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became fellow and lecturer. From 1872 he was on the permanent staff of school inspectors. He wrote poems and essays, but is chiefly associated with work done in connection with the Psychological Research Society. He wrote the Wordsworth in the 'Men of Letters' series.—His brother, ERNEST JAMES, poet, born in 1844, from Cheltenham passed to Balliol College, Oxford, was a fellow of Wadham 1868-83, and was called to the bar in 1874, but never practised.

Myne, WALTER, priest of Lunan in Forfarshire, was burnt as a heretic at St Andrews, the last Scottish Protestant martyr, 28th April 1558.

Myron (fl. 450 B.C.), a Greek sculptor, known by copies of his 'Discobolos,' &c.

Mytens, DANIEL (c. 1590-1642), portrait-painter, born at the Hague, lived in England about 1617-30, and by Charles I. was made 'king's painter.'

Mytton, JACK (1796-1834), of Halston, Salop, a wastrel squire and great sportsman, ran through a fortune, and died of delirium tremens in the King's Bench. See Life by 'Nimrod' (1837).

NACHTIGAL, GUSTAV, traveller, was born 23d February 1834, at Eichstedt, studied medicine, served as army surgeon, and in 1863 went to North Africa.

With presents from the king of Prussia to the sultan of Bornu, he started from Tripoli in 1869, travelled by Fezzan and Tibesti to Bornu, visited Borgu and the Bagirmi country, and returned by Wadai, Dar-Fur, and Kordofan to Cairo in November 1874. His journey he described in Sahara und Sudan (1879-89). In 1884 he went to annex for Germany Togoland, Cameroons, and Angra Pequena in Western Africa, and died on the return journey off Cape Palmas, 19th April 1885. See Dorothea Berlin's Erinnerungen an Nachtigal (1887).

Naden, CONSTANCE CAROLINE WOODHILL (1858-89), a woman of great culture, author in 1881-87 of two volumes of poetry, was born at Edgbaston, visited the East in 1887-88, and then settled in London. See Memoir by W. R. Hughes (1890).

Nadir Shah, the Conqueror, born in Khorassan in 1688 of a Turkish tribe, was degraded from the governor's service for some offence, and became leader of a band of 3000 robbers. Persia was then ruled by Ashraf, a tyrannical Afghan, and when Nadir essayed to restore the old dynasty, crowds flocked to his standard; Meshed, Herat, and all Khorassan were reduced; and Ashraf fled. The rightful heir, Tamasp, ascended the throne; and Nadir became governor of Khorassan, Mazanderan, Seistan, and Kerman. He defeated the Turks in 1731, imprisoned Tamasp, and elevated his infant son, Abbas III., to the throne in 1732. The death of this puppet in 1736 opened the way for Nadir himself, who resumed the war with the Turks, and ultimately was victorious. He also conquered Afghanistan and drove back the Uzbeks. Difficulties arose with the Great Mogul, and Nadir ravaged the north-west of India and took Delhi, with booty amounting to £20,000,000, including the Koh-i-nûr. He next reduced Bokhara and Khiva; but becoming suspicious, avaricious, and tyrannical, he was assassinated 20th June 1747. See Maynard's Nadir Shah (1885).

Nævius, GNEVUS, one of the creators of Latin literature, was born, probably in Campania, about 265 B.C., and served in the first Punic war. A plebeian, he for thirty years satirised and lampooned the Roman nobles in his plays, and was compelled to withdraw from Rome, ultimately retiring to Utica in Africa, where he died after 204. Besides tragedies and comedies, he wrote an epic, De Bello Punico. Only fragments are extant. See Sellar's Poets of the Roman Republic.

Nahum, one of the twelve minor Hebrew prophets, who seems to have been an Israelite or Judæan who had been a captive in Nineveh, and wrote his prophecy between 666 and 606 B.C.

Nairne, CAROLINA OLIPHANT, BARONESS, songwriter, was born 16th August 1766, at the 'auld house' of Gask in Perthshire, third daughter of its Jacobite laird. In 1806 she married her second cousin, Major Nairne (1757-1830), who in 1824, by reversal of attainder, became sixth Lord Nairne, and to whom she bore one son, William (1808-37). They settled at Edinburgh, and after her husband's death she lived for three years in Ireland, then for nine on the Continent. She died at Gask, 27th October 1845. Her eighty-seven songs appeared first in The Scottish Minstrel (1821-24), and posthumously as Lays from Strathearn. Some of them are mere Bowdlerisations of 'indelicate' favourites; but four at least live and shall live with the airs to which they are wedded—the 'Land o' the Leal' (c. 1798), 'Caller Herrin', 'The Laird o' Cockpen', and 'The Auld House.' See Rogers's Life of Lady Nairne (1869), and Kington Oliphant's Jacobite Lairds of Gask (1870).

Nana Sahib, the name under which the Brahmin Dundhu Panth, adopted son of the ex-peshwa of the Mahrattas, became known as the leader of the Indian Mutiny in 1857. Born about 1821, he was disappointed that the peshwa's pension was not continued to himself, on the outbreak of the Mutiny was proclaimed peshwa, and perpetrated the massacres at Cawnpore. After the collapse of the rebellion he escaped into Nepal. The date of his death is unknown.

Nansen, FRIDTJOF, Arctic discoverer, was born, the son of a finance official, near Christiania, 10th October 1861, and studied at the university there, as well as later at Naples. In 1882 he made a voyage into the Arctic regions in the sealer Viking, and on his return was made keeper of the natural history department of the museum at Bergen. In the summer of 1888 he made an adventurous journey, accompanied by three Norwegians and two Lapps, across Greenland from east to west. He described it in The First Crossing of Greenland (trans. 1890). But his great achievement was the partial accomplishment of his scheme for reaching the North Pole by letting his ship get frozen into the ice north of Siberia and drift with a current setting towards Greenland—on the theory based by Prof. Mohn of Christiania on the finding of Siberian trees and the relics of the Jeannette on the Greenland coast. He started in the Fram, built for the purpose, in August 1893, reached the New Siberian islands in September, made fast to an ice-floe, and drifted north to 84° 4' on 3d March 1895. There, accompanied by Johansen, he left the Fram and pushed across the ice, reaching the highest latitude yet attained, 86° 14' N., on 7th April. The two wintered in Franz Josef Land, and on 17th June 1896 met the Jackson-Harmsworth expedition there. Nansen's arrival in Norway was made the occasion of national rejoicings. Farthest North (2 vols. 1897) is but one of his works. D.C.L., Commander of the Legion of Honour, and professor of Zoology, and (1908) of Oceanography, at Christiania, he was a strong Norwegian nationalist, and after the secession became Norwegian ambassador in London. See the Life by Brøgger and Rolfsen (trans. by Archer, 1896).

Naoroji, DADHABAI, son of a Parsee priest, and born at Bombay, 4th September 1825, became professor of Mathematics in Elphinstone College there, and a member of the Legislative Council; and in 1892-95 sat in the British House of Commons for Finsbury. [Now-ro-jee.]

Napier, SIR CHARLES, admiral, was born 6th March 1786, at Merchiston Hall near Falkirk, a cousin to the hero of Sind. At thirteen he went to sea; in 1808 he received the command of the Recruit, and for his share in capturing a French line-of-battle ship received a post-captaincy. He served as a volunteer in the Peninsular army. Commanding the Thames in 1811, he inflicted incredible damage upon the enemy in the Mediterranean. In 1814 he led the way in the ascent of the Potomac, and he took part in the operations against Baltimore. In command of the fleet of the young queen of Portugal, he defeated the Miguelite fleet and placed Donna Maria on the throne. In the war between the Porte and Mehemet Ali he stormed Sidon, defeated Ibrahim Pasha in Lebanon, attacked Acre, blockaded Alexandria, and concluded a convention with Mehemet Ali. A K.C.B., he commanded the Baltic fleet in the Russian war; but the capture of Bomarsund failed to realise expectations, and he was superseded. He twice sat in parliament, and, until his death at his Hampshires seat, Merchiston Hall, November 6, 1860, he laboured to reform the naval administration. See his Life (1862).

Napier, SIR CHARLES JAMES, conqueror of Sind, was a descendant of Napier of Merchiston. He was born at Westminster, 10th August 1782, served in Ireland during the rebellion, and commanding the 50th Foot during the retreat on Coruña, was wounded and made prisoner. In 1811 he returned to the Peninsula. At Busaco he was wounded, but was present at Fuentes d'Oñoro and the second siege of Badajoz. He took part in a fighting cruise off the Chesapeake, was not in time for Waterloo, but was engaged in the storming of Cambray. In 1818 he was made governor of Cephalonia, but became embroiled with the home authorities. In 1838 he was made K.C.B., and in 1841 was ordered to India to command in the war with Sind, and at the battle of Meeanee (1843) broke the power of the aneers. After another battle at Hyderabad Napier was made governor. He gained the respect of the inhabitants, but was soon engaged in an acrimonious war of despatches with the home authorities. In 1847 he returned to England, but was back in India before the close of the Sikh war. As commander-in-chief of the army in India, he quarrelled with Lord Dalhousie about military reform, bade a final adieu to the East in 1851, and died, a lieutenant-general, at Oaklands near Portsmouth, 29th August 1858. He was brave to rashness, ready alike with tongue, pen, and sword, quarrelsome with his superiors, but beloved by his soldiers. See Lives by his brother (1857), W. Napier Bruce (1885), and Sir W. Butler (1890).—His brother, SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS PATRICK NAPIER, K.C.B. (1785-1860), served in the Peninsular campaign, and became lieutenant-general. Besides his History of the War in the Peninsula (1828-40), he published The Conquest of Seinde (1845) and the Life of his brother (1857). See Lives by H. A. Bruce (1864) and Gen. Sir W. F. Butler (1890).

Napier, JOHN, the inventor of Logarithms, was born at Merchiston Castle, Edinburgh, in 1550, matriculated at St Andrews in 1563, travelled on the Continent, and settled down to a life of literary and scientific study. In 1593 he published his Plaine Discovery of the whole Revelation of Saint John, which was translated into Dutch, French, and German. He made a contract with Logan of Restalrig for the discovery of treasure in Fast Castle (1594), devised warlike machines for defence against Philip of Spain, and recommended salt as a fertiliser of land. A strict Presbyterian, he was also a believer in astrology and divination. He described his famous invention of logarithms in Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio (1614), and the calculating apparatus called 'Napier's Bones' in Rabdologie seu Numerationis per Virgulas libri duo (1617). He died at Merchiston, 4th April 1617; and two years after a second work on logarithms was published by his son Robert (new ed. by W. R. Macdonald, 1889). Napier's eldest son was raised to the peerage as Lord Napier in 1627, and the ninth Baron Napier in 1872 became Baron Etrick also. See Lives by the Earl of Buchan (1787) and Mark Napier (1834), who also edited Napier's Ars Logistica, a system of arithmetic and algebra (1839).

Napier, MACVEY, born at Glasgow, 11th April 1776, in 1790 became a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, in 1805 Signet Librarian (till 1837), and in 1824 first professor of Conveyancing. He edited the supplement to the fifth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica (1816-24), and from 1829 was editor of the Edinburgh Review. He died 11th February 1847. See Correspondence (1879).

Napier of Magdala, ROBERT CORNELIS NAPIER, LORD, born at Colombo, Ceylon, 6th December 1810, was educated at Addiscombe, entered the Bengal Engineers in 1826, served in the Sutlej campaign, was wounded at Multan, and fought in the battle of Gujrat. As chief-engineer of the Punjab he greatly developed the resources of the country. During the Indian Mutiny he was chief-engineer in Sir Colin Campbell's army, distinguished himself at the siege of Lucknow, and was made K.C.B. He received the thanks of parliament for his services in the Chinese war of 1858. For his brilliant conduct of the expedition in Abyssinia in 1868 he received the thanks of parliament and an annuity of £2000, and was made G.C.B. and Baron Napier of Magdala. In 1870 he became Commander-in-chief in India and a member of the Indian Council, and was subsequently governor of Gibraltar, Field-marshal, and Constable of the Tower. He died 14th January 1890, and was buried in St Paul's.

Napier, ROBERT (1791-1876), Govan naval ship-builder, born at Dumbarton, died at Shandon.

Napoleon I. Napoleon Bonaparte, second son of Charles Bonaparte (q.v.), assessor to the royal tribunal of Corsica, was born at Ajaccio, 15th August 1769. In 1779 he entered the Military School of Brienne, and in 1784 was transferred to that at Paris. In 1785 he was commissioned second-lieutenant of artillery. During the Revolution he joined the army acting against the Marseillais who had declared against the National Convention. He commanded the artillery at the siege of Toulon (1793), and was promoted general of brigade. In 1795, as second in command under Barras, he did good service in repelling the attack of the Sections of Paris. In February 1796 the Directory appointed General Bonaparte to the command of the Army of Italy. On 9th March he married Joséphine, widow of General Vicomte de Beauharnais, and left two days later for Italy, where his great military genius flashed forth in full brilliancy. He found the French army about 36,000 strong, distributed between Nice and Savona, and opposing 20,000 Piedmontese and 38,000 Austrians. Bonaparte attacked the centre of the allied line, defeated the Austrians on 12th April, the Piedmontese next day, and the Austrians on the 14th; and his victory at Mondovi forced Sardinia to sue for peace. At the bridge of Lodi, 11th May, he completely defeated the Austrians, and entered Milan on the 15th. Heavy contributions were exacted; works of art were despatched to France wholesale. Insurrections at Pavia and in the Milanese were ruthlessly put down. He next broke through the Austrian centre and occupied the line of the Adige, taking Verona and Legnago from the neutral republic of Venice. Austria made attempts to recover Lombardy, and the contest was severe during the summer and autumn of 1796. At first Napoleon's position was critical, but at length the Austrians were defeated at Arcola, Rivoli, and Mantua. In political matters Napoleon was acting less as a servant of the French Directory than as an independent ruler. When his position in Italy was secured he advanced on Vienna, and reached Leoben on April 1797. Then Austria sued for peace. But negotiations dragged on, as Austria thought a revolution was impending in France; but Augereau, sent by Napoleon, aided the Directory to carry out the coup d'état of the 18th Fructidor; and Austria signed the treaty of Campo-Formio, 17th October 1797. By this France obtained Belgium, the Ionian Islands, and Lombardy, and Austria engaged to try and get the left bank of the Rhine for France, whilst Austria got Istria, Dalmatia, and Venetia.

The Directory thought they could only keep Napoleon quiet by employing him, and gave him command of the so-called Army of England. But he employed his new resources for an expedition to Egypt, which sailed in May 1798, captured Malta, and, escaping the British fleet, arrived at Alexandria on 30th June. Napoleon twice defeated the Mamelukes, and entered Cairo on 24th July, but his position was endangered by the destruction of the French fleet on 1st August by Nelson at the battle of the Nile. He thought, however, that he might create a revolution in Syria, by the aid of which he might overthrow the Turkish power and march back to Europe through Asia Minor and Constantinople. He accordingly entered Syria in February 1799 with 12,000 men, but failing to capture St Jean d'Acre, defended by the British squadron under Sir Sidney Smith, he was obliged to return to Egypt. The expedition to Syria was disgraced by the massacre of 2500 prisoners at Jaffa. He defeated a Turkish army which had landed at Aboukir, but learning of French reverses, he embarked for France on 22d August. He found the wars mismanaged, Italy almost lost, and the government in very bad odour. Sieyès, one of the Directors, was meditating a coup d'état when Bonaparte arrived; they coalesced, and the Revolution of 18th Brumaire followed (9th November 1799), when Sieyès, Roger Ducos, and Bonaparte drew up a new constitution. Under it the executive was vested in three consuls, Bonaparte, Cambacérès, and Lebrun, of whom Bonaparte was nominated First Consul for ten years. A proclamation was issued promising religious toleration, and decided military action was taken; and all was quiet by the end of February 1800. Napoleon now made overtures for peace to England and Austria, posing as the friend of peace; but he inwardly rejoiced when they rejected his overtures. Napoleon collected secretly an army of reserve near the Swiss frontier. He went to Geneva on 9th May, and assuming command of this army, crossed the St Bernard, reached the plains of Italy, and occupied Milan. On 14th June the Austrians attacked the French at Marengo and were completely defeated; next day they signed a convention giving up almost all North Italy. Napoleon returned to Paris with the glories of this campaign; but peace did not follow till Moreau had won Hohenlinden, 3d December 1800. Then followed the treaty of Lunéville with Germany in February 1801, the concordat with Rome in July, and the treaty of Amiens with England in March 1802. Napoleon then devoted himself to the reconstruction of the civil institutions of France—the restored church, the judicial system, the codes, the system of local government, the university, the Bank of France, and the Legion of Honour. After the peace of Amiens, Napoleon was elected First Consul for life. His desire to humble England led to the rupture of the peace of Amiens in 1803 by aggressions in Holland and elsewhere. He made vast preparations for the invasion of England, at the same time seizing Hanover. He rid himself of Moreau, his most dangerous rival, by accusing him of conspiring with the royalists, into whom he then struck terror by the execution of the Duc d'Enghien. He assumed the title of emperor, 18th May 1804. His aggressive demeanour alarmed Europe, and in 1805 he found himself at war with Russia and Austria, as well as with England. Forced by England's naval supremacy to abandon the notion of invasion, he suddenly, in August 1805, led his armies through Hanover, and reached the Danube in rear of the Austrians under Mack at Ulm. The surprise was complete; Mack surrendered on 19th October, and Napoleon entered Vienna on 13th November. On 2d December he inflicted a disastrous defeat on the Russians and Austrians at Austerlitz. This caused the break-up of the coalition; the Holy Roman Empire came to an end; the Confederation of the Rhine was formed under French protection. Napoleon then entered into negotiations for peace with Russia and England, endeavouring to conciliate them at the expense of Prussia. Prussia, mortally offended, mobilised her army in August 1806; but Napoleon crushed her at Jena and Auerstädt on 14th October. Russia intervening, an indecisive battle at Eylau was followed by a French victory at Friedland, 14th June 1807; and by the peace of Tilsit Prussia lost half her territory.

Napoleon was now the arbiter of Europe. He sought to cripple England by the Continental System—the states under his influence engaging to close their ports to English ships. He also tried to combine all the European navies against her; but England took the initiative and seized the Danish fleet. He sent an army under Junot to Portugal, and another under Murat to Spain, which took Madrid. He then placed his brother Joseph on the throne. But a formidable insurrection broke out, while a British army, under Wellesley, landed in Portugal, defeated Junot at Vimeiro, and forced him to sign the Convention of Cintra, evacuating Portugal. So began the Peninsular war. In Germany also a spirit of revolt was rising, and this brought on the war of 1809 against Austria. Napoleon drove the Austrians out of Ratisbon, and entered Vienna, 13th May, and won the battle of Wagram on 5th and 6th July. Although resistance was kept up for a time in Tyrol by the patriot Hofer, by the treaty of Schönbrunn (Oct. 20, 1809) Napoleon obtained a heavy money indemnity and considerable accession of territory in Carniola, Carinthia, Croatia, and Galicia. In December Napoleon, desirous of an heir, divorced Joséphine, who was childless, and married, 1st April 1810, the Archduchess Maria Louisa of Austria. A son was born on March 20, 1811. Still bent on the humiliation of England, Napoleon increased the stringency of the Continental System, and he annexed Holland and Westphalia. The Czar refused to adopt this policy; and Napoleon invaded Russia with 600,000 French, Germans, and Italians. He crossed the Niemen on 24th June, reaching Vilna on the 28th. The Russians met him at Borodino on September 6; Napoleon won the battle; but the victory was almost fruitless. He entered Moscow 14th September. Fire broke out the next night, and raged fiercely till the 20th, great part of the city being burned. When, after delays and hesitations, he retired from Moscow (18th October) an early winter upset his calculations, and the miseries of that terrible retreat followed. He reached the Beresina with but 12,000 men, was joined there by Oudinot and Victor with 18,000, and succeeded in crossing the river; on 6th December the miserable remnant of the Grand Army returned to Vilna. While Napoleon hastened back to Paris to raise new levies, the Czar determined to carry the war into Germany. The Prussian contingent of the Grand Army came over to the Russians, and in January 1813 the Landwehr was called out. Saxony also joined Russia, but Austria and the middle states still clung to Napoleon. He left Paris on 15th April 1813, moved on Leipzig, and won the battle of Lützen on 2d May. He then followed the allies, beat them at Bautzen, 20th and 21st May, and forced them to retire into Silesia. Austria then asked for concessions; had Napoleon granted them, he might have checkmated the coalition of Prussia and Russia. He had 400,000 men on the Elbe, but his position was weakened by Austria's accession to the coalition, and the allies had nearly 500,000 men in three armies. Napoleon inflicted a crushing defeat on the Austrians before Dresden on 27th August, but at Kulm lost Vandamme with 20,000 men. Towards the end of September the allies gathered towards Leipzig. There between the 14th and 19th October Napoleon was crushed, and led back the remnant of his army across the Rhine. The invasion of France followed; Napoleon attacked Blücher and won four battles in four days at Champaubert, Montmirail, Châteaune-Thierry, and Vauchamps (February 1814). The battles of Craonne and Laon followed. On 30th March the allies attacked Paris, and the French marshals offered to capitulate. Napoleon fell back to Fontainebleau; but his position was desperate, and Wellington had now led his army across the Pyrenees into France. Napoleon at first abdicated in favour of his son, but unconditionally on 11th April 1814.

He was given the sovereignty of Elba, and the Bourbons in the person of Louis XVIII. were restored to the throne of France. But their return was unpopular; it unsettled the position of public men and the title to estates. The army was disgusted at the appointment to commands of émigrés who had fought against France, and the church began to cause alarm to the holders of national property. The coalition, too, broke up. Napoleon accordingly landed on the French coast 1st March 1815. On the 20th he entered Paris, having been joined by the army. Europe had declared war against him, but only a mixed force under Wellington in Belgium and a Prussian army under Blücher in the Rhine provinces were in the field. Napoleon's idea was to strike suddenly at their point of junction before they could concentrate, drive them apart, and then defeat each separately. On 15th June Napoleon occupied Charleroi, and on the 16th defeated Blücher at Ligny. But not till next day did he send Grouchy to follow the Prussians in the supposed direction of their retreat towards Liège, whilst he turned against Wellington. The wasted hours had enabled the Prussians to disappear, and he did not know that Blücher was moving on Wavre in order to reunite with Wellington, who had retired to Mont St Jean. So on the 18th, when Napoleon attacked the Duke, unknown to him the bulk of the Prussian army was hastening up on his right flank while Grouchy was fruitlessly engaged with the Prussian rear-guard only. This led to the crowning defeat of Waterloo. Napoleon fled to Paris, abdicated on 22d June, and surrendered to Captain Maitland of the Bellerophon at Rochefort on 15th July. He was banished by the British government to St Helena, arrived 15th October 1815, and died there of cancer of the stomach, 5th May 1821. His body was brought back to Paris in 1840, and laid in the crypt of the Invalides. The literature falls into three categories: First, books dealing with his career by writers contemporary with him or nearly so, such as Thiers, Jouini, Montholon and Gourgaud, and his generals, such as Marmont, Masséna, and Suchet. Secondly, books touching his private life by contemporaries, such as Bourrienne (Eng. trans. 4 vols. 1893), Las Cases, Forsyth, and O'Meara. The third class are the modern works written in a more critical spirit. Among such are Lanfrey's Histoire de Napoléon I. (5 vols. 1867-75), Jung's Bonaparte et son Temps (1880-81), Seeley's Short Life of Napoleon I. (1885), Taine's Le Régime Moderne (1890-94; trans. 1891-94), and books on him by O'Connor Morris (1892), Levy (trans. 1893), Lord Wolseley (1895), Prof. Sloane (1896-1897), Lavisse and Rambaud (1897), Lord Rosebery (Napoleon: The Last Phase, 1900), and J. H. Rose (1902 and 1904). See, too, his Correspondance (33 vols. 1858-87).

Napoleon II. (1811-32), king of Rome and Duke of Reichstadt, was the son of Napoleon I. and Maria Louisa (q. v.).

Napoleon III., CHARLES LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, was born at Paris, 20th April 1808, the third son of Louis Bonaparte, king of Holland, brother of the first emperor by Hortense Beauharnais, Napoleon I.'s step-daughter. He was brought up at Geneva, Augsburg, and his mother's residence, the Swiss castle of Arenenberg, on Lake Constance. Fairly competent in artillery, engineering, the exact sciences, history, and athletic exercises, he published at Zurich (1836) a Manuel d'Artillerie. He hastened with his elder brother Louis into Italy in 1831 to assist the Romagna in its revolt against pontifical rule, an expedition in which Louis perished of fever. On the death of the Duke of Reichstadt, only son of Napoleon I., in 1832, he became the head of the Napoleonic dynasty. He published in 1832-36 his Réveries politiques, Projet de Constitution, and Considérations politiques et Militaires sur la Suisse. In 1836 he put his chances to a premature test by appearing among the military at Strasburg, was easily overpowered, and conveyed to America. He was recalled to Europe by his mother's last illness (1837); and when the French government demanded of Switzerland his expulsion he settled in London. In 1838 he published his Idées Napoléoniennes. In 1840 he made at Boulogne a second and equally abortive attempt on the throne of France, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the fortress of Ham. Here he continued his Bonapartist propaganda by writing Aux Mânes de l'Empereur, &c., and actually helped to edit the Dictionnaire de la Conversation. After an imprisonment of more than five years he made his escape (25th May 1846), and returned to England. The Revolution of February 1848 was a victory of the working-men, to whom some of his political theories were especially addressed; he hurried back to France as a virtual nominee of the Fourth Estate, or working-classes. Elected deputy for Paris and three other departments, he took his seat in the Constituent Assembly, 13th June 1848. On the 15th he resigned and left France. His quintuple election recalled him in September, and he commenced his candidature for the presidency; 5,562,834 votes were recorded for him, only 1,469,166 for General Cavaignac, his genuine republican competitor. On 20th December he took the oath of allegiance to the Republic. For a few days concord seemed established between the different political parties in the Assembly; but the beginning of 1849 witnessed the commencement of a struggle between the president and the majority of the Assembly. Then he committed the command of the army to hands devoted to him, and established his supporters in posts of influence. He paraded as a protector of popular rights and of national prosperity; but, hampered by the National Assembly in his efforts to make his power perpetual, he threw off the mask of a constitutional president. On 2d December 1851 he, with the help of the military, dissolved the Constitution. Imprisonment, deportation, the bloody repression of popular rebellion, marked this black day's work. France appeared to acquiesce; for when the vote was taken on it in December, he was re-elected for ten years by 7,000,000 votes. The imperial title was assumed a year after the coup d'état, in accordance with another plebiscite. Political parties were either demoralised or broken. Napoleon III. gagged the press, awed the bourgeoisie, and courted the clergy to win the peasantry. On 29th January 1853 he married Eugénie de Montijo, a Spanish countess, born at Granada, 5th May 1826. He sophistically proclaimed the right of peoples to choose their own masters, availing himself of it in the annexation (1860) of Savoy and Nice to France, in his Mexican intervention, and in his handling of the Italian question. At home the price of bread was regulated, public works enriched the working-men, while others were undertaken to enhance in value the property of the peasantry. The complete remodelling of Paris under the direction of Baron Haussmann raised the value of house-property. International exhibitions and treaties of commerce were a further inducement to internal peace. A brilliant foreign policy seemed to dawn on the Crimean war (1854-56); the campaign in Lombardy against Austria (1859), to which Napoleon was somewhat paradoxically encouraged by the murderous attack of Orsini on his person; and the expeditions to China (1857-60). In all these undertakings Napoleon had the support if not the co-operation of Great Britain. To Prussia his relations were very different.

At the death of Morny in 1865 the controlling power of Napoleon's measures was well-nigh spent. His Vie de César, written to extol his own methods of government, met with loud protests. Forewarned, Napoleon reorganised his army, set himself up more proudly as an arbiter in Europe, and took a more conciliatory attitude to liberalism. In 1869 his prime-minister Rouher, an advocate of absolutism, was dismissed, and new men were called into power to liberalise the constitution. By another plebiscite the new parliamentary scheme was sanctioned by 7½ million votes (8th May 1870). But 50,000 dissentient votes given by the army revealed an unsuspected source of danger. Anxious to rekindle its ardour, and ignorant of the corruption that existed in his ministry of war, he availed himself of a pretext—the scheme to place Leopold of Hohenzollern on the Spanish throne—to declare war against Prussia, 15th July 1870. By 30th July Prussia had 500,000 men in the field, while the French had with great exertion collected 270,000 by the beginning of August. The emperor assumed the command, but never got across the Rhine, and had to fight at a disadvantage within Alsace and Lorraine. The campaign opened with a small success at Saarbrücken (2d August), followed by the defeats of Weissenburg (4th August), Wörth and Spicheren (6th August). Napoleon had retired on Metz, and abandoned the chief command to Marshal Bazaine, whose escape from Metz was prevented by the defeats of Mars-la-Tour (16th August) and Gravelotte (18th August). Metz surrendered on 27th October. Meanwhile a hastily organised force of 120,000 men under Marshal Macmahon was moved to the assistance of Bazaine. On reaching Sedan Macmahon found himself surrounded by the Germans, and on 1st September suffered a crushing defeat. Next day the emperor, who was with the army, surrendered with 83,000 men. Till the conclusion of peace he was confined at Wilhelmshöhe. In March 1871 he joined the empress at Chiselhurst, Kent, and resided there till his death, 9th January 1873. His remains and his son's were removed in 1888 to the mausoleum at Farnborough Hill near Aldershot.—That son, EUGÈNE LOUIS JEAN JOSEPH, Prince Imperial, born 16th March 1856, was in the field with his father in 1870, but escaped to England, where he entered Woolwich Academy. Volunteering to serve with the English in the Zulu campaign of 1879, he was killed on 1st June by Zulus. See Lives of Napoleon III, by Blanchard Jerrold (4 vols. 1874-82) and Arch. Narses (c. 473-573 A.D.), Roman statesman and general, born in Persian Armenia, rose in the imperial household at Constantinople to be keeper of the privy-purse to Justinian. In 538 he was sent to Italy professedly to act in concert with Belisarius, but really to control him. Narses assumed an independent authority; it proved unfortunate, and he was recalled in 539. In 552 Belisarius was recalled, and Narses appointed to the chief command in Italy. Not having transports enough, he marched his army along the shore of the Adriatic, and, while the Ostrogoths' fleet held the sea, encountered them at Tagina, totally defeated them, and slew their king, Totila. Narses took possession of Rome, and completely extinguished the Gothic power in Italy. Justinian appointed him prefect of Italy in 554, and he administered its affairs with vigour and ability. But he was charged with avarice; and his exactions pressed so heavily on the impoverished population that on Justinian's death the Romans complained to Justin, who deprived him in 567 of his office. He died at Rome.

Narvaez, RAMON MARIA (1800-68), Spanish general and statesman, born at Loja, served against the French, and in 1836 routed the Carlist leader, Gomez, near Arcos. In 1838 he cleared La Mancha of brigands, and was appointed in 1840 captain-general of Old Castile. He took part in the insurrection against Espartero in 1840, but that failing, fled to France, where he was joined by Queen Christina, and commenced those plots against Espartero which in 1843 effected his overthrow. In 1844 he was made president of council and Duke of Valencia. His ministry was reactionary, but was overthrown in 1846. After a brief exile as special ambassador to France, he was thrice again premier.

Nash, JOHN (1752-1835), born at Cardigan or in London, was bred an architect, but retired to a small property he had bought near Carmarthen, till, having lost heavily by speculations in 1792, he resumed practice. On the strength of a patent (1797) for improvements in the arches and piers of bridges, he claimed much of the credit of introducing metal girders. He designed many mansion-houses, but is celebrated for his street improvements in London. Architect from 1815 to the Board of Woods and Forests, he engaged busily in planning routes, grouping buildings, and fixing sites. Regent Street and the Brighton Pavilion are specimens of his designs.

Nash, RICHARD, 'Beau Nash,' born at Swansea, October 18, 1674, was educated at Carmarthen and Jesus College, Oxford, held a commission in the army, and in 1693 entered the Middle Temple, but found greater attractions in the dissipation of society than in law. He made a shifty living by gambling, but in 1704 became master of the ceremonies at Bath, where he conducted the public balls with a splendour never before witnessed. In this way he acquired imperial influence in the fashionable society of the place. He played hard and successfully, but was distinguished by his sentimental benevolence. His own equipage was sumptuous. He took great care of the morals of the young ladies who attended the Bath balls, putting them on their guard against needy adventurers. In old age he sank into poverty, and often felt the want of that charity which he himself had never withheld. He died at Bath, Feb. 3, 1762. See Life by Goldsmith (1762), Gosse's Gossip in a Library (1891), and Melville's Bath under Beau Nash (1907).

Nash, THOMAS (1567-1601), born at Lowestoft, studied seven years at St John's College, Cambridge, travelled in France and Italy, and thereafter plunged into the life of letters in London. By Lowell styled the 'English Rabelais,' he had a genuine relish for good literature and a great faculty for vituperation. His writings were his vigorous preface to Greene's Menaphon (1589); the Anatomie of Absurditie (1589); a series of impetuous tracts flung into the Marprelate controversy; Pierce Penilless, his Supplication to the Divell (1592), full of keen satire and rich in autobiographical interest; Strange News (1593); Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1593); The Terrors of the Night, or a Discourse of Apparitions (1594); The Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jack Wilton (1594; ed. by Gosse, 1892), the best picaresque tale before Defoe; Have with you to Saffron Walden (1596), containing an onslaught on Gabriel Harvey; The Isle of Dogs (1597), at once suppressed, and now lost; and Lenten Stuffe (1599), a humorous description of Yarmouth. The tragedy of Dido was written in collaboration with Marlowe; Summer's Last Will and Testament, by Nash alone. See Introduction to Grosart's edition of his works (1883-84), M'Kerrow's edition (4 vols. 1904-7), also Jusserand's English Novel (1890).

Nasmith, DAVID (1799-1839), founder of city missions, born at Glasgow, died at Guildford.

Nasmyth, JAMES, inventor of the steam-hammer, was the son of Alexander Nasmyth (1758-1840), portrait and landscape painter, best known by his portrait of Burns, and a brother of the landscape-painter, Patrick Nasmyth (1787-1831), the 'British Hobbema.' Born in Edinburgh, August 19, 1808, from boyhood he evinced a turn for mechanics; and, employed by Maudsley 1829-31, in 1834 he started in business at Manchester, and in 1836 established at Patricroft the Bridgewater Foundry. His steam-hammer was devised in 1839 for forging an enormous wrought-iron paddle-shaft, and in 1842 he found it at work at Creuzot in France; it had been adapted from his own scheme-book. Nasmyth patented his invention, and it was adopted by the Admiralty in 1843. Business increased, and by 1856 he retired with a fortune to Penshurst, Kent. Amongst his other inventions was a steam pile-driver. He published Remarks on Tools and Machinery (1858) and The Moon (1874). He died in London, May 7, 1890. See Autobiography, edited by Smiles (1883).

Naso. See OVID.

Nasr-ed-Din (1829-96), Shah of Persia from 1848, visited England in 1873 and 1889, and was shot near Teheran by an assassin. He was succeeded by his second son, Muzaffer-ed-Din.

Naundorf, KARL W. See LOUIS XVII.

Naunton, SIR ROBERT (1563-1635), born at Alderton, Suffolk, became public orator at Cambridge in 1594, travelled, entered parliament, and was secretary of state 1618-23. He wrote Fragmenta Regalia (1641), a sketch of Elizabeth's courtiers. See his Memoirs (1814).

Nayler, JAMES (c. 1617-60), from 1651 a much-persecuted Quaker, was born at Ardsley near Wakefield, and died near King's Ripton, Hants.

Neal, DANIEL (1678-1743), born in London, in 1706 became an Independent minister there. He wrote a History of New England (1720) and the laborious and accurate History of the Puritans (1732-38; new ed., with Life by J. Toulmin, 1793).

Neal, JOHN (1793-1876), born of Quaker parentage at Falmouth (now Portland, Maine), in 1816 failed in business, and turned to law, supporting himself the while by his pen. He was one of the first Americans to write in the greater English magazines, and lived in England 1823-27. After his return he practised law, edited newspapers, and lectured. Among his works are novels, Bentham's Morals and Legislation, and Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life (1869).

Neale, EDWARD VANSITTART (1810-92), from 1851 a wealthy advocate of co-operation.

Neale, JOHN MASON, D.D., hymnologist, born in London, January 24, 1815, was a scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, and from 1846 warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead, where he died, August 6, 1866. An advanced High Churchman, he was inhibited by his bishop 1849-63. Throughout life his means were of the smallest, but he founded (1854) the nursing sisterhood of St Margaret. He wrote History of the Holy Eastern Church (1847-51), Medieval Preachers (1857), History of the so-called 'Jansenist' Church of Holland (1858), &c., but his greatest work was his contribution to hymnology. His Hymns for the Sick and Hymns for Children were followed by Medieval Hymns and Sequences (1851), Rhythm of Bernard of Morlaix (1859), and Hymns of the Eastern Church (1863). Many of his translations are cherished by all English-speaking Christendom, as 'O love how deep, how broad,' 'The day is past and over;' and the exquisite series adapted from Bernard of Morlaix, 'The world is very evil,' 'Brief life is here our portion,' 'For thee, O dear, dear country,' and 'Jerusalem the golden.' A selection from his writings appeared in 1884.

Neander, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, church historian, was born at Göttingen, 17th January 1789, of Jewish parentage. His name prior to baptism was David Mendel, and he was related to the Mendelssohns. Moved by Schleiermacher's Reden über die Religion (1799), in 1806 he renounced Judaism. Having studied at Halle and Göttingen, in 1811 he became a privat-docent at Heidelberg, in 1812 extra-ordinary professor of Theology there, and in 1813 professor of Church History at Berlin. He died July 14, 1850. Profoundly devotional, sympathetic, glad-hearted, profusely benevolent, he inspired universal reverence, and attracted students from all countries. He probably contributed more than any other to overthrow anti-historical Rationalism and dead Lutheran formalism. He wrote monographs on Julian and his times (1812), St Bernard (1813), the Gnostics (1818), St Chrysostom (1822); Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Geschichte des Christenthums (1822; 3d ed. 1845-46); Antignosticus (1826); the great Allgemeine Geschichte der Christlichen Religion und Kirche (1825-52); Geschichte der Pflanzung und Leitung der Kirche durch die Apostel (1833; 4th ed. 1847); Das Leben Jesu Christi, a reply to Strauss (1837; 5th ed. 1853); Wissenschaftliche Abhandlungen (1851); Geschichte der Christlichen Dogmen (1856). Most of these works are accessible in good English translations. See studies by Hagenbach (1851), Kraabe (1852), J. L. Jacobi (1882), Schaff (1886), and Weigand, the last with a good bibliography (1889). [Ne-an'der.]

Nearchus, a native of Crete, who settled in Amphipolis during the reign of Philip, and became the companion of the young Alexander the Great. In 330 B.C. he was governor of Lycia; in 329 he joined Alexander in Bactria with a body of Greek mercenaries, and took part in the Indian campaigns. Having built a fleet on the Hydaspes, Alexander gave Nearchus the command. He left the Indus in Nov. 325, and, skirting the coast, reached Susa in Feb. 324. His narrative is preserved in the Indica of Arrian. [Ne-ar'kus.]

Neate, CHARLES (1806-79), fellow of Oriel, Oxford, professor of Political Economy 1857-62, and Liberal M.P., was born and buried at Adstock, Bucks. See Burgon's Twelve Good Men (1888).

Neaves, CHARLES, LORD (1800-76), a Scottish judge and song-writer, born in Edinburgh.

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, succeeded his father Nabopolassar in 604 B.C. During his reign of forty-three years he recovered the long-lost provinces of the kingdom, and once more made Babylon queen of nations. He not only restored the empire and rebuilt Babylon, but almost every temple throughout the land underwent restoration at his hands. Not a mound has been opened by explorers which has not contained bricks, cylinders, or tablets inscribed with his name. In 599 he captured Jerusalem; and in 588 he destroyed the city, and removed most of the inhabitants to Chaldea.

Necker, JACQUES, born 30th September 1732 at Geneva, at fifteen went to Paris as a banker's clerk, and in 1762 established the London and Paris bank of Thellusson and Necker. A syndic of the French East India Company, and minister for the republic of Geneva at Paris, he married (1764) the accomplished and ambitious Suzanne Curchod (1737-94), who had loved Gibbon. In 1773 Necker gained the Académie prize for an éloge on Colbert; in his Essai sur le Commerce des Grains (1775) he claims for the state the right of fixing the price of grain and, if necessary, of prohibiting its exportation. In 1776 he was made Director of the Treasury, and next year Director-general of Finance. Some of his remedial measures were a boon to suffering France, as his adjustment of taxes and his establishment of state-guaranteed annuities and monts de piété. But his most ambitious scheme—the establishment of provincial assemblies, one of whose functions should be the apportionment of taxes—proved a disastrous failure. His retrenchments were hateful to the queen, and his famous Compte Rendu (1781) occasioned his dismissal. He retired to Geneva, but in 1787 returned to Paris; and when M. de Calonne cast doubt on the Compte Rendu, he published a justification which drew upon him his banishment from Paris. Recalled to office in September 1788, he quickly made himself the popular hero by recommending the summoning of the States-general. But the successful banker quickly proved himself unfit to steer the ship of state amid the storms of revolution. On 11th July he received the royal command to leave France at once, but the fall of the Bastille three days later frightened the king into recalling him amid the wildest popular enthusiasm. But after spurning the help of Lafayette and Mirabeau, and leading the king to surrender his suspensive veto, he finally resigned, September 1790. He retired to his estate near Geneva, and died, 9th April 1804. His collected works were edited by his grandson (with Life prefixed, 1820-21). See also Manuscripts de M. Necker, published by his daughter in 1804; her Vie privée de M. Necker (1804); the Mélanges from his wife's papers (1798-1802), and D'Haussonville's Salon de Madame Necker (1882; Eng. trans. 1882).

Neff, FELIX (1798-1829), born at Geneva, in 1823 was ordained in England Protestant pastor to the neglected inhabitants of the Alpine valleys in Hautes Alpes. His parish was mountainous and of great extent (80 miles long). But with unwearied devotion Neff laboured amongst its rude people till his death. See Memoir by Gilly (1832), and the Biographie by Bost (trans. 1843).

Negretti, HENRY (1817-79), thermometer-maker, born at Como, came to London in 1829, and was partner with Joseph Warren Zambra from 1850.

Negus, FRANCIS, a colonel who had served under Marlborough, and who invented 'negus,' died at Dallingham, Suffolk, 9th Sept. 1732.

Nehemiah, Jew cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, who in 444 B.C. obtained full powers to act as governor-extraordinary of Judæa. He had the walls of Jerusalem rebuilt, and repopulated the city by drafts from the surrounding districts. He presumably returned to the Persian court. We read of a second visit of Nehemiah to Jerusalem, twelve years afterwards, on which occasion he either initiated or renewed and completed certain reforms which henceforth were among the most characteristic features of post-exilic Judaism—including a crusade against mixed marriages and the stringent enforcement of a strict law of Sabbath observance. The canonical Book of Nehemiah originally formed the closing chapters of the undivided work, Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah. Compare Sayce, Introduction to Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther (3d ed. 1899); the commentary of Bertheau-Ryssel (1887), and those of Keil (Eng.

trans. 1873), and Rawlinson in Speaker's Commentary.

Nelle, RICHARD (1562-1640), born at Westminster, and educated there and at St John's, Cambridge, became Dean of Westminster (1605), Bishop of Rochester (1608), Lichfield and Coventry (1610), Lincoln (1614), Durham (1617), and Winchester (1628), and Archbishop of York (1631).

Neill, COL. JAMES GEORGE SMITH (1810-57), born near Ayr, avenged the massacre of Cawnpore, and fell in the advance on Lucknow.

Neilson, JAMES BEAUMONT (1792-1865), inventor of the hot-blast in 1825-28, and foreman and manager of Glasgow gas-works 1817-47, born at Shettleston, died at Queenshill, Kirkcubright.

Neilson, LILLIAN ADELAIDE (1848-80), a brilliant and beautiful tragédienne, was born at Leeds, the daughter of a poor actress, Brown or Bland, and had been a mill-hand and barmaid, when in 1865 she made her début at Margate. She married unhappily a Mr Lee, five times played in America (1872-80), and died suddenly in Paris.

Nekrasoff, NIKOLAI ALEXIEVITCH (1821-88), Russian lyrical poet of the realistic school.

Nelaton, AUGUSTE (1807-73), became in 1851 professor of Clinical Surgery, in 1866 surgeon to the emperor, and in 1868 member of the senate.

Nelson, HORATIO, VISCOUNT NELSON, born 29th September 1758 at Burnham Thorpe rectory, Norfolk. He entered the navy in 1770; made a voyage to the West Indies; served in the Arctic expedition of 1773, and afterwards in the East Indies, whence he returned invalided in September 1776. As lieutenant of the Lowestoft frigate (1777) he went to Jamaica, and in 1779 was posted to the Hinchinbrook frigate. In January 1780 he commanded the naval force in the expedition against San Juan; on the pestilential river his health again broke down. In 1781 he commissioned the Albemarle, and joined the squadron under Lord Hood in America. In 1784 he was appointed to the Boreas frigate for service in the West Indies, where he enforced the Navigation Act against the Americans. Here he married the widow of Dr Nisbet of Nevis; and in December 1787 he with his wife retired to Burnham Thorpe for five years. Appointed to the Agamemnon in 1793, he accompanied Lord Hood to the Mediterranean. When Toulon was given up to the allies Nelson was ordered to Naples. He was employed in the blockade of Corsica, and next year commanded the naval brigade at the reduction of Bastia and of Calvi; here a blow from a bit of gravel, scattered by a shot, destroyed his right eye. In 1795 he was in Hotham's two victories outside Toulon. During 1796 with a small squadron in the Gulf of Genoa he commanded the road along the shore. When Spain concluded a treaty with France, and sent her fleet into the Mediterranean, Jervis found himself opposed by very superior forces, and retired ultimately to Lisbon. He was determined that the Spanish fleet should not pass, and inflicted a signal defeat on it off Cape St Vincent, 14th February 1797. Nelson, now commodore, was in the rear of the line. In thwarting an attempt to reunite the two divisions of the Spanish fleet, he for nearly half-an-hour withstood the whole Spanish van. When the Spaniards fled Nelson let his ship fall foul of the Spanish San Nicolas, which he boarded, and, leading his men across her deck to the San Josef, took possession of her also. Nelson was rewarded with the cross of the Bath; and, promoted rear-admiral in July, was sent with an inadequate squadron to seize a richly-laden Spanish ship at Santa Cruz. The attack was made on the night of 21st July; but the boats were repulsed with severe loss, and Nelson had his right elbow shattered by a grape-shot, and amputated. In March 1798 he hoisted his flag on the Vanguard, and was sent into the Mediterranean with a small squadron to watch the French. But the Vanguard, dismasted in a gale, was obliged to put into San Pietro to refit, while the French expedition sailed to Egypt. On 7th June Nelson was reinforced by ten sail of the line; but his frigates had all parted company, and after a fruitless search he put into Syracuse, when he learned at last that they had gone to Egypt. Thither he followed, and on 1st August found them at anchor in Aboukir Bay. His fleet was numerically inferior, but the wind was blowing along the French line, so he concentrated his attack on the weather end. The leeward ships could not render any assistance; and thus, creeping down the line, he captured or destroyed the whole, with the exception of the two rearmost ships and two of the frigates, which fled. Never, in recent times, had there been a victory so overwhelming; and when Nelson returned to Naples the queen welcomed him with ardour, and Lady Hamilton (q.v.), the wife of the English ambassador, fell on his breast in a paroxysm of rapture. A woman of extreme beauty, winning manners, and shady antecedents, she enslaved Nelson by her charms, and the two became bound by a liaison which death only severed. Nelson was raised to the peerage as Baron Nelson of the Nile, parliament voted him a pension of £2000 a-year, and the East India Company awarded him £10,000. The king of Naples conferred on him the title of Duke of Bronte, in Sicily, with an estate valued at £3000 a-year, though during Nelson's life its revenues were in abeyance. The government of Naples had already concluded an alliance with Austria and declared war against France; but the French army swept away the Neapolitan troops, and the Neapolitan Jacobins received their French brethren with open arms. Nelson conducted the king and his court to Palermo. Afterwards, returning as the king's representative, he annulled the convention which Cardinal Ruffo had made with the rebels, forced the traitors to surrender, and hanged Caracciolo (q.v.). In July 1799 Nelson received an order from Lord Keith, commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, to bring the greater part of his force to Minorca, which he conceived to be threatened by an attack of France and Spain. Nelson refused to obey the order; and when it was repeated, sent Sir John Duckworth, his second in command, while he himself remained at Naples or Palermo, and controlled the blockade of Malta. The Admiralty censured him for his disobedience; and it can scarcely be maintained that the affairs of Naples justified this extraordinary breach of discipline. Happy at last in the capture of the two ships which had escaped from Aboukir Bay, he resigned his command, and made his way home overland with Lady Hamilton and her husband. He arrived in England in November 1800. His meeting with his wife was not a happy one, and after an angry interview they parted never to see each other again. In January 1801 Nelson was promoted to be vice-admiral, and was appointed second in command of the expedition to the Baltic, under Sir Hyde Parker. The whole conduct of the attack on Copenhagen and the Danish fleet was entrusted to Nelson. After a furious combat of from three to four hours' duration, the enemy's ships were subdued. A suspension of hostilities led to an armistice, which the news of the czar's death converted into a peace. Nelson, created a viscount, succeeded Parker as commander-in-chief; but, his health having given way, he returned to England. He was ordered to undertake the defence of the coast, in prospect of a French invasion; and though he failed in an attempt to destroy the flotilla at Boulogne, his watch was so vigilant that the boats never ventured from under the protection of their batteries. On the renewal of the war Nelson cruised for eighteen months off Toulon. During a temporary absence, in March 1805, the French fleet put to sea under Villeneuve, and got away to Martinique, where they expected to be joined by the fleet from Brest. Nelson, though delayed for six weeks by his ignorance of Villeneuve's movements, was only twenty days behind him; and Villeneuve hastily returned to Europe. Nelson again followed, and arrived off Cadiz some days before the French approached the shores of Europe. Conceiving that Villeneuve's aim might be to overpower the fleet off Brest, he reinforced it with most of his ships, returning himself to England. Within a fortnight it was known that Villeneuve had gone to Cadiz, and Nelson resumed the command in September. Villeneuve was meantime urged by positive orders to put to sea, and on 20th October he reluctantly came out. Of French and Spanish ships there were thirty-three; Nelson had twenty-seven. At day-break on the 21st the two fleets were in presence of each other off Cape Trafalgar. At noon the lee division of the English fleet, under Collingwood in the Royal Sovereign, broke through the rear of the Franco-Spanish line. Nelson, with the other division, threw himself on the centre of the van. As the Victory passed astern of Villeneuve's flagship she fell foul of the Redoubtable of seventy-four guns, and her quarter-deck became exposed to the musketry fire from the Redoubtable's tops. Nelson, while speaking to Captain Hardy, fell mortally wounded by a shot on the left shoulder. He was carried below, and died some three hours later, just as the battle ended in victory. The enemy's fleet was annihilated. Nelson's body was brought home and buried in St Paul's. NELSON, ROBERT, born in London, 22d June 1656, a rich Turkey merchant's son, removed with his widowed mother to Dryfield in Gloucestershire, where he was brought up by Dr George Bull. In 1680, elected an F.R.S., he travelled with Halley in France and Italy, returning with Lady Theophila Lucy (1654-1705), a widow and daughter to the Earl of Berkeley, who in 1683 became his wife, and soon after was converted to Catholicism by Cardinal Howard and Bossuet. Her ill-health had taken them again to Italy at the Revolution; but Nelson was from the first a (passive) Jacobite, and on his return in 1691 he joined the Nonjurors. He was received back into the Established Church in 1710, though he still would not pray for Queen Anne. He died at Kensington, 16th January 1714. One of the earliest members of the S.P.C.K. and S.P.G., Nelson was the author of five devotional works, of one of which, the Festivals and Fasts (1703), 10,000 copies were sold in four and a half years. See Lives by W. H. Teale (1840-46) and C. F. Secretan (1860).

Nemours, DUC DE (1814-96), the second son of Louis Philippe, after the fall of the monarchy played an inconspicuous part. [Ne-moor'.]

Nennius, reputed author about 810, and of a Historia Britonum, a native apparently of Powys. His book gives the mythical account of the origin of the Britons, the Roman occupation, the settlement of the Saxons, and closes with King Arthur's twelve victories. The writer is credulous and feeble in judgment, but he has preserved valuable fragments of earlier treatises. The text was edited by the Rev. Joseph Stevenson (Eng. Hist. Soc. 1838). See De la Borderie's L'Historia Britonum (Paris, 1883), works by Skene and Rhys, and a German one by Dr H. Zimmer (1898).

Neot, Sr, a Saxon 9th-century hermit in Cornwall, whose relics were brought to Crowland about 1003. [Neet.]

Nepomuk, or POMUK, JOHN OF (c. 1330-83), patron saint of Bohemia, was born at Pomuk near Pilsen, studied at Prague, and became confessor to Sophia, wife of Wenceslaus IV. For refusing to betray to this monarch the confession of the queen John was put to the torture, then flung into the Moldau. In 1729 he was canonised. By some historians two personages of the same name are enumerated—one, the martyr of the confessional; the other, a victim to the simoniacal tyranny of Wenceslaus. See Wratisslaw's Life of St John Nepomucen (1873).

Nepos, CORNELIUS, a native of Pavia or Hostilia, was the contemporary of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus, and was probably still alive in 25 B.C. The ancients ascribed to him the following works: Chronica, Exemplorum Libri, Lives of Cato and Cicero, and De Viris Illustribus. Of the last, only twenty-five biographies of warriors and statesmen, mostly Greeks, survive—untrustworthy, but written in a clear and elegant style. Good editions are those of Cellarius (1689) and Nipperley (2d ed. 1879). See Freudenberg, Questiones historice in C. Nepotis vitas (1839).

Neri, St PHILIP, the founder of the Congregation of the Oratory, was born at Florence, July 21, 1515. He betook himself in his eighteenth year to Rome, and for many years spent most of his time in visiting the sick, in instructing the poor and ignorant, and in solitary prayer in the catacombs. In 1551 he was persuaded to become a priest; and gathering round him a number of disciples, he started the daily exercises of devotion which made his name famous. At the carnival or in holiday seasons he instituted musical entertainments and religious dramas, the origin of the modern oratorio. In 1564 Philip established a community, which, as the Oratory, received the approbation of the pope, and here Philip died, May 25, 1595. He was canonised with Ignatius Loyola and others in 1622. Philip's literary remains consist of a few letters (1751) and some sonnets. The best Life was by Bacci (1622); Eng. trans. edited by F. W. Faber, 1849. A popular biography is by Mrs Hope (1859); see also Life by Archbishop Capelatro (Eng. trans. 1882).

Nero, Roman emperor from 54 to 68 A.D., was born at Antium, 15th December 37, son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and of the younger Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. His mother became the wife of the Emperor Claudius, who adopted him (50). After the death of Claudius (54) the Prætorian Guards declared him emperor. His reign began with good promise, but owing to the baleful influence of his mother and his own moral weakness and sensuality, he soon plunged headlong into debauchery, extravagance, and tyranny. He caused Britannicus, the son of Claudius, to be poisoned, and afterwards (59) his mother Agrippina to be murdered, in order to please his infamous mistress Poppæa Sabina. To marry her he put to death his wife Octavia, the sister of Britannicus. In 61 an insurrection broke out in Britain under Queen Boadicea, which was suppressed by Suetonius Paulinus. Next year saw an unsuccessful war against the Parthians in Armenia. In July 64 occurred a great conflagration in Rome, by which two-thirds of the city was burned. Nero is stated to have been the incendiary; and we are told that he admired the spectacle from a distance, reciting verses about the burning of Troy. But he found a scapegoat in the Christians, many of whom were put to death with unheard-of cruelties. He rebuilt the city with great magnificence, and reared on the Palatine Hill a splendid palace; and in order to provide for his expenditure Italy and the provinces were plundered. A conspiracy against Nero in 65 failed, and Seneca and the poet Lucan fell victims to his vengeance. In a fit of passion he murdered his wife Poppæa, by kicking her when she was pregnant. He then offered his hand to Antonia, daughter of Claudius, but was refused; whereupon he caused her to be put to death, and married Statilia Messalina, after murdering her husband. He also executed or banished many persons distinguished for integrity and virtue. His vanity led him to seek distinction as poet, philosopher, actor, musician, and charioteer. In 68 the Gallic and Spanish legions, and after them the Prætorian Guards, rose against him to make Galba emperor. Nero fled to the house of a freedman, four miles from Rome, and saved himself from execution by suicide, 11th June 68. See W. Wolfe Capes, Early Roman Empire, Merivale's Romans under the Empire, and the Life by B. W. Henderson (1903).

Neruda, MADAME. See HALLÉ.

Nerva, M. COCCÆUS, Roman emperor, was born in 32 A.D., and elected in 96 A.D. He rectified the administration of justice, and died in 98.

Nerval, GÉRARD DE, the adopted name of Gérard Labrunie, born at Paris, May 21, 1808. He published at twenty a translation of Faust. Desultory work, a love-affair, fits of restless travel, of dissipation, and of gloom, and death, almost certainly by his own hand, 25th Jan. 1855, sum up the story of his life. Nerval wrote admirably alike in prose and verse. But his travels, criticism, plays, and poems are less interesting than his fantastic short tales, the Contes et Facéties (1852), and the semi-autobiographic series of Filles du Feu (1856). Another book of singular interest is La Bohème Galante. See works by Arvède Barine (1897) and Ferrière (1906), and the Fortnightly for Dec. 1897.

Nesselrode, KARL ROBERT, COUNT, Russian diplomatist, born 14th December 1780, at Lisbon, son of the Russian ambassador. He gained the confidence of the Emperor Alexander, took a principal part in the negotiations which ended in the peace of Paris, and in the Congress of Vienna, and was one of the most active diplomatists of the Holy Alliance. He dealt a deadly blow to the revolutionary cause in Hungary in 1849. He exerted himself to preserve peace with the Western Powers, and in 1854 strove for the re-establishment of peace. He died 23d March 1862. See his autobiography (1866), Lettres et Papiers (1908).

Nestorius was a native of Germanicia in northern Syria, and as priest became so eminent for his zeal, ascetic life, and eloquence that he was selected as patriarch of Constantinople (428). The presbyter Anastasius having denied that the Virgin Mary could be truly called the Mother of God, Nestorius warmly defended him; and so emphasised the distinction of the divine and human natures that antagonists accused him—falsely—of holding that there were two persons in Christ. A controversy ensued, and at a general council at Ephesus in 431 Nestorius was deposed. He was confined in a monastery near Constantinople, was banished thence to Petra in Arabia, and died, we know not when and where, after having been confined in the Greater Oasis in Upper Egypt and elsewhere. There are still Nestorians in Kurdistan, and the Syrian Christians of India are Nestorian in theology.

Nethersole, OLGA, actress, born in London, 18th Jan. 1870, made her début in 1887.

Nettlehip, HENRY (1839-93), from 1878 Corpus Latin professor at Oxford, was born at Kettering, and educated at Lancing, Durham, Charterhouse, and Corpus, taking only a second, but winning the Hertford, Gaisford, and Craven. He was elected a fellow of Lincoln, was a master at Harrow 1868-73, completed Conington's Virgil, and published Contributions to Latin Lexicography (1889), &c. See his Literary Remains by Prof. A. Bradley (1897).—His brother, RICHARD LEWIS (1846-92), took the place of T. H. Green as a tutor of Balliol. He was lost on Mont Blanc. See his Philosophical Lectures and Remains, edited, with memoir, by Bradley and Benson (2 vols. 1897).

Neville, ALPHONSE MARIE DE (1836-85), painted pictures of French exploits in the Crimea, Italy, and Mexico. During the war with Germany Neville fought in the ranks, and this gave power to his works depicting incidents of that war. Rorke's Drift and Tel-el-Kebir were also chosen as subjects for pictures. Neville excelled as an illustrator of books. [Neh-vel'.]

Neville, RICHARD. See WARWICK.

Nevison, JOHN (1639-84), highwayman, was born at Pontefract and hanged at York.

Newall, ROBERT STIRLING (1812-89), submarine-maker at Gateshead and astronomer, was born at Dundee. He was F.R.S. and D.C.L.

Newbery, JOHN (1713-67), bookseller, born a Berkshire farmer's son, settled about 1744 in London as a vendor of books and patent medicines. He was the first to publish little books for children, and he was himself—perhaps with Goldsmith—part author of some of the best of them, notably Goody Two-Shoes. In 1758 he started the Universal Chronicle, or Weekly Gazette, in which the Idler appeared. In the Public Ledger (1760) appeared Goldsmith's Citizen of the World. See a book on him by C. Welsh (1885).

Newbolt, HENRY JOHN, son of the vicar of Bilston, Staffordshire, and born in 1862, studied at Oxford, went to the bar, and in 1895 published Mordred, a drama. But he is best known for the ring of his sea songs, for Admirals All, The Island Race, and The Sailing of the Long Ships.

Newcastle. See CAVENDISH and PELLIAM.

Newcomb, SIMON, LL.D., F.R.S. (1835-1909), astronomer, born at Wallace, Nova Scotia, graduated at Harvard, in 1861-97 was professor of Mathematics in the U.S. navy, had charge of the naval observatory at Washington, and edited the American Nautical Almanac. In 1894-1901 he was professor in the Johns Hopkins University. He made many astronomical discoveries, and wrote, besides innumerable memoirs, a long series of works, including Elements of Astronomy, The Stars, and his own Reminiscences (1903).

Newcomen, THOMAS (1663-1729), a Dartmouth ironmonger or blacksmith, who, born at Dartmouth, died in London. Before 1698 he invented the atmospheric steam-engine, an improvement on one by Capt. Savery. From 1712 his invention was used for pumping water out of mines.

Newdigate, SIR ROGER (1719-1806), antiquary, was born and died at Arbury, Warwickshire, having sat for thirty-six years as member for Middlesex and Oxford University. He endowed the Newdigate prize poem at Oxford, winners of which have been Heber, John Wilson, Milman, Hawker, Lord Selborne, Faber, Stanley, Ruskin, Shairp, M. Arnold, Sir E. Arnold, Symonds, Courthope, and Mallock. See Lady Newdigate's Cheverels of Cheverel Manor (1898).

Newland, ABRAHAM (1730-1807), for twenty-five years cashier of the Bank of England, amassed £200,000. See Life by Collier (1808).

Newman, JOHN HENRY, CARDINAL, was born in London, 21st February 1801. His father was a banker; his mother, a moderate Calvinist, deeply influenced his early religious views. He went up to Trinity College, Oxford, in 1817, but the stoppage of his father's bank (1819) compelled him to graduate next year. Still, in 1822, in spite of his second-class, he was elected a fellow of Oriel, and here he formed his close intimacy with Pusey and Hurrell Froude. In 1824 he was ordained, in 1828 became vicar of St Mary's, in 1830 broke definitely with Evangelicalism. His first book, The Arians of the Fourth Century (1833), argued that Arianism was a Judaizing heresy which sprang up in Antioch. In 1832-33 Newman accompanied Hurrell Froude and his father on a Mediterranean tour. Most of his smaller poems were written on this voyage, and were published in the Lyra Apostolica (1834). In Sicily he fell ill of malarial fever. Becalmed in the Strait of Bonifacio on his passage in an orange-boat to Marseilles, he wrote 'Lead, kindly Light.' He was present at Keble's Oxford assize sermon on National Apostasy (July 1833), which he regarded as the beginning of the Tractarian movement. Into the Tracts for the Times Newman threw himself with energy, and he himself composed a number of them. The tracts were all intended to assert the authority of the Anglican Church, to claim apostolical descent for the Anglican episcopate, to advocate the restoration of a stricter discipline and the maintenance of a stricter orthodoxy, to insist on the primary importance of the sacraments, and to guard the divine ritual of the church. Tract 90 (1841) was the most famous of the tracts. Newman contended that the intention of the Thirty-nine Articles was Catholic in spirit, and that they were aimed at the supremacy of the pope and the popular abuses of Catholic practice, and not at Catholic doctrine. But Tract 90 provoked an explosion which was the end of the Tractarian movement, and brought on the conversion to Rome of those of the Tractarians who were most logical as well as most in earnest. Newman struggled for two years longer to think his position tenable, but in 1843 resigned the vicarage of St Mary's, which he had held since 1828, and retired to Littlemore. The magnificent sermon on 'Development in Christian Doctrine' was the last which he preached in the university pulpit, 2d February 1843. In October 1845 he invited the Passionist Father Dominic to his house at Littlemore in order that he might be received into the Roman Catholic Church. He went to Rome for a year and a half, and on his return in 1848 he published Loss and Gain, the story of an Oxford conversion very different from his own. Shortly afterwards he began Callista, the story of a 3d-century martyr in Africa. In 1848 he established a branch of the brotherhood of St Philip Neri in England. He established himself at Edgbaston, a suburb of Birmingham; and here he did a great deal of hard work, devoting himself to the sufferers from cholera in 1849 with the utmost zeal. The lectures on Anglican Difficulties (1850) drew public attention to Newman's great power of irony and the singular delicacy of his literary style, and were followed by the Lectures on Catholicism in England (1851). His long series of Oxford sermons contain some of the finest ever preached from an Anglican pulpit, and his Roman Catholic volumes—Sermons addressed to Mixed Congregations (1849) and Sermons on Various Occasions (1857)—though less remarkable for their pathos, are even fuller of fine rhetoric, and show the rarest finish. In 1864 a casual remark by Canon Kingsley in Macmillan's Magazine on the indifference of the Roman Church to the virtue of truthfulness, an indifference which he asserted that Dr Newman approved, led to a correspondence which resulted in the publication of the remarkable Apologia pro Vita Sua, afterwards slightly recast as A History of My Religious Opinions. In 1865 he wrote a poem of singular beauty, The Dream of Gerontius, republished in Verses on Various Occasions (1874). In 1870 he published his Grammar of Assent, on the philosophy of faith. In the controversies which led to the Vatican Council Newman sided with the Inopportunist. He was at this time in vehement opposition to the Ultramontanes under Manning and William George Ward, and the bitterness between the two parties ran very high. Leo XIII., anxious to show his sympathy with the moderates, in 1879 summoned Newman to Rome to receive the cardinal's hat. He died at Edgbaston, 11th August 1890. See the Life by Wilfred Ward (1912); books by R. H. Hutton (1890), E. A. Abbott (1892), Waller and Burrow (1902), Father Barry (1904), Henri Brémond (1905-7); and Newman's Letters, edited by Miss Mozley (1891).

Newman, FRANCIS WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, born in London in 1805, and educated at Ealing and Worcester College, Oxford, in 1826 obtained a double first and a Balliol fellowship, which he resigned; and he withdrew from the university in 1830, declining subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles. After a three years' stay in the East, he became classical tutor in Bristol College in 1834, in 1840 professor in Manchester New College, and in 1846-63 professor of Latin in University College, London. In religion he took a part directly opposite to his brother's, being eager for a religion including whatever is best in all the historical religions. Phases of Faith (1853), the best known of his works, was preceded by The Soul (1849), and followed by Miscellanies (1869-90). Other works were a History of the Hebrew Monarchy (1847), Dictionary of Modern Arabic (1871), Handbook of Modern Arabic (1866), two mathematical volumes (1888-89), and a small book on his brother (1891). He died at Weston-super-Mare, 4th Oct. 1897.

Newmarch, WILLIAM (1820-82), born at Thirk, was a London banker, economist, and statistician.

Newnes, SIR GEORGE, born 13th March 1851, the son of a Matlock Congregational minister, was educated at Shireland Hall, Warwickshire, and the City of London School. He founded Tit-Bits (1881), The Strand Magazine (1891), The Wide World Magazine (1898), &c.; was Gladstonian M.P. for the Newmarket division 1885-95; and then was created a baronet. He died in 1910.

Newton, ALFRED, F.R.S. (1829-1907), born at Geneva, was in 1866 appointed professor of Zoology at Cambridge, and wrote valuable works on ornithology.

Newton, SIR CHARLES THOMAS (1816-94), held a British Museum post 1840-52, as vice-consul at Mitylene made important finds (Discoveries in the Levant, 1865), and was British Museum keeper of antiquities 1861-85.

Newton, SIR ISAAC, was born, 25th Dec. (o.s.) 1642, at Woolsthorpe, Lincolnshire, 8 miles S. of Grantham, at whose grammar-school he got his education. In 1661 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1665, when he took his B.A., he committed to writing his first discovery on fluxions; and in 1666 the fall of an apple suggested the law of universal gravitation. But on his first attempt so to explain the lunar and planetary motions, the then erroneous estimate of the radius of the earth produced such discrepancies that he dropped the hypothesis for investigations into the nature of light and the construction of telescopes. By a variety of experiments upon sunlight refracted through a prism, he concluded that rays of light which differ in colour differ also in refrangibility—a discovery which suggested that the indistinctness of the image formed by the object-glass of telescopes was due to the different coloured rays of light being brought to a focus at different distances. He concluded rightly that it was impossible for an object-glass consisting of a single lens to produce a distinct image, and was led to the construction of reflecting telescopes; and the form devised by him is that which reached such perfection in the hands of Herschel and Rosse. Newton became a fellow of Trinity in 1667, and Lucasian professor of Mathematics in 1669; and in 1671 he was elected a member of the Royal Society. He resumed his calculations about gravitation with the more correct measure of the earth obtained by Picard in 1670; and by 1684 had demonstrated the whole theory, which, on the solicitation of Halley he expounded first in De Motu Corporum, and more completely in Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica (1687). The part he took in defending the rights of the university against the illegal encroachments of James II. procured him a seat in the Convention Parliament (1689-90). In 1696 he was appointed Warden of the Mint, and was Master of the Mint from 1699 till the end of his life. He again sat in parliament in 1701 for his university. He solved two celebrated problems proposed in June 1696 by John Bernoulli, as a challenge to the mathematicians of Europe; and performed a similar feat in 1716, by solving a problem proposed by Leibnitz. Newton recommended public encouragement for the invention of a method for determining longitude—the first reward being gained by John Harrison for his chronometer. He was president of the Royal Society from 1703 till his death. He superintended the publication of Flamsteed's Greenwich Observations—not without much disputing between himself and Flamsteed. The controversy between Newton and Leibnitz as to priority of discovery of the differential calculus, or the method of fluxions, was raised through the partisanship of jealous friends. The verdict of science is that the methods were invented independently, and that, although Newton was the first inventor, a greater debt is owing to Leibnitz for the superior facility and completeness of his method. In 1699 Newton was elected foreign associate of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1705 he was knighted by Queen Anne. He died 20th March 1727, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. An admirable reprint of the Principia is that by Lord Kelvin and Prof. Blackburn (1871). Clarke's Latin translation of the Optics appeared in 1706, the Optical Lectures in 1728, the Fluxions in 1736, and Horsley edited an edition of his collected works (1779-85). Newton was a student of Alchemy; and he left a remarkable MS. work on the prophecies of Daniel and on the Apocalypse, a history of the Creation, and a number of tracts. See Sir David Brewster's Life of Newton (1855), and Augustus de Morgan's Newton, his Friend, and his Niece (1885).

Newton, JOHN, the friend of Cowper, was born in London, 24th July (o.s.) 1725, son of a shipmaster, and sailed with his father for six years. Impressed on board a man-of-war, he was made midshipman, but was degraded for attempted escape, and for ten years engaged in the African slave-trade. In 1748 he was converted, but still went on slave-trading; in 1755 he became tide-surveyor at Liverpool; and in 1764 he was offered the curacy of Olney in Bucks, and took orders. To Olney the poet Cowper came four years later, and an extraordinary friendship sprang up. In 1779 Newton became rector of St Mary Woolnoth, London, and he died December 21, 1807. Newton's prose works, Omicron (1762), Cardiphonia (1781), &c., are little read, save the Remarkable Particulars in his own Life. But some of his Olney Hymns have been taken to the heart by the English world, including 'Approach, my soul, the mercy-seat;' 'How sweet the name of Jesus sounds;' 'One there is above all others;' and 'Quiet, Lord, my froward heart.' See Life by Cecil (1808), prefixed to a collected edition of Newton's works (1816); Thomas Wright, The Town of Couper (1886); and other works cited at COWPER.

Newton, THOMAS (1704-82), born at Lichfield, in 1761 won his way to the bishopric of Bristol. His annotated edition of Milton's Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained, and his Dissertation on the Prophecies (1754-58), long enjoyed a reputation far beyond their deserts.

Ney, MICHEL, marshal of France, was born, a cooper's son, at Saarlouis, 10th January 1769, and rose to be adjutant-general (1794) and general of brigade (1796). For the capture of Mannheim he was made general of division in 1799. Under the empire he was made marshal. In 1805 he stormed the entrenchments of Elchingen, and was created Duke of Elchingen. He distinguished himself at Jena and Eylau, and his conduct at Friedland earned him the grand-eagle of the Legion of Honour. Serving in Spain, he quarrelled with Masséna and returned to France. In command of the third corps (1813) he covered himself with glory at Smolensk and Borodino, received the title of Prince of the Moskwa, and led the rear-guard in the disastrous retreat. In 1813 he was present at Lützen and Bautzen, but was defeated by Bülow at Dennewitz. He fought heroically at Leipzig, but submitted to Louis XVIII., who loaded him with favours. On Napoleon's return from Elba Ney, sent against him, went over to his old master's side. He opposed Brunswick at Quatrebras, and led the centre at Waterloo. After the capitulation of Paris he was condemned for high-treason, and shot 7th Dec. 1815, Wellington declining to interfere. His three sons published his Mémoires (1833).

Niccola, PISANO. See PISANO.—And for NICCOLO DI FOLIGNO, see ALUNNO.

Nichol, JOHN, LL.D. (1833-94), son of the Glasgow astronomical professor, JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL (1804-59), himself was Glasgow professor of English Literature 1861-89. He wrote poems and books on Byron, Bacon, Burns, American Literature (1882), &c. See Life by Knight (1896).

Nicholas, the name of five popes and an antipope. NICHOLAS I., pope from 858 to 868, asserted the supremacy of the Roman curia. His latest triumph was the restoration to her rights of Thietberga, the divorced wife of Lothaire, king of Lorraine.—NICHOLAS II. (1058-61) had Robert Guiscard as his vassal.—NICHOLAS III. (1277-80) and NICHOLAS IV. (1288-92) were unimportant popes.—NICHOLAS V., born at Pisa in 1398, showed such astuteness during the Councils of Basel and Florence that he was chosen pope in 1447. He prevailed on the antipope, Felix V., to abdicate, and thus restored the peace of the church in 1449. A liberal patron of scholars, he despatched agents East and West to purchase or to copy important Greek and Latin manuscripts, and practically may almost be said to have founded the Vatican Library. He vainly endeavoured to arouse Europe to the duty of succouring the Greek empire. Nicholas died in 1455. There was an antipope of the same name set up in 1323 by Ludwig of Bavaria, in antagonism to John XXII. See also NICHOLAS (St).

Nicholas, Sr, patron saint of Russia. Bishop of Myra in Lycia, he was imprisoned under Diocletian and released under Constantine, and his supposed relics were conveyed to Bari in 1087. St Nicholas is the patron of youth, particularly of scholars (Santa Claus is a corruption of the name); also of merchants, sailors, and travellers.

Nicholas I., emperor of Russia, third son of Paul I., was born 7th July 1796. On 13th July 1817 he married the daughter of Frederick-William III. of Prussia. On the death of his brother, Alexander I. (1825), owing to the resignation of Constantine, he succeeded to the throne, and suppressed a military conspiracy with vigour and cruelty. After a brief ebullition of reforming zeal, he reverted to the ancient policy of the czars—absolute despotism, supported by military power. Wars with Persia and Turkey resulted in giving Russia increase of territory. The movement of 1830 in the west of Europe was followed by a rising of the Poles, which was suppressed after a severe contest of nine months; and Nicholas, converting Poland into a Russian province, strove to extinguish the Polish nationality. In Russia intellectual activity was kept under official guidance. The czar's Pan Slavism also prompted him to Russianise all the inhabitants of the empire, and to convert Roman Catholics and Protestants to the Russian Greek Church. War was waged against the mountaineers of the Caucasus with great energy. The extension of British influence in central Asia led to an unsuccessful expedition to Khiva. During the political storm of 1848-49 he assisted the emperor of Austria in quelling the Hungarian insurrection, and drew closer the alliance with Prussia. The re-establishment of the French empire confirmed these alliances, and led Nicholas to think that the time had come for absorbing Turkey; but the opposition of Britain and France brought on the Crimean war, during which he died, March 2, 1855. He was fanatically beloved by his subjects. See Lacroix, Histoire de Nicolas I. (1864-73).—NICHOLAS II., born 18th May 1868, in 1894 succeeded his father, Alexander III., married a princess of Hesse, and experienced the rapprochement with France, the war with Japan (1904-5), and the constitutional movement, and initiated the Hague Peace Conference.

Nichols, a family of printers and antiquaries, associated with the Gentleman's Magazine from 1778 to 1856. To it belonged John Nichols (1745-1826); his son, John Bowyer Nichols (1779-1863); and his son, John Gough Nichols (1806-73).

Nicholson, EDWARD WILLIAMS BYRON, Bodley librarian in 1882-1912, born at St Helier, 16th March 1849, wrote on libraries and on ancient inscriptions, a commentary on Matthew, &c.

Nicholson, HENRY ALLEYNE (1844-99), born at Penrith, studied at Göttingen and Edinburgh; and, professor of Natural History at St Andrews (1875) and Aberdeen (1882), wrote over twenty works on zoology and palæontology.

Nicholson, JOHN, Indian soldier, was born at Lisburn, 11th December 1821. In 1839 he joined the H.E.I.C. service, and in 1840 his regiment was ordered to Ghazni in Afghanistan, where, two years later, it was compelled to surrender, and he endured a miserable captivity. In 1846 he became assistant to the resident at Lahore. During the Sikh rebellion of 1848 he saved the fortress of Attock, and at Chillianwalla and Gujrat he earned the special approval of Lord Gough. The Punjab having become a British province, Nicholson was appointed deputy-commissioner (1851), and his success in bringing the savage tribes under subjection was marvellous. In 1857 he perhaps did more than any other man to hold the Punjab; twice he nearly annihilated a rebel force. As brigadier-general, on Sept. 14 he led the storming party at the siege of Delhi, and fell mortally wounded. He died on the 23d. See Life by Captain Trotter (1897).

Nicholson, JOSEPH SHIELD, born at Wrawby near Brigg, 9th Nov. 1850, studied at Edinburgh and Cambridge, and in 1880 became professor of Political Economy at Edinburgh. He has written a treatise on Money (1888) and other economic works, and, anonymously, three romances (1888-90)—Thoth, A Dreamer of Dreams, and Toxar.

Nicholson, MARGARET (c. 1750-1828), sempstress, tried to stab George III. in 1806 with an old desert-knife, and died in Bedlam. See SHELLEY.

Nicholson, PETER (1765-1844), mathematician and architect, was the son of a stone-mason at Prestonkirk in East Lothian, and wrote, at London, Carlisle, and elsewhere, some thirty books.

Nicholson, WILLIAM (1655-1727), successively Bishop of Carlisle and Derry, published the Historical Library (English, Scottish, and Irish) and other important works and collections.

Nicholson, WILLIAM (1781-1844), portrait-painter and etcher, born in Oringhaun-on-Tyne, about 1814 settled in Edinburgh, and was the first secretary of the Royal Scottish Academy.

Nicholson, WILLIAM (1783-1849), Galloway pedlar-poet, was born and died at Borgue. See his Poems (4th ed. by Harper, 1897).

Nicholson, WILLIAM (1816-64), born near White-haven, emigrated as a grocer to Melbourne in 1841, became mayor 1850, and premier of Victoria 1859. He got the ballot adopted in 1855.

Nicias, Athenian statesman and general, belonged to the aristocratic party, and opposed Cleon and Alcibiades. In 427-426 B.C. he defeated the Spartans and the Corinthians. In 424 he ravaged Laconia, but in 421 made peace between Sparta and Athens. In the naval expedition against Sicily (418) he was one of the commanders. In 415 he laid siege to Syracuse, and was at first successful, but subsequently experienced a series of disasters; his troops were forced to surrender, and he was put to death in 414. See Plutarch's Life of Nicias (ed. by H. A. Holden, 1887).

Nicol, ERSKINE, R.S.A., A.R.A. (1866), born at Leith, 3d July 1825, lived in Dublin 1843-46, settled in London in 1862, and died in 1904. He painted homely incidents in Irish and Scottish life.

Nicol, WILLIAM (c. 1744-97), a classical master in the High School of Edinburgh, was the too convivial intimate of Robert Burns.

Nicolai, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH, author, book-seller, and publisher born 18th March 1733 at Berlin. He early distinguished himself by a series of critical letters (1756) contributed to many literary journals, and for many years edited the Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek (106 vols. 1765-92). He wrote topographical works, satires, anecdotes of Frederick the Great, and an autobiography (recording strange apparitions and hallucinations of his own). He died 8th January 1811.

Nicolai, OTTO (1810-49), composer, born at Königsberg, in 1847 became kapellmeister at Berlin. The opera The Merry Wives of Windsor (1848) is his.

Nicolas, SIR NICHOLAS HARRIS, antiquary, born at Dartmouth, 10th March 1799, served in the navy 1808-16, and was called to the bar in 1825. He devoted himself chiefly to genealogical and historical studies, as in his History of British Orders of Knighthood (1841-42). Made K.H. and K.C.M.G., he died 3d August 1848. Others of his thirty works are the Dispatches and Letters of Nelson (1844-46), the unfinished History of the British Navy (1847), Synopsis of the Peerage (1825), Chronology of History (1835), Privy Council Ordinances (1833-37), Life of William Davison (1823), Memoirs of Ritson (1833), &c.

Nicole, PIERRE (1625-95), one of the most distinguished of the Port Royalists, the friend of Arnauld and Pascal. See JANSEN.

Nicolini. See PATTI.

Nicoll, ROBERT (1814-37), born at Little Tullybeltane, Perth, started a circulating library in Dundee, published Songs and Lyrics (1835), and worked himself to death as editor of the ultra-radical Leeds Times. See Life by Drummond (1884).

Nicoll, SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON, LL.D. (knighted 1909), born 10th October 1851 at the Free Church manse of Lumsden, studied at Aberdeen, was Free Church minister at Dufftown 1874-77 and Kelso 1877-85. He then addressed himself to literary work in London, becoming editor of the Expositor, the British Weekly (1886), and the Bookman. He has written works in biography, theology, and literary criticism.

Nicot, JEAN (1530-1600), French ambassador at Lisbon, in 1561 introduced into France the tobacco-plant, called after him Nicotiana. He compiled one of the first French dictionaries (1606).

Niebuhr, BARTHOLOMÆUS GEORG, historian, born August 27, 1776, at Copenhagen, son of the traveller, Karsten Niebuhr (1738-1815), studied at Kiel, London, and Edinburgh (1798-99). In 1800 he entered the Danish state-service, and in 1806 the Prussian civil service. The opening of the university of Berlin in 1810 proved a new era in his life. He gave (1810-12) a course of lectures on Roman history, which established his position as one of the most original and philosophical of modern historians. In 1816 he was appointed Prussian ambassador at the papal court, and on his return in 1823 he took up his residence at Bonn, where his lectures gave a powerful impetus to historical learning. The revolution of 1830 produced such mental depression and bodily prostration as ended in his death, 2d January 1831. Niebuhr possessed great intuitive sagacity in sifting true from false historic evidence; and though his scepticism as to the credibility of early history goes too far, the bulk of his contribution to history still stands substantially unshaken. Of his Römische Geschichte (3 vols. 1811-32) the first two volumes were translated by Hare and Thirlwall, and the third by Smith and Schmitz; other works translated by Schmitz into English are Lectures on the Hist. of Rome, to Fall of Western Empire (2d ed. 1850); Lectures on Ancient Hist. (1852); and Lectures on Ancient Ethnography and Geog. (1853). Other works are Lectures on Roman history to the fall of the Empire, an ancient Ethnography and Geography, and Griech. Heroengeschichte (1842). He helped to re-edit the Byzantine Historians. See Madame Hensler's Lebensnachrichten (1838; trans. 1852), and the studies by Classen (1870) and Eysenhardt (1886).

Niel, ADOLPHE, French marshal, born at Muret (Upper Garonne), 4th October 1802, entered the army as an engineer officer. He took part in the storming of Constantine in Algeria (1836), the siege of Rome (1849), the bombardment of Bonar-sund (1854), the fall of Sebastopol (1856), and the battles of Magenta and Solferino (1859). Minister of war in 1867, he died 14th August 1869.

Niemsch. See LENAÜ.

Niepce, JOSEPH NICÉPHORE, one of the inventors of photography, born at Chalons-sur-Saône, 7th March 1765, served in the army, and in 1795 became administrator of Nice. At Chalons in 1801 he devoted himself to chemistry, lithography, and to experiments with sunlight pictures which brought him into connection with Daguerre. He died 5th July 1833.—His nephew, CLAUDE MARIE FRANÇOIS NIEPCE DE ST VICTOR (1805-70), wrote a Traité Pratique (1856) on the subject, and Recherches Photographiques (1855). [Nee-epps.]

Nietzsche, FRIEDRICH WILHELM, born a pastor's son at Röcken in Saxony, 15th Oct. 1844, studied at Bonn and Leipzig, and won distinction by treatises on Theognis, tragedy, &c. But from 1878 he began in a long series of works to expound a revolutionary philosophy denouncing all religion and treating all moral laws as a remnant of Christian superstition, cherishing the 'virtues of the weak.' His ideal, 'the overman,' is to be developed by giving unbridled freedom to the struggle for existence, will seek only his own power and pleasure, and knows not pity. His mind became unhinged in 1889, and till his death (26th Aug. 1900) he lived at Weimar with his sister, who published a Life of him (1895-97; recast in part, trans. 1912). See works by Meucken (1908), Mütge, Lichtenberg, Faguet, and Halevy (trans. 1911). Oscar Levy edited a translation of his works in 18 vols. in 1905-12. [Nee'tsheh.]

Nightingale, FLORENCE, daughter of William Edward Nightingale of Embley Park, Hants, was born at Florence, 15th May 1820, and in 1844 went into training as a nurse at Kaiserswerth (1851) and Paris. In 1854 war was declared with Russia; after the battle of the Alma Miss Nightingale offered to go out and organise a nursing department at Scutari, and in October she departed with thirty-four nurses. She arrived in time to receive the wounded from Inkermann (5th November) into overcrowded wards; soon she had 10,000 sick men under her care. But she saw in the bad sanitary arrangements of the hospitals the causes of their frightful mortality, and devoted herself to the removal of these causes. In the spring of 1855 she was prostrated with fever, but remained at Scutari till Turkey was evacuated by the British, July 1856. A fund of £50,000 was subscribed to enable her to form an institution for the training of nurses at St Thomas's and at King's College Hospital. In 1858 she published her Notes on Nursing, in 1859 Notes on Hospitals, in 1871 Notes on Lying-in Institutions, in 1873 Life or Death in India, and (in Fraser's Magazine) 'A Note of Interrogation' on religious belief. She was O.M. (1907) and had the freedom of the City of London (1908); and she died 13th August 1910.

Nilsson, CHRISTINE, operatic singer, was born at Wexiö, Sweden, 3d August 1843, and singing at a fair in 1857 so impressed a magistrate of Ljungby that he sent her for a musical education to Stockholm and Paris. She made her début at Paris in 1864; and in London, where she appeared in 1867, soon became one of the foremost soprano singers. She repeatedly visited the United States. She married (1872) M. Rouzand, who died in 1882; and in 1887 at Paris she became the wife of the Count de Miranda.

Ninian, Sr (Lowland Scotch, 'Ringan'), the first known apostle of Scotland, was born, about 360, on the shores of the Solway Firth. He made a pilgrimage to Rome, was consecrated bishop by the pope, visited St Martin at Tours, and he founded the church of Whithorn (397). He laboured successfully for the evangelisation of the Southern Picts, and died in 432. See his Life by Aired (1109-66), edited by Bishop Forbes (1874).

Ninon. See LENCLOS.

Nithsdale, WILLIAM MAXWELL, EARL OF, born in 1676, at seven succeeded his father as fifth earl. In 1699 he married Lady Winifred Herbert (c. 1679-1749), youngest daughter of the Marquis of Powis, and lived at his Kirkcudbrightshire seat, Terregles. A Catholic, in 1715 he joined the English Jacobites under Forster and Derwentwater, and was taken prisoner at Preston. He was tried for high-treason in London, and sentenced to death; but on 23d February 1716—the night before the day fixed for his execution—he escaped from the Tower in woman's apparel, through the heroism of his countess. They settled at Rome, where the earl died 20th March 1744. See Sir W. Fraser's Book of Carlarverock (1873).

Nitzsch, KARL LUDWIG (1751-1831), Protestant theologian, became in 1790 professor at Wittenberg.—KARL IMMANUEL NITZSCH (1787-1868), his son, became professor at Bonn in 1822, and in 1847 at Berlin. He subordinated dogma to ethics, and was one of the leaders of the broad evangelical school. His chief books are System der Christlichen Lehre (1829; Eng. trans. 1849), Praktische Theologie (1847-67), Christliche Glaubenslehre (1858), several volumes of sermons and essays. See studies by Beyschlag (2d ed. 1882) and Hermens (1886).—GREGOR WILHELM NITZSCH (1790-1861), philologist, brother of the preceding, fought as a volunteer at Leipzig, and from 1827 professor at Kiel, from 1852 at Leipzig, devoted himself to defending the unity of the Homeric poems. See study by Lübker (1864).—KARL WILHELM NITZSCH (1818–80), son of the preceding, became in 1844 extra-ordinary, in 1858 ordinary professor at Kiel, in 1862 at Königsberg, in 1872 at Berlin. His writings embrace historical studies on Polybius (1842) and the Gracchi (1847), Die Römische Annalistik (1873), Deutsche Studien (1879), German history to the peace of Augsburg (1883–85), and a history of the Roman republic (1884–85).—FRIEDRICH AUGUST BERTHOLD NITZSCH, son of Karl Immanuel, born 19th February 1832, became in 1868 professor of Theology at Giessen, in 1872 at Kiel. His writings include Boethius (1860), a Dogmengeschichte (1870), Luther und Aristoteles (1883).

Noailles, a distinguished French family. Antoine (1504–62) was ambassador in England in 1553–56, and admiral of France. Anne Jules (1650–1708), son of the first duke, commanded against the Huguenots and in Spain, and became marshal; his brother, Louis Antoine (1651–1729), Archbishop of Paris from 1695 till his death, became cardinal in 1700. The third duke, Adrien Maurice (1678–1766), won the marshal's baton in the wars of Louis XV. A grandson of the third duke, Louis Marie (1756–1804), served in America under Lafayette, embraced for a while the French Revolution, and defended San Domingo against the British. The fifth duke, Paul François (1739–1824), attained eminence as a chemist; his brother, Emmanuel Marie Louis (1743–1822), was French ambassador at Amsterdam (1770–76), London (1776–83), and Vienna (1783–92). The sixth duke, Paul (1802–85), wrote historical works, and was elected to the Academy in 1849. His second son, Emmanuel Victorien (born 1830), was ambassador at Washington (1872), Rome (1873), and Constantinople (1882–86), and has written works on the history and literature of Poland.

Nobel, ALFRED, was born at Stockholm, 21st Oct. 1833. His father, a mechanic, settled 1837–59 in St Petersburg, and in 1860 began to manufacture nitro-glycerine. In 1867 Alfred, who assisted him, discovered through the accidental escape of some nitro-glycerine from a cask into the siliceous sand of the packing, how to make a safe and manageable explosive—dynamite. He also invented blasting-jelly and several kinds of smokeless powder. Ultimately he had manufactories at Brefsors in Sweden, and experimented on mild steel for armour-plates, &c. At his death at St Remo on 10th December 1896, he left a fortune of over £2,000,000, most of which he destined to go for annual prizes for those making the most important discoveries in physics, chemistry, physiology, writing, the best literature, and accomplishing the most for humanity and peace. [No-bel.]

Noble, JAMES ASHCROFT (1845–96), journalist and critic, was born at Liverpool, edited a paper there, but settled in London, where in 1891 he published The Sonnet in England and other Essays.

Nodier, CHARLES (1780–1844), French writer. He lived a shiftless life until appointed in 1823 to the librarianship of the Bibliothèque de l' Arsenal in Paris. He was elected to the Academy in 1833, and deeply influenced the Romantics of 1830. Most of his literary work is forgotten, save his fresh and fantastic short stories and his Fairytales. His Souvenirs de Jeunesse (1832) must not be taken too seriously. There are Lives by Wey (1844) and Mme. Ménessier-Nodier (1867). See also Mérimée's éloge. [Nod-yay.]

land after the Gorham Case (1848), and became popular as a Baptist preacher.

Noel, RODEN BERKELEY WRIOTHESLEY (1834–94), son of Lord Barham, studied at Cambridge, and published several volumes of poetry and criticism, a Life of Lord Byron, and a book on Livingstone in Africa.

Noëltekens, JOSEPH, sculptor, born in London, 11th August 1737, and in 1760–70 worked in Rome. He became R.A. in 1772. His forte was in modelling busts, and he has given us likenesses of most of his famous contemporaries—Garrick, Sterne, Goldsmith, Johnson, Fox, Pitt, George III., &c. He died 23d April 1823, leaving £200,000. See J. T. Smith's Nollekens and his Times (1828).

Nonius Marcellus, Latin grammarian of the beginning of the 4th century, author of a poor treatise, precious as preserving many words in forgotten senses, and passages from ancient Latin authors now lost. A good edition is that by Gerlach and Roth (1842); see also Prof. Nettleship's Essays in Latin Literature (1885).

Nordau, MAX SIMON, born of Jewish descent at Budapest, 29th July 1849, studied medicine and established himself as physician, first at his birthplace (1878), and then at Paris (1886). He wrote several books of travel, but became known by his work proving that current ethical, religious, and political principles were but Conventional Lies of Society (1883; 15th ed. 1890; Eng. trans. 1895); Paradoxes (1886), and Degeneration (1893; Eng. trans. 1895), maintaining that most that is conspicuous in contemporary art, literature, and life is but proof of physical and psychical degeneration. His novels (Gefühlskomödie, &c.) have been more successful than his dramas and poems.

Nordenskiöld, BARON NILS ADOLF ERIK, Arctic navigator, was born at Helsingfors, 18th November 1832, naturalised himself in Sweden, and in 1858 was appointed head of the mineralogical department of the Royal Museum at Stockholm. He frequently visited Spitzbergen; in 1864 he measured an arc of the meridian there, and mapped the south of the island. After two preliminary trips to the mouth of the Yenisei, by which he proved the navigability of the Kara Sea, he successfully accomplished (June 1878–September 1879) the navigation of the North-east Passage, from the Atlantic to the Pacific along the north coast of Asia. On his return he was made a baron of Sweden (1880), and published the Voyage of the Vega (Eng. trans. 1881), Scientific Results of the Vega Expedition (1883), &c. To Greenland he made two expeditions, and wrote a book on them. He died 12th August 1901. See a work by A. Leslie (1879). [Nor-den-shild.]

Nordica, LILLIAN (Mme Zoltan Döme), soprano singer, born at Farmington, Maine, U.S.A., in 1859, studied at the Boston Conservatoire and in Italy.

Norfolk, DUKES OF. See HOWARD.

Norman, SIR HENRY, born in Leicester, 19th Sept. 1858, studied at Harvard and Leipzig, was on the staff of the Pall Mall Gazette, travelled in Eastern Asia and Eastern Europe, Egypt, and Armenia, was assistant-editor of the Daily Chronicle in 1895–99, became Liberal M.P. in 1900, Assistant Postmaster-general in 1910. He has written Real Japan (1892), The Peoples and Politics of the Far East (1895), The Near East (1897), All the Russias (1902), Motors and Men (1906), &c., and he founded The World's Work.

Norris, SIR JOHN (c. 1547–97), was a great English soldier, who fought in the Low Country wars, in France, on the coast of Spain, and in Ireland.

Norris, WILLIAM EDWARD, son of the Chief-justice of Ceylon, was born in 1847, was called to the bar in 1874, and has published Heaps of Money (1877), Matrimony, My Friend Jim, The Rogue, Clarissa Furiosa (1897), and other novels.

North, a family whose most illustrious members were three of the sons of Dudley, fourth Baron North of Kirtling in Cambridgeshire, whose lives were written by their brother Roger.—SIR EDWARD NORTH (1496–1564), famous as a lawyer, was created Baron North in 1554.—SIR THOMAS NORTH (? 1535–? 1601), his second son, is known by his translation of Plutarch (1579), from the French of Amyot, a noble monument of English, and one of the fountains from which Shakespeare drew his knowledge of ancient history (ed. by Wyndham, 6 vols. 1895 et seq.). Other translations by North were The Diall of Princes, from a French version of Guevara, and The Morall Philosophie of Doni, from the Italian (1570; new ed. by Joseph Jacobs, 1888).—FRANCIS NORTH (1637–85), second son of Dudley, fourth Baron North, was born 22 October 1637. He was educated at Cambridge, called to the bar in 1655, and was successively Solicitor-general, Attorney-general, Lord Chief-justice of the Court of Common Pleas, Privy-councillor, Lord-keeper of the Great Seal, and Baron Guilford (1683).—SIR DUDLEY NORTH (1641–91), third son, became a Turkey merchant in London, voyaged, and for a time settled in Constantinople. One of the sheriffs of London, he was pliant enough in the interest of the crown, was knighted, and was appointed a Commissioner of Customs. Under James II. he sat for Banbury. He was a keen-eyed observer, and had great mechanical genius, and his Discourses upon Trade (1691) anticipate Adam Smith.—DR JOHN NORTH (1645–83), fifth son, was fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, succeeded Barrow as Master of Trinity College in 1677, and became clerk of the closet to Charles II.—ROGER NORTH (1653–1734), sixth and youngest brother, was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, entered the Middle Temple, and rose to a lucrative practice at the bar. At the Revolution his hopes of advancement were closed, and he cast in his lot with the nonjuring party, and retired to his estate of Rougham in Norfolk. His three hyper-elogistic biographies, his autobiography (all collected by Jessopp in 1890), and his Examen (1740) of Dr White Kennet's History of England gave him a place in English literature.

—FREDERICK NORTH, eighth Lord North and second Earl of Guilford, statesman, was born April 13, 1732, and educated at Oxford. At twenty-two he entered parliament, and was made a Tory Lord of the Treasury in 1750. In 1767, eloquent and witty, he was made Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House of Commons. In 1770 he succeeded the Duke of Grafton as prime-minister. North was largely responsible for the measures that brought about the loss of America, being too ready to surrender his judgment to the king's. In 1782 he resigned. Fox's dislike of the terms of peace with America led him to enter into a coalition with North, whom he had heretofore inveighed against; and for a few months the two took office under the Duke of Portland in 1783. North succeeded his father as Earl of Guilford in 1790, and died 5th August 1792.—BROWNLOW NORTH, evangelist, was grandson of that Brownlow North (1741–1820), Bishop of Lichfield, Worcester, and Winchester, whose son succeeded in 1827 as sixth Earl of Guilford. Born at Chelsea, January 6, 1810, he travelled abroad, gambled, and lived much in the north of Scotland, but underwent conversion in 1854, and thereafter devoted himself to evangelical labours under the Free Church, as well as in Ireland and England. He died November 9, 1875. See Life by K. Moody-Stuart (1878).—MARIANNE NORTH (1830–90), a descendant of Roger of the 'Lives,' painted flowers with extraordinary beauty all round the world (1871–79), and gave her very valuable collection to the Kew Gardens.

Northcote, JAMES, R.A. (1746–1831), the son of a Plymouth watchmaker, painted portraits and historical pictures, but is remembered by Hazlitt's Conversations with Northcote (ed. by Gosse, 1894) and his own with Ward (1901). See Life by Gwynn (1898).

Northumberland, DUKES OF. See PERCY.

Norton, ANDREWS (1786–1853), American Unitarian theologian, studied at Harvard, became professor there, and wrote Reasons for not believing the Doctrines of Trinitarians (1833), and two works on The Genuineness of the Gospels.—His son, CHARLES ELIOT NORTON (1827–1908), in 1864–68 joint-editor with Lowell of the North American Review, and from 1875 professor of Art at Harvard, wrote on Italy, Dante, Michelangelo, and William Blake, and (a personal friend of all five) edited Carlyle's letters, Lowell, Emerson, Ruskin, and Clough.

Norton, HON. MRS CAROLINE E. S., poet and novelist, was born in London in 1808, second of the three beautiful granddaughters of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Her eldest sister became Lady Dufferin, the other Duchess of Somerset; and she herself in 1827 married a barrister, the Hon. George Chapple Norton (1800–75). She bore him three sons, of whom the second succeeded as fourth Lord Grantley; but the marriage proved most unhappy, and her friendship with Lord Melbourne (q.v.) led her husband to institute a groundless and unsuccessful action of divorce (1836). Her poems include The Sorrows of Rosalie (1829), The Undying One (the Wandering Jew, 1830), The Child of the Islands (1845), and The Lady of La Garaye (1862); her novels, Stuart of Dunleath (1851), Lost and Saved (1863), and Old Sir Douglas (1868). In March 1877 she married Sir William Stirling Maxwell (q.v.), but died 15th June.

Norton, THOMAS (1532–84), lawyer, M.P., and poet, with Sackville (q.v.) joint-author of Gorboduc, was born in London, and died at Sharpenhoe, Beds.

Nostradamus (Michel de Notredame), astrologer, born at St Remi in Provence, 14th December 1503. He became doctor of medicine in 1529, and practised at Agen, Lyons, &c. He commenced prophet about 1547. His Centuries of predictions in rhymed quatrains (two collections, 1555–58), expressed generally in obscure and enigmatical terms, brought their author a great reputation. Charles IX. on his accession appointed him physician-in-ordinary. Nostradamus died 2d July 1566. See books on him by Jaubert (1656), Haitze (1712), Baresté (1842), and C. A. Ward (1891).

Novalis, the pen-name of Friedrich von Hardenberg, who, born at Wiederstedt, 2d May 1772, was called the 'Prophet of Romanticism.' At Weissenfels (1795) he fell in love with a beautiful girl, whose early death left a lasting impression upon him. He died of consumption, 25th March

1801. His two philosophical romances, both incomplete, Heinrich von Ofterdingen and Lehrlinge zu Sais, teach that life ought to be poetry realised in practical conduct, and that there are in the universe many verities and realities which can only be known by sympathetic intuition. His Hymnen an die Nacht and his Poems and Sacred Songs are finished productions. See Carlyle's Miscellaneous Essays (vol. ii.), the Life published at Gotha (2d ed. 1883), and the correspondence with the Schlegels (1880). [No-vah'tis.]

Novatian, a Roman Stoic, was converted to Christianity and ordained a priest. In 251 A.D., soon after the Decian persecution, a controversy arose about those who fell away during persecution. Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, defended indulgence towards the lapsed; Novatian was chosen by a small party and ordained bishop in opposition to Cornelius. The Novatians denied the lawfulness of readmitting the lapsed to communion, and set up bishops at Carthage, Constantinople, Alexandria, in Phrygia, Gaul, and Spain. The sect, in spite of persecution, survived into the 6th century.

Novello, VINCENT (1781-1861), organist, composer, and music publisher, born in London of an Italian father and English mother, was a founder of the Philharmonic (1813), and its pianist and conductor. His compositions improved church music, and he was a painstaking editor of unpublished works of musicians. He lived at Nice from 1849.—His son, JOSEPH VINCENT (1810-96), also organist and music publisher, from 1857 lived at Nice and at Genoa with his sister, Mrs Cowden Clarke (q.v.). Another sister, CLARA ANASTASIA, vocalist, born in London, 10th June 1818, won triumphs in the chief cities of Europe; in 1843 married Count Gigliucci; but returned to the stage 1850-60, and died 12th March 1908.

Novikoff, MADAME, born, Olga Kireef, at Moscow in 1840, began in 1876 to write in English

AKELEY, SIR HERBERT STANLEY, born at Ealing, 22d July 1880, and educated at Rugby and Christ Church, was professor of Music at Edinburgh University from 1865 to 1891, was knighted in 1876, and died 26th October 1903. He composed songs, hymns, anthems, cantatas, marches, &c.

Oastler, RICHARD (1789-1861), advocate of a ten-hours' working day and the factory laws, by his opposition to the poor-law irritated Mr Thornhill, on whose Fixby estate near Huddersfield he was steward 1821-38, and he was imprisoned 1840-44 for a debt of £2000, ultimately paid by subscription.

Oates, TITUS, was born at Oakham in 1649, the son of an Anabaptist preacher, who became at the Restoration rector of All Saints', Hastings. The boy was brought up at Oakham school, Merchant Taylors' (1665), and Sedlescombe in Sussex; entered Caius College, Cambridge (1667); and two years later was admitted to St John's. Next taking orders, he held curacies and a naval chaplaincy, from all of which he was expelled for infamous practices. With the Rev. Dr Tonge he resolved to concoct the 'narrative of a horrid plot,' and, feigning conversion to Catholicism, was admitted to the Jesuit seminaries of Valladolid and St Omer. From both in a few months he was expelled for misconduct, but, returning to London in June 1678, he forthwith communicated to the authorities his pretended plot, the main features of which were a rising of the papers and magazines in defence of Russian policy and in deprecation of English prejudices. A collection of them, Russia and England, appeared in 1880; and since she has continued her crusade.

Noyes, JOHN HUMPHREY, Perfectionist, born at Brattleboro, Vermont, 6th September 1811, as a theological student discovered that the prevailing theology was wrong. He held that God is a dual body (male and female), and that communion with Christ not merely saves from sinning, but from disease and death. He founded a 'Perfectionist' church at Putney, Vermont, and he and his converts put their property into a common stock; those who were married renounced their marriage ties, and a 'complex marriage' was established between the males and females of the 'Family.' In 1848 the communists removed to Oneida, N.Y. Noyes died 13th April 1886 at Niagara Falls, Ontario, then headquarters of the community. See several works by Noyes; Hepworth Dixon's New America, &c.; Nordhoff, Communist Societies of the United States (1875).

Nur ed-Din Mahmūd, MALEK AL-ADEL, born at Damascus in 1117, succeeded his father as ruler of Northern Syria in 1145, and from this time his life was one long duel with the Christians. Count Joscelin's great defeat at Edessa gave occasion to the second Crusade; and the Crusaders were foiled by Nur ed-Din before Damascus. The emir next conquered Tripolis, Antioch, and Damascus (1153). His nephew, Saladin, completed the conquest of Egypt from the Fatimites. Nur ed-Din, created by the calif of Bagdad sultan of Syria and Egypt, became jealous of Saladin, and was preparing to march into Egypt, when he died in May 1173.

Catholics, a general massacre of Protestants, the burning of London, the assassination of the king, and the invasion of Ireland by a French army. He swore to the truth of it before a magistrate, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, who on 17th October was found dead in a ditch—murdered possibly by Titus and his confederates. All London straightway went wild with fear and rage, and Oates became the hero of the day. A pension of £480 was granted him, and a suite of apartments at Whitehall set apart for his use; the mob cheered him as the 'saviour of his country.' Bedloe, Dangerfield, and other wretches came forward to back or emulate his charges; the queen herself was assailed; and many Catholics were cast into prison. He was directly or indirectly the cause of thirty-five judicial murders; but after two years a reaction set in. In May 1683 Oates was fined £100,000 for calling the Duke of York a traitor, and being unable to pay, was imprisoned; in May 1685 he was found guilty of perjury, and sentenced to be stripped of his canonicals, pilloried, flogged, and imprisoned for life. The Revolution of 1688 set him at liberty, and a pension was even granted him of £300. He died 12th July 1705. See Secombe's Lives of Twelve Bad Men (1894).

Obadiah, one of the twelve 'minor prophets,' of whose personality nothing is known. From internal evidence the date of composition of the book may be put shortly after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, about 587 B.C.

Oberlin, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, was born at Strasburg, 31st August 1740, and in 1767 became Protestant pastor of Waldbach, in the Ban de la Roche, a wild mountainous district of Alsace, which had suffered terribly in the Thirty Years' War. Oberlin introduced better methods of cultivation and manufacture, made roads and bridges, founded a library and schools. He died 1st June 1826. See biographies by Bodenmann (1868), Spach (1866), and Butler (1882).

O'Brien, WILLIAM, born at Mallow in 1852, became a journalist, founded United Ireland, sat in parliament as a Nationalist (1883-95), was nine times prosecuted and imprisoned for two years. He retired in 1895 owing to dissensions in the party, headed the Independent Nationalists, but returned to parliament in 1900-10 for Cork, and founded the (anti-Redmondite) United Irish League. He has written several books on Irish politics, including An Olive Branch (on the 'All-Ireland' movement; 1910).

O'Brien, WILLIAM SMITH, son of Sir Edward O'Brien, born in County Clare in 1803, entered parliament in 1826, and though a Protestant supported the Catholic claims as a Whig. In October 1843 he joined O'Connell's Repeal Association. But O'Connell's aversion to physical force made a wide gulf between him and the fiery 'Young Ireland' party. After many disputes O'Brien in 1846 withdrew from the Association, and the Young Irelanders set up a Repeal League under his leadership. The sentence of John Mitchel for 'treason-felony' in 1848 hastened the projected rising, which ended ludicrously in an almost bloodless battle in a cabbage-garden at Ballinacorney. Smith O'Brien was arrested, tried, and sentenced to death; but the sentence was commuted to transportation for life. In 1854 he was released on condition of not returning to Ireland, and in 1856 he received a free pardon. He died at Bangor in North Wales, 16th June 1864. See A. M. Sullivan's New Ireland (1877), and Sir C. G. Duffy's Young Ireland (1880).

O'Bryan, WILLIAM (1778-1868), son of a Cornish yeoman, quarrelled with the Methodists, was expelled in 1810, and founded a new Methodist communion, the (Arminian) Bible Christians or Bryanites.

Ochino, BERNARDINO, Italian reformer, born at Siena in 1487, joined the Franciscans, but in 1534 changed to the Capuchins. In four years' time he was vicar-general of the order. In 1542 he was summoned to Rome to answer for evangelical tendencies, but fled to Calvin at Geneva. In 1545 he became preacher to the Italians in Augsburg. Cranmer invited him to England, where he was pastor to the Italian exiles and a prebend in Canterbury. At Mary's accession (1553) he fled to Switzerland, and ministered to the Italian exiles in Zurich for ten years. The publication of Thirty Dialogues, one of which the Calvinists said contained a defence of polygamy, led to his being banished. Ochino fled to Poland, but was driven thence and died at Schlackau in Moravia in 1564. See Life by Benrath (Eng. trans. 1876). [O-kee'no.]

Ochterlony, SIR DAVID, British general, born of Scottish descent, at Boston, Mass., 12th February 1758, went to India as a cadet, and was made lieutenant-colonel in 1803. In 1804 he defended Delhi against Holkar; but his greatest services were rendered against the Goorkhas of Nepal in 1814 and 1815. The treaty made near the Nepalese capital has remained in force down to the present time. Ochterlony was made a baronet in 1816. He also held a command in the Pindari and Mahratta wars of 1817 and 1818. He died at Meerut, 15th July 1825.

Occham, or OCCAM, WILLIAM OF, a 14th-century schoolman, was born at Ockham in Surrey between 1270 and 1280. He entered the Franciscan order, studied at Oxford and Paris, and headed the Franciscans' revolt against Pope John XXII.'s denunciation of Evangelical poverty (1322). After four months' imprisonment at Avignon he fled to Munich, and found there a defender in the Emperor Louis of Bavaria, whom he in his turn defended stoutly against the temporal pretensions of the pope. In 1342 he seems to have become general of the Franciscans. Besides insisting on the independent divine right of temporal rulers, Occham won fame as the reviver of Nominalism (the doctrine that universal ideas are merely names), for which he won a final victory over the rival Realism. He seems to have died at Munich in 1349. His views on civil government are expounded in Super Potestate Papali and his Dialogues, his philosophical views in Summa Logices (1488), commentaries on Porphyry and Aristotle, and the commentary on the Sentences of Peter the Lombard, and his theological in this last and the Tractatus de Sacramento Altaris (1516). See Riezler's Widersacher der Püspste (1874).

Ockley, SIMON (1678-1720), orientalist, in 1711 became Arabic professor at Oxford. His History of the Saracens (1708-18) was long a standard, though not based on the best authorities.

O'Connell, COUNT DANIEL (? 1745-1833), entered the French army in 1760, and was the last colonel of the Irish Brigade in the service of the kings of France, being made a count after the siege of Gibraltar (1779-82). At the Revolution he came to London, and returning to France at the Restoration, was made lieutenant-general.

O'Connell, DANIEL, 'the Liberator,' was born near Cahirciveen, County Kerry, August 6, 1775, and was a nephew of the preceding. He was sent in 1791 to the college of St Omer, and in 1792 to Douay; entered Lincoln's Inn in 1794, and was called to the Irish bar in 1798. In 1802 he married his cousin (died 1836), who bore him five sons and three daughters. He was on the Munster circuit for twenty-two years, was famous as a counsel, and had an enormous practice. He flung himself into the agitation for the rights of the Catholics, and by 1811 stood out as the virtual chief of the party. He supported the Catholic bishops (1813) in their policy in opposition to Grattan. His attacks on the 'beggarly corporation' of Dublin, then an Orange stronghold, brought him a challenge from Mr D'Este, and in the duel he shot his antagonist (1815). Only once did he allow himself to accept another challenge—from Peel in 1815; but he was arrested on his wife's information and bound over to keep the peace. In 1823 O'Connell formed on a popular basis the Catholic Association, and brought the priests into it. By the 'Catholic Rent' a large sum of money was raised for its purposes—in 1824 as much as £500 in a week. The Irish forty-shilling freeholders now began to oppose their landlords at the elections. Waterford was carried in 1826, and O'Connell himself was returned for Clare in 1828. In May 1829 he came to take his seat, but the House refused his claim. The same year the Catholic Emancipation Bill was passed, and he, returned for Clare unopposed, took his seat in 1830, being afterwards returned for Waterford.

He formed a new society for Repeal, revived as often as suppressed by others under new names. He denounced the ministry of Wellington and Peel, but in the face of a threatened prosecution (1831) he temporised, saved himself, and was made King's Counsel. In 1830 the potato crop had been very poor, and under O'Connell's advice the people declined to pay tithes, and that winter disorder was rampant everywhere. He had sat last for Kerry, when at the general election of 1832 he was returned for Dublin. At this time he nominated about half of the candidates returned, while three of his sons and two of his sons-in-law composed his 'household brigade.' Of the 105 Irish members 45—his famous 'tail'—were declared Repealers. He fought fiercely against the Coercion Act of 1833. By Feargus O'Connor, the Freeman's Journal, and his more ardent followers he was forced to bring the Repeal movement prematurely into parliament; a motion for inquiry was defeated by 523 to 38. For the next five years (1835-40) he gave the Whigs a steady support. His phrase 'a bloated buffoon,' applied to Lord Alvanley, brought a challenge which was refused, but his son Morgan went out in his stead. D'Israeli now attacked him fiercely at the Taunton election in 1835. In a speech at Dublin O'Connell retorted by calling him 'a liar' and 'heir-at-law of the blasphemous thief who died upon the cross.' D'Israeli challenged Morgan O'Connell in his father's stead, but the challenge was declined. The Carlow election of 1835 brought upon him the charge of having pocketed money to procure a man a seat, but the inquiry only brought out that he was grossly careless in managing affairs. To serve his country he had surrendered a very lucrative practice at the bar (£7000 a-year) and all hope of professional promotion; though as much as £10,000 of tribute flowed yearly into his hands, he expended it faithfully in the cause; and, in spite of the large fortune bequeathed by his uncle in 1825 and a subscription of £50,000 in 1829, died worth scarcely a thousand pounds. Mulgrave and Drummond governed Ireland so mildly that O'Connell was prepared to abandon the Repeal agitation. In 1836 he was unseated on petition for Dublin, and he was returned for Kilkenny. In 1837 the Mastership of the Rolls was offered him but declined. In August he founded his 'Precursor Society,' and in April 1840 his famous Repeal Association. Yet the agitation languished till the appearance of the Nation in 1842 brought him the aid of Dillon, Duffy, Davis, Mangan, and Daunt. In 1841 O'Connell lost his seat at Dublin, but found another at Cork, and in November he was elected Lord Mayor of Dublin. In 1843 he brought up Repeal in the Dublin corporation, and carried it by 41 to 15. The agitation now leaped into prominence; that year's rent was £48,400; monster meetings were held—at that on the Hill of Tara, 15th August 1843, the attendance was three-quarters of a million. But now the Young Ireland party began to grow impatient of the old chief's tactics, and O'Connell allowed himself to outrun his better judgment. Wellington poured 35,000 men into Ireland. A great meeting was fixed at Clontarf for Sunday, October 5, 1843, but it was proclaimed the day before, and O'Connell issued a counter-proclamation abandoning the meeting. Early in 1844 he was tried with his son and five of his chief supporters for a conspiracy to raise sedition, and after a twenty-three days' trial was found guilty, and on May 30 sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment and a fine of £2000. The House of Lords set aside the verdict on September 4; but for fourteen weeks the Tribunal lay in prison. He opposed Peel's provincial 'godless colleges,' and it soon came to an open split between him and Young Ireland (1846). Next followed the potato famine. Vexation at the breach in his party, consciousness of failure, religious austerities, and insidious disease combined to break down his herculean frame. He left Ireland for the last time in January 1847, and died at Genoa on the way to Rome, May 15, 1847. His heart was carried to Rome, and buried in St Agatha's; his body rests in the Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin. Of O'Connell's writings the most characteristic is the Letter to the Earl of Shrewsbury (1842). His Memoir of Ireland (1843) is poor and inaccurate. There is no adequate biography, though there are Lives by his son John (1846), Fagan (1847-48), Cusack (1872), O'Rourke (1875), Dunlop ('Heroes of the Nations,' 1900), and MacDonagh (1903). See W. J. O'Neill Daunt's Personal Recollections (1848); his son's Recollections (1849); Lecky's Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland, the ablest estimate of his character (new ed. 1871); Cusack's Speeches and Public Letters of the Liberator (1875); Shaw Lefevre's Peel and O'Connell (1887); the study by J. A. Hamilton in the 'Statesmen' series (1888); and W. J. Fitzpatrick's authoritative Correspondence of Daniel O'Connell (1888).

O'Connell, HUGH ROE (?1571-1602), Lord of Tyrconnel, fought against the English in Ireland, and fled to Spain in 1602, leaving his power to his brother, RORY O'CONNELL (1575-1608), who kissed the king's hand, and was made Earl of Tyrconnel (1603); but having plotted to seize Dublin Castle (1607), fled, and died at Rome.

O'Connor, FEAROUS EDWARD, Chartist, born July 18, 1794, studied at Trinity College, Dublin, was called to the Irish bar, and entered parliament for Cork Co. in 1832. Estranged from O'Connell, he devoted himself to the cause of the working-classes in England. His eloquence and enthusiasm gave him vast popularity, and his Leeds Northern Star (1837) did much to advance Chartism. Elected for Nottingham 1847, he presented the monster petition in April 1848. In 1852 he became hopelessly insane, and died August 30, 1855.

O'Connor, THOMAS POWER, born at Athlone, 5th October 1848, was educated at Queen's College, Galway, became a journalist, and edited the Sun, M.A.P., T.P.'s Weekly, and P.T.O. Elected M.P. for Galway in 1880, he has sat for Liverpool since 1885, and been a conspicuous Irish Nationalist. He has written books on Beaconsfield, the Parnell movement, Mr Gladstone's House of Commons, &c.

Octavia, sister of the emperor Augustus, distinguished for beauty and womanly virtues. On the death of her first husband, Marcellus, she consented in 40 B.C. to marry Antony, to reconcile him and her brother; but in a few years Antony forsook her for Cleopatra. She died 11 B.C.

Odilon Barrot. See BARROT.

Odo, Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent, was half-brother to William the Conqueror (q.v.), played under him a conspicuous part in English history, and died 1097.

Odoacer, or ODOVACAR, son of a captain of the Germanic Scyri in the service of the western Roman empire, took part in the revolution which (475) drove the emperor Julius Nepos from the throne, and conferred on his son Romulus the title of Augustus, scoffingly called Augustulus. With the Herulians and other Germanic mercenaries he marched against Pavia, and stormed the city (476). Romulus abdicated, and thus perished the Roman empire. Odoacer was a politic ruler; but his increasing power excited the alarm of the Byzantine emperor Zeno, who encouraged Theoderic, king of the Ostrogoths, to undertake an expedition against Italy (489). Odoacer, defeated in three great battles, shut himself up in Ravenna, which he defended for three years. Compelled by famine, he capitulated (493); a fortnight after he was assassinated by Theoderic himself. See Hodgkin's Italy and her Invaders.

O'Donnell, LEOPOLD, Marshal of Spain, born at Teneriffe, 12th January 1809, was descended from an Irish family. He supported the infant Isabella against Don Carlos, and emigrated with the queen-mother to France. In 1843 his intrigues against Espartero were successful; and as governor-general of Cuba he amassed a fortune. He returned to Spain in 1846; was made war minister by Espartero in 1854, but in 1856 supplanted him by a coup d'état. He was in three months' time succeeded by Narvaez, but in 1858 he returned to power; in 1859 he commanded in Morocco, took the Moorish camp, and was made Duke of Tetuan. In 1866 his cabinet was upset by Narvaez, and he died, 5th November 1867.

Ecclampadius, JOANNES (Latin for HAUSCHEIN), reformer, was born in 1482 at Weinsberg in Swabia. He studied at Heidelberg, became tutor to the sons of the Elector Palatine, and subsequently preacher at Basel, where Erasmus employed him. In 1516 he entered a convent at Augsburg, but under Luther's influence commenced reformer at Basel in 1522 as preacher and professor of Theology. On the Lord's Supper he gradually adopted the views of Zwingli, disputed with Luther at Marburg in 1529, and wrote treatises. He died 24th November 1531. See Lives by Herzog (1843) and Hagenbach (1859).

Ehlenschläger, ADAM GOTTLÖB, born 14th November 1779 in Copenhagen, was by 1805 foremost of Danish poets. Hakon Jarl was his first tragedy (1807; trans. by Lascelles, 1875); Correggio (trans. by Theod. Martin, 1854) dates from 1809. In 1810 he was made professor of Aesthetics in Copenhagen University. He died 20th January 1850. His fame rests principally on his twenty-four tragedies, most of them on northern subjects. An Autobiography appeared in 1830-31, his Reminiscences in 1850; there are Lives by Arentzen (1879) and Nielsen (1879). [Ehlenschläger; g hard.]

Oehler, GUSTAV FRIEDRICH (1812-72), Old Testament scholar, became in 1845 professor of Theology at Breslau, and in 1852 at Tübingen. His best-known book was the Theology of the Old Testament (1874; Eng. trans. 1875). [Eh'-ler.]

Oetinger, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH (1702-82), German theosophic theologian. See monographs by Auberlin (1848), Ehmman (1852; 2d ed. 1877), and Wächter (1885). [Eh'-ting-er.]

Offa, king of Mercia in 757-796, contended successfully against Wessex and the Welsh, and made Mercia the principal state in England.

Offenbach, JACQUES, composer of opera-bouffe, born of Jewish parents at Cologne, 21st June 1819. He came to Paris in 1833, becoming chef d'orchestre in the Théâtre Français in 1848, and manager of the Bouffes Parisiens in 1855; and died 5th October 1880. He composed a vast number of light, lively operettas, La Mariage aux Lanternes, &c., but is best known as inventor of modern opera-bouffe, represented by Orphée aux Enfers (1858), La Belle Hélène, La Barbe Bleue, La Grande Duchesse, Geneviève de Brabant, Roi Carotte, and Madame Favart. Les Contes d'Hoffmann is still popular.

Offertingen, HEINRICH VON, one of the famous minnesinger or lyric poets of Germany, who flourished between the years 1170 and 1250. At the Thuringian court at Eisenach occurred the semi-mythical Wartburgkrieg (c. 1207), a poetical contest between the chief minnesingers, at which Walther von der Vogelweide (q.v.) was victor.

Ogier le Danois, a vassal noble of Charlemagne, the theme of a Chanson de Geste, written by Raimbert of Paris before 1150.

Oglethorpe, JAMES EDWARD, born in London, 22d Dec. 1696, the son of Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, served with Prince Eugene, and in 1722-54 sat in parliament. Meanwhile he projected a colony in America for debtors from English jails and persecuted Austrian Protestants. Parliament contributed £10,000; George II. gave a grant of land, after him called Georgia; and in 1732 Oglethorpe went out with 120 persons and founded Savannah. In 1735 he took out 300 more, including the two Wesleys; and in 1738 he was back again with 600 men. War with Spain was declared in 1739; in 1740 Oglethorpe invaded Florida, and in 1742 repulsed a Spanish invasion of Georgia. In 1743 he left the colony to repel malicious charges. He was tried and acquitted after the '45 for failing as major-general to overtake Prince Charles's army. He died at Cranham Hall, Essex, 30th Jan. 1785. See Lives by Harris (1841), Wright (1867), Bruce (1890), and Harriet C. Cooper (1904).

O'Grady, STANDISH, born 20th April 1847, son of the fourth Viscount Guillemore, and educated at Charterhouse and St John's College, Oxford, has written a History of Ireland (1878-80), Bardic Literature (1879), Lost on Du Corrig (1894), Ulrick the Ready and In the Wake of King James (1896), &c.

O'Hagan, THOMAS BARON (1812-85), became Solicitor-general for Ireland in 1861 and Lord Chancellor of Ireland in 1868—the first Catholic who held the office since the days of James II.

O'Hara, THEODORE (1820-67), author of 'The Bivouac of the Dead,' was a lawyer and journalist, but served as captain in the Mexican war, in the United States cavalry, and in the civil war as a Confederate colonel. See monograph by Ranck (1875), and the Century (May 1890).

O'Higgins, DON AMBROSIO, son of the viceroy of Peru, but a native of Chili, played a conspicuous part in the Chilian revolt of 1810, and in 1817-23 was the first dictator of the new republic.

Ohm, GEORG SIMON (1787-1854), German physicist, became in 1849 professor at Munich. Ohm's Law was a result of his researches in electricity, and the measure of resistance is called the ohm.

Ohnet, GEORGES, French novelist of great popularity, born 3d April 1848. Under the general title of Les Batailles de la Vie he has published a series of novels, some of which have reached a hundredth edition. Serge Panine (1881) was followed by Le Maître de Forges (1882), La Comtesse Sarah (1883), Lise Fleuron (1884), La grande Marnière (1885), Dette de Haine (1891),

Dernier Amour (1892), Nimrod et Cie (1893), La Femme en Gris (1895), &c. [Oh-nay.]

Ohthere, a Norse sailor, made two exploring voyages for King Alfred between 880 and 900—one round the North Cape to the White Sea.

O'Keefe, JOHN (1747-1833), dramatist, was born in Dublin, settled in London in 1780, and produced a long series of comic operas, melodramas, &c. In his Recollections he specifies sixty-eight pieces of his own composition.

Oken, LORENZ (1779-1831), naturalist, became professor of Medicine at Jena in 1807, and in 1816 he issued a journal called Iris, which led to government interference and his resignation. In 1828 he obtained a professorship at Munich, and in 1832 at Zurich. His system was a transcendental nature-philosophy, fertile in ideas. He developed the theory, now exploded, that the skull is a modified vertebra. See works by Ecker (1880) and Gutler (1884).

Olaf, the Saint, king of Norway, was born in 995, and, having made his name a terror on the coasts of Normandy and England, succeeded, in 1015, in securing the throne of Norway. The severity with which he sought to exterminate paganism alienated his subjects, who adhered to Canute of Denmark. Olaf fled to his brother-in-law, Jaroslav of Russia, who gave him 4000 men, with whom, in 1030, he gave Canute battle at Stiklestad, where Olaf was defeated and slain. His body, laid in the cathedral of Trondhjem, wrought many miracles, and ere long Olaf was proclaimed patron saint of Norway. See Passio et Miracula Beati Olavi, edited by Metcalfe (1881).—An earlier Olaf was leader of the Ostmen and king of Dublin, and died in 981.

Olaus. For Olaus Magnus, see MAGNUS; for Olaus Petri, see PETRI.

Oibers, HEINRICH WILHELM MATTHÄUS (1758-1840), physician and astronomer, practised medicine at Bremen. He calculated the orbit of the comet of 1779; discovered the minor planets Pallas (1802) and Vesta (1807); in 1781 rediscovered the planet Uranus; discovered five comets; and invented a method for calculating the velocity of falling stars. He died 2d March 1840. See the Life prefixed to his works by Schilling (3 vols. 1894-97).

Olcott, COLONEL HENRY STEEL (c. 1830-1907), a notable theosophist, was by 1856 distinguished in the United States as an agriculturist, fought in the Civil War, and held posts in the accounts department of the army and navy. After the war he devoted himself to theosophy.

Oldcastle, SIR JOHN, the 'good Lord Cobham,' was born about 1378, and is first heard of as serving Henry IV. on the Welsh marches. He acquired the title of Lord Cobham by marrying the heiress, and presented a remonstrance to the Commons on the corruptions of the church. He got Wycliffe's works transcribed and distributed, and paid preachers to propagate his views. In 1411 he commanded an English army in France, and forced the Duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris; but in 1413, after the accession of Henry V., he was examined, and condemned as a heretic. He escaped from the Tower into Wales; a Lollard conspiracy in his favour was stamped out; and after four years' hiding he was captured, brought to London, and was 'hanged and burnt hanging,' 14th December 1417. Halliwell-Phillipps first proved in 1841 that Shakespeare's Sir John Falstaff was based on a popular tradition of dislike for the heretic Oldcastle—a view endorsed in Gairdner and Spedding's Studies (1881). Though he stood high in the favour of Prince Hal, there is no historical ground for representing him as his 'boon companion.'

Oldenbarneveldt. See BARNEVELDT.

Oldenburg, HENRY (1626-78), under the Commonwealth was consul in London for his native city, Bremen. He was an original member of the Royal Society, and, as assistant-secretary, edited its Transactions 1664-77, maintaining an extensive correspondence with Spinoza, Leibnitz, Bayle, &c. Milton addressed him in the Epistolæ Familiæres.

Oldfield, ANNE (1683-1730), actress, was born in London, made her début in 1700, stood high in public favour by 1705, and played till the last year of her life. See Edward Robins, The Palmy Days of Nance Oldfield (1898).

Oldham, JOHN (1653-83), poet, was especially distinguished as a satirist and writer of odes.

Oldmixon, JOHN (1673-1742), author of dull, partisan histories of England, Scotland, Ireland, and America, and of works on logic and rhetoric. He is one of the heroes of Pope's Dunciad.

Old Mortality. See PATERSON (ROBERT).

Oldys, WILLIAM (1696-1761), bibliographer, natural son of Dr Oldys, Chancellor of Lincoln. For about ten years Oldys was librarian to the Earl of Oxford, whose valuable collection of books and MSS. he arranged and catalogued, and by the Duke of Norfolk he was appointed Norroy King-of-arms. His chief works are a Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, prefixed to Raleigh's History of the World (1736); The British Librarian (1737); The Harleian Miscellany (1753), besides many miscellaneous literary and bibliographical articles.

Ole Bull. See BULL.

Olga, St, a Russian saint, wife of the Duke of Kieff, who governed during the minority of her son, till 955. Thereafter she was baptised at Constantinople, and returning to Russia, laboured for the new creed until her death in 968.

Oliphant, LAURENCE, born at Capetown in 1829, son of the Attorney-general there (afterwards Chief-justice in Ceylon), was admitted to the Scottish bar, and later to the English bar. His first work, A Journey to Khatmandu (1852), was followed by The Russian Shores of the Black Sea (1853). He next became private secretary to the Earl of Elgin, then Governor-general of Canada, whom later he accompanied to China, thus finding material for his books Minnesota and the Far West (1855) and The Earl of Elgin's Mission to China (1860). In 1861, while acting as Chargé d'Affaires in Japan, he was severely wounded by assassins, and from 1865 to 1868 he sat for the Stirling burghs. His Piccadilly (1870) was a book of exceptional promise, bright with wit and delicate irony. He joined the religious community of T. L. Harris (q.v.) in the United States, and finally settled at Haifa in Palestine. He died at Twickenham, 23d December 1888. His later mystical views he published in Sympneumata (1886) and Scientific Religion (1888), as well as in his novel Masoulam (1886); they had been indicated in his earlier novel, Altiora Peto (1883). Other books were The Transcaucasian Campaign under Omar Pasha (1856), Patriots and Filibusters (1860), The Land of Gilead (1881), Traits and Travesties (1882), The Land of Khemi (1882), Haifa (1887), and Episodes in a Life of Adventure (1887). See Life by Mrs Oliphant.

Oliphant, MRS MARGARET (née WILSON), novelist, born in 1828 at Wallyford near Musselburgh.

In 1849 her Passages in the Life of Mrs Margaret Mailland instantly won approval. This was followed by Caleb Field (1850), Merkland (1850), Adam Graeme (1852), Katie Stewart (1852), Harry Muir (1853), Magdalen Hepburn (1854), The Quiet Heart (1854), Lilliesleaf (1855), Zaidee (1855). It was by the Chronicles of Carlingford (first in Blackwood's, 1861-64) that her reputation as a novelist was secured. In the first of them, The Doctor's Family, little Netty is an original creation; the next, Salem Chapel, indicates a wider and more vigorous grasp. Mrs Oliphant settled at Windsor. Other works are Agnes (1865), Madonna Mary (1866), The Minister's Wife (1869), Ombra (1872), A Rose in June (1874), Phoebe Junior (1876), Within the Precincts (1879), In Trust (1882), The Ladies Lindores (1883), The Wizard's Son (1884), Madam (1885), and Kirsteen (1890). Contributions to general literature have been Life of Edward Irving (1862); Historical Sketches of the Reign of George II. (1869); St Francis of Assisi (1871); Montalembert (1872); Makers of Florence (1876); Dress (1878); Literary History of England, 1790-1825 (1882); A Little Pilgrim: in the Unseen (1882); Makers of Venice (1888); Dante and Cervantes in the 'Foreign Classics' series (edited by her); Memoir of Tulloch (1888); Royal Edinburgh (1890); Life of Laurence Oliphant (1891); Makers of Rome (1894); Reign of Queen Anne (1895); Jeanne d'Arc (1896); Child's History of Scotland (1896); and William Blackwood & Sons (1897). Mrs Oliphant, who received a pension in 1868, died at Wimbledon, 25th June 1897.

Olivarez, GASPARO DE GUZMAN, COUNT OF, Duke of San Lucar, was born, January 6, 1587, at Rome, where his father was ambassador. He became the friend and favourite of Philip IV. of Spain, and his prime-minister for twenty-two years. He constantly wrung money from the country to carry on wars against Portugal, France, and the Netherlands. His attempts to rob the people of their privileges provoked insurrections, and roused the Portuguese to shake off the Spanish yoke in 1640, and the king was obliged to dismiss him in 1643. He died 22d July 1645. See a Life by De la Rocca (1673).

Olive, PRINCESS, the title assumed in 1820 by an impudent pretender, Mrs Olivia Serres, who claimed to have been born at Warwick, 3d April 1772, the granddaughter of the Rev. Dr Wilmot, her mother being his only daughter, her father the Duke of Cumberland, youngest brother of George III. In 1791 she had married John Thomas Serres (1759-1825), marine painter, but separated from him in 1804; and between 1805 and 1819 she had published ten trashy volumes of poetry and fiction. She died in poverty within the 'rules' of the King's Bench, 21st November 1834. Lavinia (b. 1797), the elder of two daughters by her husband, married in 1822 Anthony Thomas Ryves, adopted son of William Combe ('Dr Syntax'), also only to separate. She died 7th December 1871, five years after a jury had decided that Olive Serres was not the legitimate daughter of the Duke of Cumberland. See Life of John Thomas Serres (1826), E. Walford in Gentleman's Magazine for 1873, and vol. li. of Dict. Nat. Biog. (1897).

Ollivier, OLIVIER ÉMILE, born at Marseilles, 2d July 1825, established a reputation at the Parisian bar, and after 1864 acquired influence as a member of the Legislative Assembly. In 1865 the viceroy of Egypt appointed him to a judicial office. In January 1870 Napoleon III. charged him to form a constitutional ministry. But 'with a light heart' he rushed his country into war with Germany, himself to be overthrown on 9th August. He withdrew to Italy for a time. He wrote books on Lamartine (1874) and Thiers (1879), L'Église et l'État (1879), Principes et Conduite (1875), Droit Ecclésiastique Français (1885), and L'Empire Libéral, a defence of his policy (15 vols. 1894-1911). [Ol-leev-yay'.]

Olney, RICHARD, American statesman, was born at Oxford, Mass., March 4, 1843. He was educated at Harvard, called to the bar, and rose rapidly in his profession. In 1893 he became Attorney-general under Cleveland, in June 1895 Secretary of State, and within six months brought Great Britain and the United States to the verge of war by his interference, in virtue of the Monroe Doctrine, in the disputed boundary question between British Guiana and Venezuela. He signed, in 1896, the Arbitration Treaty with Britain, which was mutilated in the Senate in 1897.

Olshausen, HERMANN (1796-1839), German theologian, became professor at Berlin (1821), Königsberg (1827), and Erlangen (1834). His principal work was a commentary on the New Testament, completed by Ehrhard and Wiesinger (1830 et seq.; Eng. trans. 1847-49; rev. ed. New York, 1856-58). [Olsh-how'zen.]

Olympias, wife of Philip of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of the king of Epirus. When Philip left her and married Cleopatra, niece of Attalus, she instigated his assassination, and subsequently (337 B.C.) brought about the murder of Cleopatra and her daughter. After Alexander's death she secured the death of Alexander's brother and successor. Her cruelties having alienated the people, Cassander besieged her in Pydna, and on its surrender put her to death, 316 B.C.

Olympiodorus, a 6th-century Alexandrian Neoplatonist, left a Life of Plato, with commentaries on several of his dialogues.—Another was a 5th-century Peripatetic, also at Alexandria.—A third, from Thebes in Egypt, wrote in Greek a history of the western empire.

O'Mahony, DANIEL (died 1714), of ancient Irish stock, went to France in 1692, held commands under Villeroi and Vendôme, and did prodigies with his Irish dragoons at Almanza in the Spanish service.

O'Mahony, JOHN (1816-77), Fenian head-centre, was born at Kilbeheny, co. Limerick, studied at Trinity College, Dublin, translated Keating's History of Ireland, joined in 1848 in Smith O'Brien's rebellion, and after Stephens, played the most prominent part in organising Fenianism.

Omar Khayyam, the astronomer-poet of Persia, was born at Nishapur about 1017, and is said to have died there in 1123 or 1124. Summoned to Merv by the sultan, he reformed the Moslem calendar. Of his Arabic mathematical treatises, one on algebra was edited and translated by Woeppke (1851); and it was as a mathematician that he was known to the western world, until in 1859 Edward FitzGerald published his 'translation' of seventy-five of his Rubā'iyāt or quatrains. Omar was the poet of Agnosticism, though some in his poetry see nothing save the wine-cup and roses, and others read into it that Sufi mysticism with which it was largely adulterated long after Omar's death. He was a true poet; yet FitzGerald's translation is far finer than the original. There are editions of the Rubā'iyāt by Nicolas (464 quatrains, 1867), Sadik Ali (nearly 800 quatrains; Lucknow, 1878), Whinfield (253 quatrains, 1883), who also translated them into very literal English verse (1882), Ssobrievsky (St Pet. 1888), and Dole (1898). Other English translations are by Garner (Milwaukee, 1888), J. H. McCarthy (prose, 1889), and E. Heron Allen (158 quatrains, prose, 1898).

Omar Pasha was born at Plasky in Croatia 24th Nov. 1806, his real name being Michael Latas, and served in the Austrian army. In 1828 he deserted, fled to Bosnia, and, embracing Mohammedanism, became writing-master to Abdul-Medjid, on whose accession to the Ottoman throne in 1839 Omar Pasha was made colonel, and in 1842 governor of Lebanon. In 1843-47 he suppressed insurrections in Albania, Bosnia, and Kurdistan. On the invasion of the Danubian Principalities by the Russians in 1853 Omar Pasha, with an army of 60,000 men, crossed the Danube in presence of the enemy, intrenched himself, and defeated the Russians in two battles. In February 1855 he arrived in the Crimea, and repulsed 40,000 Russians at Eupatoria. He was sent too late to relieve Kars. In 1861 he again pacified Bosnia and Herzegovina, and overran Montenegro in 1862. He died 18th April 1871.

O'Meara, BARRY EDWARD, was born in Ireland in 1786. He first served as surgeon in the army, but was dismissed the service in 1803 for his share in a duel. Later he entered the naval service, and was on board the Bellerophon when Napoleon came on board, and accompanied him as his private physician to St Helena. Reprimanded for irregularities by the governor, he took part with Napoleon in his squabbles with Sir Hudson Lowe, and was compelled to resign his post in 1818. On his return to England he asserted in a letter to the Admiralty that Sir Hudson Lowe had dark designs against his captive's life, and was dismissed the service. His Napoleon in Exile (1822) made a great sensation, and is still valuable if read with caution. He died in London, 3d June 1836.

Omnium, JACOB. See HIGGINS.

O'Neill, ELIZA (Lady Becher) (1791-1872), daughter of a stage-manager at Drogheda, became a very distinguished actress, appearing at Covent Garden in 1814, and retired from the stage in 1819, on marrying William Wrixon Becher, M.P. for Mallow and subsequently a baronet.

O'Neill, HUGH, Earl of Tyrone, and 'arch-rebel,' was the son of an illegitimate son of Con O'Neill (?1484-?1559), a warlike Irish chieftain who was made Earl of Tyrone on his submission to Henry VIII. in 1542. His grandson, Hugh (born about 1540), was invested with the title and estates in 1587, but soon plunged into intrigues with the Irish rebels and the Spaniards against Elizabeth, as 'the O'Neill' spread insurrection in 1597 all over Ulster, Connaught, and Leinster, and in spite of Spanish support was defeated by Mountjoy at Kinsale, and badly wounded. He made submission, but intrigued with Spain against James I., and in 1607 fled, dying at Rome in 1616.—His nephew, OWEN ROE O'NEILL (?1590-1649), won a distinguished place in the Spanish military service, came to Ireland in 1642, fought for a time with great success against Scots and English for an independent Ireland, but died suddenly when about to measure himself against Cromwell. See a monograph by J. F. Taylor (1896).—A kinsman, SIR PHELIM O'NEILL, was the leader of the insurrection, not so much against the English government as against the English and Scots settlers in Ulster, in which occurred the massacre of 1641.—SHANE O'NEILL (?1530-1567), eldest legitimate son of Con O'Neill, was second Earl of Tyrone, nominally acknowledged Elizabeth, but was always at war with the Scots and the O'Donnells.

Onkelos, the reputed author of an Aramaic Targum of the Pentateuch, produced by the scholars of R. Akiba between 150 and 200 A.D. in Palestine. 'Onkelos' is a corruption of Akylas (Greek for Aquila), the name of the actual translator of the Old Testament into Greek, c. 130 A.D.

Onomacritus, a religious poet at Athens under the Pisistratide, who influenced the development of the Orphic mysteries and collected the oracles, but was banished for falsifying them. He helped to arrange the Homeric poems.

Onslow, ARTHUR (1691-1768), son of a commissioner of Excise, was trained a barrister, entered parliament in 1720, and for thirty-three years was a dignified and blameless Speaker of the House of Commons.

Oosterzee, JAN JAKOB VAN (1817-82), Dutch theologian, in 1862 became professor at Utrecht, and leader of the Evangelical school. Among his works are a Life of Christ, a Christology, a work on John's Gospel, commentaries on Luke and the Pastoral Epistles in Lange's Commentary; also a Theology of the New Testament (1867; Eng. trans. 1870, 4th ed. 1882); Christian Dogmatics (1872); trans. 1874); Moses (trans. 1876); Practical Theology (trans. 1878). Opie, JOHN, R.A., was born, a carpenter's son, at St Agnes near Truro, in May 1761. His attempts at portrait-painting interested Dr Wolcot ('Peter Pindar'), by whom in 1780 he was taken to London to become the 'Cornish Wonder.' The ebb in the tide of good-fortune only brought out Opie's manly independence, and he tried 'high art,' large historical or scriptural subjects. He also painted works in illustration of Boydell's Shakespeare, Bowyer's English History, Macklin's Poets and Biblical Gallery, &c. His 'Murder of James I. of Scotland,' 'The Slaughter of Rizzio,' 'Jephtha's Vow,' 'Presentation in the Temple,' 'Arthur and Hubert,' 'Belisarius,' and 'Juliet in the Garden' are his most noted works. Successively A.R.A. and R.A., he wrote a Life of Reynolds and a discourse on Art, and lectured on Art at the Royal Institution. He obtained a divorce from his first wife; his second wife was the novelist. He died April 9, 1807. See a book by Miss Earland (1912). AMELIA OPIE, the daughter of a Norwich physician, Dr Alderson, was born 12th November 1769, and while very young wrote songs and tragedies. She was married to Opie in 1798. In 1801 her first novel, Father and Daughter, appeared; next year a volume of poems. Adeline Mowbray and Simple Tales were her next works. On her husband's death she published his lectures, with a memoir. She wrote also Temper, Tales of Real Life, Valentine's Eve, Tales of the Heart, and Madeleine. Mrs Opie became a Quaker in 1825, and afterwards published Illustrations in Lying, Detraction Displayed, and articles in periodicals, but no more novels. She died 2d December 1853. See Memoirs by Miss Brightwell (1854), and Lady Richmond Ritchie's Book of Sibyls (1853).

Opitz, MARTIN, German poet, born on 23d December 1597, at Bunzlau in Silesia. He earned an inflated reputation by toadying to the German princes. In 1620 he fled to Holland to escape war and the plague; but of the plague he died in Danzig, 20th August 1639. His poems have no imagination and little feeling, and are cold, formal, didactic, pedantic. His works include translations from classic authors (Sophocles and Seneca), the Dutchmen Heinsius and Grotius, and from the Bible. See books by Palm (1862), Borinski (1883), and Berghöffer (1888).

Oppert, JULIUS, orientalist, was born of Jewish parents at Hamburg, 9th July 1825, studied at Heidelberg and Bonn, settled in France in 1847, in 1857 became professor of Sanskrit, and wrote on Assyria, Babylon, and cuneiform inscriptions. He died in August 1905.

Orange, PRINCES OF. See WILLIAM III., WILLIAM THE SILENT.

Orcagna (c. 1316-68), a nickname, corrupted from Arcagnuolo, 'Archangel,' of Andrea di Cione, who, the son of a Florentine silversmith, distinguished himself as sculptor, painter, architect, and poet. The tabernacle in Or San Michele at Florence is a triumph in sculpture. His greatest paintings are frescoes and an altarpiece in Santa Maria Novella, and a 'Coronation of the Virgin' in the National Gallery. [Or-kan'ya.]

Orchardson, SIR WILLIAM QUILLER (knighted 1907), born in 1835 in Edinburgh, came to London in 1862, and was elected A.R.A. in 1868, R.A. in 1877. Among his works are 'The Challenge' (1865), 'The Duke's Antechamber' (1869), 'The Protector' (1871), 'The Bill of Sale' (1875), 'Queen of the Swords' (1877), 'Hard Hit' (1879), 'On board H.M.S. Bellerophon' (1880), 'Mariage de Convenience' (1884), 'After' (1886), 'Salon of Madame Récamier' (1885), 'The First Cloud' (1887), 'Her Mother's Voice' (1888), 'The Young Duke' (1889), and 'Reflections' (1896). He died 14th April 1910.

Ordericus Vitalis (1075-1143), medieval historian, born, the son of a French priest and an English wife, at Achem near Shrewsbury, and educated in the Norman abbey of St Evroul, where he spent his life, although he visited England to collect historical materials for his Historia Ecclesiastica (1123-41), on the history of Normandy and England, preceded by a brief chronicle of events from the birth of Christ down to his own time—a singular mixture of important history and trivial gossip. The first edition was by Duchesne (1619); the best is by Le Prevost for the French Historical Society (1838-55). It was translated by T. Forester (1853-56). See Dean Church's St Anselm (1870) and Freeman's Norman Conquest.

O'Reilly, JOHN BOYLE (1844-90), the son of a schoolmaster near Drogheda, was bred a compositor, but becoming a hussar in 1863, was in 1866 sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude for spreading Fenianism in the army. He escaped in 1867 from Western Australia, and settled as a journalist in Boston, U.S., where he became known as an author of songs, novels (Moodyne, a tale of convict life, 1880), &c. [O'Ri'ey.]

O'Rell, MAX. See BLOUET.

Orelli, KASPAR VON (1787-1849), scholar, born and died at Zurich. In 1807 he became a Reformed preacher at Bergamo; in 1813 teacher at Coire; in 1819 professor at Zurich. He edited Horace (1837-38), Tacitus (1846-47), and Cicero (1826-31), and published Latin inscriptions.

Orelli, KONRAD VON, theologian, born at Zurich, 25th January 1846. In 1869 he became preacher at Zurich, professor extra-ordinary of Theology at Basel in 1873, and professor there in 1881. Among his writings are a book on the Kingdom of God (1832; trans. 1885) and commentaries on Isaiah (1887; trans. 1889), Jeremiah (1887), Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets (1888).

Orfila, MATHIEU JOSEPH BONAVENTURE, founder of toxicology, born at Mahon in Minorca, 24th April 1787, studied at Valencia, Barcelona, and

Paris. In 1811 he lectured on chemistry, botany, and anatomy. In 1813 appeared his celebrated Traité de Toxicologie Générale. In 1819 he became professor of Medical Jurisprudence, and in 1823 of Chemistry. He died March 12, 1853. Other works were on medical chemistry (1817) and on forensic medicine (1825). [Or'fee-la.]

Orbasius (326-403 A.D.), Greek medical author, and physician to Julian the Apostate, was born at Pergamus or Sardis.

Origen, the most learned and original of the early church fathers, was born, probably at Alexandria, in 185, and was the son of the Christian martyr Leonidas. He studied in the catechetical school of Clement, and soon acted as master. He made a thorough study of Plato, the later Platonists and Pythagoreans, and the Stoics, under the Neoplatonist Ammonius Saccas. At Alexandria he taught for twenty-eight years (204-232), composed the chief of his dogmatic treatises, and commenced his great works of textual and exegetical criticism. During his visit to Palestine in 216 the bishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea employed him to lecture in the churches, and in 230 they consecrated him presbyter without referring to his own bishop. An Alexandrian synod deprived him of the office of presbyter. The churches of Palestine, Phœnicia, Arabia, and Achaëa declined to concur in this sentence; and Origen, settling at Caesarea in Palestine, founded a school of literature, philosophy, and theology. In the last twenty years of his life he made many journeys. In the Decian persecution at Tyre he was cruelly tortured, and there he died in 254. His exegetical writings extended over nearly the whole of the Old and New Testaments, and included Scholia, Homilies, and Commentaries. Of the Homilies only a small part has been preserved in the original, much, however, in the Latin translations by Rufinus and Jerome; but the translators tampered with them. Of the Commentaries a number of books on Matthew and John are extant in Greek. His gigantic Hexapla, the foundation of the textual criticism of the Scriptures, is mostly lost. His Eight Books against Celsus, preserved entire in Greek, constitute the greatest of early Christian apologies. The speculative theology of the Peri Archon is extant mostly in the garbled translation of Rufinus. Two books on The Resurrection and ten books of Stromata are lost. The eclectic philosophy of Origen bears a Neoplatonist and Stoical stamp. The idea of the proceeding of all spirits from God, their fall, redemption, and return to God, is the key to the development of the world, at the centre of which is the incarnation of the Logos. All scripture admits of a threefold interpretation—literal, psychical or ethical, and pneumatic or allegorical. His fanciful interpretation and profound views both led to views which by enemies were denounced as heretical. The best editions are the Benedictine one by De la Rue (1733-59) and that by Lommatzsch (25 vols. 1831-48). See besides the church histories and Harnack's Dogmengeschichte, Farrar's Lives of the Fathers (1889), German works on Origen by Thomasius (1837) and Redepenning (1846), and French works by Joly (1860), Freppel (1868), and Denis (1884).

Orleans, a ducal title thrice conferred by French kings on brothers—in 1392 by Charles VI., in 1626 by Louis XIII., and in 1660 by Louis XIV. on his brother Philippe (1640-1701). His son was the regent, Philippe (1674-1723), and his great-grandson was 'Egalité' (see below);

Egalité's son was King Louis Philippe (q.v.). His eldest son (1810-42) took the title, but it was not borne by that duke's son, the Comte de Paris, who settled in England, in 1883 became head of the Bourbon house of France, and died in 1894. His son (see below) resumed the old ducal title. (Louis Philippe's younger sons were the Dukes of Annalle, Nenours, Montpensier, and the Prince de Joinville.)

CHARLES, DUKE OF ORLEANS (1391-1465), married in 1406 his cousin Isabella, widow of Richard II. of England. In alliance with the infamous Bernard d'Armagnac, he did his best to avenge on the Duke of Burgundy his father's murder. He commanded at Agincourt (October 1415), and was taken prisoner and carried to England, where he spent over a quarter of a century, hunting, hawking, and composing ballades and rondels, conventional, musical, and graceful. He was ransomed in 1440, and during the last third of his life he maintained a kind of literary court at Blois. His son became Louis XII. of France. See Beaufl's Étude (1861), and R. L. Stevenson, in Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882).

JEAN BAPTISTE GASTON, DUKE OF ORLEANS (1608-60), third son of Henry IV., troubled France with bloody but fruitless intrigues against Richelieu. He was lieutenant-general of the kingdom during the minority of Louis XIV., was at the head of the Fronde, but soon made terms with Mazarin. See his Mémoires (1683).

PHILIPPE, DUKE OF ORLEANS, regent of France during the minority of Louis XV., son of the first Duke Philippe, and grandson of Louis XIII., was born 4th August 1674. He possessed excellent talents, but was early demoralised. The king compelled him to marry his daughter by Madame de Montespan. The young prince showed courage at Steenkirk and Neerwinden, and commanded with success in Italy and Spain. For some years he lived in exile from the court, spending his time by turns in profligacy, the fine arts, and chemistry. Louis XIV. at his death appointed (1715) the Duke of Orleans sole regent. He was popular, but his adoption of Law's schemes led to disaster. His alliance with England and Holland (1717) was joined by the emperor, and overthrew Auberoni. He expelled the Pretender from France, debarred the parliament of Paris from meddling with political affairs, and to appease the Jesuits sacrificed the Jansenists. Enfeebled by his debaucheries, he died 2d December 1723. See works by Piossens (1749) and Capelleu (1838).

LOUIS-PHILIPPE JOSEPH, the famous Egalité, was born April 13, 1747, and succeeded to the title on his father's death in 1785. He early fell into debauchery, and was looked upon coldly at court, especially after the accession of Louis XVI. (1774). He visited London frequently, became an intimate friend of the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., infected young France with Anglomania in the form of horse-racing and hard drinking, and made himself popular by profuse charity. In 1787 he showed his liberalism boldly against the king, and was sent by a lettre-de-châchet to his château of Villers-Cotterets. As the States-general drew near he lavished his wealth in disseminating throughout France books and papers by Sieyès and other liberals. In 1788 he promulgated his Délibérations, written by Laclos, to the effect that the tiers état was the nation, and in June 1789 he led the forty-seven nobles who seceded from their own order to join it. He dreamed of becoming constitutional king of France, or at least regent. He gradually lost influence, felt hopeless of the Revolution, and thought of going to America. In 1792, all hereditary titles being swept away, he adopted the name of Philippe Egalité, was twentieth deputy for Paris to the Convention, and voted for the death of the king. His eldest son, afterwards King Louis-Philippe, rode with Dumouriez, his commander, into the Austrian camp. Egalité was at once arrested, with all the Bourbons still in France, and, after six months' duration, was found guilty of conspiracy and guillotined, 6th November 1793. See works by Baschet and by Tournois (1840-43), and Mrs Elliot's Journal (1859).

LOUIS PHILIPPE ROBERT, eldest son of the Comte de Paris, born 6th Feb. 1869, went to France in 1890 on attaining his majority, and was imprisoned for contravening the law banishing the heirs of families that have reigned. In 1896 he married an Austrian princess.—PRINCE HENRI OF ORLEANS (1867-1901), who travelled (his Tonkin and Siam was translated in 1893), and who fought the duel with the Count of Turin in August 1897, was a son of the Duc de Chartres.

Orloff, a Russian family that rose to eminence, when one of its members, Gregory (1734-83), succeeded Poniatowski as the favourite of Catharine II. It was he who planned the murder of Peter III., and his brother Alexis (1737-1809) who committed the deed (1762). The legitimate line of Orloff became extinct; but Feodor, a brother of Gregory and Alexis, left four illegitimate sons, one of whom, Alexis (1787-1861), signalled himself during the French wars and in Turkey, represented Russia at the London conference of 1832, in 1844 was at the head of the secret police, stood high in favour with the Emperor Nicholas, in 1856 was Russian representative at the congress of Paris, and was made president of the grand council of the empire.

Orm, or ORMIN, versifier and spelling-reformer, born probably in Lincolnshire, was an Augustinian monk about 1200 A.D., author of the 'Ormulum' named after him, a series of homilies in verse on the gospel history, first printed by White in 1852 (new ed. by Holt, 1878).

Ormerod, ELEANOR A., entomologist, daughter of George Ormerod (1785-1873), the historian of Cheshire, in 1882-92 was consulting entomologist to the Royal Agricultural Society. Her Manual of Injurious Insects (1881), Guide to Methods of Insect Life (1884), and Agricultural Entomology (2d. ed. 1892) are well known. Made LL.D., Edinburgh, in 1900, she died in 1901.

Ormonde, JAMES BUTLER, DUKE OF, of the ancient Anglo-Irish family of Butler, was born in London in 1610, and in 1632 succeeded to the earldom and estates of Ormonde. During the Strafford administration he greatly distinguished himself, and in the rebellion of 1640 was appointed to the chief command of the army; but when, in 1643, he concluded an armistice, his policy was condemned by both great parties. In the last crisis of the king's fortunes he retired to France, returned again to Ireland with the all but desperate design of restoring the royal authority, but after a gallant struggle was compelled (1650) to return to France. At the Restoration he was rewarded by the ducal title of Ormonde. He twice again returned to the government of Ireland. In 1679 an attempt was made on his life by the notorious Colonel Blood, supposed to have been instigated by the Duke of Buckingham. He escaped uninjured, and lived until 1688. See Lives by Carte (1736) and Lady Burghclere (1912). —JAMES BUTLER, second Duke of Ormonde, and grandson of the foregoing, was born in Dublin in 1665. As Earl of Ossory he served in the army against Monmouth. After his accession to the dukedom in 1688, he took his share in the Revolution conflict. He headed William's life-guards at the battle of the Boyne. In 1702 he commanded the troops in Rooke's expedition against Cadiz; in 1703 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1711 commander-in-chief against France and Spain. Under George I. he fell into disgrace, and was impeached in 1715 of high-treason, his estates being attainted; he retired to France, spent years in the intrigues of the Pretender, and died abroad in 1746. Letters written by him in organising the attempt by Spain to invade England and Scotland in 1719 were in 1890 brought to light, and in 1896 published by the Scottish History Society.

Orosius, PAULUS, a Spanish presbyter and historian, visited Augustine in 415, and went to study under Jerome at Bethlehem. His Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri vii. (ed. by Zangemeister, Vien, 1882) begins with the Creation and goes down to 417 A.D. An uncritical compilation, it was a favourite text-book during the Middle Ages, and was translated into Anglo-Saxon by King Alfred (ed. by Bosworth, 1851; and Sweet, 1883). An English translation (1773) was reprinted in 1853.

O'Rourke, SIR BRIAN-NA-MURTHA, Irish chieftain in Galway, Sligo, and the west of Ulster, was in frequent collision with the English authorities, sheltered the Spaniards of the Armada wrecked on Irish coasts, and in 1591 went to Scotland to seek support from James I., who handed him over to the English. He was tried and executed at Tyburn in 1591.

Ortery. See BOYLE (CHARLES).

Orsini, FELICE, conspirator, born in December 1819, at Meldola, in the States of the Church, of an ancient and distinguished family, was, as the son of a conspirator, early initiated into secret societies, and in 1844 was sentenced at Rome to the galleys, amnestied, and again imprisoned for political plots. In 1848 he was elected to the Roman Constituent Assembly. He took part in the defence of Rome and Venice, agitated in Genoa and Modena, and in 1853 was shipped by the Sardinian government to England, where he formed close relations with Mazzini. Next year he was at Parma, Milan, Trieste, Vienna, until arrested and confined at Mantua. In 1856 he escaped to England, where he supported himself by public lecturing, and wrote Austrian Dungeons in Italy (1856). In 1857 he went to Paris to assassinate Napoleon III. as an obstacle to revolution in Italy. Orsini and three associates threw, from a house near the Opera, three bombs under the carriage containing the emperor and empress (14th January 1858); 10 persons were killed, 156 wounded, but Napoleon and the empress remained unhurt. The assassins were arrested and tried; Orsini and another were sentenced to capital punishment, and were guillotined 13th March. See his Memoirs, written by himself (Eng. trans. 1857), his Letters (1861), and a work by Montazio (1862). [Or-see'nee.]

Ortelius, the Latinised name of the geographer Abraham Ortel, born of German parents in 1527, at Antwerp, where he died in 1598. His Theatrum orbis Terrarum (1570) was the first great atlas.

Orton, ARTHUR. See TICHBORNE.

Osborn, SHERARD, born at Madras, 25th April 1822, entered the navy in 1837. He took part in the Chinese war of 1841-42, commanded vessels in two expeditions (1849 and 1852-55) in search of Sir John Franklin, was head of the British squadron in the Sea of Azov during the Crimean war, and took a leading share in the Chinese war of 1857-59. He helped to lay a cable between Great Britain and Australia, was made rear-admiral in 1873, and helped to fit out the Arctic expedition of Nares and Markham (1875). He died 6th May 1875. He published his Arctic Journal (1852), Journals of M'Clure (1856), and Fate of Sir John Franklin (1860).

Osborne. See LEEDS, BERNAL O., TEMPLE.

Osbourne, LLOYD, step-son and collaborator of R. L. Stevenson (q.v.), was born in San Francisco in 1868, was U.S. vice-consul in Samoa, and has written Love the Fiddler, stories, and dramas.

Oscar II., king of Sweden, a great-grandson of Charles XIV. (q.v.), was born 21st January 1829, and succeeded Charles XV. in 1872. He translated Faust, wrote a Life of Charles XII. and poems, and in 1905 regretfully agreed to the secession of Norway. He died in December 1907.

O'Shaughnessy, ARTHUR (1844-81), born in London, in 1861 entered the British Museum (the natural history department in 1863), in 1873 married a daughter of Dr Westland Marston, and wrote Epic of Women (1870), Lays of France (1872), Music and Moonlight (1874), and Songs of a Worker (1881)—diffuse, but revealing a mastery of lyrical forms. See Life by Louise C. Moulton (1894).

Osiander (Græcised form of Helligmann), ANDREAS (1498-1552), became a preacher at Nuremberg (1522), persuaded that city to declare for Luther, and was conspicuous as a Lutheran leader. Deprived for refusing to agree to the Augsburg Interim (1548), he was made professor of Theology at Königsberg, but soon became entangled in bitter theological strife, disputing the imputation of Christ's righteousness in favour of an infusion doctrine. See Lives by Wilken (1844), Möller (1870), and Hase (1879).

Osman Digna, born at Suakim about 1836 of mixed Turkish and Hadendawa descent, a slave-dealer and from 1881 a Mahdist leader on the Red Sea coast and the Abyssinian frontier, was defeated and taken at Tokar (1900). See Wingate's Mahdism and the Egyptian Sâdan (1889).

Osman Pasha (1837-1900), Turkish general, born at Amasia or at Tokat, held Plevna against the Russians in 1877. See work by Levaux (1891).

Osmund, ST., coming from Normandy with the Conqueror, became chancellor (1072) and Bishop of Salisbury (1078). He established the 'Use of Sarum,' and died in 1099.

Ossian, heroic poet of the Gael, and son of the 3d-century hero Fingal or Fionn MacCumhail. His poems James Macpherson (q.v.) professed to have collected and translated. See Ossian, with introduction by W. Sharp (1897).

Os'soli. See FULLER (SARAH MARGARET).

Ostade, ADRIAAN VAN (1610-85), a prolific Dutch painter and engraver. Dancing-greens, farm-yards, and beer-shops are favourite subjects.—ISAAC (1621-49), his brother, excelled in landscape.

Ostwald, WILHELM, a great physical chemist, born at Riga in 1853, was professor at Leipzig from 1887 to 1906.

Oswald, ST. (c. 605-642), son of Ethelfrith of Bernicia, fought his way to the Northumbrian crown by the defeat (635) of Cædwalla the Welsh king. He had been converted to Christianity at Iona, and established Christianity in Northumbria with St Aidan's help. He fell in battle with Penda.

Oswell, WILLIAM COTTON (1818-93), 'the Nimrod of South Africa,' was born at Leytonstone in Essex, was in the East India Company's service at Madras, went in 1848 to Africa for his health, co-operated with Livingstone in 1849 and 1851, did special service in the Crimea, and travelled in America. See Sir S. Baker's notice of him prefixed to Wolley's Big Game Shooting (1894).

Othman, or Osman I. (1259-1326), founder of the Ottoman (Turkish) power, was born in Bithynia, and, on the overthrow of the Seljuk sultanate of Iconium in 1299 by the Mongols, gradually subdued great part of Asia Minor. From his name are derived the terms Ottoman and Osmanli.

Othman, third calif, was Mohammed's secretary and son-in-law, and was chosen in 644. His weak government raised complaints and insurrections on all sides. But Persia was finally subdued, and Herat, Merv, and Balkh captured. He was besieged in Medina, and murdered (656).

Otho, MARCUS SALVIUS, born in 32 A.D., joined Galba in his revolt against Nero (68), but, not being proclaimed Galba's successor, rose against the new emperor, who was slain. Otho was recognised as emperor everywhere save in Germany, whence Vitellius marched on Italy, and completely defeated Otho's forces. Next day Otho, who had worn the purple only three months, stabbed himself (16th April 69).

Otho I., or OTTO THE GREAT (912-973), was, on the death of his father the emperor Henry I., in 936, crowned king of the Germans. He subdued many turbulent tribes, maintained almost supreme power in Italy, and established Christianity in Scandinavian and Slavonic lands.

Otis, JAMES, born at West Barnstable, Mass., 5th February 1725, became a leader of the Boston bar. He was advocate-general in 1760, when the revenue officers demanded his assistance in obtaining from the superior court general search-warrants allowing them to enter any man's house in quest of smuggled goods. Otis refused, resigned, and appeared in defence of popular rights. In 1761, elected to the Massachusetts assembly, he was prominent in resistance to the revenue acts. In 1769 he was savagely beaten by revenue officers and others, and lost his reason. On 23d May 1783 he was killed by lightning. His fame chiefly rests on The Rights of the Colonies Asserted (1764). See Life by W. Tudor (1823).

Otway, THOMAS, dramatist, was born at Trotton in Sussex, March 3, 1652, and from Winchester passed in 1669 to Christ Church College, Oxford. He quitted the university without a degree in 1672, failed utterly as an actor, but made a fair hit with his tragedy Alcibiades (1675). In it beautiful Mrs Barry made her first appearance, and with her Otway quickly fell in love. In 1676 Betterton accepted his Don Carlos, a good tragedy in rhyme. In 1677 Otway translated Racine's Titus and Berenice, as well as Molière's Cheats of Scapin. The intrigue between Rochester and Mrs Barry drove him a-soldiering to Flanders 1678-79; in the May of the former year appeared his diverting but grossly indecent comedy, Friendship in Fashion. The year 1680 yielded two tragedies, The Orphan and Caius Marius, and his one important poem, The Poet's Complaint of his Muse: to 1681 belongs the filthy comedy, The Soldier's Fortune. His greatest work, Venice Preserved, or a Plot Discover'd (1682), is a noble masterpiece of tragic passion. Otway's mistress was now at the height of her fame. Six letters of his to her, written about 1682, tell us the touching story of his faith and of her cruelty.

From this time he sinks out of sight, drowned in dissipation, debt, and misery. He reappears again in 1684 with The Atheist, a feeble comedy, and in February 1685 with Windsor Castle, a poem addressed to the new king, James II. He wore out his wasted life in abject misery in a sponging-house or tavern on Tower Hill, and there he died April 14, 1685. In 1719 a badly edited tragedy, Heroick Friendship, was published as his. The best edition of his works is that by Thornton (1813). See Johnson's Lives, Ward's Dramatic Literature, Gosse in Seventeenth Century Studies (1883), and Roden Noel's 'Mermaid' edition (1888).

Oudinot, CHARLES NICOLAS (1767-1847), born at Bar-le-Duc, served in the revolutionary wars. In 1805 he obtained the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour and the command of ten reserve battalions, the 'grenadiers Oudinot.' He fought at Austerlitz and Jena, gained the battle of Ostrolenka (1807), and helped at Friedland. Conspicuous in the Austrian campaign of 1809, he was created Marshal of France and Duke of Reggio. In 1810 he was charged with the occupation of Holland, and took part in the Russian campaign and in the battles of 1813 with Russians and Austrians. He was one of the last to abandon Napoleon. At the second restoration he became a minister of state, commander-in-chief of the royal and national guards, peer of France, &c. In 1823 he commanded in Spain. See Lives by Nolle (1856) and Stiegler (1894), and Memoirs of Marshal Oudinot (trans. 1896).—His son, CHARLES NICOLAS-VICTOR OUDINOT, Duke of Reggio (1791-1863), fought in Algeria, and commanded the expedition to Rome in 1849. Ouida, the pseudonym of LOUISE DE LA RAMÉE, born about 1840 at Bury St Edmunds, lived long in London, and since 1874 made her home in Italy. She was writing for Bentley's Magazine as early as 1861; and among her novels are Strathmore (1865), Idalia (1867), Under Two Flags (the best, 1868), Puck (1869), Folle Farine (1871), Pascarel (1873), Ariadne (1877), Moths (1880), Guilleroy (1889), The Silver Christ (1891), The Massarenes (1897), and The Waters of Edeya (1900)—besides Critical Studies (1900) and Street Dust (1901). Her stories have glamour and go, and are sometimes tender or powerful. She wrote much in magazines against the new Italian régime and against vivisection. She died (in poverty) at Lucca, 25th January 1908.

Oules, WALTER WILLIAM, portrait-painter, born 21st September 1848 at St Helier, Jersey, first exhibited at the Academy in 1868, and became A.R.A. 1877, R.A. 1881. Of his portraits, those of Darwin, Gladstone, Bright, Lord Roberts, Newman, and Manning are well known.

Ouseley, SIR FREDERICK ARTHUR GORE, musician, born 12th August 1825, son of Sir Gore Ouseley (1770-1844), diplomatist, orientalist, and first baronet. He graduated at Christ Church and took orders. In 1855 he became professor of Music at Oxford, and in 1856 vicar of St Michael's, Tenbury. He was LL.D., canon of Hereford, &c. His edition of Neumann's History of Music and his treatises on harmony are standard works. His oratorios St Polycarp and Hagar are too severe to be popular. He composed much church music, overtures, glees, and quartets; and died 6th April 1889. See Life by F. W. Joyce (1896).—SIR WILLIAM OUSELEY (1767-1842), the first Sir Gore's brother, was also an orientalist; and his son, Sir William Gore Ouseley (1797-1866), was a diplomatist.

Outram, SIR JAMES, the 'Bayard of India.'

was born 29th January 1803, at Butterley Hall, Derbyshire, the residence of his father, Benjamin Outram (1764-1805), engineer, and was educated in Aberdeen. In 1819 he joined the Bombay native infantry, organised a corps of wild Bhils (1825-35), and was political agent in Gujrat (1835-38). In 1839 he attended Sir John Keane as aide-de-camp into Afghanistan, and did good service; and his eight days' ride of 355 miles from Kelat through the Bolan Pass to the sea is famous. Political agent in Sind (1840), he defended the Residency at Hyderabad against 8000 Beluchis (1843), and opposed Sir Charles Napier's aggressive policy towards the Ameer. He was afterwards Resident at Satara and Baroda, and in 1854, on the eve of the annexation of Oudh, was made Resident at Lucknow. In 1857 he commanded the brief and brilliant Persian expedition, and he returned to India a G.C.B. when the Mutiny was raging. Lord Canning tendered him the command of the forces advancing to the relief of Lucknow, but he chivalrously waived the honour in favour of his old lieutenant, Havelock, and accompanied him as a volunteer and as chief-commissioner of Oudh. Lucknow was relieved, and Outram took command, only to be in turn himself besieged. He held the Alumm-bagh against overwhelming odds, until Sir Colin Campbell relieved him; and his skillful movement up the Guntli led to a complete victory. For his services he was in 1858 made lieutenant-general, thanked by parliament, and created a baronet. He took his seat as a member of the Supreme Council at Calcutta, but in 1860 had to return to England. He spent a winter in Egypt, died at Paris, 11th March 1863, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Lives by Goldsmid (1880) and Trotter (1903).—GEORGE OUTRAM (1805-56), editor of the Glasgow Herald and author of Lyrics, Legal and Miscellaneous, was his cousin, the son of Joseph Outram, manager of the Clyde ironworks.

Overbeck, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, painter, born at Lübeck, 4th July 1789, studied art at Vienna (1806-10), and settled in Rome, where he allied himself with the like-minded Cornelius, Schadow, Schnorr, and Veit, who, from the stress they laid on religion and moral significance, were scoffed at as Church-Romanticists, Pre-Raphaelites, &c. A Madonna (1811) brought Overbeck into notice; and Bartholdy, the Prussian consul, employed him to adorn his house with Scripture subjects. He next painted in fresco, in the villa of the Marchese Massimo, five compositions from Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. In 1813 he became a Roman Catholic. His oil-pictures are inferior to his frescoes. Among his famous pictures are a fresco at Assisi, 'The Vision of St Francis'; 'Christ's Entry into Jerusalem' (Lübeck); 'Christ's Agony in the Garden' (Hamburg); 'Lo Spozializio' (Berlin); 'The Triumph of Religion in the Arts' (Frankfurt); the 'Incredulity of St Thomas' (London). Overbeck died 12th November 1869. See Life by Atkinson (1882).

Overbury, SIR THOMAS, was born in 1581, at Compton-Scorpion, Warwickshire. After three years at Oxford (1595-98), he studied at the Middle Temple, then travelled on the Continent. In 1601 at Edinburgh he met Robert Carr, afterwards minion of James I., who in 1611 made him Viscount Rochester. The two became inseparable friends, and Overbury was, through Carr's influence, knighted in 1608. Meanwhile, in 1606, the lovely but profligate Frances Howard (1592-1632) had married the third Earl of Essex, and had intrigued with more than one lover—Carr the most favoured. Overbury had played pander; but when Carr proposed to get Lady Essex divorced, and marry her, he declared she might do for a mistress but not for a wife. Lady Essex offered Sir Davy Wood £1000 to assassinate him. On 26th April 1613 Overbury, on a trivial and illegal pretext—his refusal to go on an embassy—was thrown into the Tower, where on 15th September he was poisoned. Three months later Carr (now Earl of Somerset) and his paramour were married. But in 1615 an inquiry was instituted, and four of the humbler instruments were hanged. In May 1616 the countess pleaded guilty, and the earl was found guilty; but by a stretch of the royal prerogative they were pardoned. In 1622 they were released from the Tower; and Somerset survived till 1645. Overbury's works, posthumous and partly spurious, include The Wife (1614), a didactic poem; Characters (1614); and Crumm's fal'n from King James's Table (1715). They were collected in 1856 by E. F. Rimbault, with a Life. See also Andrew Amos, The Great Oyer of Poisoning (1846), and Gardiner's History of England.

Overstone, SAMUEL JONES LOYD, BARON, economist and financier, was born in London, 25th September 1796, only son of Mr Lewis Loyd, banker. On leaving Cambridge Loyd entered his father's banking-house, afterwards merged in the London and Westminster Bank. In 1819-26 he was Whig member for Hythe, and in 1850 was raised to the peerage as Baron Overstone. His famous tracts on the management of the Bank of England and the currency were published in 1837-57. He died 17th November 1883, leaving a fortune of over £2,000,000.

Ovid (PUBLIUS OVIDIUS NASO), born 20th March 43 B.C., at Sulmo (Solmona), in the Abruzzi, son of a well-to-do equo, and was trained for the bar; but in spite of extraordinary forensic aptitude, he gave his whole energies to poetry, and visited Athens. He was thrice married; and his life at his country-seat, among congenial friends, was an enviable one. His first literary success was his tragedy Medea. Then came his Epistolæ or Heroides, imaginary love-letters from ladies of the heroic foretime to their lords; but his Amores occupied the sphere he has made peculiarly his own. His Medicamina Faciei (a practical poem on artificial aids to personal beauty) seems to have been preliminary to his true master-work, the Ars Amandi, or Ars Amatoria, in three books, which appeared about 1 B.C., followed by a subsidiary book entitled Remedia Amoris—the former teaching how to win and preserve the love of woman. His second period of poetic activity opens with the Metamorphoses, in fifteen books, and with the Fasti, designed to be in twelve, of which six only were completed. The Metamorphoses, according to Bernhardt, surpasses all that antiquity has to show in brilliant and felicitous metrical narration. The Fasti forms in elegiac distichs a poetic commentary on the calendar, seeks to enoble the policy of Augustus, and revivify forgotten religious ceremonials. Midway in its composition he was banished (8 A.D.). Posterity has failed to fathom the true ground of Ovid's banishment; but nothing could move Augustus to a reprieve of the sentence; so in 9 A.D. he left Rome, as 'relegatus, non exul,' for Tomi, on the Euxine (close to the present Kustendji). There he languished out the last years of his life, and died in 17 A.D. This, his third period, produces but minor notes of melancholy. On his way from Rome he began the elegies which he published in five books, the Tristia. Similar in tone and theme are the four books of the Epistola ex Ponto. His Ibis, written in imitation of Callimachus, and his Haliutica, a poem extant only in fragments, complete the list of his remains. In mastery of metrical form and in creative fecundity Ovid outsoars all the poets of the Augustan cycle. He is the most voluminous of Latin poets, and in this characteristic may be found the cause of his chief defects—his self-repetition, his too frequent echoings of former felicities, the monotony of his cadences, particularly in the elegiac distich. There are old translations of the Metamorphoses by Golding (1565), Sandys (1632), Garth; and one by King (1871). Complete editions of the text are by Merkel (1858) and Riess (1872-74); of the Heroides, by A. Palmer (1899), Ibis, by Robinson Ellis (1882), and Tristia, by S. G. Owen (1890). See the monograph by Zingerle (1869-71), and Church's study in 'Ancient Classics' (1876).

Oviedo y Valdes, GONZALO FERNANDEZ DE (1478-1557), born at Madrid, was sent to St Domingo in 1514 as inspector-general of gold-mines, and, as historiographer of the Indies, wrote after his return a history thereof (1526; trans. by Eden, 1555; new ed. 1851-55).

Owen ap Gruffydd, prince of Gwynedd or North Wales, fiercely resisted Henry II., but ultimately submitted, and died in 1169.

Owen Glendower. See GLENDOWER.

Owen, JOHN (c. 1560-1622), epigrammatist, born at Llanarmon, Pwllheli, became a fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1584, and about 1594 a schoolmaster at Warwick. His Latin Epigrammata (1606-13; best ed. by Renouard, Par. 1794) have been five times translated into English since 1619.

Owen, JOHN, Puritan, born at Stadhampton vicarage, Oxfordshire, in 1616, took his B.A. in 1631 from Queen's College, Oxford, and in 1637 was driven from Oxford by dislike to Laud's statutes. Some years he spent as private chaplain; then in 1642 he removed to London, and published The Display of Arminianism, a work for which he was rewarded with the living of Fordham in Essex. In 1646 he removed to Coggeshall, and showed his preference for Independency over Presbyterianism. Cromwell carried him in 1649 as his chaplain to Ireland, where he regulated the affairs of Trinity College. Next year (1650) he went with Cromwell to Scotland. In 1651-52 he became dean of Christ Church and vice-chancellor of Oxford University. Here he wrote his Diatribe de Divina Justitia, his Doctrine of the Saints Perseverance, his Vindicia Evangelicæ, and his Mortification of Sin in Believers. He was one of the Triers appointed to purge the church of scandalous ministers. He opposed the giving the crown to the Protector, and the year after Cromwell's death he was ejected from his deanery. He purchased an estate at Stadham, and formed a congregation. The writings of this period are Communion with God, On the Divine Original of the Scriptures, Theologoumena, and a diatribe against Walton's Polyglott. These were followed by works on Indwelling Sin, on the 130th Psalm, and on the Epistle to the Hebrews, the last his greatest work. In 1673 he became pastor in Leadenhall Street. Late publications were Concerning the Holy Spirit (1674), Justification by Faith (1677), and Christologia. He wrote replies to a Franciscan and to Bishop Parker, sustained controversies with Sherlock and Stillingfleet, and to the end preached and wrote incessantly. He died 24th August 1683. See Orme's Memoirs (1820), and Life by Thomson, prefixed to Gould's edition of Owen's works (1850-55).

Owen, JOHN, born at Penbroke in 1836, studied at Lampeter, and in 1870 was appointed rector of East Anstley in Devonshire, where he died 6th February 1896. He wrote a series of works on the Sceptics (of the French Renaissance, Italy, &c.).

Owen, SIR RICHARD, zoologist, born at Lancaster, July 20, 1804, studied medicine at Edinburgh and at St Bartholomew's; became curator in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, where he produced a marvellous series of descriptive catalogues; and in 1834-55 he lectured as professor of Comparative Anatomy, for two years at Bartholomew's, and afterwards at the College of Surgeons. Meanwhile he helped to give new life to the Zoological Society of London, and was a commissioner of health (1843-46), and for the Great Exhibition of 1851. In 1856 he became superintendent of the natural history department of the British Museum, but continued to teach at the Royal Institution and elsewhere. F.R.S. (1834), president of the British Association (1857), Associate of the French Institute (1859), C.B. (1873), K.C.B. (1883), recipient of many scientific medals, degrees, and honorary titles from many nations, he gained the immortality of a true worker, and died 18th December 1892. Owen's anatomical and palaeontological researches number towards four hundred, and concern almost every class of animals from sponge to man. He greatly advanced morphological inquiry by his clear distinction between analogy and homology, and by his concrete studies on the nature of limbs, on the composition of the skull, and on other problems of vertebrate morphology; while his essay on Parthenogenesis was a pioneer work. A pre-Darwinian, he maintained a cautious attitude to detailed evolutionist theories. See Life by his grandson (1894).

Owen, ROBERT, social reformer, born, a saddler's son, at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, 14th May 1771. At ten he was put into a draper's shop at Stamford, and by nineteen had risen to be manager of a cotton-mill. In 1799 he married the daughter of David Dale (q.v.), the philanthropic owner of the New Lanark cotton-mills, where next year he settled as manager and part-owner. He laboured to teach his workpeople the advantages of thrift, cleanliness, and good order, and established infant education. He began social propagandism in A New View of Society (1813), and finally adopted socialism; he lost much of his influence by his utterances on religion. His socialistic theories were put to the test in experimental communities at Orbiston near Bothwell, and later at New Harmony in Indiana, in County Clare, and in Hampshire, but all were unsuccessful. In 1828 his connection with New Lanark ceased; and, his means having been exhausted, the remainder of his days were spent in secularist, socialistic, and spiritualistic propagandism. He died 17th November 1858. See Holyoake, Co-operation in England (1875); Owen's Autobiography (1857-58); also Lives by Booth (1869), Sargent (1860), Lloyd Jones (1890), and Podmore (1906).—His son, ROBERT DALE OWEN, born in Glasgow, 9th November 1801, went to America in 1825 to help in the New Harmony colony. He settled in America in 1827, edited the Free Inquirer in New York, was a member of the Indiana legislature, and entered congress in 1848. Later he helped to remodel the constitution of Indiana; acted first as chargé d'affaires, next as minister at Naples (1853-58); and was an abolitionist and spiritualist. He died 17th June 1877. Among his books are Footprints on the Boundary of another World (1859) and Debatable Land between this World and the Next (1872), and Threading my Way, an autobiography (1874).—Two other sons, David Dale Owen (1807-60) and Richard Owen (1810-90), were notable geologists.

Owens, JOHN (1790-1846), a Manchester cotton-merchant, who left £96,655 for the foundation of an unsectarian college there, now a university.

Owenson, SYDNEY. See MORGAN (LADY).

Oxenford, JOHN, born in Camberwell, 12th August 1812, and bred for the law, translated Goethe's Dichtung und Wahrheit and Eckermann's Conversations with Goethe. From 1850 he was dramatic critic for the Times. His Illustrated Book of French Songs (1855) showed a dexterous mastery of the lighter forms of verse. He wrote many plays—the Dice of Death, Reigning Favourite, Two Orphans, the libretto for The Lily of Killarney, &c. He died Feb. 21, 1877.

Oxenham, HENRY NUTCOMBE (1829-88), born at Harrow, was educated there and at Balliol. He took orders in 1854, but entered the Roman Catholic Church in 1857, and was successively professor at St Edmund's College, Ware, and master at the Oratory School, Birmingham. He died March 23, 1888. Oxenham translated from

PACCHIAROTTO, JACOPO (1474-1540?), painter, fled from Siena in 1539 as being implicated in a conspiracy, and was again exiled and recalled. [Pak-kee-a-ro'to.]

Pachomius, an Egyptian, superseded the system of solitary recluse life by founding (340 A.D.) the first monastery on an island in the Nile.

Packard, ALPHEUS SPRING, entomologist, born at Brunswick, Maine, 19th February 1839, was assistant to Agassiz, and state entomologist of Massachusetts (1871-73), and from 1878 till his death in 1905 was professor at Brown University in Providence, R.I. He wrote much, and his classification of insects was widely accepted.

Pacuvius (c. 220-130 B.C.), earliest of Roman tragic poets and nephew of Ennius, was born at Brundisium, lived in Rome, and wrote dramas after Greek models. Only fragments are extant.

Paderewski, IGNAZ JAN, Polish pianist, was born at Kurylowka in Podolia, 6th November 1860, and began to play as an infant of three. He studied at Warsaw, becoming professor in the Conservatoire there in 1878. In 1884 he taught in the Strasburg Conservatoire, but thereafter became a virtuoso, appearing at Vienna in 1887, and with phenomenal success at Paris, at London, and in America. He became director of Warsaw Conservatoire in 1909. He has composed for piano, for voice, and for orchestra. [Pa-der-ev'skee.]

Padilla, JUAN DE, a Spanish popular hero, was commandant of Saragossa under Charles V., headed an insurrection against the intolerable taxation, and after some successes was defeated (23d April 1521) and beheaded. His wife held Toledo against the royal forces. [Pa-deel'ya.]

Paganini, NICOLÒ, a marvellous violinist, was born, a porter's son, at Genoa, 18th February 1781. He gave his first concert in 1793, began his professional tours in Italy in 1805, in 1828-29 made a great sensation in Austria and Germany, and in 1831 created an equal furor in Paris and London.

Döllinger and Hefele, and wrote works on the Atonement (1865) and Catholic Eschatology (1876), and two series of Short Studies (1884-85).

Oxenstierna, or OXENSTERN (1583-1654), Swedish statesman, was trained for the church, but entered the public service in 1602, and on the accession of Gustavus Adolphus (1611) was made chancellor. He negotiated peace with Denmark, with Russia, with Poland; and though he sought to prevent the king from plunging into the Thirty Years' War, he supported him in it loyally throughout, and on his death kept the Swedish armies together and sustained the Protestant cause. Christina did not always take his advice; but he remained chancellor till his death under Charles X. See, besides the histories of Sweden, the Life by Fryxell.—His eldest son, JOHAN (1611-57), was a Swedish diplomatist; another (1624-56) succeeded his father as chancellor.

Ozanam, ANTOINE FRÉDÉRIC (1813-53), a Neo-Catholic of the school of Lacordaire, and one of the founders of the Society of St Vincent de Paul, became in 1841 professor of Foreign Literature at the Sorbonne. He wrote Dante et la Philosophie Catholique (1839), Histoire de la Civilisation au V^e Siècle (1845; Eng. trans. 1868), and Études Germaniques (1847-49). A collected edition of his writings fills 11 vols. (1862-75). There are Lives by Karker (1867), O'Meara (1876), and Hardy (1878); and see his Letters (trans. 1886).

He had gambled much in youth, but returned very rich to Italy; and died 27th May 1840. See Life in French by Fétis (1851), Italian by Bruni (1873), German by Niggli (1882), and Engel's From Mozart to Mario (1886). [Pu-ga-nee'nee.]

Page, THOMAS NELSON, born at Oakland in Virginia, 23d April 1853, practised law at Richmond, and has written many stories, some of them in negro dialect (Befo' de War, &c.).

Paget, SIR AUGUSTUS (1823-96), G.C.B., P.C., was a distinguished diplomatist, and was ultimately ambassador to Italy and to Austria.

Paget, SIR GEORGE EDWARD (1809-92), studied at Cambridge, and in 1872 became regius professor of Physic there. He was D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S., and K.C.B. See his Lectures, with a memoir by C. E. Paget (1893).—His brother, SIR JAMES PAGET (1814-99), born at Yarmouth, became president of the College of Surgeons, surgeon to the Queen and the Prince of Wales, and to Bartholomew's Hospital, vice-chancellor of the University of London, and member of the Institute of France. An LL.D. and a baronet (1871), he wrote Lectures on Surgical Pathology (1853; 4th ed. 1876) and Clinical Lectures (1875).

Paget, VIOLET, born in 1856 and resident in Florence, has as 'Vernon Lee' written studies, tales, essays, a Life of the Countess of Albany, &c.

Paileron, ÉDOUARD (1834-99), French dramatist, was born in Paris, and was elected to the Academy in 1884. He died in 1899.

Paine, THOMAS, deist and radical, was born at Thetford, 29th January 1737, the son of an ex-Quaker stay-maker. He had by turns been stay-maker and marine, schoolmaster, exciseman, and tobaccoconist, when in 1774 he sailed for Philadelphia. In 1776 his pamphlet Common Sense argued for complete independence; his Crisis came a year later; and Paine, then serving with the American army, was made Secretary to the Committee of Foreign Affairs. He lost that post in 1779 for divulging state secrets, but was appointed clerk of the Pennsylvania legislature, and in 1785 received from congress $3000 and a farm. In 1787 he returned to England, where in 1791-92 he published The Rights of Man, most famous of the replies to Burke's Reflections, which involved many in heavy penalties. Paine had slipped off to Paris, having been elected by Pas-de-Calais deputy to the National Convention. He voted with the Girondists, proposed to offer the king an asylum in America, and so offending the Robespierre faction, in 1794 was imprisoned; just before his arrest having written part i. of The Age of Reason, in favour of Deism. Part ii. appeared in 1795, and a portion of part iii. in 1807. The book alienated Washington and most of his old friends. After an imprisonment of eleven months he was released and restored to his seat in the Convention, but became disgusted with French politics. In 1802 he returned to America, and he died at New York, 8th June 1809. 'Paine's ignorance,' says Leslie Stephen, 'was vast and his language brutal; but he had the gift of a true demagogue—the power of wielding a fine vigorous English.' There are editions of his works by Mendum (1850) and Moncreu Conway (4 vols. 1895-96); among biographies are those by 'Francis Oldys' (i.e. George Chalmers, 1791), Cheetham (1809), Rickman (1814), Sherwin (1819), Vale (1841), Blanchard (1860), and Moncreu Conway (1892).

Painter, WILLIAM (?1540-94), studied at Cambridge, was master of Sevenoaks school, but in 1561 became Clerk of Ordnance in the Tower. His The Palace of Pleasure (1566-67), largely composed of stories from Boccaccio, Bandello, and Margaret of Navarre, became popular, and was the main source whence many dramatists drew their plots; several of Shakespeare's comedies owe something to his Italian borrowings. There are editions by Haslewood (1813) and Jacobs (1890).

Paisiello, GIOVANNI (1741-1816), Neapolitan composer of ninety operas and a hundred masses, marked an epoch in Italian musical art.

Pakington, SIR JOHN (1799-1880), was Colonial Secretary, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Secretary at War in Conservative ministries.

Palacky, FRANCIS (1798-1876), was a Czech publicist and politician in Prague, and the most distinguished historian of Bohemia. [Pal-laz-kee.]

Palafox y Melzi, JOSÉ DE, Duke of Saragossa, was born in 1780, as general made the heroic defence of Saragossa (July 1808 to February 1809), was carried prisoner to France, and not released until 1813. He was made Duke of Saragossa (1836) and grandee of Spain (1837), and died 15th February 1847. [Pal-a-foh' ee Mel-thee.]

Palestrina, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA, musical composer, was born at Palestrina between 1514 and 1529. In 1551 he was made maestro di capella by Pope Julius III., a post to which he was restored in 1571, after having from 1555 been choir-master at the Lateran and at Sta Maria Maggiore. The Council of Trent entrusted to Palestrina the reform of church music. He blended devotional with artistic feeling, and was the first to reconcile musical science with musical art. He died 2d Feb. 1594. See Italian Life by Baini (1828) and French work by Félix (1895). [Pal-es-tree'na.]

Paley, FREDERICK APTHORP, classical scholar, grandson of the Paley, was born at Easingwold rectory, York, 14th Jan. 1815, and educated at Cambridge. He was converted to the Roman Catholic faith in 1846, in 1874 was appointed professor at the Roman Catholic college at Kensington, was twice classical examiner to London University and at Cambridge, and continued till his death, 11th December 1888, his arduous labours on editions of Æschylus, Euripides, Hesiod, the Iliad, Sophocles, Propertius, parts of Ovid, Aristophanes, Demosthenes, Plato, Aristotle, Pindar, and Fragments of the Greek Comic Poets (1888). Other works were a treatise on Greek Paeticles (1881), Greek Wit (1881), and an unsatisfactory edition of the Gospel of St John (1887).

Paley, WILLIAM, born at Peterborough in July 1743, entered Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1759, and in 1763 came out senior wrangler. After three years as an assistant-master at Greenwich, he was elected in 1768 fellow and tutor of Christ's College, and lectured on moral philosophy till his marriage in 1776. He then successively held the livings of Musgrove, Dalston, and Appleby; and was prebendary, archdeacon, and chancellor in Carlisle diocese. In 1785 he published his Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, expounding a form of utilitarianism, virtue being prudence looking for happiness in a future life. In 1790 appeared his most original work, Horæ Paulinæ, the aim of which is to prove the great improbability of the hypothesis that the New Testament is a cunningly devised fable. It was followed in 1794 by his famous Evidences of Christianity. The Bishop of London gave Paley a stall in St Paul's; shortly after he was made subdean of Lincoln, with £700 a-year; Cambridge made him D.D.; and the Bishop of Durham presented him to the rectory of Bishop Wearmouth, worth £1200 a-year. In 1802 he published perhaps the most widely popular of all his works, Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity (ed. by Brougham and Bell, 1836-39). Paley died May 25, 1805. A complete edition of his works was published by his son (1825), and by Wayland (1837). See the Life by Meadley (1809), and Leslie Stephen's English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876).

Palgrave, SIR FRANCIS, historian, was born in London in July 1788, the son of Meyer Cohen, a Jewish stockbroker, but on his marriage (1823) he assumed his mother-in-law's maiden name. He was called to the bar in 1827; and, knighted in 1832, was in 1838 appointed deputy-keeper of Her Majesty's Records, an office he held till his death, 6th July 1861. Among his works are The English Commonwealth (1832), The Merchant and the Friar, and a History of Normandy and of England (1851-64). He also edited Parliamentary Writs (1830-34), Rotuli Curie Regis (1835), Ancient Kalendars of the Treasury of the Exchequer (1836), and Documents illustrating the History of Scotland (1837).—His son, FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE, poet and critic, born in London, Sept. 28, 1824, became scholar of Balliol, Oxford, and fellow of Exeter, was successively vice-principal of a training college, private secretary to Earl Granville, an official in the Education Department, and professor of Poetry at Oxford (1886-95). He died 25th Oct. 1897. His works are Idylls and Songs (1854), Essays on Art (1866), Hymns (1867), Five Days' Entertainments at Wentworth Grange (1868), Lyrical Poems (1871), and Visions of England (1881). He is best known as the editor of the Golden Treasury of English Lyrics (1861, re-edited 1896; poor 2d series, 1897); Children's Treasury of Lyrical Poetry (1875); Sonnets and Songs of Shakespeare (1877); selections from Herrick (1877) and Keats (1885); Treasury of Sacred Song (1889); and Landscape in Poetry (1897). See Life by daughter (1899).

—His brother, WILLIAM GIFFORD PALGRAVE, born Jan. 24, 1826, graduated at Oxford in 1846. He joined the Bombay Native Infantry, but becoming a Jesuit, studied at Rome, and was sent as a missionary to Syria. For Napoleon III. he went disguised as a physician on a daring expedition through Arabia (1862-63), described in his Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia (1865). Quitting the Society of Jesus in 1864, he was sent by the British government in 1865 to treat for the release of the captives in Abyssinia: He became consul at Trebizond, St. Thomas, and Manila; consul-general in Bulgaria 1878, and Siam 1880; and British minister to Uruguay 1884. There he married, was reconciled to the church, and died 30th Sept. 1888. His other works are Essays on Eastern Questions (1872); Hermann Agha: an Eastern Narrative (1872); Dutch Guiana (1876); and Ulysses, or Scenes in Many Lands (1887).—SIR REGINALD F. D. PALGRAVE, K. C. B. (1892), a fourth son (born 1829, died 1904), was in 1886 appointed Clerk to the House of Commons, and wrote on parliamentary practice and history.

Pal'isa, JOHANN, Viennese astronomer, born at Troppan, 6th Dec. 1848, since 1874 has discovered over eighty minor planets.

Palissy, BERNARD, potter, was born about 1509 in Agen, and, after wandering for ten years over France as a glass-painter, about 1538 married and settled at Saintes. Resolved to discover how to make enamels, he neglected all else and experimented for sixteen years, exhausting all his resources, but was at length rewarded with success (1557). His ware, bearing in high relief plants and animals coloured to represent nature, soon made him famous; and, though as a Huguenot he was in 1562 imprisoned, he was speedily released and taken into royal favour. In 1564 he established his workshop at the Tuileries, and was specially exempted from the massacre of St. Bartholomew (1572). During 1575-84 he lectured on natural history, physics, and agriculture. In 1585 he was again arrested as a Huguenot and thrown into the Bastille, where he died in 1589. Palissy's writings were, including an account of his experiences, edited by M. France (1880). See English Life by H. Morley (1852), and French ones by Andiat (1868), Burty (1836), and Dupuy (1894).

Palladio, ANDREA, architect, was born at Vicenza, 30th November 1518, and there he died 19th August 1580. He was the founder of modern Italian architecture, as distinguished from the earlier Italian Renaissance. The Palladian style is vitruvian in the ancient Roman as apprehended by Michelozzo. His Quattro Libri dell' Architettura (1570) had greatly influenced his successors, especially Inigo Jones, whose notes on the book are published in Leoni's Eng. trans. (1715). There are Lives by Zanella (1880) and Barichella (1880).

Palladius, RUTILIUS TAURUS ÆMILIANUS, Roman author of 4th century A.D., who wrote De Re Rustica (On Agriculture), in fourteen books.

Palladius, ST. is said to have been sent 'in Scythiam,' in 430, by Pope Celestine; but the Scythia here meant was certainly Ireland. Skene doubts if Palladius was ever in Scotland till after his death, when St. Terian brought his relics to Fordoun in Kincardineshire.

Pallas, PETER SIMON, born 22d September 1741 at Berlin, and was in 1768 invited to St. Petersburg by the Empress Catharine as an eminent naturalist. He spent six years (1768-74) exploring the Urals, the Kirghiz Steppes, the Altai range, part of Siberia, and the steppes of the Volga, returning with an extraordinary treasure of specimens; and he wrote a series of works on the geography, ethnography, flora and fauna of the regions visited. He settled in the Crimea in 1796, and died 8th September 1811.

Pallavicino, SFORZA (1607-67), Italian historian, became in 1638 a Jesuit, and a cardinal in 1659. His best-known work is Istoria del Concilio di Trento (1656-57), a reply to the work of Sarpi. —FERRANTE PALLAVICINO (1618-44) wrote pasquinades which offended the papal curia and the Barberini, and was beheaded. [Pal-la-vi-tchee'no.]

Pal'iser, SIR WILLIAM, C. B. (1830-82), born at Dublin, entered the army as a cavalry officer, and in 1863 he invented the chilled shot that bears his name, and a system of strengthening cast-iron ordnance by the insertion of a steel tube. He sat for Taunton in parliament.

Palm, JOHANN PHILIPP, a bookseller of Nuremberg, born in 1768, published in 1806 a pamphlet (probably by Professor Yelin) containing some bitter truths concerning Napoleon and the conduct of the French troops in Bavaria. Napoleon ordered Palm to be arrested, and had him tried by court-martial and shot, 26th August 1806.

Palma, JACOPO (c. 1480-1528), called PALMA VECCHIO ('Old Palma'), stands at the head of the second class of great Venetian artists. His pictures are sacred subjects or portrait groups. See work by Locatelli (1890). —His brother's grandson, JACOPO (1544-1628), called IL GIOVANE ('the Younger'), painted poorish religious pictures.

Palmblad, VILHELM FREDRIK (1788-1852), Swedish historian and miscellaneous author, became professor of Greek at Uppsala in 1835.

Palmer, EDWARD HENRY, was born 7th August 1840, at Cambridge, and at the university he devoted himself to oriental studies. In 1867, graduating with a third-class in classics, he was elected fellow. During 1868-70 he was engaged for the Palestine Exploration Fund in the survey of Sinai and the Desert. In 1871 he was appointed Lord Almoner's professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and in 1874 he was called to the bar. In 1881 he turned journalist, writing principally for the Standard. In 1882, on the eve of Arabi's Egyptian rebellion, sent by government to win over the Sinai tribes, he, Capt. Gill, R.E., and Lieut. Charrington, R.N., were on August 11 murdered in the ravine of Wady Sadr. Among Palmer's works are the Desert of the Exodus (1871), Arabic Grammar (1874), Song of the Reed (1876), Poems of Behā ed Din Zoheir (1876-77), a Persian dictionary (1876-83), Haroun Alraschid (1880), and a translation of the Koran (1880). See Life by Besant (1883), and Haynes, Man-hunting in the Desert (1894).

Palmer, ROUNDELL. See SELBORNE (LORD).

Palmer, SAMUEL (1805-81), water-colour landscape-painter and etcher. See Life (1892).

Palmer, WILLIAM (1824-56), a medical practitioner at Rugeley, who took to the turf, seems to have poisoned his wife and brother for their insurance policies, and was hanged for poisoning a betting friend, Cook, whom he had swindled.

Palmerston, HENRY JOHN TEMPLE, VISCOUNT, was born at Broadlands near Romsey, Hants, 20th October 1784, of the Irish branch of the ancient English family of Temple. In 1800 he went to Edinburgh University, in 1802 he succeeded his father as third Viscount, and in 1808 matriculated at Cambridge. As Tory candidate for the university he was rejected in 1806, and entered parliament for Newport (Wight); but from 1811 he represented his alma mater for twenty years, and only lost his seat when he supported the Reform Bill. Afterwards he was returned for South Hampshire, lost his seat in 1835, but found a seat for Tiverton. He was Junior Lord of the Admiralty and Secretary at War under Perceval, the Earl of Liverpool, Canning, Goderich, and the Duke of Wellington (1809-28). His official connection with the Tory party ceased in 1828. The Duke's government was swept away in 1830, and Earl Grey offered the seals of the Foreign Office to Palmerston. For the first time on record England and France acted in concert. Palmerston took a leading part in securing the independence of Belgium, in establishing the thrones of Isabella of Spain and Maria of Portugal, and in endeavouring, in alliance with Austria and Turkey, to check Russian influence in the East. In 1841 Palmerston went out of office with the Whigs on the question of free trade in corn, and under Lord John Russell in 1846 resumed the seals of the Foreign Office. His second term was embarrassed by the Spanish marriages (see Guizot), the revolutions in 1848, the rupture between Spain and Great Britain, the affair of Don Pacifico (a Gibraltar Jew living in Athens, who claimed the privileges of a British subject), and the consequent quarrel with Greece. His self-asserting character, his brusque speech, his interferences in foreign affairs, were little calculated to conciliate opponents at home, and secured for 'Firebrand Palmerston' many enemies abroad. A vote of censure on the foreign policy was in 1850 carried in the House of Lords, but defeated in the Lower House. In December 1851 Palmerston expressed to the French ambassador his approbation of the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon, without consulting either the premier or the Queen, and Lord John Russell advised his resignation. Next February he shattered the Russell administration on a Militia Bill. He refused office under the Earl of Derby, but was Home Secretary in Aberdeen's coalition (1852), whose fall (1855) brought Palmerston the premiership. He vigorously prosecuted the Russian war. Defeated in 1857 on Cobden's motion condemning the Chinese war, he appealed to the country, and met the House of Commons with a largely increased majority, but fell in Feb. 1858, over the Conspiracy Bill. In June 1859 he again became First Lord, and kept the post till his death, the chief events the American civil war, Napoleon's war with Austria, and the Austro-Prussian war with Denmark. He died 18th Oct. 1865, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. It was his ambition to be the minister of a nation rather than of a political party, and his opponents admitted that he held office with more general acceptance than any minister since Chatham. He was a dexterous tactician, and, though homely, a ready, witty, and often brilliant debater. See Lives by Lord Dalling and Evelyn Ashley (5 vols. 1870-76), Anthony Trollope (1882), Lloyd Sanders (1888), and the Marquis of Lorne (1892).

Palmieri, LUIGI (1807-96), meteorologist, became in 1847 professor at Naples, and in 1854 director of the Vesuvius observatory. [Pal-mee-ay'ree.]

Paltock, ROBERT (1697-1767), born in London, and bred to the law, wrote Peter Wilkins (1751); its authorship remained a mystery till 1835. See Bullen's edition (1884) and Athenæum 1884-85.

Paludan-Müller, FREDERIK (1809-76), Danish poet, wrote poems, dramas, and romances: But his fame rests on Adam Homo (1841-49; 7th ed. 1885), a humorous, satiric, didactic poem. See Georg Brandes, Danske Digtere (1877).

Panckoucke, a family that for four generations have been booksellers and publishers, first at Lille, but since 1798 in Paris. [Pang-kook.]

Pancras, Sr, son of a heathen noble of Phrygia, was baptised at Rome, but immediately afterwards was slain (304) in the Diocletian persecution, being only fourteen years old.

Pandulf, CARDINAL, the commissioner sent (1213) by Innocent III. to King John, who returned to England as legate (1218-21), and in 1218 was made Bishop of Norwich.

Pānini, Sanskrit grammarian, born near Attock, is variously referred to the 7th or 4th century B.C.

Panizzi, SIR ANTHONY, K.C.B. (1797-1879), born at Brescello in Modena, was an advocate, but, sharing in the revolution of 1821, fled to Liverpool, and in 1828 became Italian professor in University College, London, in 1831 assistant-librarian, and in 1856 chief librarian of the British Museum, where he showed great administrative faculty. See Life by Fagan (1880). [Pan-ii'zee.]

Pa'oli, PASQUALE DE, Corsican patriot, born 25th April 1725 at Rostino in Corsica, son of a patriot driven an exile to Naples in 1739. Thence Pasquale returned to take part in the heroic struggle of his country against the Genoese, and in 1755 was appointed to the chief command. He struggled bravely against disaffection and a powerful enemy, and might have achieved independence for Corsica had not the Genoese secured French help and sold the island (1768) to France. For a year he held out against a French army, but was overpowered, and escaped to England, where he was warmly received and granted a pension. Boswell, who had visited him in Corsica, introduced him to Dr Johnson. The French Revolution recalled Paoli to Corsica, of which he became governor; but under the Convention he organised a fresh insurrection. He supported a union with England, returned to England in 1796, and died 5th February 1807. In 1889 his remains were removed from London to Corsica. See Boswell's Account of Corsica (1768), and Lives by Arrighi (1843), Klose (1853), Bartoli (1867; new ed. 1889), and Oria (1869).

Paolo, FRA. See SARPI.

Papias, bishop at Hierapolis in Phrygia, in the earlier half of the 2d century, is known to us only from references by Irenæus, Eusebius, and a few others, and from fragments of his lost work ('Exposition of Oracles of the Lord'), in five books, preserved in their writings. He was a 'companion of Polycarp' (69-155 A.D.), bishop at Smyrna, who had been a disciple of the apostle John. See Lightfoot, Essays on 'Supernatural Religion' (1889).

Papin, DENIS, French physicist, born at Blois, 22d August 1647, and practised as a physician. He helped Huygens in his experiments with the air-pump; then, crossing to England, he assisted Boyle in his physical experiments, invented the condensing pump and the steam digester (1681), and was made a member of the Royal Society (1680). For four years he was at Venice, was back in London in 1684, in 1687 became professor of Mathematics at Marburg, but from 1696 to 1707 worked in Cassel. Returning to England, he died apparently in 1712. French writers have, on doubtful grounds, claimed that he was the inventor of the steam-engine and of steam-navigation as well. See a Life by Ernouf (Par. 1874), and his own correspondence with Huygens and Leibnitz as published by Gerland (1881). [Pa-pa-nø.]

Papineau, Louis Joseph (1789-1871), worked his way to the head of the French-Canadian party, and from 1815 to 1837 was Speaker of the House of Assembly for Lower Canada. He opposed the union of Upper and Lower Canada, and agitated against the imperial government; and at the rebellion of 1837 a warrant was issued against him for high-treason. He escaped to Paris; but returned to Canada, pardoned, in 1847.

Papinianus, Emilius (c. 140-212 A.D.), Roman jurist, held offices at Rome under Septimius Severus, but was put to death by Caracalla. Nearly 600 excerpts from his legal works were incorporated in Justinian's Pandects.

Pappenheim, Gottfried Heinrich, Count von, imperial general in the Thirty Years' War, was born at Pappenheim in Franconia, 29th May 1594, of an ancient Swabian family. At twenty he went over to the Roman Catholic Church, served the king of Poland, joined the army of the Catholic League, and decided the battle of Prague (1620). In 1625 he became general of the Spanish horse in Lombardy; but in 1626 re-entered the Austrian service, and after suppressing a peasant revolt co-operated with Tilly against Danes, Swedes, and Saxons. On his head rests in great measure the guilt of the ferocious massacres at Magdeburg. He involved Tilly in the disastrous battle of Breitenfeld, but made heroic efforts to protect the retreat. After Tilly's death he served under Wallenstein. He arrived at Lützen when Wallenstein's army was on the point of being routed by Gustavus Adolphus, and charged the Swedes' left wing with such fury as to throw it into confusion. He was mortally wounded in the last charge, and died next day (Nov. 7, 1632). [Pap-pen-hime.]

Pappus of Alexandria, mathematician, flourished about the end of either the 3d or 4th century A.D. One of his works, the 'Mathematical Collection,' in seven books, is extant. See Hultsch's edition (1876-78).

Paracelsus, a name coined for himself by Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim, son of a physician at Einsiedeln, in the canton of Schwyz, was born apparently 17th December 1493, went to Basel University at sixteen, studied alchemy and chemistry with Trithemius, Bishop of Würzburg, and next at the mines in Tyrol learned the properties of metals and minerals. In subsequent wanderings he amassed a vast store of facts, learned the actual practice of medicine, but lost all faith in scholastic disquisitions and disputations. He acquired fame as a medical practitioner (1526), was made town physician at Basel, and lectured on medicine at the university, but flouted at Galen and Avicenna, and justified the furious enmities that pursued him by his own vanity, arrogance, aggressiveness, and intemperate habits. A dispute with the magistrates in 1528 drove him from Basel; he wandered for a dozen years, and settled in 1541 at Salzburg, but died 23d September of the same year. Of some 250 works attributed to him, the critics only admit from ten to twenty-four as genuine, the others being by his followers the 'Paracelsists.' They were mainly written in Swiss-German; and about a dozen were translated into English. The earliest printed work was Practica D. Theophrasti Paracelsi (1529). Collected German editions appeared at Basel in 1589-91 and again in 1603-5 (reissued 1618), Latin editions in 1603-5 and 1658. In spite of his attraction to alchemy and mysticism, he made new chemical compounds, and improved pharmacy and therapeutics, encouraged research and experiment, and, in an empirical fashion, revolutionised hide-bound medical methods. See monographs by M. B. Lessing (1839), Marx (1842), Mook (1876), and Kahlbaum (1894), the English Life by Miss Stoddart (1911), and Browning's poem.

Pardoe, Julia, born at Beverley in 1806, published Traits and Traditions of Portugal in 1833. A visit to Constantinople in 1836 led to her City of the Sultan, Romance of the Harem, and Beauties of the Bosphorus. She visited Hungary, and wrote The City of the Magyar, and a novel, The Hungarian Castle (1842). A series of works deal with French history—Louis XIV. and the Court of France (1847), The Court and Reign of Francis I. (1849), The Life of Mary de Medicis (1852; new ed. 1891), and Episodes of French History during the Consulate and the First Empire (1859). Other books are The Confessions of a Pretty Woman, Flies in Amber, The Jealous Wife, Reginald Lyle, Lady Arabella, and The Thousand and One Days. She died in London, 26th Nov. 1862.

Paré, Ambroise (1510-90), the father of modern surgery, was born near Laval, in 1537 as surgeon joined the army starting for Italy, and was surgeon to Henry II., Charles IX., and Henry III. He died in Paris. Paré improved the treatment of gunshot wounds, and substituted ligature of the arteries for cauterisation with a red-hot iron after amputation. His Cinq Livres de Chirurgie (1562) and other writings exercised a great influence on surgery. See Lives by Paulmier (1884) and Stephen Paget (1898).

Paris, Gaston, born at Paris, 9th August 1839, in 1872 became professor of Old French at the Collège de France in succession to his father, Paulin Paris (1800-81). He edited medieval poems, wrote a long series of valuable works on medieval French literature, was in 1896 elected to the Academy, and died 6th March 1903.

Paris, Louis Philippe, Comte de (1834-94), grandson of King Louis Philippe, served in the American war (of which he wrote a history), lived mainly in England, and on the death of the Comte de Chambord (q.v.) became head of the Bourbon house. See BOURBON, ORLEANS.

Paris, Matthew, the best Latin chronicler of the 13th century, was born in England about 1200, entered the Benedictine monastery of St Albans in 1217, went on a mission to Norway, and died in 1259. His principal work is his Historia Major, or Chronica Majora, a history from the creation down to 1259, the first part compiled from Roger of Wendover and others, from 1235 his own work. It was published in 1571 by Archbishop Parker; the authoritative edition is by Dr Luard in the Rolls series (1872-83). The Historia Anglorum, abridged from the greater work, was edited by Sir F. Madden in the Rolls series (1866-69). Other works are lives of abbots and a book of Addimenta. See Dr Jessopp's Studies by a Recluse (1892).

Park, John, D.D. (1804-65), minister of St Andrews from 1854, wrote pleasing songs, and set them and songs by others to graceful music.

Park, Mungo, African traveller, was born 10th September 1771, at Foulshields on the Yarrow, and studied medicine in Edinburgh (1789-91). Through Sir Joseph Banks, he was named assistant-surgeon in the Worcester, bound for Sumatra (1792); and in 1795 his services were accepted by the African Association. He learnt Mandingo at an English factory on the Gambia, started inland in December, was imprisoned by a chief, but escaping, reached the Niger at Segou in July 1796. He pursued his way westward along its banks to Bammaku, and then crossing a mountainous country, fell ill, but was ultimately brought by a slave-trader back to the factory again, after an absence of nineteen months. He told his adventures in Travels in the Interior of Africa (1799). He married (1799), and settled as a surgeon at Peebles; but the life was repugnant to him, and in 1805 he undertook another journey to Africa at government expense. Again he started from Pisanía on the Gambia, with a company of forty-five; but when he reached the Niger he had but seven followers. From Sansanding he sent back his journals and letters in November 1805, and embarked in a canoe with four European companions. Through many perils and difficulties they reached Boussa, where they were attacked by the natives, and drowned in the fight. See Life by Wishaw prefixed to his later Journal (1815), and Lives by Joseph Thomson (1890) and MacLachlan (1898).

Parker, SIR GILBERT, born in Canada, 24th November 1862, became lecturer on English at a college in Toronto, edited a paper in Sydney, and since 1889 has been known as author of a series of novels, including When Valmond came to Pontiac (1895), The Seats of the Mighty (1896), The Battle of the Strong (1898), The Lane that had no Turning (1900), The Right of Way (1901), &c. He was returned to Parliament for Gravesend as a Unionist in 1900, and was knighted in 1902.

Parker, SIR HYDE (1730-1807), admiral, son of Vice-admiral Sir Hyde Parker (1714-82), in 1801 was appointed to command the fleet sent to the Baltic to act against the armed coalition of Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. He had no share in the battle of Copenhagen, in which Nelson engaged contrary to his orders.

Parker, JOHN HENRY (1806-84), bookseller at Oxford, published for the 'Oxford movement,' and by his writings on ecclesiastical architecture greatly promoted interest in medieval art and archaeology. From 1869 he was 'Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum.'

Parker, JOSEPH (1830-1902), preacher and author, the son of a stone-cutter, born at Hexham, studied at Moorfields Tabernacle and University College, London (1852), and became pastor of Congregational chapels at Banbury, Manchester, and, in 1869, of that now represented by the City Temple in London. Among his books are Helps to Truth-seekers (1857); Ecce Deus (1868; 5th ed. 1875), a reply to Ecce Homo; Ad Clerum (1870); City Temple Sermons (1869-70); Inner Life of Christ (1881-82); Apostolic Life (1884); People's Prayer-book (1889); People's Bible (1885-95); Tyne Clyde: My Life and Teaching (new ed. 1889).

Parker, MATTHEW, second Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich, August 6, 1504, studied at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and became chaplain to Queen Anne Boleyn (1535), dean of a college at Stoke in Suffolk, a royal chaplain, canon of Ely, master of Corpus Christi (1544), vice-chancellor (1545), and dean of Lincoln. He married, and by Mary was deprived of his preferments. Under Elizabeth he was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury (1559). The ritual was not the Roman one; but the scandalous fable that he was informally consecrated in an inn called the Nag's Head originated in Catholic circles forty years later. The new primate strove to bring about more general conformity. The Thirty-nine Articles were passed by convocation in 1562; and his 'Advertisements' for the regulation of service, and measures of repression perhaps forced upon him by the queen, provoked great opposition in the growing Puritan party. Parker originated the revised translation of the Scriptures known as the Bishops' Bible. He died 17th May 1575. He edited works by Elfric, Matthew Paris, Walsingham, and Giraldus Cambrensis, was an indefatigable collector of books, and maintained printers, transcribers, engravers. De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ (1572) was an original work. His letters fill a volume (Parker Soc. 1853). See his Life and Acts by Strype (1824); also Hook's Archbishops, vol. ix.

Parker, RICHARD (c. 1767-97), a seaman, born at Exeter, volunteered into the navy in 1797, and from 10th May till 13th June that year was ring-leader of the mutiny at the Nore, having for a time thirteen ships of the line, besides frigates, under his orders. He was hanged 30th June.

Parker, SAMUEL (1640-88), Bishop of Oxford, was regarded as a tool of James II. He wrote a dozen philosophical and polemical works or pamphlets, and a Latin history of his own times.

Parker, THEODORE (1810-60), American preacher, was born at Lexington, Mass., graduated at Harvard in 1836, and settled as Unitarian minister at West Roxbury, now in Boston. The rationalistic views which separated him from conservative Unitarians were expounded in A Discourse of Matters pertaining to Religion (1841), followed by Sermons for the Times. From 1844 he preached to a congregation of three thousand, besides incessantly writing on social and theological questions. He lectured also throughout the States, and plunged into the anti-slavery agitation. His health broke down, and he died in Florence. The English edition of his works was edited by Frances P. Cobbe (14 vols. 1863-71). See Lives by Weiss (1864), Frothingham (1874), Dean (1877), and Frances E. Cooke (3d ed. 1889); also Martineau's Essays (1890).

Parker, SIR WILLIAM (1781-1866), admiral, commanded in the Chinese war in 1841, and in 1847-50 in the Mediterranean. See the Life of him by Phillimore (1876-80).

Parkes, EDMUND ALEXANDER (1819-76), an army doctor, and after 1845 a practitioner in London, wrote largely on physiology, and was the founder of the science of hygiene.

Parkes, SIR HARRY SMITH, K.C.B., G.C.M.G. (1823-85), born near Walsall, went to China in 1841, and from 1883 was British minister there. See Life by Stanley Lane-Poole (1894).

Parkes, SIR HENRY, K.C.M.G. (1815-96), Australian statesman, was born, the son of a yeoman, at Stoneleigh, Warwickshire, emigrated to New South Wales in 1839, and at Sydney became eminent as a journalist. A member of the colonial parliament in 1854, he held various offices, from 1872 was repeatedly prime-minister, and was identified with free trade. See two autobiographical works by him (1892-97) and the Life by Charles E. Lyne (1897).

Parkhurst, JOHN (1728-97), educated at Rugby and Cambridge, published A Hebrew and English Lexicon without Points (1762), long a standard work. He also wrote against Priestley.

Parkinson, JOHN (1567-1650), a London herbalist, a native probably of Nottinghamshire.

Parkman, FRANCIS (1823-93), American historian, graduated at Harvard in 1844, studied law, and became the authoritative writer on the rise and fall of the French dominion in America. His chief works should be read as follows: The Pioneers of France in the New World (1865), The Jesuits in North America (1867), The Old Régime in Canada (1874), La Salle and the Great West (1869), Frontenac and New France (1877), A Half-Century of Conflict (1893), Montcalm and Wolfe (1884).

Parley, PETER. See GOODRICH; MARTIN (W.).

Parmenides (fl. 5th c. B.C.), Greek philosopher, and greatest member of the Eleatic School, in his didactic poem On Nature sought to demonstrate the reality of Absolute Being. The fragments were edited by Diels (1897), rendered into English hexameters by Thomas Davidson (1870), and paraphrased in English prose by W. L. Courtney (1882). [Par-men-i-deez.]

Parmigiano, or PARMIGIANINO (1504-40), the nickname of GIROLAMO FRANCESCO MARIA MAZZOLA, painter of the Lombard school, born at Parma, painted there, at Rome (1523-27), and at Bologna. [Par-mij-i-ah'no.]

Parnell, CHARLES STEWART, was born at Avondale, Co. Wicklow, June 27, 1846. His father belonged to an old Cheshire family which purchased an estate in Ireland under Charles II. His great-grandfather, Sir John Parnell (1744-1801), was Chancellor of the Irish Exchequer. Thomas Parnell (q.v.), the poet, belonged to the same family. Charles, whose mother was the daughter of an American admiral, studied four years at Magdalen College, Cambridge, but took no degree. In 1874 he became High Sheriff of County Wicklow; that same year he contested County Dublin without success, but in April 1875 was returned as a Home Ruler for County Meath. In 1877-78 he gained great popularity in Ireland by his audacity in the use of deliberate obstruction in parliamentary tactics. In 1878 he threw himself into agrarian agitation, and was elected president of the Irish National Land League. From the United States he brought home £70,000 for the cause. In 1880 he was returned for Meath and Mayo and for the city of Cork, sat for the last, and was chairman of the Irish parliamentary party. In 1880 too he formulated the method of 'boycotting.' Mr Gladstone's government put Parnell and other leading members of the Land League on trial, but the jury failed to agree. In opposing the government's Coercion Bill, Parnell was ejected from the House, with thirty-four of his followers (February 3, 1881). He refused to accept Mr Gladstone's Land Bill as a final settlement. In October Mr Gladstone sent him to Kilmainham jail; he was released on May 2, 1882. Parnell in the House of Commons expressed his detestation of the terrible tragedy of Phoenix Park. The Crimes Act was now hurried through parliament in spite of the Irish party. The Land League, proclaimed illegal after the issue of the 'No Rent' manifesto, was revived in 1884 as the National League, Parnell being president. The year before the sum of £35,000, mostly raised in America, had been presented to him by his admirers. After an unsuccessful attempt to make terms with the Conservatives, Parnell flung his vote—now eighty-six strong—into the Liberal scale, and brought about the fall of the short-lived first Salisbury government. Mr Gladstone's Home Rule Bill was defeated owing to the defection of Liberal members. The consequent appeal to the country (July 1886) gave Lord Salisbury a Unionist majority of over a hundred, and threw Parnell into close alliance with Mr Gladstone. Now it was that the Times published 'Parnellism and Crime'—with letters as by Parnell, expressing approval of Mr Burke's murder. A Special Commission sat 128 days, and, after the flight and suicide at Madrid of Pigott (q.v.), who had imposed upon the Times with forgeries, cleared Parnell (November 1889) of the charge of having been personally guilty of organising outrages; but his party were declared guilty of incitements to intimidation, out of which had grown crimes which they had failed to denounce. Parnell now raised an action against the Times, compromised by a payment of £5000. The 'uncrowned king' of Ireland was presented with the freedom of Edinburgh in July 1889. His frequent mysterious absences from his parliamentary duties were explained by his appearance as co-respondent in a divorce case brought by Captain O'Shea against his wife, and decree was granted with costs against Parnell (November 17, 1890). The Gladstonian party now demanded his retirement from leadership; and though the Irish members had reappointed him chairman, they met to reconsider the position a week later, and, after five days of wrangling, the majority elected Justin M'Carthy chairman. Parnell, with the remnants of his party, carried the warfare into Ireland; but his condemnation by the church and the emphatic defeat of his nominees at by-elections foretold the collapse of his party at the general election of 1892, when seventy-two Anti-Parnellites were returned against nine who claimed his name. Ere this, Parnell had died suddenly at Brighton, 6th October 1891, five months after his marriage to Mrs O'Shea; he is buried in Glasnevin cemetery, Dublin.—His sister, FANNY PARNELL (1854-82), wrote fiery poems and articles in aid of the cause. There are Lives—not free from bias—by T. P. O'Connor (1891), R. F. Walsh (New York, 1892), and others. See also T. P. O'Connor's Parnell Movement (1886), and Gladstone, Parnell, and the Great Irish Struggle (1888), by him and MacWade (1891); Justin M'Carthy, A History of Our Own Times (vol. v. 1897); and the Life by Barry O'Brien (2 vols. 1899).

Parnell, THOMAS, minor Queen Anne poet, born in Dublin in 1679. He was educated at Trinity College, took orders, and received the archdeaconry of Clogher, a prebend, and the vicarage of Finglass. The head of an English family settled in Ireland, with property both there and in Cheshire, he lived mostly in London, where his wit procured him the friendship of Harley, Swift, and Pope. After his wife's death he took to drinking, and died at Chester, while on his way to Ireland, in October 1718. Next year Pope published a selection of his poems, the best-known of which is the Hermit. The Night-piece and the Hymn to Contentment are better poetry. See Mitford's edition of the poems, with Life, &c., re-edited by G. A. Aitken (1894).

Parr, CATHARINE (1512-48), sixth wife of Henry VIII., daughter of Sir Thomas Parr of Kendal, married first Edward Borough, and next Lord Latimer, and on July 12, 1543, became queen of England by marriage with Henry VIII. She was distinguished for her learning and knowledge of religious subjects, her discussion of which with the king well-nigh brought her to the block. She persuaded Henry to restore the succession to his daughters. Very soon after Henry's death (1547) she married a former lover, Lord Thomas Seymour of Sudeley, and died in childbirth next year at Sudeley Castle near Cheltenham.

Parr, LOUISA, daughter of Matthew Taylor, R.N., and wife (1869) of Mr George Parr, surgeon, was born in London, and in 1870 produced Dorothy Fox, which was followed by a dozen more novels.

Parr, SAMUEL, scholar, was born, the son of a surgeon, at Harrow, January 26, 1747, went to school at Harrow, and left Cambridge in two years to become assistant-master at Harrow (1767-71); but, disappointed of the head-mastership, he started a school at Stanmore (1771-76). He was head-master of Colchester grammar-school (1776-78) and of Norwich (1778-86); and he held livings at Asterby, Hatton, Wadenhoe, and Graffham, and a prebend of St Paul's. He died March 6, 1825. He was regarded as the Whig Johnson; but none of his voluminous writings justify the reputation he once had. His complete works (8 vols. 1828) relate to matters historical, critical, and metaphysical. To his conversational powers he owed his fame. See Barker's Parriana (1828-29), De Quincey's essay, and Lives by Field (1828) and Johnstone (1828).

Parr, THOMAS ('Old Parr'), was born, according to the tradition, in 1483. He was a Shropshire farm-servant, and when 120 years old married his second wife, and till his 130th year performed all his usual work. In his 152d year his fame had reached London, and he was induced to journey thither to see Charles I. But he was treated at court so royally that he died, 14th Nov. 1635. Taylor, the Water-poet, wrote his Life, and the great Harvey in his post-mortem report repeats the popular hearsay. Cornwall Lewis and W. J. Thoms showed that there is no sound evidence for the facts in this or in similar cases.

Parrhasius, greatest painter of ancient Greece, worked at Athens in the 4th century B.C.

Parrish, EDWARD (1822-72), pharmacist of Philadelphia, is known through 'Parrish's Chemical Food,' the Compound Syrup of Phosphate of Iron.

Parry, SIR CHARLES HUBERT HASTINGS, composer, was born at Bournemouth, Feb. 27, 1848, the son of Thomas Gambier Parry (1816-88) of Highnam Court, Gloucester, inventor of the spirit-fresco process. Educated at Eton and Oxford, in 1883 he became professor in the Royal College of Music, and in 1895 its director. He has composed the oratorios Judith, Job, and King Saul; an opera on Lancelot and Guinevere; symphonies, quartets, cantatas, &c.; and has written The Art of Music (1894) and Evolution of Music (1896). Knighted in 1898, he was made a baronet in 1902.

Parry, JOHN ORLANDO. See REED, T. G.

Parry, JOSEPH (1841-1903), musician, was born at Merthyr-Tydfil, studied at the Royal Academy of Music, and became professor at Cardiff College. He composed oratorios and operas, songs and hymns.

Parry, SIR WILLIAM EDWARD (1790-1855), Arctic navigator, was born at Bath, son of Caleb Hillier Parry (1755-1822), an eminent physician. Entering the navy as midshipman, he served against the Danes in 1808, and in 1810 was sent to the Arctic regions to protect the whale-fisheries. He took command in five expeditions to the Arctic regions—in 1818 (under Ross), 1819, 1821-23, 1824-25, and 1827—the last an attempt to reach the Pole on sledges from Spitzbergen. In 1829 he was knighted, and in 1837 was made comptroller of a department of the navy. He was subsequently superintendent of Haslar (1846), made rear-admiral (1852), and governor of Greenwich Hospital (1853). See the collected edition of his voyages (1833), and the Life by his son (1857).

Parsons, ALFRED WILLIAM, landscape-painter, born in 1847, made A.R.A. in 1897, R.A. in 1911.

Parsons, SIR CHARLES ALGERNON, K.C.B. (1911), developer of the steam-turbine and manufacturing engineer, is the fourth son of the third Earl of Rosse, born 1854, and educated at Cambridge.

Parsons, ELIZABETH (1749-1807), was the Cock Lane Ghost. See A. Lang's Cock Lane (1894).

Parsons, FATHER ROBERT, Jesuit, born at Nether Stowey, Somerset, 24th June 1546, passed from Taunton to Oxford, and became a fellow and tutor of Balliol. His enemies secured his forced retirement from Oxford in 1574. He now turned Catholic, and at Rome entered the Society of Jesus (1575), becoming a priest in 1578. With Campion (q.v.) Parsons landed at Dover in 1580, disguised as a merchant of jewels, amazed Catholics and Protestants by his activity and success, and for twelve months baffled all the attempts of government to catch him. In 1581 he escaped to the Continent. In 1582 he was at Paris conferring with the Provincial of the French Jesuits, the Archbishop of Glasgow, the papal nuncio, and the agent of the king of Spain, concerning his own project for the invasion of England; and this plan he himself carried to King Philip at Madrid. Now began his influence with the Spanish king, and the series of political enterprises which culminated in the Armada of 1588. At Rouen in 1582 he had finished his Christian Directory; and he founded a seminary at Eu. In 1588 he was rector of the college at Rome; and he organised seminaries for his countrymen at Valladolid in 1589, St Lucar in 1591, Seville and Lisbon in 1592, and St Omer in 1593. After 1595 the loyal Catholic clergy regarded with jealousy the ambitious schemes of the Jesuits and the Spanish party. Parsons persuaded the pope to appoint George Blackwell (q.v.), a Jesuit partisan, as archbishop over the secular clergy; but the appointment was strenuously resisted by the seculars. Parsons died at Rome, April 15, 1610. In The Conference on the next Succession to the Crown he insists on the right of the people to set aside, on religious grounds, the natural heir to the throne. The Jesuit's power of invective may be seen in his Responsio ad Elizabethæ edictum (1591). His other polemical tracts are historically interesting.

Parton, JAMES (1822-91), was born at Canterbury, but taken when a child to America, where he became a journalist, wrote biographies of Greely, Butler, Franklin, Voltaire, and others, and did much miscellaneous work. He married a sister of N. P. Willis (q.v.), who, as 'Fanny Fern,' wrote many children's books.

Partridge, JOHN (1644-1715), astrologer and almanac-maker, was originally a shoemaker at East Sheen, but contrived to learn Latin, Greek, Hebrew, medicine, and astrology, and published a number of astrological books. The manifold quackery of his prophetic almanac, Merlinus Liberatus, led Swift (under the name of Bickerstaff) to ridicule and expose him.

Pascal, BLAISE, was born at Clermont-Ferrand in Auvergne, 19th June 1623, son of a president of the Court of Aids, who in 1630 settled in Paris. The boy worked out for himself at twelve the propositions of Euclid as far as the thirty-second; and at sixteen wrote a treatise on conic sections. Richelieu sent the father as Intendant to Rouen in 1641, and here, in contact with the Jansenists, Blaise gave himself to study. To this period belongs his first conversion. In 1647 he published his Nouvelles Expériences sur le Vide, and next year made his famous Pny de Dôme experiments on atmospheric pressure. Other scientific labours of his life were his calculating machine, and his contributions to the infinitesimal calculus, and to the theory of the equilibrium of fluids, of probability, and of the cycloid. In the autumn of 1647 he returned to Paris; in 1652 Jacqueline, one of his two accomplished sisters, joined the Jansenist community of Port Royal. In 1654 occurred Pascal's second conversion, marked by a vision or state of ecstasy. From this time he subjected himself to the most rigid mortifications, complete denial of self, boundless charity, and absolute obedience to his spiritual director. For a time he lived in Port Royal, and henceforth he threw himself with a passionate devotion into its cause. Arnauld was condemned by the Sorbonne in 1655 for asserting the identity of the Augustinian and Jansenist doctrines of gratia efficax. In January 1656 Pascal came to his aid with A Letter written to a Provincial by one of his Friends. A second was issued a few days later. These flew from hand to hand, and the rage and fury of the Jesuits knew no bounds. Never before had been seen such delicate yet scathing irony, such incisive argument wedded to perfect felicity of phrase and rare distinction of style. There are altogether eighteen Letters from the pen of Pascal himself, a fragment of a nineteenth ascribed to him, and a twentieth by M. Le Maître. The Letters discuss at length the whole subject of the moral theology of the Jesuits, with all its subtle equivocations and refinements for the extenuation of sin. His Letters occupied him till the spring of 1657, and during the following year he busied himself in a scheme for a great Apology of religion, his faith meanwhile being quickened by his belief in a miraculous cure effected on a niece by touching a thorn from the crown of Christ. His health gave way during 1658, and thenceforward he bore the burden of constant suffering with saintly resignation, till on 19th August 1662 he sank to rest under his sister's roof at Paris. In 1669 appeared his Pensées, unhappily garbled in the supposed interests of orthodoxy by a committee of Jansenists; as they were in 1776 by Condorcet in the interests of heterodoxy. Bossut's edition (1779) was long accepted; but in 1842 Cousin first showed the real state of the case. Faugère first gave (1844; trans. 1850) an authentic text; but neither his attempt to restore the true order nor that of Havet (1852; 2d ed. 1860), Rochet (1873), or of Molinier (1877-79) is convincing. Michaud's (1897) follows Pascal's own order. The Pensées, detached thoughts intended as materials to be shaped into his projected Apology, contain some of the most profound, suggestive, and startling thoughts that have ever been expressed on the greatest mysteries within the range of human speculation. Yet there exist in the Pensées startling fragments deeply tinged with scepticism; and they owe much to Montaigne, Charron, and the 13th-century Spanish writer Raymond Martiu. More or less complete editions of Pascal's works are those of Bossut (1779), Lahure (1858), Faugère (8 vols. 1886-95), and Brunschvicg (1904). Of the Provincial Letters, besides Lesieur's reprint of the original quarto (1867), there are editions by Villemain (1829), Maynard (1851), De Sacy (1877), De Soyres (Lond. 1880), L. Derome (1885 et seq.), and Molinier (2 vols. 1891). There are English translations by Royston (1657), Pearce (1849), and Dr McCrie (1846). Of the Pensées there are, besides those already mentioned, editions by Frantin (1835), Lahure (1858), Louandre (1854), and Rochet (1873). English translations are those by Walker (1688), Craig (1825), Pearce (1850), and Kegan Paul (1885). For Jacqueline Pascal, see works by Cousin (1845) and Weizel (New York, 1880), and the edition of her poems and other writings by Faugère (1845). See vols. ii. and iii. of Sainte-Benve's Port Royal (1842-48), and Charles Beard's Port Royal (1861); the studies by Reuchlin (Stutt. 1840), Vinet (1856), Cousin (1857), H. Weingarten (Leip. 1863), Dreydorff (Leip. 1870), Tulloch (1878), and Joseph Bertrand (1890); also the articles ARNAULD and JANSEN.

Paschal was the name of two popes (817-824 and 1099-1118), besides an antipope (died 1168).

Paskevitch, IVAN FEDOROVITCH, Russian field-marshal, was born at Poltava, 19th May 1782, served against the French in 1805, and against the Turks, and took a prominent part in the campaign of 1812. In 1826 conquering Persian Armenia and taking Erivan, he was made Count of Erivan; in 1828-29 he made two campaigns against the Turks in Asia, taking Kars and Erzerüm. In 1831 he suppressed the rising in Poland, and was made Prince of Warsaw; under his governorship Poland was (1832) incorporated with Russia. In 1848, sent to the support of Austria, he defeated the insurgent Hungarians. In 1854 he commanded the Russian army on the Danube, was wounded at Silistria, retired to Warsaw, and died 1st February 1856. See French Lives of him by Tolstoy (1835) and Stcherbatoff (1888). [Pas-kay'vitch.]

Pasley, GENERAL SIR CHARLES WILLIAM (1780-1861), served with the engineers in Spain, at Walcheren, and again in Spain; was for thirty years director of the engineer establishment at Chatham, and wrote on military subjects.

Pasquier, ÉTIENNE DENIS, DUC DE (1767-1862), a statesman under Napoleon, the Bourbons, and Louis-Philippe, was chancellor of France in 1837-48, and was created a duke in 1844. See his History of my Time (Eng. trans. 1894).

Passaglia, CARLO, born at Lucca, 2d May 1812, in 1827 entered the Society of Jesus, and in 1844 became professor in the Collegio Romano. In 1849-51 he taught in England. In 1855 he published a treatise on the Immaculate Conception, but leaving the Jesuits, wrote a famous pamphlet against the temporal power, Pro Causa Italica (1859). He now withdrew to Turin, where he edited the Mediatore (1862-66), was professor of Moral Philosophy, and died 13th March 1887. [Pas-sahl'ya.]

Passow, FRANZ (1786-1833), born at Ludwigs-lust in Mecklenburg, in 1815 became professor of Archaeology at Breslau, and wrote and edited much. His Handwörterbuch (1819-24; 5th ed. 1841-57) formed the basis of Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon. See Life by Wachler (1839).

Pasta, GIUDITTA, opera singer, was born of Jewish parents, Negri by name, at Como, 9th April 1798, and studied at Milan. She married a singer called Pasta (before 1816), and achieved her first triumph at Verona in 1822. From 1825 to 1833 was her most glorious period in London and Paris. She lived at Lake Como from 1834 till her death, 1st April 1865.

Pasteur, LOUIS, born at Dôle, 27th December 1822, studied at Besançon and Paris, and held academic posts at Strasburg, Lille, and Paris, where in 1867 he became professor of Chemistry at the Sorbonne. From 1886 he worked at the Pasteur Institute in Paris. His work was at first chemical—as on tartrate crystals and ‘left-handed’ tartrates. He erelong discovered a living ferment—a micro-organism comparable in its powers to the yeast-plant—which would, in a solution of paratartrate of ammonia, select for food the ‘right-handed’ tartrates alone, leaving the ‘left-handed.’ He next showed that other fermentations—lactic, butyric, acetic—are essentially due to organisms, greatly extended Schwann’s researches on putrefaction, gave valuable rules for making vinegar and preventing wine disease, and refuted supposed proofs of spontaneous generation. After 1865 he tackled, with brilliant success, silkworm disease, injurious growths in beer, splenic fever, and fowl cholera. He showed that it was possible to attenuate the virulence of injurious micro-organisms by exposure to air, by variety of culture, or by transmission through various animals. He thus demonstrated by a memorable experiment that sheep and cows ‘vaccinated’ with the attenuated bacilli of anthrax were protected from the evil results of subsequent inoculation with the virulent virus; and by the culture of antitoxic re-agents prophylactic treatment of diphtheria, tubercular disease, cholera, yellow fever, and plague has been found effective. His treatment of hydrophobia depends on similar proofs. A devout Catholic, he died 28th Sept. 1895, and was committed to his final resting-place in the Pasteur Institute 26th Dec. 1896. See Pasteur by P. Frankland (1898).

Paston, a Norfolk family, named from the village of Paston, whose letters and papers, published in 1787 as the Paston Letters, shed a vivid light on domestic life in the 15th century. Gairdner edited them with more fullness in 1872-75, and again completely in 1904, after the recovery of two long-lost additional volumes. The chief members of the family were William Paston (1378-1444), Justice of Common Pleas under Henry VI.; his son John (1421-66); Clement Paston (c. 1515-97), a sailor under Henry VIII.; and Sir Robert Paston (1631-83), by Charles II. created Earl of Yarmouth.

Pater, WALTER, a critic distinguished for critical insight and a style of exquisite finish, was born in London, 4th August 1839, and educated at King’s School, Canterbury, and at Queen’s College, Oxford, taking a classical second-class in 1862. He died at Oxford, 30th July 1894. Among his books were Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873), on Leonardo, Botticelli, Joachim du Bellay, and others; Marius the Epicurean (1885), a spiritual biography; Imaginary Portraits (1887) of Watteau and others; Appreciations (1889), on Lamb, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Rossetti, Sir Thomas Browne, Blake, and Style itself; Miscellaneous Studies (1895); and Gaston de la Tour (1897). There are books on him by Greenslet (1904), A. C. Benson (1906), and T. Wright (1907).

Paterculus, MARCUS VELLEIUS, a Roman historian, born about 19 B.C., served under Tiberius. He was alive in 30 A.D., and may have perished next year as a friend of Sejanus. His Historiæ Romanæ, a compendium of universal, but more particularly of Roman history, is not complete, and is superficial and rhetorical. See editions by Kritz (1848), Halm (1876), and Prof. Ellis (1899).

Paterson, ROBERT, ‘Old Mortality,’ born, a farmer’s son, near Hawick, 25th April 1715, was apprenticed to a stone-mason, and rented a quarry in Morton parish. From about 1758 he neglected to return to his wife and five children, and for over forty years devoted himself to the task of repairing or erecting head-stones to Covenanting martyrs. He died at Bankhill, 14th Feb. 1801, and was buried at Caerlaverock, where a monument was erected to him by the Messrs Black in 1869. See Introduction to Old Mortality and Ramage’s Drumlanrig Castle (1876).

Paterson, WILLIAM, founder of the Bank of England, was born at Skipmyre farm, in Tinwald parish, Dumfriesshire, in April 1658, and spent some years in the West Indies. Returning to Europe, he promoted his Darien Scheme in London, Hamburg, Amsterdam (where he worked for the Revolution of 1688), and Berlin, made a fortune by commerce in London, founded the Hamstead Water Company in 1690, projected the Bank of England, and was one of its first directors in 1694. At Edinburgh he soon talked the whole nation into his Darien Scheme. He sailed with the expedition in a private capacity, shared all its troubles, and returned with its survivors a broken man in December 1699. But his energy remained unabated. He had a considerable share in promoting the Scottish union, and was elected to the first united parliament by the Dumfries burghs. In 1715 he was awarded £18,000 as indemnity for his Darien losses. A far-seeing financier and a free-trader before free-trade times, he died in January 1719. See the Life by S. Bannister (1858), editor of his Works (1859); and that by J. S. Barbour (1907).

Patey, JANET MONACH (1842-94), contralto singer, the daughter of a Scotsman called Whytock, was born in London, made her first concert-tour in 1865, and married a singer, John George Patey, in 1866. She died suddenly at Sheffield.

Patmore, COVENTRY KEARSEY DEIGHTON, poet, was born at Woodford in Essex, July 23, 1823, the son of P. G. Patmore, author of My Friends and Acquaintances. He published a volume of Poems in 1844, and was a librarian in the British Museum from 1847 till 1868. He married in 1847 Emily Augusta Andrews (1824-62), daughter of an Independent minister, and after her death embraced Catholicism. Ultimately he settled at Hastings, where he built a large Catholic church. His second volume of poems, Tamerton Church-tower, &c. (1853), prepared the way for The Angel in the House (1854-66), an exquisite poem on domestic love. A revised edition was issued in his collected poems (1878 and 1886), including also The Unknown Eros, and other Odes (published in 1877), and preceded by an essay on English Metrical Law. Patmore edited the anthology entitled The Children’s Garland (1862), the Autobiography of Barry Cornwall (1877), and the posthumous poems of his son, Henry Patmore (1884). The Root, the Root, and the Flower (1895) contains apophthegms on a religious life. There are selections by Dr Garnett (1888) and Mrs Meynell (1895). He died 26th November 1896. See Lives by Champneys (2 vols. 1900) and Mr Gosse (1905).

Paton, JOHN, Covenanter, was the son of a farmer at Fenwick in Ayrshire, became a captain in the army of Gustavus Adolphus, fought at Rullion Green and Bothwell Brig (1679), and, apprehended in 1684, was hanged 9th May.

Paton, JOHN GIBSON, D.D., the son of a stocking-maker, was born in Kirkmahoe parish, Dumfriesshire, 24th May 1824, and in 1858 went as a missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church to the cannibals of the New Hebrides. His brother published and edited his graphic missionary narratives. He died in January 1907.

Paton, SIR NOEL, painter, was born in Dunfermline, 13th December 1821, and studied at the Royal Academy, London. Notable early pictures are the two on 'Oberon and Titania,' both in the National Gallery at Edinburgh. Others are 'Dante Meditating' (1852), the 'Dead Lady' (1854), 'The Pursuit of Pleasure' (1855), 'Home from the Crimea,' 'In Memoriam,' six illustrations of the 'Dowie Dens o' Yarrow,' 'Luther at Erfurt,' 'The Fairy Raid,' 'Faith and Reason,' 'Gethsemane,' 'Christ and Mary at the Sepulchre,' 'The Man of Sorrows,' 'Mors Janua Vitæ,' 'The Spirit of Twilight,' 'Thy Will be Done' (1879), 'Beati Mundo Corde' (1891), &c. He illustrated Aytoun's Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers and the Ancient Mariner. R.S.A., Queen's Lunner for Scotland from 1865, knighted (1867), LL.D. (1876), he published two volumes of poems. He died 26th December 1901. See Art Journal for April 1895.—His brother, WALLER (1828-95), R.S.A., R.S.W., was a notable landscape-painter.

Patrick, Sr., the Apostle of Ireland, is said by Ussher to have been born in 372. Some writers assign his birthplace to Boulogne-sur-Mer; others to Kilpatrick near Dumbarton. His father was a deacon named Calpurnius. His own Celtic name was Succat, Patricius being his Latin designation. In his sixteenth year he was seized by pirates, carried to Ireland, and sold to an Antrim chief called Milchu. After six years he escaped, and, probably after a second captivity, went to France, where he became a monk, first at Tours and afterwards at Lerins. He was ordained a bishop at forty-five, and at sixty (432) went as a missionary to Ireland, Palladius, sent thither by Pope Celestine a short time before, having died. Patrick landed at Wicklow; thence he sailed north to convert his old master Milchu. In Down he converted another chief, Dichu. At Tara in Meath he preached to the king of Tara, Laoghaire. Thence he proceeded to Croagh-Patrick in Mayo, to Ulster, and as far as Cashel in the south. He addressed himself first to the chiefs, and made use of the spirit of clausiph. He is reported to have founded 365 churches, baptised 12,000 persons, consecrated 450 bishops, and ordained vast numbers of priests, not to speak of monks and nuns. After twenty years spent in missionary labours, he fixed his see at Armagh (454). He died at Saul (Saul-patrick; Sabhal, 'baru'), the spot which Dichu had given him on his arrival, and was buried in all likelihood at Armagh. Ussher, followed by Todd, fixes his death at 493—a date that would make Patrick's age quite 120 years; but the true date seems to be 463. The only certainly authentic literary remains of the Saint (both in very rude Latin) are his 'Confession' and a letter addressed to Coroticus, a British chieftain who had carried off some Irish Christians as slaves. See the great Life by Dr Todd (1863), Newell's (1890), Zimmer's (1904, disputing his historical existence), and J. B. Bury's (1905, reaffirming it); also Whitley Stokes's edition of the Tripartite Life (1887).

Patrick, SIMON (1626-1707), born at Gainsborough, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and was successively rector of St Paul's, Covent Garden (1662), Dean of Peterborough (1678), Bishop of Chichester (1689) and of Ely (1691). He was a devout and erudite theologian, and a sagacious and catholic churchman. His sermons and commentaries were long famous; of his works may here be named A Brief Exposition of the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, The Parable of the Pilgrims, The Heart's Ease, The Christian Sacrifice, and The Devout Christian In- structed. His Autobiography is included in his works (9 vols. Clar. Press, 1858).

Patteson, JOHN COLERIDGE, martyr-bishop, was born in London on 1st April 1827, the son of Sir John Patteson, judge in the King's Bench, and of a niece of Coleridge. He passed through Eton and Balliol, and was a fellow of Merton, and curate of Allington in Devonshire. From 1855 he spent sixteen years in missionary work in the New Hebrides, Banks, Solomon, and Loyalty Islands; and in 1861 he was consecrated Bishop of Melanesia. He was killed by the natives of the Santa Cruz group on 20th September 1871. See Life by Miss Yonge (2 vols. 1874).

Patti, ADELINA, was born at Madrid, 19th Feb. 1843, the daughter of a Sicilian tenor. At seven she sang in New York, and there she made her début as 'Lucia' in 1859. In London she appeared in 1861, when her success was as splendid as it afterwards was wherever she has sung—from St Petersburg to Buenos Ayres. Her voice is an unusually high, rich, ringing soprano. She married in 1866 the Marquis de Caux, and, on her divorce in 1886, the Breton tenor Ernesto Nicolini (1834-98). Her home is Craig-y-nos Castle near Swansea. In June 1895 she returned to the stage; in 1898 she was naturalised. On Jan. 25, 1899, she married the Swedish Baron Cederström.—Her sister, CARLOTTA (1840-89), also a great soprano, was born at Florence, made her début at New York in 1861 as a concert-singer (being debarred by lameness from opera), and married in 1879 the cellist Ernst de Munk. [Pat'tee.]

Pattison, MARK, was born 10th October 1813, at Hornby in Yorkshire, but brought up mostly at Hauxwell, of which parish his father was rector. He was educated at home until, in 1832, he entered Oriel College, where, a shy and diffident lad, he suffered much from morbid self-consciousness. He took a second-class in classics (1837), and was elected fellow of Lincoln (1839). Under Newman's influence he forsook Evangelicalism, wrote two Lives of the Saints, translated for the 'Library of the Fathers,' and almost followed his master into the fold of Rome. Then came a reaction towards liberalism, and he soon became a tutor of exceptional influence. An attempt to deprive him of his fellowship failed; but for ten years he took little share in Oxford life. He published an article on education in the Oxford Essays, went with a commission on education to Germany, and served for three months of 1858 as Times correspondent at Berlin. Scholars soon came to recognise his hand in the Quarterly, Westminster, and Saturday Review. His luminous Report on Elementary Education in Protestant Germany appeared in 1859, his paper on 'Tendencies of Religious Thought in England, 1688-1750,' in Essays and Reviews (1860). At length, in 1861, he was elected Rector of his college. In 1862 he married Emilia Frances Strong (afterwards Lady Dilke, q.v.). Down to his death at Harrogate, 30th July 1884, he lived wholly for study. His standard of perfection was so high that his actual achievement is only suggestive of his powers, and the greatest project of his life—the study of Scaliger—remains a fragment, printed by Prof. Nettleship in vol. 1. of Pattison's collected Essays (1889). He did publish Suggestions on Academical Organisation (1868); admirably annotated editions of Pope's Essay on Man (1869) and Satires and Epistles (1872); Isaac Casaubon (1875); Milton, in the 'Men of Letters' (1879); the Sonnets of Milton (1883); and Sermons (1885). See his frank posthumous Memoirs (1885) and Lionel Tollemache's Recollections of Pattison (1895).—DOROTHY WYNDLOW PATTISON, his sister, was born at Hauxwell, January 16, 1832. In 1861 she started a life of labour for others as schoolmistress at Little Woolston near Bletchley; in 1864 she joined a sisterhood at Coatham near Redcar; and in 1865 she began as 'Sister Dora' her devoted labours as nurse at Walsall. In 1877 she took charge of the municipal epidemic hospital (mainly for smallpox). She was also indefatigable in all good works for unfortunates and poor neighbours, but died 24th December 1878. See Miss Lonsdale's Sister Dora (1880).

Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, was born of Jewish parents at Tarsus in Cilicia, and trained for a rabbi under Gamaliel at Jerusalem, acquiring also the trade of tent-maker. A strenuous Pharisee, he assisted in persecuting the Christians; and was on his way to Damascus on this mission when a vision of the Crucified converted him into a fervent adherent of the new faith. After three years spent mainly at Damascus, but partly in Arabia, he visited Jerusalem again, and undertook, with Barnabas, his first mission-tour in Cyprus, Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Lycaonia. At Antioch he found the controversy raised as to the condition under which Gentiles and Jews respectively were to be admitted to the Christian Church, a controversy in which Paul opposed Peter, and through which he was finally separated from his colleague Barnabas. Since the time of Baur (q.v.) much diversity of opinion has prevailed as to the amount of divergence that obtained between Paul and the original apostles at the conference in Jerusalem, Baur affirming that the elder apostles remained essentially Judaic, and viewed Paul's freer views with inevitable disapproval. At all events, Paul addressed himself hereafter mainly to the Gentiles. His second mission-journey led him, with Silas, again to Asia Minor and through Galatia and Phrygia to Macedonia and Achaia, where in Corinth he was especially successful. A year and a half later he was again at Jerusalem and Antioch, and then undertook a third mission-tour—to Galatia and Phrygia. Driven from Ephesus, he visited Achaia and Macedonia again, and by way of Miletus returned by sea to Jerusalem. There the fanaticism of the Jews against him led to disturbances, whereupon he was brought to Caesarea to be tried before Felix the procurator, and after two years' imprisonment before Felix's successor M. Porcius Festus. Now using his right as a Roman citizen, Paul appealed to Caesar, and in the spring of 62 A.D. arrived in Rome, where he spent two years a prisoner, but in his own hired house. He was executed under Nero—probably at the end of the two years' captivity, though tradition makes him visit Spain and other countries. The ancient church recognised thirteen of the New Testament Epistles as Paul's, but did not unanimously regard Hebrews as his. All but the most destructive modern critics accept unhesitatingly as Paul's the Epistles to the Galatians, Romans, and Corinthians (1st and 2d). But a considerable body of scholars dispute the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles, 2d Thessalonians and Ephesians, some also Colossians and Philippians. The order of the Epistles is certainly not chronological, though it is difficult to fix the succession. See the works on Paul by Baur (1845; trans. 1873); Conybeare and Howson (1852; often re-edited); Hansrath (1869; trans. 1871); Farrar (1879); Pfeiderer (Der Paulinismus, 2d ed. 1890);

Paul was the name of five popes. PAUL I. (757–67) and PAUL II. (1467–71) were unimportant. PAUL III., Alessandro Farnese (born 1468), a Tuscan, was created cardinal-deacon in 1493, and in 1534 was elected pope. One of his first acts was to give cardinal's hats to two of his boy-grandsons, and throughout his reign he laboured to advance his bastard sons. Yet he surrounded his throne with good cardinals like Contarini, Pole, and Sadolet. He convoked a general council in 1542, but it did not actually assemble (in Trent) until 1545. He it was who in 1538 issued the bull of excommunication and deposition against Henry VIII. of England, as also the bull instituting the order of the Jesuits (1540). He sent a force to support Charles V. against the Protestants, and tried later to trim between the emperor and Francis I. He died November 10, 1549. See Bishop Creighton's History of the Papacy (vols. v.–vi. 1894–97).—PAUL IV. (Giovanni Pietro Caraffa) was born in Naples in 1476. As Bishop of Chiotti he laboured earnestly for the reformation of abuses and for the revival of religion and morality. He was a rigorous enemy of heresy, and under his influence Paul III. organised the Inquisition in Rome. Elected pope in 1555, he enforced upon the clergy the observance of all the clerical duties, and enacted laws for the maintenance of public morality. He established a censorship, issued a full Index Librorum prohibitorum, completed the organisation of the Roman Inquisition, and lightened the burdens of the poor. He was embroiled with the Emperor Ferdinand, with Philip II. of Spain, with Cosmo, grand-duke of Tuscany. He died August 18, 1559.—PAUL V. (Camillo Borghese), born in Rome in 1552, rose to be nuncio at the Spanish court and cardinal, and on the death of Leo XI. in 1605 was elected pope. In his time took place the great conflict with the republic of Venice, as to the immunity of the clergy from the jurisdiction of civil tribunals, and other questions. Paul issued a brief denouncing excommunication against the doge and senate, and placing the republic under an interdict. By the intervention of Henry IV. of France the dispute was accommodated in 1607, after the pope had abandoned his claims. Paul promoted charities and useful public works, and preserved antiquities. He died January 28, 1621. See T. A. Trollope's Paul the Pope, and Paul the Friar (1860).

Paul, emperor of Russia, second son of the unfortunate Peter III. and the Empress Catharine II., was born October 2, 1754, became heir-apparent in 1763, and succeeded his mother in 1796. The tragical death of his father when he was still a child and his mother's neglect exerted a baneful influence on his character. His earliest measures were the exile of his father's murderers and the pardon of Polish prisoners, including Kosciusko. But he soon revealed his violent temper and lack of capacity, and irritated all his subjects by vexatious regulations. He suddenly declared for the allies against France, and sent an army of 56,000 men under Suvaroff into Italy; sent a second to co-operate with the Austrians, retired from the alliance, quarrelled with England, and entered into close alliance with Bonaparte. After his convention with Sweden and Denmark, England sent a fleet into the Baltic under Nelson to dissolve the coalition (1801). His own officers conspired to compel Paul to abdicate, and in a scuffle the emperor was strangled, March 24, 1801.

Paul of SAMOS'ATA was born at Samosata on the Euphrates, and in 260 became bishop or patriarch of Antioch, and so was practically the vicergerent of Queen Zenobia of Palmyra; but in 272 was deposed for monarchianism—the doctrine that the Son is rather an attribute of the Father than a person.

Paula. See FRANCESCO DI PAULA.

Paulding, JAMES KIRKE, was born in Dutchess county, New York, August 22, 1779. A friend of Washington Irving, he wrote part of Salmagundi. During the war of 1812 he published the Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan, and in 1814 a more serious work, The United States and England, which gained him an appointment on the Board of Naval Commissioners. He also wrote a successful novel, The Dutchman's Fireside (1831), Westward Ho! (1832), a Life of Washington (1835), and a defence of Slavery in the United States (1836). In 1837 he became Secretary of the Navy. He died 6th April 1860. See Literary Life by his son (1867).

Paulet, or POULET, SIR AMYAS (c. 1536–88), succeeded his father as governor of Jersey, was ambassador to France (1576–79), and was Keeper of Mary Queen of Scots from 1585 till her death (1587). See his Letter-book (ed. Morris, 1874).

Pauli, REINHOLD, was born in Berlin, 25th May 1823, studied at Bonn and at Oxford, and in 1849–52 was private secretary to Bunsen. He was successively professor of History at Restock, Tübingen, Marburg, and Göttingen, and died, an Oxford D.C.L., at Bremen, 3d June 1882. Pauli's lifelong studies were devoted to English history. His excellent book on Alfred (1851; Eng. trans. 1852) led to his writing the period from Henry II. to Henry VIII. in the great Geschichte von England (1853–58). Other works are Bilder aus Alt-England (trans. 1861), a history of England since 1814 (in German, 1864–75), Simon de Montfort (trans. 1876), a series of essays on English history, and an edition of Gower's Confessio Amantis (1856).

Paulinus, first Archbishop of York, was a Roman sent with Augustine to Kent by Pope Gregory in 601. Ordained bishop by Justus, fourth archbishop, in 625, he accompanied Ethelburga on her marriage to the heathen Edwin of Northumbria, who was baptised at York in 627. Edwin's death in battle drove him back to Kent, where, having in 633 received the pallium as Archbishop of York, he died Oct. 10, 644.

Paulus. See EMILIUS and SCIPIO AFRICANUS.

Paulus, HEINRICH EBERHARD GOTTLOR, pioneer of rationalism, was born at Leonberg near Stuttgart, 1st September 1761, studied at Tübingen, and, as professor at Jena (1789–1803), produced a New Testament commentary (1800–4), one on the Psalms (1791), and one on Isaiah (1793). He was afterwards professor at Würzburg and at Heidelberg, where he died, August 10, 1851. Of his numerous works the most important were his Leben Jesu (2 vols. 1828), and a commentary on the first three gospels (3 vols. 1830–33). He asserted the impossibility of the supernatural, and explained the miracles as due to mistaken opinions and errors in narration. See his Autobiography (1839) and a book by Reichlin-Meldegg (1853). [Pow'lus.]

Paulus Ægineta, Greek physician, was born in Ægina, and flourished in the 7th century.

His Synopsis of the Medical Art went through many editions and translations.

Paulus Diaconus, Lombard historian, was born at Friuli about 720, and probably resided at the court of the Duke of Beneventum. He became a monk about 774, but spent some years at the court of Charlemagne, and retired to Monte Cassino in 787. His Historia Romana is based on Eutropius. The Historia Langobardorum comes down to 744. Other works are a Life of Gregory the Great; Gesta Episcoporum Mettensium; a Book of Homilies, selected from Augustine, Chrysostom, &c.; and poems and letters. See German works by Jacobi (1877) and Loeck (1890).

Paul Veronese. See VERONESE.

Pausanias, Spartan regent, a nephew of Leonidas, commanded the confederate Greeks at Plataea (479 B.C.), where the Persians were routed. He then compelled the Thebans to give up the chiefs of the Persian party, and haughtily treated the Athenians and other Greeks. Capturing Cyprus and Byzantium, he negotiated with Xerxes in the hope of becoming ruler under him of the whole country, and was twice recalled for treachery. He tried to stir up the Helots, was betrayed, and fled to a temple of Athena, where he was built up and left to die of hunger.

Pausanias, Greek geographer and historian, was probably a native of Lydia, and flourished under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Aurelius. He travelled through almost all Greece, Macedonia, and Italy, and also through part of Asia and Africa, and composed from his observations and researches an Itinerary of Greece, describing the different parts of that country and the monuments of art. His style is unpretentious and easy, and his Itinerary possesses the rare merit of being the work of an accurate eye-witness, one of the earliest examples of the antiquary; bare and meagre as it is, it remains one of the most precious records of antiquity. There are editions by Siebelis (5 vols. 1822–28), Schubart and Walz (3 vols. 1838–40), and Hitzig and Blümner (1896); and translations by A. R. Shilleto and J. G. Frazer. See also Margaret Verrall's Ancient Athens (1890), and books by Kalkmann (1886), Gurlitt (1890), Bencker (1890), and Heberder (1896).

Paxton, SIR JOSEPH, born at Milton-Bryant near Woburn, 3d August 1801, began life as a working-gardener in the service of the Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick and at Chatsworth; there he remodelled the gardens, and was made manager of the duke's Derbyshire estates. His experience in designing glass conservatories found wider scope in his design for a palace of glass and iron for the Great Exhibition of 1851, which brought him a knighthood. He designed the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, and superintended its construction. He wrote or edited several horticultural works, and died 8th June 1865, having represented Coventry since 1854.

Payn, JAMES, novelist, was born at Cheltenham, 28th Feb. 1830, and educated at Eton, Woolwich Academy, and Trinity, Cambridge. In 1855 he published a volume of poems, in 1858 succeeded Leitch Ritchie as editor of Chambers's Journal, and in 1882 Leslie Stephen as editor of the Cornhill—this post he resigned in 1896. He died 25th March 1898. Of his hundred novels may be named here Lost Sir Massingberd (1864), A Woman's Vengeance, Curly's Year, Not Wooded but Won, By Proxy, Thicker than Water, The Talk of the Town, The Heir of the Ages, A Modern Dick Whittington (1892), A Trying Patient (1893), and In Market Overt (1895). See his Some Literary Recollections (1886) and Gleanings of Memory (1894).

Payne, HENRY NEVILLE, wrote tragedies and comedies, intrigued in Scotland for James II. after the Revolution, was tortured in Edinburgh with 'the boot' in 1690, and was imprisoned till 1700. He seems to have died about 1710.

Payne, JOHN HOWARD, born in New York, 9th June 1791, made his debut as an actor there in February 1809, and in 1813 appeared in London. For thirty years he had a successful career as actor and author of plays, chiefly adaptations; that called Clari contains the song Home, Sweet Home, the music being by Sir Henry Bishop. Payne was appointed American consul at Tunis in 1841, and died there 10th April 1852. See his Life and Poems, edited by Harrison (1875; new ed. 1885), and Brainard's J. H. Payne (1885).

Payne, JOSEPH (1808-76), had a successful school in London, was in 1872 appointed professor of Education in the College of Preceptors, and published several books on education, including Lectures (2 vols. 1883-92).

Payne, PETER, Wycliffite, was born near Grantham, studied at Oxford, and became in 1410 principal of St Edmund Hall. Charged with heresy, he fled about 1416 to Bohemia, where, till his death in 1455, he played a conspicuous part as a controversialist amongst the Hussites, taking the Taborite or extreme view. See Baker's A Forgotten Great Englishman (1894).

Payne, ROGER (1739-97), born at Windsor, became famous, after 1766, as the most artistic bookbinder in London.

Payne-Smith, ROBERT, was born at Chipping Camden in Gloucestershire, 7th November 1819, studied at Pembroke College, Oxford, and was successively master in the Edinburgh Academy and incumbent of a chapel there, head-master of a school at Kensington, and sub-librarian of the Bodleian (1857-65), where he began his great Thesaurus Syriacus (1870-93). Sermons on Isaiah (1862) led to his appointment as regius professor of Theology at Oxford (1865-70), whence he removed to the deanery of Canterbury. He died 31st March 1895. He gave the Bampton Lectures on Prophecy (1869), and published books on Daniel, Jeremiah, Samuel, and Genesis.

Peabody, GEORGE, philanthropist, was born at South Danvers, Mass., 18th February 1795, of Leicestershire stock, and was successively in a grocer's shop, a haberdasher's, and a Baltimore dry-goods store, in which he became a partner in 1829. He established himself in London in 1837 as a merchant and banker, and in his lifetime gave away a million and a half for philanthropic purposes. Amongst his gifts were $10,000 to Kane's Arctic expedition, $50,000 to $200,000 to found institutes in Danvers and Baltimore, gifts to Harvard and other colleges, $3,500,000 for the Southern Education Fund, and $500,000 towards building industrial homes in London. He refused a baronetcy. He died in London, Nov. 4, 1869; and his remains were conveyed to America in an English war-ship. See the Life of him by P. A. Hanford (1882) and Robert Cochrane's Benevolent and Useful Lives (1890).

Peacock, THOMAS LOVE, satirist, was born at Weymouth on 18th October 1785, the only child of a London merchant. From thirteen he was self-educated, but grew up an accomplished scholar. The chief events of his life were his under-secretaryship on a warship (1808-9); his close friendship with Shelley; his clerkship and examinership to the East India Company (1819-56). He died at Halliford, 23d January 1866. Of his half-dozen booklets of verse (1804-37) the best, Rhododaphne, offers nothing so good as some of the gay lyrics scattered throughout his seven 'novels'—Headlong Hall (1816), Melincourt (1817), Nightmare Abbey (1818), Maid Marian (1822), The Misfortunes of Elphin (1829), Crotchet Castle (1831), and Gryll Grange (1860). And these 'novels' are interesting chiefly as a study of character—that of the author, a Rabelaisian pagan, egoistic, protean, a student of Aristophanes, Petronius, and the Italians. Three plays were first published in 1910. See memoirs in Cole's (1875) and Garnett's (1892) editions, the Life by Carl van Doren (1911), and the critical study by A. M. Freeman (1911).

Pearson, CHARLES HENRY (1830-94), born at Islington, and educated at Rugby, King's College, London, and Oriel and Exeter Colleges, Oxford, was successively professor or lecturer on Modern History at King's College, London (1855-65), Trinity College, Cambridge (1869-71), and Melbourne University (1874). He went into the colonial parliament in 1878, and in 1886-90 was Minister of Education. He died in London. His chief work was National Life and Character (1893). Earlier was a History of England in the Early and Middle Ages (1867). See Life by Strong, prefixed to a volume of his articles (1896).

Pearson, JOHN, divine, was born 28th February 1613, at Great Snoring, Norfolk, son of the Archdeacon of Suffolk. He was educated at Eton and at Queen's and King's Colleges, Cambridge, and in 1640, appointed chaplain to the lord-keeper Finch, was presented to the rectory of Thorington in Suffolk. In 1659 he published his learned Exposition of the Creed, and edited the remains of John Hales of Eton. In 1660 he was presented to the rectory of St Christopher's in London, and made prebendary of Ely, Archdeacon of Surrey, and Master of Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1661 he was the principal antagonist of Baxter in the Savoy Conference, and became Margaret professor of Divinity; in 1662 he was made Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1673 Bishop of Chester. He defended the genuineness of the Ignatian epistles (1672), and in 1684 published his Annales Cyprianici. He died July 16, 1686. Admirable editions of the Exposition of the Creed are by Burton (1833) and Chevallier (1849; revised by Sinker, 1882); of the Minor Theological Works, with Life, by Churton (1844).

Pearson, KARL, F.R.S., professor of Applied Mathematics in University College, London, has published Socialism in Theory and in Practice (1885), The Ethics of Free Thought (1888), The Grammar of Science (1892), and works on enginics.

Peary, ROBERT, American admiral, made eight Arctic voyages by the Greenland coast, reaching in 1906 87° 6' N. lat., and on 6th April 1909 attaining the North Pole. See accounts of his travels in a series of books by himself, his wife, Heilprin, and others.

Pease, EDWARD (1767-1858), carried on till 1817 his father's woollen manufactory in Darlington, and subsequently promoted railways, and was George Stephenson's supporter. The family were Quakers, and worked for the Peace Society and the Anti-slavery Society; two of Edward's sons entered zealously into their father's schemes, and were members of parliament.

Peacock, REGINALD, divine, born in Wales about 1395, was a fellow of Oriel, Oxford, and received priest's orders in 1422. His preferments were the mastership of Whittington College.

London, together with the rectory of its church (1431); the bishopric of St Asaph's (1444); and that of Chichester (1450). He plunged into the Lollard and other controversies of the day, and compiled many treatises, of which the Donet (c. 1440), on the main truths of Christianity, and his Treatise on Faith (c. 1456), are still extant. The object of his Repressor of Over Much Blaming of the Clergy (c. 1455) was to promote the peace of the church by plain arguments against Lollardy. His philosophic breadth and independence of judgment brought upon him the suspicions of the church. In 1457 he was denounced for having written in English, and for making reason paramount to the authority of the old doctors. He was summoned before Archbishop Bouchier, condemned as a heretic, and given the alternative of abjuring his errors or being burned. He elected to abjure, gave up fourteen of his books to be burnt, and, concussed into resigning his bishopric, spent the rest of his days in the abbey of Thorney in Cambridgeshire, dying about 1460. See James Gairdner's Studies in English History (1881), Churchill Babington's edition of the Repressor in the Rolls series (1860), and the Life by John Lewis (1774; reprinted 1820).

Peden, ALEXANDER (c. 1626-86), Covenanter, studied at Glasgow, was ejected in 1662 from his ministry at New Luce in Galloway, and subsequently wandered preaching at conventicles and hiding in caves. He was repeatedly in Ireland, and in 1673-77 was imprisoned on the Bass Rock. His preaching was famous, and many of his utterances were regarded as prophecies.

Pedro I. (1798-1834), emperor of Brazil, second son of John VI. of Portugal, fled to Brazil with his parents on Napoleon's invasion, and became prince-regent of Brazil on his father's return to Portugal (1821). He declared for Brazilian independence in 1822, and was crowned as Pedro I. The new empire did not start smoothly, and Pedro in 1831 abdicated and withdrew to Portugal.—Pedro II., his son, born 2d Dec. 1825, became king on his father's abdication, and, distinguished by his love of learning and scholarly tastes, reigned in peace until the revolution of 1889 drove him to Europe. He died at Paris, 5th Dec. 1891. See French Life by Mossé (1889).

Pedro the Cruel, king of Castile and Leon, born 30th August 1334, succeeded his father, Alfonso XI., in 1350, and assuming full power in 1353, became exceedingly popular with the people for his justice, but alienated the nobles and clergy. When he had marched to suppress a revolt in Estremadura, he was betrayed by his brother Henry and taken prisoner. Escaping, despite the excommunication of the pope, he speedily crushed the rebels. But now he became suspicious of every one; and the rest of his reign was devoted to the establishment of his own authority on the ruins of the feudal tyranny of the great vassals, and to long-continued and bloody wars with Aragon and Granada. He owes the epithet Cruel mainly to the murder of his brother Don Fadrique in 1358; the people were in general well and justly governed, but heavy taxes dissipated his popularity. Henry returned from France (1366) at the head of a body of exiles, backed by Du Guesclin, and aided by Aragon, France, and the pope. Edward the Black Prince, persuaded to espouse Pedro's cause in 1367, defeated Henry and Du Guesclin at Navarrete (13th April). But, disgusted by his ally's non-fulfilment of his promises, the English prince repassed the Pyrenees and left Pedro to his fate. The whole kingdom groaned under his cruelties; rebellions broke out everywhere; and when, in 1367, Henry returned, Pedro was routed at Montiel (1369), and in a single combat (or a wrangle) with Henry was slain, 23d March 1369. See Prosper Mérimée's monograph (1848; 2d ed. 1865; Eng. trans. 1849).

Peel, SIR ROBERT, was born 5th February 1788, near Bury in Lancashire. His father, Sir Robert Peel (1750-1830, M.P. from 1790, created baronet in 1800), was a wealthy cotton-manufacturer and calico-printer, and from him he inherited a great fortune. He had three years at Harrow, took a double-first from Christ Church, Oxford, in 1808, and entered parliament in 1809 as Tory member for Cashel. In 1811 he was appointed Under-secretary for the Colonies, and in 1812-18 was Secretary for Ireland. In this capacity 'Orange Peel' displayed a strong anti-Catholic spirit, and was so fiercely attacked by O'Connell (q.v.) that he sent the agitator a challenge. From 1818 till 1822 Peel remained out of office, but sat for the University of Oxford. In 1819 he was chairman of the Bank Committee, and moved the resolutions which led to the resumption of cash-payments. In 1822 he re-entered the ministry as Home Secretary, and he and Canning as Foreign Secretary worked together pretty well, Peel devoting himself to the currency; but on 'Roman Catholic emancipation' Canning was in advance of Peel; and when Canning formed a Whig-Tory ministry, Peel, along with the Duke of Wellington and others, withdrew from office (1827). Yet, when the death of Canning led to the Wellington-Peel government, its great measure was that for the relief of the Roman Catholics (1829). As Home Secretary he re-organised the London police force ('Peelers' or 'Bobbies'). Peel opposed parliamentary reform, and in 1830 the Wellington-Peel ministry was succeeded by a Whig ministry under Earl Grey, which, in 1832, carried the Reform Bill. Peel shrank from factious obstruction of the measure, but as leader of the 'Conservative' opposition, sought by vigilant criticism of Whig measures to retard the too rapid strides of Liberalism. Rejected by Oxford in 1829, but returned for Westbury, Peel represented Tamworth from 1833 till his death. In November 1834 he accepted office as prime-minister, but gave place to Lord Melbourne in April 1835. The general election of 1841 was virtually a contest between Free-trade and Protection, and Protection won. The Conservative party, headed by Peel, now came into office. The Whigs were bent upon a fixed but moderate duty on foreign corn; the Anti-Corn-law League would hear of nothing short of repeal; while Sir Robert carried (1842) a modification of the sliding-scale. The deficit in the revenue led him to impose (1842) an 'income-tax' of 7d. in the pound, to be levied for three years. To alleviate the new burden Peel revised the general tariff, and either abolished or lowered the duties on several very important articles of commerce. He resolutely repressed the malcontents of Ireland, and O'Connell's influence was broken. In 1845 the allowance to Maynooth was changed into a permanent endowment, and the Irish unsectarian colleges were founded. But the potato-rot in Ireland, followed by a frightful famine, rendered 'cheap corn' a necessity. Cobden and the League redoubled their exertions. Peel again yielded, telling his colleagues that the corn-laws were doomed. Lord Stanley (afterwards Earl of Derby) succeeded, and, with Lord George Bentinck, Disraeli, and others, formed a 'no-sur-render' Tory party; but the Duke of Wellington, Graham, Aberdeen, Gladstone, and other eminent Conservatives stood by him, and repeal was carried. Defeated on an Irish Protection of Life Bill, he retired in June 1846, giving place to a Whig administration under Lord John Russell, to which he gave independent but general support. In the critical times of 1847-48 he was one of the most important props of the government, whose free-trade principles he had now accepted. He had a keen English interest in sport, and a cultivated taste in matters literary and artistic. On 29th June 1850 he was thrown from his horse, and was so much injured that he died 2d July. See his (non-biographical) Memoirs, edited by Earl Stanhope and Viscount Cardwell (1857), Speeches (1835 and 1853), and C. S. Parker's Peel Papers (3 vols. 1891-99); monographs by Guizot (1851), Laurence Peel, Lord Dalling, Barnett Smith, F. C. Montague (1888), Justin M'Carthy (1891), and J. R. Thurstfield (1891); Shaw Lefevre, Peel and O'Connell (1887); Greville's Memoirs; Beaconsfield's Bentinck; Morley's Cobden; Fronde's Beaconsfield (1890); and Croker's Memoirs, Diaries, and Correspondence (1884). Peel left five sons, the eldest of whom, SIR ROBERT (1822-95), and the second, SIR FREDERICK (1823-1906), held office as ministers; whilst ARTHUR WELLESLEY, the youngest (born 3d August 1829), was Speaker of the House of Commons 1884-95, and then was created Viscount Peel.

Peele, GEORGE, Elizabethan dramatist, was born probably about 1558, and went up to Oxford in 1571. He took his bachelor's degree in 1577, his master's in 1579. By 1581 he had removed to London, where for seventeen years he lived a roistering Bohemian life as actor, poet, and playwright, dying a discreditable death in 1598. He was one of those warned to repentance by Greene in his Groatsworth of Wit (1592). His best work, The Arraignment of Paris (1584), is a dramatic pastoral containing some exquisite verse and ingenious flatteries of Elizabeth. Another pastoral play, The Hunting of Cupid (1591), is lost. His Farewell to Sir John Norris on his expedition to Portugal (1589, eked out by A Tale of Troy), his Eloque Gratulatory (1589) to the Earl of Essex, his Polyhymnia (1590), his Speeches for the reception of Queen Elizabeth (1591), and his Honour of the Garter (1593) are other occasional poems. The historical play of Edward I. (1593) is marred by its baseless slanders against Queen Eleanor. His bombastic Battle of Alcazar (1594) was followed by another now lost. His charming play, The Old Wives' Tale (1595), probably gave Milton the subject for his Comus. David and Bethsabe was published in 1599; the authorship of Sir Clyomon and Sir Clamydes (1599) is more than doubtful. Peele's works were first collected by Dyce (1828); a supplementary third volume in 1839; reissue, with Greene, in 1861. The best edition is by A. H. Bullen (1888). See Symonds's Shakspeare's Predecessors (1884).

Peile, JOHN, born at Whitehaven, 24th April 1838, graduated in 1860 as senior classic from Christ's College, Cambridge, of which in 1887 he became master. He wrote Greek and Latin Etymology (1869), Primer of Philology (1877), and other philological works, and died 9th October 1909.

Peirce, BENJAMIN (1809-80), American mathematician, in 1833 became professor at Harvard, in 1849 astronomer to the American Nautical Almanac, and in 1867-74 was superintendent of the Coast Survey. In 1836-46 he issued a series of mathematical text-books. His papers on the discovery of Neptune (1848) and on Saturn's rings (1851-55) attracted great attention. His Treatise on Analytic Mechanics appeared in 1857.

Peirson, FRANCIS (1757-81), major, commanding the troops at St. Helier in Jersey, after the governor had been captured by a French force, was killed in victoriously repelling the invaders. His death is the subject of Copley's famous picture. See Oules, The Death of Peirson (1881).

Pelagius, heretic, was born, a Briton or an Irishman, about 370, his name being a Greek translation of the Celtic Morgan ('sea-born'). He was a monk, but never took orders, and settled in Rome about 400. Here he wrote On the Trinity, On Testimonies, and On the Pauline Epistles, and attached Celestius, an Irish Scot, to his views. About 409 the two withdrew to Africa, and Pelagius made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Celestius having sought ordination at Carthage, his doctrines were examined and condemned; and in 415 Pelagius too was accused of heresy before the synod of Jerusalem. The Pelagian heresy was held to deny original sin. It is possible to live without sin. Grace as understood by the Catholic Church was not required; free-will and the teaching of the law may suffice; and the will is equally free to choose to do good and to do evil. The impeachment failed, but a new synod of Carthage in 416 condemned Pelagius and Celestius; and ultimately Pope Zosimus adopted the canons of the African Council, and Pelagius was banished from Rome in 418, and is said to have died, over seventy, in Syria. The Pelagian sect was soon extinguished, but Pelagianism and Semi-Pelagianism often troubled the church. See works by Wiggers (1832); trans. by Emerson, 1840, Jacobi (1842), Wörter (1866), and Klasen (1882).

Pelayer, said to have been the first Christian king of Spain, seems to have made head against the Arabs in Asturias in the 8th century.

Pelham, SIR THOMAS (c. 1650-1712), of Herefordshire ancestry, in 1706 was created Baron Pelham.—His son and successor, THOMAS PELHAM HOLLES (1693-1768), succeeded in 1711 to the estates of his maternal uncle, John Holles, Duke of Newcastle; and George I. created him Earl of Clare (1714) and Duke of Newcastle (1715). A Whig and a supporter of Walpole, in 1724 he became Secretary of State, and held the office for thirty years. In 1754 he succeeded his brother, Henry Pelham, as premier, but retired in 1756. In July 1757 he was again premier, and compelled to take the first William Pitt into his ministry and to give him the lead in the House of Commons and the supreme direction of the war and of foreign affairs—Newcastle, an incapable minister, but strong in court-craft and intrigue, being a mere figurehead. On the accession of George III. Bute superseded Newcastle (1762). In the Rockingham ministry (1765) he was for a few months Privy Seal.—His younger brother, HENRY PELHAM (c. 1695-1754), took an active part in suppressing the rebellion of 1715, became Secretary for War in 1724, and was a zealous supporter of Walpole. In 1743 he was made head of a ministry as First Commissioner of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. Events during his ministry were the war of the Austrian succession, the rebellion of '45, the financial bill of 1750, the reform of the calendar, and Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act.—HENRY PELHAM-CLINTON (1811-64), fifth Duke of Newcastle and twelfth Earl of Lincoln, represented South Notts from 1832 to 1846, when he was ousted for supporting Peel's free-trade measures. He was a Lord of the Treasury in the Conservative administration of 1834-35, First Commissioner of Woods and Forests in 1841-46, and then Irish Secretary. He succeeded to the dukedom in 1851, and returned to office in 1852, being Colonial Secretary in the Aberdeen government. At the Crimean war he was made Secretary of State for War—the first to hold that office. But the sufferings of the British army in the winter of 1854 raised a storm of discontent, and he resigned. He was Colonial Secretary under Palmerston, 1859-64.

Péllissier, AMABLE JEAN JACQUES, born 6th November 1794 near Rouen, served in Spain in 1823, in the Morea in 1828, in Algeria in 1830 and 1839. In 1845 he acquired notoriety by suffocating 500 fugitive Arabs in caves in the Dahra. In the Crimean war (1854) he commanded the first corps, and succeeded Canrobert in the chief command before Sebastopol. For storming the Malakhoff he was made Marshal and Duc de Malakhoff. In 1858-59 he was French ambassador in London; thereafter he was governor of Algeria. He died 22d May 1864. [Pay-less-jay.]

Pellegrini, CARLO (1839-89), caricaturist, born at Capua, came to London in 1864, and from 1869 till his death was the cartoonist, 'Ape,' of Vanity Fair. [Pel-leh-gree-nee.]

Pellico, SILVIO (1788-1854), born at Saluzzo in Piedmont, spent four years at Lyons, and at Milan (1810) was French tutor in the military school. His tragedies of Laodamia and Francesca da Rimini gained him a name; and he translated Byron's Manfred. In 1820 he was arrested and imprisoned for two years at Venice. He was then, on a charge of Carbonarism, condemned to death, but had his sentence commuted to fifteen years' imprisonment in the Spielberg near Brünn, and was liberated in 1830. During this time he wrote two other dramas; and he published an account of his imprisonment, Le mie Prigioni (1833). Pellico subsequently published numerous tragedies and poems, and a catechism on the duties of man. See Lives by Chiala (Italian, 1852), Bourdon (5th ed. Paris, 1885), and Rivieri (1899-1901).

Pellisson-Fontanier, PAUL (1624-93), wrote a history of the French Academy, and was a member of it. Ste-Beuve ranks him as a classic.

Pelly, SIR LEWIS, K.C.S.I., K.C.B. (1825-92), entered the Indian army, and served England as administrator or diplomatist in Baroda, Sind, Afghanistan, Central Arabia, Baroda (at the trial of the Gaekwar), and on the north-west frontier.

Pelopidas, in 382 B.C., was driven from Thebes by the oligarchic party, who were supported by the Spartans, and sought refuge at Athens, whence he returned with a few associates in 379, and recovered possession of the citadel. His 'sacred band' of Theban youth largely contributed to Epaminondas's victory at Leuctra (371). In the expedition against Alexander of Phæræ (368) he was treacherously taken prisoner, but rescued by Epaminondas next year. He was then ambassador to the Persian court. In 364, in command of a third expedition against Alexander of Phæræ, he marched into Thessaly, and won the battle of Cynoscephalæ, but was himself slain.

Pemberton, MAX, reviewer and novelist, born at Birmingham, 19th June 1863, was educated at Merchant Taylors' and Caius College, Cambridge, produced The Diary of a Scoundrel in 1891, The Iron Pirate in 1893, The Hundred Days in 1905, My Sword for Lafayette in 1906, and in 1896-1906 was editor of Cassell's Magazine.

Pembroke. See HENRY II. and HERBERT.

Panda (c. 577-655), heathen king of Merca, was constantly at war with Northumbria. He defeated Oswald at Maserfelth (? Oswestry) in 642, but was himself defeated and slain by Oswy on the Winwæd, either in Lothian or in Yorkshire.

Pender, SIR JOHN, G.C.M.G., F.R.S. (1815-96), was born in the Vale of Leven, Dumbartonshire, became an export merchant in Glasgow and then in Manchester, and did much for the promotion and execution of Atlantic and oceanic telegraphy. He repeatedly sat in parliament from 1862 on.

Penderel, the name of five Shropshire Catholic yeomen who aided Charles II. (q.v.) at Boscobel. See Allan Fea's Flight of the King (1897).

Penelope, wife of Ulysses. During his long wanderings after the fall of Troy he was regarded as dead, and Penelope, to put off her many suitors, pretended that she must first weave a shroud for her father-in-law, and undid by night what she had woven by day. [Pen-el-o-pee.]

Pengelly, WILLIAM, F.G.S., F.R.S. (1812-94), schoolmaster and tutor at Torquay, was eminent as a geologist, especially in connection with the exploration of the Brixham Cave and Kent's Hole. See The Life by his daughter (1897).

Penn, WILLIAM, founder of Pennsylvania, was the son of Admiral William Penn, and was born at London, 14th October 1644. He was sent down from Christ Church, Oxford, for having become a zealous Quaker; and his father sent him to the Continent, in the hope that the gaiety of French life would alter the bent of his mind. He returned a polished man of the world, having served for a little in the Dutch war. In 1666 the admiral despatched him to look after his estates in Cork, but for attending a Quaker meeting in Cork he was imprisoned. He returned to England a thorough-going Quaker. In 1668 he was thrown into the Tower for his Sandy Foundation Shaken, in which he attacked the ordinary doctrines of the Trinity, God's 'satisfaction' in the death of Christ, and justification by the imputation of Christ's righteousness. While in prison he wrote the most popular of his books, No Cross, no Crown, and Innocency with her Open Face, a vindication of himself that contributed to his liberation, obtained through the interference of his father's friend, the Duke of York. In September 1670 Admiral Penn died, leaving his son an estate of £1500 a-year. In the same month he was again imprisoned for preaching; and in 1671 he was sent to Newgate for six months. He took advantage of the indulgence for making preaching tours, and he visited Holland and Germany for the advancement of Quakerism. In 1681 he obtained from the crown, in lieu of his father's claim upon it, a grant of territory in North America, called Pensilvania in honour of the old admiral; his desire being to establish a home for his co-religionists. Penn with his emigrants sailed for the Delaware in 1682, and in November held his famous interview with the Indians on the site of Philadelphia. He planned the city of Philadelphia, and for two years governed the colony wisely, with full tolerance for all that was not by Puritanism regarded as wicked (card-playing, play-going, &c. being strictly forbidden as 'evil sports and games'). Penn returned to England to exert himself in favour of his persecuted brethren at home. His influence with James II. and his belief in his good intentions were curiously strong. The suspicion that Penn allowed himself to be used as a tool is not justified by any known facts. Through his exertions, in 1686 all persons imprisoned on account of their religious opinions (including 1200 Quakers) were released. After the accession of William III. Penn was repeatedly accused of treasonable adhesion to the deposed king, but was finally acquitted in 1693. In 1699 he paid a second visit to Pennsylvania, where his constitution had proved unwelcome, and had to be much altered. He did nothing to mitigate the evils of slavery, but held negro-slaves himself. He departed for England in 1701. His last years were embittered by disputes about boundaries, and the ill-behaviour of his son and his steward; he was even, in financial embarrassment, thrown for nine months into the Fleet in 1708. He died at Ruscombe in Berkshire, July 30, 1718. He was twice married, and wrote over forty works or pamphlets. See the Life prefixed to his collected works (1726), and to later issues of 'select works;' and Lives by Clarkson (1813), Barker (1852), Janney (1852), Hepworth Dixon (new ed. 1856), Burdette (1882), Stoughton (new ed. 1883), Sparks, Draper, Bridges, and others.

Pennant, THOMAS, traveller, was born at Downing near Holywell, Flintshire, 14th June 1726. In 1744 he went to Oxford, but left without a degree. His many tours included visits to Ireland (1754), the Continent (1765), Scotland (1769 and 1772), and the Isle of Man (1774), besides rambles through England and Wales. He was F.R.S. and D.C.L., and died 16th December 1798. From boyhood a naturalist, for years a correspondent of Linnaeus, Pennant published British Zoology (1765-77), British Quadrupeds (1771), Arctic Zoology (1785), History of London (1790), &c.; he is remembered by his Tours in Scotland (1771-75) and Wales (1778-81). See his Literary Life by himself (1793), and the memoir in Rhys's edition of the Tours in Wales (1883).

Pennell, HENRY CHOLMONDELEY, born in 1837, was in 1866-75 Inspector of Sea Fisheries, and subsequently an official in Egypt. He has written many books on fishing and fisheries (2 vols. in the Badminton series), as well as Puck on Pegasus (1861) and other volumes of verse.

Pennell, JOSEPH, artist in black and white and book illustrator, born at Philadelphia, 4th July 1860, has lived much in England. He has written* on book illustration; and with his wife (née Elizabeth Robins, author of a Life of Mary Wollstonecroft, 1884) has produced illustrated tours on the Thames, in Provence, in Hungary, and elsewhere, and a Life of Whistler (1908).

Penrose, ELIZABETH ('Mrs Markham'), was the daughter of the Rev. Edmund Cartwright (q.v.), inventor of the power-loom, and was born in 1780. She married the Rev. John Penrose, vicar of Bracebridge, and in 1823 wrote under the pseudonym her History of England, in 1828 her History of France. Other works were Amusements of Westernheath, A Visit to the Zoological Gardens, Historical Conversations, and Sermons for Children. She died in Lincoln, 24th January 1837.

Pentraeth, DOLLY (1685-1777), was the maiden name of the last person reputed to speak Cornish, an itinerant fishwife and fortune-teller, and wife of a man called Jeffery. She was born and died at Mousehole on Mount's Bay. See Jago's Ancient Language of Cornwall (1882).

Penzance, JAMES PLAISTED WILDE, LORD (1816-99) son of a London solicitor, and educated at Winchester and Trinity, Cambridge, became Baron of Exchequer in 1860, judge of Probate and Divorce (1863) and of the Court of Arches (1875).

Pepin, or PIPPIN (c. 715-68), surnamed 'the Short,' king of the Franks, son of Charles Martel (q.v.) and father of Charlemagne (q.v.), founded the Frankish dynasty of the Carolingians. Childeric, the last of the Merovingians, having been deposed, Pepin was chosen king in his stead (751). When Pope Stephen III. was hard pressed by the Longobards, Pepin led an army into Italy (754), compelled the Longobard Aistulf to become his vassal, and laid the foundation of the temporal sovereignty of the popes (756). The rest of his life was spent in semi-crusading wars against Saxons and Saracens.—PEPIN OF HERISTAL (died 714) succeeded as mayor of the palace in Anstrasia, to this added after 687 the similar vice-royalties of Neustria and Burgundy, and called himself 'Duke and Prince of the Franks.' He was their real ruler during several reigns.—PEPIN (777-810), son of Charlemagne, was crowned king of Italy in 781, and fought against the Avars, Slavs, Saxons, and Saracens.

Pepper, JOHN HENRY (1821-1900), inventor, was born in Westminster, became in 1848 analytical chemist at the Royal Polytechnic, and wrote several handbooks of popular science. He is best known as the improver and exhibitor of 'Pepper's Ghost,' in its earliest form the invention of Dircks (q.v.). Pepper travelled with this show in America and Australia, and became public analyst at Brisbane in Queensland.

Pepys, SAMUEL, born February 23, 1633, the son of a London tailor, went to St Paul's School, and in March 1651 to Magdalene College, Cambridge. In 1655 he married a pretty girl of fifteen, and became secretary to a cousin, obtaining by his favour small appointments; in 1660 was made Clerk of the Acts of the Navy, and also Clerk of the Privy Seal, and was a very energetic and competent official. In 1686 he became Secretary to the Admiralty, and for a time sat in parliament. At the Revolution his career was closed, but until the end of his life he was looked on as the Nestor of navy affairs. But it is as the writer of a Diary (in cipher), unique in the literature of the world, that his fame still lives; a work which has thrown the most unexpected light upon the history and manners of his day, while at the same time it presents a most remarkable psychological study. Pepys was twice (1676 and 1685) Master of the Trinity House, Master of the Clothworkers Company in 1677, and President of the Royal Society (1684-86). During the supposed Popish Plot (1679) he was committed to the Tower, and in 1689 he was placed in Gatehouse at Westminster for a few days. He died 26th May 1703. The Diary—commenced 1st January 1660—was discontinued 29th May 1669. The MS. was deciphered by the Rev. J. Smith in 1825, and published by Lord Braybrooke; the fullest edition is that by Wheatley (10 vols. 1893-99). Besides the Diary Pepys wrote Memoires relating to the State of the Royal Navy (1690). See the various editions of the Diary, and H. B. Wheatley, Samuel Pepys and the World he lived in (1880). [Peepz.]

Perceval, SPENCER, second son of the second Earl of Egmont, was born in London, November 1, 1762, educated at Harrow and Trinity, Cambridge, and called to the bar in 1786. He soon obtained a reputation as a diligent lawyer, in 1796 entered parliament for Northampton, and became a strong supporter of Pitt. In the Addington administration he became Solicitor-general in 1801 and Attorney-general in 1802, and in the Portland administration of 1807 Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was even then the real head of the government, being trusted by George III. for his opposition to Catholic claims. At Portland's death in 1809 Perceval became premier also, and retained office till his tragic death, 11th May 1812, when he was shot dead entering the lobby of the House of Commons by a bankrupt Liverpool broker, John Bellingham, who was hanged for the murder on the 18th. See Lives by Spencer Walpole (1874) and P. Treherne (1909).

Perceval, JAMES GATES (1795-1856), poet, born at Berlin, Conn., graduated at Yale in 1815, studied botany and medicine, and became professor of Chemistry at West Point in 1824, geologist of Wisconsin in 1854. His poems Prometheus and Clio appeared in 1822-27; and The Dream of a Day in 1843. See Life by J. H. Ward (1866).

Percival, JOHN, D.D., born at Brough in 1834, became head-master of Clifton in 1862; president of Trinity, Oxford, in 1878; head-master of Rugby in 1887; and Bishop of Hereford in 1895.

Percy, a noble northern family, whose founder, William de Percy (c. 1030-96), came with the Conqueror, and received lands in Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Hampshire, and Essex. Richard (c. 1170-1244) was one of the barons who extorted Magna Carta. Henry (c. 1272-1315) aided Edward I. in subduing Scotland, was governor of Galloway, was driven out of Turnberry Castle by Robert Bruce, and received from Edward II. a grant of Bruce's forfeited earldom of Carrick and the wardenship of Bamborough and Scarborough Castles. In 1309 he purchased from Bishop Antony Bek the barony of Alnwick, the chief seat of the family ever since. His son defeated and captured David II. of Scotland at Neville's Cross (1346); his grandson fought at Crécy; his great-grandson, Henry (1342-1408), fourth Lord Percy of Alnwick, in 1377 was made marshal of England and Earl of Northumberland. His eldest son, Henry (1364-1403), was the famous Hotspur whom Douglas defeated at Otterburn (1388), and who himself fell at Shrewsbury fighting against Henry IV. The father, who had helped Henry of Lancaster to the throne, was dissatisfied with Henry's gratitude, and with his sons plotted the insurrection. Later he joined Archbishop Scrope's plot, and fell at Bramham Moor (1408), when his honours were forfeited, but restored (1414) to his grandson, who became High Constable of England, and fell in the first battle of St Albans (1455). His son, the third earl, fell at Towton (1461). The title and estates were now given to a brother of Warwick, the king-maker, but in 1469 Henry, son of the third earl, was restored by Edward IV. The sixth earl, who had in youth been the lover of Anne Boleyn, died childless in 1537, and as his brother, Sir Thomas Percy, had been attainted and executed for his share in the Pilgrimage of Grace, the title of Duke of Northumberland was conferred by Edward VI. upon John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, who in turn was attainted and executed under Mary in 1553. That queen in 1557 granted the earldom to Thomas Percy (1528-72), son of the attainted Sir Thomas; a devoted Catholic, he took part in the Rising of the North, and was beheaded at York. His brother Henry, eighth earl, became involved in Throgmorton's conspiracy in favour of Mary Stuart, and was committed to the Tower, where he was found dead in bed (1585). His son, ninth earl, was imprisoned for fifteen years in the Tower, and fined £30,000 on a baseless suspicion of being privy to the Gunpowder Plot. His son, the tenth earl, fought for the parliament; on the death of his son (1670), eleventh earl, the male line of the family became extinct. Charles II. created his third bastard by the Duchess of Cleveland Earl and afterwards Duke of Northumberland, but the titles expired on his dying childless in 1716. The eleventh earl's child and heiress, in her own right Baroness Percy, married Charles Seymour, Duke of Somerset; their son was created in 1749 Baron Warkworth and Earl of Northumberland, with remainder to his son-in-law, Sir Hugh Smithson (1715-86). Sir Hugh assumed the surname and arms of Percy, and in 1766 was created Duke of Northumberland. Henry George Percy (1810-99) succeeded his father as seventh duke in 1899. See E. B. de Fonblanque's House of Percy (privately printed, 1887), and Brennan's House of Percy (1902).

Percy, THOMAS, born, a grocer's son, at Bridgnorth, 13th April 1729, in 1746 entered Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1753 became vicar of Easton Mandit, Northamptonshire, in 1756 also rector of Wilby. His leisure soon yielded fruit in Hau Kiou Chouan (1761), a Chinese novel translated from the Portuguese, and Miscellaneous Pieces relating to the Chinese (1762), as well as anonymously in Runic Poetry translated from Icelandic (1763), prompted by the success of Macpherson, and A New Translation of the Song of Solomon (1764). In 1764 his friend Dr Johnson paid him a visit. In 1765 Percy published the Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (4th ed. 1794; best ed. by H. B. Wheatley, 1876-77). He had long been engaged in collecting old ballads from every quarter, and a large folio MS. of ballads had fallen accidentally into his hands. Of the 176 pieces in the first edition but 45 (a good deal touched up) were taken from the MS., which was only printed in full by Dr Furnivall (1867-68), with Introductions by Professor Hales and himself. Made chaplain to the Duke of Northumberland and George III., Percy in 1769 published his translation of the Northern Antiquities of Paul Henri Mallet (q.v.). He was himself the author of the ballad, 'O Nancy, wilt thou go with me?' so happily set to music by an Irishman, Thomas Carter (c. 1735-1804). In 1771 Percy wrote the 'Hermit of Warkworth.' In 1778 he was appointed Dean of Carlisle, in 1782 Bishop of Dromore. He died 30th September 1811. See the Life by Pickford in Hales and Furnivall, and that by Miss Gausson (1908).

Pere'da, JOSE MARIA DE (1834-1905), 'the modern Cervantes,' born near Santander, wrote Sotileza (1888), D. Gonzalo Gonzalez de la Gonzalez (1889), La Montalvez (1891), &c.

Pereira, JONATHAN (1804-53), pharmacologist, born in London, was successively lecturer on chemistry and physician to the London Hospital (1841), and was examiner in Materia Medica to London University. His books were Elements of Materia Medica (1839-40) and treatises on Diet and on Polarised Light (1843). See Memoir (1853).

Perez, ANTONIO, minister of Philip II. of Spain, born in Aragon in 1539. Don John of Austria having become an object of suspicion, Perez procured, with the king's consent, the assassination of Escovedo, Don John's secretary and abettor (1578), whom Perez had private reasons for getting out of the way (he had threatened to tell the king Perez's love for the Princess Eboli). The family of Escovedo denounced Perez, and though the king sought to shield him, in July 1581 he was arrested, and by torture forced to confess. Condemned to imprisonment for embezzlement, he escaped to Aragon, where he put himself under protection of its fueros. The king next got the Inquisition to apprehend him, but the people rose in tumult and liberated him repeatedly; at last (1591) Philip entered Aragon with an army and abolished the old constitutional privileges. Perez escaped to Paris and to London, where he was the intimate of Bacon and the Earl of Essex. He spent his later years in Paris, and died there, 3d November 1611, in great poverty. See his own Relaciones (1598), Mignet's monograph (5th ed. 1881), and Froude's Spanish Story of the Armada and other Essays (1892). [Pay-reth.]

Pergolese, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1710-36), Italian musician, was born at Jesi near Ancona, and died at Naples. His first great works were the oratorio San Gaglielmo (1731) and the operetta La Serva Padrona (1732). His last works were the cantata Orfeo and his great Stabat Mater. Pergolese besides composed numerous operas, oratorios, and sacred pieces. See German monograph by Schletterer (1880). [Per-go-lay'zeh.]

Pericles was born of distinguished parentage at Athens early in the 5th century B.C., was carefully educated, and rapidly rose to the highest power as leader of the dominant democracy. About 463 he struck a great blow at the oligarchy by depriving the Areopagus of its most important political powers. His successful expeditions to the Thracian Chersonese and to Sinope, together with his numerous colonies, increased the naval supremacy of Athens. His greatest project was to form a grand Hellenic confederation to put an end to mutually destructive wars; but the Spartan aristocrats brought the scheme to nought. Athens and Sparta were already in the mood which rendered the Peloponnesian war inevitable; but the first troubles were allayed by a thirty years' peace with Sparta (445). Cimon was now dead, and the next leaders of the aristocratic party sought in vain (in 444 B.C.) to overthrow the supremacy of Pericles by attacking him in the popular assembly for squandering the public money on buildings and in festivals and amusements. Thereafter Pericles reigned undisputed master in the home of Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Anaxagoras, Zeno, Protagoras, Socrates, as well as Myron and Phidias. In the Samian war (439) Pericles gained high renown as a naval commander. His enemies, who dared not attack himself, struck at him in the persons of his friends—Aspasia, Phidias, Anaxagoras. Greek architecture and sculpture under the patronage of Pericles reached perfection. To him Athens owed the Parthenon, the Erechtheum, the Propylæa, the Odeum, and numberless other public and sacred edifices; he liberally encouraged music and the drama; and during his rule industry and commerce flourished. At length in 431 the inevitable Peloponnesian war broke out between Athens and Sparta. The plague ravaged the city in 430, and in the autumn of 429 Pericles himself died after a lingering fever. His greatest fault as a statesman was a failure to foresee that personal government is ultimately ruinous to a nation. See Thucydides and Plutarch; the histories of Greece by Thirlwall, Grote, and Curtius; Watkiss Lloyd's Age of Pericles (1875); A. J. Grant's Greece in the Age of Pericles (1893); and the study by Evelyn Abbott (1891).

Périer, CASIMIR (1777-1832), a Parisian banker, secured a seat in the Chamber of Deputies in 1817, was minister of finance in 1828, President of the Council in 1830, and chief minister in 1831. For his son, see CASIMIR-PÉRIER.

Perkin, SIR WILLIAM HENRY, F.R.S., LL.D. (1838-1907), born in London and knighted in 1906, was assistant to Hofmann, and in 1856, while in Pullar's dye-works at Perth, made the discovery of mauve, which led to the foundation of the aniline dye industry.—His son and namesake (born 17th June 1860) became in 1892 professor of Organic Chemistry at Owens College, Manchester.

Perosi, LORENZO, born (1872) the son of a musician at Tortona in Piedmont, was ordained priest, and is author of The Resurrection of Lazarus, The Passion of Christ, and other oratorios.

Pérowne, JOHN JAMES STEWART (1823-1904), the son of a missionary in Bengal, educated at Corpus, Cambridge, held office at King's College (London), Lampeter, Trinity College (Cambridge), became Dean of Peterborough in 1878. From 1875 he had been also Hulsean professor of Divinity at Cambridge. In 1891-1901 he was Bishop of Worcester. Dr Pérowne sat in the company for the revision of the Old Testament, and was general editor of 'The Cambridge Bible for Schools.' His works include a Commentary on the Psalms (1864-68), Hulsean Lectures on Immortality (1869), Sermons (1873), and Remains of Thirlwall (1878).

Perrault, CHARLES, was born at Paris, January 12, 1628, studied law, and filled from 1654 till 1664 an easy post under his brother, the Receiver-general of Paris. In 1663 he became a secretary or assistant to Colbert, through whom he was admitted to the Academy in 1671. His poem, 'Le Siècle de Louis XIV.', read to the Academy, and Boileau's angry criticisms thereon, opened up the dispute about the relative merits of the ancients and moderns; to the modern cause Perrault contributed his poor Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes (1688-96), and his Hommes Illustres du Siècle de Louis XIV. (1696-1700). He died May 16, 1703. His Mémoires appeared in 1769. All his writings would have been forgotten but for his eight inimitable fairy-tales, the Histoires ou Contes du Temps Passé (1697), including 'The Sleeping Beauty,' 'Red Riding Hood,' 'Bluebeard,' 'Puss-in-Boots,' 'Cinderella,' 'Riquet of the Tuft,' and 'Tom Thumb.' There are editions by Girard (1865), Lefèvre (1875), Paul Lacroix (1876), and Andrew Lang (with full Introduction, 1888). See Deschanel's Boileau, Perrault (1888).

Perron, GENERAL (really PIERRE AULIER), military adventurer, was born in Sarthe in 1755, went as a soldier to the Isle of France, served for a time in the navy, deserted and took service with various native Indian princes, and in 1790 obtained an appointment under his countryman De Boigne, then commanding Sindia's forces. He succeeded De Boigne, and exercised enormous military and political influence in India, but was crushed in 1803 by Lake at Laswari, and by Wellesley at Assaye. He returned the same year to France, and died in 1834. See H. Compton's European Military Adventurers of Hindustan (1892).

Perrot, GEORGES, French archaeologist, born 12th November 1832, travelled in Greece and Asia Minor, and in 1877 became professor of Archaeology in the University of Paris, in 1883 director of the Ecole Normale. He has written on Crete (1866) and archaeology, especially, with Charles Chipiez, a History of Art in Antiquity (in Egypt, Chaldaea, Primitive Greece, &c.; 1882-1911). [Per-rô'.]

puted a son of Henry VIII., was Lord Deputy of Ireland during the troublous time there of Queen Elizabeth, and died in the Tower, under trial for treason with Spain.

Perry, GEORGE GRESLEY (1820-97), ecclesiastical historian and biographer, born at Churchill, Somerset, and educated at Ilminster and Oxford, became rector of Waddington near Lincoln in 1852, and Archdeacon of Stow in 1894.

Perry, OLIVER HAZARD (1785-1819), American naval officer, on Lake Erie in 1813, with nine vessels, 54 guns, and 492 men, fought six British vessels, with 63 guns and 502 men, and won a complete victory. See Life by Mackenzie (1843).

Persigny, JEAN GILBERT VICTOR FIALIN, DUC DE (1808-72), entered the French army in 1828, but was expelled for insubordination in 1831. He secured the favour of Louis Napoleon, and had the chief hand in the affairs of Strasburg (1836) and Boulogne (1840), where he was captured, and condemned to twenty years' imprisonment. He strongly supported his patron in 1848 and 1851, in 1852-55 and 1860-63 was minister of the Interior, in 1855-60 ambassador to England, and a senator until the fall of the empire. See his Mémoires (1896). [Per-seen'-yee.]

Persius (AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS), Roman satirist, born of a distinguished equestrian family, 4th December 34 A.D., at Volaterra in Etruria, was educated in Rome, where he came under Stoic influence. But he died before completing his twenty-eighth year (62 A.D.). He wrote fastidiously and sparingly, leaving at his death six admirable satires, the whole not exceeding 650 hexameter lines. Among his many editors have been Casaubon (1605), Otto Jahn (1843-68), and Conington, whose edition, revised by Nettleship (1878), gives text, prose translation, and notes. Earlier verse translations were by Dryden and Gifford.

Perthes, JOHANN GEORG JUSTUS (1749-1816), established a publishing-house at Gotha in 1785, which acquired, in the hands of his sons, a great reputation as a geographical institute; it issues Petermann's Mitteilungen, Stieler's Atlas, books of travel and geography, and the Almanach de Gotha.—His nephew, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH PERTHES (1772-1843), started business in Hamburg in 1796, and soon was in the front rank of publishers. An ardent patriot, he in 1810 started the National Museum, and resisted the establishment of French authority in Germany. After the peace, he removed in 1821 to Gotha. See Life (7th ed. 1892; trans. 1878) by his son Clemens Theodor. [Per-tez.]

Pertinax, HELVIUS, Roman emperor, born at Alba-Pompeia in Liguria, in 126 A.D. When the assassins of Commodus forced him to accept the purple, his accession was hailed with delight; but he was attacked and slain by a band of rebellious praetorians three months after.

Perugino ('the Perugian'), the usual name of the painter PIETRO VANNUCCI, born at Città della Pieve in Umbria in 1446, who established himself in Perugia. He executed works, no longer extant, at Florence, Perugia (1475), and Cerqueto (1478). At Rome, whither he went about 1483, Sixtus IV. employed him in the Sistine Chapel; his fresco of 'Christ giving the Keys to Peter' is the best of those still visible—others being destroyed to make way for Michelangelo's 'Last Judgment.' At Florence (1486-99) he had Raphael for his pupil. At Perugia (1499-1504) he adorned the Hall of the Cambio; after 1500 his art visibly declined. In his second Roman sojourn (1507-12) he also, along with other painters, decorated the Stanze of the Vatican; and one of his works there, the Stanza del Incendio, was the only fresco spared when Raphael was commissioned to repaint the walls and ceilings. He died of the plague near Perugia in 1524. See also BARTOLI. [Per-oo-jee'no.]

Pestalozzi, JOHANN HEINRICH, educational theorist, born at Zurich, 12th January 1746, devoted himself specially to the children of the very poor. Believing in the moralising virtue of agricultural occupations and rural environment, he chose a farm in the canton Aargau upon which to dwell with his collected waifs and strays; but it was stranded on a faulty domestic economy after a five years' struggle (1780). He then for a time withdrew from practical life, to think out the educational problem, and wrote his Evening Hours of a Hermit. Then came a social novel, Leonard and Gertrude. In 1798 he opened his orphan school at Stanz, but at the end of eight months it was broken up. He next took a post in the people's school at Berthoud (Burgdorf), in canton Berne, only to be ejected from it by the jealous senior master. In partnership with others, and under the patronage of the Swiss government, he opened a school of his own at Berthoud. While there he published How Gertrude Educates her Children (1801), the recognised exposition of the Pestalozzian method, setting forth that the development of human nature should be in dependence upon natural laws, with which it is the business of education to comply, observation being the method by which all objects of knowledge are brought home to us. In 1805 Pestalozzi moved his school to Yverdon, and applied his method in a large secondary school for the sons of Europeans attracted by his fame. His incapacity in practical affairs brought the school down step by step till it was closed in 1825; and Pestalozzi, distracted by the enmity of former colleagues, and sinking under difficulties of his own making, addressed to mankind the Song of the Swan, a last educational prayer, and withdrew to Brugg, where he died, 17th February 1827. His works were all in German. See Quick's Essays (1890), and works by Morf (1864-80), De Guimps (trans. 1890), Krüsi (New York, 1875), and Guillaume (French, 1890).

Petavius, DIONYSIUS or DENYS PETAU (1583-1652), Catholic theologian, born at Orleans, became a teacher at Bourges in 1602, in 1605 a Jesuit, and in 1621 professor of Theology in the University of Paris. In 1646 he retired and devoted himself to the completion of a series of about fifty works in philology, history, and theology, including editions of Synesius (1611) and Epiphanius (1622); De Doctrina Temporum (1627); Tabulae Chronologicae (1628); Rationarium Temporum, an outline of universal history (1634); De Theologicis Dogmatibus (1644-50; new ed. 1864 et seq.); polemical works against Grotius and Salmasius.

Peter, St., apostle, named originally SYMON or SIMON, was of Bethsaida, but during the public ministry of Jesus had his house at Capernaum. Originally a fisherman, he, when called by Christ, soon became and remained leader amongst the twelve apostles. For the incidents in his life reference must be made to the four gospels. It is plain that he was regarded by Jesus with particular favour and affection. He was the spokesman of the rest on the day of Pentecost, he was the first to baptise a Gentile convert, and he took a prominent part in the council at Jerusalem. At Antioch he for a time worked in harmony with Paul, but ultimately the famous dispute arose (Gal. ii. 11-21) which, with other causes, led to the termination of Paul's ministry in that city. Baur regarded him as the head of the Judaic party in opposition to the wider Pauline school. Peter's missionary activity seems to have extended to Pontus, Cappadocia, Galatia, Asia, and Bithynia. That he suffered martyrdom is clear from John, xxi. 18, 19, and is confirmed by ecclesiastical tradition: Eusebius says he was impaled or crucified with his head downward; as to the place, tradition from the end of the 2d century mentions Rome. But the comparatively late tradition which assigns him a continuous bishopric of twenty-five years in Rome from 42 A.D. to 67 A.D. is unhistorical. Many distinguished scholars (Protestant) deny that Peter ever was in Rome. The first Epistle of Peter is usually accepted as genuine, but not the second. Holtzmann's Einleitung (1886), Salmon (Introduction), and Weiss defend the genuineness of both. See Littledale's Petrine Claims (1889); Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers (2d ed. 1890); Döllinger's First Age of the Church (3d Eng. ed. 1877); Johann Schmid, Petrus in Rom; and Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten (1883-90).

Peter the Cruel. See PEDRO.

Peter the Great, emperor of Russia, was the son of the Czar Alexei, and was born at Moscow, 9th June 1672. His father died in 1676, leaving the throne to his eldest son, Feodor, Peter's half-brother, who, dying in 1682, named Peter as his successor, to the exclusion of his own full brother, Ivan, who was weak-minded. This step provoked an insurrection of the 'streltzi' or militia, fomented by Ivan's sister, the grand-duchess Sophia, who secured the coronation (July 1682) of Ivan and Peter as joint rulers, and her own appointment as regent; and Peter was put under the charge of a capable tutor, Lefort, a Genevese. In 1689, on his marriage to Eudoxia, Peter called upon his sister to resign. At first worsted in the struggle, he was soon joined by the foreigners in the Russian service, with Patrick Gordon (q.v.) and Lefort at their head; and the streltzi flocking to his standard, Sophia resigned the contest, and was shut up in a convent, where she died in 1704. Peter gave Ivan nominal supremacy and precedence, reserving the power for himself. Ivan died in 1696. Peter's first care was to organize an army on European principles. He also laboured to create a navy, both armed and mercantile. But at this time Russia had only one port, Archangel being shut out from the Baltic by Sweden and Poland; so, for his fleet's sake, Peter declared war against Turkey, and took (1696) the city of Azov. Peter was eager to see for himself the countries for which civilisation had done so much; and, after repressing a revolt of the streltzi, he left Russia in April 1697, in the train of an embassy of which Lefort was the head. He visited the three Baltic provinces, Prussia, and Hanover, reaching Amsterdam, where, and at Zaandam, he worked as a common shipwright; he also studied astronomy, natural philosophy, geography, and even anatomy and surgery. For three months at London and Deptford, he amassed all sorts of useful information; and from England he carried (1698) English engineers, artificers, surgeons, artisans, artillerymen, &c., to the number of 500. From Vienna a formidable rebellion of the streltzi recalled him to Russia. General Gordon had already crushed the revolt, and Peter finally broke up the institution that had given him so much trouble. The Empress Eudoxia, as associated with the conspiracy, which had been the work of the anti-reform party, was divorced and shut up in a convent. Peter put the press on a proper footing, published translations of famous foreign books, and established naval and other schools. Trade with foreign countries was permitted, or even insisted upon. Many changes in dress, manners, and etiquette were introduced and enforced; and the national church was reorganised. In 1700 Peter, with Poland and Denmark, attacked Sweden, but was defeated at Narva; yet he quietly appropriated a portion of Ingria, in which he laid the foundation of the new capital, St Petersburg (1703), which soon became the Russian commercial depôt for the Baltic. In the long contest with Sweden the Russians were almost always defeated; but at last the Swedish king, Charles XII., was totally routed at Pultowa in 1709. Peter seized the whole of the Baltic provinces and a portion of Finland in 1710. He now prepared for strife with the Turks, who, at the instigation of Charles XII., had declared war against him. In this contest Peter was reduced to great straits, but a treaty was concluded (1711) by which Peter lost only Azov and the territory belonging to it. The war against Sweden in Pomerania was pushed on with the greater vigour. In 1712 he married his mistress, Catharine (see CATHARINE I.), and the government was transferred to St Petersburg. In 1716-17, in company with the czarina, he made another tour of Europe. Soon after this his son Alexei, who had opposed some of his father's reforms, was condemned to death, and died in prison. Many nobles implicated in his plans were punished with savage barbarity. In 1721 peace was made with Sweden, which definitely ceded the Baltic provinces, Ingria, and part of Finland. In 1722 Peter commenced a war with Persia, and secured three Caspian provinces. During his last years he was chiefly engaged in beautifying and improving his new capital and carrying out plans for the diffusion of knowledge and education. In the autumn of 1724 he was seized with a serious illness, and he died 8th Feb. (28th Jan., o.s.) 1725. Catharine succeeded him. See Russian Lives by Golikov (1797) and Ustjalov (1858-63), French by Waliszewski (trans. 1897), and English by Barrow (new ed. 1883) and Schuyler (2d ed. New York, 1891).

Peter II. (1715-30), grandson of Peter the Great, Alexei's son, succeeded Catharine I. (1727), but died of smallpox.

Peter III., grandson of Peter the Great (son of his eldest daughter Anna, wife of the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp), was born 29th January 1728, in 1742 was declared by the Czarina Elizabeth (q.v.) her successor, and married Sophia-Augusta, a princess of Anhalt-Zerbst, who assumed the name of Catharina Alexeievna. Peter succeeded Elizabeth on her death in 1762; and his first act was to restore East Prussia to Frederick the Great, and to send to his aid 15,000 men. In 1762 a formidable conspiracy, headed by his wife, broke out, originating in the general discontent at the czar's liberal innovations, the preference he showed for Germans, his indifference to the national religion, and his servility to Frederick the Great. He was declared to have forfeited his crown; his wife was proclaimed as Catharine II.; and Peter was strangled by Orloff and some of the conspirators, 17th July 1762.

Peter Martyr, patron saint of the Inquisition, a Dominican of Verona, who, for the severity with which he exercised his inquisitorial functions, was (1522) slain at Como by the populace.

Peter Martyr (PIETRO MARTIRE VERMIOLI), Reformer, born in Florence, September 8, 1500, became a canon regular of St Augustine and abbot at Spoleto and Naples. As visitor-general of his order in 1541, his rigour made him hateful to the dissolute monks, and he was sent to Lucca as prior, but soon fell under the suspicions of the Inquisition, and fled to Zurich (1542). At Strasburg he was made Old Testament professor. In 1547 he came to England, and lectured at Oxford. Mary's accession drove him back to Strasburg, and in 1555 to Zurich, where he died, Nov. 12, 1562. His Loci Communes was printed at London in 1575. See C. Schmidt's Leben der Väter der reformirten Kirche (1858).

Peter Martyr Anglerius (1459–1525), historian, born at Arona on Lago Maggiore, from 1487 rose to high ecclesiastical preferment in Spain, and was named Bishop of Jamaica. He wrote De Orbe Novo (1516), giving the first account of the discovery of America; De Legatione Babylonica (1516); and Opus Epistolarum (1530). See a German book by Bernays (1891).

Peter the Hermit, a preacher of the first crusade, was born about the middle of the 11th century at Amiens. He served some time as a soldier, became a monk, and is said to have made a pilgrimage to Palestine before 1095. Legends have gathered round his name, and his importance has been exaggerated. The scheme of a crusade originated with the pope, Urban II., to whom Alexius Comnenus had appealed. At a council at Clermont in France (1096) it was definitely resolved upon. After Urban's famous sermon there many preachers, of whom Peter was one of the most notable, traversed Europe, preaching everywhere, and producing extraordinary enthusiasm by impassioned description of the cruelties of the Turks towards pilgrims, and their desecration of the holy places. When the feelings of Europe had been sufficiently heated, four armies—if disorderly multitudes deserve that name—amounting to 275,000 persons, started for Palestine. The first was cut to pieces in Bulgaria. The second, led by Peter in person, reached Asia Minor, but was utterly defeated by the Turks at Nicaea. The other two were exterminated by the Hungarians. A fifth crusading army, 600,000 strong, under renowned leaders, set out in 1096, and was joined by Peter the Hermit. During the siege of Antioch, which lasted seven months, the besiegers' ranks were fearfully thinned by famine and disease. Many lost heart, and among the deserters was Peter, who was several miles on his way home when he was brought back to undergo a public reprimand. He founded a monastery in France or the Low Countries, where he perhaps died about 1115.

Peter the Wild Boy was found in July 1725 in a wood near Hameln in Hanover; 'he was walking on his hands and feet, climbing up trees like a squirrel, and feeding upon grass and moss of trees.' Brought to England in 1726 by George I., he could never be taught to articulate more than a few syllables, and was apparently an idiot. From 1737 till his death in August 1778, he lived on a Hertfordshire farm near Berkhamstead. See Notes and Queries for 11th October 1884.

Peterborough, CHARLES MORDAUNT, EARL OF, born in 1658, was for a short time at Christ Church, Oxford, but by 1680 had been thrice in naval expeditions to the Barbary coast. In that year he began to take an active part in politics, identifying himself with the extreme Whig party; and on the accession of James II. he was one of the earliest intriguers for his overthrow. After the Revolution he rose into high favour with the new king, being made First Commissioner of the Treasury and Earl of Monmouth. On William's departure for Ireland, he was one of the Queen's council of regency. He became hostile to the king and his measures, and was embroiled in plots that resulted (January 1697) in his committal to the Tower for three months. In 1705, in the war of the Spanish succession, Monmouth, now Earl of Peterborough (by his uncle's death), was appointed to the command of an army of 4000 Dutch and English soldiers, with which he proceeded to Barcelona, captured the strong fort of Monjuich, and so reduced the city. Gerona, Tarragona, Tolosa, and Lerida opened their gates; and driving his foes before him, he reached Valencia early in February 1706. Meanwhile an army under the Duke of Anjou, the French claimant to the throne, and Marshal Tessé was closely investing Barcelona, which was at the same time blockaded by a fleet under the Count of Toulouse. Hurrying back, Peterborough threw himself on board one of the ships of the English squadron, took command, and drove Toulouse and his fleet from before the port. This success was followed by the raising of the siege. Now came a series of disputes with his colleagues and allies, recriminations, and futile schemes and expeditions hither and thither. His imperious temper seems to have unfitted him for anything but supreme command, and led to his recall in March 1707. His career thenceforward—in minor appointments and diplomatic missions—till his death at Lisbon on 25th October 1735 is interesting only to the student of letters. He was an intimate friend of Pope. The famous singer Anastasia Robinson (d. 1755), whom he married secretly in 1722, was not publicly acknowledged as his countess till a few months before his death. Recent military criticism has endeavoured to show that Peterborough's fame as a conqueror rests wholly on a basis of imposture; but Mr Stebbing holds that 'the figure of the hero remains much where it was, though its pedestal may have been somewhat lowered.' See Memoir by Russell (2 vols. 1887), and Stebbing's Peterborough ('Men of Action' series, 1890).

Petermann, AUGUST (1822–78), Gotha cartographer and geographer. See PERTHES.

Peters, HUGH (1598–1660), Independent divine, emigrated to Holland, then to New England, but returning in 1641, became army-chaplain, and was active in parliamentarian politics. He published numerous pamphlets, and was executed for assumed complicity in the death of Charles I.

Pétion de Villeneuve, JÉRÔME (1753–94), born at Chartres, in 1789 was elected deputy to the Tiers État. He was a prominent member of the Jacobin Club, and became a great ally of Robespierre. He was one of those who brought back the royal family from Varennes, advocated the deposition of the king, was elected mayor of Paris, and was the first president of the Convention. On the triumph of the Terrorists, he cast his lot with the Girondists. He voted at the king's trial for death, but headed the unsuccessful attack on Robespierre. Proscribed on 2d June 1793, he escaped to Caen, and thence, on the failure of the attempt to make armed opposition against the Convention, to the Gironde, where his and Buzot's bodies were found in a cornfield, partly devoured by wolves. His Œuvres fill 3 vols.

(1792). See works by Regnault-Warin (1792) and Dauban (1866). [Pet-yous deh Veel-nehv.]

Peto, SIR SAMUEL MORTON (1809-89), attained great wealth as a railway contractor, laying railways in England, Russia, Norway, Algiers, Australia; was Liberal M.P. for Norwich, Finsbury, and Bristol (1847-68); and was created a baronet in 1855. In 1866, during the financial panic, the firm of Peto & Betts had to suspend payment, with liabilities of £4,000,000 and assets of £5,000,000. See Memorial Sketch (1893).

Petőfi, SANDOR, Hungarian poet, born 1st Jan. 1823, was successively actor, soldier, and literary hack, but by 1844 had secured his fame as a poet. In 1848 he threw himself into the revolutionary cause, writing numerous war-songs. He fell in battle at Segesvár, 31st July 1849. His poetry breaks completely with the old pedantic style, and, warm with human and national feeling, began a new epoch in Hungarian literature. Selections have been Englished by Bowring and others. See Lives by Opitz (1868), Fischer (1888), and Ferenczy (Budapest, 1897).

Petrarch. Francesco Petrarca, one of the earliest and greatest of modern lyric poets, was the son of a Florentine notary, who, exiled (1302) along with Dante, settled in Arezzo, and here, 20th July 1304, Francesco was born. In 1312 his father went to Avignon, to the then seat of the papal court; and there and at Bologna the boy devoted himself with enthusiasm to the study of the classics. After his father's death Petrarch returned to Avignon (1326). Being without means, he became a churchman, though perhaps never a priest, and lived on the small benefices conferred by his many patrons. It was at this period (1327) that he first saw Laura (possibly Laure de Noves, married in 1325 to Hugo de Sade, who died, the mother of eleven children, in 1348); she inspired him with a passion which has become proverbial for its constancy and purity. Now began also his friendship with the powerful Roman family of the Colonnas. As the fame of Petrarch's learning and genius grew, his position became one of unprecedented consideration. His presence at their courts was competed for by the most powerful sovereigns of the day. He travelled repeatedly in France, Germany, and Flanders, searching for MSS.; in Liège he found two new orations of Cicero, and in Verona a collection of his letters, in Florence an unknown portion of Quintilian. Invited by the senate of Rome on Easter Sunday, 1341, he ascended the capitol clad in the robes of his friend and admirer, King Robert of Naples, and there, after delivering an oration, he was crowned poet-laureate. In 1353, after the death of Laura and his friend Cardinal Colonna, he left Avignon (and his country-house at Vancluse) for ever, disgusted with the corruption of the papal court. His remaining years were passed in various towns of Northern Italy, and at Arquà near Padua he died, 18th July 1374. Petrarch may be considered as the earliest of the great humanists of the Renaissance. He himself chiefly founded his claim to fame on his epic poem Africa, the hero of which is Scipio Africanus, and his historical work in prose, De Viris Illustribus, a series of biographies of classical celebrities. Other Latin works are the eclogues and epistles in verse; and in prose the dialogues, De Contemptu Mundi (or Secretum), the treatises De Otio Religiosorum and De Vita Solitaria, and his letters—he was in constant correspondence with Boccaccio. Great as were his merits as patriot or student, it is by his lyrics alone that his fame has lasted for over five centuries. His title-deeds to fame are in his Canzoniere, in the Italian sonnets, madrigals, and songs, almost all inspired by his unrequited passion for Laura. The Opera Omnia appeared at Basel in 1554. His Italian lyrics were published in 1470, and have since gone through innumerable editions—the standard one that of Marsand (1819), used by Leopardi for his edition and commentary (1826). See the Abbé de Sade, Mémoires de Pétrarque (1764); Mézières, Pétrarque (1868; new ed. 1896); Koerting, Pétrarques Leben (1878); works by Henry Reeve (1878), De Sanctis (1869), Zumbini (1878), Nolhac (Par. 1892), Robinson and Rolfe (1894), and Hollway-Calthorp (1907).

Petre, EDWARD (1631-99), born in London of an old Catholic house, studied at St Omer, but was not admitted a Jesuit until 1671. His influence as confessor of James II. made him extremely unpopular. In 1693 he became rector of St Omer. [Pé-ter.]

Petri, LAURENTIUS (1499-1573), Swedish Reformer, studied under Luther at Wittenberg, was made professor at Upsala, and in 1531 first Protestant Archbishop of Upsala. He and his brother Olaus did most to convert Sweden to the Reformed doctrines, and superintended the translation of the Bible into Swedish (1541).—OLAUS (1493-1552) gained, after his return (1519) from Wittenberg, the ear of Gustavus Vasa, who made him (1531) chancellor of the kingdom—a post he resigned in 1539 to spend the rest of his life as first pastor of Stockholm. His works include memoirs, a mystery-play, hymns, and controversial tracts. [Pay-tree.]

Petrie, GEORGE (1789-1866), Irish archaeologist, born at Dublin, was trained a landscape-painter, but was early attracted by the old buildings of Ireland. In 1833-46 he was attached to the Ordnance Survey of Ireland, and from 1832 he contributed much to the Dublin Penny Journal. He wrote on Tara, Irish music, &c.; and his famous Essay on Round Towers proved that they were Christian ecclesiastical buildings. See the study by Stokes (1868). [Pel-tree.]

Petrie, WILLIAM MATTHEW FLINDERS, LL.D., D.C.L., Egyptologist, born at Woolwich, 3d June 1833. His earliest explorations bore fruit in his Stonehenge (1880), and he next turned his attention to the pyramids and temples of Gizeh (book, 1887); subsequently, with the aid of the Egypt Exploration Fund, to the mounds of Saïd and Naukratis. His Memoirs on Tanis (1885-89), on Naukratis (1886), on Lachish (1891), and on Medun (1892) are but the earlier of some thirty works, mainly on his own diggings and methods in archaeology, several of them eminently original and suggestive. He is editor and main author of a History of Egypt (1894-1905).

Petronius, surnamed 'ARBITER,' from his supposed identity with the Caius Petronius whom Tacitus calls 'arbiter elegantie' at the court of Nero, is generally believed to be the author of the satirical romance in prose and verse, of which the 15th and 16th books have, in a fragmentary state, come down to us. The work depicts with wit, humour, and realism the licentious life in Southern Italy of the upper or moneyed class. The favour Petronius enjoyed as aider and abettor of Nero and the jeunesse dorée in every form of sensual indulgence aroused the jealousy of another confidant, Tigellinus, who procured his disgrace and banishment; and he committed suicide by opening his veins. See Bücheler's edition (Berl. 4th ed. 1904), and two French books by Collignon (Par. 1892 and 1893).

Pettenkofer, MAX VON, German chemist, born 3d December 1818, in 1847-94 was professor of Chemistry at Munich. He made valuable contributions to science on gold-refining, gas-making, ventilation, clothing, epidemics, and hygiene. He shot himself 10th February 1901. Of his works the best known is his Handbuch der Hygiene (1882 et seq.).

Pettie, JOHN, was born at Edinburgh, 17th March 1839, and brought up after 1852 at East Linton, joined Orchardson in London in 1862, and died at Hastings, 21st February 1893. He exhibited from 1859, and attracted notice by his 'Drum-head Court-martial' (1864). Among the hundreds of later pictures, including portraits, are 'An Arrest for Witchcraft' (1866), 'Scene in the Temple Gardens' (1871), 'Juliet and Friar Laurence' (1874), 'The Death Warrant' (1879), 'The Vigil' (1884), and 'The Chieftain's Candlesticks' (1886). He was elected an A.R.A. in 1866, an R.A. in 1873.

Petty, SIR WILLIAM, economist, was born at Rousey, Hants, the son of a clothier, 26th May 1623, went to sea, and then studied at a Jesuit college in Caen, at Utrecht, Amsterdam, Leyden, Paris, and Oxford, where he taught anatomy. Appointed physician to the army in Ireland (1652), he executed a fresh survey of the Irish lands forfeited in 1641; started ironworks, lead-mines, sea-fisheries, and other industries on estates he bought in south-west Ireland; was secretary to Henry Cromwell when Lord-lieutenant; was made surveyor-general of Ireland by Charles II., who knighted him; invented a copying-machine (1647), a double-keeled sea-boat (1663), and in early life took much interest in education. In political economy he was a precursor of Adam Smith, and wrote a Treatise on Taxes (1662) and Political Arithmetic (1691), the latter a discussion of the value of comparative statistics. He died 16th December 1687. He married the Baroness Shelburne, and his sons were successively Lord Shelburne (q.v.). See Life by Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice (1895).

Peuting'er, CONRAD (1465-1547), a keeper of the archives of Augsburg, who published a series of Roman inscriptions; his Tabula Peutingeriana, now at Vienna, is a copy, made in 1264, of an itinerary or a Roman map of the military roads of the 3d century A.D. [Peū'ting-er.]

Pfeiffer, IDA (née REYER), traveller, born at Vienna, October 15, 1797, in 1820 married an advocate named Pfeiffer, from whom she separated. Her first expedition was to the Holy Land in 1842. In 1845 she visited northern Europe. Resolving in 1846 on a voyage round the world, she started for Brazil, then sailed round Cape Horn to Chili, and by way of China, India, Persia, southern Russia, and Greece, reached Vienna in 1848. A second journey round the world brought her by the Cape to Java, Borneo, California, Peru, and the United States (1851-54). In 1856 she went on an expedition to Madagascar, endured terrible hardships, and came home to die, October 28, 1858. She wrote an account of each of her five journeys; that of the last, edited by her son, contains a Life.

Pfleiderer, Orro, philosophic theologian, was born at Stetten in Württemberg, September 1, 1839, studied at Tübingen (1857-61), became pastor at Heilbronn in 1868, in 1870 professor of Theology at Jena, and in 1875 at Berlin. In New Testament criticism Pfeleiderer belonged to the younger critical school which grew out of the impulse given by Baur, and was an independent thinker, suggestive and profoundly learned. He died 20th July 1908. His chief works are Primitive Christianity (3 vols., trans. 1908-10), Die Religion (1869; 2d ed. 1878), Der Paulinismus (1873; 2d ed. 1890; trans. 1877), Religions-philosophie (1878; 2d ed. 1883-84; Eng. trans. 1886-88), Christliche Glaubens- und Sittenlehre (1880; 5th ed. 1893), The Influence of the Apostle Paul on Christianity (Hibbert Lectures, 1885), Das Urchristentum (1887), The Development of Theology since Kant (Lond. 1890), and The Philosophy of Religion (Gifford Lectures, 1894).—His brother, EDMUND PFLEIDERER (born 1842, died 1902), became professor of Philosophy at Kiel in 1873, and in 1878 at Tübingen. His writings include studies on Leibnitz (1870), Hume (1874), Pessimism (1875), Kantian criticism and English philosophy (1881), Geulincx (1884), Lotze (2d ed. 1884), Heraclitus (1886), Socrates and Plato (1896), &c.

Phædrus, or PHÆDER, translator of Æsop's fables into Latin verse, was a Græcised Macedonian, who came young to Italy. From a slave he became the freedman of Augustus or Tiberius. Under Tiberius he published the first two books of his fables, but his biting though veiled allusions to the tyranny of the emperor and his minister Sejanus caused him to be accused and condemned—to what punishment is unknown. On the death of Sejanus he published his third book. The fourth and fifth books belong to his last years. He died probably at an advanced age. Phædrus was more than a reproducer of Æsop; he invented fables of his own, and it seems certain that the five books contain many fables that are not from his pen. See the editions of Bentley, Dressel, Orelli, Müller, Ramorino (Turin, 1884), and Havet (Par. 1895).

Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigento in Sicily in the 6th century B.C., was an adventurer from Asia Minor, who greatly embellished the city, and extended his sway over large districts in Sicily. After holding power for sixteen years he was overthrown for his cruelties, and roasted alive in his own invention, the brazen bull. The 148 letters bearing his name were proved by Bentley in 1697 and 1699 to be spurious.

Phayre, SIR ARTHUR PURVES (1812-85), first commissioner of Burma, went to Burma as assistant in Tenasserim, and retired a K.C.S.I. in 1867.

Phelps, ELIZABETH STUART (1844-1911), American authoress, born at Andover, was the daughter of a professor. Besides lecturing and working for social reforms, she wrote The Gates Ajar (1868), Beyond the Gates (1883), The Gates Between (1887), Hedged In and The Silent Partner (1870), The Story of Avis (1877), Doctor Zay (1884); in 1890, in conjunction with her husband, Rev. Herbert D. Ward, Come Forth, a travesty of the story of Lazarus, and The Master of the Magicians; and in 1896 Chapters from a Life.

Phelps, SAMUEL, actor, born at Devonport, 13th February 1804, at seventeen came to London, and became reader on the Globe and Sun newspapers; but, after some amateur experience, took to the stage in 1826, and played in the provinces for eleven years. In 1837 he appeared as Shylock at the Haymarket with great success. He was afterwards engaged by Macready, but his genius did not get full scope until the beginning of his famous Sadler's Wells management. At an outlying unfashionable and unpopular theatre he for eighteen years (1844-62) produced a succession of 'legitimate' plays, attracting around him an excellent company, and educating a rough audience to appreciation of the masterpieces of English dramatic literature. When acting in March 1878 he broke down, and died 6th November 1878. See Lives by J. and E. Coleman (1886), and by W. May Phelps and J. Forbes-Robertson (1886).

Pherecydes, a Greek philosopher of Syros, in the 6th century B.C., master of Pythagoras. Another Pherecydes (5th century B.C.) compiled mythical histories of Athens and other states.

Phidias (Gr. Phēidias), the greatest sculptor of Greece, was born at Athens about 500 B.C., and received from Pericles a magnificent commission to execute the chief statues with which he proposed to adorn the city, and was superintendent of all public works. He had under him architects, statuary, bronze-workers, stone-cutters, &c. He constructed the Propylæa and the Parthenon, and the gold-and-ivory Athena there and the Zeus at Olympia were accounted the masterpieces of his own chisel. Charged with appropriating gold from the statue and carving his own head on an ornament, he was accused of impiety, and died in prison about 432 B.C. See works by Waldstein (1885) and Collignon (1886), and Gardner's Six Greek Sculptors (1910). [Phē-dī-as, not Fid-dī-as.]

Philaret (1782-1867), the greatest preacher and the most influential Russian churchman of his day, became in 1817 Bishop of Reval, in 1819 Archbishop of Tver, and in 1821 of Moscow.

Philidor, or DANICAN, FRANÇOIS ANDRÉ (1726-95), a chess-player and operatic composer, was born at Dreux, and died in London. See Life by Allen (Phila. 1864).

Philip of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great, was born at Pella, 382 B.C., the youngest son of Amyntas II. The assassination of his eldest brother (367), and the death in battle of his second (360), left him guardian to his infant nephew Amyntas, but in a few months he made himself king. Dangers beset him from without and within, but in a year he had secured the safety of his kingdom, and gained for himself a dreaded name; henceforward his policy was one of aggression. The Greek towns on the coast of Macedonia were the first objects of attack. In Thrace he captured Crenides, which as Philippi soon acquired wealth. The gold-mines of the surrounding district supplied him with the means of paying his armies and of bribing traitorous Greeks. Erelong he advanced into Thessaly, but Thermopylæ he found strongly guarded by the Athenians. He therefore directed his arms against the Thracians, and captured all the towns of Chalcidice, including Olynthus. Requested by the Thebans to interfere in the 'Sacred War' raging between them and the Phocians, he marched into Phocis, destroyed its cities, and sent many of the inhabitants as colonists to Thrace (346). He next secured a footing in the Peloponnese, by espousing the cause of the Argives, Messenians, and others against the Spartans. In 339 the Amphictyonic Council declared war against the Locrians of Amphissa, and in 338 appointed Philip commander-in-chief of their forces. The Athenians, alarmed, formed a league with the Thebans against him; but their army was utterly defeated at Chæronea (338), and all Greece lay at the feet of the conqueror. He was now in a position to enter on the dream of his later years—the invasion of the Persian empire. Preparations for it were in progress when he was assassinated by Pausanias (336). See David G. Hogarth's Philip and Alexander of Macedon (1897).

Philip I. of France (1052-1108) reigned from 1067 without glory or credit.

Philip II., better known as PHILIP-AUGUSTUS, king of France, son of Louis VII., was born 25th August 1165. He was crowned joint-king in 1179, succeeded his father in 1180, and married Isabella of Hainault, the last direct descendant of the Carolingians. His first war, against the Count of Flanders, gave him Amiens. He punished heretics and despoiled the Jews, and reduced the Duke of Burgundy. He supported the sons of Henry II. of England against their father, Richard (Cœur de Lion) and he set out on the third crusade, but they quarrelled in Sicily. After three months in Syria he returned to France, having sworn not to molest Richard's dominions; but no sooner had he returned than he made a bargain with John for the partition of Richard's French territories. Richard's sudden return occasioned an exhausting war till 1199. On Richard's death Philip supported Arthur against his uncle John in the French domains of the English crown, but was for a while fully occupied by his quarrel with the pope. He had put away his second wife, Ingeborg of Denmark, in order to marry Agnes of Meran, but the thunders of the Vatican forced him to replace Ingeborg upon her throne. The murder of Arthur again gave him the excuse he sought. The fortress of Château Gaillard surrendered to him in 1204, and that same year he added to his dominions Normandy, Maine, Anjou, and Touraine, with part of Poitou, as well as the overlordship of Brittany. The victory of Bouvines (29th August 1214) over the Flemish, the English, and the Emperor Otho established his throne securely, and the rest of his reign he devoted to reforms of justice and to the building and fortifying of Paris—Notre Dame remaining a lasting monument of his great king. He died at Nantes, July 14, 1223. See works by Capefigue (3d ed. 1842), Mazabran (1878), Davidsohn (Stuttg. 1888), and W. H. Hutton ('Foreign Statesmen' series, 1896).

Philip III., 'le Hardi' (1245-85), was with his father St Louis at his death in Tunis (1270), fought several unlucky campaigns in Spain, and died of disgust. See Life by Langlois (1887).

Philip IV., 'the Fair' (1268-1314), succeeded his father, Philip III., in 1285. By his marriage with Queen Joanna of Navarre he obtained Navarre, Champagne, and Brie. He overran Flanders, but a Flemish revolt broke out at Bruges, and at Courtrai on the 'Day of Spurs' he was disastrously defeated. His great struggle with Pope Boniface VIII. grew out of his attempt to levy taxes from the clergy. In 1296 Boniface forbade the clergy to pay taxes; Philip replied by forbidding the export of money or valuables. A temporary reconciliation in 1297 was ended by a fresh quarrel in 1300. Philip imprisoned the papal legate, and summoned the Estates. Boniface issued the bull Unam Sanctam. Philip publicly burned the bull, and confiscated the property of those prelates who had sided with the pope. Boniface now excommunicated him, and threatened to lay the kingdom under interdict, but the king sent to Rome William de Nogaret, who seized and imprisoned the pope, with the aid of the Colonnas. Boniface soon afterwards died. In 1305 Philip obtained the elevation of one of his own creatures as Clement V., and placed him at Avignon, the beginning of the seventy years' 'captivity.' He compelled the pope to condemn the Templars (1310) and abolish the order (1312); they were condemned and burned by scores, and Philip appropriated their wealth. Under him the taxes were greatly increased, the Jews persecuted, and their property confiscated. See books by Bontaric (1861), Jolly (1869), and Zeller (1885).

Philip V. (1293-1322), second son of the preceding, succeeded his brother, Louis X., in 1316.

Philip VI., of VALOIS (1293-1350), king of France, son of Charles of Valois, younger brother of Philip IV., succeeded on the death of Charles IV. in 1328. His right to the throne was denied by Edward III. of England, son of the daughter of Philip IV., who declared that females, though excluded by the Salic law, could transmit their rights to their children. Marching into Flanders to support the count against his rebellious subjects, he vanquished them at Cassel (August 23, 1328). He gave up Navarre, but retained Champagne and Brié. The hundred years' war with England began in 1337. The French fleet was destroyed off Sluys (1340). In 1346 Edward III. landed in Normandy, ravaged to the environs of Paris, and defeated Philip at Crécy. A truce was concluded just as destruction threatened France in the 'Black Death.' A bad and faithless man, Philip by his extortion well-nigh exhausted the wealth of his kingdom.

Philip I. OF SPAIN (1478-1506), son of the Emperor Maximilian, reigned only for a few months.

Philip II. OF SPAIN, only son of the Emperor Charles V., was born at Valladolid, 21st May 1527. In 1543 he married Mary of Portugal, who died in 1546 after bearing the ill-fated Don Carlos. He spent three years with his father at Brussels. In 1554 he made a marriage of policy with Mary Tudor, Queen of England. During his fourteen months' stay in England he laboured unsuccessfully to ingratiate himself with his wife's subjects. In 1555 he became by the abdication of his father the most powerful prince in Europe, having under his sway Spain, the Two Sicilies, the Milanese, the Low Countries, Franche Comté, Mexico, and Peru. But the treasury was deficient, drained by the expenditure of his father's wars. His first danger was a league formed between Henry II. of France and Pope Paul IV. Alva overran the papal territories, while Philip's troops defeated the French at St Quentin (1557) and Gravelines (1558), and Henry made peace (1559). In January 1558 the French had captured Calais, and Mary Tudor died eleven months later. Philip failed to secure the hand of Elizabeth, and in 1559 married Isabella of France. Seeking to concentrate all power in himself, he laboured to destroy free institutions in all his dominions, while putting himself at the head of the Catholic party in Europe. He found the Inquisition the best engine of his tyranny in Spain, but in the Low Countries it caused a formidable revolt, which ended in 1579 with the independence of the Seven United Provinces. To replenish his treasury Philip exacted enormous contributions. His son, Don Carlos (q.v.), whom he hated, died in prison in 1568. Philip did not disdain the aid of murder in the pursuit of his policy, and the death of William the Silent (1584) and the persecution of Antonio Perez (q.v.) show how pitiless and persistent was his hatred. He married in 1570 his niece, Anne of Austria, whose son by him became Philip III. His one great triumph was the naval victory of Lepanto (1571), won by his half-brother, Don John of Austria, over the Turks. In 1580, the direct male line of Portugal having become extinct, Philip claimed the throne, and despatched Alva to occupy the kingdom. But his attempt to conquer England resulted in hopeless disaster, as the Armada was swept to destruction before the valour of the English seamen and the northern tempests (1588). His intrigues against Henry of Navarre were foiled (1592). The stubborn heroism of the Netherlanders and the ravages of the English on the Spanish Main, added to financial distress at home, embittered Philip's last years. He died 13th September 1598. Philip possessed great abilities but little political wisdom, and he engaged in so many vast enterprises at once as to overtask his resources without leading to any profitable result. He dealt a fatal blow to Spain by crushing its chivalrous spirit, and destroyed its commerce by oppressive exactions and by a bitter persecution of the industrious Moriscos. The good points of Philip, who was a tender husband and very affectionate to his daughters, are brought out in Froude's Spanish Story of the Armada (1892), Martin Hume's Philip II. of Spain (1897), and Two English Queens and Philip (1908). See also the histories of Prescott, Motley, and Froude; Forneron's Histoire de Philippe II. (3d ed. 1887); and books by Gachard, Mignet, Philippon.

Philip V., first Bourbon king of Spain, second son of the Dauphin Louis (son of Louis XIV. and Maria Theresa of Spain), was born at Versailles, December 19, 1683. In 1700, when Duke of Anjou, he was bequeathed the crown of Spain by Charles II. He entered Madrid in February 1701, and after a long struggle against his rival, the Archduke Charles, was left in possession of the throne by the peace of Utrecht in 1713. Next year died the queen, Maria Louisa, daughter of the Duke of Savoy, whom Philip had married in 1702; and soon after he married 'the ternagant,' Elizabeth Farnese (q.v.). By her influence the government was committed to Alberoni, but Philip was obliged by the Quadruple Alliance to dismiss him in 1719. He abdicated in favour of his son Don Louis in 1724, but resumed the crown on Louis' death eight months later. The queen's dearest wish was to drive the Hapsburgs out of Italy in the interests of her sons by a former marriage, but she only secured the Two Sicilies for Don Carlos. Spain joined the coalition against Maria Theresa, and her younger son Don Philip was at first successful in conquering the Milanese; but as soon as the Silesian war was closed the Austrian queen drove the Spaniards out of Italy. At the crisis Philip, for years sunk in mental stupor, died July 9, 1746. See Sandrillart's Philippe V. et la Cour de France, 1700-15 (1890-91).

Philip the Bold ('le Hardi'), founder of the second and last ducal House of Burgundy, was the fourth son of John the Good, king of France, and was born January 15, 1342. At Poitiers (1356) he displayed heroic courage, shared his father's captivity in England, and was made Duke of Burgundy in 1363. He married Margaret, heiress of Flanders, in 1369. In 1372 he commanded with success against the English, and in 1380 helped to suppress the sedition of the Flemish towns against his father-in-law; but the rebels, especially the burghers of Ghent, were finally subdued only after the defeat of Rosbeck (1382), where 26,000 Flemings were slain. Flanders fell to him by the death of the count in 1384, and his wise government won the esteem of his new subjects. He encouraged arts, manufactures, and commerce, and his territory was one of the best governed in Europe. For his imbecile nephew, Charles VI. of France, he was obliged to take the helm of affairs. He died April 27, 1404.

Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, son of John the Fearless and grandson of Philip the Bold, was born June 13, 1396. Bent on avenging his father's murder by the dauphin, he entered into an alliance with Henry V. of England in 1419, recognising him as heir of the French crown. This agreement was sanctioned by the French king and States-general (1420), but the dauphin (Charles VII. after 1422) took to arms, and was twice defeated. Disputes with the English prompted Philip to conclude a treaty with Charles in 1429. But by ceding to him Champagne and paying a large sum, the English regained his alliance. At this time, by falling heir to Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, he was at the head of the most powerful realm in Europe. Smarting under fresh insults of the English viceroy, he made final peace (1435) with Charles. And when the English committed great havoc on Flemish ships Philip declared war against them, and, with the king of France, gradually expelled them from their French possessions. The imposition of taxes excited a rebellion, headed by Ghent; but the duke inflicted a terrible defeat (July 1454) upon the rebels, of whom 20,000 fell. The later part of his reign was troubled by the quarrels between Charles VII. and his son (afterwards Louis XI.), who sought shelter with Philip. Philip died July 15, 1467. Under him Burgundy was the most wealthy, prosperous, and tranquil state in Europe.

Phillip, an American-Indian chief, son of a staunch ally of the Pilgrim settlers of Plymouth, became the leader of a confederation of nearly 10,000 warriors, and in King Philip's War (1675) against the whites thirteen towns were destroyed and 600 colonists slain. After reprisals and retaliations Philip's supporters fell away, and he was surprised and shot by Captain Benjamin Church, 12th August 1676. See Drake's edition of King Philip's War by Church (1825).

Philip Neri, St. See NERI.

Philippa of HAINAULT (c. 1314-69) in 1328 married Edward III. at York. In 1347 she begged off the Calais burghesses. See Miss Strickland's Queens of England, vol. i.

Phillips, AMBROSE, minor poet, born about 1675, was educated at St John's College, Cambridge. In London he became intimate with Addison and Steele, did hack work for Tonson, and gained a reputation by the 'Winter-piece' in the Tatler and six Pastorals in Tonson's Miscellany (1709). Pope's jealousy was aroused by Tickell's praising Phillips in the Guardian; he revenged himself anonymously in the Guardian, and did not forget Phillips in the Dunciad. Phillips sat for Armagh, was secretary to the Lord Chancellor and judge of the Prerogative Court, and died in London 18th June 1749. Of his plays, The Distress'd Mother (1712)—an adaptation from Racine's Andromache—was warmly praised in the Spectator; The Briton and Humphry Duke of Gloucester were failures. His Pastorals are vigorous and easy yet graceful verse.

Phillips, F. C., born at Brighton, 3d February 1849, and educated at Brighton College and Sandhurst, served three years in the army, and in 1884 was called to the bar. As in a Looking-glass (1885) was the first and most successful of more than a dozen novels by him; and he has also written plays, alone and in collaboration.

Phillips, JOHN (1676-1709), poet, was born at Bampton, Oxfordshire, the son of the Archdeacon of Shropshire, and was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford. He was the author of three very popular poems, The Splendid Shilling, a Miltonic burlesque; Cyder, an imitation of Virgil's Georgics; and Blenheim, a Tory celebration of Marlborough's great victory. He died at Hereford of consumption.

Phillips, KATHERINE, 'the matchless Orinda,' was born, the daughter of a London merchant, 1st January 1631, and at sixteen married James Phillips of Cardigan Priory. Orinda is our earliest sentimental writer (her first printed poem was an address to Vaughan the Silarist); but she was a worthy woman and good wife, and deserved the dedication from Jeremy Taylor (Discourse on the Nature, Offices and Measures of Friendship, 1659). On a visit to London she caught smallpox, and died 22d June 1664. She translated Corneille's Pompeé and the greater part of his Horace. Her poems were surreptitiously printed in 1663; an authoritative edition was issued in 1667. They are in Saintsbury's Caroline Poets (vol. i. 1905). See Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies (2d ed. 1885) and her own letters From Orinda to Poliarchus.

Phillimore, SIR ROBERT JOSEPH, born 5th Nov. 1810, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, after serving in the Board of Control had a brilliant career at the bar. He sat in parliament as a Whig 1853-57; and became Advocate-general (1862, when he was knighted), Judge Advocate-general (1871), judge of the Arches Court (1867-75), and of the High Court of Admiralty (1867-83). Made a baronet in 1881, he died 4th Feb. 1885. His chief works are Commentaries upon International Law (1854-61; 3d ed. 1879-89) and Ecclesiastical Law (1873-76; 2d ed. 1895).

Phillip, JOHN, R.A., was born, an old soldier's son, at Aberdeen, 19th April 1817. He was apprenticed to a painter and glazier, but in 1836 was sent by Lord Pannure to London, where he entered the schools of the Royal Academy. In 1838 he began to exhibit. Most of his early subjects were Scotch—e.g. a 'Scotch Fair' and 'Baptism in Scotland.' In 1851 he went to Spain in search of health, and on his return became noted as a painter of Spanish themes, in 1853 exhibiting 'Life among the Gypsies at Seville.' His pictures for 1854-55, 'A Letter-Writer of Seville' and 'El Paseo,' were purchased by the Queen. In 1857 he became A.R.A., in 1859 R.A. 'The Marriage of the Princess Royal' (1860) was more artistic than such works usually are; so, too, the 'House of Commons, 1860,' containing over thirty portraits. But his main triumphs were in Spanish subjects, such as 'La Gloria' (1864; sold 1897 for 5000 gs. to the Scottish National Gallery), 'El Cigarillo' (1864), and 'The Early Career of Murillo' (1865). He died 27th February 1867.

Phillips, EDWARD (1630-c. 1696), son of Milton's sister Ann and her husband, an officer of the Court of Chancery, was brought up and educated by his uncle. He went to Oxford in 1650, but left next year without taking a degree. In 1663 he was tutor to the son of John Evelyn, and is mentioned in Evelyn's Diary as 'not at all infected by Milton's principles,' yet he not only extolled his uncle in his Theatrum Poetarum, but has left us a short Life of the poet. Among his numerous works are a complete edition (the first) of the Poems of Drummond of Hawthornden (1656); New World of English Words (1658), a kind of dictionary; the Continuation of Baker's Chronicle of the Kings of England (1665); Theatrum Poetarum, or a Complete Collection of the Poets (1675).—His brother, JOHN (1631-1706), was also educated by his uncle, and frequently acted as his amanuensis, but soon quarrelled with his views, and lived a loose life. His Satyr against Hypocrites (1655) was a bitter attack on Croinwell; and he issued two collections of indecent verses. Maronides (1673) was a Hudibrastic travesty of part of the Æneid. He was also an industrious translator.

Phillips, JOHN (1800-74), born at Marden in Wiltshire, geologised with his uncle William Smith, the father of English geology, and was professor of Geology at London, Dublin, and Oxford. He wrote Geology of Yorkshire (1829-36), &c.

Phillips, SIR RICHARD (1767-1840), school-master, hosier, stationer, publisher, author, Radical, vegetarian, &c., removed from Leicester to London in 1795, retired to Brighton in 1823.

Phillips, STEPHEN, was born, son of the preacher of Peterborough Cathedral, at Somertown, near Oxford, 28th July 1868, and educated at Stratford-on-Avon and Peterborough. As a member for six years of Frank Benson's dramatic company he played all kinds of parts, and next lectured on history at an army tutor's at Blackheath. He wrote with three others Primavera (1890), and by himself Christ in Hades (1896), Poems (1897), The New Inferno (1910), and plays, including Paolo and Francesca (1899), Herod (1901), Nero (1906), Pietro of Siena (1910).

Phillips, WENDELL (1811-84), abolitionist, born at Boston, Mass., graduated at Harvard 1831, and was called to the bar 1834. But by 1837 he was the chief orator of the anti-slavery party. Henceforth he was Garrison's valued ally, his lectures doing more than can well be estimated. He also championed the causes of temperance and women, and advocated the rights of the Indians. His speeches and letters were collected in 1863 (new ed. 1884). See Life by Austin (1888).

Phillipotts, HENRY, Bishop of Exeter, born at Bridgwater, 6th May 1778, was educated at Gloucester and Corpus, Oxford, and elected fellow of Magdalen in 1795. He held six livings, became prebendary of Durham in 1809, Dean of Chester in 1828, and Bishop of Exeter in 1831. A zealous Tory, a High Churchman, a keen controversialist, he was foremost in opposition to change; and his name is identified with his refusal to institute Mr Gorham (q.v.). Much beloved throughout his diocese, he died near Torquay, 18th September 1869. See his (unfinished) Life by Shutte (1863).

Philo Judæus, the Philosopher, was born at Alexandria, about 20-10 B.C., of a wealthy family. With all his Greek culture he remained a Jew, holding Jewish philosophy as the highest wisdom. When over fifty he went to Rome as the advocate of his Alexandrian brethren, who had refused to worship Caligula; and his De Legatione gives a vivid account of this embassy. He once went to Jerusalem, and may have paid a second visit to Rome. The religious and philosophical system of Philo exercised a vast influence on the Jewish and Christian world. The Alexandrines had sought to make Judaism palatable to the refined Greeks by proving it to be identical with the grandest conceptions of their philosophers and poets, and had quite allegorised away its distinctive characteristics. Philo made a bold and successful stand against a like evaporation of the revealed religion of his fathers, though he holds that the greater part of the Pentateuch may be explained allegorically. A fundamental conception in his philosophy is that between God, pure spirit, and this earth there are a series of intermediate beings closely related to Plato's ideas on the one hand and to the angels of the Old Testament. The Logos, or Divine Reason, comprises all these intermediate spiritual powers in His own essence, and is the highest of the angels, the Beginning, the Name, the Word, the first-born Son of God, the Second God. The influence of this conception on the theology of the Christian Alexandrian school was very marked. Philo can never lose his importance in the history of thought as the earliest eclectic religious philosopher, the first to construct a real philosophy of religion. His writings are numerous, but many of them are lost; more than three-fourths of what has come down to us consists of three chief works on the Pentateuch. See German books by Gröfner (1831), Dähne (1834), Siegfried (1875), Zeiler (History of Philosophy), and Freudenthal (1891); Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883); Drummond's Philo-Judæus (1888); Conybeare's edition of the De Vita Contemplativa (1895); and Dr H. E. Ryle's Philo and Holy Scripture (1895).

Philo of Byblus, a Hellenised Phœnician grammarian of the 1st or 2d century A.D., who wrote a distorted and misleading account of the religion and history of the Phœnicians, much of it professedly translated from Sanchoniathon.

Philopotes (c. 252-183 B.C.), born at Megalopolis, as commander-in-chief of the Achaean League crushed the Spartans at Mantinea (208), sought to unite Greece against the Romans, and was poisoned by the Messenians.

Philostratus of Lemnos (c. 170-250 A.D.), Greek sophist and rhetorician, established himself at Rome, where he wrote an idealised Life of Apollonius of Tyana, the bright Lives of the Sophists, amatory Epistles. The Heroicon and the Imagines, a description of thirty-four pictures supposed to be hung in a villa near Naples, are now ascribed to his nephew; and further Imagines to a third and related Philostratus. See texts by Kayser (1844) and Westermann (1849), and the translation by Berwick (1809).

Phipps, SIR WILLIAM (1651-95), born at Pemaquid (Bristol), Maine, was successively shepherd, carpenter, and trader, and in 1687 recovered £300,000 from a wrecked Spanish ship off the Bahamas; this gained him a knighthood and the appointment of provost-marshal of New England. In 1690 he captured Port Royal (now Annapolis) in Nova Scotia, but failed in 1691 in a naval attack upon Quebec. In 1692 he became governor of Massachusetts. He died in London. See Life by Bowen in Sparks's American Biography (1834-37).

Phocas, emperor of Constantinople, overthrew his predecessor Maurice in 602. Through his monstrous vices, tyranny, and incapacity, the empire sank into utter anarchy, and he was overthrown in 610 by Heraclius (q.v.).

Phocion (c. 400-317 B.C.), Athenian general, commanded a division of the Athenian fleet at Naxos in 376, and helped to conquer in 351 Cyprus for Artaxerxes III. In 341 he crushed the Macedonian party in Eubœa, and in 340 forced Philip to evacuate the Chersonesus, but advised Athens to make friends with him. The advice was not taken; but the fatal battle of Chæronea proved its soundness. After the murder of Philip (336) he struggled at Athens to repress the reckless desire for war, and again on the death of Alexander in 323 vainly endeavoured to hinder the Athenians from going to war with Antipater. Ultimately regarded as a traitor, he fled to Phocis, was in the intrigues of Cassander, the rival of Polyperchon, who delivered him up to the Athenians, and was condemned to drink hemlock. See German work by Bernays (1881).

Photius (c. 820-91), ex-soldier and secretary, on the deposition of Ignatius from the patriarchate of Constantinople for correcting the vices of the Emperor Michael, was hurried through all the stages of sacred orders, and installed in his stead. In 862, however, Pope Nicholas I. called a council at Rome, which declared Photius's election invalid, excommunicated him, and reinstated Ignatius. Supported by the emperor, Photius assembled a council at Constantinople in 867, which condemned many points of doctrine and discipline of the Western Church as heretical, excommunicated Nicholas, and withdrew from the communion of Rome. Under the Emperor Basilus in 867 Photius was banished to Cyprus, and Ignatius reinstated. In 869 the eighth general council, at which Pope Adrian II.'s legates presided, assembled at Constantinople; Photius was again excommunicated, and the intercommunion of the churches restored. Yet, on the death of Ignatius, Photius was re-appointed. In 879 he assembled a new council at Constantinople, renewed the charges against the Western Church, and erased the filioque from the creed. Photius was finally deprived, and exiled to Armenia by Leo, son of Basilus, in 886. His chief remains are Myriobiblon or Bibliotheca, a summary review of 280 works which Photius had read, and many of which are lost; a Lexicon; the Nomocanon, a collection of the acts and decrees of the councils and ecclesiastical laws of the emperors; and an interesting collection of letters. See Hergenröther's monograph (1869).

Phryne, a celebrated courtesan of antiquity, was born at Thespiz in Bœotia. As the fame of her beauty spread she became enormously rich through her numerous lovers. Accused of profaning the Eleusinian mysteries, she was defended by one of them, Hyperides, who, doubting the success of his eloquence, threw off her robe and showed her naked loveliness. [Fry'nee.]

Phryn'ichus, was (1) an Athenian tragic poet of the 5th century B.C.; (2) a poet of the Old Attic Comedy, contemporary with Aristophanes; (3) a Greek grammarian who flourished at Rome under Marcus Aurelius. See W. G. Rutherford's New Phrynichus (1881).

Piatti, ALFREDO (1822-1901), violoncellist, born at Bergamo, studied at Milan, settled in London in 1846, and retired in 1897. [Pee-at'lee.]

Piazzi, GIUSEPPE (1746-1826), Italian astronomer, entered the order of the Theatines in 1764. After holding professorial chairs at Genoa, Malta, Ravenna, and Rome, he became in 1780 professor of Mathematics in Palermo, and there he established an observatory in 1789. He published a catalogue of the stars (1803), and extended it in 1814. In 1801 he discovered the first of the minor planets, Ceres. [Pee-at'zee.]

Piccinni, NICCOLA (1728-1800), operatic composer, born at Bari, in 1766 was summoned to Paris, and became representative of the party opposed to Gluck (q.v.). [Pi-chee'nee.]

Piccolom'ini, an old Italian family, who obtained possession of the duchy of Amalfi. It produced numerous littérateurs and warriors, one pope (Pius II.), and several cardinals. OTTAVIO, Duke of Amalfi (1599-1656), entered the Spanish service, and, sent to aid the Emperor Ferdinand II., fought against the Bohemians (1620), in the Netherlands, and in Wallenstein's army at Lützen (1632), and contributed to the fall of Wallenstein. He greatly distinguished himself at Nördlingen (1634), and next year was sent to aid the Spaniards in the Netherlands to drive out the French. In 1640 he stopped the advance of the Swedes for a time, but he was worsted by them in Silesia. In 1643 he commanded the Spanish armies in the Netherlands. After the peace of Westphalia (1648) he was created field-marshal. His son Max, who figures in Schiller's Wallenstein, is a poetical fiction. See German works by Weyhe-Eimke (1870-71) and Richter (1874).

Pichegru, CHARLES, born, a labourer's son, at Arbois, 16th February 1761, enlisted in 1783, and by 1793 was a general of division. In October, with Hoche, he drove back the Austrians and overran the Palatinate; then defeating the Austrians at Fleurus, June 27, 1794, continued the struggle into the winter, and entered Amsterdam, January 20, 1795. Recalled by the Thermidorians, Pichegru crushed an insurrection in Paris, 1st April 1795, and next took Mannheim. But at the height of his fame he sold himself to the Bourbons. He deliberately remained inactive, and allowed Jourdan to be defeated. The Directory superseded him by Moreau. In 1797 he became president of the council of Five Hundred, and continued his Bourbon intrigues, but in September was arrested and deported to Cayenne. Escaping next year, he made his way to London, and thereafter lived in Germany and England until the Bourbon conspiracy of Cadoudal (q.v.) for the assassination of the First Consul. The pair reached Paris, but were soon betrayed, and Pichegru was lodged in the Temple, February 28, 1804. Here, on the morning of 6th April, he was found strangled in bed. See Lives by Gassier (1814), Pierrot (1826), Vouziers (1870). [Pee-sh-gree.]

Pichler, KAROLINE (1769-1843), Viennese novelist, published 60 vols. of novels and dramas—Agathokles (1808), Frauenwürde (1808), Die Belagerung Wiens (1824), &c. See her autobiographical Denkwürdigkeiten (4 vols. 1844). [Peck'h-ler.]

Picken, ANDREW (1788-1833), was born in Paisley and died in London, having published a series of novels, including The Sectarian (1829), The Dominic's Legacy (1830), and Waltham (1833).

Picken, EBENEZER (1769-1816), born at Paisley, died a teacher in Edinburgh. He published several volumes of Scots poems and a Pocket Dictionary of the Scottish Dialect (1818).

Pickering, WILLIAM (1796-1854), publisher, set up for himself in 1820, and became known by his 'Diamond Classics' (1821-31), his 'Aldine' edition of the poets, &c.—His son, BASIL MONTAGU PICKERING (1836-78), continued the business.

Pickersgill, FREDERICK RICHARD, historical painter, born in London in 1820, was elected an A.R.A. in 1847, an R.A. in 1857, retiring in 1887, until which year from 1873 he was keeper of the Royal Academy. He died 20th December 1900.

Pico della Miran'dola (1463-94), the son of the Count of Mirandola, in his youth visited the chief universities of Italy and France. In 1486 he issued a challenge to all comers to debate on any of nine hundred theses at Rome, but the debate was forbidden by the pope on the score of the heretical tendency of some of the theses, and Pico suffered persecution until Alexander VI. in 1493 absolved him of heresy. He was the last of the schoolmen; and his works are a bewildering compound of mysticism and reconcile knowledge. A humanist as well as a theologian, he wrote various Latin epistles and elegies and a series of florid Italian sonnets. See his Life by his nephew (trans. by Sir Thomas More; best ed. by J. M. Rigg, 1890), Pater's Studies in the Renaissance (1878), and two Italian works by Di Giovanni

(1882-94).—That nephew, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO DELLA MIRANDOLA (1469-1533), was murdered by his own nephew at the Castle of Mirandola. [Pee-ko.]

Pictet, ADOLPHE (1799-1875), a native of Geneva, and writer on the Celts and primitive Aryans. To the same family belong Marcus Auguste Pictet (1759-1825), physicist; François Jules (1809-72), zoologist and palæontologist; and Raoul (b. 1842), chemist and physicist at Geneva and Berlin, known from his liquefaction of oxygen, hydrogen, and carbonic acid. [Pik-tay.]

Picton, SIR JAMES ALLANSON (1805-89), a Liverpool antiquary, by profession an architect and surveyor, was a chief promoter of the free library. See Life by his son (1891).

Picton, SIR THOMAS, born in August 1758 at Poyston, Pembrokeshire, entered the army in 1771. In 1794 he went out to the West Indies, took part in the conquest of several of the islands, and was appointed (1797) governor of Trinidad, in 1801 becoming general. In 1803 he was superseded, but immediately after appointed commandant of Tobago. He returned, however, to England to take his trial for having permitted, under the old Spanish laws, a female prisoner, unquestionably guilty, to be 'tortured' (by standing on one foot, &c.). He was found technically guilty (1806), but on appeal was acquitted. He saw active service again in the Walcheren expedition (1809), and was made governor of Flushing. In 1810 he went to Spain, and in command of the 'Fighting Division' rendered brilliant service at Busaco, Fuentes de Onoro, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajoz, Vittoria, the battles of the Pyrenees, Orthez, and Toulouse. Created a G.C.B., he was seriously wounded at Quatre Bras, and fell leading his men to the charge at Waterloo, 18th June 1815. See Memoirs by H. B. Robinson (1835).

Pierce, FRANKLIN, fourteenth president of the United States, born at Hillsborough, N.H., November 23, 1804, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1827. From 1829 to 1833 he was a member of the state legislature, and for two years Speaker; he was then elected to congress as a Democrat, and in 1837 to the U.S. senate. In 1842 he resumed the practice of law. He remained, however, a leader of his party, advocated the annexation of Texas with or without slavery, and, after his opponents, the Whigs and Free-soilers, had been victorious in 1846, volunteered for the Mexican war. He was made brigadier-general, in August 1847 joined General Scott, and fought at Contreras and Churubusco. In 1852 Pierce was nominated as a compromise-candidate for the presidency against General Scott, the Whig nominee, and received the votes of all but four states. He defended slavery and the fugitive Slave Law. The events of his administration were the treaty for reciprocity of trade with the British American colonies, the treaty with Japan, the filibustering expeditions of Walker to Nicaragua and of others to Cuba, and, especially, the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the passing of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, which kindled a flame that ultimately led to the Civil War. Pierce was intensely hostile to the free-state settlers and to abolitionists in general. After the close of his term of office in 1857 he took no part in politics. He died 8th October 1869. See Lives by Hawthorne (1852) and D. W. Bartlett (1852), and a work by A. E. Carroll (1856).

Pierson, HENRY HUGO (1815-73), originally Pearson, composer, born at Oxford, the son of the Dean of Salisbury, was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1844-45 was Reid professor of Music in Edinburgh, and from 1846 lived in Germany. He composed the music for the second part of Goethe's Faust, the operas Leila and Contarini, the oratorios Jerusalem and Hezekiah, and many songs.

Pigafetta, FRANCESCO ANTONIO (1491-1535), born at Vicenza, sailed with Magellan (q.v.), and wrote the account of the voyage (trans. with introd. by Robertson, 1906).

Pigott, E. F. S. (1823-95), a barrister and journalist, from 1874 examiner of plays.

Pigott, RICHARD (c. 1828-89), born in Connty Meath, became editor and proprietor of The Irishman and two other papers of Fenian or extreme Nationalist type, which he disposed of in 1881 to Mr Parnell and others. Already suspected by his party, he sold in 1886 to a 'Loyal and Patriotic Union' papers incriminating Parnell in the Phoenix Park tragedy, on which were based the Times articles 'Farnellism and Crime.' Ultimately, convicted of falsehood in the witness-box, he confessed to Mr Labouchere that he had forged the more important papers, fled, and shot himself when about to be arrested in Madrid, 1st March 1889. See his Reminiscences (2d ed. 1883).

Pilate, PONTIUS, fifth Roman procurator of Judæa and Samaria, from 26 to 36 A.D., in whose time Jesus suffered. His rapacity and cruelties caused many outbreaks, and at length caused such loud complaints that Vitellius sent him to Rome to answer to Caesar (36 A.D.). Eusebius tells us that Pilate made away with himself; others say he was banished to Vienna Allobrogum (Vienne), or beheaded under Nero. Tradition makes him (or his wife) accept Christianity, and associates him with Pilatus in Switzerland, &c. The so-called Acts of Pilate are utterly unauthentic. See Lipsius, Die Pilatus-Acten (1871).

Pillars, JAMES, LL.D. (1778-1864), rector (1810) of the Edinburgh High School and professor (1820) of Humanity in the university, wrote much to stimulate reform in education.

Pilöty, KARL VON (1826-86), became head of the new Munich school of painters, in 1856 professor of Painting at the Munich Academy, and in 1874 director. All his best pictures belong to the class of historical genre. Pilöty was a pronounced realist; of his pictures, most of which have melancholy subjects, the best are 'Seni by Wallenstein's Corpse,' 'Nero amid the Ruins of Rome,' 'Wallenstein's March on Eger,' 'Galilee in Prison,' 'Columbus,' 'Death of Caesar,' 'Mary Stuart receiving the Death-sentence,' 'Thunelda in the Triumph of Germanicus,' and 'Death of Alexander the Great.' See Mrs Howitt-Watts's Art-student in Munich (2d ed. 1879) and Rosenberg's Münchener Malerschule (1887).

Pinchbeck, CHRISTOPHER (c. 1670-1732), a London clockmaker and constructor of automata, invented the alloy of copper and zinc called by his name.—His second son and namesake (c. 1710-83) invented astronomical clocks, automatic pneumatic brakes, patent candle-snuffers, &c.

Pinckney, CHARLES COTESWORTH, born at Charleston, S.C., 25th February 1746, was sent to England and educated at Oxford, read law, and studied at Caen Military Academy. He afterwards settled as barrister at Charleston. He was Washington's aide-de-camp at the battles of Brandywine and Germantown, and saw much service, but was taken prisoner at the surrender of Charleston (1780). A member of the convention that framed the U.S. constitution (1787), he introduced the clause forbidding religious tests. In 1796 he was sent as minister to France, but the Directory refused to receive him. In 1804-8 he was twice Federalist candidate for the presidency. He died 16th August 1825.

Pindar (Gr. Pindaros), the chief lyric poet of Greece, was born about 522 B.C., of an old and illustrious family, at Cynoscephalæ near Thebes, the capital of Bœotia. He commenced his career as a composer of choral odes at twenty with a song of victory still extant (Pyth. X., written in 502). He soon reached the highest rank in his profession, and composed odes for persons in all parts of the Greek world—for the tyrants of Syracuse and Macedon, as well as for the free cities of Greece. In his poems he gives advice and reproof as well as praise to his patrons. He died in 443 B.C. Pindar was in the prime of life when Salamis and Thermopylæ were fought, when Greek poetry and philosophy were opening into their richest blossom. He wrote hymns to the gods, pæans, dithyrambs, odes for processions, mimic dancing songs, convivial songs, dirges, and odes in praise of princes. Of all these poems we possess fragments only, but his Epinikia or Triumphal Odes have come down to us entire. They are divided into four books, celebrating the victories won in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. They show the intense admiration of the Greeks for bodily prowess and beauty; such gifts come from the gods and are sacred. The groundwork of Pindar's poems consists in those legends which form the Greek religious literature, and his protest against myths dishonouring to the gods shows a reverent nature. See editions by Böckh (1811-21), Disson (1830, re-edited by Schneidewin, 1840-47), Mommsen (1864-66), Christ (1869), Fennell (1879-83), Bury (Nemean Odes, 1891); translations in verse by Cary (1833), Paley (1869), and E. Myers (2d ed. 1883); also works on Pindar by Tycho Mommsen (1845), L. Schmidt (1862), Friederichs (1863), Lubert (1882), and Croiset (3d. ed. Paris, 1896).

Pindar, SIR PAUL (c. 1565-1650), born at Wellingborough, Northants, became wealthy as a banker in Italy, was English consul and ambassador at Aleppo and Constantinople 1609-16, was knighted in 1620, developed alum-works in England, and lent much money to the king and exchequer.

Pinel, PHILIPPE (1745-1826), a Paris physician who gained undying fame by his reformation of the old barbarous methods of treating the insane.

Pinero, SIR ARTHUR WING (knighted 1906), born in London, 24th May 1855, studied law, but in 1874 made his debut on the stage at Edinburgh, and in 1875 joined the Lyceum company. He is the author of £200 a Year (1877), The Squire (1881, when he quitted the stage), The Rocket (1883), Sweet Lavender (1888), The Profligate (1889), The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893), The Notorious Mrs Ebb-smith (1895), The Princess and the Butterfly (1897), The Gay Lord Quex (1899), &c. Pinkerton, ALLAN (1819-84), born in Glasgow, was a cooper and a Chartist who in 1842 settled at Dundee, Ill., became a detective, deputy-sheriff, head of the American secret service, and founder at Chicago of a great detective agency.

Pinkerton, JOHN (1758-1826), born at Edinburgh, in 1780 settled in London as a man of letters, in 1802 in Paris. His twenty-four books include Essay on Medals (1784); Origin of the Scythians or Goths (1787), in which he first fell foul of the Celts; Iconographia Scotica (1795-97); Walpoliana (1799); Modern Geography (1802-7); Voyages and Travels (1808-13); and New Modern Atlas (1809-15). See his Literary Correspondence (1830).

Pinnock, WILLIAM (1782-1843), born at Alton in Hants, came to London in 1817, and with his brother-in-law, Samuel Maunder (q.v.), published his 83 once well-known educational catechisms. He made £4000 a year, but speculated, and died in distress.—His son, WILLIAM HENRY PINNOCK, LL.D. (1813-85), vicar of Pinner, studied at Cambridge, and wrote on church law, &c.

Pinsuti, CIRO (1829-88), Italian composer, lived in England 1848-85 as teacher of singing, from 1856 at the Royal Academy of Music. He wrote charming music for over 300 songs.

Pinto, FERNÃO MENDES (c. 1510-83), Portuguese adventurer, born near Coimbra, at twenty-seven made his way to India, and remained twenty-one years in south-east Asia, leading a life of adventure, fighting pirates, trading, and going on special missions to Japan or elsewhere. He returned in 1558, and wrote an extravagant account of his adventures—Peregrinaçam (1614; Eng. trans. by F. Cogan, 1663; abridged ed. 1891).

Pinturicchio, the name given to the painter BERNARDINO DI BETTO VAGIO, born at Perugia in 1454. An assistant to Perugino, he helped him with the frescoes in the Sistine Chapel at Rome; and he himself painted frescoes in several Roman churches and in the Vatican library, also at Orvieto, Siena, &c. He executed a few panel pictures, and died at Siena, 11th Dec. 1513. See two works by Schmarsow (1880-82), and one by Ricci (trans. 1902). [Pin-too-rik-yo.] Pinwell, GEORGE JOHN (1842-75), born in London, drew on wood, did book illustration, and after 1865 became a water-colour painter.

Pinzon, VICENTE YAÑEZ, the discoverer of Brazil, belonged to a wealthy Andalusian family, and was born about the middle of the 15th century. He commanded the Nina in the first expedition of Columbus (1492), and, unlike his brother, Martin, who commanded another vessel, remained loyal to his chief. In 1499 he sailed on his own account, and on 26th Jan. 1500 landed near Pernambuco, on the Brazil coast, which he followed north to the Orinoco. He was made governor of Brazil by Ferdinand and Isabella. We lose sight of him after 1523.

Piombo, SEBASTIAN DEL (1485-1547), painter, was of the family of Luciani, and was called Del Piombo ('of the Seal') from his becoming in 1523 sealer of briefs to Pope Clement VII. He studied under Giovanni Bellini and Giorgione; went to Rome about 1510; worked in conjunction with Michelangelo; in 1519 painted his masterpiece, the 'Raising of Lazarus' (now in the National Gallery, London); and was an excellent portrait-painter. See Milanese, Les Correspondants de Michel Ange (Fr. trans. 1890). [P-yom'bo.]

Piozzi, MRS, more famous as MRS THRALE (Hester Lynch Salusbury), was born at Bodvel in Carnarvonshire, 27th January 1741, and in 1763 married Henry Thrale, a prosperous Southwark brewer. Dr Samuel Johnson in 1765 conceived an extraordinary affection for her, was domesticated in her house at Streatham Place for over sixteen years, and for her sake learned to soften many of his eccentricities. Thrale also esteemed Johnson, carried him to Brighton, to Wales in 1774, and to France in 1775, and made him one of his four executors. Thrale died in April 1781, after his wife had borne him twelve children, and in 1784 the brewery was sold for £135,000. Dr Johnson began to feel himself slighted as the widow became attached to the Italian musician Piozzi. The marriage took place in July 1784; the pair travelled through France, Italy, Germany, and Belgium, returning to England in 1787, to Streatham in 1790; but soon after Mrs Piozzi built Brynbellia on the Clwyd, where Piozzi died in 1809. When past seventy Mrs Piozzi formed a sentimental attachment for William Augustus Conway (q.v.); on 2d May 1821 she died of a broken leg. She was vivacious, frank, witty, and charming, and pretty, if hardly beautiful. She wrote poems, &c.; but two only of her books live through their subject—Anecdotes of Dr Johnson (1786; reprinted in Mrs Napier's Johnsoniana, 1884) and Letters to and from Dr Johnson (1788). See her Autobiography (reprinted by Hayward, 1861), Mangin's Piozziana (1833), and L. B. Seeley's Mrs Thrale (1891).

Piranesi, GIAMBATTISTA (1720–78), copper-engraver of Roman antiquities, was born at Venice.

Pirckheimer, WILHELM (1470–1530), a Nuremberg councillor and humanist, the friend of Dürer, and brother of the learned abbess, CHARITAS PIRCKHEIMER (1466–1532). See German works by Roth (1887) and Drews (1887).

Piron, ALEXIS (1689–1773), the French poet, playwright, and wit, born at Dijon, who, according to his own epitaph, 'was nothing, not even an Academician.' See his Œuvres Choïsies (ed. by Troubat, 1896) and Saintsbury's Misc. Essays (1892).

Pisano, NICCOLA (c. 1206–78), a sculptor of Pisa, executed three works still admired for their excellence—the pulpit of the baptistry at Pisa (1260), the shrine of St Dominic for a church at Bologna (1267), and the pulpit of the cathedral at Siena (1268). He was also an architect and engineer.—His son, GIOVANNI PISANO (c. 1250–1330), was not his equal either as sculptor or architect.—Niccola's pupil Andrea de Pontedera, generally called ANDREA PISANO (c. 1270–1349), became famous as a worker in bronze and a sculptor in marble, and settled in Florence.—VITTORE PISANO, or PISANELLO (1380–1456), was both fresco-painter and medallist. [Pee-zah'no.]

Pisistratus (Gr. Peisistratos), 'tyrant' of Athens, born about 600 B.C., acted at first with his kinsman Solon, but ere long became leader of a people's party in Attica—jealous of the rich, and eager for equality of political privileges. Declaring himself in danger from the aristocrats, he was allowed a bodyguard of fifty men. Gradually he increased the number, and in 560 seized the Acropolis. The heads of the aristocratic party fled, but returned in 554 and drove Pisistratus into exile (552). Supported by Thebes and Argos, he in 541 landed at Marathon, and marched on the capital. At Pallene he completely defeated his opponents, and thenceforward lived in undisturbed possession of power, dying 527, and transmitting his supremacy to his sons, Hippas and Hipparchus, the Pisistratidae. He enforced obedience to the laws of Solon; emptied the city of its poorest citizens, and made them agriculturists; secured provision for old and disabled soldiers; bestowed great care on the celebration of religious festivals; encouraged literature more than any Athenian had ever done before; and adorned Athens with many of its most beautiful buildings. See German works by Flach (1885) and Töpffer (1886).

Pitaval, FRANÇOIS GAYOT DE (1673–1748), served in the army, but became an advocate, and compiled the famous collection of Causes Célèbres.

Pitcairn, ROBERT (1793–1855), editor of Criminal Trials in Scotland, 1484–1624 (1830–33), held a post in the Register House at Edinburgh.

Pitcairne, ARCHIBALD (1652–1713), Edinburgh physician and satirist, in 1692–93 a professor at Leyden. He was notorious as a Jacobite, an Episcopalian, a satirist of Presbyterianism, and, according to his opponents, an atheist and scoffer at religion. See Life by Webster (1781).

Pitman, SIR ISAAC, born at Trowbridge, Wiltshire, 4th January 1813, was first a clerk, and then a schoolmaster at Barton-on-Humber (1832–36) and at Wotton-under-Edge, where he issued his Stenographic Sound Hand (1837). Dismissed from Wotton because he had joined the New (Swedenborgian) Church, he conducted a school at Bath (1839–43). Henceforward his career is the history of the development of shorthand and spelling reform. In 1842 he brought out the Phonetic Journal, and in 1845 opened premises in London. He was knighted in 1894, and died 22d January 1897. See Life by Baker (1908).

Pitra, JEAN BAPTISTE (1812–89), born near Autun, entered the Benedictine order, in 1855 was sent by the pope to Russia, and was created a cardinal-priest in 1863, Vatican librarian in 1869, and Cardinal-bishop of Frascati in 1879. Besides the Spicilegium Solesmense (1862–60), on his own abbey of Solesmes, he wrote on the hymnology and law of the Greek Church.

Pitrè, GIUSEPPE, folklorist, was born at Palermo, 23d December 1841, served with Garibaldi, and then practised medicine. He has published Biblioteca delle Tradizioni popolari Siciliane (1870–91), Curiosità popolari Tradizionali (1885–91), a bibliography of Italian traditions (1891), &c.

Pitcottie, ROBERT LINDSAY OF (c. 1500–65), Protestant, author of The Chronicles of Scotland, 1436–1565, owned the lands of Pitcottie near Cupar. His style is quaint and graphic, and his facts trustworthy, except where he deals in marvels. The best edition is Sheriff Mackay's (1899–1911).

Pitt, THOMAS (1653–1726), son of the rector of Blandford, became a wealthy East India merchant, governor of Madras, and purchaser for £20,400 of the Pitt Diamond, valued in 1791 at £480,000, and still among the national jewels of France. His eldest son, Robert, was father of the Earl of Chatham (q.v.); his second, Thomas (c. 1688–1729), was first Earl of Londonderry.

Pitt, WILLIAM, second son of the Earl of Chatham, was born at Hayes near Bromley, 28th May 1769. He was never sent to school, but entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, at fourteen. From his youth political life was placed before him as his ideal. He became an excellent classical scholar, but he valued the classical writers mainly as a school of language and of taste. When his father died, 11th May 1778, Pitt was left with a patrimony of less than £300 a-year. He was called to the bar in June 1780, but in September parliament was dissolved, and he stood for Cambridge University, but was rejected. Sir James Lowther, however, gave him a seat for Appleby, and Pitt entered the House of Commons in January 1781. The Tory ministry of Lord North was then tottering under the disasters in America, and confronted by the Old Whigs who followed Rockingham, among them Fox and Burke, and by a smaller body who had been attached to the fortunes of Chatham, such as Shelburne, Camden, and Barré. Pitt threw himself into the fray, and on several occasions assailed the falling ministry, but refused to cast in his lot with the opposition. Upon North's resignation in March 1782 a ministry was formed under Rockingham, but Pitt declined several offers of position. He gave a general support to the new ministers, but brought forward the question of parliamentary reform. On 1st July 1782 Rockingham died, and while Fox insisted on the leadership of the Duke of Portland, the king made Shelburne First Lord. Fox resigned, and Pitt became Chancellor of the Exchequer. Peace negotiations between England and the United States were signed in November and with France and Spain in January 1783, while a truce was established with Holland, and the first steps were taken towards a liberal commercial treaty with the United States. While Pitt's reputation steadily rose, the Shelburne ministry was weak and divided; but Pitt stood loyally by his chief. Two votes of censure directed against the peace were carried through the Commons, and on 24th February 1783 Shelburne resigned. The king implored Pitt, who had displayed splendid parliamentary talents, to accept the leadership, and gave him an absolute authority to name his colleagues. It was a dazzling offer, but he saw clearly that the hour of triumph had not yet come. After a long struggle the king was obliged to yield, and on 2d April a coalition ministry was formed under the Duke of Portland, with Fox and North as joint Secretaries of State. Pitt refused his old post of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and as leader of the Opposition brought forward an elaborate scheme of parliamentary reform. He was defeated by 293 to 149, but he succeeded in bringing Fox and North into direct collision. His other measure for the reform of abuses in the public offices passed the Commons, but was rejected in the Lords. A government bill modifying the charter of the East India Company shared a like fate; the ministry refused to resign, and the Commons supported them by large majorities; but the king dismissed them in December 1783, and Pitt took office as Chancellor of the Exchequer and First Lord of the Treasury. His position seemed hopeless; there was a majority of more than a hundred against him in the Commons, in which Pitt was the only Cabinet minister, while Dundas was the only considerable debater who supported him against the attacks of North, Fox, Burke, and Sheridan. But Pitt fought his battle with a skill and resolution never surpassed in parliamentary history. A long succession of hostile votes was carried, but failed to drive him from office, and soon signs appeared that the country was with him. The magnanimity he showed in refusing a great sinecure office added greatly to his popularity. The majorities against him grew steadily smaller. At last, on 25th March 1784, parliament was dissolved, and the ensuing election made Pitt one of the most powerful ministers in all English history, and prepared the way for a ministry which lasted, almost unbroken, for twenty years. Now the House of Commons acquired a new importance in the constitution, the people a new control over its proceedings, and the First Lord of the Treasury complete ascendancy in the government. The regency question established parliamentary rights. Direct parliamentary corruption was finally put down. Great numbers of sinecure places were abolished, reforms were introduced into revenue methods, and the whole system of taxation and of trade duties was thoroughly revised. The finances of the country, disorganised by the American war, became once more flourishing. An enlightened commercial treaty was negotiated with France. In foreign politics Pitt was for some years equally successful. His love of peace was sincere, but the influence of England in European councils rose greatly, and he showed much tact in extricating England from the ambitious designs of Prussia. But he cast aside too lightly on the first serious opposition parliamentary reform and the abolition of the slave-trade, and it became evident that he cared more for power than for measures. His famous Sinking Fund was thoroughly vicious in principle and results. His attempt to establish free-trade between England and Ireland failed through an explosion of manufacturing jealousy in England. More real blame attaches to his opposition to reforming the enormous abuses in the Irish parliament and to his uncertain policy towards the Irish Catholics. He created peerages with extreme lavishness, and few ministers have shown themselves more indifferent to the higher interests of literature, science, and art. When the French Revolution broke out his policy was one of absolute neutrality, but he wholly failed to understand the supreme importance of the Revolution. He was forced most reluctantly into war by the aggressive policy of France in Flanders and towards Holland; but he drew the sword believing that a struggle with France would be both short and easy; and he was almost wholly destitute of the talents needed for a war-minister. His military enterprises were badly planned and badly executed. Even in his domestic measures Pitt was no longer fortunate. Through fear of the revolutionary spirit, he was led into repressive measures. Corn had risen to famine price and great distress prevailed, and the government attempted to meet it by very ill-conceived relaxations of the poor-laws. In Ireland Pitt tried to win the Catholics by measures of conciliation; but the opposition of the king, divided counsels, and his own vacillation impaired his policy, and the injudicious recall of a popular viceroy contributed to the rebellion of 1798. He then tried to place Irish affairs on a sound basis by a legislative union which was to be followed by Catholic emancipation, the payment of the priests, and a commutation of tithes. The first measure was carried by very corrupt means, but the king declared himself inexorably opposed to Catholic emancipation. Pitt resigned his office into the hands of his follower Addington in February 1801; but a month later, on hearing that the Catholic question had overthrown the tottering intellect of the king, he declared that he would abandon Catholic claims for the rest of the reign, and resumed office in May 1804 on this understanding. His last ministry was a humiliating one. The war, suspended by the peace of Amiens, had broken out with renewed vehemence. There was danger of invasion, and Pitt desired to combine the most eminent men of all parties in the ministry; but the king forbade the admission of Fox, and Fox's chief followers refused to join without their chief. A junction with Addington lasted only for a short time. Dundas, now Viscount Melville, was at the head of the Admiralty; but a charge of misappropriating public funds was raised, and in 1805 he was driven ignominiously from office. Pitt's own health was now broken. His spell had passed away, and although Trafalgar saved England from immediate danger of invasion, the disasters of Ulm and Ansterlitz threw a dark cloud over his closing scene. He died at Putney, 23d January 1806, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Pitt was never married, and he never mixed much in general society; but in all his private relations he was pure, amiable, simple, and attractive. He was not free from the prevailing vice of hard drinking, and his great indifference to money degenerated into culpable carelessness. With no extravagant tastes, with no expensive elections, and with an income of at least £10,000 a-year, he left £40,000 of debt, which was paid by the nation. Few men, however, possessed to a higher degree the power of commanding, directing, and controlling, and he inspired the nation with unbounded confidence. England has seen no greater parliamentary leader, few greater masters of financial and commercial legislation; and he was one of the first statesmen to adopt the teaching of Adam Smith. His Political Life was written by Gifford (1809) and Bishop Tomline (1822); the standard biography is by Lord Stanhope (4th ed. 1879). See Macaulay's essay, books by Sergeant (1882), Walford (1890), Lord Rosebery (1891), Lord Ashbourne (1899), Whitley (1906), Holland Rose (1911-12).

Pittacus of MITYLENE (c. 650-570 B.C.), one of the 'Seven Wise Men' of Greece, whose experience, according to the ancients, was embodied in 'Know thine opportunity' and other aphorisms.

Pitt-Rivers, AUGUSTUS LANE-FOX (1827-1900), Lieutenant-general, F.R.S., D.C.L., served (as Lieutenant A. Lane-Fox) in the Crimea, devoted himself to archaeology, anthropology, and excavations, and in 1880 assumed his additional name under the will of his great-uncle, George Pitt, Lord Rivers. He founded the anthropological collection of the Museum of Oxford.

Pius, the name of ten Roman pontiffs. PIUS I. was Bishop of Rome 140-155.—PIUS II. (ÆNEAS Sylvius Piccolomini) was born in 1405. His early life was stained with moral irregularities, and he wrote licentious poems, letters, and a loose novel. At twenty-six he was secretary to the Bishop of Fermo at the Council of Basel, and in 1432-35 was employed on missions to Scotland, England, and Germany. He took an office under the Emperor Frederick III., regulated his life, took orders, was made Bishop of Trieste, and after returning to Italy (1456) a cardinal. On the death of Callistus III. in 1458 he was elected pope, and took the name of Pius II. His reign is memorable for his efforts to organise an armed confederation of Christian princes to resist the Turkish arms. He died 14th August 1464. Æneas Sylvius was one of the most eminent scholars of his age. His works (Basel, 1551) are chiefly historical; his letters throw a vivid light upon their age. See Lives by Voigt (1856-63), Weiss (1897), and Boulting (1909), Creighton's History of the Papacy (vol. ii. 1882), and Pastor's History of the Popes (Eng. trans. vol. iii. 1895).—PIUS III., his nephew, was pope for barely one month of 1503.—PIUS IV. (Medici), born at Milan in 1499, became Archbishop of Ragusa, cardinal in 1549, and pope in 1559. He brought to a close the deliberations of the Council of Trent, and issued (1564) the Creed of Pius IV., or Tridentine Creed. He died December 8, 1565.—PIUS V. (Ghislieri), born near Alessandria in 1504, became a Dominican, a bishop in 1556, and a cardinal in 1557. As inquisitor-general for Lombardy he rigorously repressed the Reformed doctrines. Chosen pope (1566), he laboured to restore discipline and morality, and reduced the expenditure of his court. The bull In Cæna Domini (1568) applies to the 16th century the principles and the legislation of Hildebrand. His bull releasing Queen Elizabeth's subjects from their allegiance (1570) fell harmless. The most momentous event of his pontificate was the expedition which he organised, with Spain and Venice, against the Turks, resulting in the naval engagement of Lepanto (1571). Pius died 1st May 1572, and was canonised in 1712.—PIUS VI. (Braschi) was born at Cesena, December 27, 1717, attained to the cardinalate in 1773, to the papacy in 1775. To him Rome owes the drainage of the Pontine Marsh, the improvement of the port of Ancona, the completion of St Peter's, the foundation of the New Museum of the Vatican, and the embellishment of the city. The pope repaired to Vienna, but failed to restrain the reforming Emperor Joseph from further curtailing his privileges. Soon after came the French Revolution and the confiscation of church property in France. The pope launched his thunders in vain, and ere long the murder of the French agent at Rome (1793) gave the Directory an excuse for the attack. Bonaparte took possession of the Legations, and afterwards of the March of Ancona, and extorted (1797) the surrender of these provinces from Pius. The murder of a member of the French embassy in December was avenged by Berthier taking possession of Rome. Pius was called on to renounce his temporal sovereignty, and on his refusal was seized, carried to Siena, the Certosa, Grenoble, and finally Valence, where he died, August 28, 1799.—PIUS VII. (Chiaromonte) was born at Cesena, 14th August 1742. He became Bishop of Tivoli, and, already a cardinal, was, on the death of Pius VI., chosen his successor (1800). Rome was now restored to the papal authority, and next year the French troops were withdrawn from most of the papal territory. Pius restored order in his states, and in 1801 concluded a concordat with Napoleon, which the latter altered by autocratic Articles organiques. In 1804 Napoleon compelled Pius to come to Paris to consecrate him as emperor. He failed to get any modification of the articles, and soon after his return to Rome the French seized Ancona and entered Rome. This was followed by the annexation (May 1809) of the papal states to the French empire. The pope in June retaliated by excommunicating the robbers of the Holy See. He was next removed to Grenoble, and finally to Fontainebleau, where he was forced to sign a new concordat and sanction the annexation. The fall of Napoleon (1814) allowed him to return to Rome, and the Congress of Vienna restored him his territory. Brigandage was suppressed, as well as secret societies; while the Jesuits were restored. Pius died August 20, 1823. See Life by Mary H. Allies (1872 and 1897).—PIUS VIII. (Saverio) was pope only from March 1829 to Nov. 1830.—PIUS IX. (Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti), born at Sinigaglia, May 13, 1792, and admitted to deacon's orders in 1818, in 1827 was made Archbishop of Spoleto, and translated to Imola in 1832. In 1840 he became a cardinal, and on the death of Gregory XVI. in 1846 was elected pope. He entered at once on a course of reforms. He granted an amnesty to all political prisoners and exiles, removed most of the disabilities of the Jews, authorised railways, projected a council of state, and in March 1848 published his Statuto Fondamentale, a scheme for the temporal government of the papal states by two chambers, one nominated by the pope, the other (with the power of taxation) elected by the people. At first the new pope was the idol of the populace. But the revolutionary fever of 1848 spread too fast for a reforming pope, and his refusal to make war upon the Austrians finally forfeited the affections of the Romans. On November 15, 1848, his first minister, Count Rossi, was murdered, and two days later a mob assembled in the square of the Quirinal. On the 24th the pope escaped to Gaeta, and a republic was proclaimed in Rome. In April 1849 a French expedition was sent to Civita Vecchia; in July General Oudinot took Rome, after a siege of thirty days; and henceforward the papal government was re-established. Pio Nono proved an unyielding Conservative and ultramontane, closely allied with the Jesuits. The war of the French and Sardinians against Austria in 1859 and the popular vote of 1860 incorporated great part of the papal territory with the Sardinian (Italian) kingdom; but Pius always refused to recognise the fact. He re-established the hierarchy in England, sanctioned a Catholic university in Ireland, and condemned the Queen's Colleges. He concluded a reactionary concordat with Austria. By the bull 'Ineffabilis Deus' (1854) he decreed the Immaculate Conception; his famous encyclical 'Quanta Cura' and the Syllabus of errors appeared in 1864. The Vatican Council (1869-70) proclaimed the infallibility of the pope. For the last ten years the pope's temporal power had been only maintained by the French garrison; on its withdrawal in 1870 the soldiers of Victor Emmanuel entered Rome. For the rest of his days the pope lived a voluntary 'prisoner' within the Vatican, and died 8th February 1878. See Lives by Maguire (2d ed. 1878), T. A. Trollope (1877), Dawson (1880), and Pougeois (Par. 1877-86).—Prus X. (Giuseppe Sarto) was born 2d June 1835 of humble parents at Riese near Venice, studied at Treviso and Padua, and, ordained priest in 1858, was ere long chancellor of the diocese and vicar of the chapter of Treviso. He was made bishop of Mantua in 1884 by Leo XIII., and in 1893 cardinal and patriarch of Venice. In August 1903 he was elected pope, after six fruitless ballots had been taken. Almost his first act was sanctioning the condemnation of the Abbé Loisy's books; and the separation of church and state in France and Portugal, toleration in Spain, and Pius's attacks on modernism led to strained relations and embarrassments.

Pizarro, FRANCISCO, born at Trujillo about 1478, served under Gonsalvo di Cordova in Italy. In 1509 we find him at Darien. He also served under Balboa when he crossed the isthmus of Panamá and discovered the Pacific. In 1526 Pizarro and Almagro sailed for Peru; and, after many misadventures and delays, they reached its port of Tumbez, and collected full information respecting the empire of the Incas. Pizarro repaired to Spain for authority to undertake the conquest, which he got in 1529, he being made captain-general and Almagro marshal. He sailed again from Panamá in December 1531, with 183 men and 37 horses; Almagro was to follow with reinforcements. Landing at Tumbez, the Spaniards commenced the march inland in May 1532, and in November entered Cajamarca. Near this Pizarro captured the Inca Atahualpa by treachery, and after extorting an enormous ransom, amounting to £3,500,000, put him to death, 29th August 1533. Pizarro then marched to Cuzco, set up the young Inca Manco as nominal sovereign, and was himself created a marquis by the Emperor Charles V. Almagro undertook the conquest of Chili, Pizarro was busy founding Lima and other cities on the coast, and his brothers were at Cuzco, when an Indian insurrection broke out. Both Cuzco and Lima were besieged, and Juan Pizarro was killed, but in the spring of 1537 Almagro returned from Chili, raised the siege of Cuzco, and took possession of the city. Pizarro had no intention of allowing his rival to retain Cuzco. Too old to take the field himself, he entrusted the command of his forces to his brothers, who defeated Almagro, 26th April 1538, and beheaded him soon afterwards. One of Almagro's followers, named Juan de Rada, matured a conspiracy for the assassination of Pizarro. The conspirators attacked his house in Lima, and murdered the old conqueror, 26th June 1541. Hernando Pizarro, for having beheaded Almagro at Cuzco, was imprisoned until 1560 on his return to Spain. He died in 1578.—GONZALO PIZARRO accompanied his brother Francisco in the conquest of Peru, and did good service when the Indians besieged Cuzco, and in the conquest of Charcas. In 1539 he undertook an expedition to the eastward of Quito, and endured fearful hardships. One of his lieutenants, Francisco de Orellana, sent in advance for supplies, deserted his starving comrades, discovered the whole course of the Amazon, and returned to Spain. Only 90 out of 350 Spaniards returned with Gonzalo in June 1542. On his brother's assassination Gonzalo retired to Charcas. In 1544 the new viceroy, Vela, arrived in Peru to enforce the 'New Laws.' The Spaniards, dismayed, entreated Gonzalo to protect their interests. He mustered 400 men, entered Lima in October 1544, and was declared governor of Peru; the viceroy Vela was defeated and killed in battle (1546). When news of this revolt reached Spain, Pedro de la Gasca, an able ecclesiastic, was sent to Peru as president to restore order, and landed at Tumbez in June 1547. Gonzalo Pizarro defeated a force sent against him, and met Gasca near Cuzco in April 1548. But his forces deserting him, he gave himself up, and was beheaded 10th April 1548, at the age of forty-two. See Lives of Francisco by Helps (1869) and Towle (1878).

Planché, JAMES ROBINSON, was born, of Huguenot descent, in London, 27th February 1796. His first extravaganza, Amoroso, was produced at Drury Lane in 1818. In 1823 he designed for Charles Kemble the dresses and appointments for King John. In 1824 he wrote English words for Weber's Der Freischütz, in 1826 for Oberon; and then ninety-six adaptations or translations and seventy-two original pieces (some with collaborators). In 1854 he was made Ronge Croix Pursuivant, and in 1866 Somerset Herald; in 1872 he received a pension of £200 a-year. He died May 29, 1880. Among his works, besides two histories of British costume and a Cyclopædia of Costume, are Regal Records (1838), The Pursuivant of Arms (1852; 3d ed. 1874), and The Conqueror and his Companions (1874). See his Recollections (1872) and Extravanzas (5 vols. 1879).

Planquette, ROBERT, operatic composer, born in Paris in 1850, and educated at the Conservatoire there, wrote Les Cloches de Corneville (1877), Rip Van Winkle (1882), Paul Jones (1889), Le Talisman (1893), &c. He died in January 1903.

Plantagenet, a surname applied to the Angevin family which in 1154 succeeded in the person of Henry II. to the throne of England on the extinction of the Norman dynasty in the male line, and which reigned till Richard III.'s death at Bosworth in 1485. Plante-geneste was given as a nickname to Geoffrey, Count of Anjou, husband of Matilda, daughter of Henry I.—possibly from the sprig of broom (planta genista) which he wore in his cap, possibly because he used a broom-switch in penance! possibly from the village of Le Genest in Maine; and Henry I. is the only king to whom Freeman would allow the name. The first to use Plantagenet (sic) as his family name was Richard Duke of York in 1460, in laying claim to the crown. But the sovereigns called Plantagenet kings are Henry II., Richard I., John, Henry III., Edward I.-III., Richard II., Henry IV.-VI., Edward IV.-V., and Richard III.

Plantin, CHRISTOPHE (1514-89), printer, born at St Avertin near Tours, settled as bookbinder at Antwerp in 1549; six years later he began to print. His Biblia Polyglotta (1569-73), his Latin, Hebrew, and Dutch Bibles, and his editions of the classics are all famous. His printing-houses in Antwerp, Leyden, and Paris were carried on by his sons-in-law. His office in Antwerp, bought by the city in 1876, is now the 'Musée Plantin.' See French works by Rooses (2d ed. 1892), Debacker and Ruelens (1866), Degeorge (3d ed. 1886), and Gruel (1894), and Plantin's Correspondance (1884-86).

Planudes, MAXIMUS (c. 1260-1310), a monk of Constantinople, sent as ambassador to Venice in 1296. His tasteless Anthology (Flor. 1494), from that of Constantine Cephalas (10th century), was the only one known in the West until 1606. See his Letters, edited by Treu (Bresl. 1890).

Plato, Athenian philosopher, was born probably in 427 B.C., by one account in Athens, by another in the island of Egina. He came of an aristocratic family; some stories made him the son of Apollo. In youth he is said to have written poetry; a few epigrams in the 'Anthology' are ascribed to him. Aristotle says that from his youth he had been familiar with Cratylus, a follower of Heraclitus, and that he was influenced by Socrates, the Pythagoreans, and the Eleatics. If Plato was, as Diogenes Laertius says, twenty years old when he first became companion of Socrates, his discipleship lasted for eight years. According to his own account in the Phædo, he was prevented by illness from being present at the last conversation and death of his master (399). Plato made no attempt to enter on a political career. Through family ties he was connected with the anti-democratic party, who admired Sparta. His youth was passed amid the disasters and failures of the Athenian democracy; and the martyrdom of his master would not increase his sympathy with that form of government. After Socrates' death he seems to have stayed some time at Megara, where he studied the Eleatic philosophy. He is also reported to have visited Cyrene, Egypt, Italy, and Sicily. On his way back from Sicily Plato is said to have been seized by order of Dionysius and sold as a slave in Egina, but ransomed. Back in Athens (389 or 387), he now began to teach in the Academy, a place of exercise planted like a grove. There and in his own adjacent garden, he gathered round him a band of disciples, teaching them mainly by conversations, and embodying the results of his thinking and teaching in his written Dialogues. He twice revisited Sicily, having in 368 been summoned to Syracuse in the vain hope that he might convert the younger Dionysius to philosophy. He died at home after a peaceful old age, 'in his eighty-first year,' at a wedding-feast (347). He was succeeded in the Academy by his sister's son, Spensippus; but his greatest disciple was Aristotle. Of Plato's philosophical writings none apparently have been lost; but along with undoubtedly genuine works there have come down to us others whose authenticity is open to question. Almost all modern scholars reject the Epistles; and the authenticity of some ten or more of the dialogues has been much disputed. Fortunately, the more important works are the least open to question, and these may best be arranged in groups. First of all come those short dialogues in which Plato does not go beyond what the actual Socrates might have said; the most important of this group is the Protagoras. The Apology, or 'Defence of Socrates on his Trial,' has probably more historical accuracy than any other composition of Plato's (Plato tells us he was present at the trial), and may have been written soon after Socrates' death. The Phædo (the last conversation of Socrates, on the immortality of the soul) is probably of later date. Some modern scholars assign the great metaphysical dialogues (Parmenides, Theætetus, Sophist, Statesman) to the time, between 399 and 386, when Plato began his teaching at the Academy. Others, with more probability, consider these dialogues and the Philebus to belong to a later period than the Republic. The Phædrus, Symposium ('Banquet'), Gorgias, Republic, and Phædo, in which (along with the Theætetus) Plato's literary skill is at its very highest, may perhaps be all assigned to the period of his life after forty, but before his old age. In these dialogues the personal characteristics ascribed to Socrates are probably represented with historical and, at least, with dramatic truth; but theories are introduced which betray strong Pythagorean influences.

Plato's philosophy is a development of the teaching of Socrates, but contains elements derived from the earlier philosophies. The most special part of Plato's teaching is his doctrine of ideas (lit. 'forms,' 'shapes,' or 'kinds'). In discussing 'what is knowledge,' Plato says it is not 'sensation' (or 'perception'), as Protagoras and his followers suggest; sensation alone gives us no objective certainty valid for every one. Nor is it 'opinion.' Opinion may be true, but has no certainty. A man only 'knows' when he has got at the reasons or causes of things, when he sees facts not in an isolated way, but connected by the 'chain of causation:' he must be dealing with what is permanent and universal. This introduces the theory of 'Ideas.' According to Plato, both the one (the permanent) and the manifold (the changing) have their place in the universe, the former in the world of ideas, the intelligible world, with which 'science' deals, the latter in the world of sense, with which mere 'opinion' is content. These ideas are not mere concepts of our minds: they are, in Plato's phrase, 'the most real existences.' The 'ideas' must, however, be thought of both as 'real kinds' and as archetypes. Plato's presentation of his theory varies: the theory itself underwent modification. The highest of the ideas is 'the good.' Plato cannot accept the Cyrenaic view that pleasure is the good; but neither does he agree with the Cynics that all pleasure is evil. Pleasures are good or bad, high or low, according to the part of the soul to which they belong.

Plato's influence on human thought has been even more widely diffused, but is more difficult to measure than that of Aristotle. The various schools of the Old, Middle, and New Academy caught only a small portion of his spirit. The Stoics, especially the later Stoics, borrowed much from him. But the Alexandrian Platonists and the Neoplatonists differ from Plato himself in making the Timæus the centre of his system. The Italian Renaissance and the revolt against Scholastic Aristotelianism revived the study of Plato's own writings. Aristotle's whole system gives a more trustworthy clue to Plato's real philosophical significance than is to be got from mystical interpreters whose zeal was not always according to knowledge. The first printed edition of the Greek text of Plato is the Aldine (1513). The best texts are those of Stallbaum (1836-75), Orelli and Baiter (1839-42), K. F. Hermann (1873), and Schanz (1875). A complete English translation was published by Thomas Taylor in 1804; and Jowett made Plato an English classic (Trans. with Introductions, 1871; 3d ed. 5 vols. 1892). Among works on Plato's philosophy, see Grote's Plato; Whewell's Platonic Dialogues for English Readers (1860); Zeller's Plato (Eng. trans.); Walter Pater's Plato and Platonism (1893), Strong's Platonism (1896), Bussell's The School of Plato (1896), and the sections dealing with Plato in the Histories of Philosophy by Schweigler, Ueberweg, and Erdmann.

Platoff, MATVEI IVANOVICH, COUNT (1757-1818), born at Azov, served in the Turkish campaign of 1770-71, and in 1801 was named by Alexander I. Hetman of the Cossacks of the Don. He took part in the campaigns against the French (1805-7), and hung on their retreat from Moscow with pitiless pertinacity (1813), defeating Lefebvre at Altenburg, gaining a victory at Laon, and making his name memorable by the devastations of his hordes of semi-savages.

Plautus, M. ACCIUS (more correctly T. Maccius), the chief comic poet of Rome, was born about 250 B.C. at Sarsina in Umbria. It is probable that he went to Rome while still young, and acquired there his mastery of the most idiomatic Latin. At Rome he found employment in connection with the stage, and saved money enough to enable him to leave Rome and start in business on his own account in foreign trade. His plays evince close familiarity with seafaring life and adventure, and an intimate knowledge of all the details of buying and selling and book-keeping. He failed, however, in business, and returned to Rome in such poverty that he had to earn his livelihood in the service of a baker by turning a hand-mill. While in this humble calling he wrote three plays which he sold to the managers of the public games. The price paid him enabled him to leave the mill, and he spent the rest of his life at Rome. Probably he commenced to write about 224 B.C., and, until his death in 184, he continued to produce comedies with wonderful fecundity. His plays appear to have been left in the hands of the actors, who probably interpolated and omitted passages to suit them for the stage. Almost all the prologues were written after his death. About 130 plays were attributed to him in the time of Gellius, who held most of them to be the work of earlier dramatists revised and improved by Plautus. Roman critics considered most of them spurious. Varro limited the genuine comedies to twenty-one; and these so-called 'Varronian comedies' are the same which we now possess, only one, the Vidularia, being lost. Plautus's plays were immensely popular, and were acted, as Arnobius tells us, in the time of Diocletian, five centuries later. Plautus borrowed his plots to a large extent from the New Attic Comedy, which dealt with social life to the exclusion of politics. But he infused into his borrowed framework a new and robust life, which was Roman to the very core. His perfect spontaneity, vivacity, and vigour of language, and the comic power of his dialogues, show that these are the genuine fruit of his own genius. The charm of Plautus, lying in his genuine humour and powerful grasp of character, goes deep down to the roots of human nature; he delights his readers to-day as truly as when he made Roman theatres ring with applause. According to Sellar, the five best plays are Aulularia, Capitoli, Menæchmi, Pseudolus, Rudens. Shakespeare has imitated the plot of the Menæchmi, entirely recasting it, in his Comedy of Errors. Molière's L'Avare is borrowed from the Aulularia. English translations are by Thornton and Warner (1767-74) and H. T. Riley (1880). Ritschl showed great acuteness in restoring Plautus's text, which is very corrupt (2d ed. 1871). The complete edition which he contemplated was continued by G. Goetz and others (1878-94). There is a good translation in the original metres by Sugden (1895).

Playfair, JOHN, born near Dundee, March 10, 1748, studied at St Andrews, and in 1773 became minister of Liff and Benzie, in 1785 joint-professor of Mathematics at Edinburgh, but he exchanged his chair for that of Natural Philosophy in 1805. He was a strenuous supporter of the 'Huttonian theory' in geology, and travelled much to make observations. He died 19th July 1819. His separate works are Elements of Geometry (1795) and Outlines of Natural Philosophy (1812-16).

Playfair, LYON, LORD, born at Meerut, Bengal, 21st May 1819, studied at St Andrews, Glasgow, London, and Giessen, was manager of print-works at Clitheroe 1840-43, Edinburgh Chemistry professor 1858-68, Liberal M.P. from 1868, Postmaster-general 1878-74, Vice-president of Council 1886. Made a K.C.B. in 1883, in 1892 a peer, he wrote on chemistry and political economy. He died 30th May 1898.

Plethon, GEORGIOS GEMISTOS (c. 1355-1450), Greek scholar, probably a native of Constantinople, was counsellor in the Peloponnesus to Manuel and Theodore Palæologus, and was sent to the Council of Florence in 1439. Here, if he did little for the union of the Churches, he did much to spread a taste for Plato. [Plee-thoan.]

Pleyel, IONAZ JOSEPH (1757-1831), composer, in 1783 became kapellmeister of Strasburg Cathedral. In 1791 he visited London, in 1795 opened a music shop in Paris, and in 1807 added a pianoforte manufactory. His forgotten compositions include quartets, concertos, and sonatas. [Plee-el.]

Plimsoll, SAMUEL, 'the sailors' friend,' born at Bristol, 10th February 1824, became clerk in a Sheffield brewery, and in 1854 started business in the coal trade in London. Shortly afterwards he began to interest himself in the dangers affecting the mercantile marine. He accumulated a mass of facts proving that the gravest evils resulted from the employment of unseaworthy ships, from overloading, undermanning, bad stowage, and over-insurance. He entered parliament for Derby in 1868; but it was not until he had published Our Seamen (1873) and had made an appeal to the public that the Merchant Shipping Act (1876) was passed, by which, inter alia, every owner was ordered to mark upon his ship a circular disc (the 'Plimsoll Mark'), with a horizontal line drawn through its centre, down to which the vessel might be loaded. Mr Plimsoll retired from parliamentary life in 1880. In 1890 he published Cattle-ships, exposing the cruelties and dangers of cattle-shipping. He died 31 June 1898. See Japp, Good Men and True (1890).

Pliny (GAIUS PLINIUS SECUNDUS), the Elder, came of a North Italian stock possessing estates at Novum Comum (Como), where he was born 23 A.D. He was educated in Rome, and when about twenty-three entered the army and served in Germany. He became colonel of his regiment (a cavalry one), and while attentive enough to his military duties to write a treatise on the throwing of missiles from horseback and to compile a history of the Germanic wars, he made a series of scientific tours in the region between the Ems, Elbe, and Weser, and the sources of the Danube. Returning to Rome in 52, he studied for the bar, but withdrew to Como, and devoted himself to reading and authorship. Apparently for the guidance of his nephew, he wrote his Studiosus, a treatise defining the culture necessary for the orator, and the grammatical work, Dubius Sermo. By Nero he was appointed procurator in Spain, and through his brother-in-law's death (71) he became guardian of his sister's son, Pliny the Younger, whom he adopted. Vespassian, whom he had known in Germany, was now emperor, and was henceforth his most intimate friend; but court favour did not wean him from study, and he brought down to his own time the history of Rome by Aufidius Bassus. A model student, amid metropolitan distraction he worked assiduously, and by lifelong application filled the 160 volumes of manuscript which, after using them for his Historia Naturalis (77), he bequeathed to his nephew. In 79 he was in command of the Roman fleet stationed off Misenum when the great eruption of Vesuvius was at its height. Eager to witness the phenomenon as closely as possible, he landed at Stabiae (Castellamare), but had not gone far when he succumbed to the stifling vapours rolling down the hill. His Historia Naturalis alone of his many writings survives. Under that title the ancients classified everything of natural or non-artificial origin. Pliny adds digressions on human inventions and institutions, devoting two books to a history of fine art, and dedicates the whole to Titus. His observations, made at second-hand, show no discrimination between the true and the false, between the probable and the marvellous, and his style is inartistic, sometimes obscure. But he supplies us with information on an immense variety of subjects as to which, but for him, we should have remained in the dark. The best text is by Jan and Mayhoff (1857-75); the best translation by Littré, in French (1848-50).

Pliny (GAIUS PLINIUS CÆCILIUS SECUNDUS), the Younger, was born at Novum Comum, 62 A.D. He wrote a Greek tragedy in his fourteenth year, and made such progress under Quintilian that he became noted as one of the most accomplished men of his time. His proficiency as an orator enabled him at eighteen to plead in the Forum, and brought him much practice. Then he served as military tribune in Syria, where he frequented the schools of the Stoic Euphrates and of Artemidorus; at twenty-five, the earliest possible age, he was questor Cesaris, then prætor, and afterwards consul in 100 A.D., in which year he wrote his laboured panegyric of Trajan. In 103-5 he was prætor of the Provincia Pontica, and, among other offices, held that of curator of the Tiber, chiefly for the prevention of floods. He married twice; his second wife, Calpurnia, is fondly referred to in one of his most charming letters for the many gifts and accomplishments with which she sweetened his rather invalid life. He died without issue about 114. It is to his letters that Pliny owes his assured place in literature as a master of the epistolary style. His meaning, though never obscure, is generally fuller than his expression; and, reading between the lines, we discern the features of a truly lovable man, much given to hospitality, and always pleased to help a less favoured brother, such as Suetonius or Martial. We derive from him not a few of our distinctest impressions of the life of the upper class in the 1st century; above all, it is from his correspondence with Trajan that we get our clearest knowledge of how even the most enlightened Romans regarded the then obscure sect of the Christians and their 'depraved and extravagant superstition.' Keil's text of the Epistles and Panegyricus (1853) is the best; a useful selection with a good commentary has been published by Church and Brodribb (1871). Melmoth's translation (1746) is free and eminently readable; Orrery's of the Epistles (1751) is still esteemed.

Plotinus, the most important Neoplatonic philosopher, was born at Lycopolis in Egypt in 205 A.D. In 242 he joined Gordianus's expedition to Persia, in order to study the philosophy of India and Persia; but, the emperor being murdered in Mesopotamia, he returned to Antioch. In 244 he went to Rome, where men and women of the highest circles flocked to hear him lecture on Neopythagorean and Neoplatonic wisdom, on asceticism, and the charm of a purely contemplative life; and such was the impression his earnestness made upon his hearers that some of them gave up their fortune to the poor, set their slaves free, and devoted themselves to study and ascetic piety. Sixty years old, he thought of realising Plato's 'Republic,' by founding an aristocratical and communistic commonwealth; but he died near Minturnæ in 270. He left fifty-four books to the editorial care of his pupil Porphyry, who arranged them in six principal divisions, each subdivided into nine books or Enneads. Plotinus's system was based chiefly on Plato's, combined with Neopythagoreanism and the oriental theory of Emanation—i.e. the constant transmission of powers from the Absolute to the Creation, through several agencies, the first of which is 'Pure Intelligence,' whence flows the 'Soul of the World,' whence, again, the souls of 'men' and 'animals,' and finally 'matter' itself. His mysticism influenced early Christian philosophy, modern theosophy, and various German idealistic systems. See editions by H. F. Müller (1878-80) and Volkmann (1883-84), and works by Kirchner (1854), Brenning (1864), and Kleist (1883).

Plumptre, EDWARD HAYES, D.D., born in London, August 6, 1821, took a double-first in 1844 from University College, Oxford, and was elected a fellow of Brasenose. He became chaplain at King's College, London (1847), a professor there (1853), a prebendary of St Paul's (1863), principal of Queen's College, Harley Street (1875), and Dean of Wells (1881). He died February 1, 1891. Among his numerous contributions to theology are King's College Sermons (1860), Christ and Christendom (Boyle Lectures, 1867), Biblical Studies (1870), Introduction to the New Testament (1883), and The Spirits in Prison (1884). Dean Plumptre's name is also widely known by his verse translations of Sophocles (1865), Æschylus (1868), and Dante in the original metres (1886-87), as well as by his original verse—Lazarus (1864), Master and Scholar (1866), and Things New and Old (1884). His Life of Bishop Ken (1886) is less happy.

Plunket, WILLIAM CONYNGHAM, LORD (1764-1854), born at Enniskillen, opposed the Union

(1798), prosecuted Emmett (1803), and rose to be Lord Chancellor of Ireland (1830-41).—His grandson, WILLIAM, LORD PLUNKET (1828-97), was Archbishop of Dublin from 1884.

Plunkett, Sir Horace Curzon, P.C., F.R.S., K.C.V.O., D.C.L., and LL.D., third son of Lord Dunsany, was educated at Eton and Oxford, was for ten years on a cattle-ranch, and from 1889 promoted agricultural co-operation in Ireland, founding the very successful Irish Agricultural Organisation Society in 1894. In 1892-1900 he was M.P. for Dublin Co. (S.), and in 1899-1907 vice-president of the Irish Department of Agriculture.

Plutarch (Ploutarchos) was born about 46 A.D. at Chæroneia in Bœotia. His higher education was commenced at Athens in 66. He paid more than one visit to Rome—once as chargé d'affaires of his native town—and here gave public lectures in philosophy. He spent all his mature life at his native place until his death about 120. His extant writings comprise his historical works, and those which are grouped under the general head of Opera Moralia. To the former belong his Parallel Lives—the work by which he is best known. These contain a gallery of forty-six portraits of the great characters of the ages preceding his own. They were published in successive books, each pair forming one book, and a Greek and Roman, with some resemblance between their respective careers, being chosen for the subject of each. The sequels which come after most of the Lives, giving a detailed comparison of each warrior, statesman, legislator, or hero, are regarded as spurious by some critics. Plutarch's Biographies are monuments of great literary value for the precious materials which they contain, based as they are on lost records. The author adheres throughout to his professed purpose—portraiture of character; he either omits or briefly touches upon the most famous actions or events which distinguish the career of each subject of his biography, holding that these do not show a man's virtues or failings so well as some trifling incident, word, or jest. The other and less known half of his writings—the Morals—are a collection of short treatises, sixty or more (though certainly not all from Plutarch's hand), upon various subjects—Ethics, Politics, History, Health, Facetia, Love-stories, Philosophy, and Isis and Osiris. Some of the essays breathe quite a Christian spirit, although the writer probably never heard of Christianity. The nine books of his Symposiaca or Table-talk exhibit him as the most amiable and genial of boon companions; while his dialogue Gryllus reveals a remarkable sense of humour. Though not a profound thinker, Plutarch was a man of rare gifts, and occupies a unique place in literature as the encyclopædist of antiquity. The best editions of Plutarch's entire works are those of Reiske (1774-79) and Dübner-Dühner in Didot's Bibliotheca (1846-55). The best text of the Lives is that of Sintenis in the Teubner series (1874-81); of the Moralia, that in the Teubner series by G. N. Bernardakes (1888-95). Separate annotated editions of the Lives have been published by Held, Leopold, Siefert-Blass, Sintenis-Fuhr in Germany, and in England by Dr Holden with elaborate commentaries (Sulla, Demosthenes, Gracchi, Nicias, Timoleon, and Themistocles), and by E. G. Hardy (Galba and Otho). There are translations of the Lives by the brothers Langhorne and by Dryden and others (re-edited by Clough, 1874)—neither so scholar-like as the French of Jacques Amyot (1559), from which Sir Thomas North (q.v.) made his version (1579); also of the Roman Lives by

G. Long. See Oakesmith's Religion of Plutarch (1902), Dill's Roman Society (1905), Mahaffy's Silver Age of the Greek World (1911).

Pobiedonostseff, Constantin Petrovitch (1827-1907), son of a Moscow professor, became himself a professor of civil law there (1858), and as procurator of the Holy Synod (from 1880) was the most uncompromising champion of the autocracy and of the supremacy of the orthodox church.

Pocahontas (1595-1617), daughter of an Indian chief, Powhattan, twice saved the life of Captain John Smith (q.v.). Cajoled to Jamestown in 1612, she embraced Christianity, was baptised Rebecca, married an Englishman, John Rolfe (1585-1622), in 1613, and came to England with him in 1616. Having embarked for Virginia, she died off Gravesend in March 1617. She left one son, and several Virginia families claim descent from her (Wynndham Robertson's Pocahontas and her Descendants, 1887). Charles Deane, in his reprint of Smith's True Relation (1866), started doubts as to the rescue story, but Prof. Arber vindicates it in his reprint of Smith's works (1884).

Pocock, Edward (1604-91), orientalist, born at Oxford, was elected a fellow of Corpus in 1628. He sailed for Aleppo in 1630 as chaplain to the English factory, but in 1636 became Oxford professor of Arabic, and in 1643 rector of Childrey. He was appointed to the chair of Hebrew in 1648, but his inability to take the engagement of 1649 deprived him of the salary down to the Restoration. Pocock's learning was remarkable. His Specimen Historiæ Arabum (1649), Porta Mosis Maimonidis (1655), the Annals of Eutychius (1656) in Arabic and Latin, and an edition of Abulfaraj's History (1663) were followed by Commentaries on Micah (1677), Malachi (1677), Hosea (1685), and Joel (1691).

Pococke, Richard (1704-65), 'the Traveller,' born at Southampton, studied at Corpus, Oxford. Precentor successively of Lismore and Waterford, then Archdeacon of Dublin (1745), in 1756 he became Bishop of Ossory, and had just been translated to Meath when he died. His travels, which took up nearly nine years of his life, are described in two folios, dealing with his four years' wanderings in Syria, Egypt, and Mesopotamia (1743-45), in a volume on his tours in Scotland (Scot. Hist. Soc., 1887), in two on England (Camden Soc., 1888-89) and in one on Ireland (ed. 1891)—books that are as dull as they are valuable. Pococke was the pioneer of Alpine travel; in 1741 he led a dozen Englishmen to the Vale of Chamouni.

Podiebrad, George of, Bohemian king, born at Podiebrad, 6th April 1420, became an adherent of the moderate Hussites. When the Catholic barons (1438) carried the election of the Emperor Albert II. to the Bohemian crown, Podiebrad allied himself with the Utraquists in Tabor, who offered it to Casimir, king of Poland. After forcing Albert to raise the siege of Tabor and retire to Prague, Podiebrad became leader of the Utraquists, seized Prague (1448), and got himself made regent (1453-57) for the young king Ladislaus. On Ladislaus's death, Podiebrad was crowned his successor in 1458. He succeeded for a while in allaying the bitterness of religious zeal. In 1462 he decided to uphold the terms of the compactata of Prague (1433); this angered Pius II., but the emperor restrained him from excommunicating Podiebrad. The next pope, however, Paul II., excommunicated him in 1466.

Matthias Corvinus of Hungary took the field to enforce the ban; but Podiebrad forced him into a truce at Wilamow (1469). Nevertheless Matthias was crowned king by the Catholic barons. Podiebrad died 23d March 1471, having made arrangements for a Polish prince to succeed him. See German works by Jordan (1861) and Bachmann (1878), and a French one by Denis (1891).

Poe, EDGAR ALLAN, born at Boston, Mass., January 19, 1809, and orphaned in his third year, was adopted by John Allan, a wealthy and childless merchant. In 1815-20 the family were in England, and the boy went to school at Stoke Newington. The year 1826 was spent at the University of Virginia; but, offended by his dissipation and gambling debts, his patron removed him to the counting-room, whence he absconded to Boston. He published Tamerlane and other Poems (1827), enlisted that same year, and rose to be sergeant-major in 1829. Mr Allan procured his discharge and after a year's delay his admission to West Point Military Academy (July 1830), but the next March he was dismissed for deliberate neglect of duty. Now he was thrown on his own resources. A third edition of his Poems (1831) contained Israfel, his earliest poem of value, and To Helen. Of his life in Baltimore during the next two years few records remain. Nearly the first earnings of his pen was the $100 prize won in 1833 by A MS. found in a Bottle. From this time he lived with his aunt, Mrs Clemm, and wrote for the Saturday Visitor. His connection with the Southern Literary Messenger began with his tale Berenice in March 1835; a few months later he went to Richmond as its assistant-editor. In May 1836 he married his cousin Virginia. For more than a year he worked hard on the Messenger. But he was 'irregular, eccentric, and querulous.' He left Richmond in 1837, and after a year or less in New York, of which the chief fruit was The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym, in 1838 established himself in Philadelphia. Here he published Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque (1840), was connected with Burton's Gentleman's Magazine (1839), and for a year (1842-43) edited Graham's Magazine. Long periods of sobriety and patient though ill-required labour would be interspersed with fits of reckless indulgence and months of desperate poverty. A second prize of $100 was won in 1843 by his wonderful story The Gold Bug. In 1844 he removed to New York, and in The Evening Mirror (January 29, 1845) published The Raven, which won immediate fame. On January 30, 1847, his wife died in deepest poverty. Except for The Bells, The Domain of Arnheim, the wild 'prose poem' Eureka (1848), and a few minor pieces, the brief remainder of his life might to advantage be forgotten. He attempted suicide in November 1848, and had an attack of delirium tremens in June 1849. Recovering, he spent over two months in Richmond, lecturing there and at Norfolk. He became engaged to a lady of means, and in September went to wind up his affairs in the north. On 3d October he was found in a wretched condition in Baltimore, and died in the hospital, October 7, 1849. As to Poe's genius there is no room for question. Weird, wild, fantastic, dwelling by choice on the horrible, it yet was most genuine and picturesque. Of humour he had no particle, and some of his tales are poor stuff; the charm of his best poems is their exquisite melody. See Mrs Whitman's Poe and his Critics (1860), and Lives by J. H. Ingram (1874, 1880, 1891), R. H. Stoddard (1875), E. L. Didier (1876), Gill (1877), Stedman (1881), Woodberry (1885), and Harrison (1903); and the Works (ed. Stedman and Woodberry, 10 vols. 1895-96).

Poerio, CARLO (1803-67), Italian patriot, born in Naples, was repeatedly imprisoned as a liberal; in 1848 he was director of police, minister of Public Instruction, and deputy for Naples to parliament. In July 1849 he was arrested, and sentenced to twenty-four years in irons. Diplomatic protests and denunciations of tyranny moved Ferdinand II. in 1858 to ship him with sixty-five more prisoners to America. They persuaded the captain to land them at Cork, and Poerio returned to Turin, where he became a member of parliament, and in 1861 its vice-president.—His brother, ALESSANDRO (1802-48), who had settled in Florence and devoted himself to poetry, fell in battle for the liberation of Venice. See Life by Imbriani (1884). [Po-ay'-ree-o.]

Poelenburg, CORNELIS VAN (1586-1667), a painter, by Beckford ranked far above Rubens, was born and died at Utrecht, and painted in Florence and London.

Poggendorf, JOHANN CHRISTIAN (1796-1877), German physicist, was professor of Physics at Berlin from 1834. His chief discoveries were in connection with electricity and galvanism, and he invented a multiplying galvanometer.

Poggio Bracciolini, GIAN FRANCESCO (1380-1459), Florentine humanist, gained notice for his skill in copying MSS., and in 1402 became a secretary to the Roman curia. At the Council of Constance (1414-18) he explored the Swiss and Swabian convents for MSS. He recovered MSS. of Quintilian, Ammianus Marcellinus, Lucretius, Silius Italicus, Vitruvius, and other Roman authors. About 1452 he retired to Florence, and became historiographer to the republic. His writings include Letters (best ed. 1832-61), moral essays, a rhetorical Latin History of Florence, a series of invectives against contemporaries, and a poor translation into Latin of Xenophon's Cyropaedia. But his most famous book is the Liber Facietiarum, a collection of humorous stories and jests, mainly at the expense of monks and secular clergy. A good edition (Fr. trans. and text) is that of Lisièvre (1878). See Life by Shepherd (1802) and Symonds's Renaissance. [Podj'fo.]

Poinsot, LOUIS (1777-1859), mathematician, from 1813 an Academician, was born in Paris.

Poisson, SIMÉON-DENIS (1781-1842), French geometer, became in 1802 professor in the Polytechnique, in 1809 professor in the Faculty of Sciences, in 1812 member of the Institute, and in 1837 a peer of France. He wrote Traité de Mécanique (1833), &c. [Pwas'son.]

Pole, DE LA, a family descended from a Hull merchant, whose son Michael (c. 1330-89) in 1383 became chancellor, in 1385 was made Earl of Suffolk, and died an exile in France. His grandson, William (1396-1450), was in 1449 raised to be Duke of Suffolk, having since 1445 been practically prime-minister. His administration was disastrous; and he was on his way to a five years' banishment in Flanders when he was intercepted off Dover and beheaded. John de la Pole, second Duke (1442-91), married Elizabeth, sister to Edward IV. and Richard III.; and from this marriage sprang John, Earl of Lincoln (c. 1464-87), Edmund, Earl of Suffolk (c. 1472-1513, executed by Henry VIII.), two churchmen, four daughters, and Richard, on whose death at the battle of Favia (1525) the line became extinct.

Pole, ROINALD, 'Cardinal of England,' born at

Stourton Castle near Stourbridge in March 1500, was the son of Sir Richard Pole and Margaret, Countess of Salisbury (1473-1541), daughter of the Duke of Clarence and niece of Edward IV. At nineteen he went to Italy to finish his studies. He returned in 1527, and was then high in Henry VIII.'s favour. When the question of the divorce was raised, Pole seemed at first disposed to take the king's side; but afterwards he became disgusted with Cromwell, refused the archbishopric of York, and, going to Italy in 1532, formed intimate friendships with many eminent men eager for an internal reformation of the church. In 1535 he entered into a political correspondence with Charles V., and was now compelled by Henry to declare himself, which he did in a violent letter to the king, afterwards expanded into the treatise De Unitate Ecclesiastica. The king withdrew Pole's pension and preferments. Paul III. made him a cardinal (1536), and sent him as legate to the Low Countries to confer with the English malcontents. Henry retaliated by setting a price on his head and beheading his mother and other relatives. Pole's several attempts to procure the invasion of England were not successful. In 1541-42 he was governor of the 'Patrimony of St Peter;' and at the Council of Trent (1545) he was one of the presidents. In 1549 he was on the point of being elected pope; after the election of Julius III. he lived in retirement until the death of Edward VI., when he was commissioned to Queen Mary as legate a latere. Pole was still only in deacon's orders, and cherished the idea of marrying the queen; but Charles V. carried the match with his son, Philip of Spain. Pole arrived in London in November 1554, with powers to allow the owners of confiscated church property to retain their possessions. He absolved parliament and country from their schism, and reconciled the Church of England to Rome. As long as Cranmer lived Pole would not accept the archbishopric of Canterbury, but Pole was ordained priest March 1556, and consecrated archbishop after Cranmer was burnt. Pope Paul IV., indignant at the concessions made by authority of his predecessor to the holders of church property, revived the accusations of heresy formerly brought against Pole. Paul IV. was, moreover, now at war with Spain, and could not tolerate Pole as his ambassador at the court of Mary. So his legation was cancelled, and he was summoned before the Inquisition. Mary angrily protested, and the pope relented, but would not reinstate Pole. When the queen died, 17th November 1558, Pole was dangerously ill; he died on the same day. It has been disputed how far he was responsible for Mary's persecution of Protestants; certainly when Pole became the queen's supreme adviser the persecution increased in violence. See his letters, with Life (1744), and other Lives by Beccatelli (trans. 1690 and 1766), Philipps (1764-67), Hook (Archbishops of Canterbury), Zimmermann (1893), Haile (1910).

Pole, WILLIAM, Mus. Doc., F.R.S. (1814-1900), born at Birmingham, engineer for the imperial railways in Japan in 1871-83, was a high authority on music and whist.

Polemburg. See POELENBURG.

Polidori, JOHN WILLIAM (1795-1821), born in London, took his M.D. at Edinburgh, and in 1816 was travelling physician to Byron, to whom he falsely ascribed his story of The Vampire (1819). Through gaming losses he poisoned himself.

Polignac, an ancient French family to which belonged Cardinal Melchior de Polignac (1661-1742), plenipotentiary of Louis XIV. at Utrecht (1712) and French minister at Rome. A Duchesse de Polignac (born 1749; died at Vienna, 9th December 1793), and her husband (died at St Petersburg, 1817), grand-nephew of the cardinal, were among the worst, but unhappily most favoured, advisers of Marie Antoinette, and were largely responsible for the shameful extravagance of the court.—Their son, AUGUSTE JULES ARMAND MARIE, PRINCE DE POLIGNAC, was born at Versailles, 14th May 1780. On the Restoration he returned to France; became intimate with the Comte d'Artois, afterwards Charles X.; from his devotion to Rome was in 1820 made a prince by the pope; was appointed ambassador at the English court in 1823; and in 1829 became head of the last Bourbon ministry, which promulgated the fatal ordonnances that cost Charles X. his throne. He was condemned to imprisonment for life in the castle of Ham, but was set at liberty by the amnesty of 1836. He took up his residence in England, but died in Paris, 2d March 1847.—His son, PRINCE ARMAND (1817-90), was a leading monarchist.

Politian. ANOELO AMBROGINI, born at Montepulciano in Tuscany, 14th July 1454, and called Politianus from the Latin name of his birthplace, at ten was sent to Florence, and made incredible progress in the ancient languages. By his sixteenth year he wrote brilliant Latin and Greek epigrams; at seventeen he began the translation of the Iliad into Latin hexameters; and, having secured the friendship of the all-powerful Lorenzo de' Medici (whose sons he taught), he was soon recognised as the prince of Italian scholars. At thirty he became professor of Greek and Latin at Florence. Lorenzo's death in 1492 was a serious blow, and he mourned his death in a remarkable Latin elegy. He himself died in Florence, 24th Sept. 1494, during the temporary supremacy of Savonarola, whose religious zeal was directed against every principle of that pagan revival which it had been the life-work of Lorenzo and Politian to forward. Politian was vicious in life, but was a scholar of the first rank and a poet of high merit. Among his works were Latin translations of a long series of Greek authors, and an excellent edition of the Pandects of Justinian. His original works in Latin fill a thick quarto, half of which is made up of letters; the rest with miscellanies in prose and verse. His Orfeo was the first secular drama in Italian. See J. A. Symonds's Renaissance in Italy.

Polk, JAMES KNOX, eleventh president of the United States, was born in Mecklenburg county, N.C., November 2, 1795. He was admitted to the bar in 1820, and in 1823 was elected a member of the legislature of Tennessee, and in 1825 returned to congress as a Democrat. For five years he was Speaker of the House of Representatives. He was in 1839 elected governor of Tennessee, and in 1844 was elected president over Henry Clay, mainly because of his 'firm' attitude with regard to the annexation of Texas. In December 1845 Texas was admitted to the Union, and jurisdiction was extended to the disputed territory. The president next forced on hostilities by advancing the American army to the Rio Grande; the capital was taken in September; and by the terms of peace the United States acquired California and New Mexico. The Oregon boundary was settled by a compromise with England. Polk condemned the anti-slavery agitation. He died at Nashville, June 15, 1849. Polk was devoted to the Democratic principles of Jefferson and Jackson—state rights, a revenue tariff, independent treasury, and strict construction of the constitution. See Life by Jenkins (1850) and Chase's History of his administration (1850).

Polk, LEONIDAS, was born at Raleigh, N. C., 10th April 1806. Graduating at West Point in 1827, he held a commission in the artillery, but in 1831 received priest's orders in the Episcopal Church. In 1838 he was consecrated a missionary bishop of Arkansas, and from 1841 till his death was Bishop of Louisiana, even when at the head of an army corps. In the civil war he was made major-general by Jefferson Davis, and fortified points on the Mississippi. At Belmont, in Nov. 1861, he was driven from his camp by Grant, but finally forced him to retire. At Shiloh and Corinth he commanded the first corps; promoted lieutenant-general, he conducted the retreat from Kentucky. After Chickamauga, where he commanded the right wing, he was relieved of his command; reappointed (Dec. 1863), he opposed Sherman's march. He was killed reconnoitring on Pine Mountain, 14th June 1864. See W. N. Polk's Leonidas Polk, Bishop and General (1894).

Pollaiuolo, ANTONIO (1429-98), Florentine goldsmith, medallist, metal-caster, and painter, cast sepulchral monuments in St Peter's at Rome for Popes Sixtus IV. and Innocent VIII. His pictures are distinguished for life and vigour.—His brother, PIETRO (1443-96), was associated with him in his work. [Pol-la-yoo-aw'lo.]

Pollio, CAIUS ASINIUS (76 B.C.—4 A.D.), Roman orator, poet, and soldier, sided with Cæsar in the civil war, commanded in Spain, and, appointed by Antony to settle the veterans on the lands assigned them, saved Virgil's property from confiscation. He founded the first public library at Rome, and was the patron of Virgil and Horace. His orations, tragedies, and history have perished.

Pollock, an illustrious family descended from David Pollock, saddler to George III.—His eldest son was SIR DAVID POLLOCK (1780-1847), Chief-justice of Bombay.—The second, SIR JONATHAN FREDERICK (1783-1870), passed from St Paul's to Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated in 1806 as senior wrangler. Next year he was elected a fellow and called to the bar. In 1827 he became K. C. ; in 1831 was returned as a Tory for Huntingdon; and was successively Attorney-general and Chief Baron of the Exchequer. He was knighted in 1834, and in 1866 made a baronet.—His eldest son, SIR WILLIAM FREDERICK POLLOCK, born 3d April 1815, was educated at St Paul's and Trinity, and in 1838 was called to the bar. He was appointed a master of the Court of Exchequer (1846) and Queen's Remembrancer (1874); in 1876 became senior master of the Supreme Court of Judicature; in 1886 resigned his offices; and died 24th December 1888. Besides magazine articles, he published a blank verse translation of Dante (1854) and two volumes of Personal Remembrances (1887).—His eldest son, SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, third baronet, born 10th December 1845, was educated at Eton and Trinity, and in 1868 obtained a fellowship. He was called to the bar in 1871, and became professor of Jurisprudence at University College, London (1882), Corpus professor of Jurisprudence at Oxford (1883), and professor of Common Law in the Inns of Court (1884-90). Besides his Spinoza (1880), he has published Principles of Contract (1875; 6th ed. 1895), Digest of the Law of Partnership (1877; 6th ed. 1895), Law of Torts (1887; 5th ed. 1897), Oxford Lectures (1891), History of English Law before Edward I. (with Dr F. W. Maitland, 1895), The Etchingham Letters (with Mrs Fuller-Maitland, 1899), &c.—His brother, WALTER HERRIES POLLLOCK, born 21st Feb. 1850, and educated at Eton and Trinity, was called to the bar in 1874, and 1884-94 was editor of the Saturday Review. He is author of Lectures on French Poets, Verses of Two Tongues, A Nine Men's Morrice, King Zub, &c.—SIR CHARLES EDWARD POLLOCK (1823-97), fourth son of the first baronet, was a baron of Exchequer, and from 1875 justice of the High Court.—SIR GEORGE POLLLOCK, field-marshal, third son of the saddler, born 4th June 1786, entered the East India Company's army in 1803. He was engaged at the siege of Bhartpur (1805) and in other operations against Holkar, saw service in the Nepal (Goorkha) campaigns of 1814-16, and in the first Burmese war (1824-26) won his colonelcy. In 1838 he became major-general. After the massacre of General Elphinstone in Afghanistan the Indian government sent him to the relief of Sir Robert Sale in Jelalabad. In April 1842 he forced the Khyber Pass and reached Sir Robert Sale, pushed on to Kabul, defeated Akbar Khan, and recovered 135 British prisoners. Then, joined by Nott, he conducted the united armies back to India, and was rewarded with a G. C. B. and a political appointment at Lucknow. He returned to England in 1846, was director of the East India Company 1854-56, was created a field-marshal in 1870 and a baronet in 1872, and in 1871 was appointed Constable of the Tower. He died 6th Oct. 1872. See Life by Low (1873).

Pollok, ROBERT, born at Muirhouse, Eaglesham, Renfrewshire, 19th Oct. 1798, studied at Glasgow for the Secession Church, and in 1824-25 wrote feeble Tales of the Covenanters, in 1827 The Course of Time, a poetical description of the spiritual life of man. Meantime, seized with consumption, he set out for Italy, but died near Southampton, 17th Sept. 1827. See Memoir (1843).

Polo, MARCO, was born of a noble family at Venice, in 1254, while his father and uncle had gone on a mercantile expedition by Constantinople and the Crimea to Bokhara and to Cathay (China), where they were well received by the great Kublai Khan. The Mongol prince commissioned them as envoys to the pope, requesting him to send 100 Europeans learned in the sciences and arts—a commission they tried in vain to carry out in Italy (1269). The Polos started again in 1271, taking with them young Marco, and arrived at the court of Kublai Khan in 1275, after travelling by Mosul, Bagdad, Khorassan, the Pamir, Kashgar, Yarkand, and Khotan, Lob Nor, and across the desert of Gobi, to Tangut and Shangtu. The khan took special notice of Marco, and ere long sent him as envoy to Yunnan, northern Burma, Karakorum, Cochín-China, and Southern India. For three years he served as governor of Yang Chow, and helped to reduce the city of Saianfu. The khan long refused to think of the Polos leaving his court; but at length, in the train of a Mongol princess, they sailed by Sumatra and Southern India to Persia, finally reaching Venice in 1295. They brought with them great wealth in precious stones. In 1298 Marco fought his own galley at Curzola, where the Venetians were defeated by the Genoese, and he was a prisoner for a year at Genoa. Here he dictated to another captive, one Rusticiano of Pisa, an account of his travels. After his liberation he returned to Venice, where he died in 1324. Marco Polo's book consists of: (1) a Prologue, the only part containing personal narrative; and (2) a long series of chapters descriptive of notable sights, manners of different states of Asia, especially that of Kublai Khan, ending with a dull chronicle of the internecine wars of the house of Genghis during the second half of the 13th century. Nothing disturbs the even tenor of his narrative. His invaluable work reveals a plentiful lack of humour, and contains not a few too marvellous tales (such as those of the Land of Darkness, the Great Roc, &c.). Ransius (1485-1557) assumed that it was written in Latin, Marsden supposed in the Venetian dialect, Baldelli-Boni showed (1827) that it was French. There exists an old French text, published in 1824, which Yule believed the nearest approach to Marco's own oral narrative. The notes of Marsden's edition (1818) were abridged by T. Wright for Bohn's Library (1854); but it and Hugh Murray's (1844) were eclipsed by Sir Henry Yule's edition (1871; new ed. 1903), containing a faithful English translation from an eclectic text, an exhaustive introduction, and notes. See too Noah Brooks, The Story of Marco Polo (1899).

Polybius (c. 205-123 B.C.), Greek historian, born at Megalopolis in Arcadia, was one of the 1000 noble Achæans who, after the conquest of Macedonia in 168, were sent to Rome and detained in honourable captivity. Polybius was the guest of Æmilius Paulus himself, and became the close friend of his son, Scipio Æmilianus, who helped him to collect materials for his great historical work. In 151 the exiles were permitted to return to Greece; Polybius, however, soon rejoined Scipio, followed him in his African campaign, and was present at the destruction of Carthage in 146. The war between the Achæans and Romans called him back to Greece, and, after the taking of Corinth, he used all his influence to procure favourable terms for the vanquished. In furtherance of his historical labours he undertook journeys to Asia Minor, Egypt, Upper Italy, southern France, and even Spain. His history, the design of which was to show how and why it was that all the civilised countries of the world fell under the dominion of Rome, covers the period 220-146 B.C. The greater part has perished; of forty books only the first five are preserved complete, but the plan of the whole is fully known. The merits of Polybius are the care with which he collected his materials, his love of truth, his breadth of view, and his sound judgment; but his tone is didactic and dull. Good editions are by Schweighäuser (1789-95; new ed. Oxf. 1831), Bekker (1844), Dindorf (1862-68; new ed. 1882), and Hultsch (1867-72; 2d ed. 1888). There is an English translation by Shuckburgh (1889). See Mahaffy, The Greek World under Roman Sway (1890).

Polycarp, one of the 'Apostolic Fathers,' was bishop at Smyrna during the earlier half of the 2d century. He bridges the little-known period between the age of his master the Apostle John and that of his own disciple Irenæus. He was born about 69 A.D., and probably of Christian parents. Ephesus had become the new home of the faith, and there Polycarp was 'taught by apostles,' John above all, and 'lived in familiar intercourse with many that had seen Christ.' He was intimate with Papias and Ignatius. At the close of his life Polycarp visited Rome to discuss the vexed question of the time for commemorating the Passion; and he returned to Smyrna, only to win the martyr's crown in a persecution which broke out during a great festival. The fire, it was said, arched itself about the martyr, and he had to be despatched with a dagger. The graphic Letter of the Smyrneans tells the story of the martyrdom, which may be dated 23d February 155 A.D. The only writing of Polycarp extant is the Epistle to the Philippians, incomplete in the original Greek, but complete in a Latin translation. Somewhat commonplace in itself, it is of great value for questions of the canon, the origin of the church, and the Ignatian epistles. See Gebhardt's Patrum Apostol. Opera (1876) and Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers, part ii. (2d ed. 1889).

Polycletus, a Greek sculptor from Samos, contemporary with Phidias. See Gardner's Six Greek Sculptors (1910).

Polycrates, 'tyrant' of Samos from about 536 B.C. to 522, conquered several islands and towns on the Asiatic mainland, and made alliance with Amasis, king of Egypt. According to Herodotus, Amasis, thinking him too fortunate, wrote advising him to throw away his most valuable possession, and so avert the spleen of the gods. Polycrates cast a precious signet-ring into the sea, but next day a fisherman brought him a fish with the ring in its belly. It was quite clear to Amasis now that Polycrates was a doomed man, and he broke off the alliance. Polycrates yet successfully defied an attack from Spartans, Corinthians, and disaffected Samians, but was enticed to Magnesia by a Persian satrap, seized, and crucified. [Pol-ik'ra-teez.]

Polydore Vergil. See VERGIL.

Polygnotus, a Greek painter of the 5th century B.C., born in the isle of Thasos, was the first to give life and character to painting. His principal works were at Athens, Delphi, and Plataea.

Pombal, SEBASTIAN JOSEPH DE CARVALHO E MELLO, MARQUIS OF, Portuguese statesman, born 13th May 1699 near Coimbra. In 1739 he was sent as ambassador to London and to Vienna. Appointed secretary for foreign affairs (1750), he reattached many crown domains unjustly alienated; at the great Lisbon earthquake (1755) he showed great calmness and resource, and next year he was made prime-minister. He sought to subvert the tyranny of the church, opposed the intrigues of nobles and Jesuits, and in 1759 banished the Jesuits. He established elementary schools, reorganised the army, introduced fresh colonists into the Portuguese settlements, and established East India and Brazil Companies. The tyranny of the Inquisition was broken. Agriculture, commerce, and the finances were improved. In 1758 he was made Count of Oeyras, in 1770 Marquis of Pombal. On the accession of Maria I. (1777), who was under clerical influence, the 'Great Marquis' lost his offices. He died 8th May 1782. See books by G. Moore (1819), John Smith (1843), and Carnota (trans. 1871).

Pompadoeur, JEANNE ANTOINETTE POISSON, MARQUISE DE, mistress of Louis XV., was born in Paris, 29th December 1721, and was supposed to be the child of Le Normant de Tournehem, a wealthy fermier-général. She grew up a woman of remarkable grace, beauty, and wit; but her mother habituated her to see in the rôle of king's favourite the ideal of feminine ambition. In 1741 she was married to Le Normant's nephew, Le Normant d'Étiolles, became a queen of fashion, and at length in 1745 attracted the eye of the king at a ball, was installed at Versailles, and ennobled as Marquise de Pompadoeur. Her husband and brother were paid with offices and titles. Ere long she assumed the entire control of public affairs, for twenty years swayed the whole policy of the state, and lavished its treasures on her own ambitions. She reversed the traditional policy of France because Frederick the Great laimponed her, filled all public offices with her nominees, and made her own creatures ministers of France. Her policy was disastrous, her wars unfortunate—the ministry of Choiseul was the only fairly creditable portion of the reign. She was a lavish patroness of the arts, and heaped her bounty upon poets and painters. She held her difficult position to the end, and retained the king's favour by relieving him of all business, by diverting him with private theatricals, and at last by countenancing his infamous debaucheries. She died 15th April 1764. The Mémoires (1766) ascribed to her are not genuine. See studies by Capefigue (1858), Campardon (1867), and Goncourt (new ed. 1887); Beaujoint's Secret Mémoires of La Marquise de Pompadour (1885); but especially her Correspondance, edited by Malassis (1878) and Bonhomme (1880).

Pompey. CNEIUS POMPEIUS MAGNUS was born in 106 B.C., and at seventeen fought in the Social War against Marius and Cinna. He supported Sulla, and destroyed the remains of the Marian faction in Africa and Sicily. He next drove the followers of Lepidus out of Italy, extinguished the Marian party in Spain under Sertorius (76-71), and annihilated the remnants of the army of Spartacus. He was now the idol of the people, and was elected consul for the year 70. Hitherto Pompey had belonged to the aristocratic party, but latterly he had been looked upon with suspicion, and he now espoused the people's cause and carried a law restoring the tribunician power to the people. He cleared the Mediterranean of pirates; conquered Mithridates of Pontus, Tigranes of Armenia, and Antiochus of Syria, subdued the Jews and captured Jerusalem, and entered Rome in triumph for the third time in 61. But now his star began to wane. Henceforward he was distrusted by the aristocracy, and second to Cæsar in popular favour. When the senate declined to accede to his wish that his acts in Asia should be ratified he formed a close intimacy with Cæsar, and the pair, with the plutocrat Crassus, formed the all-powerful 'First Triumvirate.' Pompey's acts in Asia were ratified, and his promises to his troops fulfilled; Cæsar's designs were gained; and Cæsar's daughter, Julia, was given in marriage to Pompey. Next year Cæsar repaired to Gaul, and for nine years carried on a career of conquest, while Pompey was wasting his time at Rome. Jealousies arose betwixt the two, and Julia died in 54. Pompey now returned to the aristocratic party. Cæsar was ordered to lay down his office, which he consented to do if Pompey would do the same. The senate insisted on unconditional resignation, otherwise he would be declared a public enemy. But crossing the Rubicon, Cæsar defied the senate and its armies. The story of the war is recorded at CÆSAR. After his final defeat at Pharsalia in 48, Pompey had fled to Egypt, when he was murdered. His younger son, Sextus, secured a fleet, manned largely by slaves and exiles, and, occupying Sicily, ravaged the coasts of Italy. But in 36 he was defeated at sea by Agrippa, and in 37 slain at Mitylene.

Ponce de Leon, FRAY LUIS (1527-91), Spanish poet, born at Granada, in 1544 entered the Augustinian order, and became professor of Theology at Salamanca in 1561. In 1572-76 he was imprisoned by the Inquisition for his translation and interpretation of the Song of Solomon; but shortly before his death he became general of his order. His poetical remains, published in 1631, comprise translations from Virgil, Horace, and the Psalms; his few original poems are lyrical masterpieces. See German monographs by Wilkens (1866) and Reusch (1878); also a Spanish Life by Tejede (1863). [Pon'thay de Le-on.]

Ponce de Leon, JUAN, born at San Servas in Spain in 1460, was a court page, served against the Moors, and became governor, first of part of Hispaniola, then (1510-12) of Porto Rico. On a quest for the fountain of perpetual youth, he in March 1512 discovered Florida, and was made governor, but failed to conquer his new subjects, retired to Cuba, and died in July 1521 from the wound of a poisoned arrow.

Poncelet, JEAN VICTOR (1788-1867), engineer-officer and geometer, was born at Metz, and died in Paris. See Life by Didion (1869).

Pond, JOHN (1767-1836), became astronomer-royal in 1811. He made numerous improvements in methods and instruments, translated Laplace, and published many valuable papers.

Poniatowski, a princely family of Poland. STANISLAS (1677-1762) joined Charles XII. of Sweden in supporting Stanislas Leszczynski.—His son, STANISLAS AUGUSTUS (1732-98), last king of Poland, was elected king in 1764, though not fitted to rule the country at such a crisis. Frederick the Great, who had gained the consent of Austria to a partition of Poland, made a like proposal to Russia, and the first partition was effected in 1772. The diet tried, too late, to introduce reforms. The intrigues of discontented nobles led again to Russian and Prussian intervention, and a second fruitless resistance was followed in 1793 by a second partition. The Poles now became desperate; a general rising took place (1794), the Prussians were driven out, and the Russians were several times routed. But Austria now appeared on the scene, Kosciusko was defeated, Warsaw was taken, and the Polish monarchy was at an end. King Stanislas resigned his crown, and died at St. Petersburg.—His brother, JOSEPH ANTONY (1762-1813), was trained in the Austrian army. In 1789 the Polish Assembly appointed him commander of the army of the south, with which he gained brilliant victories over the Russians (1792); and he commanded under Kosciusko (1794). When the duchy of Warsaw was constituted (1807), he was appointed minister of war and commander-in-chief. In 1809, during the war between Austria and France, he invaded Galicia. Three years later he joined, with a large body of Poles, Napoleon in his invasion of Russia, and distinguished himself at Smolensk, at Borodino, and at Leipzig, where, in covering the French retreat, he was drowned in the Elster. See German Life by Boguslawski (1831).

Ponsonby, SARAH. See BUTLER, ELEANOR.

Pont, TIMOTHY (c. 1560-1630), the son of Robert Pont (1524-1606), a celebrated Edinburgh minister, graduated at St. Andrews in 1584, became minister of Dunnet (1601), and in 1609 subscribed for 2000 acres of forfeited lands in Ulster. He first projected a Scotch atlas, and personally surveyed all the counties and isles of the kingdom. His collections were rescued from destruction by Sir John Scot of Scotstarvet, and his maps appeared in Blaeu's Theatrum Orbis Terrarum (1654). See Dobie's Cunninghame Topographised by Pont (1876).

Pontiac, chief of the Ottawa Indians, in 1763 organised a conspiracy against the English garrisons, and for five months besieged Detroit. He was murdered by an Indian in 1769. See work by Parkman (1851).

Pontoppidan, Erik (1698-1764), born at Aarhus, became professor of Theology at Copenhagen in 1738 and Bishop of Bergen in 1747. His writings include Annales Ecclesie Danicæ Diplomaticæ (1741-52), a Danish topography, a Norwegian glossary, and Norges Naturlige Historie (1752-54; Eng. trans. 1755), describing the Kraken (sea-serpent) and other marvels.

Poole, John (c. 1786-1872), playwright, wrote Paul Pry (1825) and several other farces and comedies, such as Turning the Tables, Deaf as a Post, &c. He wrote also The Comic Sketch Book (1835), Little Pellington (1839), Comic Miscellany (1845), &c.

Poole or Pole, Matthew (1624-79), born at York, was rector of St Michael le Querne in London from 1648 till the passing of the Act of Uniformity (1662). In 1678 he retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam. His principal work was Synopsis Criticorum Bibliothecum (1669-76).

Poole, Paul Falconer (1807-79), a self-taught historical painter, born at Bristol, was elected an A.R.A. in 1846, an R.A. in 1861.

Poole, Reginald Stuart (1832-95), Egyptologist and numismatist, keeper of coins at the British Museum from 1870, was born and died in London. He was a nephew of E. W. Lane (q.v.).

Poole, William Frederick (1821-94), born at Salem, Mass., graduated at Yale in 1849. There in 1848 he published an Index of Periodical Literature (2d ed. 1853; 3d 1882). Two supplements by him and W. J. Fletcher appeared in 1888-93. In 1856-69 he was librarian of the Boston Athenæum, and from 1888 of the Newberry Library at Chicago.

Pope, Alexander, was born in London, 21st May 1688, of good middle-class parentage, his father, a linen-draper, having become a Roman Catholic. In the opinion of a kinsman, 'it was the perpetual application he fell into in his twelfth year that changed his form and ruined his constitution.' His education was unmethodical and imperfect to the last degree. At twelve he wrote his Ode on Solitude, a not unpromising performance, and at fourteen he composed the astonishingly mature poem on Silence. Now too he produced the Translation of the First Book of the Thebais of Statius, in which the English heroic couplet is already beginning to take Pope's new mould. His Pastorals (1709) were highly commended by all the leading critics of the day. Wycherley introduced the young poet to London life, where he soon established a friendship with Addison, Steele, Swift, and Arbuthnot. His Essay on Criticism (1711) placed him in the front rank of men of letters of his time. Windsor Forest (1713) was succeeded by the poem on which Pope's claim to the gift of poetic imagination and delicate fancy may be most securely rested, the Rape of the Lock (1714). Fortune, as well as fame, was secured by the translation of the Iliad (1719-20). Most imperfectly representative of its great original, it yet is remarkable for force, elegance, and animation. Pope was now the foremost of the literary lions. Political differences, aggravated by jealousy, had alienated him from Addison; his almost lifelong quarrel with John Dennis had begun. In 1718 he purchased the famous villa and grounds at Twickenham, which he occupied till his death. A translation of the Odyssey, less successful because largely 'farmed out' to inferior hands, was published in 1725-26; and in 1727-32 a collection of Miscellanies, from the joint-authorship of Pope and Swift. The furious and scurrilous retorts wrung from the persons ridiculed in the third volume elicited the first three books of the Dunciad (1728). It was in existence as early as 1725, but was withheld until its author had deliberately stung his enemies into a blind and headlong charge. In this immortal lampoon Pope has rescued the names of a host of insignificant enemies from oblivion. The Essay on Man (1733), the Moral Essays, and The Imitations of Horace conclude the catalogue of Pope's poetic works. The first, a didactic poem intended to commend Bolingbroke's not very profound philosophy, is a masterpiece of weight and wit. The Moral Essays and the Imitations exhibit the same qualities exercised upon a series of selected subjects, mostly of a lighter order; and, as in the Essay on Man, it is almost impossible to open a page without coming on a line or a couplet that is a household word. Pope died 30th May 1744, and was buried at Twickenham. His vanity was insatiable, and his vindictiveness came near to be so. He showed an extraordinary preference for the crooked to the straight path, and much of his time was occupied in laying elaborate plots for the deception of posterity and his contemporary public; but he was undoubtedly capable of warm attachment, and his disposition when appealed to by the sight of want or suffering was genuinely benevolent. The first edition of Pope (1751), by his friend Bishop Warburton, was an answer to Bolingbroke's attack on Pope's memory. Warburton's (1797) was virtually a reply to Warburton's; and Bowles and Roscoe each published an edition of his works; but all other editions have been superseded by that of Elwin and Courthope, with Life by Courthope in last volume (10 vols. 1871-89).

Pope, John, born in Louisville, Ky., 16th March 1822, graduated at West Point in 1842, and served with the engineers in Florida (1842-44) and in the Mexican war. He was exploring and surveying in the west till the civil war, when as brigadier-general in 1861 he drove the guerrillas out of Missouri; as major-general commanded the Army of the Mississippi (1862) and then that of Virginia; but was defeated at the second battle of Bull Run, 29th-30th August. He was transferred to Minnesota, where he kept the Indians in check, and held commands until 1886, when he retired. He died in 1892.

Popham, Sir John (c. 1531-1607), born at Huntworth near Bridgwater, became Speaker in 1580 and Lord Chief-justice in 1592.

Portage, John. See BOEHME.

Pordenone, IL (1483-1539), the name given to the religious painter, Giovanni Antonio Licinio, who was born at Corticelli near Pordenone, in 1535 settled at Venice, and in 1538 was summoned by the duke of Ferrara. [Por-day-no' nay.]

Porphyry (c. 233-304 A.D.), Neoplatonist, born at Tyre or Batanea, is said, improbably, to have been originally a Christian. He studied at Athens under Longinus, and about 263 at Rome under Plotinus. In Sicily he wrote his once celebrated treatise against the Christians, now lost. He then returned to Rome, and taught there. He was a voluminous writer, and a capable, earnest, high-minded man. His philosophy keeps close to life and practical duties, its object the salvation of the soul, to be effected by the extinction of impure desires through strict asceticism and knowledge of God. His chief writings are the Lives of Plotinus and Pythagoras, Sententiæ, De Abstinentiâ, and the Epistola ad Marcellam, addressed to his wife. See monograph by Bouillet (1864) and Alice Zimmern's translation of Porphyry to his Wife Marcella (1896).

Por'pora, NICCOLA (1686-1766), Neapolitan composer, established a school for singing, from which came famous singers. During 1725-55 he was in Dresden, Venice, London (1734-36), and Vienna, composing operas and teaching—Haydn at Vienna. He figures in George Sand's Consuelo.

Porson, RICHARD, was born on Christmas Day 1759 at East Ruston in Norfolk, son of the parish clerk. A neighbouring squire sent him to Eton. In 1778 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, was elected a scholar, won the Craven Scholarship and the first chancellor's medal, and in 1782 was elected a fellow. He now began to contribute to reviews; his Notæ breves ad Toupitii Emendationes in Suidam (1790) carried his name beyond England. In 1787 appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine his three sarcastic letters on Hawkins's Life of Johnson; and during 1788-89 his far more famous letters on the Spurious Verse 1 John, v. 7, which brought him no little odium. In 1792 his fellowship ceased to be tenable by a layman, and friends raised for him a fund of £100 a-year; he was also appointed to the regius professorship of Greek at Cambridge, an office worth £40 a-year. In 1795 he edited Æschylus, and in 1797-1801 four plays of Euripides. He married in 1796, but his wife died five months later. In 1806 he was appointed librarian of the London Institution, but neglected his duties. He was struck down with apoplexy, 19th September 1808, and died six days later. Porson possessed a stupendous memory, unwearied industry, great acuteness, fearless honesty, and masculine sense, but was hindered all his life by poverty, ill-health, dilatoriness, and fits of intemperance. He achieved little, besides the works already named, but a few bon-mots, some brilliant emendations, and the posthumous Adversaria (1812), notes on Aristophanes (1820), the lexicon of Photius (1822), Pausanias (1820), and Suidas (1834). His Tracts and Criticisms were collected by Kidd (1815). See Selby Watson's Life of him (1861), and his Correspondence edited by Luard (1867).

Porta, GIAMBATTISTA DELLA (1543-1615), Neapolitan physicist, wrote on physiognomy, natural magic, gardening, &c., besides several comedies. See also BARTOLOMEO.

Porta, GUGLIELMO DELLA (c. 1500-79), and GIACOMO (c. 1520-1604), brothers, Roman architects.

Portalis, JEAN ÉTIENNE MARIE (1745-1807), practised law in Paris, was imprisoned during the Revolution, but under Napoleon compiled the Code Civil. See Life by Lavollee (1869).

Porteous, JOHN, the ne'er-do-well son of an Edinburgh tailor, enlisted and served in Holland, and soon after 1715 became captain of the Edinburgh town guard. On 14th April 1736 he was in charge at the execution of one Wilson, a smuggler who had robbed the Pittenweem custom-house. There was some stone-throwing; whereupon Porteous made his men fire on the mob, wounding twenty persons and killing five or six. For this he was tried and condemned to death (20th July), but respited by Queen Caroline. But on the night of 7th September an orderly mob burst open the Tolbooth, dragged Porteous to the Grass-market, and hanged him from a dyer's pole. See Criminal Trials illustrating the 'Heart of Midlothian' (1818), and Scott's own notes to the novel.

Porter, DAVID, born at Boston, Mass., 1st February 1780, son of a naval officer, entered the navy in 1798, became captain in 1812, and captured the first British war-ship taken in the war. In 1813 he nearly destroyed the English whale-fishery in the Pacific, and took possession of the Marquesas Islands; but in March 1814 his frigate was destroyed by the British at Valparaiso. He afterwards commanded an expedition against pirates in the West Indies. He resigned in 1826, and for a time commanded the Mexican navy. In 1829 the United States appointed him consul-general to the Barbary States, and then minister at Constantinople, where he died, 3d March 1843. See the Life (1876) by his son.—That son, DAVID DIXON PORTER, born at Chester, Penn., 8th June 1813, accompanied his father against the pirates and in the Mexican service. He entered the U.S. navy in 1829, and in the civil war, as commander of the mortar flotilla, in April 1862 bombarded the New Orleans forts. In September, with the Mississippi squadron, he passed the batteries of Vicksburg, and bombarded the city; in Dec. 1864, as rear-admiral, he silenced Fort Fisher, taken next month. Superintendent till 1869 of Annapolis naval academy, he was in 1870 made admiral of the navy, and died 13th Feb. 1891. He wrote three romances, Incidents of the Civil War (1885), and History of the Navy in the Rebellion (1887).

Porter, ENDYMION (1587-1649), was groom of the bedchamber to Charles I., and fought for him in the Great Rebellion. He wrote verses. See Life and Letters by Dorothea Townshend (1897).

Porter, JANE, born at Durham in 1776, the daughter of an army surgeon, made a great reputation in 1803 by her high-flown romance, Thaddeus of Warsaw, which was distanced in 1810 by The Scottish Chiefs, its hero a most stilted and preposterous Wallace. Other books were The Pastor's Fireside (1815), Duke Christian of Lüneburg (1824), Tales Round a Winter's Hearth (with her sister Anna Maria, 1824), and The Field of Forty Footsteps (1828); Sir Edward Seaward's Shipwreck (1831), a clever fiction, edited by her, was almost certainly written by her eldest brother, Dr William Ogilvie Porter (1774-1850). She died 24th May 1850.—Another brother, ROBERT KER PORTER (1775-1842), a clever battle-painter, visited Russia in 1804, accompanied Sir John Moore's expedition in 1808, became K.C.H. in 1832, was afterwards British consul in Venezuela, and died at St Petersburg. He published books of travel in Russia, Sweden, Spain, Portugal, Georgia, Persia, and Armenia.—Her younger sister, ANNA MARIA PORTER (1780-1832), blossomed precociously into Artless Tales (1793-95), followed by a long series of works, among which were Octavia (1798), The Lake of Killarney (1804), The Hungarian Brothers (1807), The Recluse of Norway (1814), The Fast of St Magdalen (1818), Honor O'Hara (1826), and Barony (1830).

Porter, JOHN, racehorse trainer, born at Rugeley, 2d March 1838, has written Kingsclere (1896).

Porter, JOSIAS LESLIE, D.D. (1823-89), born at Burt near Londonderry, was a Presbyterian missionary in Syria and then professor of Biblical Criticism at Belfast. He wrote Giant Cities of Bashan (1865), Through Samaria (1888), &c.

Porter, NOAH (1811-92), born at Farmington, Conn., studied at Yale, was a Congregational pastor 1836-46, then became professor of Moral Philosophy at Yale, and in 1871-86 was president of the college. Among his numerous works are The Human Intellect (1868), Books and Reading (1870), Sciences of Nature versus the Science of Man (1871), Moral Science (1885), Kant's Ethics (1886). See Memorial, ed. by Merriam (1893).

Porteus, BELBY (1731-1808), born at York, his parents both being natives of Virginia, became a fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, and was in 1776 made Bishop of Chester, in 1787 of London. He wrote Lectures on St Matthew's Gospel, Summary of Christian Evidences, &c. See Life by Hodgson, prefixed to his works (1811).

Posidonius (c. 135-51 B.C.), Stoic, born at Apamea in Syria, studied at Athens, and settled at Rhodes, where in 86 he was sent as envoy to Rome; there, the friend of Cicero and Pompey, he died, leaving works on philosophy, astronomy, and history, of which only fragments are extant.

Potemkin, GREGORY ALEXANDROVITCH, was born near Smolensk, 27th September 1739, of a noble but impoverished Polish family. He entered the Russian army, attracted the notice of the czarina by his handsome face and figure, in 1774 became her recognised favourite, and directed the Russian policy. When in 1787 Catharine paid a visit to his government in the south, he caused an immense number of wooden houses to be grouped into towns and villages along the czarina's route, and hired people to act the part of villagers. The czarina, gratified at the seeming improvement of the country, covered Potemkin with honours. In the war with the Turks Potemkin was placed at the head of the army. Otchakoff was taken, and Suvoroff won the battles of Bender and Ismail, of which Potemkin reaped the credit (1791). He died 16th October in the same year. Licentious, astute, and unscrupulous, in spite of his lavish extravagance he heaped up an immense fortune. See Memoirs (1812), and Life in German by his secretary Saint-Jean (new ed. 1888). [Russian pron. Pot-yom'kin.]

Pott, AUGUST FRIEDRICH, philologist, born at Netteltrede in Hanover, 14th November 1802, became in 1833 professor of the Science of Language at Halle. The foundation of Pott's reputation was laid by his Etymologische Forschungen (1833-36; 2d ed. 1859-76); and his article on the Indo-Germanic stock in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædie is a masterpiece. All the progress of learning since has not stripped the value from his works on the Gypsies (1844-45), Personal Names, Numerals, Mythology, African Languages, or General Grammar. He died 5th July 1887.

Potter, JOHN (c. 1674-1747), born at Wakefield, became professor of Divinity at Oxford in 1708, Bishop of Oxford in 1715, and in 1737 Archbishop of Canterbury. He published Archæologia Græca, or Antiquities of Greece (1698), editions of Lycophron (1697) and Clemens Alexandrinus (1715), &c.

Potter, PAUL, Dutch animal-painter, was born a painter's son at Enkhuizen in 1625, and died at Amsterdam in January 1654. His best pictures are pastoral scenes with animal figures, the life-size 'Young Bull' (1647, at the Hague) being especially celebrated. His 'Dairy Farm' was sold in London in 1890 for £6090. The Rijks Museum at Amsterdam possesses the 'Bear-hunt' and seven other pictures; and England is rich in his works. He was also an excellent etcher. See French monograph by Van Westrehe (1867), and Cundall's Landscape Painters of Holland (1891).

Pottinger, SIR HENRY, G.C.B. (1789-1856), born at Mount Pottinger, in Co. Down, entered the Indian army in 1804, published Travels in Beloochistan and Sinde (1816), and became resident and political agent in Cutch (1825-40), a baronet (1840), envoy to China (1841-42), governor of Hong-kong (1843-44) and of Madras (1847-54), Pounds, JOHN (1766-1839), cripple shoemaker at Portsmouth, as unpaid teacher of poor children, was founder of ragged schools.

Poussin, NICOLAS, painter, born at Les Andelys in Normandy in June 1594, went at eighteen to Paris to study, and by 1623 had attained the means of visiting Rome. He received important commissions from Cardinal Barberini, and soon acquired fame and fortune. After sixteen years he returned to Paris and was introduced by Richelieu to Louis XIII., who appointed him painter in ordinary. But in 1643, annoyed by intrigues, he returned to Rome, and died there, 19th Nov. 1665. His style is a combination of classical ideals and Renaissance tendencies.—His nephew, Gaspar Dughet (1613-75), assumed his uncle's name, and as GASPAR POUSSIN became famous as a landscapist. See works on Nicolas by Bouchitte (1858), Poillon (2d ed. 1875), and Denio (1899). [Poossan®.]

Powell, BADEN (1796-1860), born in London, studied at Oriel, and in 1821 became vicar of Plumstead, in 1824 F.R.S., and in 1827 Savilian professor of Geometry at Oxford. He published a series of works on physics and mathematics, but was best known by his contribution to Essays and Reviews, and theological books thought dangerously 'liberal'.—His sixth and youngest son, SIR ROBERT STEPHENSON SMYTH BADEN-POWELL, born in London in 1857, and educated at the Charterhouse, joined the 13th Hussars in 1876; served in India and Afghanistan; was on the staff in S. Africa in 1887-89, in Ashanti in 1895, and in Matabeleland in 1896-97; and having been lieutenant-colonel of 5th Dragoon Guards, made his fame as defender of Mafeking, and was made major-general. He organised the South African Constabulary, became lieutenant-general in 1908, founded the Boy Scouts (1908), and wrote on scouting and other military matters, on pig-sticking, &c.

Powell, FREDERICK YORK, born in 1850, and educated at Rugby and Christ Church, Oxford, in 1894 became at Oxford regius professor of Modern History. He died 8th May 1904.

Powell, JOHN WESLEY (1834-1902), born at Mount Morris, New York, lost his right arm in the civil war, and became a professor of Geology, surveyor (1868-72) of the Colorado and its tributaries, and director of the Bureau of Ethnology and of the U.S. Geological Survey. He wrote on the arid region, the Uinta Mountains, the Colorado River and its canyons, and on the Indian language.

Powers, HIRAM, American sculptor, was born a farmer's son at Woodstock, Vermont, July 29, 1805, became apprentice to a clockmaker in Cincinnati, and was taught to model in clay by a German sculptor. Employed for seven years making wax figures for the Cincinnati museum, in 1835 he went to Washington, where he executed busts, and in 1837 to Florence in Italy, where he resided till his death, 27th June 1873. There he produced his 'Eve,' and in 1843 the still more popular 'Greek Slave.' Among his other works were his 'Fisher Boy,' 'Proserpine,' 'Il Penseroso,' 'California,' and 'America,' with busts of Washington, Calhoun, and Daniel Webster.

Poynter, SIR EDWARD JOHN, painter, was born of Huguenot ancestry in Paris, 20th March 1836, the son of the architect, Ambrose Poynter (1796-1886). Educated at Westminster and Ipswich, he studied 1853-54 at Rome and 1856-60 in Paris and elsewhere. He made designs for stained glass, and drawings on wood for Once a Week and other periodicals, and for Dalziel's projected illustrated Bible. This led to studies in Egyptian art, which resulted in his 'Israel in Egypt' (1867). His water-colours are numerous, and he was elected to the Royal Water Colour Society in 1883. A.R.A. from 1868, and R.A. from 1876, in 1871 he became Slade professor, in 1876-81 was Director for Art at South Kensington, in 1894-1905 was Director of the National Gallery, in 1896 was made P.R.A. and a knight, in 1902 a baronet. Among his works are 'The Catapult' (1868), 'The Golden Age' (1875), 'Zenobia' (1876), 'Visit to Esculapius' (1880, South Kensington); 'The Ides of March' (1883), 'A Corner in the Villa' (1889), 'The Visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon' (1891), 'The Ionian Dance' (1895), and 'Skirt Dance' (1898), with 'Perseus and Andromeda,' 'Dragon of Wantley,' 'Atalanta's Race,' and 'Nausicaa and her Maidens,' painted (1872-79) for the Earl of Wharnclyffe at Wortley Hall. In 1869-70 he designed the cartoons for a mosaic of St George in the Houses of Parliament. He has done some fine portraits. See the Art Journal by Cosmo Monkhouse for Easter 1897.

Pozzo di Borgo, CARLO ANDREA, COUNT, diplomatist, born at Alala in Corsica, March 8, 1764, practised as an advocate in Ajaccio, in 1790 joined the party of Paoli, who made him president of the Corsican council and secretary of state, but in 1796 was obliged to seek safety from the Bonapartes in London. In 1798 he went to Vienna and effected an alliance of Austria and Russia against France. In 1803 he entered the Russian service, and was employed in many diplomatic missions. He strenuously laboured to unite Napoleon's enemies against him, and seduced Bernadotte (q.v.) from the Napoleonic cause. It was he who urged the allies to march on Paris, and drew up the famous declaration 'that the allies made war not on France, but on Napoleon.' He represented Russia at Paris, the Congress of Vienna, the Congress of Verona, and London; and in 1839 settled in Paris, where he died, 15th February 1842. See his Correspondence (Par. 1890) and a French monograph by Maggioli (1890). [Pot'so dee Bor-go.] Priodier, JAMES (1792-1852), a French sculptor, elegant but weak, was born at Geneva and died in Paris. See Life by Etex (Par. 1859).

Praed, MRS CAMPBELL (née Rosa Caroline Prior), born in Queensland 27th March 1851, married in 1872, and since 1880 has written many novels.

Praed, WINTHROP MACKWORTH, born in London, 26th July 1802, at Eton was one of the most brilliant contributors to the Etonian. In 1821 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, distinguishing himself in Greek and Latin verse, and cultivating the lighter letters in Charles Knight's Quarterly Magazine. In 1829 he was called to the bar, in 1830 entered parliament as a Conservative, and in 1834-35 was secretary to the Board of Control. He died 15th July 1839. Praed was the coryphæus of writers of vers de société—his note individual, his rhythm brilliant, and his wit bright. But he is also admirable in a kind of metrical genre-painting—e.g. The Vicar; while in The Red Fisherman and Sir Nicholas he not unskillfully emulates Hood. His Poems appeared in 1864, with a memoir by Derwent Coleridge; in 1887 his prose essays; in 1888 his political poems. See Saltsbury's Essays in English Literature (1890). [Praid.]

Prati, GIOVANNI (1815-84), Italian poet, was born near Trent, and died in Rome.

Praxiteles, one of the greatest sculptors, was a citizen of Athens, and flourished 340-330 B.C. His works have almost all perished, though his 'Hermes carrying the boy Dionysus' was found at Olympia in 1877. [Prax-ih'-leez.]

Prejevalski, or PRSCHEWALSKY, NICHOLAS, Russian traveller, born 12th April 1839, served in the army, and from 1867, when he was stationed in Siberia, began a series of very important explorations in Southern Mongolia, the Gobi desert, and the upper basin of the Yang-tze-Kiang and Hoang-ho. He died at Karakol, in West Turkestan, 1st November 1888. See his two principal works (in Russian 1875-83, Germ. 1877-84), and Nature for November 1888.

Prescott, WILLIAM HICKLING, historian, was born at Salem, Mass., May 4, 1796, the son of a lawyer. He studied at Harvard (where a piece of bread playfully thrown blinded his left eye, and greatly weakened his right one), travelled in England, France, and Italy, married in 1820, and, abandoning law for literature, devoted himself to severe study, and, in spite of his grievous disabilities, formed splendid literary projects. His first studies were in Italian literature, but by 1826 he had found his life's work in Spanish history. His History of Ferdinand and Isabella (1838) quickly carried his name to the Old World, and was translated into French, Spanish, and German. The History of the Conquest of Mexico (1843), followed by the Conquest of Peru (1847), confirmed his reputation; he was chosen a corresponding member of the French Institute. In 1855-58 he published three volumes of his History of Philip II., but died in New York before completing it, January 28, 1859. Prescott's style alone would have assured him popularity. See Life by George Ticknor (1864).

Pressensé, EDMOND DEHAULT DE (1824-91), French Protestant theologian, studied at Paris, Lausanne, Berlin, and Halle (under Neander and Tholuck), and in 1847 became a pastor at Paris. He was deputy to the National Assembly for the Seine (1871-76), and was elected a life senator in 1883. He was made D.D. by Breslau in 1869 and Edinburgh in 1884. A vigorous writer as well as eloquent preacher, Pressensé took a foremost part in the great theological and ecclesiastical controversies of the day. Among his works are: Trois Premiers Siècles de l'Église Chrétienne (1858-77; Eng. trans. 1869-78); L'Église et la Révolution (1864; trans. 1869); Jésus-Christ, son Temps, sa Vie, son Œuvre (1866; trans. 1866); Études Contemporaines (1880; trans. New York, 1880); Les Origines (1882; trans. 1883). See Life by Rousset (1894).—His son, F. DE PRESSENSÉ (b. 1853), wrote a strongly anti-Protestant sketch of Cardinal Manning (1896). [Pres-sen-say.] Prestwich, SIR JOSEPH (1812-96), born at Pensbury, Clapham, was a wine-merchant till sixty, but in 1874 became Oxford professor of Geology, and in 1896 was knighted. See Life by wife (1899).

Prévost, ABBÉ (ANTOINE FRANÇOIS PRÉVOST D'EXILES), was born at Hesdin in Artois, 1st April 1697, and educated by the Jesuits. At sixteen he enlisted, but soon returned to the Jesuits, and had almost joined the order when he was again tempted to the soldier's life. In 1720 he joined the Benedictines of St Maur, and spent the next seven years in religious duties and in study, but about 1727 fled for six years to Holland and England. In 1728 he published Mémoires d'un Homme de Qualité, to which, indeed, Manon Lescaut (1733) forms a supplement. He employed himself in further novels—Cleveland;

Le Doyen de Killerine—in translations, and in Le Pour et Contre (1733-40), a periodical review of life and letters, modelled on the Spectator. Back in France by 1735, he assiduously compiled over a hundred volumes more. On 23d November 1763 he died suddenly at Chantilly; that a surgeon both brought him to life and killed him by a single thrust of his knife was first told in 1782. Prévost lives securely by Manon Lescaut. It remains fresh, charming, and perennial, from its perfect simplicity, the stamp of reality and truth throughout, and a style so flowing and natural that the reader forgets it altogether in the pathetic interest of the story. His Œuvres Choiesies appeared at Amsterdam (1785-85). See French monograph by HARRISSE (1896).

Prévost, EUGÈNE MARCEL, born in Paris, 1st May 1862, till 1891 filled a post in a Lille tobacco factory. He has written Le Scorpion (1887), Made-moiselle Jaufre (1889), La Cousine Laura (1890), Les Demi-Vierges (1894), and other novels.

Prévost-Paradol, LUCIEN ANATOLE, born in Paris, 8th August 1829, after a twelvemonth at Aix as professor of French Literature became in 1856 a journalist in the capital, and from time to time published collections of essays, the best his Essais sur les Moralistes Français (1864). In 1865 he was elected to the Academy, in 1868 visited England. He had always been, as a moderate Liberal, an opponent of the empire, but Ollivier's accession to power in Jan. 1870 seemed to open up a new era, and he accepted the post of envoy to the United States. His mind unhinged by virulent republican attacks, and hopeless of the issue of the struggle with Germany, he committed suicide at Washington, July 20, 1870.

Price, BONAMY (1807-88), born in Guernsey, was a master at Rugby 1830-50, and from 1863 professor of Political Economy at Oxford.

Price, RICHARD (1723-91), philosopher, born at Tinton, Glamorganshire, at seventeen went to a Dissenting academy in London, became a preacher at Newington Green and Hackney, and established a reputation by his Review of the Principal Questions in Morals (1758) and Importance of Christianity (1766). In 1769 he was made D.D. by Glasgow, and published his Treatise on Reversionary Payments, the celebrated Northampton Mortality Tables, &c. In 1771 appeared his Appeal on the National Debt; in 1776 his Observations on Civil Liberty and the War with America, which brought him an invitation from congress to assist in regulating its finances. Of his great treatise on morals the chief position is that right and wrong are simple ideas incapable of analysis, and received immediately by the intuitive power of the reason. See Life by Morgan (1815).

Price, SIR UVEDALE (1747-1829), writer on the Picturesque, was born and died at Foxley, Herefordshire, and was made a baronet in 1828.

Richard, JAMES COWLES, ethnologist, born at Ross, the son of a Quaker merchant, 11th February 1786, studied medicine, and in 1810, after a residence at Cambridge and Oxford, commenced practice in Bristol. He was appointed physician to the Clifton dispensary and St Peter's Hospital, and afterwards to the Bristol infirmary. In 1813 appeared his Researches into the Physical History of Mankind (4th ed. 1841-51), which secured him a high standing as an ethnologist. In The Eastern Origin of the Celtic Nations (1831; 2d ed. by Latham, 1857) he established the close affinity of the Celtic with the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, and Teutonic languages. Besides several medical works, he also published an Analysis of Egyptian Mythology (1819) and The Natural History of Man (1843; 4th ed. 1855). He was president of the Ethnological Society, and in 1845 became a commissioner in Lunacy. He died in London, 22d Dec. 1848.

Pride, THOMAS, born perhaps near Glastonbury, had been a London drayman or brewer, when at the commencement of the Civil War he became parliamentary captain, and quickly rose to be colonel. He commanded a brigade in Scotland, and when the House of Commons betrayed a disposition to effect a settlement with the king, was appointed to expel its Presbyterian royalist members. By 'Pride's Purge' over a hundred were excluded, and the House, reduced to about eighty members, proceeded to bring Charles to justice. Pride sat among his judges, and signed the death-warrant. He died 23d October 1658.

Prideaux, HUMPHREY (1648-1724), born at Padstow, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford. His Ministora Ozoniensia (1676), an account of the Arundel Marbles, procured for him the friendship of Heneage Finch (q.v.), who in 1679 appointed him rector of St Clement's, Oxford, and in 1681 a canon of Norwich. In 1688 he became Archdeacon of Suffolk, and in 1702 Dean of Norwich. His nine works include a Life of Mahomet (1697), Directions to Churchwardens (1701; 16th ed. 1895), and The Old and New Testament connected (1715-17; 27th ed. 1876). See Prideaux's Letters to John Ellis (Camden Soc. 1875). [Prid'ol.]

Priestley, JOSEPH, was born, a cloth-dresser's son, at Fieldhead in Birstall parish, Leeds, 13th March 1733. After four years at a Dissenting academy at Daventry, in 1755 he became Presbyterian minister at Needham Market, and wrote The Scripture Doctrine of Remission, denying that Christ's death was a sacrifice, and rejecting the Trinity and Atonement. In 1758 he removed to Nantwich, and in 1761 became a tutor at Warrington Academy. In yearly visits to London he met Franklin, who supplied him with books for his History of Electricity (1767). In 1764 he was made LL.D. of Edinburgh, and in 1766 F.R.S. In 1767 he became minister of a chapel at Mill Hill, Leeds, where he took up the study of chemistry. In 1774, as literary companion, he accompanied Lord Shelburne on a continental tour, and published Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever. But at home he was branded as an atheist in spite of his Disquisition relating to Matter and Spirit (1777), affirming from revelation our hope of resurrection. He was elected to the French Academy of Sciences in 1772 and to the St Petersburg Academy in 1780. He became in that year minister of a chapel at Birmingham. His History of Early Opinions concerning Jesus Christ (1786) occasioned renewed controversy. His reply to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution led a Birmingham mob to break into his house and destroy its contents (1791). He now settled at Hackney, and in 1794 removed to America, where he was heartily received; at Northumberland, Pa., he died 6th February 1804, believing himself to hold the doctrines of the primitive Christians, and looking for the second coming of Christ. Priestley is justly called the father of pneumatic chemistry; good authorities (see Nature, xlii. 1890) defend the priority of his discovery of oxygen (1774) and of the composition of water (1781), and deny Lavoisier's claim to be considered an independent discoverer. See Rutt's edition of Priestley's Works (1831-32), including Autobiographical Memoir; and Thorpe's monograph (1906).

Prim, JUAN, Spanish general, born at Reus, 6th December 1814, so distinguished himself in war and statesmanship as to be made general, marshal, and marquis. As progressist he opposed Espartero. Failing in an insurrectionary attempt in 1866, he fled to England and Brussels, but here he guided the movement that in 1868 overthrew Isabella. He was war minister under Serrano, but soon became virtually dictator. He secured the election of Amadeus (q.v.) as king, and was thereupon shot by an assassin 25th December 1870. He died on the 30th. [Freem.]

Primaticcio, FRANCESCO (1504-c. 1570), painter, born at Bologna, came to France in 1531 at the invitation of Francis I. [Pre-ma-titch'yo.]

Prince, HENRY JAMES (1811-99), born at Bath, studied medicine, but took Anglican orders, and in 1859 at Charltnch near Bridgwater founded the 'Agapemone,' a community of religious visionaries. See Hepworth Dixon's Spiritual Wives (1868).

Prince, JOHN (1643-1728), a Devon clergyman, author of The Worthies of Devon (1701).

Pringle, SIR JOHN (1707-82), from 1748 a London physician (to the king from 1774), was born at Stichel, Kelso, and in 1766 was made a baronet.

Pringle, THOMAS (1789-1834), born at Blaiklaw, Roxburghshire, studied at Edinburgh University, and in 1811 entered the Scottish Record Office. He took early to writing, and in 1817 started the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, the parent of Blackwood, in which appeared his 'Gypsies' article, from notes supplied by Scott. In 1820 he sailed for Cape Colony, and for three years was government librarian at Capetown. He started a Whig paper, but it was suppressed by the governor, and returning to London in 1826, he became secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society. His Ephemerides (1828) was a collection of graceful verse. See Life by Leitch Ritchie in his Poetical Works (1839).

Prinsep, HENRY THOBY (1793-1878), a distinguished Indian civilian, born at Thoby Priory, Essex, was a member 1858-74 of the Indian Council, and wrote a history of India under the Marquis of Hastings (1823). — His second son, VALENTINE CAMERON ('Val') PRINSEP (1838-1904), born at Calcutta, accompanied the Prince of Wales to India (1875-76), painted many Indian pictures, and wrote Imperial India, an Artist's Journal (1879), a novel, Virginie, &c. In 1879 he was elected an A.R.A., in 1894 an R.A.

Prior, MATTHEW, was born 21st July 1664, probably at Wimborne. He was sent to Westminster, but on his father's death had to turn bookkeeper to his uncle, a vintner. His familiarity with Horace attracted the attention of the Earl of Dorset, with the result that he returned to Westminster, where he formed a lifelong friendship with the two sons of Mr Montagu, the elder of whom became Earl of Halifax. He got a scholarship at St John's, Cambridge, and in 1687 with Charles Montagu parodied Dryden's Hind and the Panther as the Country-mouse and the City-mouse. In 1688 Prior obtained a fellowship, and his composition of the yearly college tribute to the Exeter family led to his becoming tutor to Lord Exeter's sons. At twenty-six he was made secretary to the ambassador at the Hague, where he found especial favour with King William. In 1697 he brought over the Articles of Peace at the treaty of Ryswick; and, after being nominated Secretary of State for Ireland, was made secretary in 1698 to the Paris embassy. In 1699 he became an under-secretary of state, and in 1700 succeeded Locke as commissioner of trade and plantations. In 1701 he entered parliament for East Grinstead. Under Anne he joined the Tories, and in 1712 went to Paris as ambassador; but after the queen's death was impeached and imprisoned (1715). The remainder of his life was passed chiefly at his country-house, Down-Hall, in Essex. He died at Wimpole, Harley's seat, 18th September 1721. Without much real sentiment or humanity, Prior's verses have wit, grace, neatness, and finish; he survives mainly by his purely playful efforts, his lyrics and his epigrams, not a few of which are unsurpassable. He collected his poems in 1709, and again, in extended form, in 1718. In 1740 two volumes were published, one containing alleged Memoirs. See his Selected Poems, edited by Austin Dobson (1889), and the editions of his Poems by Brimley Johnson (1892) and Waller (1905-7).

Priscian (Lat. Priscianus) of Caesarea, first of Latin grammarians, in the beginning of the 6th century taught Latin at Constantinople. Besides his Institutiones Grammaticae, he wrote six smaller grammatical treatises and two hexameter poems.

Priscillian, Bishop of Avila, was excommunicated by a synod at Saragossa in 380, then tolerated, but ultimately executed in 385—one of the first heretic martyrs. His doctrine, said to have been brought to Spain from Egypt, contained Gnostic and Manichean elements, and was based on dualism. The Priscillianists were ascetics, eschewed marriage and animal food, and were said to hold strict truth obligatory only between themselves. See German monographs by Mandemach (1851) and Paret (1891).

Pritchard, CHARLES, F.R.S. (1808-93), schoolmaster, clergyman, and astronomer, from 1870 Savilian professor at Oxford. See Memoirs (1896).

Pritchard, EDWARD WILLIAM (1825-65), a Glasgow doctor, born at Southsea, was hanged for poisoning his wife and mother-in-law.

Probus, MARCUS AURELIUS, born at Sirmium in Pannonia, under Valerian greatly distinguished himself on the Danube and in Africa, Egypt, Asia, Germany, and Gaul, was by Tacitus appointed governor of Asia, and by his soldiers, on Tacitus's death, was forced to assume the purple (276 A.D.). The Germans were driven out of Gaul and the Barbarians from the frontier; while Persia was forced to a humiliating peace. Probus next devoted himself to developing the internal resources of the empire. But fearing that the army would deteriorate with inactivity, he employed the soldiers on public works. Such occupations, deemed degrading, excited discontent; and a body of troops engaged in draining the swamps about Sirmium murdered him in 282.

Probus, MARCUS VALERIUS, a Latin grammarian, from Syria, in the latter half of the 1st cent. A.D.

Procida, GIOVANNI DA (c. 1210-98), a royal physician and statesman, born at Salerno. See work by De Renci (Nap. 1860). [Pro'chee-da.]

Proclus (c. 412-485 A.D.), the Neoplatonist, born in Constantinople, studied at Alexandria and Athens. His vivid imagination convinced him, when all the influences of the mysteries were brought to bear upon him, of his direct intercommunion with the gods. The Orphic Poems, the writings of Hermes, and all the mystical literature of that occult age were to him the only source of true philosophy. Of an impulsive piety, and eager to win disciples from Christianity itself, he made himself obnoxious to the Christian authorities in Athens, who banished him. Allowed to return, he acted with more prudence. In his system the predominant law of development is triadic. The existence of what is produced in that which produces it, its emergence from it, and its return to it, are the three moments by the continued repetition of which the totality of things is developed from their origin. The final source of this development is the original essence, elevated above all being and knowledge, between which and the intelligible there intervenes an intermediary member—the absolute unities together forming the single supernal number. The soul is made of three kinds of part-souls—divine, dæmonic, and human. The soul enters temporarily into the material body. It is capable by divine illumination of mystic union with the Deity. Faith alone is essential to the attainment of Theurgy, which, comprising supernatural inspiration, is preferable to all human wisdom. Cousin edited some of his works (1820-25; new ed. 1864); Taylor 'the Platonist' translated a series of them (1788-89).

Procop, ANDREW (c. 1380-1434), Hussite leader, from a monk became one of Ziska's followers, and on Ziska's death commander of the Taborites. Under him the fearful raids into Silesia, Saxony, and Franconia were carried out, and he repeatedly defeated German armies. He and his colleague, Procop the Younger, headed the internal conflict of the Taborites with the more moderate Calixtines; both fell at Lipan near Böhmischbrod.

Procopius (c. 499-565 A.D.), Byzantine historian, born at Cæsarea in Palestine, studied law, and accompanied Belisarius against the Persians (526), the Vandals in Africa (533), and the Ostrogoths in Italy (536). He was highly honoured by Justinian, and seems to have been appointed prefect of Constantinople in 562. His principal works are his Historiæ (on the Persian, Vandal, and Gothic wars), De Edificiis, and Anecdota or Historia Arcana, a sort of chronique scandaleuse of the court of Justinian. The best edition is by Dindorf (1833-38). See THEODORA; and works by Dahn (1865), Renan (Essais de Morale, 3d ed. 1867), and Haury (1891).

Procter, BRYAN WALLER ('Barry Cornwall'), born at Leeds, 21st November 1787, and educated at Harrow with Byron and Peel for schoolfellows, was articled to a Calne solicitor, in 1807 came to London to live, and in 1815 began to contribute poetry to the Literary Gazette. In 1816 he inherited from his father £500 a-year, in 1823 married Basil Montagu's step-daughter, Anne Benson Skepper (1799-1888). He had meanwhile published poems and produced a tragedy at Covent Garden, whose success was largely due to the acting of Macready and Kemble. He was called to the bar in 1831, in 1832-61 was a metropolitan commissioner of Lunacy, and died 4th October 1874. His works comprise Dramatic Scenes (1819), Marcian Colonna (1820), The Flood of the Tessaly (1823), and English Songs (1832), besides memoirs of Kean (1835) and Charles Lamb (1866). The last is always worth reading; but his poems are rarely more than studied if graceful exercises. Yet 'Barry Cornwall' will be remembered as a man beloved by a hundred of the greatest of the century. See Autobiographical Fragment, ed. by Coventry Patmore (1877), and a long obituary of Mrs Procter in the Academy for 17th March 1888.—His daughter, ADELAIDE ANN PROCTER (1825-64), was born and died in London, and in 1851 turned Roman Catholic. By her Legends and Lyrics (1858-60), first written some of them for Houshold Words, she won no small poetical renown.

Proctor, RICHARD ANTHONY, astronomer, born at Chelsea, 23d March 1837, graduated from St John's, Cambridge, in 1860. Devoting himself from 1863 to astronomy, in 1866 he was elected F.R.A.S., and in 1873 made a lecturing tour in America. About this time he communicated to the R.A.S. some important papers on 'The Milky Way,' 'The Transit of Venus,' 'Star Distribution,' &c.; and his name is associated with the determination of the rotation of Mars, the theory of the solar corona, and stellar distribution. He charted the 324,198 stars contained in Argelander's great catalogue. His magazine Knowledge was founded in 1881, in which year he settled in the States; and he died at New York, 12th Sept. 1888.

Pro'dicus, born at Iulis in Ceos, a Greek sophist of the time of Socrates, was author of the story, 'The Choice of Hercules.'

Propertius, SEXTUS, the most impassioned of the Roman elegiac poets, was born about 48 B.C., probably at Assisium (the modern Assisi). He had a portion of his patrimony confiscated after Philippi by the Triumvirs, to reward their veterans, but retained means enough to proceed to Rome for education and to make poetry the business of his life. He won the favour of Mæcenas, to whom he dedicated a book of his poems, and even ingratiated himself with Augustus, whose achievements he duly celebrated. But the central figure of his inspiration was his mistress Cynthia. Propertius left Rome apparently only once, on a visit to Athens. He died probably about 14 B.C. Of his poems only the first book, devoted to Cynthia, was published during his lifetime; certainly the last of the four was given to the light by his friends. Recent criticism shows increasing admiration for his native force, his eye for dramatic situation, and his power over the reader's sympathies. But he is often rough to harshness and obscure from defect of finish. There is an admirable text by Palmer (1880), and critical notes by Paley, Postgate, and Phillimore in their editions. The translations of Craunston (1875) and Phillimore (1906) are admirable.

Prosper of AQUITAINE, the champion of Augustinian doctrine against the Semi-Pelagians, was a prominent theologian in southern Gaul in 428-434, and then settled in Rome. Besides letters, Responsiones, and pamphlets on grace and free-will, he wrote a chronicle, coming down to 455, a hexameter poem against the Pelagians, and a Liber Sententiarum compiled from Augustine.

Protag'oras (c. 480-410 B.C.), the earliest of the Greek sophists, born at Abdera, taught in Athens, Sicily, &c. a system of practical wisdom fitted to train men for citizens' duties, and based on the doctrine that 'man is the measure of all things.' All his works are lost. He perished at sea.

Proto'genes, a painter of ancient Greece, was born at Cannus in Caria, and practised his art at Rhodes, where he worked steadily on through the din of the siege of 305-304 B.C.

Proudhon, PIERRE JOSEPH, socialist, born at Besançon, July 15, 1809, contrived as a compositor to complete and extend his education. He became partner (1837) in the development of a new typographical process, contributed to an edition of the Bible notes on the Hebrew language, and in 1838 published an Essai de Grammaire Générale. He subsequently contributed to an Encyclopédie Catholique. In 1840 he issued Qu'est-ce que la Propriété? affirming the bold paradox 'Property is Theft,' as appropriating the labour of others in the form of rent. In 1842 he was tried for his revolutionary opinions, but acquitted; in 1846 he published his greatest work, the Système des Contradictions Économiques. During the Revolution of 1848 he was elected for the Seine department, and published several newspapers advocating the most advanced theories. He attempted also to establish a bank which should pave the way for a socialist transformation by giving gratuitous credit, but failed utterly. The violence of his utterances at last resulted in a sentence of three years' imprisonment, and in March 1849 he fled to Geneva, but returned to Paris in June and gave himself up. While in prison he married a young working-woman, and published Confessions d'un Révolutionnaire (1849), Actes de la Révolution (1849), Gratuité du Crédit (1850), and La Révolution Sociale démontrée par le Coup d'État (1852). In June 1852 he was liberated, but in 1858 was again condemned to three years' imprisonment, and retired to Belgium. Amnestied in 1860, he died near Paris, January 19, 1865. His paradox representing anarchy as the culmination of social progress was an exaggerated assertion of the principle that the fully-developed man should be a law to himself—that the moral progress of man should make government unnecessary. His complete works fill 37 vols. (1867 et seq.); his correspondence, 14 vols. (1874). See Lives by Sainte-Beuve (1872) and Desjardins (1896).

Prout, EBENEZER (1835-1909), composer and writer on music, was born at Oundle, and in 1894 became professor of Music at Dublin.

Prout, FATHER. See MAHONY.

Prout, SAMUEL, water-colourist, born at Plymouth, 17th September 1783. He came to London in 1802, in 1815 was elected to the Water Colour Society, and in 1818 went to Rouen. Architecture thenceforward was the feature of his works; and he made many excursions to France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Italy for picturesque architectural remains. Prout's numerous elementary drawing-books influenced many. He died February 9, 1852. See Memoir by Ruskin in Art Journal (1852), and his Notes on the Drawings by Prout and Hunt (1879-80).

Prout, WILLIAM, F.R.S. (1785-1850), from 1812 a London physician and chemist, was born at Horton near Chipping-Sodbury. His 'Hypothesis' (1815) is a modification of the Atomic Theory.

Prudentius, MARCUS AURELIUS CLEMENS, a Latin Christian poet, was born in the north of Spain in 348 A.D. He practised as a pleader, acted as civil and criminal judge, and ultimately received a high office at the imperial court. His religious convictions came late in life, from which time he devoted himself to the composition of religious poetry. About 407 he withdrew to a monastery, and died three years later. Of his poems the chief are Cathemerinon Liber, a series of twelve hortatory hymns (Eng. trans. 1845); Peristephanon, fourteen lyrical poems in honour of martyrs; Apotheosis, a defence of the Trinity; Hamartigenia, on the Origin of Evil; Psychomachia, on the Christian Graces; Contra Symmachum, against the heathen gods; Diptychon, on scriptural incidents. He is the first of the early Christian verse-makers. Editions are by F. Areval (1788), reprinted in Migne's Patrologia; Obbar (1845), and Dressel (1860). See German books by Brockhaus (1872) and Rösler (1886), Puech's Prudence (Par. 1888), and F. St John Thackeray's Translations from Prudentius (1890).

Prud'hon, PIERRE (1758-1823), a French mythological painter, unhappily associated with his pupil, CONSTANCE MAYER (1775-1821). See works by Clément (3d ed. 1880) and Gauthiez (1886).

Pryme, ABRAHAM DE LA (1672-1704), a Yorkshire clergyman, antiquary, and diarist.

Prynne, WILLIAM, born in 1600 at Swanswick near Bath, graduated from Oriel College, Oxford, in 1621. He was called to the bar, but was early drawn into controversy, and during 1627-30 published The Unloveliness of Love-locks, Healths Sicknesse (against drinking of healths), and three other Puritan and anti-Arminian diatribes. In 1633 appeared his Histrio-Mastix: the Players Scourge, for which, on account of a supposed reflection on the virtue of Henrietta Maria, he was in 1634 sentenced to have his book burnt by the hangman, pay a fine of £5000, be expelled from Oxford and Lincoln's Inn, lose both ears in the pillory, and suffer perpetual imprisonment. Three years later, for assailing Laud and the hierarchy in two more pamphlets, a fresh fine of £5000 was imposed; he was again pilloried, and was branded on both cheeks with S. L. ('seditious libeller'; rather 'stigmata Laudis' by Prynne's own interpretation). He remained a prisoner till in 1640 he was released by a warrant of the House of Commons. He acted as Laud's bitter prosecutor (1644); and in 1647 became recorder of Bath, in 1648 member for Newport in Cornwall. But opposing the Independents and Charles I.'s execution, he was one of those of whom the House was 'purged,' and was even imprisoned 1650-52. On Cromwell's death he returned to parliament as a royalist; and after the Restoration Charles II. 'kept him quiet' by making him keeper of the Tower records. He died 24th Oct. 1669. Prynne was a great compiler of constitutional history, his best works the Calendar of Parliamentary Writs and his Records. See Documents relating to Prynne, edited by S. R. Gardiner (Camden Soc. 1877).

Psalmānā'zar, GEORGE, 'the Formosan,' was born probably in Languedoc between 1679 and 1685. Educated by monks and Jesuits, he at sixteen turned vagabond, and wandered through France, Germany, and the Low Countries, by turns a 'Irish pilgrim,' a 'Japanese convert,' a waiter, a 'heathen Formosan,' and a soldier. At Sluys in 1703 he found an accomplice in one Innes, chaplain to a Scottish regiment, who baptised him 'George Lauder,' and brought him to London. For Bishop Compton he translated the Church Catechism into the 'Formosan' language; and to him he dedicated his Historical and Geographical Description of Formosa (1704), which found many believers in spite of its patent absurdities. But people gradually lost faith in him, or by Law's Serious Call (1729) he was converted to a sense of the error of his ways. Anyhow, we find him the alleged importer of a white 'Formosan' enamel, a tutor, a regimental clerk (1715-17), a fan-painter, and, lastly, for years a diligent hack-writer. The Universal History was largely of his compiling; and his, too, a popular Essay on Miracles. But in all his strange life there is nothing stranger than the esteem expressed for him by Samuel Johnson as 'the best man he ever knew.' He died 3d May 1763. See his autobiographical Memoirs (1764) and Farrer's Literary Forgeries (1907).

Psellus, MICHAEL (c. 1020-1105), a Constantinople teacher of philosophy, wrote Synopsis in Aristotelis logicam, &c.

Ptolemy, name of the Macedonian kings who ruled Egypt for three hundred years. PTOLEMY SOTER, a son of Lagos, was one of the greatest of the generals of Alexander the Great, upon whose death he obtained Egypt (323 B.C.). Nominally subject to Macedon, Ptolemy occupied the first half of his reign in warding off outside attacks and consolidating his government. In 306 he was defeated by Demetrius in a sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus. Notwithstanding this, he assumed the title of king of Egypt, and defended his dominions against Antigonus and Demetrius. In 305 he defended the Rhodians against Demetrius, and received from them his title Soter (Saviour). Alexandria, his capital, became the centre of commerce and Greek culture. He abdicated in 285, and died two years afterwards.—He was succeeded by his son, PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS, under whom the power of Egypt attained its greatest height. He was successful in his external wars, founded the Museum and Library of Alexandria, purchased the most valuable manuscripts, engaged the most celebrated professors, and had made for him the Septuagint translation of the Hebrew Scriptures and the Egyptian history of Manetho. Philadelphus died in 247.—His son and successor, EUBERGETES, pushed the southern limits of the empire to Axum.—His son, PHILOPATROS (221–204), began his reign by murdering his mother, Berenice. He abandoned himself to luxury, and from this time dates the decadence of the Egyptian empire. He warred with Antiochus, persecuted the Jews, and encouraged learning. He was succeeded by his infant son, Epiphanes (204–180). The kings of Syria and Macedonia availed themselves of the opportunity to wrest from Egypt her provinces, and the country was only saved by the king's ministers calling in the aid of Rome, whose influence in Egypt after this was supreme. 'Henceforth the history of Egypt consists of a series of disgusting details, and a more contemptible set of rulers never disgraced a throne than the later Ptolemies.' The successors of Epiphanes were PHILOMETOR (180–145); EUBERGETES II. (145–116); SOTER II. and CLEOPATRA till 106; ALEXANDER (87); CLEOPATRA BERENICE; ALEXANDER II. (80); NEOS DIONYSIUS; and finally the celebrated CLEOPATRA (q.v.), after which Egypt became a Roman province. See Mahaffy's Empire of the Ptolemies (1896).

Ptolemy, or CLAUDIUS PTOLEMEUS, astronomer and geographer, was a native of Egypt, and flourished in Alexandria in 139–161 A.D. His 'great compendium of astronomy' seems to have been denominated by the Greeks megistê, 'the greatest,' whence was derived the Arab name Almagest, by which it is generally known. With his Tetrabiblos Syntaxis is combined another work called Karpos or Centiloquium, from its containing a hundred aphorisms—both treat of astrological subjects, so have been held by some to be of doubtful genuineness. Then there are a treatise on the fixed stars or a species of almanac, the Geographia, and other works dealing with nautical matters, the musical scale, and chronology. Ptolemy, as astronomer and geographer, held supreme sway over the minds of scientific men down to the 16th–17th century; but he seems to have been not so much an independent investigator as a corrector and improver of the work of his predecessors. In astronomy he depended almost entirely on Hipparchus. But, as his works form the only remaining authority on ancient astronomy, the system they expound is called the Ptolemaic System, which, the system of Plato and Aristotle, was an attempt to reduce to scientific form the common notions of the motions of the heavenly bodies. The Ptolemaic astronomy, handed on by Byzantines and Arabs, assumed that the earth is the centre of the universe, and that the heavenly bodies revolve round it. Beyond and in the ether surrounding the earth's atmosphere were eight concentric spherical shells, to seven of which one heavenly body was attached, the fixed stars occupying the eighth. The apparent irregularity of their motions was explained by a complicated theory of epicycles. As a geographer Ptolemy is the corrector of a predecessor, Marinus of Tyre. His geography (ed. by Müller, Par. 1883) contains a catalogue of places, with latitude and longitude; general descriptions; details regarding his mode of noting the position of places—by latitude and longitude, with the calculation of the size of the earth. He constructed a map of the world and other maps. See German work by Bell (1894). [To'î-mî.]

Publius Syrus. See SYRUS.

Puccini, Giacomo, born at Lucca, 22nd June 1858, descendant of four generations of eminent musicians, studied at Milan with Ponchielli, and composed the operas La Bohème, La Tosca, Madame Butterfly, The Girl of the Golden West (1910).

Puccinotti, Francesco (1794–1872), Italian physician, was professor at Rome and Pisa, and wrote a history of medicine. [Poot-shee-not'lee.]

Pückler-Muskau, Hermann Ludwig, Fürst von (1785–1871), German traveller, author, and horticulturist. See Life by Assing (1873).

Puffendorf, or Pufendorf, Samuel, Baron von (1632–94), writer on jurisprudence, born at Chemnitz, studied at Leipzig and at Jena. Whilst he was tutor to the sons of the Swedish ambassador at Copenhagen war broke out (1658) between Denmark and Sweden, and he was thrown into prison. There he thought out his Elementa Jurisprudentiæ Universalis, dedicated to the Elector Palatine, who made him professor of the Law of Nations at Heidelberg (1661). He next, as 'Severinus de Monzambano,' exposed the absurdities of the constitution of the Germanic empire in De Statu Reipublicæ Germanicæ (1667). In 1670 he became professor at Lund, and wrote his great De Jure Naturæ et Gentium (1672), based upon Grotius (q.v.), with features from Hobbes. Appointed Swedish historiographer, he published a history of Sweden from the wars of Gustavus Adolphus to the death of Queen Christina. In 1688 the Elector of Brandenburg invited him to Berlin to write the history of the Great Elector, and there he died. See German works by Franklin (1872) and Jastrow (1882). [u as oo.]

Puget, Pierre (1622–94), French sculptor and painter. See Life by Ginoux (1894). [Pee-zhayf.]

Pugin, Augustus Welby, architect, was born in London, 1st March 1812, the son of a French architect, Augustin Pugin (1762–1832), in whose office, after schooling at Christ's Hospital, he was trained, chiefly by making drawings for his father's books on Gothic buildings. Whilst working with Sir C. Barry he designed and modelled a large part of the decorations and sculpture for the new Houses of Parliament (1836–37). He became about 1833 a convert to Catholicism; and most of his plans were made for churches and other edifices of that communion. He died insane at Ramsgate, 14th Sept. 1852. He wrote Contrasts between the Architecture of the 15th and 19th Centuries (1836), Chancel Screens (1851), and True Principles of Christian Architecture (1841). See Ferrey's Recollections of Pugin and his Father (1861).—His son, EDWARD WELBY PUGIN (1834–75), designed many Catholic churches, &c. [Pew'jin.]

Pulaski, Casimir (1748–79), Polish count, fought against Russia, and was outlawed at the partition of Poland (1772). In 1777 he went to America, and for his conduct at the Brandywine was given a brigade of cavalry. In 1778 he organised

'Pulaski's legion,' in May 1770 entered Charleston, and held it until it was relieved. He was mortally wounded at the siege of Savannah.

Pulci, LUIGI (1432-84), Florentine poet, wrote Il Morgante Maggiore ('Morgante the Giant,' 1481), a burlesque epic with Roland for hero, one of the most valuable specimens of the early Tuscan dialect. He also produced a comic novel and several humorous sonnets.—His brother, Bernardo (1438-88), wrote an elegy on the death of Simonetta, mistress of Julian de' Medici, and the first translation of Virgil's Eclogues. [Pool-chee.]

Pullen, ROBERT, theologian, is heard of at Exeter, Oxford, Paris, and Rome, where he died about 1147, and was Archdeacon of Rochester 1134-43, a cardinal, and chancellor of the church.

Pullman, GEORGE MORTIMER (1831-97), born in New York state, in 1859 made his first sleeping-cars, and in 1863 the first on the present lines. The Pullman Palace-car Company was formed in 1867. In 1880 he founded 'Pullman City,' since absorbed by Chicago.

Pulszky, FRANCIS AURELIUS, Hungarian politician and author, born at Eperies, 17th Sept. 1814, studied law, travelled, and published (1837) a successful book on England. In 1848 he became Esterhazy's factotum, but, having joined the revolution, fled to London, where he wrote for the papers. When Kossuth came to England Pulszky became his companion, and went with him to America. His wife, Theresa (1815-66), wrote Memoirs of a Hungarian Lady (1850) and Tales and Traditions of Hungary (1851). Pulszky was condemned to death in 1852, but after living in Italy 1852-66, and being imprisoned in Naples as a Garibaldian, was pardoned in 1867. He sat in parliament, was director of museums, and died 9th September 1897. See his Autobiography (1879-82; Ger. trans. 1883), and F. W. Newman's Reminiscences of Two Exiles (1889). [Pool-ski.] Pulteney, WILLIAM, EARL OF BATH (1684-1764), the son of a London knight, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. He became Whig member for Heydon in 1705, and was an eloquent speaker. Disgusted with Walpole's indifference to his claims, in 1728 he headed a group of malcontent 'Patriots,' and was henceforth Walpole's bitterest opponent. He was Bolingbroke's chief assistant in the Craftsman, which involved him in many political controversies, and called forth some of his finest pamphlets. On Walpole's resignation in 1741 Pulteney was sworn of the Privy-council, and in 1742 created Earl of Bath. Horace Walpole places him amongst his Royal and Noble Authors; his prose was effective and his verse graceful.

Punshon, WILLIAM MORLEY, LL.D. (1824-81), pulpit orator, born at Doncaster, from 1845 was a Wesleyan minister in London, Bristol, Canada, &c., and missionary-secretary from 1875. See the Life by Macdonald (1887).

Purbach, or PEUERBACH, GEORG VON (1423-61), the first great modern astronomer, Regiomontanus's master, was a professor at Vienna. See German monograph by Schubert (1828).

Purcell, HENRY, greatest of English composers, was born at Westminster in 1658, and in 1664 became a chorister in the Chapel Royal. His compositions at an early age gave evidence of talent; and in 1680 he was appointed organist of Westminster Abbey, in 1682 of the Chapel Royal. He wrote many anthems and other church music, which have kept their place to this day; his dramatic and chamber compositions are finer still. Among the former are his opera Dido and Aeneas, written at seventeen, his music to the Tempest, his songs in Dryden's King Arthur, his music to Howard's and Dryden's Indian Queen, to D'Urfey's Don Quixote, &c. A great many of his cantatas, odes, glees, catches, and rounds are yet familiar. In 1683 he composed twelve sonatas for two violins and a bass. In originality and vigour, in richness of harmony and variety of expression, he far surpassed his predecessors and contemporaries. His church music was edited from the original MSS. by Vincent Novello in 1820-32, with an essay on his life and works; and a complete edition of his works was undertaken by the Purcell Society, instituted in 1876. Purcell died 21st Nov. 1695. See Lives by Cummings (1881) and J. F. Runciman (1909).

Purchas, JOHN (1623-72), a Brighton clergyman, born at Cambridge, was prosecuted for ritualism in 1869-70. He edited the Directorium Anglicanum (1858).

Purchas, SAMUEL (1577-1626), born at Thaxted, studied at St John's College, Cambridge, and became vicar of Eastwood in 1604, and in 1614 rector of St Martin's, Ludgate. His great works were Purchas his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World in all Ages (1613; 4th ed. enlarged, 1626), and Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas his Pilgrimes (based on the papers of Hakluyt, q.v.; 1625). Another work is Purchas his Pilgrim: Microcosmus, or the History of Man (1619). [Pur'kas.]

Pusey, EDWARD BOUVERIE, was born at Pusey in Berkshire, 22d August 1800. His father, the youngest son of the first Viscount Folkestone, had assumed the name Pusey when in 1789 the old Pusey estates were bequeathed to him. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, in 1823 was elected a fellow of Oriel, and in 1825-27 in Germany made himself acquainted with German theological teaching. In 1828 he was appointed regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford, a position which he retained until his death. His first work was an essay on the causes of Rationalism in recent German theology, which was criticised as itself rationalistic; really he sought to derive Rationalism from the want of life in the Lutheran body. The aim of his life was to prevent the spread of Rationalism in England. Hence, when in 1833 Newman began the issue of the Tracts for the Times, Pusey very soon joined him; and they, with Keble, were the leaders of the movement. They endeavoured to make the church live again before the eyes and minds of men as it had lived in times past. With this aim Pusey wrote his contributions to the Tracts, especially those on Baptism and the Holy Eucharist; and commenced in 1836 the Oxford Library of the Fathers, to which his own chief contributions were Augustine's Confessions and several works of Tertullian. But Newman's celebrated Tract 90 was condemned in 1841, and in 1843 Pusey was suspended for three years from preaching in Oxford for a university sermon on the Holy Eucharist; at the first opportunity he reiterated his teaching, and was left unmolested. But before his suspension was over Newman, with several of his leading disciples, had joined the Roman communion. With Keble, Pusey at once set himself to reassure those who were reeling under the blow; it was Pusey's moral weight mainly that prevented a catastrophe greater than any the English Church has ever experienced. But the new power which a civil court had acquired in doctrinal matters (shown in the Gorham case), the constant attacks of bishops and others upon the Oxford movement, the practical inhibition of Pusey from all ministerial work in the diocese of Oxford by Bishop Wilberforce—these and other causes brought about the departure to the Roman Church of another band of distinguished men, including Archdeacon (Cardinal) Manning and Archdeacon Wilberforce. Still Pusey loyally laboured on. His numerous writings during this period included a letter on the practice of confession (1850), a general defence of his own position in A Letter to the Bishop of London (1851), The Doctrine of the Real Presence (1855-57), and the Eirenicon (1865-70)—its object to clear the way for reunion between the Church of England and that of Rome. The reform of Oxford University, which destroyed the intimate bond between the university and the church, greatly occupied Pusey's mind. His evidence before the commission, his remarkable pamphlet on Collegiate and Professorial Teaching, and his assiduous work on the Hebdomadal Council are proofs of the interest he took in the university.

By 1860 the tide had turned. The teaching for which the Tractarians had laboured was beginning to be recognised. But the fruits of the intolerance and persecution of which Oxford had been the scene were also ripening into religious indifference and Rationalism. Against such teaching Pusey contended for the rest of his life. Therefore it was that he prosecuted Professor Jowett for his commentary on St Paul's Epistles, and that he took so prominent a part in the later controversy about the Athanasian Creed. His chief works in this connection are Lectures on Daniel (1863), defending the early date of the book, and What is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment? From his predecessor in the Hebrew chair Pusey inherited the task of completing A Catalogue of the Arabic Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library (1835), for six years a toilsome duty. The Commentary on the Minor Prophets (1860-77) was his contribution to a projected commentary on the whole Bible. In private life Pusey was a man of warm affection, widely known for his gentleness, sincerity, and humility, and was constantly sought as a spiritual guide by persons of every station. His charity was bounded only by his income; and he spent large sums in helping to provide churches in East London, in building St Saviour's, Leeds, and in founding sisterhoods. He married in 1828 Maria Catherine Barker, who died of consumption in 1839; his only son, Philip Edward (1830-80), also predeceased him. He himself died at Ascot Priory, Berks, 16th Sept. 1882, and was buried in Oxford Cathedral. See Life by Canon Liddon, left unfinished at his death in 1890, and completed by the Revs. J. O. Johnston and R. J. Wilson (4 vols. 1893-97, with vol. v., Spiritual Letters, 1898).

Pushkin, ALEXANDER SERGEJEVICH, Russian poet, born at Moscow, 26th May 1799. In 1817 he entered the service of the government, but for his Liberalism was in 1820 relegated to Southern Russia, and in 1824 dismissed and confined to his estate near Pskov. His romantic poem, Ruslan and Lyudmila (1820), was followed by the Prisoner of the Caucasus (1822), Fountain of Bakhchserai (1826), Tzigani (1827), and Eugene Onegin (1828), a clever novel in verse somewhat after the style of Byron's Beppo. Poltava (1829) has Mazepa for its hero. Boris Godunov is his finest tragedy. He wrote also many graceful lyrical poems, a History of the Revolt of Pugachev, several tales, and essays, and was appointed Russian historiographer. He was mortally wounded in a duel, and died January 29 (February 10), 1837. His Eugene Onegin, a Don-Juanesque poem, was translated into English verse by Spalding (1831); and there are also translations of his Daughter of the Commandant (1891), his Prose Tales (1894), and his Poems, with introduction and notes by Ivan Pavin (New York, 1889). Putnam, ISRAEL (1718-90), American general, born at Danvers, Mass., became a farmer, but in 1755 helped as a captain to repel a French invasion of New York, and was present at the battle of Lake George. In 1758 he was captured by the savages, tortured, and about to be burnt when a French officer rescued him. In 1759 he received a regiment, in 1762 went on the West India campaign, and in 1764 helped to relieve Detroit, then besieged by Pontiac (q.v.). In 1775, after Concord, he was given command of the forces of Connecticut, was at Bunker Hill, and held the command at New York and in August 1776 at Brooklyn Heights, where he was defeated by Howe. In 1777 he was appointed to the defence of the Highlands of the Hudson. See Life by Tarbox (1876).—His cousin, RUFUS PUTNAM (1738-1824), served against the French in 1757-60, and then settled as a farmer and millwright. In the war he rendered good service as an engineer, commanded a regiment, and in 1783 became brigadier-general. In 1788 he founded Marietta, Ohio; in 1789 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the North-west Territory; and in 1793-1803 was surveyor-general of the United States.—Israel's grand-nephew, GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM (1814-72), in 1840 became partner in a New York book-firm, and in 1848 started business alone. In 1852 he founded Putnam's Magazine; in 1866 established the firm of G. P. Putnam & Sons (now G. P. Putnam's Sons). He wrote a Plea for International Copyright (1837).

Puvis de Chavannes, PIERRE (1824-98), a French decorative, symbolic painter, was born at Lyons. See work by Vachon (1895).

Pyat, FÉLIX (1810-89), French journalist and communist, in 1831 was admitted to the bar, but chiefly wrote articles, feuilletons, and plays. He signed Ledru-Rollin's appeal to the masses to arm in 1849, escaped to Switzerland, Brussels, and London, and was a member of the 'European revolutionary committee.' Returning to Paris on amnesty in 1870, he was a leader of the communards, and again escaped to London. He was condemned to death, in absence, in 1873, but pardoned in 1880. Marseilles chose him one of her deputies in 1888. [Pee-ah'.]

Pycroft, JAMES (1813-95), writer on cricket, &c., and ex-clergyman, was born at Geyers House, Wiltshire, and died at Brighton. See his Oxford Memories (2 vols. 1886).

Pye, HENRY JAMES (1745-1813), poet-laureate, born in London, studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1772 was made a D.C.L. He held a commission in the Berkshire militia, in 1784 became member for that county, in 1790 succeeded Warton as laureate, and in 1792 was appointed a London police magistrate. He died at Pinner near Harrow. The works of 'poetical Pye,' who, as Byron remarked, was 'eminently respectable in everything but his poetry,' number nearly twenty, and include Alfred; an Epic (1801), with numerous birthday and New-year odes.

Pye, JOHN (1782-1874), engraver after Turner, was born at Birmingham, and died in London.

Pym, JOHN, was born at Brymore near Bridgewater in 1584. He entered Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford, in 1599, as a gentleman-commoner, but left in 1602 without taking a degree, and then became a student of the Middle Temple. In 1614 he was returned to parliament for Calne. He married the same year, but in 1620 was left a widower with five children. His seat of Calne he exchanged in 1625 for Tavistock. He attached himself to the Country party, and made war against monopolies, papistry, the Spanish match, and absolutism with a vigour that brought him three months' durance. In 1626 he took a prominent part in the impeachment of Buckingham. In the parliament of 1628 he stood second only to Sir John Eliot in supporting the Petition of Right, but he opposed him on tonnage and poundage. In the Short Parliament (1640) he 'brake the ice by a two hours' discourse, in which he summed up shortly and sharply all that most reflected upon the prudence and justice of the government, that they might see how much work they had to do to satisfy their country.' And in the Long Parliament, having meanwhile joined hands with the Scots, and ridden with Hampden through England, urging the voters to their duty, Pym on 11th November named Strafford, twelve years earlier his friend and ally, as the 'principal author and promoter of all those counsels which had exposed the kingdom to so much ruin.' In the impeachment of Strafford which followed, resulting in his execution, Pym took the leading part. In the proceedings against Laud, Pym was also conspicuous, as in the carrying of the Grand Remonstrance and in every other crisis up to the time when war became inevitable; he was the one of the 'Five Members' whom Charles singled out by name. On the breaking out of hostilities he remained in London, and there in the executive rendered services to the cause not less essential than those of a general in the field. He died 8th December 1643, having only the month before been appointed Lieutenant of the Ordnance. 'The most popular man,' says Clarendon, 'and the most able to do hurt that hath lived in any time.' He was neither revolutionist nor precisian; his intellect was 'intensely conservative,' in Mr Gardiner's phrase; he was a champion of what he believed to be the ancient constitution. See Forster's Eminent British Statesmen (1837), Goldwin Smith's Three English Statesmen (1867), C. E. Wade's John Pym (1912), and works cited at CHARLES I., ELIOT, and STRAFFORD.

Pyne, LOUISA (1828-1904), operatic soprano, visited America 1854-57, and left the stage on marrying in 1868 the baritone, Mr Frank Bodda.

Pyrrho (c. 376-270 B.C.), a sceptic philosopher, born at Elis, whose opinions we know not from his own writings but from his pupil Timon. He taught that we can know nothing of the nature of things, but that the best attitude of mind is suspense of judgment, which brings with it calmness of mind. Pyrrhonism is often regarded as the ne plus ultra of (philosophical) scepticism: consistent Pyrrhonists were said even to doubt that they doubted.

Pyrrhus, born about 318 B.C., succeeded his father as king of Epirus in 306, was driven out in 301, but regained his throne by help of the Ptolemies (295), and straightway extended his dominions by the addition of western Macedonia.

In 281 the Tarentines, a Greek colony in Lower Italy, invited him to help them against the Romans, and in 280 he sailed for Tarentum with 25,000 men and a number of elephants. The first battle, on the river Siris, was long and bloody, but Pyrrhus won it by help of his elephants, heretofore unknown to the Romans. 'Another such victory,' he said, 'and I must return to Epirus alone.' Many of the Italian nations now joined Pyrrhus, and he marched northward. But after penetrating to within 20 miles of Rome, he found the Roman preparations too strong, and withdrew to Tarentum, where he wintered. In 279 the Romans were again defeated (at Asculum); but Pyrrhus himself lost so heavily that he had again to withdraw to Tarentum. Here a truce was agreed to, and Pyrrhus passed over into Sicily to assist the Sicilian Greeks against the Carthaginians in 278. His first exploits in that island were brilliant; but his repulse at Lilybæum broke the spell; he became involved in misunderstandings with the Greeks, and in 276 quitted the island to renew his war with Rome. While he was crossing over, the Carthaginians attacked him and destroyed seventy of his ships. In 274 he was utterly defeated by the Roman consul Curius Dentatus near Beneventum. He was now forced to abandon Italy and return to Epirus, where he engaged in war with Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. His success was complete; but in less than a year he was at war with the Spartans, by whom he was repulsed in all his attempts on their city. He then marched against Argos, where he was killed by a woman hurling a tile at him from a roof in 272. See German Life by Schubert (1894).

Pythagoras (c. 582-500 B.C.), the founder of the Pythagoreans, born in Samos, became acquainted with the teachings of the early Ionic philosophers, and, through his travels, with those of the Egyptian priests and other foreigners. About 530 he settled at Crotona in Magna Græcia, where he founded a moral and religious school. Pythagoreanism was first a life and not a philosophy, a life of moral abstinence and purification, reactionary against the popular and poetic religions, but yet sympathetic towards the old (Doric) aristocratic forms and institutions. All that can be certainly attributed to Pythagoras is the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, the institution of certain religious and ethical regulations, the beginning of those investigations into the relations of numbers which made the school famous, and astronomical attainments beyond their contemporaries. How much of the mysticism called Neo-Pythagorean (and akin to Neo-Platonism) was directly derived from him is hard to say. The Pythagoreans as an aristocratic party became unpopular after the defeat of the Sybarites by the Crotoniates in 510, and at first were instrumental in putting down the democratic party in Lower Italy; but the tables were afterwards turned, and they had to flee from persecution. See a German monograph by Rothenbücher (1867) and a French one by Chaignet (2d ed. 1875).

Quain, JONES (1796-1865), born at Mallow, studied medicine at Dublin and Paris, and in 1831-35 was professor of Anatomy in London University. He wrote the well-known text-book, Quain's Elements of Anatomy (1828, 10th ed. 1890-96).—His brother, RICHARD, F.R.S. (1800-87), born at Fermoy, was professor of Clinical Surgery in University College, London (1848-66), surgeon-extraordinary to the Queen, and president of the College of Surgeons (1868). He left £75,000 to University College for 'education in modern languages (especially English) and natural science.'—A half-brother, SIR JOHN RICHARD QUAIN (1817-76), born at Mallow, became judge of the Queen's Bench in 1871, and justice of the High Court of Judicature in 1875. Along with H. Holroyd he published New System of Common Law Procedure (1852).—A cousin, SIR RICHARD QUAIN (1816-98), born at Mallow, was the Luncheon lecturer at the College of Physicians in 1872, and Harveian Orator in 1885, and was made physician-extraordinary to the Queen, L.L.D. of Edinburgh in 1889, president of the General Medical Council in 1891, and a baronet in 1891. He edited the Dictionary of Medicine (1882; 2d ed. 1894).

Quarles, FRANCIS, was born at the manor-house of Stewards near Romford, 8th May 1592. He studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, and at Lincoln's Inn, and was successively cup-bearer to the Princess Elizabeth (1613), secretary to Archbishop Ussher (c. 1621), and Chronologer to the City of London (1639). He married in 1618 a wife who bore him eighteen children and prefixed a touching memoir to his Solomon's Recantation (1645). Quarles was a royalist and churchman who suffered in the cause; he died 8th September 1644. He wrote abundantly in prose and verse. His Emblems, in spite of many imperfections, shows wealth of fancy, excellent sense, felicity of expression, and occasionally a flash of poetic fire. His poetical works include A Feast of Wormes (1620), Iob Militant (1624), Argalus and Parthenia (1629), Divine Poems (1630), The Historie of Samson (1631), Divine Fancies (1632), the Emblems (1635), and The Shepherds Oracles (1646). The prose includes Enchyridion (1640), The Profest Royalist (1645), and The Virgin Widow, a worthless comedy (1649). The best edition is Grosart's ('Chertsey Worthies Library', 1880-81).

Quatrefages, JEAN LOUIS ARMAND DE (1810-92), naturalist, born at Berthezème (Gard), in 1850 was elected professor in the Lycée Napoléon and in 1855 at the Natural History Museum. His chief works are Souvenirs d'un Naturaliste (1854; trans. 1857), Unité de l'Espèce Humaine (1861), L'Espèce Humaine (1877; Eng. trans. 1879), Crania Ethnica (1875-82), Les Pygmées (1887; trans. 1895), Darwin et ses Précurseurs Français (1892), and Théories Transformistes (1892). Quatremère, ANTOINE CHRYSOSTÔME (1755-1849), a French archaeologist, brother of the chemist, DENIS BERNARD QUATREMÈRE (1754-1830). See Jouin's Life of Antoine (1892).

Quatremère, ETIENNE MARC (1782-1857), orientalist, born in Paris, in 1807 entered the M.S. department of the Imperial Library, and in 1809 became professor of Greek at Rouen, and in 1819 of Ancient Oriental Languages at Paris, in 1827 of Persian. Although a man of vast knowledge, he had little critical insight or originality. He wrote on the language of ancient Egypt, the Mameluke sultans, the Mongols of Persia, &c. [Kaht'-meh'r.]

Queensberry, WILLIAM DOUGLAS, DUKE OF (1724-1810), 'Old Q,' succeeded his father as Earl of March, his mother as Earl of Ruglen, and his cousin in 1778 as fourth Duke of Queensberry. He was famous as a patron of the turf, and infamous for his shameless debaucheries. He died unmarried, worth over a million sterling. See Life by Robinson (1895).

Quental, ANTERO DE (1842-91), Portuguese lyricist, was born at Ponta-Deigada in the Azores, and there committed suicide. [Ken-tahl'.]

Querouaille or KEROUALLE. See CHARLES II.

Quesnay, FRANÇOIS (1694-1774), economist, studied medicine at Paris, and at his death was first physician to the king. But the fame of the 'European Confucius' depends on his essays in political economy. Around him and his friend, M. de Gournay, gathered the famous group of the Economistes, also called the Physiocratic School. Quesnay's views were set forth in Tableaux Économiques. Only a few copies were printed (1758), and these are lost; yet Quesnay's principles are well known from his contributions to the Encyclopédie, and from his Maximes du Gouvernement Économique, Le Droit Naturel, &c.—collected in Oncken's edition of his Œuvres (1888). [Kay-nay.]

Quesnel, PASQUIER (1634-1719), theologian, born in Paris, studied at the Sorbonne, became in 1662 director of the Paris Oratory, and here wrote Réflexions Morales sur le Nouveau Testament. In 1675 he published the works of Leo the Great, which, for Gallicanism in the notes, was placed on the Index. Having refused to condemn Jansenism in 1684, he fled to Brussels, where his Réflexions were published (1687-94). The Jesuits were unceasing in their hostility, and Quesnel was flung into prison (1703), but escaped to Amsterdam. His book was condemned in the bull Unigenitus (1713). See his Letters (1721-23) and Sec'hé, Les Derniers Jansénistes (1891). [Kay-nel.]

Quesnoy, FRANÇOIS DU (1594-1646), sculptor, was born at Brussels, lived much at Rome, and died at Leghorn, poisoned perhaps by his jealous brother, JÉRÔME (1612-54), a sculptor too, who was burnt for unnatural crimes.

Quételet, LAMBERT ADOLPHE JACQUES (1796-1874), statistician and astronomer, born at Ghent, became in 1819 Mathematical professor at the Brussels Athenæum, in 1828 director of the new Royal Observatory, in 1836 professor of Astronomy at the Military School, and in 1834 perpetual secretary of the Belgian Royal Academy. In his greatest book, Sur l'Homme (1835), as in L'Anthropométrie (1871), &c., he shows the use that may be made of the theory of probabilities, as applied to the 'average man.' See sketch by Mailly (1875). [Kayt-lay.]

Quevedo Villegas, FRANCISCO GOMEZ DE, was born at Madrid, 26th September 1580. His father was secretary to the queen, and his mother a lady-in-waiting. He quitted the University of Alcalá with a reputation for varied scholarship. The fatal issue of a duel drove him in 1611 to the court of the Duke of Ossuna, viceroy of Sicily; he made him his right-hand man, and, when promoted to the viceroyalty of Naples, chose him for minister of finance. Quevedo was involved in Ossuna's fall in 1619, and put in prison, but allowed to retire to the Sierra Morena. He returned to Madrid in 1623, and became a persona grata at the court of Philip IV. In his Política de Dios (1626) he appealed to the king to be a king, not in name only, but in fact; in 1628 he followed up this attack on government by favourites with an apologue, Hell Reformed. He remained, however, on friendly terms with Olivares; and if high place could have silenced him he might have had anything in the minister's gift. But all that he would accept was the honorary title of royal secretary. In 1639 a memorial in verse to the king, imploring him to look with his own eyes to the miserable condition of his kingdom, was one day placed in Philip's napkin. Quevedo was denounced as the author, arrested, and imprisoned in a convent at Leon, where he was struck down by an illness, from which he never recovered. In 1643 Olivares fell from power, and Quevedo was free to return to Madrid. He died 8th September 1645. Quevedo was one of the most prolific Spanish poets, but his verses were all written for his friends or for himself, and, except those in the Flores de Espinosa (1605), the few pieces published in his lifetime were printed without his consent. His poetry is therefore for the most part of an occasional character; sonnets, serious and satirical, form a large portion of it, and light humorous ballads and songs a still larger. About a dozen of his interludes are extant, but of his comedies almost nothing is known. His prose is even more multifarious than his verse. His first book (1620) was a Life of St Thomas de Villanueva, and his last (1644) one of St Paul; and most of his prose is devotional. Of his political works the Política de Dios is the chief. His brilliant picaresque novel, the Vida del Buscón Pablos (1626), or, as it was called after his death, the Gran Tacaño, at once took its place beside Guzman de Alfarache. His five Visions were printed in 1627; to obtain a license they were barbarously mutilated; and it is in this mangled shape that they have been printed since 1631. The fullest edition of his works is that in the Biblioteca de Autores Españoles. The earliest translations from Quevedo were into French, and from them most of the English versions have been made—e.g. Visions; or Hell's Kingdom, by R. Croshawe (1640); Hell Reformed, by E. M. (1641); Buscon, the Witty Spaniard, by J. Davies (1657); and the Visions, by Sir R. L'Estrange (1667). Captain John Stevens in 1697-1707 produced a good translation from the original of Fortuna con Sesó, the Vida del Buscón, &c.; and his translations, together with L'Estrange's Visions, were published in 1798 as Quevedo's Works. See French monograph by E. Merimée (1886).

Quick, JOHN (1748-1831), comedian, was born and died in London, and retired in 1813.

Quick, ROBERT HEBERT (1831-91), born in London, and educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, was a curate in Whitechapel and Marylebone, a schoolmaster, and vicar of Sedbergh 1883-87. The great interest of his life was education. To the discussion of its theories he brought wide study, independent thought, and ripe wisdom; witness his delightful Essays on Educational Reformers (1868; 2d ed. 1890).

Quillinan, EDWARD (1791-1851), born at Oporto, the son of an Irish Catholic wine-merchant, served in the cavalry, settled in the Lake Country, but lost his first wife by burning (1822), lived much abroad, married in 1841 Wordsworth's daughter Dorothy (1804-47), and died near Ambleside. His unfinished version of Camoens' Lusitana and his own selected poems both appeared in 1853.

Quin. See DUNRAVEN, EARL OF.

Quin, JAMES, actor, born in London, 24th February 1693, made his début at Dublin in 1714. At Drury Lane in 1716 the sudden illness of a leading actor led to Quin's being called on to play Bajazet in Tamerlane. His success was marked. At Lincoln's Inn Fields (1718-32) and at Drury Lane (1734-41) he was by universal consent the first actor in England; then Garrick largely eclipsed him. In 1746 the two played together in the Fair Penitent, and Garrick's superiority was acknowledged by the best judges. Retiring in 1751, Quin died at Bath, Jan. 21, 1766. An anonymous Life (1766) was reprinted in 1887 with corrections and additions.

Quincey. See DE QUINCEY.

Quincy, JOSIAH, was born at Boston, Mass., February 4, 1772, the son of the lawyer, Josiah Quincy (1744-75). He graduated at Harvard, was called to the bar in 1793, was a leading member of the Federal party, and, elected in 1804 to congress, distinguished himself as an orator. He denounced slavery, and in one most remarkable speech declared that the admission of Louisiana would be a sufficient cause for the dissolution of the union. Disgusted with the triumph of the Democrats and the war of 1812, he declined re-election to congress, and devoted his attention to agriculture; but he was a member of the Massachusetts legislature, served as mayor of Boston 1823-28, and in 1829-45 was president of Harvard. He died at Quincy, Mass., July 1, 1864. Among his works are Memoirs of his father (1825) and J. Q. Adams (1858), histories of Harvard (1840), the Boston Athenaeum (1851), and Boston (1852). His Speeches were edited (1874) by his son, Edmund Quincy (1808-77), who was secretary of the American Anti-Slavery Society.

Quinet, EDGAR, born at Bourg, February 17, 1803, studied at Strasburg, Geneva, Paris, and Heidelberg. The remarkable Introduction to his translation of Herder's Philosophy of History (1825) won him the friendship of Cousin and Michelet; a government mission to Greece bore fruit in La Grèce Moderne (1830). Ahasvérus (1833), a kind of spiritual imitation of the ancient mysteries, was followed by the less successful poems, Napoléon (1836) and Prométhée (1838); in his Examen de la Vie de Jésus (1838) he shows that Strauss is too analytic, and that religion is the very substance of humanity. Appointed in 1839 professor of Foreign Literature at Lyons, he began those lectures which formed his brilliant Du Génie des Religions (1842); then recalled to the Collège de France at Paris, he joined Michelet in attacking the Jesuits. But his lectures caused so much excitement that government suppressed them in 1846. At the Revolution Quinet took his place on the barricades, and in the National Assembly voted in the Extreme Left. After the coup d'état he was exiled to Brussels, whence in 1857 he migrated to Switzerland. At Brussels he produced Les Esclaves (1853), and in Switzerland Merlin l'Enchanteur (1860). Other works were La Révolution Religieuse au XIX^e. Siècle (1857), Histoire de mes Idées (1860), Histoire de la Campagne de 1815 (1862), and La Révolution (1865). After the downfall of Napoleon III. he returned to Paris, and during the siege strove to keep patriotism aglow. He sat in the National Assemblies at Bordeaux and Versailles, and aroused great enthusiasm by his orations. He died 27th

March 1875. Quinet's latest books were La Création (1870), La République (1872), L'Esprit Nouveau (1874), and Le Livre de l'Exilé (1875). His wife published in 1870 Mémoires d'Exil; his Correspondance Inédite followed in 1877, his Lettres d'Exil à Michelet in 1884-86. His Œuvres Complètes (28 vols. 1857-79) include a Life by Chassin. See also Edgar Quinet avant et depuis l'Exil (1887-89), by his widow; and Heath's Edgar Quinet: His Early Life and Writings (1881). His widow has also written La Vraie dans l'Éducation (1891) and La France Idéale (1895). [Kee-nay.]

Quinta'na, MANUEL JOSÉ (1772-1857), a Madrid advocate whose house became a resort of advanced Liberals. Besides his classic Vidas de los Españoles Celebres (1807-34), he published tragedies and poetry. On the restoration of Ferdinand VII. he was imprisoned 1814-20; but he recanted, and from 1833 held office. See Spanish monographs by Piñeyro (1892) and Piralá (1892).

Quintilian. M. FABIVS QUINTILIANUS (c. 35-100 A.D.) was born at Calagurris (Calahorra) in Spain, studied oratory at Rome, returned there in 68 in the train of Galba, and became eminent as a pleader and still more as a teacher of the oratorical art. His pupils included Pliny the Younger and the two grand-nephews of Domitian. The emperor named him consul and gave him a pension. His reputation rests securely on his great work, De Institutione Oratoria, a complete system of rhetoric, remarkable for its sound critical judgments, purity of taste, admirable form, and the perfect familiarity it exhibits with the literature of oratory. Quintilian's own style is excellent, though not free from the florid ornament and poetic metaphor characteristic of his age. Nineteen longer and 145 shorter Declamations (ed. C. Ritter, 1885) ascribed to him are now believed to be spurious. The best editions of the Institutio are by Spalding, Zumpt, and Bonnell (1798-1834), Halm (1868-69), and Meister (1886-87), and of Book x. alone, with its survey of Greek and Roman literatures, by Prof. Mayor (1872, incomplete) and W. Peterson (1891). There are translations by Guthrie (1805) and Watson (1855-56).

RABBE, WILHELM ('Jakob Corvinus,' 1831-1910), German novelist, was born at Eschershausen in Brunswick, and in 1870 settled in Brunswick.

Raban, EDWARD, a native probably of Worcestershire, from 1622 till his death in 1658 was an Aberdeen printer.

Rabanus of HRABANUS MAURUS (c. 776-856), Archbishop of Mainz from 847, was born there, and was abbot of Fulda 822-42. He wrote commentaries, homilies, &c. See German works by Sprenger (1856), Köhler (1870), and Richter (1882).

Rabelais, FRANÇOIS, was born in 1483, an apothecary's son, at Chinon. At nine he was sent to the monastery of Seully, and thence to that of La Baumette near Angers, where he founded a lifelong friendship with the three illustrious Du Bellay brothers. He became a novice of the Franciscan order, and entered the monastery of Fontenay le Comte, where he had access to a large library, acquired Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic, and studied all the Latin and old French authors within his reach, medicine, astronomy, botany, and mathematics. In Fontenay Rabelais found a friend, André Tiraqueau, lawyer and scholar; his patron, the Bishop of Maillezaïs, lived close by; and he corresponded with Budæus. But Franciscan jealousy of the old learning was transformed into jealousy of the new. His books were taken from Rabelais; he conceived a loathing for the convent, and he ran away. Over forty years old now, he seems to have sought the protection of his friend the bishop, and through him obtained the pope's permission (1524) to pass from the Franciscan to the Benedictine order; but he remained with the bishop for six years. In September 1530 he entered the University of Montpellier. He left the university in 1532, went to Lyons to get his first book, parts of Hippocrates and Galen, published, and remained there as physician to the hospital. At this time Lyons was a great intellectual centre, and round its great printer Gryphius was gathered a company of scholars and poets, men of broad thought and advanced opinions. They had no idea of Christianity apart from the superstitions they derided, and had adopted the vague but hopeful agnosticism of Cicero. It was at Lyons that Rabelais began the famous series of books by which he will for ever be remembered. In 1532 he brought out The Great and Inestimable Chronicles of the Grand and Enormous Giant Gargantua. In the sequel, Pantagruel, he no longer wrote pure burlesque: serious ideas are set forth side by side with overwhelming nonsense. Both books had a prodigious success. At the same time he began his almanac, which he continued for eighteen years—all lost but a few fragments. In 1534 he accompanied Cardinal du Bellay to Rome. In 1535 new editions appeared of the Gargantua and Pantagruel. In 1536 Rabelais again went to Rome, received permission to go into any Benedictine house which would receive him, and was enabled to hold ecclesiastical offices and to practise medicine. He amused himself in Italy with collecting plants and curiosities—to Rabelais France owes the melon, artichoke, and carnation. From 1537 (when he took his doctorate) to 1539 he taught at Montpellier. He then went to Lyons, removed to Paris in 1540, and once more made things right with the church, obtaining permission to enter the Collegiate Chapter of St Maur des Fossés instead of a convent. He caused his first two books to be read to Francis I., who was so pleased with them that he granted a license for a third (1546). But in 1547 the king died, and the authorities fell upon Rabelais. Not content with finding impieties in the first three books, they printed a thing which they called his fourth book. Rabelais fled to Metz, where he practised medicine. Cardinal du Bellay, himself suspected of liberal tendencies, withdrew to Rome, and summoned Rabelais thither. On the birth of King Henry's eldest son great rejoicings were held in Rome. Rabelais wrote an account of these, and sent the book to the Cardinal de Lorraine, a stroke of policy which enabled him to return and gave him the living of Mendon. But both Catholics and Protestants demanded that his book should be suppressed and the author burned. Rabelais did not dare to proceed further with the fourth book than the eleventh chapter. There, in 1549, it broke short off. Early in 1553 Rabelais resigned his living and went to Paris; and there, on 9th April, he died. Ten years after his death appeared the fifth and last book, left unfinished. The riotous license of his mirth, which is restrained by neither decency nor reverence, has made Rabelais as many enemies as his wisdom has made him friends. We may grant the blot: yet it is not inherent in the book; and when it is removed there remains the most astonishing treasury of wit, wisdom, common-sense, and satire that the world has ever seen. Among editions of Rabelais are those of Lacour and A. de Montaiglon (1868-78) and Ch. Marty-Laveaux (4 vols. 1868-81). Urquhart and Motteux's translation (1658-94) was reprinted in 1892 and 1900; one by W. F. Smith appeared in 1893. See works by Delécluze (1841), Lacroix (1859), Gebhart, Fleury (1874), Sir Walter Besant (1879-81), Stapfer (1889), Arthur Heulhard (Rabelais: ses Voyages en Italie, son Exil à Metz, 2d ed. 1893), Millet (1892), and Bertrand (Rabelais à Lyon, 1894). Rachel, ÉLISA (properly ÉLISA FÉLIX), tragic actress, was born at Mumpf in Aargau, the daughter of Alsatian-Jewish pedlars, 24th March 1821. Brought to Paris about 1830, she received lessons in singing and declamation, made her début in the Vendéenne in 1837 with moderate success, but in June 1838 appeared as Camille in Les Horaces at the Théâtre Français. From this time, in the great masterpieces of Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire, she shone without a rival. In Adrienne Lecouvreur, written for her by Legouvé and Scribe, she had also immense success. In 1849 she made the tour of the French provinces; she also visited London (Charlotte Brontë saw her there), Brussels, Berlin, and St Petersburg, everywhere meeting with enthusiastic applause. In 1855, during a visit to America, her health gave way; a residence at Cairo failed to restore her; and on 3d January 1858 she died at Cannes near Cannes. As an artist Rachel has never been quite equalled. In character she was neither exemplary nor altogether amiable. In her professional relations she was notoriously avaricious, and she lavished her love and her wealth on her family. She left 1,500,000 francs. See Lives by J. Janin (1858), D'Heylli (1882), and Mrs Arthur Kennard (1885). [Rah-shel.]

Racine, JEAN, was born, a solicitor's son, at La Ferté-Milon (dep. Aisne), 21st December 1639, and was sent to the college of Beauvais, whence he passed to Port Royal in 1655. Here he studied hard, and early discovered a faculty for verse-making and a liking for romance that caused his good teachers no small uneasiness. At nineteen, when he went to study philosophy at the Collège d'Harcourt, he appears to some extent to have exchanged the severity of his Jansenist upbringing for libertinism and the life of letters. He wrote an ode, La Nymphé de la Seine, on the marriage of Louis XIV., finished one piece and began another for the theatre, made the acquaintance of La Fontaine, Chapelain, and other men of letters, and assisted a cousin who was a secretary to the Duc de Luynes. In 1661 he went to Uzès in Languedoc, hoping in vain to get a benefice from his uncle, the vicar-general of the diocese. Again in Paris, he obtained in 1664 a gift from the king for a congratulatory ode. Another ode, La Renommée aux Muses, gained him the lifelong friendship of Boileau; and now began the famous friendship of 'the four'—Boileau, La Fontaine, Molière, and Racine. His earliest play, La Thébaïde ou Les Frères Ennemis, was acted by Molière's company at the Palais Royal (1664); his second, Alexandre le Grand (1665), was after its sixth performance played by the rival actors at the Hôtel de Bourgogne, which led to a rupture with Molière. Racine showed himself as hostile to Corneille. Stung by one of Nicole's Lettres

Visionnaires (1666) condemning in accordance with Port Royal ethics the romancer or dramatist as an 'empoisonneur public,' he published a clever letter to the author, full of indecent personalities. During the next thirteen years Racine produced his greatest works—Andromaque (1667); Les Plaideurs (1668), satirising lawyers; Britannicus (1669); Bérénice (1670); Bajazet (1672); Mithridate (1673), produced almost at the moment of his admission to the Academy; Iphigénie (1675), a masterpiece of pathos; and Phèdre (1677), a marvellous representation of human agony. Now the Troupe du Roi introduced an opposition Phèdre, by Phaoon, which was supported by a powerful party. Whether from mortification or from alleged conversion, Racine turned from dramatic work, made his peace with Port Royal, married in June 1677, and settled down to twenty years of domestic happiness. His wife brought him money (as well as two sons and five daughters); and he had found ample profit in the drama, besides enjoying an annual gratification that grew to 2000 livres, at least one benefice, and from 1677, jointly with Boileau, the office of historiographer-royal. In 1689 he wrote Esther for Madame de Maintenon's school-girls at Saint-Cyr; Athalie followed in 1691. Four cantiques spirituelles and an admirable Histoire abrégée de Port Royal make up Racine's literary work. In his later years he somehow lost the favour of the king. He died 21st April 1699, and was buried at Port Royal. In France Racine is regarded as the greatest of all masters of tragic pathos; this estimate does not greatly exceed the truth. He took the conventional French tragedy from the stronger hands of Corneille, and added to it all the grace of which it was capable, perfecting exquisitely its versification, and harmoniously subordinating the whole action to the central idea of the one dominant passion. But he was a far greater poet even than dramatist, fascinating by the tender sweetness of his rhythm, the finished perfection and flexibility of his cadence. Of editions may be named those of 1805, La Harpe (with commentary, 1807), Geoffroy (1808), Aimé Martin (1820), A. France (1874), and Paul Mesnard ('Les Grands Écrivains,' 8 vols. 1865-73), with a Life. The Distressed Mother was translated by Ambrose Philips (1712), and the Phædra by Edmund Smith, brought out at the Haymarket in 1707; and there is a complete metrical version by R. B. Boswell (2 vols. 1889-90). See Sainte-Beuve's Port Royal (vol. vi. 4th ed. 1878), H. M. Trollope's Corneille and Racine ('Foreign Classics,' 1881), and other works by Deltour (2d ed. 1879), Robert (2d ed. 1891), and De Grouchy (1892). [Ra-seene.]

Radcliffe, ANN (née Ward), novelist, was born in London, 9th July 1764, of respectable tradespeople with good connections. At twenty-three, at Bath, she married William Radcliffe, a graduate of Oxford and student of law, who became proprietor and editor of the weekly English Chronicle. In 1789 she published The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne, followed by A Sicilian Romance (1790), The Romance of the Forest (1791), The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794), and The Italian (1797). For the last she received £800; for its predecessor, £500. She travelled much, and her journal shows how keen an eye she had for natural scenery and ruins. She died 7th February 1823. A sixth romance, Gaston de Blondville, with a metrical tale, 'St Alban's Abbey,' and other poems, and a short Life, was published in 1826.

Radcliffe, SIR GEORGE (1593-1657), born at Thornhill near Dewsbury, studied at University College, Oxford, was called to the bar, from 1627 managed the affairs of Strafford (q.v.), shared his imprisonment, and died in exile at Flushing. See Whitaker's edition of his Correspondence (1810).

Radcliffe, JOHN (1650-1714), born at Wakefield, studied at University College, Oxford, became a fellow of Lincoln, took his M.B. in 1675, his M.D. in 1682, and in 1684 removed to London, where he soon became the most popular physician of his time, original, capricious, not too temperate. A Jacobite, he yet attended William III. and Queen Mary; in 1713 he was elected M.P. for Buckingham. He bequeathed the bulk of his large property to public uses—the Radcliffe Library, Infirmary, and Observatory, and University College at Oxford, and St Bartholomew's Hospital, London.

Radetzky, JOHANN JOSEPH, COUNT (1766-1858), born near Tabor in Bohemia, fought against the Turks in 1788-89 and in nearly all the wars between the Austrians and the French. Commander-in-chief in Lombardy from 1831, in 1848 Field-marshal Radetzky was driven out of Milan by the insurgents, but held Verona and Mantua for the Hapsburgs. Defeated at Goito, he won a victory at Custoza, and re-entered Milan. In March 1849 he almost destroyed the Sardinian army at Novara, forced Venice to surrender, and till 1857 again ruled the Lombardo-Venetian territories with an iron hand. He died at Milan. See his Denkwürdigkeiten (1887) and Briefe an Seine Tochter (1892), and works by Strack (1849), Schneidawind (1851), Schönhals (1858), Trubetzkoi (1860), Kunz (1890), and K. von Duncker (1891).

Rad'owitz, JOSEPH VON (1797-1853), born at Blankenburg in the Harz, in 1813 entered the Westphalian army, in 1823 the Prussian, and in 1830 became chief of the artillery staff. Connected by marriage with the Prussian aristocracy, he headed the anti-revolutionary party, and was Frederick-William IV.'s adviser. After 1848 the Prussian scheme of a German constitution by means of the alliance of the three kings was principally his work. He wrote several political treatises. See Lives by Frensdorff (1850) and Fischer (1874), and Hayward's Biog. Essays (1858).

Rae, JOHN, Arctic traveller, born near Stromness in Orkney, 30th September 1813, studied medicine at Edinburgh, and in 1833 became doctor to the Hudson Bay Company. In 1846-47 he made two exploring expeditions, and in 1848 he accompanied Richardson on a Franklin search voyage. In 1853-54 he commanded an expedition to King William's Land; in 1860 surveyed a telegraph line to America by the Feroes and Iceland, and visited Greenland; and in 1864 made a telegraph survey from Winnipeg over the Rockies. He died in London, 22d July 1893. [Ray.]

Rae, WILLIAM FRASER (1835-1905), studied at Heidelberg, and was called to the bar in 1861. He edited Sheridan and wrote his Life, novels, books of travel, and much on 'Junius,' Canada, &c.

Raeburn, SIR HENRY, portrait-painter, born 4th March 1756 at Stockbridge, Edinburgh, was apprenticed to a goldsmith, but took to art, producing first water-colour miniatures and then oils. At twenty-two he married the widow of Count Leslie, a lady of means, studied two years in Rome (1785-87), then settled in Edinburgh, and soon attained pre-eminence among Scottish artists. In 1814 he was elected A.R.A., in 1815

R.A.; and he was knighted by George IV. in 1822, and appointed king's limner for Scotland a few days before his death, 8th July 1823. His style was to some extent founded on that of Reynolds. Among his sitters were Scott, Hume, Boswell, 'Christopher North,' Lord Melville, Sir David Baird, Henry Mackenzie, Neil Gow, Harry Erskine, Dugald Stewart, Principal Robertson, Lord Jeffrey, and Lord Cockburn. See Life by his great-grandson, W. R. Andrew (1886); R. L. Stevenson's Virginibus Puerisque (1881); and reproductions of his portraits, edited by Dr John Brown (1873) and by W. E. Henley (1890).

Raff, JOACHIM (1822-82), composer, born at Lachen on the Lake of Zurich, in 1850-56 lived near Liszt in Weimar, taught music at Wiesbaden until 1877, and then was director of the conservatory at Frankfort-on-Main. He wrote over 200 symphonies, overtures, operas, quartets, songs, &c.; the symphonies Lenore and Im Walde are his best works. In Die Wagnerfrage (1852) he championed the new German musical school.

Raffles, SIR THOMAS STAMFORD, was born, a sea-captain's son, off Port Morant in Jamaica, 5th July 1781. In 1795 he was appointed to a clerkship in the East India House, and in 1805 secretary to an establishment at Penang. In 1811 he accompanied the expedition against Java as secretary to Lord Minto; and on its capture as lieutenant-governor completely reformed the internal administration. In 1816 ill-health brought him home to England, where he wrote his History of Java (1817), and was knighted. Lieutenant-governor of Bencoolen (1818), he formed a settlement at Singapore, but in 1824 he had again to return to England. His ship took fire off Sumatra, and his natural history collections, East Indian vocabularies, &c. perished. He founded the Zoological Society, and died 5th July 1826. See Lives by his widow (1830) and D. Boulger (1897).

Rafn, KARL CHRISTIAN (1795-1864), became sub-librarian of Copenhagen University in 1821, a professor in 1826, and founded (1825) the Northern Antiquities Society. His works include a Danish translation of Norse Sagas (1821-26) and Antiquitates Americane (1837), on the Norse discovery of America in the 10th century.

Raglan, FITZROY JAMES HENRY SOMERSET, LORD, eighth son of the fifth Duke of Beaufort, was born September 30, 1788, and in 1807 served on Wellington's staff in the Copenhagen expedition. He was his aide-de-camp in the Peninsula, in 1812 became his military secretary, and was present at all the great actions. In 1815 he lost his sword-arm at Waterloo, and was made K.C.B. He was minister-pleni-potentiary at Paris in 1815, secretary to the embassy there 1816-19, Wellington's military secretary 1827-52, and then Master-general of the Ordnance. He sat in the parliaments of 1818 and 1826 for Truro, and in 1827 was created Baron Raglan of Raglan. He went to the Crimea as commander-in-chief, and the battle of Inkermann obtained for him a field-marshal's baton; but ere long unfavourable comments were made upon his conduct of the war. During the winter of 1854-55 his soldiers suffered unspeakable privations, the fault mainly of the home authorities. On June 18, when both the English and French troops received a terrible repulse, Raglan, who had been suffering from dysentery, grew suddenly worse, and died June 28, 1855. See Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea (1863-87), and Hamley's War in the Crimea (1891).

Rahbek, KNUD LYNE (1760-1830), Danish poet and critic, was born and died in Copenhagen.

Rahel (RAHEL ANTONIE FREDRIKE LEVIN), born a Jewess at Berlin, 19th May 1771, in 1814 turned Christian and married Varuhageu von Ense (q.v.). Her house in Berlin was a gathering-place for philosophers, poets, and artists, and she encouraged the genius of Jean Paul, Tieck, Fouqué, Fichte, Hegel, Heine, Thiers, and Benjamin Constant, especially the Romanticists. Into the patriotic struggle against Napoleon she threw herself heart and soul. She died 7th March 1833. See her Correspondence (11 vols. 1833-75), and works by Schmidt-Weissenfels (1857), Mrs Jennings (1876), and Assing (1877).

Raikes, HENRY CECIL (1838-91), born at Chester, and educated at Shrewsbury and Trinity, Cambridge, was a Conservative M.P. (Chester, Preston, Cambridge University) from 1868, and Postmaster-general from 1886. He died at Llwynegryn, Mold. See Life by H. S. Raikes (1899).

Raikes, ROBERT (1735-1811), born at Gloucester, in 1737 succeeded his father as proprietor of the Gloucester Journal. His pity for the misery and ignorance of many children in his native city led him in 1780 to start a Sunday-school where they might learn to read and to repeat the Catechism. He lived to see such schools spread over England. See Lives by Gregory (1877) and Eastman (1880).

Railton, HERBERT (1857-1910), book-illustrator, was born at Plesington, Lancashire.

Rainy, ROBERT, son of a professor of Medicine in Glasgow University, was born 1st January 1826, studied at Glasgow and the New College in Edinburgh, and after being minister of the Free Church in Huntly and Edinburgh, was in 1862-1900 professor of Church History in the New (Free Church) College in Edinburgh, becoming its principal in 1874. He it was who carried the union (1900) of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches as the United Free Church. He died 21st Dec. 1906. Works were Christian Doctrine (1874), The Bible and Criticism (1878), and The Ancient Catholic Church (1902).

Rajon, PAUL ADOLPHE (1842-88), etcher, born at Dijon, and worked in Paris. [Razh-on?] Rakoczy, a princely family of Hungary and Transylvania that became extinct in 1780.

Raleigh, SIR WALTER, was born of an ancient but decayed family at the Devon manor-house of Hayes Barton near Sidmouth in 1552. He entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1566, but left, probably in 1569, to volunteer into the Huguenot cause in France, and fought at Jarnac and Montcontour. In 1578 he joined the bootless expedition of his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert; in 1580 he went to Ireland with one hundred foot to act against the rebels, and quickly attracted notice by his dash and daring. Returning to England in 1581, he now entered the court as a protégé of Leicester, whom in 1582 he accompanied to the Netherlands; and after his return he became prime favourite of the queen. She heaped favours upon him—estates, the 'farm of wines,' and a license to export woollen broadcloths. In 1584 he was knighted, in 1585 appointed Lord Warden of the Stannaries and Vice-admiral of Devon and Cornwall; that same year he entered parliament for Devon. A fleet sent out by him in 1584 to explore the American coast north of Florida took possession of a district to which Elizabeth gave the name Virginia. In 1585-87 he fitted out two more expeditions, but the colonists either returned or perished; the only results were the introduction of potatoes and tobacco into England. It is supposed that Raleigh spent £40,000 over these attempts to colonise Virginia. In 1587 the appearance at court of the handsome young Earl of Essex endangered Raleigh's place in the queen's favour, and repairing to Ireland, where he had received 42,000 acres in Munster, he set about re-peopling this tract with English settlers. He became a warm friend of the poet Spenser, visiting him at his estate at Kilcolman, and reading him his poem of The Ocean's Love to Cynthia [Elizabeth]. In his Youghal garden Raleigh planted tobacco and potatoes. He quickly recovered his influence at court, and busied himself with further schemes for reprisals on the Spaniards. His famous tract on the fight of the Revenge, which inspired Tennyson's noblest ballad, appeared anonymously in 1591. Early in 1592 Raleigh prepared a new expedition to seize the Spanish treasure-ships, but his doting mistress forbade him to sail with the fleet, which he entrusted to Frobisher and Burgh. Hardly had he got back to London when Elizabeth discovered his intrigue with Bessy Throckmorton, one of her maids-of-honour. In July he was committed to the Tower, and not for more than four years was he re-mitted to his mistress's presence. Meantime Burgh had captured the Madre de Dios, and brought her into Dartmouth. So great was the excitement that none but Raleigh could control the tumult, and he was sent down to Dartmouth with a keeper. He now married Bessy Throckmorton, and for the next two years lived with her in quiet happiness at Sherborne. About 1593 his imagination was fired by the descriptions of Guiana, with its vast city of Manoa and its El Dorado; and in 1595, with five ships, he explored the coasts of Trinidad, and sailed up the Orinoco. Early in 1596 he published The Discovery of Guiana (Hakluyt Soc. 1848). In June 1596 he sailed with Howard and Essex to Cadiz, and it was his advice that governed that splendid triumph; his Relation of Cadiz Action remains the best history of the exploit. It was 1597 before Raleigh was allowed to resume his place as Captain of the Guard. Essex was glad of his support in a new expedition against Spain, which, in July 1597, sailed from Plymouth. A desperate storm compelled many of the ships to put back, but Raleigh met Essex off the island of Flores. They agreed to attack Fayal, but Raleigh reached the harbour first, and carried the town by storm, to the great mortification of Essex. In 1600 Raleigh became governor of Jersey, and in three years did much to foster its trade. In the dark intrigues at the close of Elizabeth's reign he took little part, while Cecil and others got the ear of James, and poisoned his mind against Raleigh. Erelong Raleigh was stripped of all his offices. Possibly he may have in his haste spoken, or at least listened to, words expressing a preference for Arabella Stuart. But the only witness against him was the miserable Lord Cobham, and he made and unmade eight several charges with facility. Raleigh was arrested on 17th July 1603, and in his first despair tried to kill himself. His defence on his trial at Winchester was splendid; all his popularity came back to him from that hour. Yet he was condemned to death, and only on the scaffold was his sentence commuted to perpetual imprisonment. Within the Tower Raleigh employed himself with study and chemical experiments and with writing his History of the World (1614), whose first and only volume (in 1300 folio pages) comes down but to the second Roman war with Macedon. It was suppressed as 'too saucy in censuring the acts of kings.' Other writings of Raleigh's captivity were The Prerogative of Parliaments (written 1615, published in 1628); The Cabinet Council, published by Milton in 1658; and A Discourse of War, one of his most perfect pieces of writing. On January 30, 1616, Raleigh was released from the Tower to make an expedition to the Orinoco in search of a gold-mine. He engaged not to molest the dominions of the king of Spain. In April 1617 he sailed; but storms, desertion, disease, and death followed the expedition from the first, and ere they reached the mouth of the river Raleigh himself was stricken down by sickness and compelled to stay behind with the ships, and entrust the command to Keymis. The adventurers burned a new Spanish town, San Thomé, but never reached the mine. In the fight young Walter Raleigh was struck down; Keymis killed himself; and the father in June 1618 arrived at Plymouth with his ship, the Destiny, alone and utterly cast down. Arrested by his false cousin, Sir Lewis Stukeley, at Salisbury he penned his touching Apology for the Voyage to Guiana; but, 29th October 1618, he was beheaded at Whitehall, under the old Winchester sentence. His high courage never left him. The best edition of Raleigh's works is the Oxford one of 1829, with Lives by Oldys (1736) and Birch (1751); Sir Egerton Brydges edited his Poems in 1814, and Hannah in 1885. See Lives by Cayley (1805), Tytler (1833), Mrs Thomson (1830), Kingsley (Miscellanies, 1859), Edwards (1868), St John (1868), Louise Creighton (1877), E. Gosse (1886), Stebbing (1892), Hume (1897), Sir R. Rodd (1904), with others cited in Brushfield's Bibliography (Plym. 1886).

Ralston, WILLIAM RALSTON SHEDDEN (1828-89), Russian scholar and folklorist, his surname originally Shedden, was born in London; studied at Trinity College, Cambridge (1846-50); was called to the bar in 1862, but never practised; and in 1853-75 held a post in the British Museum library. He more than once visited Russia. Among his works are a translation of Turgenieff's Liza (1869), Kriloff and his Fables (1869), Songs of the Russian People (1872), Russian Folk-tales (1873), and Early Russian History (1874).

Rambaud, ALFRED NICOLAS (1842-1905), historian, born at Besançon, in 1896-98 was minister of public instruction. From 1870 he wrote on Russia, French civilisation, colonial France, &c., and edited the Histoire Générale du IV. Siècle jusqu'à nos Jours (12 vols. 1893 et seq.).

Rambouillet, CATHERINE DE VIVONNE, MARQUISE DE (1588-1665), born at Rome, the daughter of Jean de Vivonne, Marquis of Pisani, at twelve was married to the son of the Marquis de Rambouillet, who succeeded to the title in 1611. From the beginning she disliked alike the morals and manners of the French court. Virtuous and spirituelle, she gathered together in the famous Hôtel Rambouillet for fifty years all the talent and wit of France. See Livet's Précieux et Précieuses (4th ed. 1896) and Brunetière's Nouvelles Études (2d ed. 1886). [Ronp-boo'yay.]

Rameau, JEAN PHILIPPE (1683-1764), composer, born at Dijon, had been organist, when he settled in Paris (1721) and wrote his Traité de l'Harmonie (1722). In 1732 he produced his first opera, Hippolyte et Aricie, which created a great sensation; his best was Castor et Pollux (1737). By 1760 he had composed twenty-one operas and ballets, besides harpsichord pieces. Louis XV. made him composer of chamber music and ennobled him. See Life by Pongin (1876).—Rameau's nephew, who gave the title to a singular work by Diderot (q.v.), was Louis Sébastien Mercier (1740-1814), author of the Tableau de Paris.

Ramée, DE LA. See RAMUS and OUIDA.

Ramèses I., of the 19th Egyptian dynasty, formed a treaty with the Hitittes, and maintained the conquests of Egypt as far as Wady Halfa.—His grandson, RAMESES II., usually called the Great, defeated the Hitittes at Katesh, then formed a peace with them, and married a Hititte princess. He subjected Ethiopia, which had revolted, and established a fleet in the Mediterranean. His name and reputation formed the basis of the legendary Sesostris. His epoch appears to have been about 1322 B.C.—RAMESES III. warred with the Philistines and maritime tribes of Greece and Asia Minor, and repeated the conquest of Ethiopia. It is usual to identify the warrior king Rameses II. with the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Merenptah or Rameses III. with the Pharaoh of the Exodus, as well as with the Rhampsinitus of Herodotus. The mummy of Rameses II. was found at Deir-el-Bahari in 1881, that of Rameses III. at Boulak in 1886.

Rammohun Roy, or RAJÁ RÁM MOHÁN RÁI (1772-1833), born at Burdwar in Bengal of high Brahman ancestry, came early to question his ancestral faith, and studied Buddhism in Tibet. Revenue collector for some years in Rangpur, in 1811 he succeeded to affluence on his brother's death. He published various works in Persian, Arabic, and Sanskrit, with the aim of uprooting idolatry; and he helped in the abolition of suttee. He issued an English abridgment of the Vedanta, giving a digest of the Vedas. In 1820 he published The Precepts of Jesus, accepting the morality preached by Christ, but rejecting His deity and miracles; and he wrote other pamphlets hostile both to Hinduism and to Christian Trinitarianism. In 1828 he began the Brahma Somaj association, in 1831 visited England, where he gave valuable evidence before the Board of Control on the condition of India, and died at Bristol. See Miss Carpenter's Last Days of Rammohun Roy (1866); also Bengali memoir (1881). His English works were edited by Jogendra Chunder Ghose (1888).

Ramsay. See DALHOUSIE.

Ramsay, SIR ALEXANDER, a Scottish patriot, starved to death at Hermitage Castle in 1824 by William Douglas, the 'flower of chivalry.'

Ramsay, ALLAN, Scottish poet, born at Leadhills, Lanarkshire, October 15, 1686. His father was manager of Lord Hopetoun's mines there, and his mother, Alice Bower, was the daughter of a Derbyshire miner. At fourteen he was apprenticed to a wigmaker in Edinburgh, and followed that calling till his thirtieth year, by which time he had become known as a poet, having issued several short humorous satires printed as broadsides. He had also written (1716-18) two additional cantos to the old Scots poem of Christ's Kirk on the Green, felicitous pictures of rustic life and broad humour. Ramsay in 1726 commenced business as bookseller, later adding a circulating library—the first in Scotland. Down to 1755, when he retired, 'honest Allan's' career was eminently prosperous; though the theatre he built in Edinburgh at his own expense (1736) was almost immediately shut up by the magistrates. In 1740 he built himself a quaint house (the 'goose-pie') on the Castle Hill, and here he died 7th January 1758. His eldest son, Allan (1713-84), was a distinguished portrait-painter, settled in London, and in 1767 was appointed portrait-painter to George III. Among the elder Allan's works are: Tartana, or the Plaid (1721); Poems, published by subscription in 1721, by which it is said he realised 400 guineas; Fables and Tales (1722); Fair Assembly (1723); Health, a Poem (1724); The Tea-table Miscellany, a collection of songs (4 vols. 1724-40); The Evergreen, 'being a collection of Scots Poems wrote by the Ingenious before 1600' (1724); The Gentle Shepherd, a Pastoral Comedy (1725), his one still remembered poem; a second collection of Poems (1728); and Thirty Fables (1730). A complete edition of Ramsay's poems with a biography was published by Chalmers (1800); a good selection is that by J. Logie Robertson (1887). See the short Life by Oliphant Smeaton (1896).

Ramsay, SIR ANDREW CROMBIE (1814-91), born at Glasgow, in 1841 joined the geological survey, in 1871 became director-general, in 1881 retired with a knighthood, and died at Beaumaris. See Life by Sir Archibald Geikie (1895).

Ramsay, ANDREW MICHAEL (1656-1743), the 'Chevalier de Ramsay,' was born at Ayr, the son of a baker, served in the Low Countries, in 1710 was converted by Fénelon to Catholicism, and lived with him five years. In 1724-5 he was tutor to Prince Charles Edward; in 1730 he visited England, and was made F.R.S. and D.C.L. of Oxford. He died at St Germain. He wrote Vie de Fénelon (1723), Les Voyages de Cyrus (1727), &c.

Ramsay, EDWARD BANNERMAN BURNETT, LL.D., Dean of Edinburgh, was born in Aberdeen, 31st January 1793, the son of Alexander Burnett, Sheriff of Kincardineshire, who in 1806 succeeded to his uncle Sir Alexander Ramsay's estates, took the surname Ramsay, and was created a baronet. Young Ramsay was educated at Durham and St John's College, Cambridge, held two Somerset curacies 1816-24, and then removed to Edinburgh. In 1830 he became incumbent of St John's, and in 1846 also dean of the diocese. He died 27th December 1872. Among his works are Memoirs of Sir J. E. Smith and Dr Chalmers, Faults in Christian Believers (1859), Pulpit Table-talk (1868), and The Christian Life (1869). But the book with which his name will be always identified is the delightful Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character (1857; 22d ed. with Memoir by Cosmo Innes, 1874).

Ramsay, WILLIAM (1806-65), third son of Sir W. Ramsay, Bart., of Bamff in Perthshire, from 1831 was Glasgow professor of Humanity, and wrote Roman Antiquities, &c.—His elder brother, SIR GEORGE (1800-71), wrote on philosophy.—His son, SIR JAMES HENRY RAMSAY, born in 1832, and educated at Rugby and Christ Church, has written Lancaster and York (2 vols. 1892).

Ramsay, SIR WILLIAM, made K.C.B. in 1902, was born at Glasgow, 2d Oct. 1852. Professor of Chemistry at University College, Bristol, in 1880, he was also principal from 1881; in 1887-1912 he held the Chemistry chair at University College, London. In conjunction with Lord Rayleigh (q.v.) he discovered argon in 1894, and later he obtained helium, neon, krypton, and xenon.

Ramsden, SIR JAMES (1822-96), the creator since 1840 of Barrow-in-Furness, was its first mayor (1867), and was knighted (1872).

Ramsden, JESSE, F.R.S. (1735-1800), born at Halifax, came to London in 1755, in 1758 engaged with a mathematical instrument maker, set up on his own account about 1762, and married a daughter of John Dollond (q.v.). He improved the sextant, theodolite, equatorial, barometer, micrometer, &c., and devised the mural circle.

Ramus, PETRUS, or PIERRE DE LA RAMÉE (1515-72), humanist, born at Cuth near Soissons, became servant to a rich scholar at the Collège de Navarre, and by studying at night made rapid progress in learning. The dominant philosophy dissatisfied him, and he put higher value on 'reason' than on 'authority.' Graduating at twenty-three, he had great success as lecturer on the Greek and Latin authors, and undertook to reform the science of logic. His attempts excited much hostility among the Aristotelians, and his Dialectic (1543) was fiercely assailed by the doctors of the Sorbonne, who got it suppressed. But Cardinals de Bourbon and Lorraine had him in 1545 appointed principal of the Collège de Presles; and Lorraine in 1551 instituted a chair for him at the Collège Royal. He mingled largely in the literary and scholastic disputes of the time, and ultimately turned Protestant. He had to flee from Paris, and travelled in Germany and Switzerland; but returning to France in 1571, he perished in the massacre of St Bartholomew. He wrote treatises on arithmetic, geometry, and algebra, and was an early adherent of the Copernican system. See monographs by Waddington (1855), Desnaze (1864), and Lobstein (1878).

Rancé, ARMAND DE (1626-1700), founder of the Trappists, was an accomplished but worldly priest, to whom fell the Cistercian abbey of La Trappe (dep. Orne). He underwent a conversion, in 1662 undertook a reform of his monastery (becoming abbot), and finally established what was practically a new religious order, its principles perpetual prayer and austere self-denial.

Randall, JAMES RYDER (1839-1908), born in Baltimore, was first a teacher, then a journalist. His lyrics, which in the civil war gave powerful aid to the Southern cause, include 'Maryland, my Maryland' (1861), 'Stonewall Jackson,' and 'There's Life in the Old Land Yet.'

Randall, SAMUEL JACKSON (1828-90), Democratic statesman, a member of congress 1863-88, born in Philadelphia, died at Washington.

Randegger, CAVALIERE ALBERTO (1832-1911), composer, conductor, and singing-master, born at Trieste, settled in London in 1854, and became in 1868 professor of singing at the Royal Academy of Music, and afterwards a conductor.

Randolph, EDMUND JENNINGS (1753-1813), born at Williamsburg, Va., studied at William and Mary College, and in 1786-88 was governor of Virginia, in 1787 a member of the convention which framed the U.S. constitution. He was working at a codification of the state-laws of Virginia when Washington appointed him attorney-general (1789). In 1794 he was made secretary of state, but, falsely charged with bribery, resigned (1795), and was practically ruined. See Life by M. D. Conway (1888).

Randolph, JOHN (1773-1833), 'of Roanoke,' born at Cawsons, Va., a second cousin of Edmund Randolph, in 1799 entered congress, where he became distinguished for his eloquence, wit, sarcasm, and eccentricity. He was the Democratic leader of the House of Representatives, but quarrelled with Jefferson and opposed the war of 1812; he opposed also the Missouri Compromise and Nullification. In 1825-27 he sat in the senate, in 1830 was appointed minister to Russia. By his will he manumitted his slaves. See Lives by Garland (1850) and Adams (1882).

Randolph, SIR THOMAS, the nephew and from 1308 the comrade of Bruce, who created him Earl of Moray. He recaptured Edinburgh Castle from the English (1314), commanded a division at Bannockburn, took Berwick (1318), won the victory of Milton (1319), reinvaded England (1320, 1327), and was regent from Bruce's death (1329) till his own at Musselburgh, 20th July 1332.

Randolph, Sir Thomas (1523-90), political agent, lived abroad during Mary's reign, and by Elizabeth was engaged on diplomatic missions in Germany, Russia, France, and specially Scotland, where off and on during 1559-86 he played his mistress's cards. He was twice shot at there, and in 1581 had to flee for his life.

Randolph, Thomas (1605-35), poet and dramatist, born at Newnham near Daventry, and educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge, was elected a fellow, began early to write, gained the friendship of Ben Jonson, and led a boisterous life. He died and was buried at Blatherwick near Oundle. Randolph left a number of bright, fanciful, sometimes too glowing poems, and six plays: 'Aristippus, or the Jovial Philosopher'; 'The Conceited Peddler'; 'The Jealous Lovers'; 'The Muses' Looking-glass'; 'Amyntas, or the Impossible Dowry'; and 'Hey for Honesty'. See W. Carew Hazlitt's edition of his works (1875).

Rands, William Brighty (1823-82), 'Henry Holbeach,' 'Matthew Browne,' &c., born at Chelsea, was warehouseman, actor, lawyer's clerk, and 1857-75 parliamentary reporter. He wrote Lilliput Levee (1864), Shoemakers' Village (1867), &c.

Ranjit Singh (1780-1839), the 'Lion of the Punjab,' at twelve succeeded his father, a Sikh chief, as ruler of Lahore, and directed all his energies to founding a kingdom which should unite all the Sikh provinces. He was a firm ally of the British; in 1813 he procured from an Afghan prince, as the price of assistance in war, the Koli-i-nur. See Life by Sir L. Griffin (1892).

Ranjitsinhji, Prince, the 'Black Prince of Cricketers,' was born in Kathiawar, 10th Sept. 1872, studied at Cambridge, and succeeded as Jam Sahib of Nawanagar in 1906. He wrote a book on cricket (1897).

Ranke, Leopold von, was born in 1795 at Wiehe in Thuringia, studied at Halle and Berlin, and in 1818 became a schoolmaster at Frankfort-on-Oder, but his heart was set on the study of history. A work on the Romance and Teutonic peoples in the Reformation period, and another criticising modern history-writers, procured his call to Berlin as professor of History (1825-72). In 1827-31 he was sent to examine the archives of Vienna, Venice, Rome, and Florence. The fruits of his labours were a work on South Europe in the 16th and 17th centuries (1827), books on Servia and Venice, and History of the Popes in the 16th and 17th Centuries (1834-37; 9th ed. 1889; trans. by Sarah Austin, 1846), perhaps his greatest achievement. Then he turned his attention to central and northern Europe, and wrote on German Reformation history, Prussian history (1847-48; new ed. 1878-79), French history in the 16th and 17th centuries (1852-61), and English history in the 17th century (1859-67; 4th ed. 1877-79; trans. 1875). Other books were on the Origin of the Seven Years' War (1871), the German Powers and the Confederation (1871), the revolutionary wars of 1791-92 (1875), Venetian history (1878), a universal history (1881-88), and the history of Germany and France in the 19th century (1887), besides monographs on Wallenstein (1869), Hardenberg (1877-78), and Frederick the Great and Frederick-William IV. (1878). Ranke was ennobled in 1865, and died in Berlin, 23d May 1886. His standpoint was that of the statesman; and he fails to give due prominence to the social side of national development. His Werke have been collected (54 vols. 1868-90). See his autobiographical Zur eigenen Lebensgeschichte (1890), and monographs by Winckler (1885), Von Giesebrecht (1887), Guglia (1893), and Ritter (1895).

Rankine, William John Macquorn (1820-72), born at Edinburgh, was appointed in 1855 to the chair of Engineering at Glasgow. His works on the steam-engine, machinery, shipbuilding, applied mechanics, &c. became standard textbooks; and he did much for the new science of Thermodynamics and the theories of Elasticity and of Waves. He wrote humorous and patriotic Songs and Fables (1874). See Life by Prof. Tait prefixed to his Miscellaneous Papers (1880).

Ransome, Robert (1753-1830), born at Wells in Norfolk, in 1789 founded at Ipswich the great Orwell Works for agricultural implements.

Raphael (or RAFFAELLO SANTI) was born at Urbino, 28th or 29th March 1483, the son of the poet-painter, Giovanni Santi (d. 1494). He seems to have studied under Timoteo Viti, and then from about 1500 at Perugia under Perugino, becoming such a clever imitator of his style that to this day the early pictures of the disciple are confounded with those of his master. Among his earliest paintings were the Crucifixion (1502-3, Dudley collection), an Assumption of the Virgin (Vatican), and a Marriage of the Virgin (1504, Milan). Probably about 1504 Raphael began to discern the advantage of greater independence, yet for some time longer he showed Peruginian influence. In 1505 he went to Siena, where he assisted Pinturicchio, and next to Florence; but before starting he probably took commissions, which produced the Madonna Ansdei (National Gallery), the Madonna of Sant' Antonio, and the Madonna of Terranuova (Berlin Museum). Raphael, who now had painting-rooms at Florence and at Perugia, resolved to acquire and assimilate some of the boldness of Michelangelo and the sweetness of Leonardo. In portraiture more than elsewhere is Da Vinci's influence visible, and the likeness of Maddalena Doni (Florence) is inspired by the Mona Lisa. Of special interest is the St George, sent by the Duke of Urbino to Henry VII. of England; whilst attractive in other ways are the painter's own likeness (Uffizi) and the Madonnas of Orleans, of the Palm, of St Petersburg, and of Canigiani, in which Raphael finally appears as a pure Tuscan. The Borghese Entombment (1507) is an embodiment of all the new principles which Raphael acquired at Florence and of colour such as only Raphael could give. He became attracted by the style of Fra Bartolommeo; and, under the influence of that master, finished the Madonna del Baldacchino at Florence. Some of the best work of his Florentine period was now produced—the small Holy Family (Madrid), the St Catharine (Louvre), the Bridgewater and Colonna Madonnas, the Virgin and Sleeping Infant (Milan), the large Cowper Madonna, the Belle Jardinière, and the Estherazy Madonna.

In 1508 Raphael went to Rome at the instigation of his relative Bramante, then in high favour with Julius II., who had laid the foundation of the new cathedral of St Peter, and who caused the papal chambers to be decorated afresh because he disliked the frescoes of the older masters. The date of Raphael's engagement to paint the 'Camera' of the Vatican is now fixed as 1509. In the ceiling of the chamber 'of the Signature'

the space is divided into fields, in which the Temptation, the Judgment of Solomon, the Creation of the Planets, and Marsyas and Apollo were inserted side by side with medallions enclosing allegories of Theology, Philosophy, Justice, and Poetry. On the walls of the camera Raphael began the Disputa, in which he represented the Eternal, Christ, Mary, and the apostles and angels presiding in heaven over the Trinitarian controversy. The School of Athens, the Parnassus, and the allegory of Prudence followed. Subordinate pictures are the Pope accepting the Decretals (1511), Justinian receiving the Pandects, and Augustus saving the manuscripts of Virgil. Raphael divided his time between the labours of the Vatican and easel-pictures. The portraits of Julius II. and the Virgin of the Popolo were now executed, drawings were furnished to the copperplate-engraver Marcantonio for the Massacre of the Innocents, and Madonnas and Holy Families were composed; while on the ceiling of the chamber of Heliodorus at the Vatican he finished the picture in which the Eternal appears to Noah, Abraham's Sacrifice, Jacob's Dream, and the Burning Bush. The pontiff is introduced into the Expulsion of Heliodorus and the Mass of Bolsena. The death of Julius in 1513 but slightly interrupted the labours of the painter, who gave a noble rendering of Leo X. and his suite in the Defeat of Attila. The Deliverance of Peter closed the decorations. The constant employment of disciples enabled Raphael in the three years 1511-14 also to finish the Madonna di Foligno, the Isaiah of St. Agostino, the Galatea of the Farnesina, the Sibyls of the Pace, and the mosaics of the Popolo ordered by Agostino Chigi. He painted, too, the Madonna of the Fish (Madrid) and Madonna della Sedia (Florence), whilst in portraits such as Altoviti (Munich) and Inghirami (Florence) he rises to the perfect rendering of features and expression which finds its greatest triumph in the Leo X. (Florence). Leo selected Raphael to succeed Bramante as architect of St. Peter's in 1514, and secured from him for the Vatican chambers the frescoes of the Camera dell' Incendio, which all illustrate scenes from the lives of Leonine popes. But much of Raphael's attention was taken up with the cartoons (Kensington) executed, with help from assistants, for the tapestries of the Sistine Chapel. The first was completed in December 1516, the second woven at Brussels in 1519. His portraits of the Duke of Urbino, Castiglione, Bembo, and Navagero, and his decoration of Cardinal Bibiena's rooms at the Vatican, tell of the company which Raphael now frequented. When Leo X. succumbed to Francis I. Raphael followed the pontiff to Florence and Bologna, and found there new patrons for whom he executed the Sistine Madonna, the St. Cecilia of Bologna, and the Ezechiel of the Pitti. The labours subsequently completed were immense, including the Spasino (Madrid), the Holy Family and St. Michael, which the pope sent to the king of France in 1518, the likeness of the vicereine of Aragon, and the Violin-player (Sciarra collection at Rome). In wall-painting he produced, with help, the cycle of the Psyche legend at the Farnesina, the gospel-scenes of the Loggia of the Vatican, and the frescoes of the Hall of Constantine. His last work, the Transfiguration, was nearly finished when Raphael died, 6th April 1520. See the great work on him by Crowe and Cavalcaselle (1882); Prof. Knackfuss's monograph (1899); French works by Passavant (1860), Gruger (1863-81), and Müntz (1881-96); and German ones by Grimm (3d ed. 1896);

Rapin, PAUL DE (1661-1725), born at Castres in Languedoc, the son of the Seigneur de Thoyras, studied at the Protestant college of Saumur, and passed advocate in 1679. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) he went to Holland, enlisted in a Huguenot volunteer corps, followed the Prince of Orange to England in 1688, was made ensign in 1689, and distinguished himself at the Boyne and at Limerick. For some years he travelled as tutor with the Earl of Portland's son, then settled at Wesel, where he devoted his remaining years to the composition of his great Histoire d'Angleterre (1724), undoubtedly the best work on English history that had until then appeared. It was continued from William III.'s accession to his death by David Durant (1734), and was translated into English by Tindal (1726-31).

Rapp, GEORGE (1770-1847), founder of the Harmonists, was born in Württemberg, and emigrated with his followers to Western Pennsylvania in 1803, establishing a settlement named Harmony. After migrating to New Harmony in Indiana (1815), they returned in 1824 to Pennsylvania and built Economy on the Ohio, 15 miles NW. of Pittsburgh. Looking for the speedy second coming of Christ, the community sought to amass wealth for the Lord's use, practised rigid economy, self-denial, and celibacy, all things being held in common, and diminished in number, owned farms, dairies, and vineyards, and railway and bank shares worth millions of dollars. See German monograph by Knortz (1892).

Rapp, JEAN, COMTE DE (1772-1821), born at Colmar, entered the French army in 1788, distinguished himself in Germany and Egypt, and became aide-de-camp to Napoleon. For his brilliant charge at Austerlitz he was made general of division (1805); in 1809 he became a Count of the Empire. He accompanied the emperor on the Russian expedition, defended Danzig for nearly a year, on its surrender was sent prisoner to Russia, and did not return till 1814. In 1815 he went over to Napoleon, but after the Restoration he was made a peer. See his Memoirs (1823; new ed. 1895).

Rarey, JOHN S. (1828-66), an Ohio horse-tamer who made a great sensation in England in 1860, breaking horses thoroughly in an hour.

Rask, RASMUS CHRISTIAN (1787-1832), comparative philologist, born in Finen, had studied and written on Icelandic, Anglo-Saxon, and the Eddas, when in 1819-23 he travelled by way of St. Petersburg, the Turkoman country, and Persia to India and Ceylon. He returned to Copenhagen laden with learning and MSS., and in 1825 became professor of Literary History, in 1828 of Oriental Languages, and in 1831 of Icelandic. He also wrote on Singhalese, Frisian, &c., and on Egyptian and Hebrew chronology; his study of Icelandic (1818), with Bopp's and Grimm's works, opened up the science of comparative philology. See Lives by Petersen (1870), Rönning (1887), and Wimmer (1887).

Raspail, FRANÇOIS VINCENT (1794-1878), French chemist, doctor, and revolutionist, whose camphor-system (1845) was a forerunner of antiseptic surgery. See monograph by Saint-Martin (1877).

Raspe. See MÜNCHHAUSEN.

Rassam, HORMUZD (1826-1910), Assyriologist, born, the son of Chaldean Christians, at Mosul. He assisted Layard at Nineveh in 1845-47 and 1849-51, and succeeded him, until 1854, as British agent for Assyrian excavations, finding the palace of Assurbani-Pal (Sardanapalus). After holding political offices at Aden and Muscat, he was sent (1864) to Abyssinia, where Theodore cast him also into prison with the other captives till their release (1868). In 1876-82 he made explorations in Mesopotamia for the British Museum. He wrote on his Abyssinian experiences (1869), and did much work for the Academy, &c.

Rathbone, HANNAH MARY, née Reynolds (1798-1878), born near Wellington, Salop, married a cousin in 1817, published anonymously the clever quasi-17th-century Diary of Lady Willoughby (1844-47), and died at Liverpool.

Ratich, OF RATKE, WOLFGANG (1571-1635), born in Holstein, based a new system of education on Bacon's Advancement, which he put into practice at Köthen in 1618. A second trial at Magdeburg in 1620 ended also in failure, and after some years of ineffective wanderings he died at Erfurt. See monographs by Krause (1872), Störl (1876), Schumann (1876), and Vogt (1894); and Quick's Essays on Educational Reformers (1868; new ed. 1890).

Rattazzi, URBANO (1808-73), born at Alessandria, practised as advocate at Casale, and in 1848 entered the Second Chamber at Turin, becoming minister of the Interior and later of Justice till after Novara. In 1853 he took the portfolio of Justice under Cavour; but, accused of weakness in suppressing the Mazzinian movement, retired in 1858. In 1859 he was minister of the Interior, but retired because of the cession of Savoy and Nice (1860). Twice prime-minister for a few months (1862, 1867), he twice had to resign through his opposition to Garibaldi. See Life by Morelli (1874) and his widow's Rattazzi et son Temps (1881-87). [Rat-tat-zee.]

Rauch, CHRISTIAN DANIEL (1777-1857), born at Arolsen, practised sculpture while still valet to Frederick-William of Prussia, and in 1804 went to Rome. In 1811-15 he chiselled the recumbent effigy for the tomb of Queen Louisa at Charlottenburg; still finer is his other monument to her at Sans Souci. His works include statues of Blücher, Dürer, Goethe, Schiller, and Schleiermacher; his masterpiece is the Frederick the Great (1851) in Berlin. See Life by Eggers (1873-90; Eng. trans. Boston, 1893). [Rowkh; kh guttural.]

Raumer, FRIEDRICH LUDWIG GEORG VON (1781-1873), historian, born at Wörlitz near Dessau, entered the Prussian state service in 1801; in 1811 became professor of History at Breslau; in 1819-53 filled the chair of Political Science at Berlin; and was secretary of the Berlin Academy. In 1848 he went to Paris as German ambassador. His chief works are a history of the Hohenstaufen emperors (1823-25) and a history of Europe from the 16th century (1832-50). He also wrote books on his visits to England (1835 and 1841), Italy (1840), the United States (1845), &c. See his Autobiography and Correspondence (1861).—His brother, KARL GEORG VON RAUMER (1783-1865), became professor of Mineralogy at Breslau in 1811, and at Halle in 1819, of Natural History in 1827 at Erlangen. Besides books on physiography, geography, Palestine, geognosy, and crystallography, he wrote a great history of pedagogics (1843-51; 5th ed. 1880), part of which on the education of girls was separately published. See Autobiography (1866).—His son, RUDOLF (1815-76), Teutonic philologist, from 1846 was a professor at Erlangen. [Row'mer.]

Rauscher, JOSEPH (1797-1875), cardinal, from 1853 prince-archbishop of Vienna, opposed but ended by accepting the infallibility dogma. See his Life by Wolfsgruber (1888).

Ravachol, a vile French anarchist and dynamiter, guillotined for murder, 11th July 1892.

Ravallac, FRANÇOIS (1578-1610), a bankrupt schoolmaster, who, after long imprisonment and a brief service in the Order of Feuillans, was moved by fanaticism to stab Henry IV. (q.v.) of France. He was torn asunder by horses. See works by Loiseleur (1873) and Callandreau (1884).

Ravenscroft, THOMAS (1592-1640), composer and author of Melismata (1611), of a collection of psalm-tunes, and of The Whole Book of Psalms (1621) by various composers. Some well-known tunes, as St Davids and Bangor, are by himself.

Ravenstein, ERNST GEORG, geographer, cartographer, and statistician, born at Frankfurt 30th December 1834, came to London in 1852, and held a post in the War Office 1855-74.

Ravignan, GUSTAVE DELACHROIX DE (1795-1858), born at Bayonne, was a Jesuit professor at Mont-rouge, and became famous in 1837 as a pulpit orator by his sermons at Notre Dame in Paris. He published two defences of his order (1844-54). See memoirs by Poujoulat (1858) and De Ponleroy (1860; Eng. trans. 1873). [Ra-veen-yon'.]

Rawlinson, SIR HENRY CRESWICKE, born at Chadlington, Chipping Norton, 11th April 1810, entered the East India Company's army in 1827. In 1833-39 he helped to reorganise the Persian army, studying the while the cuneiform inscriptions, and translating Darius's Behistun inscription. He was political agent at Kandahar 1840-42, and at Bagdad from 1844, being made consul-general there in 1851. Made a K.C.B. and a director of the East India Company in 1856, in 1859 he was British minister in Persia, sat in parliament as a Conservative, and in 1876 became vice-president of the Council of India. He was P.R.G.S., was made a baronet in 1891, and died 5th March 1895. He wrote The Cuneiform Inscriptions (1850), History of Assyria (1852), Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia (1861-80), England and Russia in the East (2d ed. 1875), &c. See Life by his brother (1898).—That brother, GEORGE RAWLINSON (1812-1902), born at Chadlington, took a classical first from Trinity College, Oxford, in 1838, and was elected a fellow of Exeter in 1840. In 1859 he was Bampton Lecturer, and in 1861 became Camden professor of Ancient History, in 1872 a canon of Canterbury, and in 1888 rector of All Hallows, Lombard Street. His annotated translation of Herodotus (1858-60; 3d ed. 1876) was followed by The Five Great Eastern Monarchies (1862-67), The Sixth Great Monarchy of Parthia (1873), The Seventh or Sassanian Empire (1876), History of Ancient Egypt (1881), and Phœnicia (1889), as well as by popular works on ancient history (1861), sermons, commentaries on Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Exodus, Moses (1887), Kings of Israel and Judah (1889), and Parthia (1893).

Ray, JOHN, naturalist, born, a blacksmith's son, at Black-Notley near Braintree, 29th November 1627, in 1649 became a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and presently devoted himself to natural history. At the Restoration he accepted Episcopal ordination, but was ejected by the 'Black Bartholomew' (1662). With a pupil, Francis Willughby (q.v.), Ray travelled (1662-66) over England and Wales, the Low Countries, Germany, Italy, and France, studying botany and zoology. In 1667 he was elected F.R.S., and he contributed valuable papers to the Transactions. He settled in 1679 at the Dewlands, Black-Notley, and died there, 17th January 1705. Ray's classification of plants was practically the foundation of the 'Natural System'; his zoological works were called by Cuvier the basis of all modern zoology. He wrote Methodus Plantarum Nova (1682), Catalogus Plantarum Angliæ (1670), Historia Plantarum (1686-1704), and Synopsis Methodica Animalium (1693), besides three volumes on Birds, Fishes, and Insects, some theological works, and a collection of Proverbs (1670). See Memorials of Ray (1846) and his Correspondence (1848), both edited by Lankester for the Ray Society, founded in 1844; also the Essex Field Club Transactions, 1886-92.

Ray, MARTHA. See HACKMAN.

Rayleigh, JOHN WILLIAM STRUTT, LORD, physicist, born 12th November 1842, graduated in 1865 from Trinity College, Cambridge, as senior wrangler and Smith's prizeman, and was elected a fellow (1866). He succeeded his father as third baron in 1873; was Cambridge professor of Experimental Physics 1879-84, in 1888-1905 of Natural Philosophy at the Royal Institution; P.R.S. (1905-8); and became in 1908 chancellor of Cambridge University. O.M. (1902), P.C. (1905), he was with Sir W. Ramsay discoverer of argon (1895), and is author of The Theory of Sound (1877-78; 2d ed. 1894-96) and Scientific Papers (in progress 1912).

Raynouard, FRANÇOIS JUSTE MARIE (1761-1836), poet and philologist, born at Briguoles in Provence, was a prosperous Paris advocate, in 1791 entered the legislative assembly, joined the Girondins, and was imprisoned. His poems and tragedies were successful, and in 1807 he was elected to the Academy, of which he became perpetual secretary in 1817. Elected to the imperial legislative body in 1806 and 1811, after 1816 he wrote on the Provençal language and literature.

Reach, ANGUS BETHUNE (1821-56), born at Inverness, came to London in 1842, and wrote, besides several books, much for Punch, the magazines, papers, &c. [Re'ach.]

Read, CLARE SEWELL, of Barton Bendish, a Norfolk agriculturist and Conservative M.P. 1865-83, was born at Ketteringham in 1826.

Reade, CHARLES, novelist and playwright, was born at Ipsden House, 8th June 1814. The youngest of eleven, he came on both sides of good lineage, his father an Oxfordshire squire, his mother a clever Evangelical; from her he 'inherited his dramatic instinct.' After five years (all flogging) at Ifley, and six under two other and milder private tutors, in 1831 he gained a demyship at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1835, having taken a third class in honours, was duly elected to a lay fellowship. Next year he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1843 was called to the bar, meanwhile having made the first of many tours abroad and at home, and developed a craze for trading in violins. It was not till 1850 that he put pen seriously to paper, 'writing first for the stage—about thirteen dramas, which nobody would play.' Through one of these dramas he formed his platonic friendship with Mrs Seymour, a warm-hearted actress, who from 1854 till her death (1879) kept house for him. His life after 1852 is little except a record of the production of plays and novels, by the former of which he generally lost money, by the latter won profit and fame. The plays include Masks and Faces (1852), written with Tom Taylor; Gold (1853); Sera Nunquam (1865); and Drink (1879), an adaptation of Zola's L'Assommoir. Among his eighteen novels are Peg Woffington (1852), Christie Johnstone (1853), It is Never too Late to Mend (1856), The Cloister and the Hearth (1861, his masterpiece), Hard Cash (1863), Griffith Gwain, or Jealousy (1866), Foul Play (1869, in conjunction with Dion Boucicault), Put Yourself in his Place (1870), A Terrible Temptation (1871), and A Woman-hater (1877). His last years clouded by sorrow and ill-health, he died at Shepherd's Bush on Good Friday, 11th April 1884, and was buried in Willesden churchyard beside his 'beloved friend.' He was not one of the greatest novelists of the century, but of the second order he is perhaps the best. Charles Reade (1887), by his brother and a nephew, is not a good biography. Readiana (1882) is a collection of fragments; and there were Extracts from his works (1891) by Mrs Ireland. See Swinburne's Miscellanies (1886), and Coleman's Charles Reade as I knew Him (1903).

Réaumur, RENÉ ANTOINE FERCHAULT DE (1683-1757), physicist, born at La Rochelle, at Paris (1703) attracted attention by three geometrical memoirs, became in 1708 a member of the Academy of Sciences, and superintended an official Description des Arts et Métiers. He made researches in natural history, as to the woods, rivers, and mines, and in metallurgy and glass-making. His thermometer (with spirit instead of mercury) has eighty degrees between the freezing and boiling points. [Ray-o-meer.]

Récamière, MADAME (née JEANNE FRANÇOISE JULIE ADELAIDE BERNARD), born at Lyons 4th December 1777, in 1793 married a rich banker thrice her own age. Her salon was soon filled with the brightest wits of the day, but she possessed a temperament that almost saved her from scandal. When her husband was ruined she visited Madame de Staël at Coppet (1806). Here she met Prince August of Prussia, who seems to have touched her heart. A marriage was arranged, provided M. Récamière would consent to a divorce. He would, but Madame could not desert him in adversity. The most distinguished friend of her later years was Chateaubriand. She died 11th May 1849. See her Souvenirs et Correspondance (1859), and the very full Life of her by E. Herriot (trans. by Alys Hallard in 1906). [Ray-kam-yayf.]

Reclus, MICHEL ÉLIE (1827-1904), scientist and anarchist, was born in Gironde, and trained for the Protestant ministry.—His better-known brother, JEAN JACQUES ÉLISÉE (1830-1905), geographer, born at Ste-Foix-la-Grande, Gironde dept., was educated at Montauban and Berlin. An extreme Democrat, he left France after the coup d'état of 1851, and spent seven years in England, Ireland, and America. He returned in 1858, and published Voyage à la Sierra Nevada de Ste Marthe (1861), &c. For his share in the Commune (1871) he was banished. In Switzerland he began his masterpiece, Nouvelle Géographie Universelle (19 vols. 1876-94; Eng. trans. by Ravenstein and A. H. Keane). He wrote also a physical geography, La Terre (1867-68; trans. 1871 and 1887), Histoire d'un Ruissseau (1866), Les Phénomènes Terrestres (1873), and Histoire d'une Montagne (1880; trans. 1881). In 1893 he became a professor at Brussels. [Reh-klée'.]

Recorde, ROBERT (c. 1510-58), mathematician, born at Tenby, studied at Oxford, in 1545 took his M.D. at Cambridge, became physician to Edward VI. and Queen Mary, but died in the debtors' prison. His works include The Grounde of Artes (1540), an arithmetic; Pathwaye to Knowledge (1551), an abridged Euclid; Castle of Knowledge (1551), on astronomy; and Whetstone of Wit (1557), an important treatise on algebra.

Redding, CYRUS (1785-1870), journalist, editor, biographer, novelist, &c., was born at Penryn, and came to London about 1806.

Redgrave, RICHARD, C.B. (1804-88), subject-painter, was elected A.R.A. in 1840, R.A. in 1851, and from 1857 was Inspector-general of Art Schools. He wrote, with his brother, SAMUEL (1802-76), A Century of English Painters (1866; 2d ed. 1890), and edited several valuable catalogues. See Richard Redgrave, by his daughter (1891).

Reding, ALOYS VON (1765-1818), as captain-general of his own canton, Schwyz, repulsed the French at Morgarten (1798).

Redmond, JOHN EDWARD, born 1st Sept. 1856, the son of a Wexford M.P., and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was called to the bar at Gray's Inn 1886, and entered parliament 1881; since 1900 he has headed the Nationalists. His Historical and Political Addresses appeared in 1898.

Redwitz, OSKAR, FREIHERR VON (1823-91), a Bavarian poet, playwright, and romance-writer, till about 1855 a strong ultramontane.

Reed, SIR EDWARD JAMES (1830-1906), F.R.S., K.C.B., was chief constructor of the navy 1863-70, Liberal M.P. for Cardiff, and Lord of the Treasury 1886.—His son, EDWARD TENNYSON REED (b. 1800), was educated at Harrow, began to draw for Punch in 1889, and was put on the staff in 1890.

Reed, ISAAC (1742-1807), editor of Shakespeare.

Reed, THOMAS GERMAN (1817-88), born at Bristol, in 1844 married PRISCILLA HORTON (1818-95), and with her in 1855 started a well-known London entertainment, in which they were aided (1860-77) by the actor-singer JOHN ORLANDO PARRY (1810-79). See book by Williamson (1895).

Rees, ABRAHAM, D.D., F.R.S. (1743-1825), Unitarian minister from 1783 at the Old Jewry, was born at Llanbrynmair, and compiled an Encyclopædia on the basis of Ephraim Chambers's.

Reeve, CLARA (1729-1807), born at Ipswich, the daughter of the rector of Freston, translated Barclay's Argenis (1772), and wrote The Champion of Virtue, a Gothic Story (1777), renamed The Old English Baron, which was avowedly an imitation of Walpole's Castle of Otranto. She wrote four other novels and The Progress of Romance (1785).

Reeve, HENRY, C.B. (1813-95), born at Norwich, was registrar of the Privy Council 1843-87, and editor of the Edinburgh Review from 1855. He edited the Greville Memoirs, &c. See Life by Prof. Loughton (1898).

Reeves, JOHN (1752-1829), born in London, and educated at Eton and Oxford, was chief-justice of Newfoundland (1791-92), a king's printer (1800), superintendent of aliens (1803-14), and law clerk to the Board of Trade. He published much on law, and a Bible with selected scholia (1825).

Reeves, JOHN SIMS (1818-1900), born at Shooter's Hill, appeared as a baritone at Newcastle in 1839, and acquired fresh fame as a tenor. He studied at Paris (1843), sang at Milan, and was recognised as the first English tenor. Leaving the stage in 1860, he sang at concerts and in oratorio. See Life by Sutherland Edwards (1881) and his own My Jubilee (1889).

Reeves, Mrs. See MATHERS, HELEN.

Reeves, WILLIAM, D.D. (1815-92), born at Charleville, Co. Cork, became in 1886 Bishop of Down. He wrote on Irish ecclesiastical antiquities, and edited Adamnan's Life of Columba. See Life by Lady Ferguson (1894).

Reger, MAX, composer, born at Brand, Bavaria, in 1873, taught music at Wiesbaden and Munich, and became Director of Music in Leipzig University (1907), and professor (1908).

Regiomontanus (1436-76), the name given from his Franconian birthplace, Königsberg (Mons Regius), to the mathematician and astronomer Johann Müller. He studied at Vienna, and in 1461 accompanied Cardinal Bessarion to Italy to learn Greek. In 1471 he settled in Nuremberg, where the patrician Bernhard Walther subsidised him. The two laboured at the 'Alphonsine Tables,' and published Ephemerides 1475-1506 (1473), of which Columbus made much use. He established the study of algebra and trigonometry in Germany, and wrote on water-works, burning-glasses, weights and measures, the quadrature of the circle, &c. He was summoned to Rome in 1474 by Sixtus IV. to help to reform the calendar, and died there. See German Life by Ziegler (1874).

Regnard, JEAN FRANÇOIS (1655-1709), comic dramatist, a rich Paris shopkeeper's son, found himself at twenty master of a considerable fortune, and set out on his travels. In his autobiographical romance, La Provençale, we read of his and his Provençal mistress's capture and sale as slaves by Algerian corsairs, their bondage at Constantinople, their ransom, &c. After wanderings even to Lapland, he found his vocation in the success of Le Divorce at the Théâtre Italien in 1688. Le Joueur (1696), a hit at the Théâtre Français, was followed by Le Distrain (1697), Le Retour Imprévu (1700), Les Folies Amoureuses (1704), and his masterpiece Le Légataire Universel (1708). There are editions by Didot (1820), Michiels (1854), Fournier (1875), and Moland (1893). See German study by Mahrenholtz (1887), and Bibliographie by Marchéville (1877). [Ray-nahr'.]

Regnault, HENRI VICTOR (1810-78), chemist and physicist, born at Aix-la-Chapelle, was a shop-assistant in Paris and a professor at Lyons, whence, in 1840, he was recalled to Paris as a member of the Academy of Sciences. Having filled chairs in the École Polytechnique and the Collège de France, he became in 1854 director of the Sèvres porcelain factory. He investigated gases, latent heat, steam-engines, &c., and published a Cours Élémentaire de Chimie (14th ed. 1871). See Éloge by Dumas (1881).—His son, HENRI (1843-71), painter of mythological, Spanish, and Moorish subjects, was born in Paris, and after two unsuccessful attempts gained the prix de Rome in 1866. From Rome he passed on in 1868 to Spain, where, as afterwards in Tangier, he found subjects of that picturesque character best suited to his genius. In 1869 he painted his equestrian portrait of Prim; in 1870 his 'Salome' and 'Moorish Execution.' He returned to Paris on the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, volunteered as a private soldier, and fell at Buzenval. See Lives by Cazalis (1872) and Marx (1887), and his Correspondance (1873). [Ray-nô'.]

Régnier, MATHURIN (1573-1613), satirist, born at Chartres, was tonsured at nine, but grew up dissipated and idle, obtained a canonry at Chartres, and enjoyed the favour of Henry IV. His whole work scarce exceeds 7000 lines—sixteen satires, three epistles, five elegies, and some odes, songs, epigrams, &c.—yet it places him high among French poets. He is greatest in his satires, admirably polished, but vigorous and original. Editions are by Poitevin (1860), Barthélemy (1862), and Courbet (1875). See Cherrier's Bibliographie (1889), and Life by Vianey (1896). [Ray-n-yaf'.]

he defeated the Carthaginian fleet, then landed, and, at first victorious, at last suffered a total defeat and was taken prisoner (255). He remained five years in captivity, until, reverses inducing the Carthaginians to sue for peace, he was released on parole and sent to Rome with the Punic envoys. He successfully dissuaded the senate from agreeing to their proposals, then, according to legend, returned to Carthage, and was put to death with horrible tortures.

Regulus, or RULE, Sr, according to legend a monk of Constantinople or bishop of Patras, who in 347 A.D. came to Muckross or Kilmont (afterwards St Andrews), bringing relics of St Andrew from the East. For the possible identification of him with an Irish St Riagail of the 6th century, see Skene's Celtic Scotland (1877).

Rehan, ADA, American comédienne, born at Limerick, 22d April 1860, was taken as a child to the States, made her début at fifteen, and first played in London with Daly's company in 1888.

Reichenbach, GEORG VON (1772-1826), a Munich astronomical instrument maker, born at Durlach. See Life by Bauernfeind (1883).

Reichenbach, HEINRICH GOTTLIEB (1793-1879), botanist and zoologist, from 1820 professor at Dresden.—His son, HEINRICH GUSTAV (1824-89), also a botanist, was a Hamburg professor from 1862. He wrote on orchids. [Ri-hen-bach.]

Reichenbach, KARL, BARON VON (1788-1869), born at Stuttgart, in 1821-34 made a fortune as a manufacturer at Blansko in Moravia. He worked at the compound products of the distillation of organic substances, and discovered paraffin (1830) and creosote (1833). Studying animal magnetism, he discovered, as he thought, a new force, which he called Od, intermediate between electricity, magnetism, heat, and light, and recognisable only by the nerves of sensitive persons. He wrote on the geology of Moravia, on magnetism, and several works on 'odic force' (1852-58). See Lives by Schrötter (1869) and Fehner (1876).

Reichstadt, DUKE OF. See NAPOLEON II.

Reid, SIR GEORGE, born at Aberdeen, 31st October 1841, became an A.R.S.A. in 1870, an R.S.A. in 1877, and from 1891 (when he was knighted) to 1902 was P.R.S.A. He is best known by his portraits, but has also produced admirable landscapes and book illustrations.

Reid, SIR JOHN WATT, K.C.B. (1882), born in Edinburgh, 10th May 1823, became a naval surgeon in 1845, and was medical director-general of the navy 1880-88.

Reid, or ROBERTSON, JOHN (1721-1807), of Perthshire stock, entered the army in 1745, rose to be general, was a flute-player and composer, and left £50,000 to found a chair of music at Edinburgh.

Reid, CAPTAIN MAYNE, writer of boys' stories, born at Ballyrone, Co. Down, 4th April 1818, in 1840 emigrated to New Orleans, and served in the U.S. army during the Mexican war (1847). Returning to England in 1849, he settled down to a literary life in London, Bucks, and Herefordshire, and died 22d Oct. 1883. His vigorous style and profusion of hairbreadth 'scapes delighted his readers. Among his books were the Boy Hunters (1853), Boy Tar (1859), Scalp Hunters (1851), Rifle Rangers (1850), War Trail (1857), and Headless Horseman (1866). See Life by widow (1900).

Reid, THOMAS, head of the Scottish school of Philosophy, was born, 26th April 1710, at Strachan manse, Kincardineshire, took his M.A. at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1726, and was college librarian 1733-36. He then visited Oxford, Cambridge, and London, and in 1737 became minister of New Machar in Aberdeenshire. In 1739 appeared Hume's Treatise on Human Nature, which determined Reid to seek a new foundation for the common notions as to a material world; and he became the chief of a school whose aim was to deliver philosophy from scepticism, by resting finally on principles of intuitive or a priori origin. In 1752 he became professor of Philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen, in 1763 of Moral Philosophy at Glasgow; and in 1764 he published his Inquiry into the Human Mind. He retired from the duties of his chair in 1780. In 1785 the Philosophy of the Intellectual Powers appeared, in 1788 the Active Powers. He died 7th October 1796. See Life by Dugald Stewart in Reid's works (1803), the edition by Sir W. Hamilton (1853), and sketch by A. C. Fraser (1899).

Reid, SIR THOMAS WEMYSS, LL.D., born at Newcastle in 1842, edited the Leeds Mercury 1870-87, then was manager to Messrs Cassell, and in 1890-99 editor of the Speaker. Knighted in 1894, he died in Feb. 1905. He wrote Lives of Charlotte Brontë, Mr Forster, and Lord Houghton, a book about Tunis, two or three novels, &c.

Reid, SIR WILLIAM (1791-1858), writer on winds and storms, born at Kinglassie, Fife, served with high distinction in the Peninsular war, and was governor of Bermuda, the Windwards, and Malta.

Reimarus, HERMANN SAMUEL (1694-1768), born at Hamburg, from a mastership at Wismar was called in 1728 to an Oriental chair in his native city. His famous Wolfenbüttelsche Fragmente eines Ungenannten, first published by Lessing (q.v.) in 1774-78, denied the supernatural origin of Christianity. He wrote also on natural religion. See monograph by Strauss (1860; 2d ed. 1878; trans. by Voysey, 1879). [Ri-mah'roos.]

Reinecke, KARL (1824-1910), pianist and composer, born at Altona, from 1860 to 1895 was leader of the Leipzig Gewandhaus orchestra. See German monograph on him by Wasielewski (1890).

Reinhold, KARL LEONHARD (1758-1823), Kantian philosopher, born in Vienna, died at Kiel.

Reinkens, JOSEPH HUBERT (1821-96), born at Burtscheid, became a professor at Breslau (1853) and 'Old Catholic' bishop at Bonn (1873).

Reiske, JOHANN JAKOB (1716-74), Greek and Arabic scholar, born at Zörbig, died at Leipzig.

Remak, ROBERT (1815-65), physician, born in Posen, from 1859 a Berlin professor, studied with the microscope in pathology and embryology, and wrote on the medical uses of electricity.

Rembrandt was merely the baptismal name of Rembrandt Harmenszoon, born 15th July 1607 at Leyden, the son of a prosperous miller, Harmen Gerritszoon. From his twelfth or thirteenth year he studied painting under various masters, returning to his father's house about 1623. He began his career as an etcher very early, and etched beggars and picturesque heads, including his own; also 'Christ presented in the Temple.' In 1630 he went to Amsterdam, where he set up a studio and took pupils. Already one of the most industrious and productive artists, Rembrandt found time to paint a number of portraits and biblical subjects and to etch forty plates in the year 1631. A masterpiece, 'The Anatomical Lesson,' dates from 1632. In 1634 he married Saskia van Ulenburgh (1618-42), whom we know by the portraits her husband made of her. The year of her death produced the famous 'Night Watch'—An important branch of his art from 1643 to 1650 was landscape, which he continued to practise more or less till 1659. It is not precisely known what were the causes of Rembrandt's bankruptcy in 1656. His art became unfashionable; but he did not relax his diligence. He died October 8, 1669, after continuing to work with constant energy and undiminished power, his total works numbering some 500 paintings, 600 drawings and studies, and 353 etchings. Rembrandt's fame has increased, notwithstanding unintelligent censure and praise. He was not blind to the merits of Italian art, but his own practice was founded on the direct study of nature, both in human life and landscape. His chiaroscuro is often false and inconsistent, but though arbitrary it is always conducive to his purpose. No artist ever combined more delicate skill with more energy and power. His treatment of mankind is full of human sympathy for all ages and conditions, but his especial study was old age. See French Lives by Vosmaer (2d ed. 1877) and Michel (1893); Eng. trans. 1893; monographs on the etchings by Middleton (1878), Haden (1879), and Hamerton (1894); works by W. Bode (1897-1908); and Bolton's Saskia (1893).

Remigius, Sr. See REMY.

Remington, PHILIP, inventor, born at Litchfield, N.Y., 31st Oct. 1816, entered his father's small-arms factory, and for twenty-five years superintended the mechanical department. The perfecting of the Remington breech-loading rifles and the Remington type-writer was largely due to him. He died in 1889.

Rémusat, ABEL (1788-1832), Chinese scholar, born at Paris, took his diploma in medicine in 1813, but in 1811 had published an essay on Chinese literature. In 1814 he was made professor of Chinese in the Collège de France. Among his numerous works are one on the Tartar tongues (1820) and his great Grammaire Chinoise (1822). He wrote also on Chinese writing (1827), medicine, topography, and history, and Mélanges (1843). In 1822 he founded the Société Asiatique, and in 1824 became curator of the Oriental Department in the Bibliothèque Royale.

Rémusat, CHARLES FRANÇOIS MARIE, COMTE DE, was born at Paris, 14th March 1797, son of the Comte de Rémusat (1762-1823), who was chamberlain to Napoleon. He early developed Liberal ideas, and took to journalism. He signed the July Revolution, was elected deputy for Toulouse, and in 1836 became under-secretary of state for the Interior, in 1840 minister of the Interior. Exiled after the coup d'état, he devoted himself to literary and philosophical studies, till, in 1871, Thiers called him to the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, which he retained until 1873. He died June 6, 1875. Among his writings are Essais de Philosophie (1842); Abélard (1845); L'Angleterre au XVIII^e Siècle (1856); studies on St Anselm (1853), Bacon (1857), Channing (1857), John Wesley (1870), and Lord Herbert of Chesham (1874); Histoire de la Philosophie en Angleterre de Bacon à Locke (1875); and two philosophical dramas, Abélard (1877) and La Saint Barthélemy (1878). See his Correspondance (1883-86). The Mémoires (1879-80) and Lettres (1881) of his mother, CLAIRE, COMTESSE DE RÉMUSAT (1780-1821), dame du palais to Josephine, both translated into English, throw a flood of light on the society of the First Empire and the character of Napoleon.

Remy, Sr (c. 438-538), Bishop of Rheims.

Renan, ERNEST, born at Tréguier in Brittany,

27th February 1823, till his sixteenth year was trained for the church there, wholly under clerical influences. He was one of the lads chosen in 1836 by the Abbé Dupanloup for the Catholic seminary of St Nicolas du Chardonnet in Paris, whence, after three years, he was transferred to St Sulpice and its branch at Issy. As the result of the study of Hebrew and of German criticism, traditional Christianity became impossible for him; in 1845 he quitted St Sulpice and abandoned all thoughts of the church as a profession. By his elder sister Henriette's assistance and counsel he was enabled to follow out his purpose, a life of study untrammelled by creeds or formularies. In 1850 he obtained a post in the Bibliothèque Nationale, and having become known through mémoires on Oriental studies, in 1860 he was made one of a commission sent by government to study the remains of Phœnician civilisation. In 1861 he was chosen professor of Hebrew in the Collège de France; but the emperor, inspired by the clerical party, refused to ratify the appointment; and it was not until 1870 that he was established in the chair. In 1878 he was elected to the Academy. His work as author began with a paper (1847), developed into his Histoire Générale des Langues Sémitiques (1854). Averroës et l'Averroïsme (1852) proved his familiarity with the life and thought of the middle ages. And he wrote frequent essays, afterwards collected in his Études d'Histoire Religieuse (1856) and Essais de Morale et de Critique (1859). But his European reputation dates from the publication of the Vie de Jésus (1863), first in the series which its author regarded as the special work of his life, the Histoire des Origines du Christianisme. None of the other volumes excited the extraordinary interest of the first. In the Vie de Jésus the combined weakness and strength of Renan's method were exaggerated to caricature. Of the volumes that followed, those on St Paul (1869) and Marcus Aurelius (1882) are specially noteworthy. In completion of his life's task Renan undertook a history of the people of Israel (5 vols. 1887-94). Other works are books on Job (1858), the Song of Solomon (1860), Ecclesiastes (1882), Études d'Histoire Religieuse, Questions Contemporaines, La Réforme Intellectuelle et Morale, Dialogues Philosophiques, Drames Philosophiques, Souvenirs d'Enfance (1883), Le Prêtre de Nemé (1885), L'Abbesse de Jouarre (1888), L'Avenir de Science (1890), and Ma Sœur Henriette (1895; trans. as Brother and Sister, 1896). He died 2d October 1892. Madame Renan (1838-94), whom he married in 1856, was a niece of Ary Scheffer. Whatever may be the judgment of time on the intrinsic value of Renan's contribution to the sum of knowledge, he can never lose his place among the few great names in the history of letters. In London he delivered the Hibbert Lectures (1880), The Influence of Rome on Christianity. See Sainte-Beuve's Nouveaux Lundis (tome ii.), Scherer's Études sur la Littérature Contemporaine (tome viii.), F. W. H. Myers' Modern Essays (1883), Life by Mme. Darmesteter (1897), and books by Grant-Duff and Father Barry (1905).

Renaudot, THÉOPHRASTE (1586-1653), a Protestant doctor, born at Loudun, settled in Paris in 1624, in 1631 founded the first French newspaper, the Gazette de France, also started the earliest Mont-de-Piété (1637), and advocated gratis dispensaries. See Life by Bonnefont (1893).

René I., 'THE GOOD' (1409-80), failed in his efforts (1438-42) to make good his claim to the crown of Naples, married his daughter to Henry VI. of England (1445), and ultimately devoted himself to Provençal poetry and agriculture at Aix. See Life by Lecoy de la Marche (Par. 1875).

Reni, GUIDO. See GUIDO.

Rennell, JAMES (1742-1830), geographer, served first in the navy and then as major in the engineers in the East India Company's army, and was surveyor-general of Bengal. He wrote books and memoirs on ocean currents, India, Africa, Troy, Cyrus's expedition, Western Asia, and one on the Geographical System of Herodotus (1800). See Life by Sir Clements Markham (1895).

Rennie, JOHN, civil engineer, born at Phantassie farm, East Lothian, 7th June 1761, after working as a millwright studied at Edinburgh University 1780-83. In 1784 he entered the employment of Messrs Boulton & Watt; in 1791 he started in London on his own account as an engineer, and soon became famous as a bridge-builder—building those of Kelso (1803), Leeds, Musselburgh, Newton-Stewart, Boston, and New Galloway, with the Southwark and Waterloo Bridges over the Thames (1811-17), and the plans for London Bridge. He made many important canals; drained fens; assisted in the Bell Rock lighthouse; designed the London Docks, and others at Blackwall, Hull, Liverpool, Dublin, Greenock, and Leith; and improved harbours and dockyards at Portsmouth, Chatham, Sheerness, and Plymouth, where he constructed the celebrated breakwater (1811-41). He died October 4, 1821, and was buried in St Paul's. See Smiles's Lives of the Engineers (1874).—His eldest son, GEORGE (1791-1866), was superintendent of the machinery of the Mint, and aided his father. With his brother John he carried on an immense business—shipbuilding, railways, bridges, harbours, docks, machinery, and marine engines.—JOHN (1794-1874), knighted in 1831 on the completion of London Bridge, was engineer to the Admiralty. See his Autobiography (1875). He published British and Foreign Harbours (1854) and a monograph on Plymouth breakwater (1848).

Renouf, SIR PETER LE PAGE (1822-97), born in Guernsey, studied at Pembroke College, Oxford, turned Catholic in 1842, was a professor in Ireland 1855-64, a school-inspector 1864-85, and keeper of Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities at the British Museum 1885-91. He wrote on the language and religion of ancient Egypt, Pope Honorius, &c. He was knighted in 1896.

Renwick, JAMES, born at Moniaive, Dumfriesshire, 15th February 1662, studied at Edinburgh University, joined the Cameronians, proclaimed the Laniark Declaration (1682), and was sent to complete his studies in Holland. In 1683 he preached his first sermon at Darnead Moss near Cambusnethan; in 1684 he was outlawed for his Apologetic Declaration. On the accession of James II. (1685) Renwick published at Sanquhar a declaration rejecting him. A reward of £100 was offered for his capture; he was hunted from place to place, and at last was captured in Edinburgh, and executed 17th February 1688. See Life by Simpson (1843). [Ren'nik.]

Renwick, JAMES, LL.D. (1790-1863), born at Liverpool of Scoto-American parentage, in 1820-53 was professor of Chemistry and Physics in Columbia College, N.Y., in 1838 was appointed a commissioner to explore the boundary-line between Maine and New Brunswick. Among his works are Outlines of Natural Philosophy (1822-23), a Treatise on the Steam-engine (1830), several books on Mechanics, and Lives of De Witt Clinton, Jay and Hamilton, &c. One of his sons, JAMES (1818-1895), was architect of Grace Church and St Patrick's Cathedral, New York; other buildings from his designs are the Smithsonian Institution, Vassar College, &c.

Repton, HUMPHRY (1752-1818), landscape-gardener, born at Bury St Edmunds, from 1783 lived at Romford. He wrote a dozen works.

Reshid Pasha (1802-58), Turkish statesman.

Retz, JEAN PAUL DE GONDI, CARDINAL DE (1614-79), born at Montmirail, was bred for the church in spite of amours, duels, and political intrigues. He became in 1643 coadjutor to his uncle, the Archbishop of Paris, plotted against Mazarin, and instigated the outbreak of the Fronde in 1648. He received a cardinal's hat, but in 1652 was flung into prison. After two years he made his escape, wandered in Spain and England, appeared at Rome, and in 1662 made his peace with Louis XIV. by resigning his claim to the archbishopric in exchange for the abbacy of St Denis and restoration to his other benefices. His debts (four millions of francs!) he provided for in 1675 by making over to his creditors his entire income save 20,000 livres. Retz figures pleasingly in the letters of Madame de Sévigné. His own wasterly Mémoires (1655; best ed. in 'Les Grands Écrivains,' 10 vols. 1872-90) throw much light on the Fronde. See works by Curnier (1863), Topin (3d ed. 1872), Chantelauze (1878-79), Gazier (1876), Normand (1895), Ogg (1912). [Fr. pron. Raiss.]

Retz, RAIS, OR RAIZ, GILLES DE (1404-40), a Breton of high rank who fought by the side of the Maid at Orleans, became marshal of France at twenty-five, but soon retired to his estates, where for over ten years he is alleged to have indulged in the most infamous orgies, kidnapping 150 children, who were sacrificed to his lusts or sorceries. He was hanged and burned at Nantes, after a trial closed by his own confession. See Life by Bossard (1886), Baring-Gould's Were-Wolves (1865), and Vizetelly's Bluebeard (1902).

Retzsch, FRIEDRICH AUGUST MORITZ (1779-1857), painter and engraver, born in Dresden, became a professor there in 1824. He acquired great celebrity by his etchings in outline of Schiller, Goethe, Fouqué, and Shakespeare. His masterpiece is 'The Chess-players.'

Reuchlin, JOHANN, humanist and Hebraist, born at Pforzheim, 22d Feb. 1455, as travelling companion to a prince of Baden visited Paris, where he studied Greek, at Basel wrote his Latin dictionary (1476), made a second sojourn in France, and in 1481 set up as lecturer at Tübingen. In 1482, 1490, and 1498 he was in Italy on state business; in 1492 we find him studying Hebrew under a learned Jewish court-physician. In 1496 Reuchlin went to Heidelberg, where he became the main promoter of Greek studies in Germany; in 1500 he received a judicial appointment at Stuttgart. In 1506 appeared his Rudimenta Lingue Hebraice. In 1510 Pfefferkorn, a Jewish renegade, urged the emperor to burn all Jewish books except the Old Testament; and Reuchlin's contention that no Jewish books should be destroyed except those directly written against Christianity drew on him the enmity of the Dominicans of Cologne, especially of the inquisitor Hoogstraten; but all the independent thinkers in Germany (see HUTTEN) were on his side; and the Duke of Bavaria appointed him in 1519 professor at Ingolstadt. He died 30th June 1522. Reuchlin edited various Greek texts, published a Greek grammar, a whole series of polemical pamphlets, and a satirical drama (against the Obscurantists), and in De Verbo Mirifico and De Arte Cabalistica shows a theosophico-cabbalistic tendency. See books on him by Barham (1843), Geiger (1871), Horawitz (1877), and Holstein (1888). [Koikh-lin; kh guttural.]

Reumont, ALFRED VON (1808-87), historian, was born and died at Aix-la-Chapelle, having from 1829 to 1860 followed a diplomatic career, chiefly in Italy. His numberless works deal mainly with Italian history; one, Lorenzo de' Medici, appeared in English in 1876. [Roi-mont.]

Reuss, EDUARD (1804-91), Protestant theologian, born at Strasburg, was a Theological professor there 1836-38, and again after the re-establishment of the university in 1872-88. His chief works are a history of the New Testament (in German, 1842; 6th ed. 1887; Eng. trans. 1884) and of the Old (1881); and La Théologie Chrétienne au Siècle Apostolique (1852; 3d ed. 1864; trans. 1872-74), Histoire du Canon des Saintes Ecritures (1862; trans. 1884), and La Bible, a new translation and commentary (1877-79). [Roiss.]

Reuter, Fritz, Plattdeutsch humorist, born at Stavenhagen in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 7th November 1810, studied law at Rostock and Jena. In 1833 he was condemned to death—with other Jena students he had indulged in wild talk about the fatherland—a sentence commuted to thirty years' imprisonment. Released in 1840, with his career spoilt and his health ruined, he tried to resume his legal studies, learned farming, and taught pupils. His rough Plattdeutsch verse setting of the jokes and merry tales of the country-side, Läuschen un Rimels (1853), became at once a great favourite; another humorous poem, Reis' nah Bellingen (1855), was equally successful. Next came a second volume of Läuschen un Rimels (1858), and the tragic poem Kein Hüsung (1858), picturing the wretchedness of the semi-serfs on the great Mecklenburg domains. The rest of his best works, except the poem Hanne Nüte (1860), were all written in Low German prose. Ut de Franzoesentid (1860; Eng. trans. as The Year '13, 1873), Ut mine Festungstid (1862), and his masterpiece, Ut mine Stromtid (1862-64), gave him fame abroad through all Germany, and lifted him to the position of Germany's greatest humorist next after Jean Paul. Ut mine Festungstid is a record of the miserable seven years he spent in prison. He also wrote Schurr Murr (1861), Dörchlüchting (1866), the satirical Urgeschicht von Mecklenborg (1874), &c. He lived at Eisenach from 1863, and there he died, 12th July 1874. See Wilbrandt's biography in the Werke (15 vols. 1868-75), and works by Glagan (2d ed. 1875), Ebert (1874), Gaedertz (1890 and 1900), Römer (1895), Raatz (1895), Brandes (1899). [Roi-ter.]

Reuter, PAUL JULIUS, FRIEHR VON, born at Cassel, 21st July 1821, in 1849 formed at Aix-la-Chapelle an organisation for transmitting by telegraph commercial news. In 1851 he fixed his headquarters in London; and gradually he multiplied the ramifications of his system till it embraced the remotest regions. In 1865 he converted his business into a limited liability company, and in 1871 was made a baron by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. He died at Nice, 25th Feb. 1899.

Revere, PAUL (1735-1818), hero of a poem by Longfellow, was born in Boston, Mass., and after serving as lieutenant of artillery (1756), followed the trade of goldsmith and copperplate printer. He was one of the party that destroyed the tea in Boston harbour, and he was at the head of a secret society formed to watch the British. On April 18, 1775, the night before Lexington and Concord, he rode from Charlestown to Lexington and Lincoln, rousing the minutemen as he went. In the war he became lieutenant-colonel of artillery. In 1801 he founded the Revere Copper Company at Canton, Mass. See Life by Goss (2 vols. 1892). [Ri-veer'.]

Révillon, ALBERT (1826-1906), Protestant theologian of the advanced school, born at Dieppe, was pastor of the Walloon Church at Rotterdam 1851-72, lectured at Leyden, and in 1880 became professor of the History of Religions in the Collège de France. His works include a comparative history of philosophy and religion (1859; Eng. trans. 1864); books on Redemption, Satani, and Apollonius of Tyana; Manual of Religious Instruction (1863; trans. 1866); The Divinity of Jesus Christ (1869; trans. 1870); Prolegomena of the History of Religions (1881; trans. 1885); Native Religions of Mexico and Peru (Hibbert Lectures for 1884); Religions des Peuples Non-civilisés (1883); and La Religion Chinoise (1889).—His son, JEAN, born at Rotterdam in 1855, is also a liberal theologian, editor from 1885 of the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions. [Reh-veel.]

Reybaud, LOUIS (1799-1879), born at Marseilles, travelled in the Levant and India, and returning to Paris in 1829, wrote for the Radical papers and edited a history of the French expedition to Egypt (1830-36), &c. His Réformateurs ou Socialistes modernes (1840-43), which gained him the Montyon prize (1841) and a place in the Academy of Moral Sciences (1850), popularised the word 'Socialism.' His satiric novel, Jérôme Paturot (1843), was continued by a sequel in 1848.

Reynolds, GEORGE WILLIAM MACARTHUR (1814-79), journalist, Chartist, and blood-and-thunder novelist, was born at Sandwich, studied at Sandhurst, and in 1850 started Reynolds's Weekly.

Reynolds, JOHN FULTON (1820-63), born at Lancaster, Pa., was commandant at West Point in 1859, fought at Mechanicsville and Gaines's Mills, and was taken prisoner at Glendale, but exchanged in August 1862. At the second battle of Bull Run his brigade prevented a total rout. In 1863 he commanded a corps at Fredericksburg, and fell at Gettysburg.

Reynolds, JOHN HAMILTON (1796-1852), minor poet and lawyer, the friend of Leigh Hunt, Keats, and Hood. Born at Shrewsbury and educated at Christ's Hospital, he died in the Isle of Wight.

Reynolds, SIR JOSHUA, was born at Plympton Earls near Plymouth, 16th July 1723, the seventh son of a clergyman and schoolmaster. Sent in 1740 to London to study art, in 1747 he settled at Plymouth Dock, now Devonport. At Rome (1749-52) he studied Raphael and Michelangelo, and in the Vatican caught a chill which permanently affected his hearing. He now established himself in London, and by 1760 was at the height of his fame. In 1764 he founded the literary club of which Dr Johnson, Garrick, Burke, Goldsmith, Boswell, and Sheridan were members. He was one of the earliest members of the Incorporated Society of Artists, and on the establishment of the Royal Academy (1768) was elected its first president; in 1769 he was knighted. In that year he delivered the first of his Discourses to the students of the Academy, which, along with his papers on art in the Idler, his annotations to Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, and his Notes on the Art of the Low Countries (the result of a visit in 1781), show a cultivated literary style. In 1784 he became painter to the king, and finished his Mrs Siddons as the 'Tragic Muse,' undoubtedly his greatest portrait, a work existing in several versions. In 1789 his sight became affected, and he ceased to paint. The following year was embittered by a dispute with the Academy, which led to his resignation of the presidency, a resolution he afterwards rescinded. He died 23d February 1792, and was buried in St Paul's. It is in virtue of his portraits that Reynolds ranks as the head of the English school. In the dignity of their style, the power and expressiveness of their handling, the variety and appropriateness of their attitudes, the beauty of their colouring, and the delicacy of their flesh-painting they have never been surpassed. His pictures of children have an especial tenderness and beauty which have given a world-wide celebrity to 'Master Bunbury,' 'The Strawberry Girl,' 'Simplicity,' &c. His works are between two and three thousand; and from these 700 engravings have been executed, some of them ranking among the finest examples of the art. His 'Lady Betty Delme' fetched 11,000 guineas at Christie's in July 1894—the largest sum ever paid till then at an auction in England. See Memoirs by Northcote (1813), The Literary Works (with memoir, &c., by Beechy, 1835), Life by Leslie and Tom Taylor (1865), Catalogue Raisonné of the engravings by E. Hamilton (2d. ed. 1884), Reynolds and Gainsborough by Sir W. M. Conway (1885), and Lives by C. Phillips (1894) and Graves and Cronin (1900).

Reynolds, SAMUEL WILLIAM (1773–1835), a London mezzotinter after Reynolds, Turner, &c.

Reynolds, THOMAS (1771–1836), a spendthrift Roman Catholic manufacturer, who in 1798 sold the United Irishmen to Government, was born in Dublin, and from about 1822 lived in Paris.

Reynolds, WALTER, a venal churchman, the son of a Windsor baker, by Edward II. was made treasurer and Bishop of Worcester in 1307, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1314. He died at Mortlake, 16th November 1327.

Rhazes, or RĀZI (fl. 925), a Persian physician and alchemist who practised at Bagdad.

Rheinberger, JOSEPH (1839–1901), composer of operas, sonatas, &c., born at Vaduz in Liechtenstein, held musical posts at Munich 1855–94.

Rhind, ALEXANDER HENRY (1833–63), antiquary, born at Wick, founded the Rhind Lectures.

Rhodes, CECIL JOHN, South African statesman, was born 5th July 1853, the fifth son of the vicar of Bishop-Stortford. He was sent for his health to Natal, and subsequently made a fortune at the Kimberley diamond diggings. He came back to England and entered at Oriel College, Oxford, and though his residence was cut short by ill-health, he ultimately took his degree. He entered the Cape House of Assembly as member for Barkly. In 1884 General Gordon asked him to go with him to Khartoum as secretary; but Rhodes declined, having just taken office in the Cape ministry. He sent £10,000 in 1888 to Mr Parnell to forward the cause of Irish Home Rule. In 1890 he became prime-minister of Cape Colony; but even before this he had become a ruling spirit in the extension of British territory and in securing (1889) the charter for the British South Africa Co., of which till 1896 he was managing director, and whose territory has now become known as Rhodesia. His policy was the ultimate establishment of a federal South African dominion under the British flag. In 1895 he was made a member of the Privy Council. In 1896 he resigned the Cape premiership in consequence of complications arising from the 'unauthorised' raid into the Transvaal of Dr Jameson (q.v.), the Chartered Company's administrator, in aid of the Uitlanders' claims. His action was condemned by the South Africa Commission (1897). In 1899 he was capped D.C.L. at Oxford. He was a conspicuous figure during the war of 1899–1902, died 25th March 1902, and was buried in the Matoppo Hills, leaving a remarkable will which, besides making great benefactions to Cape Colony, founded rich scholarships at Oxford for Americans and colonials. See Lives by Sir Lewis Michell (1910) and Sir J. E. Fuller (1910).

Rhys, SIR JOHN (knighted 1907), born in Cardiganshire, June 21, 1840, taught until 1865, when he entered Jesus College, Oxford, and he continued his studies in France and Germany. From 1871 an inspector of schools in Wales, in 1877 he became professor of Celtic at Oxford, in 1881 a fellow of Jesus, and in 1895 its principal. A reputation gained by contributions to the philological journals was confirmed by Lectures on Welsh Philology (1877), Celtic Britain (1882; 3d ed. 1904), Celtic Heathendom (Hibbert Lectures, 1888), Arthurian Legend (1891), and Inscriptions and Languages of the Northern Picts (1892). Ribalta, FRANCISCO DE (1550–1628), Spanish painter, studied at Rome, and settled at Valencia.—His sons, JOSÉ (1588–1656) and JUAN (1597–1628), were also Valencian painters.

Ribbeck, OTTO (1827–98), editor of Latin poets, born at Erfurt, studied at Berlin and Bonn, and in 1877 succeeded to Ritschl's chair at Leipzig.

Ribera, JUSEPE, called SPAGNOLETTO ('Little Spaniard', 1588–1656), was born at Jativa in Spain, studied with Ribalta at Valencia, then in Rome, Parma, and Modena. He settled in Naples, and, attracting the viceroy's attention, became court-painter. He delighted to represent horrible subjects, such as martyrdoms. [Ree-bay'ra.]

Ribot, THÉODULE, psychologist, born at Guingamp, 18th December 1839, from 1888 a professor in the Collège de France, died in 1903. [Ree-bo.]

Ricardo, DAVID, political economist, born in London, 19th April 1772, was brought up by his father, a Jewish stockbroker, to the same business. In 1793 he married a Miss Wilkinson and turned Christian; then, starting for himself, he made a large fortune by 1814. In 1799 his interest in political economy was awakened by Smith's Wealth of Nations. His pamphlet, The High Price of Bullion a Proof of the Depreciation of Bank-notes (1809), was an argument in favour of a metallic basis. In 1817 appeared the work on which his reputation chiefly rests, Principles of Political Economy and Taxation, a discussion of value, wages, rent, &c. In 1819 he became Radical M.P. for Portarlington. He died at his Gloucestershire seat, Gatcombe Park, 11th September 1823. His collected works were edited, with a Life, by M'Culloch (1846); his letters to Malthus, to M'Culloch, and to H. Trower and others were edited by Bonar and Hollander (1887–99).

Ricasoli, BARON BETTINO (1809–80), born at Florence, was a leading agriculturist, and for ten years worked successfully at draining the Tuscan Maremma. In 1859 he took a prominent part against the grand-duke, on whose flight he was made dictator of Tuscany. He was head of the ministry in 1861–62 and 1866–67. See his Lettere e documenti (1886–94) and Life by Gotti (1894).

Ricci, MATTEO (1552–1610), founder of the Jesuit missions in China, was born at Macerata, studied at Rome, and lived at Nanking and at Peking. He so mastered Chinese as to write dialogues, &c., which received much commendation from the Chinese literati, and met with extraordinary success as a missionary. [Rit-chee.]

Richard I., CŒUR DE LION, third son of Henry II., was born at Oxford, 8th September 1157, and whilst still a child was invested with the duchy of Aquitaine, his mother Eleanor's patrimony. In England Richard did not spend in all his life a full twelvemonth; it may reasonably be doubted whether he could speak English. He was doubted by his mother to join his brothers Henry and Geoffrey in their rebellion (1173) against their father (see HENRY II.); and in 1189 he was again in arms against his father and in league with Philip Augustus of France. Richard became king of England, Duke of Normandy, and Count of Anjou on 5th July 1189. But he had already taken the crusader's vows; and to raise the necessary funds he sold whatever he could. In 1190 he and Philip set out for Palestine. Both spent the winter in Sicily, whose throne had just been seized by the Norman Tancred. Tancred made his peace by giving up to Richard his sister Johanna, the widowed queen, and her possessions, and by betrothing his daughter to Arthur, Richard's nephew and heir. In 1191 part of Richard's fleet was wrecked on Cyprus, and the crews were most inhospitably treated by the sovereign, Isaac Comnenus. Richard sailed back from Rhodes, routed Isaac, deposed him, and gave his crown to Guy de Lusignan. In Cyprus he married Berengaria of Navarre, and on 8th June landed near Acre, which surrendered. Richard's exploits—his march to Joppa, his two advances on Jerusalem (the city he never beheld), his capture of the fortresses in the south of Palestine, and his relief of Joppa—excited the admiration of Christendom. In September he concluded a three years' peace with Saladin, and started off home alone. He was shipwrecked in the Adriatic, and in disguise made his way through the dominions of his bitter enemy, Leopold, Duke of Austria, but was recognised, seized, and handed over to the Emperor Henry VI. (1193), who demanded a heavy ransom. Richard's loyal subjects raised the money, and he returned home (March 1194). Although his brother John used his utmost endeavours to prevent his return, Richard generously forgave him; and, proceeding to France, spent the rest of his life warring against Philip. He was killed 7th April 1199 whilst besieging the castle of Chaluz, and was buried at Fontevault. See BLONDEL; Stubbs's Const. Hist. (vol. i.), and T. A. Archer's Crusade of Richard I. (1889).

Richard II., son of Edward the Black Prince, was born at Bordeaux, 6th January 1367, and succeeded his grandfather, Edward III., 21st June 1377. The government was entrusted to a council of twelve, but John of Gaunt (q.v.) got the control of it. The war going on with France and the extravagance of the court cost money; and more was wasted by the government, for which John of Gaunt was held to be mainly responsible. The poll-tax of 1380 provoked popular risings; the men of Essex and Kent, 100,000 strong, marched upon London. The Essex men consented to return home when Richard at Mile End (14th June 1381) assured them he would liberate the villeins and commute their personal service into money rent. The men of Kent, after destroying the Savoy (Gaunt's palace), burning Temple Bar, opening the prisons, breaking into the Tower, and slaying the Archbishop of Canterbury, met the king at Smithfield (15th), where, during the negotiations, William Walworth, mayor of London, struck down Wat Tyler, their leader. The king at once rode amongst them, exclaiming he would be their leader, and granted them the concessions demanded. From this time John of Gaunt kept much in the background, until in 1386 he retired to the Continent. In 1385 Richard invaded Scotland and burned Edinburgh. About the same time another coalition of the baronial party, headed by the Duke of Gloucester, began to oppose the king. They impeached several of his friends in 1388, and secured convictions and executions. But on 3d May 1389 Richard suddenly declared himself of age; for eight years he ruled as a moderate constitutional monarch, and the country was fairly prosperous. But in 1394 Richard's first wife, Anne of Bohemia, died; in 1396 he married Isabella (1389-1409), daughter of Charles VI. of France, and seems to have adopted French tastes, manners, and ideas, and to have asserted the pretensions of an absolute monarch. He had Gloucester, Arundel, and Warwick arrested for conspiracy. Arundel was beheaded; Gloucester was sent a prisoner to Calais, and died in prison, probably murdered; Warwick was banished, and so was the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1398 the Duke of Norfolk and the Duke of Hereford (Henry, John of Gaunt's son) were accused of treason; Norfolk was banished for life and Hereford for ten years. In 1399 John of Gaunt died, and Hereford succeeded him as Duke of Lancaster. Richard in May went over to Ireland, and Henry of Lancaster landed on 4th July. Richard hurried back, submitted to his cousin at Flint (19th August), and was put in the Tower. On 29th Sept. he resigned the crown, and next day was deposed by parliament, which chose Henry as his successor. Richard seems to have been murdered at Pontefract Castle, 14th Feb. 1400.

Richard III., youngest brother of Edward IV., was born at Fotheringhay Castle, 2d October 1452. After the defeat and death of his father, the Duke of York, in 1460, he was sent to Utrecht for safety, but returned to England after Edward had won the crown (1461), and was created Duke of Gloucester. In the final struggle between York and Lancaster he took an active share, and is believed to have had a hand in the murder of Prince Edward, Henry VI.'s son, after Tewkesbury, and of Henry himself. In 1472 he married Anne, younger daughter of Warwick the King-maker. This alliance was resented by his brother, the Duke of Clarence, who had married the elder sister, and wished to keep Warwick's vast possessions to himself. Clarence was impeached and put to death in the Tower, 18th February 1478. Of this judicial murder Gloucester is likewise accused; but the evidence is slight. In 1482 he commanded the army that invaded Scotland and captured Berwick. In 1483, whilst still in Yorkshire, he heard of King Edward's death (9th April), and learned that he himself was guardian of his son and heir, Edward V., then thirteen. On his way south the Protector arrested Earl Rivers and Lord Richard Grey, the uncle and step-brother of the young king, and rallied to himself the old nobility. On 13th June he suddenly accused Lord Hastings, a leading member of the council, of treason, and had him beheaded. On 16th June the queen-dowager was induced to give up her other son, the little Duke of York, and he was put into the Tower to keep his brother, the king, company. The parliament desired Richard to assume the crown, and on 6th July he was crowned, Rivers and Grey having been executed on 25th June. Richard's principal supporter all through had been the Duke of Buckingham; but he soon after Richard's coronation entered into a plot with the friends of Henry Tudor, Earl of Richmond (afterwards Henry VII.), the chief representative of the House of Lancaster, to effect Richard's overthrow and proclaim Henry king. The attempted rising collapsed, and Buckingham was executed on 2d November. It seems to have been shortly before this that Richard murdered his nephews in the Tower. The deed was done so secretly that the nation did not know of it until some time after. Henry lauded at Milford Haven on 7th August 1485; Richard met him at Bosworth on the 22d, and there lost his kingdom and his life. Had Richard been born the lawful heir to the throne and succeeded to it peacefully, he would probably have been a great king; for he was a very capable ruler. He was short of stature and slight of build, with one shoulder slightly higher than the other. See Sir T. More's History of King Richard III. (1513), Horace Walpole's Historic Doubts (1768), Jesse's Memoirs of Richard III. (1862), Legge's The Unpopular King (1885), and especially James Gairdner's Life and Reign of Richard III. (3d ed. 1898); and Sir Clements K. Markham's book 'whitewashing' him (1907).

Richard of Cirencester (c. 1335-1401), chronicler, was in 1355 a Benedictine monk at Westminster. His only extant work is a poor compilation, the Speculum Historiale de Gestis Regum Angliæ 447-1066, edited by Prof. Mayor (Rolls series, 1863-69). But Richard's name is best known in connection with the De Situ Britannia, long accepted as an authoritative work on Roman Britain, and first printed in 1758 by its ingenious author, Charles Julius Bertram (1723-65), English teacher at Copenhagen, who professed to have discovered it in the Royal Library there. In the same volume were included the works of Gildas and Nennius. An English translation forms one of the 'Six Old English Chronicles' in Bohn's 'Antiquarian Library' (1848). Stukeley, Gibbon, and Lingard cited it with respect; but its authenticity received its death-blow from Mr B. B. Woodward, librarian of Windsor Castle, in the Gentleman's Magazine (1866-67). See Prof. Mayor's preface.

Richard of Cornwall (1209-72), second son of King John, in 1225-26 with his uncle, William of Salisbury, commanded an expedition which re-conquered Gascony. Married to a daughter of the Earl of Pembroke, he for some years acted with the English barons. But in 1240-41 he was away on a crusade; in 1244 he married Sanchia of Provence, sister of Queen Eleanor; and in 1257 he was elected titular king of the Romans, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. In the struggle between Henry III. and the barons Richard at first acted as peacemaker, but soon he sided with his brother against Simon de Montfort. He was taken prisoner at Lewes (1264), and imprisoned until Evesham (1265) set him free. He died broken-hearted at the loss of his eldest son, Henry, murdered at Viterbo by a Montfort.

Richards, HENRY BRINLEY (1819-85), born at Carmarthen, the son of an organist, in 1834 entered the Royal Academy of Music, where he was long a professor, and won a good position in London as pianist and teacher of music. His compositions achieved great popularity, especially his 'God Bless the Prince of Wales.'

Richardson, SIR BENJAMIN WARD, born at Somerby, Leicestershire, 31st October 1828, studied at Glasgow, and took his M.D. at St Andrews in 1854. He wrote on hygiene, strenuously promoted total abstinence, experimented with new anaesthetics, and invented several kinds of medical apparatus, methods for embalming, &c. An LL.D. and F.R.S., and knighted in 1893, he died 21st November 1896. His works include Cause of the Coagulation of the Blood (1856), Hygeia, a Model City of Health (1876), Diseases of Modern Life (1876), Moderate Drinking (1879), Life of Edwin Chadwick (1887), Common Health (1887), National Health (1890), Life of Sopwith (1891), and Vita Medica (1897). The quarterly Asclepiad (established 1884) was entirely written by himself.

Richardson, CHARLES (1775-1865), born at Tulse Hill, Norwood, studied law, kept school till 1827 at Clapham, published Illustrations of English Philology (1815), but is remembered for his New English Dictionary (2 vols. 4to, 1835-37). A later work was On the Study of Language, 1854).

Richardson, HENRY HOBSON (1838-86), an American architect, his specialty Romanesque, and his chief work Trinity Church, Boston (1877).

Richardson, JOHN (c. 1767-1837), the 'penny showman,' from Marlow workhouse rose to be a well-to-do travelling manager.

Richardson, SIR JOHN (1787-1865), naturalist, born at Dumfries, in 1807 became a navy-surgeon, served in the Arctic expeditions of Parry and Franklin (1819-22, 1825-27), and the Franklin search expedition of 1848-49. Knighted in 1846, he wrote Fauna Boreali-Americana (1829-37), Ichthyology of the Voyage of H.M.S. Erebus and Terror (1844-48), and other works. See a Life of him by M'Irith (1868).

Richardson, JONATHAN (1665-1745), a London portrait-painter and writer on art.

Richardson, SAMUEL, novelist, was born in 1689 in Derbyshire, the son of a joiner. He was bound in 1706 to John Wilde, a stationer; worked as a journeyman printer 1713-19; and then started an establishment of his own. He printed more than one newspaper, and obtained the printing of the journals of the House of Commons. In 1740 two bookselling friends invited him to prepare a volume of familiar letters 'in a common style, on such subjects as might be of use to country readers unable to indite for themselves.' 'Will it be any harm,' he said, 'if we should instruct them how they should think and act in common cases?' and hence sprang Pamela, 'designed to cultivate the principles of virtue and religion in both sexes.' Its vogue, in a coarser and robuster age than ours, was extraordinary; a fourth edition was reached by May 1741. Grub Street, fastening on this unexampled popularity, hastily put together for sequel a Pamela in High Life, which had the effect of seducing Richardson into two supplementary volumes, now deservedly forgotten; and then Fielding produced what Richardson and his coterie regarded as the 'lewd and ungenerous engraving' of Joseph Andrews. For eight years Richardson worked placidly at his masterpiece—Clarissa, or the Adventures of a Young Lady, known generally as Clarissa Harlowe, which Johnson declared to be the first book in the world for its knowledge of the human heart, and of which Tennyson, writing to FitzGerald, says, 'I love those large, still books.' Sir Charles Grandison (1753) aims to portray 'the man of true honour'; but its story is not strong enough to reconcile the reader to the prolix impeccability of its supertine hero. Besides an essay in Johnson's Rambler (No. 97), and the voluminous correspondence published (with memoir) by Mrs Barbauld in 1804, Richardson left no other literary remains of importance. He died 4th July 1761. He was a sentimental, methodical, well-meaning little man, domesticated and affectionate, whose fitting environment was feminine society of the sympathetic sort; and he has repaid his worshippers by depicting their sex with a discrimination shown by no other male author. See Sir Leslie Stephen's introduction to the 1883 edition, Miss L. Thomson's study (1900), and Austin Dobson's monograph (1902).

Richelieu, ARMAND JEAN DUPLESSIS, CARDINAL, DUC DE, was born of a noble but impoverished family at Richelieu near Chinon, September 5, 1585. He abandoned the military profession for the clerical in order to keep in the family the bishopric of Luçon, to which he was consecrated at twenty-two. In 1616 he rose to be secretary at war and for foreign affairs, but next year was sent back to his diocese. In 1622 he was named cardinal, in 1624 minister of state to Louis XIII. His first important measure was the blow to Spain of an alliance with England, cemented by the marriage (1625) of the king's sister Henrietta with Charles I. His next great task was to destroy the political power of the Huguenots. La Rochelle was starved into submission (1628); and he destroyed Montauban, the last refuge of Huguenot independence. In 1630 he entered Italy with a splendid army, and reduced Savoy. Meanwhile he plunged into tortuous intrigues with the Italian princes, the pope, and the Protestants of the North against the House of Austria. He promised a large subsidy to Gustavus Adolphus, and succeeded in persuading Ferdinand to dismiss Wallenstein. The first treaty of Cherasco (April 1631) ended the Italian war; the second gave France the strategic position of Pinerolo. Just before this final triumph Richelieu successfully surmounted a great combination formed for his downfall by the queen-mother, the House of Guise, and others. He now was made duke, and governor of Brittany. Further intrigues and attempted rebellions were crushed with merciless severity—Marillac and Montmorency and other nobles were sent to the block. In July 1632 Richelieu had seized the duchy of Lorraine. He continued his intrigues with the Protestants against Ferdinand, subsidising them with his gold, but till 1635 took no open part in the war. In that year, after completing his preparations and concluding an alliance with Victor Amadeus of Savoy, Bernard of Saxe-Weimar, and the Dutch, he declared war on Spain. His first efforts were unsuccessful; Piccolomini entered Picardy and threatened Paris. But Richelieu rose to the height of his genius; with 30,000 foot and 12,000 horse he swept the enemy out of Picardy, while Bernard drove them across the Rhine, and in 1638 destroyed the imperial army at Rheinfelden. His policy soon led to the disorganisation of the power of Spain—revolts in Catalonia and the loss of Portugal; the victories of Wolfenbüttel and Kempton over the Imperialist forces in Germany; and at length in 1641 in Savoy also the ascendancy of the French party. But the hatred of the great French nobles had never slumbered, and Richelieu's safety lay in the king's helplessness without him. The last conspiracy against him was that of Cinq-Mars (q.v.), whose intrigues with the Duke of Bouillon and the Spanish court were soon revealed to the cardinal, the centre of a network of espionage which covered the whole of France. Cinq-Mars and De Thou were arrested and executed. But the great minister died 4th December 1642. Whilst overwhelming the citizens with taxation, he had built up the power of the French crown, achieved for France a preponderance in Europe, destroyed the local liberties of France, and crushed every element of constitutional government. He never sacrificed to personal ambition what he thought the interests of his country, but he often forgot in his methods the laws of morality and humanity. The weakest point in Richelieu's character was his literary ambition. His plays sleep in safe oblivion, but his Mémoires are still read with interest. He founded the French Academy. See his Correspondence and State Papers (8 vols. 1853-77), and books by Capéfigue (1865), Dussieux (1885), D'Avenel (1884-90), Hanotaux (1893-96), Fagniez (1893-94), and Prof. Lodge (1896). [French pron. Reesh-l'yuh.]

Richepin, JEAN, French poet, playwright, and novelist, was meanly born in 1849 at Medeah, Algeria, and prior to the appearance of his first romance in 1872 had been franc-tireur, sailor, actor.

Richmond, GEORGE, portrait-painter, was born, a miniaturist's son, at Brompton, 28th March 1809; came under Blake's influence; made a Gretina Green marriage (1831); studied in Paris, Italy, and Germany; was made A.R.A. 1857, R.A. 1866; and died 19th March 1896.—His son, SIR WILLIAM BLAKE RICHMOND, K.C.B. (1897), portrait and mythological painter, born in London, 29th Nov. 1843, studied in Italy, was Oxford Slade professor 1878-83, and was made A.R.A. 1888, R.A. 1896. The St Paul's mosaics are his work.

Richmond, LEGH (1772-1827), born at Liverpool, became in 1798 joint-curate of Brading and Yaverland in the Isle of Wight, in 1805 rector of Turvey in Bedfordshire. He wrote the Dairyman's Daughter, Negro Servant, and Young Cottager, three famous evangelical tracts, collected as Annals of the Poor (1814). See Memoirs by Grimshawe (1828), and Mundy and Wright's Turvey and Legh Richmond (2d ed. 1894).

Richter, HANS, born at Raab, 4th April 1843, had been musical conductor successively to theatres at Munich, Budapest, and Vienna, when in 1879 he began the Orchestral Concerts in London. He is a Mus. Doc. Oxon. In 1893 he became first court kapellmeister at Vienna, in 1900-11 was conductor of the Halle orchestra.

Richter, JEAN PAUL FRIEDRICH ('Jean Paul'), humorist, was born 21st March 1763 at Wunsiedel in N. Bavaria, and was sent in 1781 to Leipzig to study theology; but literature had stronger charm for him. He got into debt, and in 1784 fled from Leipzig, to hide in the poverty-stricken home of his widowed mother at Hof. His first literary 'children' were satires which no one would publish, until in 1783 Voss of Berlin gave him forty louis d'or for The Greenland Law-suits. The book was a failure, and for three years Jean Paul struggled on at home. In 1787 he began to teach, and during his nine years of tutorship produced the satirical Extracts from the Devil's Papers (1789), Fäbhel's Journey (1796), and Freud's Complaint (1796); the beautiful idylls Domine Wuz (1793), Quintus Fixlein (1796; trans. by Carlyle, 1827), and the Parson's Jubilee (1797); the grand romances The Invisible Lodge (1793), Hesperus (1795), and Flower, Fruit, and Thorn Pieces, or Siebenkäs (1796-97); Campanerthal (1797), on the immortality of the soul; and the prose idyll, My Prospective Autobiography (1799). The Invisible Lodge was his first literary success; Hesperus made him famous. From this time for a few years Jean Paul was the object of extravagant idolatry on the part of the women of Germany. In 1801 he married a Berlin lady, and three years later settled at Bayreuth, where he died, 14th November 1825. The principal works of his married life were the romances, Titan (1800-3) and Wild Oats (1804-5), the former accounted by himself his masterpiece; Schmelle's Journey to Flätz (1809; trans. by Carlyle, 1827) and Dr Katzenberger's Trip to the Spa (1809), the best of his satirico-humorous writings; the idyll Fibel's Life (1812); the fragment of another grand romance, Nicholas Markgraf, or The Comet (1820-22); reflections on literature (Vorschule der Ästhetik; improved ed. 1812); another series on education (Levana, 1807), a book that ranks with Rousseau's Emile; various patriotic writings (1808-12); and an unfinished Autobiography (1826). Jean Paul stands by himself in German literature. All his great qualities of imagination and intellect were made ministers to his humour, which had the widest range, moving from the petty follies of individual men and the absurdities of social custom up to the paradoxes rooted in the universe. But of all great writers he is one of the most difficult to understand. Good editions of his Werke are those of 1860-62, 1879, and 1882 et seq. See Life by Nerrlich (1889); Carlyle's Miscellaneous Essays; an English Life, with Autobiography (1845); and Lady Chatterton's translated extracts (1859).

Richtshofen, FERDINAND, BARON VON, born at Karlsruhe in Silesia, 5th May 1833, in 1860 accompanied a Prussian expedition to eastern Asia, then during the next twelve years travelled in Java, Siam, Burma, California, the Sierra Nevada, and China and Japan (1868-72). After his return (1872) he became president of the Berlin Geographical Society (1873-78), professor of Geology at Bonn (1875), and of Geography at Leipzig (1883), at Berlin (1886). His reputation rests upon his great work on China (1877-83), Aufgaben der Geographie (1883), &c. He died in October 1905.

Rickman, THOMAS (1776-1841), born at Maidenhead, was in succession chemist, grocer, doctor, corn-factor, insurance agent at Liverpool, and from 1820 architect at Birmingham. His Styles of Architecture in England (1817; 7th ed. by Parker, 1881) is still a standard authority.

Ricord, PHILIPPE (1800-89), physician, born at Baltimore, U.S., came to Paris in 1820, and after 1828 lectured on surgical operations, and was surgeon-in-chief of a venereal hospital 1831-60.

Riddell, CHARLOTTE ELIZA LAWSON (née Cowan), born about 1837 at Carrickfergus, married in 1857 J. H. Riddell, Esq., C.E., of Winson Green House, Staffordshire. Between 1858 and 1894 she published over forty novels and tales, sometimes as 'F. G. Trafford'—the best-known George Geth (1864) and Austin Friars (1870), Riddell, HENRY SCOTT (1798-1870), minor Scottish poet, born, a shepherd's son, at Ewes, Dumfriesshire, from 1831 was a minister at Teviothead. See memoir by Dr Brydon prefixed to Poems (1871).

Ridding, GEORGE, D.D. (1828-1905), born at Winchester, and educated there and at Balliol, became a fellow of Exeter in 1851, second master of Winchester in 1863, head in 1868, and first Bishop of Southwell in 1884.

Ridley, NICHOLAS, Protestant martyr, born about 1500 at Unthank Hall near Haltwhistle, was elected in 1524 a fellow of Pembroke, Cambridge, studied at Paris and Louvain 1527-30, and became proctor at Cambridge in 1534, domestic chaplain to Crammer and Henry VIII., master of Pembroke in 1540, canon, first of Canterbury, then of Westminster, rector of Soham, and in 1547 Bishop of Rochester. An ardent and outspoken Reformer, he was in 1550, on the deprivation of Bonner, Bishop of London, made his successor. In this high position he distinguished himself by his moderation, learning, and munificence, and assisted Crammer in the preparation of the Articles. On the death of Edward VI. he espoused the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and was stripped of his dignities and sent to the Tower. In 1554 he was tried at Oxford, with Latimer and Crammer, by a committee of Convocation; all three were adjudged obstinate heretics and condemned. Ridley lay in jail for eighteen months, and after a second trial was burnt, along with Latimer, in front of Balliol College, 16th October 1555. His writings were collected in the Parker Society edition (1841). See Foxe's Actes and the memoir prefixed to Moule's edition of Ridley's Declaration of the Lord's Supper (1895).

Ridpath, GEORGE (c. 1717-72), born at Ladykirk manse in Berwickshire, and minister from 1742 of Stitchell, wrote a Border History (1776).

Riehm, EDUARD (1830-88), Protestant theologian, became vicar at Durlach in 1853, garrison-preacher at Mannheim in 1854, and professor at Heidelberg in 1861, at Halle in 1862. [Reeme.]

Riel, LOUIS, Canadian insurgent, born at St Boniface, Manitoba, 23d Oct. 1844, succeeded his father as a leader of the Metis or French half-breeds, and headed the Red River rebellion in 1869-70. In 1885 he again established a rebel government in Manitoba, and on 16th Nov., the rising having been quelled, he was executed. [R'yel.]

Rienzi, COLA DI (c. 1313-54), Roman tribune, born humbly at Rome, read the Latin historians, philosophers, and poets, and fired his imagination with the sacred prophecies. The assassination of his brother by a Roman noble determined him to deliver the city from aristocratic thralldom. In 1343 he was spokesman of a deputation sent to Avignon to beseech Clement VI. to return to Rome. The embassy failed, and Rienzi, returning in April 1344, for three years openly menaced the nobles. At last he incited the citizens to rise in May 1347. The aristocratic senators were driven out, and Rienzi was invested with practically dictatorial power. A bright dream flashed across his imagination—the unity of Italy and the supremacy of Rome. At his request the Italian states sent deputies to Rome to devise measures, and Rienzi was crowned tribune 15th April 1347. But the nobles were still bitterly hostile. The papal authority was turned against him; and, his seven months' reign over, he fled to Naples. After two years of religious meditation Rienzi resumed his life as political reformer, but was taken prisoner by the emperor and sent to Clement VI. to Avignon. A new pope, Innocent VI., sent him to Rome to crush the power of the nobles, but after accomplishing this Rienzi aimed at re-establishing himself in supreme authority. In August 1354, having raised a small body of soldiers, he made a sort of triumphal entry into Rome. But his conduct now was so unpopular that the Romans attacked his house and murdered him, 8th October. See French monographs by Auriac (1855) and Rodocanachi (1888). [See-en'tzee.]

Rietschel, ERNST (1804-61), Dresden sculptor.

Rietz, JULIUS (1812-77), Dresden composer.

Rigaud, HYACINTHE (1659-1743), portrait-painter, born at Perpignan, settled in Paris in 1681.

Rigby, MISS. See EASTLAKE.

Riley, JAMES WHITCOMB, born at Greenfield, Indiana, in 1853, from 1875 earned the title of 'Hoosier poet' by his verses in the local dialect. His poems about children are well known.

Riley, JOHN ATHELSTAN LAURIE, born in London in 1858, wrote on his travels in the East, and was on the London School Board and elsewhere a champion of Church teaching in schools.

Rimbault, EDWARD FRANCIS (1816-76), musical antiquary, was born and died in London.

Rimini. See FRANCESCA.

Rimmer, ALFRED (1829-93), antiquarian draughtsman, born at Liverpool, died at Chester.

Ringan, ST. See NINIAN.

Rink, HENRICH JOHANNES (1819-93), a high authority on Greenland and the Eskimos, was born at Copenhagen and died at Christiania.

Riou, EDWARD (c. 1758-1801), the 'gallant, good' captain, shot in the Battle of the Baltic.

Ripley, GEORGE (1802-80), born at Greenfield, Mass., graduated at Harvard, and until 1841 was pastor in Boston. Meanwhile he had joined in the Transcendental movement, and on leaving the pulpit he started the Brook Farm experiment. This came to an end in 1847, and Ripley from 1849 engaged in literary work at New York. He was joint-editor of Appleton's New American Cyclopedia. See Life by Frothingham (1882).

Ripon, FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON, EARL OF, born 1st November 1782, second son of the second Lord Grantham, was educated at Harrow and St John's College, Cambridge. In 1806 he entered parliament as a moderate Tory, and had successively been Under-secretary for the Colonies, Vice-president of the Board of Trade, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, when, as Viscount Goderich, in 1827 he became head of a seven months' administration. He was afterwards Colonial Secretary, Lord Privy-seal, and President of the Board of Trade; in 1833 was created Earl of Ripon; and died 28th January 1859. — GEORGE FREDERICK SAMUEL ROBINSON, MARQUIS OF RIPON, born 24th October 1827, succeeded his father as Earl of Ripon and his uncle as Earl de Grey. Since 1852 he had sat in parliament as a Liberal, and he became successively Under-secretary for War (1859), Under-secretary for India (1861), Secretary for War (1863), Secretary for India (1866), Lord President of the Council (1868), Grand-master of the Freemasons (1870, which office he resigned in 1874 on his conversion to Catholicism), Marquis of Ripon (1871), and Viceroy of India (1880-84). He was First Lord of the Admiralty in 1886, Colonial Secretary in 1892-95, and Lord Privy Seal in 1905-8, and died 9th July 1909.

Ripperda, JOHANN WILHELM, BARON DE (1680-1737), a political adventurer who, born at Groningen, played an amazing part at the Spanish court, turned first Catholic and then Moslem, and died at Tetuan, after commanding against Spain. See French monograph by Syveton (1896).

Rishanger, WILLIAM (c. 1250-1312), a monk of St Albans, wrote a Chronica 1259-1307 in continuation of Matthew Paris. It was edited by H. T. Riley (Rolls series, 1865).

Ristori, ADELAIDE (1822-1906), tragédienne, born at Cividale in Friuli, in her teens became the leading Italian actress. In 1847 her marriage with the Marquis Del Grillo (died 1861) temporarily interrupted her dramatic career. She won a complete triumph before a French audience in 1855, when Rachel was at the height of her fame; and gained fresh laurels in nearly every country of Europe, in the United States (1866, 1875, 1884-85), and in South America. See her Studies and Memories (trans. 1888).

Ritche, DAVID (1740-1811), the 'Black Dwarf,' lived and died at Manor near Peebles.

Ritche, LEITCH (1800-65), compiler of books, was born at Greenock, and died in London.

Ritche, LADY RICHMOND. See THACKERAY.

Ritschl, ALBRECHT, Protestant theologian, born at Berlin, 25th March 1822, became professor of Theology at Bonn (1853), Göttingen (1864). He died 20th March 1889. His principal work is on the doctrine of justification and reconciliation (1870-74; 4th ed. 1896). Other works were on Christian perfection (1874), conscience (1876), Pietism (1880-86), theology and metaphysics (1881), &c. The distinguishing feature of the Ritschlian theology is the prominence it gives to the practical, ethical, social side of Christianity. Though doubting the possibility of demonstrating God to the speculative intellect, Ritschl holds that God becomes known to those who have found their need of Him; He is to be thought of as love. The Ritschlians are now an important school. See Life by his son, Otto (2 vols. 1892-96); and works on Ritschlianism by Pfeiderer (1891), Garvie (1899), Swing (1901), Orr (1903), and Edgehill (1910). [Ritch'l.]

Ritschl, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1806-76), born near Erfurt, received classical chairs at Breslau (1834), Bonn (1839), and Leipzig (1865). His great edition of Plautus (1848-54; new ed. 1881-87) was preceded by Parerga Plautina et Terentiana (1845). His Priscæ Latinitatis Monumenta Epigraphica (1864) was the forerunner of the Corpus Inscriptionum. See Life by Ribbeck (1879-81).

Ritson, JOSEPH (1752-1803), antiquary, born at Stockton-on-Tees, came to London in 1775, and practised as a conveyancer, but was enabled to give most of his time to antiquarian studies. He was as notorious for his vegetarianism, whimsical spelling, and irreverence as for his attacks on bigger men than himself. His first important work was an onslaught on Warton's History of English Poetry (1782). He assailed (1783) Johnson and Steevens for their text of Shakespeare, and Bishop Percy in Ancient Songs (1790); in 1792 appeared his Cursory Criticisms on Malone's Shakespeare. Other works were English Songs (1783); Ancient Popular Poetry (1791); Scottish Songs (1794); Poems, by Laurence Minot (1795); Robin Hood Ballads (1795); and Ancient English Metrical Romances (1802). See his Letters edited, with Life, by Sir H. Nicolas (1833).

Ritter, HEINRICH (1791-1869), born at Zerbst, became professor of Philosophy at Berlin (1824), Kiel (1833), and Göttingen (1837). His fame rests upon his history of philosophy (12 vols. 1829-55) and Christian philosophy (1858-59).

Ritter, KARL (1779-1859), born at Quedlinburg, became professor of Geography at Berlin (1829), Academician, and Director of Studies of the Military School. His Erdkunde (1817-18) is a universal geography. See Lives by Gage (Edin. 1867) and Kramer (2d ed. 1875).

Rittershaus, EMIL (1834-97), lyric poet, was born at Barmen, and died a merchant there.

Rivarol, ANTOINE (1753-1801), born at Bagnols in Languedoc, came to Paris in 1780, and in 1788 set the whole city laughing at the sarcasms in his Petit Almanach de nos grands Hommes. Emigrating at the Revolution in 1792, and supported by royalist pensions, he employed himself fitfully in writing pamphlets in Brussels, London, Hamburg, and Berlin. See Lives by Curnier (1858), Lescure (1883), and Le Breton (1895).

Rivers, RICHARD WOODVILLE, EARL, was esquire to Henry V., and during his son's reign was made Governor of the Tower (1424) and knighted (1425). He fought in France and for the Lancastrians in the Wars of the Roses. He married Jaquetta of Luxembourg, widow of the Duke of Bedford, and it was their daughter Elizabeth whom Edward IV. married. This led him to go over to the Yorkists, and Edward made him Constable of England, Baron Rivers (1448), and Earl Rivers (1466). But the favour shown to the Rivers family offended the old nobility, and their avarice aroused popular enmity, and in 1469 Earl Rivers was beheaded at Northampton.—His son, ANTHONY, stuck closely to Edward IV., who made him captain-general of the forces. After Edward's death he was put to death by Richard in 1483.

Rivière, BRITON, born of Huguenot ancestry in London, August 14, 1840, was the son of a drawing-master, and graduated at Oxford in 1867. He had exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1858, and from the appearance of 'The Poacher's Nurse' (1866) he has been regularly represented. His wild animals are marvellously painted. He became A.R.A. in 1878, R.A. in 1881. Among his works are 'Daniel in the Lions' Den,' 'Persepolis,' 'A Roman Holiday,' 'Giants at Play,' 'Actæon,' 'Væ Victis,' 'Rizpah,' 'A Mighty Hunter before the Lord,' and 'Lady Wantage.' See Art Journal Annual by W. Armstrong (1891).

Rivière, ROBERT (1808-82), London bookbinder.

Rivington, CHARLES (1688-1742), London publisher, born at Chesterfield, was succeeded by his fourth son, JOHN (1720-92), his sons, FRANCIS (1745-1822) and CHARLES (1754-1831), Francis's son, JOHN (1779-1841, Tractarian publisher), and his son, JOHN (1812-86). See LONGMAN, and a book on the firm by Septimus Rivington (1894).

Robbia, LUCA DELLA (c. 1400-82), sculptor, was born and died at Florence. He executed between 1431 and 1440 ten unequalled panels of Angels and Dancing Boys for the cathedral, for whose sacristy he also made (1448-67) a bronze door with ten panels of figures in relief. In marble he sculptured, in 1457-58, the tomb of the Bishop of Fiesole. He is almost equally famous for his figures in terra-cotta, including medallions and reliefs, white or coloured.—His nephew, ANDREA (1435-1525), worked at reliefs and medallions of the Madonna.—His son, GIOVANNI (1469-1529?), continued this style of work, including a frieze at Pistoia and a fountain in Florence. See work by Leader Scott (1883), and French ones by Caval-Jucci and Molinier (1884) and Reymond (1897).

Robert I. (OF SCOTLAND). See BRUCE.

Robert II., king of Scotland, born 2d March 1316, was the son of Walter Stewart (q.v.) and of Marjory, only daughter of Robert the Bruce. Throughout the disastrous reign of his uncle, David II., he was one of the most prominent of the nobles of Scotland, and twice acted as regent. On David's death (1371) he obtained the crown, becoming founder of the Stewart dynasty. His powerful and intractable barons shaped the policy of the country very much according to their pleasure. The misery inflicted by their raids and the reprisals of the English wardens was frightful; the great events were the invasions of Scotland by an English force under the Duke of Lancaster in 1384, and by Richard II. in 1385, and the retaliatory expedition of the Scotch in 1388, ending with Otterburn. Robert died 19th April 1390. He married first (1348) his mistress, Elizabeth Mure of Rowallan, and (1355) a daughter of the Earl of Ross; he had over a dozen children.

Robert III., king of Scotland, son of preceding, was born about 1340, and originally called John. His incapacity threw the government into the hands of his ambitious brother, in 1398 created Duke of Albany. In 1400 Henry IV. of England invaded Scotland and penetrated as far as Edinburgh; the Scots retaliated in 1402 by the expedition which ended in the disaster at Honildon Hill. Robert had two sons, the eldest of whom was David, Duke of Rothesay (1378-1402), a clever but very licentious youth. Albany received orders from the king to act as his guardian, and after a short time starved him to death at Falkland. Robert, anxious for the safety of his younger son, James, resolved to send him to France; and when news came that the vessel in which James sailed was captured by an English cruiser he succumbed to paroxysms of grief, and died 4th April 1406.

Robert, LÉOPOLD (1794-1835), French painter of Italian life, born near Chaux-de-Fonds, killed himself at Venice. See Life by Clément (1874).

Roberts, ARTHUR, comic actor, born 21st September 1852, has written his Adventures (1895).

Roberts, CHARLES GEORGE DOUGLAS, the 'Longfellow of Canada,' born at Douglas, New Brunswick, 10th January 1860, graduated at Fredericton in 1879, was professor in King's College, Nova Scotia, in 1885-95, and then settled in New York as editor of a paper. He has written Orion, In Divers Tones, and other volumes of poetry, a history of Canada, &c.

Roberts, DAVID, born at Edinburgh, 24th October 1796, as a scene-painter at Drury Lane attracted attention with pictures of Rouen and Amiens cathedrals at the Royal Academy. Then he travelled in Spain, Morocco, Egypt, Palestine, Italy, and Belgium, and published illustrated works on Spain (1837), the Holy Land (1842), and Italy (1859). Among his pictures were 'Departure of the Israelites from Egypt' (1829), 'Great Temple at Carnac' (1845), 'Jerusalem' (1845), 'Destruction of Jerusalem' (1849), 'Rome' (1855), and 'Grand Canal at Venice' (1856). A.R.A. (1839) and R.A. (1841), he died 25th November 1864. See Life by J. Ballantine (1866)

Roberts, FREDERICK SLEIGH, EARL, was born at Cawnpore, 30th September 1832, son of General Sir Abraham Roberts (1784-1873). He was educated at Clifton, Eton, Sandhurst, and Addiscombe; entered the Bengal Artillery in 1851; was at the siege of Delhi; and took an active part in the subsequent operations down to the relief of Lucknow, winning the V.C. in 1858. He was assistant quartermaster-general in the Abyssinian (1868) and Lushai (1871-72) expeditions. In the Afghan war in 1878, Roberts, now major-general, forced the Afghan position on Peiwar Kotul, and was made K.C.B. (1879). After the murder of Cavagnari and his escort at Kabul, he defeated the Afghans at Charasia, took possession of Kabul, and assumed the government. Yákuḅ Khan was sent a prisoner to India, but Abdul Rahman was proclaimed ameer, General Burrows was crushingly defeated at Maiwand, and the British Kandahar garrison was besieged. On 9th August 1880 Sir F. Roberts set out with 10,000 troops on his memorable march through Afghanistan to the relief of Kandahar; three weeks later he reached it, and completely routed Ayub Khan. In 1881, now a baronet, he was appointed Commander-in-chief of the Madras army, and in 1885-93 he was Commander-in-chief in India. Created Lord Roberts of Kandahar and Waterford in 1892, he became Field Marshal and Commander-in-chief in Ireland in 1895. He published The Rise of Wellington (1895) and Forty-one Years in India (1897). After the first checks of the Boer war he was sent out to assume the chief command, relieved Kimberley and made the great advance to Pretoria, and came home in 1901 to be Commander-in-chief. From that post he retired in February 1904. He was created earl in 1902.

Roberts, MORLEY, born in London in 1857, was educated at Bedford and Owens College, served before the mast, on Australian sheep-runs, on Texan ranches, on Californian railways, and British Columbian sawmills, and multiplied his experiences in the South Seas, the Transvaal, Rhodesia, and Corsica. From 1887 onwards he published a long series of works, mostly novels, including The Purification of Dolores Silva (1894), The Colossus, A Son of Empire, Immortal Youth, Lady Penelope (1904), Sea Dogs (1910).

Robertson, ALLAN (1815-59), a St Andrews professional golfer, never once beaten.

Robertson, FREDERICK WILLIAM, born in London, 3d February 1816, the son of an artillery captain, was educated for the army at Tours and Edinburgh, but devoting himself to the church, studied at Oxford (1837-40), and in 1847 became incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, where his earnestness, originality, and wide sympathy arrested attention, but provoked suspicion. He resigned in June 1853 because his vicar had refused to confirm his nomination of a curate, and died 15th August 1853. He published but one sermon—the four series (1855, 1855, 1857, 1859-63) so well known over the English-speaking world are really recollections, sometimes dictated and sometimes written out. Yet another volume, The Human Race, &c., was issued in 1880. Other works are Expository Lectures on St Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians (1859), Lectures and Addresses (1858), An Analysis of 'In Memoriam' (1862), and Notes on Genesis (1877). See his Life and Letters, by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke (1865).

Robertson, GEORGE CROOM (1842-92), born at Aberdeen, in 1866 became professor of Mental Philosophy and Logic at University College, London. He wrote on Hobbes, and started (1876) and edited Mind. See memoir by Prof. Bain prefixed to his Philosophical Remains (1894).

Robertson, JAMES CRAIGIE (1813-82), born at Aberdeen, studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became vicar of Bekebourne, Kent (1846), canon of Canterbury (1859), and professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London (1864-74). His chief work was Materials for the History of Becket (6 vols. Rolls series, 1875-82).

Robertson, JOSEPH, antiquary, born at Aberdeen, 17th May 1810, and educated there, after six years of literary work at Edinburgh was a newspaper editor 1839-53. He then became historical curator at the Edinburgh Register House, was made LL.D. in 1864, and died 13th Dec. 1866. He was an originator of the Aberdeen Spalding Club (1839-70), for which he edited four works, and contributed much to Chambers's Encyclopaedia. Among his other works are The Book of Bon-Accord (1839); Catalogues of the Jewels, Dresses, &c., of Mary Queen of Scots (1863); Concilia Scotiae: Ecclesiae Scoticae Statuta, 1225-1559 (1866); and an article in the Quarterly (1849) on 'Scottish Abbeys and Cathedrals' (reprinted, with memoir, 1891).

Robertson, MADGE. See KENDAL, Mrs.

Robertson, THOMAS WILLIAM, dramatist, was born at Newark-on-Trent, 9th January 1829, of an old actor family, and himself was brought up on the boards. Coming up to London in 1848, he was actor, prompter, and stage manager, wrote unsuccessful plays, contributed to newspapers and magazines, translated French plays, and so forth. His first success as a dramatist was with David Garrick (1864), and Society (1865) was received with the warmest approval. His next comedy, Ours (1866), established his fame. Caste (1867), Play (1868), School (1869), M.P. (1870)—all brought out by the Bancrofts at the Prince of Wales's—and Home (1869) and Dreams (1869) were all equally successful; and several of them retain their popularity. He died 3d February 1871. See his Principal Dramatic Works, with memoir by his son (1889), and Life by Pemberton (1893).

Robertson, WILLIAM, D.D., historian, born 19th September 1721 at the manse of Borthwick in Midlothian, studied at Edinburgh, and at twenty-two was ordained minister of Gladsmuir. He volunteered for the defence of Edinburgh against the rebels in 1745, from 1751 took a prominent part in the General Assembly, and soon became leader of the 'Moderates.' From 1761 till his death he was joint-minister with Dr Erskine of Greyfriars, Edinburgh. In 1761 he became a royal chaplain, in 1762 principal of Edinburgh University, and in 1764 king's historiographer. His History of Scotland 1542-1603 (1759) was a splendid success. Next followed the History of Charles V. (1769), his most valuable work, for which he received £4500, and high praise from Voltaire and Gibbon. The History of America appeared in 1777, and a disquisition on The Knowledge which the Ancients had of India in 1791. He died at Grange House, Edinburgh, 11th June 1793. See short Lives by Dugald Stewart (1801) and Bishop Gleig (1812).

Robertson, WILLIAM BRUCE, D.D. (1820-86), born at St Ninians, Stirling, was United Presbyterian minister at Irvine 1843-71. Serious illness then incapacitated him from regular work, and till 1878 he was much in Italy. Thereafter he could undertake occasional duty, his sermons and week-day lectures at Cambridge (1879-81) being memorable. A seer rather than a theologian, he made music and painting, sculpture and architecture, all minister by illustration to the evangelical setting forth of the gospel. He published a translation of the Dies Iræ and one or two sacred songs. See Lives by J. Brown, D.D. (1889), and A. Guthrie (1889).

Robespierre, MAXIMILIEN MARIE ISIDORE, was born, originally of Irish origin, at Arras, 6th May 1758. He was admitted avocat in 1781, and was elected to the States-general in 1789 by Artois. He attached himself to the extreme Left, and soon his earnestness and high-sounding phrases commanded attention. His influence grew daily, both in the Jacobin-Club and in the Assembly; and the mob frantically admired his sincere cant and his boasted incorruptibility. In 1791 he carried the motion that no member of the present Assembly should be eligible for the next, and was appointed public accuser. Next followed the flight to Varennes (21st June), Lafayette's last effort to control the right of insurrection on the Champ-de-Mars (17th July), the abject terror of Robespierre, his hysterical appeal to the Club, the theatrical oath taken by every member to defend his life, and his conduct home in triumph by the mob at the close of the Constituent Assembly (30th Sept.). The Girondist leaders in the new Legislative Assembly were eager for war. Robespierre offered a strenuous opposition in the Jacobin Club. In April 1792 he resigned his post of public accuser. In August he presented to the Legislative Assembly a petition for a Revolutionary Tribunal and a new Convention. It does not appear that he was responsible for the September massacres. He was elected first deputy for Paris to the National Convention, where the bitter attacks upon him by the Girondists threw him into closer union with Danton. Robespierre opposed vigorously the Girondist idea of a special appeal to the people on the king's death, and Louis's execution (21st January 1793) opened up the final stage of the struggle, which ended in a complete triumph of the Jacobins on 2d June. The first Committee of Public Safety was decreed in April 1793, and Robespierre, elected in July, was now one of the actual rulers of France; but it is doubtful whether henceforth he was not merely the stalking-horse for the more resolute party within the Twelve. Next came the dark intrigues and desperate struggles that sent Hébert and his friends to the scaffold in March 1794, and Danton and Camille Desmoulins in April. The next three months Robespierre reigned supreme. He nominated all the members of the Government Committees, placed his creatures in all places of influence in the commune of Paris, and assumed complete control of the Revolutionary Tribunal. But as his power increased his popularity waned, and his declaration on 7th May of a new state religion awoke in the mind of Paris the slumbering sense of humour. The Convention, at Robespierre's instance, agreed to compliment the Supreme Being with an acknowledgment of His existence. Meantime the pace of the guillotine grew faster; public finance and government generally drifted to ruin, and Saint-Just demanded the creation of a Dictatorship in the person of Robespierre. On 26th July the Dictator delivered a long harangue complaining that he was being accused of crimes unjustly. The Convention, after at first obediently passing his decrees, next rescinded them and referred his proposals to the committee. That night at the Jacobin Club his party again triumphed. Next day at the Convention Saint-Just could not obtain a hearing, and Robespierre was vehemently attacked. A deputy proposed his arrest; at the fatal word Robespierre's power crumbled to ruin. He flew to the Common Hall, whereupon the Convention declared him an outlaw. The National Guard under Barras turned out to protect the Convention, and Robespierre had his lower jaw broken by a shot fired by a gendarme. Next day (28th July; 10th Thermidor 1794) the trembling wretch was guillotined with Saint-Just, Couthon, and nineteen others. See histories of the Revolution by Lamartine, Michelet, Blanc, Carlyle, Von Sybel, Morse Stephens, and Taine; the Life by G. H. Lewes (1849); Hamel's exhaustive and eulogistic Vie de Robespierre (1865-67), also his Thermidor (1891); Gallier's Robespierre (1896), Hilaire Belloc's (1902), and Warwick's (1909).

Robin Hood, the hero of a group of old English ballads, the gallant and generous outlaw of Sherwood Forest, where he spent his time gaily under the greenwood tree with Little John, Scarlet, Friar Tuck, and his merry men all. Unrivalled with bow and quarter-staff, he waged war on proud abbots and rich knights, taking freely of their superfluity, but himself therewith most generous to the poor. The 'rymes of Robyn Hood' are named in Piers Plowman (c. 1377) and the plays of Robin Hood in the Paston Letters (1473). Tradition made the outlaw into a political personage, a dispossessed Earl of Huntingdon and what not, and Scott's Ivanhoe represents him as a Saxon holding out against the Normans. But there is no evidence that he was anything but the creation of popular imagination, a yeoman counterpart to the knightly King Arthur. There are some forty Robin Hood ballads, some eight of them of the first rank. See Gutch, Lytell Geste of Robin Hode (1847), Hales's Introduction to the Percy Folio (1867), and especially Child's Ballads (part v. 1888).

Robinet, JEAN BAPTISTE (1735-1835), philosopher, an ex-Jesuit, was born and died at Rennes.

Robins, BENJAMIN (1707-51), mathematician and father of the art of gunnery, was born, of Quaker family, at Bath. He set up as teacher of mathematics in London, published several treatises, commenced his experiments on the resisting force of the air to projectiles, studied fortification, and invented the ballistic pendulum. In 1735 he demolished, in a treatise on Newton's Methods of Fluxions, Berkeley's objections. His New Principles of Gunnery appeared in 1742. Engineer to the East India Company (1749), he died at Madras. His works were collected in 1761.

Robins, GEORGE HENRY (1778-1847), London auctioneer, died worth over £140,000.

Robinson, EDWARD (1794-1863), born at Southington, Conn., studied in Germany, and in 1830 became a theological professor at Andover, in 1837 at New York. His survey of Palestine (1838) resulted in Biblical Researches in Palestine and Adjacent Countries (1841); and a second visit in 1852 produced a second edition (1856). Other works were a translation of Buttman's Greek Grammar (1832), a New Testament Greek Lexicon (1836), and a Harmony of the Gospels (1845-46). See Life by Smith and Hitchcock (1863). He married in 1828 THERESE ALBERTINE LOUISE VON JAKOB (1797-1869), daughter of a Halle professor; under the acoustic of her initials, 'Talvi,' she wrote Psyche (1825), and translated Scott's Black Dwarf and Old Mortality, and Volkslieder der Serben (1825-26).

Robinson, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1830-1901), born in Spitalfields, London, from 1851 had written some fifty novels, among them Grandmother's Money (1800); No Church (1802); Mattie, a Stray (1804); Little Kate Kirby (1813); The Courting of Mary Smith (1836); Woman in the Dark (1835), &c. He also founded and edited Home Chimes.

Robinson, HENRY CRABB, born at Bury St Edmunds, 13th May 1775, was articled to a Colchester attorney 1790-95. He studied five years at Jena, Weimar, &c. (1800-5), making friends of the great German spirits of the day, and during 1807-9 was engaged on the Times—in Spain, the first war-correspondent. In 1813 he was called to the bar, from which he retired in 1828 with £500 a-year. He died 5th February 1867. A dissenter and a Liberal, he was one of the founders of the London University (1828), and an early member of the Athenæum Club (1824). He was a splendid talker, a buoyant companion, an earnest thinker, a prodigious reader, content not to publish but to keep a diary. See his delightful Diary and Correspondence, edited by Dr Sadler (3 vols. 1869).

Robinson, HERCULES GEORGE ROBERT, LORD ROSMEAD, born 19th December 1824, second son of Admiral Hercules Robinson (1789-1864), became governor of Hong Kong (1859, with a knighthood), Ceylon (1865), New South Wales (1872), New Zealand (1878), and Cape Colony (1880 and again 1895); he retired in 1897. In 1875 he was created a G.C.M.G., in 1890 a baronet, and in 1896 Lord Rosmead. He died 28th Oct. 1897.—His brother, SIR WILLIAM CLEAVER FRANCIS ROBINSON, K.C.M.G. (1834-97), from 1874 was three times governor of Western Australia.

Robinson, JOHN (c. 1576-1625), pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers, born in Lincolnshire, studied at Cambridge, held a cure at Norwich, in 1608 escaped to Amsterdam, in 1609 passed to Leyden, and there established a church. In 1620, after a memorable sermon, he saw part of his flock set sail in the Speedwell (afterwards changed for the Mayflower). He died at Leyden. See Lives by Davis (1903) and Ashton (in the Works, 1851), and Dr J. Brown's Pilgrim Fathers (1895).

Robinson, MARY, 'Perdita' (1758-1800), born at Bristol, played 'Perdita' and other Shakespearean parts at Drury Lane 1776-80, and became mistress in 1779 to the future George IV., who gave her a bond (never paid) for £20,000. She wrote poems, plays, and novels; in 1783 got a pension of £500, but died poor and palsied. See her Memoirs, edited by her daughter (1801).

Robinson, MARY. See DARMESTETER.

Robinson, PHILIP, journalist, correspondent, and writer on birds and beasts and things Indian, was born in 1849 at Chanan, N.W. Provinces, and educated at Marlborough.

Robison, JOHN (1739-1805), born at Bognhall in Stirlingshire, and educated at Glasgow, devoted himself early to physical science, and became lecturer on chemistry in 1766. In 1770 he went to Russia as secretary to Admiral Knowles, then president of the Russian Admiralty; in 1774 he accepted the Edinburgh chair of Natural Philosophy. Brewster edited his Elements of Mechanical Philosophy (1822). His Proofs of a Conspiracy by Freemasons (1797) is a monument of credulity.—His son, SIR JOHN ROBISON (1778-1843), mechanician, made a fortune in Madras 1802-15.

Rob Roy (Gaelic, 'Red Robert') was born in 1671, second son of Lieut.-Col. Donald Macgregor of Glengyle. Till 1661 the 'wicked clan Gregor' had for a century been pursued with fire and sword; the very name was proscribed. But from that year until the Revolution the severe laws against them were somewhat relaxed, and Rob Roy lived quietly enough as a grazer at Balquhider. His herds were so often plundered by 'broken men' from the north that he had to maintain a band of armed followers to protect both himself and such of his neighbours as paid him blackmail. And so with those followers espousing in 1691 the Jacobite cause, he did a little plundering for himself, and, two or three years later having purchased from his nephew the lands of Craigryston and Inversnaid, laid claim to be chief of the clan. Through losses (1712) in cattle speculations, for which he had borrowed money from the Duke of Montrose, his lands were seized, his houses plundered, and his wife turned adrift with her children in midwinter. Rob now gathered his clansmen and made open war on the duke. This was in 1716, the year after the Jacobite rebellion, in which, at Sheriffmuir, Rob Roy had 'stood watch' for the booty. Marvellous stories are current round Loch Katrine and Loch Lomond of his hairbreadth escapes, of his evasions when captured, and of his generosity to the poor, whose wants he supplied at the expense of the rich. They in return warned him of the designs of his arch-foes, the Dukes of Montrose and Athole, and of the red-coats; besides, Rob enjoyed the protection of the Duke of Argyll, having assumed the name Campbell, his mother's. Late in life he is said to have turned Catholic, but in the list of subscribers to the Episcopalian church history of Bishop Keith (1734) occurs the name 'Robert Macgregor alias Rob Roy.' On 28th December 1734 Rob Roy died in his own house at Balquhider. He left five sons, two of whom died in 1754—James, the notorious outlaw James Mohr, in Paris; and Robin, the youngest, on the gallows at Edinburgh for abduction. See the introduction and notes to Scott's Rob Roy (1817); Dorothy Wordsworth's Tour in Scotland in 1803, with her brother's poem; and the Lives of Rob Roy by K. Macleay (1818; new ed. 1881) and A. H. Miller (1883).

Robson, AMY. See LEICESTER, EARL OF.

Robson, FREDERICK (1822-64), born at Margate, his real name Thomas Robson Brownhill, was apprenticed to a London copperplate engraver, but took to the actor's life in 1844. From 1853 he attracted large audiences at the Olympic in comedy, farce, and burlesque (e.g. of Macbeth and Shylock.) See sketch by G. A. Sala (1864).

Roby, HENRY JOHN, born at Tamworth, 12th August 1830, graduated in 1853 as senior classic from St John's College, Cambridge, and was a fellow and lecturer, professor of Jurisprudence at University College, London (1866-68), a sewing-cotton manufacturer, and Gladstonian M.P. for Eccles (1890-95). He is known by his Latin Grammar (1871-74).

Rochebeau, JEAN BAPTISTE DE VIMEUR, COMTE DE (1725-1807), born at Vendôme, entered the French army in 1742, was at the siege of Maestricht, and distinguished himself at Minorca in 1756. In 1780 he was sent out with 6000 men to support the Americans, and in 1781 rendered effective help at Yorktown. He became marshal in 1791, and in 1804 Napoleon made him a grand officer of the Legion of Honour. See his Mémoires (1809; Eng. trans. 1838). [Ro-shonə-bo'.]

Roche, ST (c. 1295-1327), patron of the plague-smitten, was born at Montpellier.

Roche, SIR BOYLE (1743-1807), an Irish bull-making M.P., created a baronet in 1782.

Rochefort, HENRI (Victor Henri), Marquis de

Rochefort-Luçay, born in Paris, 29th July 1832, became a clerk in the hôtel-de-ville, but was dismissed in 1859 for neglecting his duties. He took to journalism, in 1868 starting La Lanterne, which was quickly suppressed. He fled to Brussels, but returning in 1869 on his election to the Chamber of Deputies, started the Marseillaise, in which he renewed his attacks on the imperial regime. On the cowardly murder of his contributor, Victor Noir, by Prince Pierre Bonaparte, the paper was suppressed and its editor imprisoned. The fall of the empire opened up a rôle for him. In 1871 he was elected to the National Assembly, and soon sided with the Communards in Le Mot d'Ordre. He escaped from Paris, but the Prussians caught him and sent him to Versailles; sentenced to life imprisonment, he escaped from New Caledonia in 1874, and returned to France after the amnesty of 1880. In his newspaper, L'Intransigeant, he showed himself as impracticable as ever, sat in the National Assembly (1885-86), and buried his influence in Boulangism. He fled in 1889 to London, returned to Paris in 1895, and was an active anti-Dreyfusard. See his The Adventures of my Life (trans. 1896).

Rochester, JOHN WILMOT, EARL OF, was born at Ditchley, Oxfordshire, 10th April 1647, and was educated at Burford school and Wadham College, Oxford. He travelled in France and Italy, and then repaired to court, where his handsome person and lively wit made him a prominent figure. In 1665 he showed conspicuous courage against the Dutch. With his friend Windham he had engaged that, 'if either of them died, he should appear and give the other notice of the future state, if there was any.' Windham was killed, but did not disturb the rest of his friend, who now plunged into a life of the grossest debauchery and buffoonery, yet wrote excellent letters, personal satires, bacchanalian and amatory songs, and verses too often obscene and licentious. At the last he was moved to repentance by Bishop Burnet (see Burnet's Passages of the Life and Death of John, Earl of Rochester, 1680), and died 26th July 1680. His verses show more wit than poetry, but he possessed a rich gift of satire. Among the best of his poems are imitations of Horace and Boileau, Verses to Lord Mulgrave, and Verses upon Nothing.

Rochester, VISCOUNT. See OVERBURY.

Rockefeller, JOHN DAVISON, millionaire monopolist, born at Richford, New York, 8th July 1839, in 1857 was clerk in a commission house and then in a small oil-refinery at Cleveland, Ohio, and after 1875 by his Standard Oil Company secured the absolute control of the whole oil trade of America. He has given many millions of dollars to Chicago University and to Baptist churches.

Rockingham, CHARLES WATSON WENTWORTH, MARQUIS OF (1730-82), in 1750 was created Earl of Malton and succeeded his father as second Marquis. In 1751 he was made K.G.; but, opposing the policy of Bute, was dismissed from his appointments in 1762. As leader of the Whig Opposition, he was in 1765 called on to form his first ministry. He repealed the Stamp Act, and would have done more for progress but for court intrigues and the defection of the Duke of Grafton. He resigned in 1766, and for sixteen years opposed Lord North and the ruinous policy that lost America. He again became premier in March 1782, but died four months later. See Memoirs by the Earl of Albemarle (1852).

Rockstro, WILLIAM SMITH (1823-95), composer and writer on music, born at North Cheam, Surrey, was organist 1867-76 at Babbicombe, Torquay, and then turned Catholic.

Rod, ÉDOUARD (1857-1910), born at Nyon in Vaud, studied at Lausanne, Bonn, and Berlin, and settled in Paris. Among his thirty works—Zolaistic, pessimistic, optimistic, &c.—are La chute de Miss Topsy (1882), La course à la mort (1885), Les sens de la Vie (1889), Michel Teissier (1893-94), and Le dernier refuge (1896). [Rodd.]

Rodbertus, JOHANN KARL (1805-75), founder of scientific socialism, was the son of a Greifswald professor, held law appointments under the Prussian government, but in 1836 settled down on his estate. In 1848 he entered the Prussian National Assembly, and for a fortnight was minister of Education; in 1849 he carried the Frankfort constitution. He held that the socialistic ideal will work itself out gradually according to the natural laws of change and progress. When that ideal is realised the state will own all land and capital, and superintend the distribution of all products of human labour, apportioning to each a proportionate share. See books by Adler (1884), Dietzel (1886-88), Jentsch (1899), Gonner (1899).

Rodd, SIR JAMES RENNELL, G. C. V. O., K. C. M. G., poet, historian, and diplomatist, was born 9th November 1858, and educated at Haileybury and Balliol.

Roderic, the last Visigoth king of Spain, in 710 murdered and usurped the throne of Witica, but was defeated by the Moors at Xeres de la Frontera, and drowned in the Guadalete, July 711.

Rodgers, JOHN (1771-1838), born in Maryland, in 1798 entered the U.S. navy, and in 1805 he extorted treaties from Tripoli and Tunis, and in the war with Britain took twenty-three prizes.—His son, JOHN RODGERS (1812-82), in 1863 captured the Confederate ironclad Atlanta, and became rear-admiral and (1877) superintendent of the U.S. naval observatory. See Memoir by Prof. J. Russell (1882).

Rodin, AUGUSTE, the foremost of contemporary French sculptors, was born at Paris in 1840, studied under Barye, and began to exhibit in the Salon in 1875. He has produced great scriptural and symbolical groups ('Eve', 'Les Bourgeois de Calais', 'Le Porte d'Enfer', 'La Guerre'), but is best known by 'Le Penseur' and his portrait busts and statues, notably the bust and the monument of Victor Hugo. See Brownell, French Art (1894), and books by Dircks (1904), Maclair (1905), Lawton (1907).

Rodman, THOMAS JEFFERSON (1815-71), U.S. colonel, invented a method of casting guns.

Rodney, GEORGE BRYDGES RODNEY, LORD, born in London in Feb. 1719, of an old Somersetshire family, entered the navy in 1732, was made lieutenant in 1739, in 1742 post-captain, and in 1747 had a brilliant share in Hawke's victory of 14th Oct. Governor of Newfoundland 1748-52, in 1757 he served under Hawke in the futile expedition against Rochefort, and in 1758 under Boscawen at Louisburg. In 1759 as rear-admiral he commanded the squadron which bombarded Havre and destroyed the flotilla for the invasion of England. In 1761 he was appointed Commander-in-chief on the Leeward Islands station, where in 1762 he captured Martinique, St Lucia, and Grenada. A vice-admiral (1763) and baronet (1764), he was in 1765 appointed governor of Greenwich Hospital, but in 1771 was recalled to active service, and sent out as commander-in-chief at Jamaica. In 1774 he returned to England, and was on half-pay till 1779, when, again commander-in-chief at the Leeward Islands, he put to sea with a powerful squadron for the relief of Gibraltar. In January 1780 he captured a Spanish convoy off Cape Finisterre. Passing Cape St Vincent on the 16th he met the Spanish squadron, and took seven ships out of eleven. In February he sailed for the West Indies, and in April and May fought three indecisive engagements with a French fleet. Now a K.B., he in January 1781 seized the Dutch settlements. In December he again sailed for the West Indies; off Dominica came in sight of the French fleet under De Grasse, and on 12th April 1782 gained a brilliant victory, seven ships and De Grasse himself being captured. Superseded by a new administration ere the news had reached home, he returned to be raised to the peerage as Baron Rodney, with a pension of £2000—though but coldly received by government. He thereafter lived in retirement until his death in Hanover Square, 24th May 1792. See Lives by General G. B. Mundy (1830) and Hannay (1891).

Roe, EDWARD PAYSON (1838-88), born in New Windsor, N.Y., became chaplain in the volunteer service (1862-65), and afterwards pastor of a Presbyterian church at Highland Falls. The Chicago fire of 1871 furnished him with a subject for his first novel, Barriers Burned Away (1872), whose success led him to resign his pastorate in 1874. His fifteen novels include From Jest to Earnest (1875), Near to Nature's Heart (1876), Nature's Serial Story (1884), and He Fell in Love with his Wife (1886). He also wrote on fruit-growing. See memoirs and reminiscences by his sister (1899).

Roe, SIR THOMAS (c. 1580-1644), born at Low Leyton near Wanstead, studied at Magdalen, Oxford, and, after holding court appointments, was knighted in 1605, and sent as a political agent to the West Indies, Guiana, and Brazil. M.P. for Tamworth (1614), in 1615-19 he was ambassador to the Great Mogul Jahangir at Agra. The editing of his journal of this mission (partly printed by Purchas, &c.) was undertaken in 1897 by Mr W. Foster. Roe was ambassador to the Porte in 1621-28, and afterwards to Germany, died at Bath, and was buried at Woodford, Essex.

Roebeck, JOHN ARTHUR, was born at Madras in Dec. 1802, but brought up in Canada. Coming to England in 1824, and called to the bar in 1831, in 1832 he became Radical member for Bath. He represented Sheffield 1849-68, and again from 1874 till his death at Westminster, 30th Nov. 1879. His motion for inquiring into the state of the army before Sebastopol overthrew the Aberdeen administration (1855). He supported Beaconsfield's policy during the Eastern crisis in 1877-78, and in 1879 was made a P.C. He wrote Colonies of England (1849) and History of the Whig Ministry of 1830 (1852). See Life by R. Leader (1897).

Roger I. (1031-1101), Norman count of Sicily, joined his famous brother, Robert Guiscard (q.v.), in South Italy, and helped him to conquer Calabria. In 1060 he was invited to Sicily to fight against the Saracens, and took Messina. Everywhere the Normans were welcomed as deliverers from the Moslem yoke; in 1071 the Saracen capital, Palermo, was captured, and Robert made Roger count of Sicily. After Robert's death (1085) Roger succeeded to his Italian possessions, and became the head of the Norman power in southern Europe.—His second son, ROGER II. (1097-1154), by the death of his brother Simon in 1105 became count of Sicily. On the death (1127) of the Duke of Apulia, grandson of Robert Guiscard, his duchy passed to Roger, who thereupon welded Sicily and South Italy into a strong Norman kingdom, of which he was crowned king by Anacletus the antipope in 1130. He next added to his dominions Capua (1136), Naples, and the Abruzzi (1140). In 1139 he took prisoner Pope Innocent II., with whom he concluded a bargain, Innocent recognising him as king of Sicily, whilst Roger acknowledged Innocent and held his kingdom as a fief of the Holy See. The Byzantine emperor Manuel having insulted his ambassador, Roger's admiral ravaged the coasts of Dalmatia and Epirus, took Corfu, and plundered Corinth and Athens (1146). He carried off silkworkers, and introduced that industry into Sicily. Finally (1147), Roger won Tripolis, Tunis, and Algeria. His court was one of the most magnificent in Europe, and his government was firm and enlightened.

Roger of Wendover (d. 1236), prior of the Benedictine monastery of St Albans, revised and enlarged the abbey chronicle compiled by Matthew Paris (q.v.). Hewlett edited him (1889).

Rogers, CHARLES, D.D. (1825-90), maker of books and monuments, was born at Dunino manse near St Andrews, and died in Edinburgh.

Rogers, HENRY (1806-77), essayist, born at St Albans, became a Congregational preacher, and was professor of English at University College, London (1836-39), and at Spring Hill College, Birmingham, and president (1858-71) of the Lancashire Independent College, Manchester. He contributed admirable critical and biographical articles to the Edinburgh (republished 1850-55), and wrote a Life of John Howe (1836); The Eclipse of Faith (1852); its Defence (1854) in reply to F. W. Newman; Essay on Thomas Fuller (1856); and The Superhuman Origin of the Bible (1873; 9th ed., with memoir by R. W. Dale, 1893).

Rogers, JAMES EDWIN THOROLD, economist, born at West Meon, Hampshire, in 1823, took a classical first from Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1846. At first an ardent Puseyite, he was ordained, but became a successful Oxford 'coach,' and renounced his orders in 1870. He was professor of Political Economy 1862-67, but made so many enemies by his outspoken zeal for reforms that he was not re-elected till 1888. An advanced Liberal, he represented Southwark 1850-85, and Bermondsey 1885-86. He died Oct. 12, 1890. His greatest work is his History of Agriculture and Prices in England (8 vols. 1866-93), abridged as Six Centuries of Work and Wages (1885). Other books are Education in Oxford (1861), Historical Gleanings (1869-70), Cobden and other Essays (1878), First Nine Years of the Bank of England (1887), Economic Interpretation of History (1888), and Industrial History of England (1892). He also edited the Speeches (1868) and Public Addresses of Bright (1879), and the Wealth of Nations (1880), &c.

Rogers, JOHN, Marian protomartyr, born near Birmingham in 1505, was a London rector 1532-34, and at Antwerp and Wittenberg embraced the Reformed doctrines. He prepared the revised translation called 'Matthew's Bible' in 1537, and, returning to England in 1543, preached at St Paul's Cross in 1553, just after Mary's accession, against Romanism, and was burned 4th February 1555. See Life by Col. J. L. Chester (1861).

Rogers, RANDOLPH (1825-92), sculptor, resident in Rome, was born at Waterloo, N.Y.

Rogers, SAMUEL, born at Stoke-Newington,

80th July 1763, at sixteen or seventeen entered his father's bank, in 1784 was taken into partnership, and in 1793 became head of the firm. In 1781 he contributed essays to the Gentleman's Magazine, next year wrote a comic opera, and in 1786 published An Ode to Superstition. In 1792 appeared The Pleasures of Memory, on which his poetical fame was chiefly based (19th ed. 1816). There followed An Epistle to a Friend (Richard Sharp, 1798), the fragmentary Voyage of Columbus (1812), Jacqueline (1814, bound up with Byron's Lara), and the 'inimitable' Italy (1822-28). The last, in blank verse, proved a monetary failure; but the loss was recouped by the splendid edition of it and his earlier poems, brought out at a cost of £15,000 (1830-34), with 114 illustrations by Turner and Stothard. In 1803, with £5000 a year, he withdrew from the bank as a sleeping partner, and settled down to bachelor life at 22 St James's Place, to cultivate his muse and caustic wit, to raise breakfast-giving to a fine art, to make little tours at home and on the Continent, and to gather an art-collection which sold at his death for £50,000. He made a good use of his riches, for he was quietly generous to Moore and Campbell, and other unknown ones. But with the kindest heart he had so unkind a tongue that 'melodious Rogers' is better remembered to-day by a few ill-natured sayings than by his poetry, which, chaste though it be, and elegant and cultured, is dead and mummified. There is not much more to tell of him—the bank-robbery (£47,000, 1844); the proffer by Prince Albert of the laureateship (1850); the street accident—knocking down by a carriage (1850)—which crippled him; and his death, 18th December 1855. See Dyce's Table-talk of Samuel Rogers (1856); Recollections by Rogers, edited by his nephew William Sharpe (1859); two works by Clayden (1887, 1889); and the Reminiscences and Table-talk as edited by Powell (1903).

Roget, PETER MARK (1779-1869), son of a Huguenot minister, became physician to the Manchester Infirmary in 1804; physician to the Northern Dispensary, London, in 1808, F.R.S. (1815), and its secretary 1827-49; Fullerian professor of Physiology at the Royal Institution 1833-36; and an original member of senate of London University. He wrote On Animal and Vegetable Physiology (Bridgewater Treatise, 1834); and his Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases (1852) reached a 28th ed. in his lifetime (new eds. 1879, 1881, &c.). He died at West Malvern.

Rohan-Glié, HENRI, DUC DE (1679-1638), Prince of Leon, born at the château of Blain in Brittany, was a favourite of Henry IV., and in 1605 married the daughter of Sully. After the king's murder he became a Huguenot leader. On the surrender of La Rochelle (1628) a price was set on his head, and he made his way to Venice, but soon after was summoned by Richelieu to serve his king in the Valtelline, out of which he drove Imperialists and Spaniards. He next served under Bernard of Saxe-Weimar, but died 13th April 1638 of a wound received at Rheinfelden. See his Mémoires (1630 and 1738), and works by Fauvelet du Toc (1667), Schybergson (1880), Lagarde (1884), Laugel (1889), and Veraguth (German, 1894), and the Edinburgh Review for April 1890.

Rohan-Guéméné, LOUIS RENÉ ÉDOUARD, PRINCE DE (1735-1803), embraced the clerical life in spite of dissolute morals, and became coadjutor to his uncle the Bishop of Strasburg. In 1772 he was sent as minister to Vienna, but injured himself at the French court by slanderous gossip about Marie Antoinette, and was recalled in 1774. In 1778 he received a cardinal's hat, and in 1779 became Bishop of Strasburg. His eagerness to recover his footing at court made him an easy prey to Cagliostro and the adventuress Lamothe, and their forgeries and personations made him purchase the famous Diamond Necklace for the queen. When the plot was discovered he was sent to the Bastille, but was acquitted by the Parliament of Paris, 31st May 1786. He was elected to the States-general in 1789, but refused to take the oath to the constitution in 1791, retiring to the German part of his diocese, where he died. See works cited at LAMOTHE.

Rohlf, MRS CHARLES (née Anna Katharine Green), author of The Leavenworth Case (1878) and other sensational novels, was born in 1846 at Brooklyn, N.Y., and married there in 1884.

Rohlf, GERHARD, born at Vegesack near Bremen, 14th April 1832, studied medicine, and joined (1855) the Foreign Legion in Algeria. He travelled through Morocco (1861-62), and was plundered and left for dead in the Sahara. In 1864 he visited Tuat and Ghadames; in 1865 was in Fezzan and Tibesti; in 1866 in Bornu, on the Benue, and on the Niger. He accompanied the British expedition to Abyssinia in 1868, and was sent by Prussia to Bornu. In 1873-74 he led an expedition for the khedive, and was commissioned by the German emperor to Wadai (1878) and Abyssinia (1885). He wrote books of travel. He died at Godesberg, 2d June 1896.

Rokewode, JOHN GAGE (1786-1842), a Suffolk Catholic gentleman and antiquary.

Rokitansky, KARL, BARON VON (1804-78), professor 1834-75 of Pathological Anatomy at Vienna, wrote the great Handbuch der pathologischen Anatomie (1842-46; trans. 1849-52).

Roland, hero of the Chanson de Roland (11th century) and most celebrated of the Paladins of Charlemagne, was the nephew of Charlemagne, and the ideal of a Christian knight. The only evidence for his historical existence is one (doubtfully genuine) passage in Eginhard's Life of Charlemagne, which refers to Roland as having fallen at Roncesvalles. Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and Ariosto's Orlando Furioso depart widely from the old traditions.

Roland of la Platière, JEAN MARIE, born near Villefranche-sur-Saône, 18th February 1734, had risen to be inspector of manufactures at Amiens, when in 1775 he made the acquaintance of his gifted wife, Marie Jeanne Philipon, born at Paris, 18th March 1754, the daughter of an engraver. They were married in Feb. 1780. By Lyons Roland was sent in 1791 to Paris to watch the interests of the municipality; and there Madame Roland's masculine intellect made her the queen of a coterie of young and eloquent enthusiasts that included all the leaders of the Gironde. In March 1792 Roland became minister of the Interior, but was dismissed three months later for a remonstrance to the king. He was recalled after the king's removal to the Temple, made himself hateful to the Jacobins by his protests against the September massacres, and took part in the last struggle of the Girondists. It was then that the affection between Madame Roland and Buzot crossed the bounds that separate friendship from love, but she sacrificed passion to duty. On 31st May 1793 the Twenty-two were proscribed. Roland had been arrested, but escaped and fled to Rouen; Buzot and others fled to Caen to organise insurrection, but in vain; next day Madame Roland was carried to the Abbaye. Set at liberty two days later, she was arrested anew and taken to Sainte-Pélagie. During her five months in prison she wrote her unfinished Mémoires. All her sincere illusions were now dissipated, and she saw into the heart of the Revolution. In the Mémoires we have a serene and delightful revelation of her youth, but she is best and most natural in her letters. On 8th November 1793 she was guillotined. Her husband ran himself through with his sword-stick near Rouen, November 15, 1793. The best editions of the Mémoires are those of Dauban (1864), Faugère (1864), and Claretie (1884); the Lettres were collected by Dauban (1867). See studies by Sainte-Beuve, Scherer, Dauban (1864), V. Lamy (Deux Femmes Célèbres, 1884), Mathilde Blind (1886), Austin Dobson (Four Frenchwomen, 1890), Tarbelle (English, 1896), and Join-Lambert (1896).

Roll, ALFRED PHILIPPE, genre-painter, was born in Paris, 1st March 1846.

Rolle, RICHARD. See HAMPOLE.

Rolleston, GEORGE (1829-81), born at Maltby Hall near Rotherham, was elected fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, in 1851, studied at St Bartholomew's Hospital, and became physician in 1855 to the British Civil Hospital at Smyrna, in 1857 to the Radcliffe Infirmary at Oxford, in 1860 Lincoln professor of Anatomy and Physiology, F.R.S. in 1862, and fellow of Merton in 1872. His Forms of Animal Life (1870) secured him scientific eminence, confirmed by his dissertation on craniology in Greenwell's British Barrows (1877). His Scientific Papers were published, with a memoir, in 1884.

Rollin, CHARLES (1661-1741), born in Paris, became in 1688 a professor at the Collège de France, and in 1696 coadjutor to the principal of the Collège de Beauvais. He was ejected for his Jansenist sympathies, but was elected rector of the university in 1720. His Traité des Etudes (1726-31) has been pronounced by Villenain 'a monument of good sense and taste'; his Histoire Ancienne (1730-38), long popular and much translated, is jejune and often inaccurate. Yet it has opened the study of ancient history to many more than Frederick the Great. His Histoire Romaine (1738-48) was a much inferior work.

Rollin, LEDRU. See LEDRU-ROLLIN.

Rollo, or Rou, leader of a band of Northmen, secured from Charles the Simple in 912 a large district on condition of being baptised and becoming Charles's vassal. This grant was the nucleus of the duchy of Normandy. William the Conqueror's ancestor, Rollo is probably the same as Rolf the Ganger, a Norwegian chief outlawed by Harold Haarfager about 872.

Rollock, ROBERT (c. 1555-99), born at Powis near Stirling, in 1583 became first regent of Edinburgh University. He wrote Latin commentaries. See Masson's Edinburgh Sketches (1892).

Romaine, WILLIAM (1714-95), evangelical divine, born at Hartlepool, and educated at Hertford College and Christ Church, Oxford, held various London lectureships from 1748, and in 1764 became rector of St Anne's, Blackfriars. He assailed, not without credit, Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses, and published commentaries, sermons, and three books that enjoyed a remarkable popularity—The Life of Faith (1763), The Walk of Faith (1771), and The Triumph of Faith (1795). There is a complete edition of his works, with a Life by Cadogan (8 vols. 1809).

Romanes, GEORGE JOHN, naturalist, born at Kingston, Canada, 20th May 1848, graduated in 1870 from Caius College, Cambridge, with natural science honours. While still at the university he formed a friendship with Darwin, and he powerfully reinforced his master's arguments in his Croonian, Fullerian, and other lectures, and in his various works—Animal Intelligence (1881), Scientific Evidences of Organic Evolution (1881), Mental Evolution in Animals (1883), Jelly-fish, Star-fish, and Sea-urchins (1885), Mental Evolution in Man (1888), &c. He was elected an F.R.S. in 1879, married in that year, removed in 1890 to Oxford, and died there 23d May 1894. Originally a defiant agnostic or sceptic, he was latterly a devout, if not wholly orthodox, Christian. Posthumous works by him were Thoughts on Religion, Mind and Monism, Darwin and after Darwin, and selections from his Poems. See Life by his wife (1896). [Ro-may-nez.] Romanino, GIROLAMO (1485-1566), religious painter, was born and died at Brescia. See Pater's Misc. Studies (1895).

Romano, GIULIO. See GIULIO.

Romanoff, a family that originally migrated from (Slavonic) Prussia to the principality of Moscow. Its head, Michael, was elected tsar by the other Russian boyars in 1612, and the czar-dom became hereditary in his house till in 1762, on the death of the Czarina Elizabeth, the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp, son of Peter the Great's daughter, succeeded as Peter III. Later czars are descended from him and his wife, Catharine II. See S. Edwards, Romanoffs (1890). [Ro-mah'-nof.]

Romilly, SIR SAMUEL, lawyer and law reformer, was born in London, the son of a watchmaker of Huguenot descent, March 1, 1757. At twenty-one he entered Gray's Inn, and found his chief employment in Chancery practice. In 1790 he published an able pamphlet on the French Revolution. Appointed Solicitor-general in 1806, and knighted, he represented Queenborough, Horsham, Wareham, Arundel, and (1818) Westminster. He devoted himself to mitigate the severity of the criminal law. His bills were session after session rejected, but Romilly nevertheless persevered. He shared in the anti-slavery agitation, and opposed the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and the spy system. His wife died 29th October 1818, and the shock so preyed upon his mind that, on November 2, he cut his throat. See Speeches in Parliament (1820) and Autobiography (1840).—His second son, JOHN, BARON ROMILLY (1802-74), was made Solicitor-general in 1848, Attorney-general in 1850, Master of the Rolls in 1851, and a Baron in 1866.

Romney, GEORGE, painter, born at Beekside, Dalton-in-Furness, 15th December (o.s.) 1734, worked for ten years at his father's trade of cabinetmaker. In 1755 he was articulated to a 'Count' Steele at Kendal to be taught 'the art or science of a painter'; in 1756 married Mary Abbot of Kirkland; in 1757 set up as a portrait-painter; and in 1762 came up to London, leaving behind wife, boy, and baby girl. Of Romney's next thirty-five years there is little to record beyond his two visits to France (1764; 1790) and his two years' residence in Italy (1773-75), after which, for twenty-two years, he lived in Cavendish Square, and slaved at his art, which so far rewarded him that in 1786 he made by portrait-painting 3500 guineas. Of all his sitters the most celebrated is Lady Hamilton (q.v.), whom he painted in fully thirty characters. 'Sensibility,' sold originally for 100 guineas, fetched £3045 in 1890. Miss Sneyd as 'Serena' is another of his masterpieces, and so too is 'The Parson's Daughter'

(since 1879 in the National Gallery). In 1798, nearly mad and quite desolate, Romney returned to his wife at Kendal, and died there 15th November 1802. See FitzGerald's Letters (p. 102); Lord Tennyson's 'Romney's Remorse'; two poor Lives by Hayley (1809) and his son, the Rev. John Romney (1830); Espinasse's Lancashire Worthies (1877); Lord Ronald Gower's Romney and Lawrence (1882); and Lives by Hilda Gamlin (1894) and Ward and Roberts (1904). [Rum'ny.]

Romulus, legendary founder and first king of Rome, son by Mars of Rhea Silvia, the daughter of King Numinor of Alba Longa, was with his twin-brother Remus exposed by a usurping uncle, but was suckled by a she-wolf. In 753 B.C. he founded his city on the Tiber, and in 716 was carried up to heaven in a chariot of fire.

Romulus Augustus, last emperor of the West, scoffingly nicknamed Augustulus, was by Odoacer (q.v.) compelled to abdicate in 476 A.D., and ended his days in obscurity near Naples.

Ronalds, SIR FRANCIS, F.R.S. (1788-1873), a London merchant's son, devoted himself largely to electricity, and in 1816 fitted up in his garden at Hammersmith eight miles of insulated wire, which he worked successfully as an electric telegraph. His offer of the invention to the Admiralty was refused; he published a description of it in 1823. He also invented (1845) a system of automatic photographic registration for meteorological instruments. He was made superintendent of the Meteorological Observatory at Kew in 1843, and knighted in 1871.

Ronge, JOHANN (1813-87), a Silesian priest who denounced as idolatry the exhibition of the Holy Coat of Trèves in 1844, and joined with other dissidents to form the German Catholic Church, which soon comprised 300 congregations. It departed widely from the Catholic Church both in doctrine and ritual, passed further and further into freethinking and democratic politics, after the storms of 1848 was severely handled by the government, and gradually decayed. Ronge lived in London from 1849 till 1861. [Rong'ay.]

Ronner, HENRIETTE (née Knip), a Brussels painter of cats, was born at Amsterdam in 1821. See illustrated Life by Spillmann (1892).

Ronsard, PIERRE DE, French poet, born at the Château de la Poissonnière in Vendôme, September 11, 1524, served the Dauphin and the Duc d'Orléans, and accompanied James V, with his bride, Marie de Lorraine, to Scotland, where he stayed three years. Becoming deaf, he abandoned arms for letters, and at the Collège Coqueret studied with Du Belay and other members of the famous Pléiade. His seven years of study bore its first fruit in his Odes (1550), which excited violent opposition from the older national school. In 1552 appeared his Amours and the fifth book of his Odes, his Hymns in 1555, the conclusion of the Amours in 1556, in 1560 Œuvres Complètes, and in 1572, twenty days after the massacre of St Bartholomew, La Franciade, a fragment of an epic. Charles IX., like his predecessors, heaped favours upon the lucky poet, who spent his later years in lettered ease at the Abbey of Croix-Val in Vendôme. He died at his priory of St Cosme at Tours, 27th Dec. 1585. Good editions of his works are by Blanchemain (1857-67) and Marty-Laveaux (1887-91). See also Sainte-Beuve's Œuvres Choies de Ronsard (1828), and studies by Scheffler (1874), Chalandon (1875), Bizos (1891), and Wyndham (Ronsard and the Pléiade, 1906). [Ron'sar'.]

Röntgen, WILHELM KONRAD VON, physicist, 51

born 27th March 1845 at Lennep in Rhenish Prussia, studied at Zurich, and has been professor at Strasburg, Giessen, Würzburg, and (1899) Munich. He has contributed to science in the departments of specific heat in gases, elasticity, compressibility, capillarity, the absorption of heat in steam and gases, &c.; and about the end of 1895 discovered the X-rays, usually called after him. Heinrich Hertz discovered that in an exhausted Geissler tube, through which there is an electric current, the dark or invisible rays pass through an aluminium foil. Lenard, a pupil of Hertz, let them pass outside a Crookes tube by inserting a window of aluminium in the tube. Röntgen discovered that these rays, passed through the hand or other part of the body, would print the shadow-picture of the bony framework on a sensitive photographic plate. Other applications followed. [Runt'ghen.]

Rooke, SIR GEORGE (1650-1709), admiral, born near Canterbury, became at thirty post-captain, and in 1689 rear-admiral. In 1692 he did splendid service at Cape La Hogue, and was knighted. In 1702 he commanded the expedition against Cadiz, and destroyed the Plate-fleet at Vigo. With Sir Cloudesley Shovel he captured Gibraltar (1704), and then engaged off Malaga a much heavier French fleet. See his Journal (1897).

Roon, ALBRECHT THEODOR EMIL, COUNT VON (1803-79), was Prussian war minister from 1859. The effects of his labours in reorganising the army were brilliantly realised in the wars of 1866 and 1870-71, and he was made count (1871) and field-marshal (1873). [Roon.]

Roosevelt, THEODORE, president of the United States, was born, of Dutch and Scottish descent, at New York, 27th October 1858, studied at Harvard, was leader of the New York legislature in 1884, and president of the New York police board in 1895-97. He was assistant-secretary of the navy when in 1898 he raised and commanded 'Roosevelt's Rough-riders' in the Cuban war, and came back to be president of New York State (1898-1900). Appointed (Republican) vice-president (1901), he became president on the death (by assassination) of McKinley (1901), and was re-elected in 1905. An 'expansionist,' he insisted on a strong navy, the purification of the Civil Service, and the regulation of trusts and monopolies. He returned from a great hunting-tour in Central Africa in time to take active part in the elections of 1910, and helped to split the Republican party, those with whom he acted forming the 'progressive' section. He has written on American Ideals, on ranching, hunting, and other subjects; African Game Trails (1910) dealing with his African experiences. [Rose-velt.]

Root, GEORGE FREDERICK (1820-95), born at Sheffield, Mass., taught music in Boston and New York, and wrote many popular songs—'Rosalie, the Prairie Flower,' 'The Hazel Dell,' 'Just before the Battle, Mother,' 'Tramp, tramp, tramp,' &c.

Roper, MARGARET. See MORE, SIR THOMAS.

Rosa, or ROSE, CARL (1843-89), impresario, born at Hamburg, studied music at Leipzig and Paris, and in 1873 in England gave a great impulse to 'English opera' (opera sung in English words, and also operas by English composers).

Rosa, SALVATOR, born near Naples in 1615, spent his youth amongst the wild scenery of Southern Italy. At Rome his talents as painter, musician, improvisatore, actor, and poet, brought him fame, but he made powerful enemies by his satires, and withdrew to Florence for nine years. After that he returned to Rome, and died March 15, 1673. Salvator owes his reputation mainly to his landscapes of wild and savage scenes. He executed numerous etchings. His Satires were published in 1719. See Lives by Baldinucci (new ed. 1830) and Cantù (1844). Lady Morgan's book (1824) is a blending of fact and romance.

Rosamond. See ALBOIN; CLIFFORD.

Rosas. JUAN MANUEL DE, Argentine dictator, born in Buenos Ayres, 30th March 1793, became commander-in-chief in 1826, and was governor of the province in 1829-32. Disappointed of reelection, he headed a revolt, and from 1835 to 1852 governed as dictator. His rule was a rule of terror and bloodshed. Many refugees found an asylum in Uruguay, and therefore Rosas supported his partisan, General Oribe, there. After Oribe's fall Rosas in 1839 invaded Uruguay, but was defeated; in 1843 he sent Oribe back to attack Montevideo. The long siege which followed led to the intervention of England and France and the blockade of Buenos Ayres (1845-47). In 1849 Rosas secured for Buenos Ayres the entire navigation of the Plate, the Uruguay, and the Paraná. This roused the other river provinces, and in 1851 Urquiza, governor of Entre Rios, supported by Brazil, defeated Oribe in Uruguay, then marched against Rosas, and in February 1852 routed him at Monte Caseros near Buenos Ayres. Rosas escaped to England, where he lived comfortably till his death, 14th March 1877. See German monograph by Martens (1896).

Roscellinus, JOHANNES, schoolman, was born at Soissons about 1050. Owing to the skill with which he defended nominalism against Anselm he may be deemed the founder of the scholastic philosophy. In 1092 a council held at Soissons condemned his teaching as implicitly involving the negation of the doctrine of the Trinity.

Roscher, WILHELM (1817-94), political economist, born at Hanover, in 1843 became professor at Göttingen, in 1848 at Leipzig. His works include System der Volkswirtschaft (1854-94; 21st ed. 1894; Eng. trans. 1879), Englische Volkswirtschaftslehre (1851-52), and Politik (1892). [Rosh'er.]

Roscius, QUINTUS (c. 134-62 B.C.), a slave by birth, became the greatest comic actor in Rome, reckoned the dictator Sulla and Cicero among his patrons, and gave Cicero lessons in elocution. He wrote a treatise on eloquence and acting. On his being sued at law for 50,000 sesterces, Cicero defended him in his extant oration, Pro Q. Roscio Comædo.—For the 'Young Roscius,' see BETTY.

Roscoe, WILLIAM, historian, born at Liverpool, 8th March 1753, in 1769 was articled to an attorney, and began to practise in 1774. In 1777 he published a poem, Mount Pleasant, and in 1787 The Wrongs of Africa, a protest against the slave-trade. But it was his Life of Lorenzo de Medici (1796) that established his literary reputation. His second great book, Life of Leo X. (1805), like the former, was translated into German, French, and Italian. He had retired from business in 1796, but in 1799 became partner in a Liverpool bank, which involved him (1816-20) in pecuniary embarrassment. From his pen also came poems, of which the best known is the Butterfly's Ball (1807); an edition of Pope; and a monograph on Monardrian plants. He died 30th June 1831. See Life by his son, Henry (1833), and Espinasse's Lancashire Worthies (2d series, 1877).—His grandson, SIR HENRY ENFIELD ROSCOE, chemist, born in London, 7th January 1833, and educated at Liverpool High School, University College, London, and Heidelberg, was professor of Chemistry in Owens College, Manchester, 1858-86. He was elected F.R.S. in 1863, was knighted in 1884, and was Liberal M.P. for South Manchester 1885-96. His works include Spectrum Analysis (1868), Lessons in Elementary Chemistry (1870), a Primer of Chemistry, the great Treatise on Chemistry (6 vols., with Schorlemmer, 1878-89; new ed. 1905 et seq.), a book on Dalton, A New View of the Genesis of the Atomic Theory, and his own Life and Experiences (1906).

Rose, GEORGE (1744-1818), a supporter of Pitt, born near Brechin, died near Lyndhurst. See his Diaries (1859). See also SKETCHLEY.

Rose, HUGH. See STRATHNAIRN.

Rose, HUGH JAMES (1795-1838), born at Little Horsted, Sussex, studied at Trinity, Cambridge, and took orders. At his Suffolk rectory was held in 1833 the 'Hadleigh conference' that preceded the Tractarian movement.—His brother, HENRY JAMES ROSE (1800-73), born at Uckfield, became in 1824 a fellow of St John's, Cambridge, in 1837 rector of Houghton Conquest, and in 1866 archdeacon of Bedford.—His son, the Rev. HUGH JAMES ROSE (1840-78), wrote two excellent books on Spain. See Burgon's Twelve Good Men (1888).

Rosebery, ARCHIBALD PHILIP PRIMROSE, EARL OF, born in London, 7th May 1847, and educated at Eton and Christ Church, succeeded his grandfather as fifth earl in 1868. In 1874 he was president of the Social Science Congress, and in 1878 Lord Rector of Aberdeen University, in 1880 of Edinburgh, in 1899 of Glasgow, in 1881-83 Under-secretary for the Home Department, and in 1884 became First Commissioner of Works. In July 1886, and again in 1892-94, he was Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Gladstone administration. Cambridge gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1888. In 1889-90 and 1892 he was chairman of the London County Council. On Mr Gladstone's retirement he became Liberal premier (March 1894); and after his government had been defeated at the general election (1895) remained leader of the Liberal Opposition till 1896, when he resigned the leadership. A spokesman for imperial federation, he was imperialist during the Boer war, and as head of the Liberal League from 1902 represented a policy, first set forth in a famous speech at Chesterfield, but not accepted by official Liberals. His attitude in 1909-10 was independent or Conservative. In 1911 he was created Earl of Midlothian. He won the Derby in 1894 and 1895. He has written books on Pitt (1891), Peel (1899), the 'last phase' of Napoleon's career (1900), and the early life of Chatham (1910). In 1878 he married the only daughter (1851-90) of Baron Meyer de Rothschild.

Rosecrans, WILLIAM STARKE, American general, born at Kingston, Ohio, 6th September 1819, was in the engineers until 1854, when he turned civil engineer and manufacturer of kerosene. In 1861 he became aide to McClellan, whom he succeeded, and kept Lee out of Western Virginia. In 1862 he commanded a division at the siege of Corinth, and after its capture commanded the army of the Mississippi; in September he defeated Price at Iuka, and in October defended Corinth against Price and Van Dorn. In the battles at Stone River (Dec. 1862 and Jan. 1863), against Bragg, he converted what had nearly been a defeat into a victory; but at Chickamauga, Sept. 19-20, 1863, he was defeated by Bragg, although he held Chattanooga. He was superseded by Grant, but in 1864 repelled Price's invasion of Missouri. In 1868-69 he was minister to Mexico, in 1881-85 congressman, and then registrar of the U.S. treasury. He died in March 1898.

Rosencrentz, CHRISTIAN, the alleged founder in 1459 of the Rosicrucians. See ANDREA, and Waite's Real History of the Rosicrucians (1887).

Rosenkranz, KARL (1805-79), philosopher, born at Magdeburg, in 1833 became professor of Philosophy at Königsberg. His works include an encyclopedia of theology, criticisms of Schleiermacher and Strauss, and books on Poetry, Education, Diderot, and Goethe; but he is best known by his works on the Hegelian system (1840-56) and his Life of Hegel (1844). See his unfinished autobiography (1873) and Life by Quabicker (1879).

Rosenmüller, JOHANN GEORG (1736-1815), theologian, filled chairs at Erlangen (1773), Giessen (1783), and Leipzig (1785). He published Scholia in Novum Testamentum (6th ed. 1815-31) and a hundred other works.—His son, ERNST FRIEDRICH KARL (1768-1835), biblical critic and orientalist, was a professor at Leipzig, and wrote Scholia in Vetus Testamentum (1788-1835), books on Arabic grammar, and a manual of biblical antiquities.

Rosmead, LORD. See ROBINSON, HERCULES.

Rosmini, ANTONIO ROSMINI-SERBATI, philosopher, was born at Roveredo in the Italian Tyrol, 25th March 1797, and studied for the priesthood. Master of an ample fortune, he worked out a philosophical system for the truths of revelation, while he planned a new institution for the training of teachers and priests. In 1826-28 he lived mostly in Milan, thought out the rule of his new order, visited Rome, gained the approval of Pius VIII., and published his New Essay on the Origin of Ideas (1830). After a few years of labour at Trent he settled in 1837 at Stresa on Lago Maggiore, and in 1839 received from Gregory XVI. the formal approval of his Institute. He now sent volume after volume to the press, overpowered his opponents, and foiled the intrigues of Jesuit enemies. His dream in politics, as expressed in his Constitution according to Social Justice (1848), was a confederation of the states of Italy under the pope as perpetual president. For seven weeks he was envoy of Piedmont at the papal court, and followed Pius IX. to Gaeta, but found his mind poisoned against him by Antonelli and the reactionary party. When his Constitution and The Five Wounds of Holy Church (trans. 1853) were prohibited by the Congregation of the Index, he returned to Stresa to spend the rest of his life in devotion and the development of his philosophy. After a scrutiny (1851-54) the Congregation had declared Rosmini's writings to be entirely free from censure, when he died 1st July 1855. In 1888 forty propositions from his posthumous works were condemned by the Holy Office. The 'Institute of the Brethren of Charity' survived, and among the Rosminian Fathers are to be found some of the most devoted sons of the Roman Church. Rosmini's masterpiece is his New Essay on the Origin of Ideas (1830; trans. 1833-84) or his Psychology (1846-48; trans. 1884-88). Death overtook him before he had completed the Theosophy (1859-74). His Sketch of Modern Philosophies was translated by Father Lockhart (1882; 3d ed. 1891). A Bibliography, with a Life, is prefixed by Thomas Davidson to his trans. (1882) of the Sistema Filosofico (1845). See Lives by Tommaseo (1855), Paoli (1880-84), and Father Lockhart (2d ed. 1886). Rosny, LÉON DE, Japanese scholar, born at Loos (Nord), 5th August 1837, has been since 1868 a professor in Paris. He has written much.

Ross, ALEXANDER (1590-1654), a voluminous author, remembered solely from a couplet in Hudibras, was born at Aberdeen, and became a schoolmaster and clergyman at Southampton.

Ross, SIR HEW DALRYMPLE (1779-1868), born at Balkal, Wigtownshire, served with high distinction in the artillery in the Peninsular war and at Waterloo, and was made a G.C.B. in 1855, a field-marshal in 1868. He died in London.

Ross, SIR JOHN, Arctic voyager, born June 24, 1777, at Inch manse in Wigtownshire, entered the navy at nine, and served with distinction in the French wars. In 1818 he went to explore Baffin Bay and attempt a North-west Passage, and published A Voyage of Discovery (1819). Another expedition (1829), fitted out by Sir Felix Booth, discovered the peninsula of 'Boothia Felix,' brought Ross knighthood on his return in 1833, and was described in a second book (1835). He made an unsuccessful attempt to find Sir John Franklin in 1850. He wrote a Life of Lord De Saumarez, a treatise on steam-navigation, &c., and died in London, August 30, 1856.—SIR JAMES CLARK ROSS, his nephew, born April 15, 1800, accompanied Sir John in his first and second Polar voyages, and in the interval between was with Parry in his expeditions. He discovered in 1831 the North magnetic pole, and was made post-captain. After being employed in a magnetic survey of the British Islands, he commanded the Erebus and Terror in an expedition to the Antarctic seas (1839). He was knighted in 1843, and in 1847 published his Voyage of Discovery. In 1848-49 he made a voyage to Baffin Bay in search of Franklin. He died at Aylesbury, April 3, 1862. See Mackinder, Ross and the Antarctic (1892).

Ross, SIR WILLIAM CHARLES, R.A. (1794-1860), a London miniaturist, knighted in 1842.

Rosse, WILLIAM PARSONS, EARL OF (1800-67), astronomer, born in York, graduated from Magdalen College, Oxford, with a mathematical first, in 1822. During his father's lifetime he sat in parliament for King's County as Lord Oxmantown from 1821 to 1834; in 1841 he succeeded as third earl. He experimented in fluid lenses, and made great improvements in casting specula for the reflecting telescope. In 1842-45 he constructed his great reflecting telescope, 58 feet long, in his park at Parsonstown, at a cost of £30,000; in 1848-54 he was president of the Royal Society.

Rossetti, GABRIELE, born 28th Feb. 1783 at Vasto in Abruzzo Citeriore, was appointed curator of ancient bronzes in the Museum of Naples, and was a member of the provisional government sent to Rome by Murat (1813). After the restoration of Ferdinand to Naples in 1815 Rossetti joined the Carbonari; and when in 1820 a military uprising extorted a constitution, he saluted it in one of his most celebrated odes. In 1821 the constitutionalists were proscribed, but he escaped to Malta, and in 1824 came to London as a teacher of Italian. In 1826 he married Frances Mary Lavinia Polidori (1800-86), and in 1831 became professor of Italian in King's College. He died 26th April 1854. Besides his poems, he wrote commentaries on Dante to show that the Inferno was chiefly political and anti-papal, that Beatrice was a symbolic personage, not a real woman, &c.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI (baptised Gabriel Charles Dante), his elder son, was born in London, 12th May 1828, and in 1846 entered the antique school of the Royal Academy. With Mil-lais, Holman Hunt, and Woolner he founded the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, whose aim was to exhibit true and high ideas through the medium of true and rightly-elaborated details. Rossetti's earliest oil-picture was 'The Girlhood of Mary Virgin' (1849); his next (1850), now in the National Gallery, was 'The Annunciation.' After this his art developed through other phases, in which the sense of human beauty, intensity of abstract expression, and richness of colour were leading elements. He produced numerous water-colours of a legendary or romantic cast. Among his principal pictures are the Triptych for Llandaff Cathedral of the 'Infant Christ adored by a Shepherd and a King,' 'The Beloved' (the Bride of the Canticles), 'Dante's Dream' (now in the Walker Gallery, Liverpool), 'Beata Beatrix' (National Gallery), 'Pandora,' 'Proserpine,' 'The Blessed Damozel' (from one of his own poems), 'The Roman Widow,' 'La Ghirlandata,' 'Venus Astarte,' and 'The Day-dream.' Besides some juvenile work and some translations from the German, he published The Early Italian Poets (1861) and Dante and his Circle (1874). Of his original poems, The Portrait and The Blessed Damozel were written in his nineteenth year. These and many others were about to be published when, on 11th February 1862, his wife, Elizabeth Eleanor Siddal, whom he had married in 1860, and who lives in so many of his pictures, died of an overdose of laudanum. He buried his MSS. in her coffin, but in 1869 recovered them, and issued Poems (1870). The volume was reviewed with great admiration by leading critics; but in 1871 Mr Robert Buchanan in the Contemporary pseudonymously assailed it and republished his article, The Fleshly School of Poetry, as a pamphlet. Rossetti, already in a depressed state of health, a slave of chloral, was much disturbed by this, and became morbidly sensitive and gloomy, and very reclusive in his habits. In 1881 he published Ballads and Sonnets (containing 'Rose Mary,' 'The White Ship,' 'The King's Tragedy,' and the completed sonnet-sequence, 'The House of Life'), and reissued, with changes, the Poems of 1870. He died at Birchington near Margate, 9th April 1882, and was buried there. See the Family Letters and Memoir by his brother, William Michael (2 vols. 1895); that brother's Rossetti as Designer and Writer (1889); Rossetti's Letters to W. Allingham (1897); Theodore Watts-Dunton in Encycl. Britannica and Nineteenth Century for March 1883; works by Sharp (1882), Hall Caine (1882), Knight (1887), Hueffer (1902), A. C. Benson (1904), and Marillier (3rd ed. 1904).

CHRISTINA GEORGINA ROSSETTI, a daughter of the exile, born in London, 5th December 1830, ranks as one of the greatest and most spiritual of English poetesses. She wrote Goblin-Market and other Poems (1862), The Prince's Progress and other Poems (1866), Singsong (1872), A Pageant and other Poems (1881), and New Poems (1896); and, in prose, Commonplace and other Stories (1870), Speaking Likenesses (1874), and a few volumes of a devotional kind, including Time Flies, a Reading Diary. Most of her poems were reissued in 1890. Ten years an invalid, she died 29th Dec. 1894, and was buried at Highgate. See Life by M. Bell (1898).

Her elder sister, MARIA FRANCESCA (1827-76), who in 1874 joined an Anglican sisterhood, wrote A Shadow of Dante (1871). And a brother, WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI (born 25th Sept. 1829), assistant-secretary to the Board of Inland Revenue 1869-94, has published much. He married in 1874 LUCY (1843-94), only daughter of Ford Madox Brown, herself a painter.

Rossi, BERNARDINO DEI, painter, was at work in Milan in 1490, in 1498-1508 was painting the frescoes at the Certosa of Pavia, and was still working in 1511.

Rossi, GIAN BATTISTA DE (1822-94), born at Rome, explored and wrote on the catacombs. See German monograph by Baumgarten (1892).

Rossi, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DE (1494-1541), religious painter, born in Florence, and summoned to France in 1530, committed suicide.

Rossi, JOHN CHARLES FELIX, R.A. (1762-1839), sculptor, was born at Nottingham, an Italian doctor's son, and lived and died in London.

Rossi, PELLEGRINO, born at Carrara, 13th July 1787, became professor of Law at Bologna at twenty-five. Exiled after the fall of Murat, he obtained a chair at Geneva, and there wrote his Traité de Droit Pénal. In 1833 Louis-Philippe made him professor of Political Economy at the Collège de France. He was sent to Rome as French ambassador in 1845. Called to the ministry by Pius IX., Rossi, by opposing the Savoy party and striving for an Italian confederation with the pope as president, roused the hatred of the Romans, and was assassinated 15th Nov. 1848.

Rossini, GIOACCHINO ANTONIO, composer, was born at Pesaro, February 29, 1792, the son of a strolling horn-player, and studied music and singing at Bologna. At Milan, in 1812, La Pietra di Paragone made a great impression; next year Tancredi, at Venice, created the wildest excitement; and in 1816 Il Barbiere di Siviglia was received at Rome with enthusiasm. Otello, at Naples, marked an advance, but was not at first successful. The comic Cenerentola (1817) was favourably received in Rome, and La Gazza Ladra at Milan. These were rapidly followed at Naples by Armida and Mosè in Egitto (1818), La Donna del Lago (1819), and Maometto Secondo (1820). In 1821 Rossini married the singer Isabella Colbran, and the two had triumphs at Vienna. Semiramide (1823), the most advanced of his Italian works, had only a lukewarm reception from the Venetians. In England he was warmly welcomed, and he next settled at Paris as director of the Théâtre Italien for eighteen months. He adapted several of his works to French taste: Maometto (as Le Siège de Corinthe), Moïse, and Le Comte d'Orly. Here appeared in August 1829 his greatest work, Guillaume Tell, conceived and written in a much nobler style than his Italian operas; its success was immense, but, owing to the wretched libretto, not lasting. From this period he produced little but the Stabat Mater (1841), popular, but little in keeping with the majestic sadness of the subject. In 1836 he retired to Bologna, where he raised the Liceo to a high position. In 1847 revolutionary disturbances drove him to Florence. In 1855 he returned to Paris, and became one of the most noted personalities of the capital. He died November 13, 1868. Rossini stands at the head of Italian composers for the stage, though only a few of his operas hold the field—the Barber, Semiramide, and William Tell. See two Lives by H. S. Edwards (1869) and 'Great Musicians' (1881), and works by Azevedo (1865), Zanolini (1875), and Sittard (1882). [Rossee'nee.]

Rostopchine, FEODOR VASSILIEVICH, COUNT (1763-1826), Russian general, won great influence over the Emperor Paul, and in 1812 became, under Alexander, governor of Moscow. He it was who planned or at least had a share in the burning of Moscow. His works include historical memoirs, two comedies, &c., in Russian and French. See Life by Ségur (1872). [Res-top'chin.]

Rothe, RICHARD (1799-1867), theologian, born at Posen, studied at Heidelberg and Berlin, and went to Rome in 1823 as chaplain to Bunsen's embassy. From 1828 he was professor at Wittenberg, Heidelberg, Bonn, and finally Heidelberg. He sought to carry into effect Christ's distinction between mere outward form and inward spirit, and to develop a glorified Erastianism in his unfinished Anfänge der Christlichen Kirche (1837). His greatest work is Theologische Ethik (1845-48; 2d ed. by Holtzmann, 1869-71). His posthumous Dogmatik (1870-71) distinguishes sharply between Revelation itself and the Bible—its documentary record. Rothe took an active part in ecclesiastical affairs as a leader in the School of Conciliation. Prolegomena contributed to Studien und Kritiken he collected under the title Zur Dogmatik (1863). After his death there were edited from his papers sermons (1869-72), lectures on church history (1875-76), meditations on the Pastoral Epistles (1876-77), a commentary on First John (1878), a Theologische Encyclopädie (1880), a history of preaching (1881), and lectures and essays (1886). His Stille Stunden, an admirable collection of aphorisms, was edited by Nippold (1872; trans. 1886), who also wrote his Life (1873-74). [Rot'eh.]

Rotherham, THOMAS (1423-1500), born at Rotherham, became Archdeacon of Canterbury 1467, Bishop of Rochester 1468, Chancellor of England 1474, and Archbishop of York 1480.

Rothschild, MEYER AMSCHEL (named from his father's signboard, the 'Red Shield'), born at Frankfurt in 1743, was educated for a Jewish rabbi, but founded a business as a money-lender and became the financial adviser of the Landgrave of Hesse. The house got a heavy commission for transmitting money from the English government to Wellington in Spain, paid the British subsidies to continental princes, and negotiated loans for Denmark between 1804 and 1812. At his death, 13th September 1812, the founder left five sons, all of whom were made barons of the Austrian empire in 1822.—ANSELM MEYER (1773-1855), eldest son, succeeded as head of the firm at Frankfurt.—SOLOMON (1774-1855) established a branch at Vienna; NATHAN MEYER (1777-1836), one in 1798 at London; CHARLES (1788-1855), one at Naples (discontinued about 1861); and JAMES (1792-1868), one at Paris. They negotiated many of the great government loans of the 19th century, and Nathan raised the house to be first amongst the banking-houses of the world. He staked his fortunes on the success of Britain in her duel with Napoleon, and, receiving the first news of Waterloo, sold and bought stock which brought him a million of profit; that he himself was present at the battle is a myth.—His son LIONEL (1808-79) did much for the civil and political emancipation of the Jews in Great Britain.—Lionel's son, NATHAN (born 8th Nov. 1840), succeeded to the baronetcy conferred in 1847 on his uncle Anthony, and was made Baron Rothschild in 1885. His niece Hannah (1851-90) in 1878 married the Earl of Rosebery. See Reeves' The Rothschilds (1887), a German work by Von Scherb (1892), and a French one by Demachy (1896). [German pron. Roth'scheidl.]

Rotrou, JEAN DE, born at Dreux, August 21, 1609, went early to Paris, and became a busy playwright, as well as one of the five poets who worked into dramatic form the ideas of Richelieu. His first pieces were in the Spanish romantic style. Next followed a classical period, culminating with three masterpieces, Saint-Genest, a tragedy of Christian martyrdom; Don Bertrand, a comedy; and Venceslas. He died of the plague at Dreux, 28th June 1650. Thirty-five of his plays are still extant. A complete edition was edited by Viollet-le-Duc (1820-22). See works by Jarry (1868), Steffen (1882), Chardon (1884), Morel (1885), G. Steffens (German, 1891), Stiehl (do. 1891), and Spozon (Danish, 1894). [Rot-roo.]

Roubillac, LOUIS-FRANÇOIS (1695-1762), sculptor, born at Lyons, studied mainly at Paris, and before 1738 settled in London, where he spent his name Roubillac. His statue of Handel for Vauxhall Gardens in 1738 first made him popular. His other most famous statues are those of Newton (1755) at Cambridge, of Shakespeare (1758), now in the British Museum, and another of Handel in Westminster Abbey. See Life by Le Roy de Sainte-Croix (Par. 1882), and A. Dobson's Eighteenth-Century Vignettes (1894). [Roo-beel-yak.]

Rouget de Lisle, CLAUDE JOSEPH (1760-1836), born at Lons-le-Saunice, wrote and composed the Marseillaise when stationed in 1792 as captain of engineers at Strasburg. Wounded at Quiberon (1795), he quit the army, and lived poorly in Paris until Louis-Philippe in 1830 awarded him a small pension. He published in 1796 a volume of Essais en Vers et en Prose. The Marseillaise, by its author called Chant de l'Armée du Rhin, was made known in Paris by troops from Marseilles. See Lives by Poisle-Desgranges (1864) and Tiersot (1892). [Roo-zhay deh Leel.]

Rough, JOHN, a Scotch Protestant, educated at St Andrews, entered a monastery at Stirling, and was burned at Smithfield, 22d Dec. 1557.

Rouher, EUGÈNE (1814-84), born at Riom, practised there as advocate up to 1848, and then was returned to the Constituent Assembly. In 1849 he became minister of Justice, and with slight interruptions was for twenty years a member of the government. He negotiated the treaty of commerce with England in 1860 and with Italy in 1863. In that year he was appointed minister of State, and in 1870 president of the Senate. A staunch Napoleonist, after the fall of the empire he fled abroad. In 1872-75 he represented Corsica in the National Assembly. [Roo-air.]

Rous, FRANCIS (1579-1659), born at Halton near Saltash, and educated at Oxford, was a member of the Long Parliament, sat in the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and in 1644 was made provost of Eton. His writings were collected in 1657. His metrical version of the Psalms was recommended by the House of Commons to the Westminster Assembly, and is still substantially the Psalter of Scottish Presbyterians. [Rouss.]

Rous, HENRY JOHN (1795-1877), admiral, Conservative M.P., and dictator of the turf.

Rousseau, JEAN BAPTISTE (1670-1741), born in Paris, a shoemaker's son, wrote for the theatre, and by lampoons on the literary frequenters of the Café Laurent raised feuds which led to recriminations, lawsuits, and a sentence of banishment (1712). Henceforth he lived abroad, in Switzerland, Vienna (with Prince Eugene), and Brussels, where he died. Rousseau's sacred odes and cantatas are splendidly elaborate, frigid, and artificial; his epigrams are bright, vigorous, and unerring in their aim. Editions are by Amar (1820) and A. de Latour (1869). See also his Œuvres Lyriques, by Mannel (1852), and Contes inédits, by Luzarche (1881).

Rousseau, JEAN JACQUES, was born 28th June 1712 in Geneva of a French Protestant family. His mother died immediately after his birth; and in 1722 his father, involved in a brawl, fled the city, and left him to the care of relations. At thirteen his uncle placed him with a notary, who found him utterly incompetent; thereafter he was apprenticed to an engraver, who treated him with great cruelty. In 1728 he ran away, and began the adventurous career for which his Confessions form our authority. As he wandered on he was entertained by a priest of Savoy; and Jean Jacques, feigning eagerness to espouse Catholicism, was sent off to Madame de Warens at Annecy, who should look after the Calvinistic vagrant. By her he was transmitted to a hospice in Turin, where he was baptised and discharged. He in vain sought work, till a shopkeeper's wife gave him employment, and to her he acted as servant and lover, till on her husband's return he was kicked out. After being in turn footman, lackey, and secretary, he travelled back to Madame de Warens in 1731. This lady lived apart from her husband on a pension. She was twenty-eight years old, pretty and piquant, not rigid in morals. To her Jean Jacques became pupil and friend, factotum, and ultimately lover, through nearly nine years; the attachment ceased when, on returning from a visit, he found himself supplanted by a wigmaker. He now became a tutor in Lyons, and taught lamentably. In 1741 he went to Paris with some letters of introduction and a system of musical notation which was pronounced by the Academy of Sciences 'neither useful nor original.' He copied music for a livelihood, and got a secretaryship; and he had formed a connection with a servant-girl at his inn, Thérèse le Vasseur, who was utterly illiterate, densely stupid, plain-featured, and vulgar. By her he had five children, each of whom he in turn deserted and consigned to the foundling hospital. He became conspicuous in 1749 by a Discourse on Arts and Sciences, written for a prize offered by the Academy of Dijon, in which he denounced audaciously and eloquently letters, arts, sciences, and all culture as proofs of and causes of corruption. In 1753 he composed an opera, the Devin du Village, full of sparkling airs (one of them the hymn-tune Rousseau's Dream); it was played before the court at Fontainebleau. In the same year his Discourse on the Origin of Inequality, which established his position as a writer, argued that all civilisation is a state of social degradation, and pronounced the primeval savage life the state of human simplicity and perfection; all property is derived from confiscation, all wealth is a crime, all government is tyranny, all social laws are unjust. Meanwhile he lived poorly, dressed meanly, and acted churlishly to show his independence, yet accepted from Madame d'Épinay the offer of a cottage on the skirts of the forest of Montmorency. There he retired with Thérèse and her obnoxious mother. His suspicious temper fostered misunderstandings with his patroness, and bitter quarrels with her friend Baron Grimm, and with his own friend Diderot; and he quitted the Hermitage for a cottage at Montlouis, where he found friends in the Duke and Duchess of Luxembourg. In 1760 he published his romance The New Héloïse, which was instantly received with applause. This was followed by the treatise on the Social Contract (1762), published in Amsterdam in order to escape French censorship; there two months later also appeared Émile. The first work raised the recluse to the foremost rank; but the views in Émile on kings and government made him obnoxious to the state, and its deistic teaching hateful to the church. Rousseau fled to Motiers in Neuchâtel, where he was safe under the rule of Frederick the Great. Here he botanised, made lace, wrote his Letters from the Mountain, and addressed a powerful reply to the Archbishop of Paris; hence also the heretic was driven by the hostility of the villagers in 1764. A residence on the Lake of Biennne was ended by threat of prosecution from the government of Berne; and he accepted the offer of a home in England, given through David Hume in 1766. For eighteen months he lived at Wootton in Staffordshire, writing his Botanical Dictionary and composing his Confessions. His suspicious nature had soured with his trials and his years. He had quarrelled with almost every friend; he believed that the English government sought his life. Suddenly crossing the Channel (1767), he took shelter with the Marquis de Mirabeau and the Prince de Conti; then in 1770 returned to Paris, and followed his old life as copyist. Here he wrote the wild, half-mad dialogues, Rousseau juge de Jean Jacques, where he vindicates his character in a strain which casts doubt on his sanity, and his Réveries du Promeneur Solitaire, which, in singular contrast, are calm, idyllic, and perfect. Still the delusions increased, till, after craving shelter in a hospital, he retired in 1778 to a cottage given him by M. de Girardin at Ermenonville. Here, with a suddenness which has given ground for suspicion of suicide, Jean Jacques Rousseau died, 2d July 1778. We may receive his own version of many of his own acts with doubt, and his interpretation of the acts of others with reserve, while details in the Confessions are in many cases inaccurate; but as a picture of the man they are strikingly truthful. His New Héloïse, amidst all its falsetto passion, taught an artificial society the rights of the poor and the duties of the rich. The Social Contract proceeds on the premise that the basis of society is an original compact by which each member surrenders his will to the will of all, on the condition that he gets protection or defence; it demands a republic with universal suffrage, and proclaims the doctrines of liberty, equality, and fraternity which became war-cries of the Revolution. Émile did much to discourage the faults and neglects of an artificial society towards children, and to indicate a more natural and less pedantic method of training and developing the physical, mental, and moral faculties; Rousseau's ideas here were in large measure carried out by educationists like Froebel and Pestalozzi. His famous chapter on the Savoyard vicar's confession kindled in France a spirit of theism instead of cynical scepticism, and inspired Revolutionists like Robespierre with the doctrine that belief in a God is essential for society and the state. Rousseau, Théodore, landscape-painter, born in Paris, 15th April 1812, studied the old masters in the Louvre, and by 1833 had begun sketching in the Forest of Fontainebleau. He first exhibited in the Salon of 1831; and in 1834 his 'Forest of Compiègne' was bought by the Duc d'Orléans. Some twelve years of discouragement followed, but in 1849 he resumed exhibiting, and gained a first-class medal. In 1867 he was appointed an officer of the Legion of Honour, but died 22d December. He was an exceedingly prolific, if a somewhat unequal, painter. See Sensier, Souvenirs de Théodore Rousseau (1872); and D. C. Thomson, The Barbizon School (1890).—His brother, PHILIPPE (1808–87), animal and still-life painter, was born and died in Paris.

Routh, EDWARD JOHN (1831–1907), born at Quebec, and educated at University College, London, and Peterhouse, Cambridge, became a mathematical coach, and by 1888, when he retired, had turned out twenty-seven senior wranglers.

Routh, MARTIN JOSEPH, born at St Margaret's South Elmham, Suffolk, 18th September 1755, from Beccles went up in 1770 to Queen's College, Oxford. In 1771 he was elected a demy, in 1775 a fellow, and in 1791 president of Magdalen. He took deacon's orders in 1777, but priest's not till 1810, when he was presented to the rectory of Tylehurst near Reading, worth £1000 a-year; ten years later he married Eliza Agnes Blagrave (1790–1869). He died at Magdalen, 22d December 1854, in his hundredth year. A little shrunken figure, with 'such a wig as one only sees in old pictures,' he had grown very deaf, but till well after ninety retained his eyesight and marvellous memory, could walk six miles and climb a stiffish hill, mount the library steps, and study till past midnight. Newman and Bancroft were among his later friends; the earlier had included Dr Parr, Samuel Johnson, and Porson. He was a great patristic scholar when patristic scholars were few, a Caroline churchman, a liberal Tory, a lover of his dogs and canary and joke, a mighty book-buyer—his 16,000 volumes he bequeathed to Durham University. For just seventy years he was publishing, but his works number only six; two of these are editions of Burnet ('I know the man to be a liar, and I am determined to prove him so'). He will be remembered by his Reliquiæ Sacræ (1814–48), but still more for his sage advice, 'Always verify your references, sir.' See Burgon's Lives of Twelve Good Men (1888).

Routledge, GEORGE (1812–88), born at Brampton, came to London in 1833, and started as a bookseller in 1836, a publisher in 1843. In 1848–51 he took two brothers-in-law, Warne, into partnership. [Rut'ledj.]

ROUX, PIERRE PAUL ÉMILE, bacteriologist, born at Confolens (Charente), 17th December 1853, studied at Clermont-Ferrand, and became assistant to Pasteur, and in 1905 his successor. With Yersin he discovered (1894) the antitoxic method of treating diphtheria.

ROUX, WILHELM, anatomist and physiologist, born at Jena, 9th June 1850, after filling posts at Leipzig and Breslau, became a professor at Innsbruck in 1889, at Halle in 1895. He has written Die Entwickelungsmechanik der Organismen (1890), &c.

Row, JOHN (c. 1525–80), Scottish Reformer, educated at Stirling and St Andrews, in 1550 was sent by the archbishop to Rome, and took his LL.D. at Padua. In 1558 he returned to Scotland, and next year turned Protestant. In 1560 he aided in compiling the Confession of Faith and First Book of Discipline, became minister of Perth, and sat in the first General Assembly. He was four times moderator, and took a share in preparing the Second Book of Discipline.—His eldest son, JOHN ROW (1568–1646), minister from 1592 of Carnock near Dunfermline, wrote a prolix but reliable History of the Kirk of Scotland (edited for the Wodrow and Maitland Clubs by David Laing, 1842). It extends from 1558 to 1687, but was continued to 1639 by his second son, JOHN ROW (c. 1598–1672), successively rector of Perth grammar-school, minister at Aberdeen, moderator of the Assembly there in 1644, and principal of King's College in 1651. Like his father and grandfather he was a learned Hebraist. [Row.]

Rowe, NICHOLAS (1674–1718), born at Little Barford, Bedfordshire, and educated at Westminster, was called to the bar, but, in 1692 coming into £300 a-year, devoted himself to literature. Between 1700 and 1715 he produced eight plays, of which three were long popular—Tamerlane (1702), The Fair Penitent (1703), and Jane Shore (1714). The character of Lothario in The Fair Penitent was the prototype of Lovelace in Richardson's Clarissa, and the name is still the synonym for a fashionable rake. Rowe translated Lucan's Pharsalia, and his work, says Dr Johnson, 'deserves more notice than it obtains.' His edition of Shakespeare (1709–10) at least contributed to the popularity of his author. In 1709–11 Rowe was Under-secretary to the Duke of Queensberry; in 1715 he was appointed poet-laureate and a surveyor of customs to the port of London; the Prince of Wales made him clerk of his Council, and Lord Chancellor Parker clerk of Presentations in Chancery. He was buried in Poets' Corner.

Rowlandson, THOMAS (1756–1827), caricaturist, born in London, and sent at fifteen to Paris, there studied art and gained a taste for the pleasures of the town. The £7000 left him by a French aunt he gambled away, yet he hated debt, and maintained his uprightness of character. He travelled over England and Wales, and enjoyed life to the full in his tavern and the company of friends like Morland, Gillray, and Bunbury. Rowlandson possessed rare dexterity of touch and fertility of imagination; and, though not seldom vulgar, he was never feeble. He was a relentless hater of Napoleon, belittling his greatness by countless travesties. Some of his best-known works are his Imitations of Modern Drawings (1784–88), and his illustrations to Syntax's Three Tours, the Dance of Death, Sterne's Sentimental Journey, Peter Pindar, the Bath Guide, Munchausen, &c. See Grego's Rowlandson the Caricaturist (1880).

Rowley, WILLIAM (c. 1585–c. 1642), actor and playwright, of whose life little is known, save that he collaborated with Dekker, Middleton, Heywood, Webster, Massinger, and Ford. Four plays published with his name are extant: A New Wonder, a Woman never vex'd (1632); All's Lost by Lust, a tragedy (1633); A Match at Midnight (1633); and A Shoemaker a Gentleman (1638).

ROY, WILLIAM, F.R.S., born May 4, 1726, at Miltonhead, Carlisle, Lanarkshire, in 1747 was engaged on the survey of Scotland, in 1755 held an army commission, and rose to be major-general in 1781. In 1784 as a labour of love he measured a base line on Hounslow Heath of 5½ miles, which, though practically the first of the kind in Britain, was executed with such care that, when it was remeasured in 1791, the difference was found to be only 2½ inches. For this he received the Royal Society's Copley medal. Ill-health had led him to winter at Lisbon, when he died in London, 1st July 1790. In 1764 Roy studied the Roman remains in Scotland, and his Military Antiquities of the Romans in Britain was published in 1793 by the Society of Antiquaries.

Roxburghe, DUKE OF. See KER.

Royer-Collard, PIERRE PAUL (1763–1845), born at Sompuis in Champagne, and bred for an advocate, on the outbreak of the Revolution was elected member of the municipality of Paris. In 1792 he fled from the Jacobins to his birthplace, and in 1797 served for a few months on the Council of Five Hundred. Professor from 1810 of Philosophy in Paris, he exercised an immense influence on French philosophy, rejecting the purely sensuous system of Condillac, and giving special prominence to the principles of the Scottish School of Reid and Stewart. Strongly 'spiritualist' as opposed to materialism, he originated the 'Doctrinaire' school of Jouffroy and Cousin. In 1815-20 he was president of the Commission of Public Instruction, in 1815 was returned as deputy for Marne, and in 1827 entered the French Academy. He became president in 1828 of the Chamber of Representatives, and presented the address of March 1830, which the king refused to hear read. See Lives by Philippe (1857), Barante (3d ed. 1878), and Spuller (1895).

Roze, MARIE, operatic singer, born in Paris, 2d March 1846, studied at the Conservatoire, and appeared first at the Opéra Comique in 1865, at the Grand Opéra in 1869, in London in 1872, and in the States in 1877. In the Franco-German war she engaged in ambulance work. She married in 1874 the American bass singer, Julius Perkins, and in 1877 (unhappily) the impresario, 'Col.' James Henry Mapleson. She now teaches in Paris.

Rubens, PETER PAUL, was born 29th June 1577 at Siegen in Westphalia, where his father, an Antwerp lawyer, was then imprisoned for a liaison with the wife of William the Silent. On the death of her husband at Cologne in 1587, his mother returned to Antwerp, where the boy was educated in the Jesuits' college. He was for a short time in the household of Margaret de Ligne, widow of the Count of Lanaing, and was intended for the law; but at thirteen he began to study art. In 1600 he started for Italy, and in Venice studied the works of Titian and Veronese. He next entered the service of Vincenzo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua; and in 1605 was despatched on a mission to Philip III. of Spain, thus beginning the career of a diplomatist, for which his keen intellect, polished urbanity, and linguistic attainments qualified him. While at Madrid he executed many portraits, as well as several historical subjects. On his return from Spain he travelled in Italy, copying celebrated works for the Duke of Mantua. In 1608 he returned home, and, settling in Antwerp, was appointed in 1609 court-painter to the Archduke Albert, and soon afterwards married his first wife, Isabella Brant, whom his pencil has often portrayed. The painter was now rapidly approaching his full artistic maturity, and his 'Descent from the Cross' (1611-14) in Antwerp cathedral is usually regarded as his masterpiece. In 1620 Rubens was invited to France by Marie de' Medici, the queen-mother, who was then engaged in decorating the palace of the Luxembourg; and he undertook for her twenty-one large subjects commemorating her marriage to Henry IV.—works, completed in 1625, which are now in the Louvre. In 1628 he was despatched by the Infanta Isabella upon a diplomatic mission to Philip IV. of Spain. In Madrid he made the acquaintance of Velasquez, and executed some forty works, including five portraits of the Spanish monarch. In 1629 he was appointed envoy to Charles I. of England, to treat for peace; and, while he conducted a delicate negotiation with tact and success, he painted the 'Peace and War' (National Gallery) and the portrait of the king and his queen as St George and Cleolinde (Windsor), and also made sketches for the Apotheosis of James I. for the Banqueting-hall at Whitehall, completing the pictures on his return to Antwerp. He was knighted by Charles I., and received a similar honour from Philip IV. In 1630 Rubens married his second wife, Helena Fourment; in 1635 he designed the decorations which celebrated the entry of the Cardinal Infant Ferdinand into Antwerp as governor of the Netherlands; and, having completed 'The Crucifixion of St Peter' for the church of that saint in Cologne, he died at Antwerp, 30th May 1640. The main characteristics of Rubens's productions are their power, spirit, and vivacity, their sense of energy, of exuberant life. It is, however, mainly on technical grounds that he claims supremacy, for his works are wanting in the dignity, quietude, refinement, and profound imagination which distinguish the greatest Italian painters. Many of his finest works are at Antwerp; but the Pinakothek at Munich contains nearly a hundred examples of his brush, several of them ranking with his noblest efforts. See Gachet's Lettres Inédites de P. P. Rubens (1840); De Waagen's Life of Rubens (1833; trans. 1840); Original Unpublished Papers Illustrative of the Life of Rubens, by W. Noel Sainsbury (1859); Michiels's Rubens et l'École d'Anvers (1877); other French works by Gachard (1877), Génard (1877), and Rooses (1886-92); the volume in the 'Great Artists' series by C. W. Kett (1880); and Correspondance de Rubens, edited by Ruelens (1887).

Rubinstein, ANTON, pianist and composer, was born of Jewish parents near Jassy in Moldavia, 28th November 1829, and was trained to music in Moscow. Liszt heard him play in Paris in 1841, and gave him much encouragement; in 1842 he first visited London. After studying in Berlin and Vienna, in 1848 he settled in St Petersburg as teacher of music. In 1862 he got a conservatoire founded, and became its director. But his concert-tours engrossed much of his time, and in 1867 he resigned the post, to resume it, however, in 1887. In 1872 he had an enthusiastic reception in the United States. He died at Peterhof near St Petersburg, 20th November 1894. Amongst Rubinstein's best productions are the operas, The Maccabees, The Demon, Feramos (the libretto from Moore's Lalla Rookh), and Kalaschnikoff; the two symphonies, Ocean and Dramatic; and the sacred operas, Paradise Lost, The Tower of Babel, and Sulamith. His songs and chamber music are highly esteemed and more widely known. In his style there is a predominance of the lyric, rhythmic, and formal elements, an exuberant melodiousness, and a tendency to protracted length. He was a strong opponent of Wagner. As a pianist he held the highest rank. His mastery of technique was supreme; the depth of feeling and significance he could impart to the simplest piece evinced a rare musical susceptibility. See Autobiography, trans. from the Russian (1891), a Study by M'Arthur (1889), and German Life by Zabel (1892). [Roobeen-stine.]

Rubruquis, WILLIAM DE, born probably at Rubronck near St Omer, entered the Franciscan order, and was despatched in 1253 by Louis IX. from Acre to Sartak, son of the Mongol prince, Batû Khan, a supposed Christian. Friar William travelled across the Black Sea and the Crimea to the Volga, by Sartak was referred to his father, and by him was sent forward to the Mongol emperor, Mangû Khan, whom he found on 27th

December, about ten days' journey south of Karakorum in Mongolia. With him he remained until July 1254, then returned to the Volga, and by way of the Caucasus, Armenia, Persia, and Asia Minor, arrived at Tripoli in August 1255. Louis had returned to France, and Friar William wrote him an account of his journey, edited by D'Arvezac in Recueil de Voyages (Paris Geog. Soc. 1839). He was still living in 1293, when Marco Polo was returning from the East. [Ree'-bree-keess.]

Rucellai, BERNARDO (1449-1514), Florentine scholar and diplomatist, father of the poet GIOVANNI RUCCELLAI (1475-1525), who lived much in Rome and took orders. His works were edited by Mazzoni, with Life (1887). [Roo-chel'v.]

Rückert, FRIEDRICH, poet, born at Schweinfurt, 16th May 1788, at Würzburg (1805-9) studied law, philology, and the muses. By his Deutsche Gedichte (1814) he helped Arndt and Körner to arouse German patriotism; in 1826-41 he filled the chair of Oriental Languages at Erlangen, in 1841-48 at Berlin. He recast in German verse several of the famous books of the East, as Die Vervandlungen des Abu Seid of Hariri (1826), Nal und Damajanti from the Mahābhārata (1828), and Rostem und Sohrab from Firdausi's Shah-Nameh (1838). His most popular books are the lyrics entitled Liebesfrühling (1844) and Die Weisheit des Brahmanen (1836-39). He died at Neuses near Coburg, 31st January 1866. See Lives by Fortlage (1867), Beyer (1868-77), Boxberger (1878), Konrad Fischer (1889), and F. Reuter (1891). [Reek'ert.]

Ruddiman, THOMAS (1674-1757), Latin grammarian, born at Boyndie, Banff, took his M.A. at Aberdeen in 1694, in 1695 became schoolmaster of Laurencekirk, and in 1700 was appointed assistant-keeper of the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh. In 1707, when he started also as a book auctioneer, he edited Florence Wilson's Latin Dialogue on the Tranquillity of the Mind; in 1709 Arthur Johnston's Latin Paraphrase of the Song of Solomon. In 1714 appeared his Rudiments of the Latin Tongue; in 1715 his great edition of Buchanan's works. He now started business as a printer; and in 1725 became printer to the university, in 1730 principal keeper of the Advocates' Library. His philological reputation mainly rests on his great Grammaticæ Latinæ Institutiones (1725-32). In 1751 he published his 'immaculate' edition of Livy. He was an ardent Jacobite, and a most upright and estimable man. He printed (from 1714) and acquired (1729) the Caledonian Mercury. See Life by George Chalmers (1794).

Rudé, FRANÇOIS (1784-1855), sculptor, originally a smith, was born at Dijon, and died in Paris. See Life by Bertrand (1888).

Rudolf I. (1218-91), founder of the Hapsburg imperial dynasty, was born at Schloss Limburg in the Breisgau, and, becoming a warm partisan of Frederick II., increased his possessions by inheritance and marriage, until he was the most powerful prince in Swabia. In 1273 the electors chose him German king; as never having been crowned by the pope, he was not entitled to be called kaiser or emperor. Ottocar of Bohemia refused to tender his allegiance, and in 1278 was defeated and slain at Marchfeld. Rudolf did much to suppress the robber knights. He died at Spire. His son Albert, to whom (and his brother Rudolf) Austria, Styria, and Carniola had been given in 1278, succeeded him as German king. See works by Schönhuth (1844), Kopp (1845), Hirn (1874), Kaltenbrunner (1890), and Otto (1895).

Rudolf II. (1552-1612), born at Vienna, eldest son of the emperor Maximilian II., became king of Hungary in 1572; king of Bohemia, with the title King of the Romans, in 1575; and emperor on his father's death in 1576. Gloomy, taciturn, bigoted, and indolent, he put himself in the hands of the Jesuits and low favourites, and left the empire to govern itself. His taste for astrology and the occult sciences made him extend his patronage to Kepler and Tycho Brahe; and their Rudolphine Tables were called after him. Meanwhile the Protestants were bitterly persecuted; the Turks invaded Hungary and defeated the archduke Maximilian (1596); Transylvania and Hungary revolted; and at last Rudolf's brother Matthias wrested from him Hungary, Bohemia, Austria, and Moravia. Ruge, ARNOLD, born at Bergen in Rügen, 13th September 1802, studied at Jena and Halle, and over the Burschenschaft agitations of 1821-24 got six years' imprisonment. In 1837 he helped to found the Hällesche (later Deutsche) Jahrbücher, the organ of Young Germany; its liberal tendencies drew on it the condemnation of the Prussian censor, and Ruge withdrew to Paris and Switzerland. He then started a bookseller's business in Leipzig, when the revolutionary movement of 1848 drew him into its vortex. He published the democratic Reform, entered the Frankfort parliament for Breslau, attended the Democratic Congress in Berlin, and took part in the disturbances at Leipzig in May 1849. In 1850 he fled to England, where with Mazzini and Ledru-Rollin he organised the Democratic Committee; in 1850 he settled at Brighton, and lived by teaching, writing, and translating. For his services to the Prussian government, by supporting it against Austria in 1866 and against France in 1870, he received in 1877 a pension of £50. He died at Brighton, 31st Dec. 1880. Rumford, COUNT (BENJAMIN THOMPSON), born at Woburn, Mass., 26th March 1753, was assistant in a store and a school teacher, but in 1771 married a wealthy Mrs Rolfe (1739-92). He was made major in a New Hampshire regiment, but through his royalist opinions incurred such hostility that, in dread of tarring and feathering, he left wife and baby-daughter, and fled to England (1775). He gave valuable information to the government as to the state of America, and received an appointment in the Colonial Office. In England he experimented largely with gunpowder, and was elected F.R.S. (1779). In 1782 he was back in America, with a lieutenant-colonel's commission. After the peace he was knighted, and in 1784 entered the service of Bavaria. In this new sphere he reformed the army, drained the marshes round Mannheim, established a cannon-foundry and military academy, cleared the country of beggars and planned a poor-law system, spread the cultivation of the potato, disseminated a knowledge of cheap and good dishes and foods, devised an economical fireplace, kitchen, and oven (the Rumford roaster), improved the breeds of horses and cattle, and laid out the English Garden in Munich. For these services he was made head of the Bavarian War Department and count of the Holy Roman Empire. During a visit to England (1795-96) he endowed the two Rumford medals of the Royal Society, and also two of the American Academy, for researches in light and heat. Back in Munich, he found it threatened by both French and Austrians. The Elector fled, leaving Count Rumford president of the Council of Regency and generalissimo. In 1799 he quitted the Bavarian service, returned to London, and founded the Royal Institution; in 1802 he removed to Paris, and, marrying Lavoisier's widow in 1804, lived at her villa at Auteuil. There he occupied himself with physical investigations, especially in heat; and there he died, 21st August 1814. Runeberg, JOHAN LUDVIG, Swedish poet, born at Jakabstad in Finland, 5th February 1804, taught at Helsingfors from 1830, and at Borgå 1837-57; there he died 6th May 1877. Among his works were Lyric Poems (1830), The Grave in Perrho (1831), The Elk-hunters (1832), Nadeschda (1841), a third volume of Poems (1843), King Ejalor (1844), Ensign Stål's Stories (1848-60), a comedy Can't (1862), and The Kings in Salamis (1863), a fine tragedy. In 1857 Runeberg edited for the Lutheran Church of Finland a Psalm-book, in which were included above sixty pieces from his own pen. The best biography—to 1837—by J. E. Strömberg (1880-89), must be supplemented by Nyblom's preface to Runeberg's Samlade Skrifter (1873-74) and monographs (in Swedish) by Dietrichson and Rancken (1864), Cygnäus (1873), and Vasenius (1890), a German Life by Peschier (1881), and the preface to Eigenbrodt's German translation of Runeberg's epic poems (1891). There is a fairly-faithful translation of his lyrics, with memoir, in Magnusson and Palmer's Runeberg's Lyrical Songs (1878); and an indifferent translation of Nadeschda by Mrs Shipley (1891).

Rupert, PRINCE, third son of the Elector Palatine Frederick V. and Elizabeth, daughter of James I. of England, was born at Prague, 18th December 1619. After a year and a half at the English court, he served in 1637-38, during the Thirty Years' War, against the Imperialists, until at Lemgo he was taken prisoner, and confined for nearly three years at Linz. In 1642 he returned to England, and for the next three years the 'Mad Cavalier' was the life and soul of the royalist cause, winning many a battle by his resistless charges, to lose it as often by a too headlong pursuit. He had fought at Worcester, Edgehill, Brentford, Chalgrove, Newbury, Bolton, Marston Moor, Newbury again, and Naseby, when in August 1645 his surrender of Bristol so irritated Charles, who in 1644 had created him Duke of Cumberland and generalissimo, that he dismissed him. A court-martial, however, cleared him, and he resumed his duties, only to surrender at Oxford to Fairfax in June 1646. He now took service with France, but in 1648 accepting the command of that portion of the English fleet which had espoused the king's cause, acquitted himself with all his old daring and somewhat more caution. But in 1650 Blake attacked his squadron, and burned or sunk most of his vessels. With the remnant the prince escaped to the West Indies, where with his brother, Prince Maurice (1620-52), till the loss of the latter in a hurricane, he maintained himself by seizing English and other merchantmen. In 1653 he was back in France, where and in Germany he chiefly resided till the Restoration. Thereafter he served under the Duke of York, and, in concert with the Duke of Albemarle, in naval operations against the Dutch. He died, 29th November 1682, in the enjoyment of various offices and dignities, being a privy-councillor, governor of Windsor, F.R.S., &c. His last ten years had been spent in chemical, physical, and mechanical researches. Though he was not the inventor of mezzotint, he improved the processes of the art, which he described to the Royal Society in 1662; and he invented an improved gunpowder and 'Prince's metal.' See Lives by Warburton (1849), Lord Ronald Gower (1890), Eva Scott (1899), and Mrs Erskine (1910).

Rupp, AUGUST LEOPOLD (1809-89), Protestant theologian, was born and died at Königsberg.

Rush, BENJAMIN (1745-1813), born at Byberry, Pa., studied medicine at Edinburgh and Paris, and in 1769 became professor of Chemistry at Philadelphia. Elected a member of the Continental Congress, he signed the Declaration of Independence (1776). In 1777 he was appointed Surgeon-general, and later Physician-general, of the Continental army. In 1778 he resigned his post because he could not prevent frauds upon soldiers in the hospital stores, and resumed his professorship. In 1799 he became treasurer of the U.S. Mint. His chief works were Medical Inquiries (1789-93), Essays (1798), and Diseases of the Mind (1821; 5th ed. 1835).—His son, RICHARD (1780-1859), lawyer and statesman, was minister 1817-25 to England, where he negotiated the Fisheries and North-eastern Boundary Treaties, and was Secretary of the Treasury 1825-29.

Rush, JAMES BLOMFELD, a Norfolk farmer near Wymondham, hanged in April 1849 for shooting, four months before, Mr Isaac Jermy and his son.

Rushworth, JOHN (c. 1612-90), born at Acklington Park, Warkworth, studied at Oxford, and settled in London as a barrister. When the Long Parliament met in 1640 he was appointed clerk-assistant to the House of Commons; he represented Berwick 1657-60, 1679, and 1681; and he was secretary to Fairfax 1645-50, and in 1677 to the Lord Keeper. In 1684 he was hung into the King's Bench for debt, and here he died. Rushworth's Historical Collections (8 vols. 1659-1701) cover the period 1618-48, and are of high value for a knowledge of the Great Rebellion.

Ruskin, JOHN, was born in London, 8th February 1819, the son of a wealthy Scotch wine-merchant. A gentleman-commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, he gained the Newdigate in 1839, and took his degree in 1842. He studied painting under Copley Fielding and Harding; but his masters, he says, were Rubens and Rembrandt. In 1843 appeared vol. i. of his Modern Painters, its primary design to prove the superiority of modern landscape-painters, more especially Turner, to the Old Masters; but in the later volumes (ii.-v., 1846-60) the work expanded into a vast discursive treatise on the principles of art. Revolutionary in spirit and aim, it naturally excited the hostility of the conservatives in art. But the unequalled splendour of its style gave it a place in literature; and the evident justness of much of the criticism secured recognition. Gradually his views made way, and they have largely determined the course and character of later English art. In 1849 appeared The Seven Lamps of Architecture, and in 1851-53 The Stones of Venice, both being efforts to introduce a new and loftier conception of domestic architecture. They, like the three last volumes of Modern Painters, were illustrated by the author himself. He warmly espoused the cause of Pre-Raphaelitism in letters, pamphlets, and Notes on the Academy Exhibitions (1855-60). Succeeding works were Notes on the Construction of Sheepfolds (1851), dealing with the discipline of the church; The King of the Golden River (1851), a fairy story; The Two Paths (1854); Lectures on Architecture and Painting (1854); Elements of Drawing (1857); Lectures on the Political Economy of Art (1858); and Elements of Perspective (1859). The Crown of Wild Olive is a series of four essays on work, traffic, war, and the future of England; Sesame and Lilies, lectures on good literature; The Queen of the Air, a study of the Greek myths of cloud and storm; Ethics of the Dust, lectures on crystallisation; Ariadne Florentina, on wood and metal engraving; Aratra Pentelici, on the principles of sculpture; the Laws of Fesolè, on the elements of painting and drawing; Frondes Agrestes, readings from 'Modern Painters'; Love's Meinie, on Birds; and Deucalion, on Geology. Munera Pulveris contains the elements of political economy according to Ruskin; while Unto this Last attacks the current doctrines of the 'dismal science.' Val d'Arno contains lectures on 13th-century art in Pisa and Florence; later courses dealt with the modern art of England and English history (Pleasures of England). Mornings in Florence is studies of Christian art for English travellers, and St Mark's Rest is on the history of Venice. The Eagle's Nest discusses the relation of natural science to art; Time and Tide are letters to a working-man of Sunderland. Arrows of the Chace is a selection of his letters; On the Old Road a republication of miscellaneous pamphlets, articles, and essays on Samuel Prout, the Lord's Prayer, the 'Cestus of Aglaia,' &c. An early volume of poems, issued for private circulation, in 1891 was reprinted with many additional pieces and illustrations from the author's drawings. Fors Clavigera appeared as a sort of periodical at irregular intervals for several years, in the form of ninety-six letters to the workmen and labourers of Great Britain on a great variety of topics (vols. i.-viii. 1887). Proserpina, published in the same way, gives studies of wayside flowers. Hortus Inclusus (1887) is a series of letters 'to the ladies of the Thwaite.' Verona and other Lectures and Letters addressed to a College Friend, 1810-45, appeared in 1894; Studies in Both Arts in 1895. In 1869-79 Ruskin was Slade professor of Art at Oxford; in 1871 he gave £5000 for the endowment of a master of drawing there; in 1883 he was re-elected professor, but resigned in 1884. He was D.C.L. of Oxford and LL.D. of Cambridge. He founded a museum at Walkley (in 1890 transferred to Sheffield itself), where he bestowed part of his priceless library and art treasures. In his later years he lived at Brantwood, on Coniston Lake, in the Lake Country, and there he died 20th January 1900. He devoted great part of his originally large fortune to founding the St George's Guild, designed to be a kind of primitive agricultural community. His influence in creating a new interest in the beauty of nature and of art in England was profound; and he did much to vivify ideals of life and enoble British standards of conduct. See his early autobiography, Præterita (1887-88); E. T. Cooke, The Life of Ruskin (1911); Collingwood, Art Teaching of Ruskin (1891) and Life of Ruskin (2 vols. 1893; new ed. 1900); and books on him by Mrs Meynell (1900) and Frederic Harrison (1902). The definitive edition of his works appeared in 39 vols. in 1903-12, edited by Cook and Wedderburn, the last two volumes mainly index and bibliography.

Russel, ALEXANDER (1814-76), editor of the Scotsman from 1848, was born and died in Edinburgh. He was a caustic wit and great angler.

Russell, a great Whig house whose origin has been traced back to Thor. Anyhow a John Russell was constable of Corfe Castle in 1221; and from him have sprung twenty-two generations of Russells. Among them, besides William Lord Russell and Earl Russell, the following may be mentioned: Sir John Russell, Speaker of the House of Commons in 1423, 1432, and 1450; John (c. 1486-1555), created in 1539 Baron Russell of Cheneys, and in 1550 Earl of Bedford, who got the abbey lands of Tavistock and Woburn; Sir William Russell (c. 1558-1613), who in 1594 became Lord Deputy of Ireland, and in 1603 was created Baron Russell of Thornhaugh; Francis, fourth earl (1593-1641), drainer of the Bedford Level; William, fifth earl (1613-1700), created in 1694 Marquis of Tavistock and Duke of Bedford; Admiral Edward Russell (1653-1727), who, semi-Jacobite though he was, beat the French at La Hogue in 1692, and in 1697 was made Earl of Orford; John, fourth duke (1710-71), Lord-lieutenant of Ireland; his grandson, Lord William Russell (1767-1840), who was murdered by his valet Courvoisier; Francis, ninth duke (1819-91); and his brother Odo (1829-84), who from 1871 was ambassador to the German court, and in 1881 was made Baron Amphilth. See J. H. Wiffen's Historical Memoirs of the House of Russell (2 vols. 1833), and Froude's 'Cheneys and the House of Russell' (Short Studies, 4th series, 1884).

WILLIAM RUSSELL, LORD RUSSELL, born 29th September 1639, third son of the fifth Earl of Bedford, studied at Cambridge, made the grand tour, and at the Restoration was elected M.P. for Tavistock. He was 'drawn by the court into some disorders' (debts and duelling), from which he was rescued by his marriage (1669) with Lady Rachel Wriothesley (1636-1723), second daughter and co-heiress of the Earl of Southampton and widow of Lord Vaughan. In 1674 he spoke against the doings of the Cabal, and thenceforth we find him an active adherent of the Country party. He dallied unwisely with France, but took no bribe; he shared honestly in the delusion of the Popish Plot; he presented the Duke of York as a recusant; and he carried the Exclusion Bill up to the House of Lords. He was arrested with Essex and Sydney for participation in the Rye-house Plot, was arraigned of high treason, and, infamous witnesses easily satisfying a packed jury, was found guilty, and beheaded on 21st July 1683. The pity of his judicial murder, the pathos of Burnel's story of his end, and the exquisite letters of his noble wife, who at his trial appeared in court as his secretary, have secured him a place in history that else he had never attained to, for he was a Christian hero rather than a statesman. See Life by Lord John Russell (1819; 4th ed. 1853); Letters of Lady Russell (1773; 14th ed. 1853); and Lives of her by Miss Berry (1819), Lord John Russell (1820), Guizot (Eng. trans. 1855), and Lady Stepney (1899).

JOHN RUSSELL, EARL RUSSELL, K.G., born in London, 18th August 1792, the third son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, studied at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1813 was returned for Tavistock. He made his first motion in favour of parliamentary reform in 1819, and brought up the subject almost annually; and he strenuously advocated the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts and Catholic Emancipation. At the general election of 1830 the cry of reform won many seats for the Liberals; the 'Great Duke' was driven from office; and in Earl Grey's ministry Lord John became Paymaster of the Forces. He was one of the four members of the government entrusted with the task of framing the first Reform Bill, and on him devolved the honour of proposing it. On 4th June 1832 it received the royal assent. In November 1834 Lord John left office with Melbourne; the carrying of his motion (1835) for applying the surplus revenues of the Irish Church to education caused the downfall of Peel and the return of Melbourne to power. As Home Secretary and leader of the Lower House, Lord John was identified with the Municipal Reform Act (1835), and the Tithes Commutation, Registration, and Marriage Acts (1836). In 1839 he exchanged from the Home to the Colonial Office; in 1841 he proposed a fixed duty of 8s. on foreign corn and a reduction of the duties on sugar and timber. Defeated by the Opposition, the Melbourne government appealed to the country without success, so once more made way for Peel. In this general election Lord John was returned for the City, which he represented until his elevation to the Upper House. In November 1845 he wrote a letter to his constituents announcing his conversion to the repeal of the Corn Laws. This led to Peel's resignation; and Lord John was commissioned to form an administration. He failed, owing to Lord Grey's antipathy to Palmerston, so Peel was forced back to office, and carried the repeal. On the very day the bill passed the Lords Peel was defeated by a coalition of Whigs and Protectionists; whereupon a Whig ministry succeeded, with Lord John for prime-minister (1846). In Ireland there was the famine, followed by a foolish rebellion; whilst at home there was Chartism and the so-called 'Papal aggression,' which evoked the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill of 1851. Lord Palmerston's approval of the French coup d'état without the Queen's or Lord John Russell's knowledge procured him his dismissal from the office of Foreign Secretary; within two months he defeated the premier over a militia bill, and, after a short-lived Derby government, Lord Aberdeen in December formed a coalition ministry of Whigs and Peelites, with Russell for Foreign Secretary and leader in the Commons. His inopportune Reform Bill (1854), the Crimean mismanagement, his resignation (January 1855), and his bungling at the Vienna Conference, all combined to render him unpopular; and for four years he remained out of office. But in June 1859, in the second Palmerston administration, he became Foreign Secretary, and in 1861 was created Earl Russell. Though he did much for Italian unity, non-intervention was his leading principle—e.g. during the American civil war and the Sleswick-Holstein difficulty. On Palmerston's death in 1865 Earl Russell again became prime-minister, but was defeated in June on his new Reform Bill and resigned. He continued busy with tongue and pen till his death at his residence, Pembroke Lodge, Richmond Park, 28th May 1878. Earl Russell was twice married, and by his second wife, daughter of the Earl of Minto, was the father of John Viscount Amberley (1842-76), author of the posthumous Analysis of Religious Belief, whose son succeeded as second earl. Earl Russell's works, a score in number, include a tale and two tragedies, a Life of William Lord Russell (1819), Memoirs of the Affairs of Europe (1824), The Correspondence of John, fourth Duke of Bedford (1842-46), and Memoirs of Fox and Moore. See his Speeches and Despatches (1870), his Recollections and Suggestions (1875), and Lives by Spencer Walpole (1889) and Stuart J. Reid (1893).

Russell, Killowen, CHARLES RUSSELL, LORD, born at Newry, 10th November 1832, studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and was called to the English bar in 1859. He became a Q.C. (1872), a Liberal M.P. (1880), Attorney-general (1886, 1892-94), a knight bachelor (1886), and Lord Chief-Justice (1894) with a life-peerage. He died 10th August 1900. See Life by O'Brien (1901).

Russell, 'JACK' (1795-1883), born at Dartmouth, and educated at Oxford, was perpetual curate of Swynbridge near Barnstaple 1832-80, and withal master of foxhounds and sportsman generally. See Memoir (new ed. 1883).

Russell, JOHN, R.A. (1745-1806), portrait-painter in crayons and oils, and Methodist enthusiast, was born at Guildford, and died at Hull. See Life by Williamson (1894).

Russell, JOHN SCOTT (1808-82), engineer, inventor of the 'wave-system' of shipbuilding, was born near Glasgow, and died at Ventnor.

Russell, WILLIAM, LL.D. (1741-93), born at Windydoors, Selkirkshire, in 1767 came to London, and wrote The History of Modern Europe (1779-84) and ten other works. He died near Langholm.

Russell, WILLIAM CLARK (1844-1911), born in New York, was son of the vocalist Henry Russell (1812-1900), who, born at Sheerness, was composer of 'Cheer, Boys, Cheer,' 'There's a Good Time Coming,' 'A Life on the Ocean Wave,' &c., and author of Cheer, Boys, Cheer: Memories of Men and Music (1895). At thirteen he went to sea, but after seven years' service devoted himself to letter-writing for the papers. From 1887 he reserved his energies for fiction, in which he had already scored a success with John Holdsworth, Chief Mate (1874), The Wreck of the Grosvenor (1877), An Ocean Free Lance (1880), The Lady Maud (1882), Jack's Courtship (1884), and A Strange Voyage (1885). Later novels were The Death-ship (1888), Marooned (1889), My Shipmate Louise (1890), An Ocean Tragedy (1890), My Danish Sweetheart (1891), List, ye Landsmen (1893), The Convict Ship (1894), What Cheer! (1896), and The Last Entry (1897). Other works are his sketch of Nelson (1890) and Life of Collingwood (1891).

Russell, SIR WILLIAM HOWARD, special correspondent, born at Lilyvale, County Dublin, 28th March 1821, joined the Times in 1843, and was called to the bar in 1850. From the Crimea he wrote those famous letters (published in book-form 1856) which opened the eyes of Englishmen to the sufferings of the soldiers during the winter of 1854-55. He next witnessed the events of the Indian Mutiny. He established the Army and Navy Gazette in 1860; and in 1861 the civil war drew him to America, which he soon made too hot for him by a candid account of the Federal defeat at Bull Run. He accompanied the Austrians during the war with Prussia (1866), and the Prussians during the war with France (1870-71); visited Egypt and the East (1874) and India (1877) as private secretary to the Prince of Wales; and went with Wolsley to South Africa in 1879. Among his books are a novel, The Adventures of Dr Brady (1868); Hesperothen (1882); A Visit to Chile (1890); and The Great War with Russia (1895). LL.D., a Knight of the Iron Cross, a Commander of the Legion of Honour, and an English knight (1895), he died in February 1907.

Rustem Pasha (1810-95), born at Hamburg, the son of an Italian Catholic, Mariani, entered the Ottoman service as an interpreter, and from 1885 was Turkish ambassador in London.

Rutebœuf, a trouvère, born in 1230, the first French Bohemian. See study by Clédat (1891).

Rutherford, LEWIS MORRIS (1816-92), a New York astronomer, born at Morrisania.

Rutherford, SAMUEL, born at Nisbet near Jedburgh about 1600, took his M.A. at Edinburgh in 1621. In 1623 he was appointed professor of Humanity; an anteuptional irregularity caused his resignation in 1626; but next year he was settled as minister of Anwoth. Here he began that correspondence with his godly friends which has been called 'the most seraphic book in our literature.' Exercitationes pro divina Gratia (1636) was against the Arminians, and brought him an invitation to a Divinity chair in Holland and a summons before the High Commission Court in July 1636, when he was forbidden to preach, and banished to Aberdeen (till 1638). He became professor of Divinity at St Andrews in 1639, and in 1647 principal of the New College; in 1643 he was sent to the Westminster Assembly. His Due Right of Presbyteries (1644), Lex Rex (1644), Trial and Triumph of Faith (1645), Christ Dying and Drawing Sinners to Himself (1647) belong to this period. Rutherford's Lex Rex was burned by the hangman in Edinburgh in 1661, and its author deposed and summoned for high-treason; but he received the citation on his deathbed, and died 29th March 1661. Livingston said 'he had most sharp piercing wit and fruitful invention and solid judgment.' See Lives by Murray (1828) and Thomson (1884), Bonar's edition of the Letters, and Dr A. Whyte's Samuel Rutherford and his Correspondents (1894).

Ruthven, WILLIAM (c. 1541-84), created Earl of Gowrie in 1581, was beheaded at Stirling for carrying off the boy-king, James VI., to Castle Ruthven near Perth—the 'Raid of Ruthven' (1582)—His second son, JOHN (c. 1578-1600), succeeded a brother as third earl in 1588, and travelled in Italy, Switzerland, &c. 1594-99. He was killed with a brother in his house at Perth in the 'Gowrie Conspiracy'—an alleged attempt to murder or kidnap James VI. See Barbe's Tragedy of Gowrie House (Paisley, 1887). [Riv'en.]

Rutland, JOHN JAMES ROBERT MANNERS, DUKE OF (1818-1906), born at Belvoir Castle, was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, entered parliament as a Conservative in 1841, and was First Commissioner of Works (1852, 1858-59, and 1866-68), Postmaster-general (1874-80 and 1885-86), and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1886-92). He succeeded his elder brother as seventh duke in 1888. A member of the 'Young England' party (1842-45), he wrote poems, tours, a yachting-cruise, ballads, &c.

Ruysbroek, JOHANNES (1293-1381), Flemish mystic, born at Ruysbroek near Brussels, was vicar of St Gudule's in Brussels, but in 1353 withdrew to the Augustinian monastery of Groenedael near Waterloo, of which he became prior. See Lives of the Doctor ecstaticus by Engelhardt (1838), Ch. Schmidt (1859), and Otterloo (1874), and Maeterlinck's Ruysbroek and the Mystics (Eng. trans. 1894). [Rois'brook.]

Ruysdael, or RUISDAEL, JAKOB, the greatest landscape-painter of the Dutch school, was born at Haarlem about 1623, and died in the almshouse there, 14th March 1682. He loved to paint forest glades with oak-trees; sleeping pools beneath clusters of trees, with a mill or a ruined temple, or a glimpse of a distant town; a waterfall with rugged rocks; and coast scenes, where sea and earth meet. See E. Michel, Ruysdael et les Paysagistes d'Harlem (1890). [Rois'dahl.]

Ruyter, MICHAEL ADRIANZSOON DE, born at Flushing, 24th March 1607, went to sea as a cabin-boy, but by 1635 had become a captain in the Dutch navy. In the war with England in 1652 he repelled an attack off the Lizard, and with De Witt had to retire after attacking Blake off the mouth of the Thames; but two months later they defeated Blake off Dover. In 1653 he repeatedly fought with Blake, Monk, and Deane, and was at the battle off the Texel (29th July), where his superior, Tromp, was killed and the Dutch fleet defeated. After 1654 he blockaded the coasts of Portugal, and then those of Sweden; and after the Dano-Swedish war was ennobled by the king of Denmark. The years 1661-63 were principally occupied with the Barbary corsairs. In the next English war (1664) he took Gorée and some Guinea forts; in 1665 he preyed upon English merchant-vessels in the West Indies; in 1666, now admiral-in-chief, he held his own for four days (June 1-4) against Monk and Prince Rupert off Dunkirk, in July he was driven back to Holland by Monk. In 1667 he sailed up the Medway to Rochester, burned some of the English ships, and next sailed up the Thames to Gravesend, besides attacking Harwich. In a third war (1672) against England and France combined, he attacked the English and French fleets under the Duke of York, the Earl of Sandwich, and Count d'Estrées in Solebay (28th May 1672); and defeated Prince Rupert and D'Estrées in June 1673, and again in August. In 1675 De Ruyter sailed for the Mediterranean to help the Spaniards against the French. He encountered the French fleet near the Lipari Islands about the New Year, and again in the Bay of Catania. In the second fight the Dutch-Spanish fleet was routed and De Ruyter wounded. He died 29th April, in Syracuse. See French Lives by Brandt (1698) and Richer (1783), and English by G. Grinnell-Milne (1897). [Roi'ter.]

Rydberg, VIKTOR (1828-95), Swedish author.

Rydquist, JOHAN ERIK (1800-77), Swedish philologist, born at Gothenburg, died at Stockholm.

Ryle, JOHN CHARLES, Bishop of Liverpool, born at Macclesfield, May 10, 1816, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he took the Craven and a classical first, and rowed in the 'varsity eight. He became rector of St

Thomas', Winchester (1843), and of Helmingham, Suffolk (1844); vicar of Stradbroke (1861); and Bishop of Liverpool (1880-99). He died 10th June 1900. A prominent Evangelical, he wrote countless popular tracts and books, such as Coming Events and Present Duties (1867), Bishops and Clergy of Other Days (1868), Christian Leaders of Last Century (1869), and Expository Thoughts on the Gospels (1856-69).—His second son, HERBERT EDWARD, born in London, 25th May 1856, and educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, became principal of Lampeter (1886), Hulsean Divinity professor at Cambridge (1887), president of Queen's (1896), Bishop of Exeter (1901-3), and Bishop of Winchester (1903-11). He has written on the Old Testament Canon, Genesis, Philo, &c.

Rymer, THOMAS (1641-1718), born at Yafforth Hall, Northallerton, the son of a Roundhead gentleman who was hanged at York in 1664, studied at Sidney Sussex, Cambridge, and entered Gray's Inn in 1666. He published translations, critical discussions on poetry, dramas, and works on history, and in 1692 was appointed historiographer royal. Pope considered him 'one of the best critics we ever had'; Macaulay, 'the worst critic that ever lived.' His principal critical work is The Tragedies of the Last Age Considered (1678); but he is chiefly remembered as the compiler of the invaluable collection of historical materials known as the Fœdera, extending from the 11th century to his own time. Vols. I.-xv. were published in 1704-13, vols. xvi.-xx. in 1715-35, a third edition (incomplete) of the Record Commission in 1816-30, and Sir Thomas Hardy's Syllabus of the whole in 1869-85.

Sabatier, LOUIS AUGUSTE (1830-1901), Protestant theologian, born at Vallon (Ardèche), in 1868 became a professor at Strasburg, in 1873 in Paris. Among his works are books on Jesus, Paul, the first three gospels, and the philosophy of religion (trans. 1898).—His brother PAUL has written much on St Francis of Assisi. [Sa-bat-yayf.]

Sabine, SIR EDWARD, F.R.S., physicist, born in Dublin, 14th Oct. 1788, in 1803 got a commission in the artillery, and accompanied Ross and Parry as astronomer in 1818-20. In 1821-27 he undertook a series of voyages and made pendulum and magnetic experiments of great value. He was president of the Royal Society and British Association; was made a K.C.B. in 1869, and in 1875 a corresponding member of the French Academy; and retired as general in 1877. He died at Richmond, 26th June 1883. His reputation rests on his labours in terrestrial magnetism.

Sacchetti, FRANCO (c. 1330-1400), novelist, a follower of Boccaccio, was a native of Florence, who held several diplomatic offices. Of his 258 Novelle, first printed in 1724, ten are translated in Thomas Roscoe's Italian Novelists (1825). Gigli edited his Opere (1857-61) and Novelle (1886); Morpurgo his Rime (1892), with a Life.

Sacchini, ANTONIO (1734-86), operatic composer, born at Pozzuoli, lived at Naples, Rome, Venice, Stuttgart, Munich, London, and Paris.

Sacher-Masoch, LEOPOLD VON (1835-95), erotic novelist, was born at Lemberg, studied at Gratz, and died at Lindheim in Hesse.

Sacheverell, HENRY, D.D., born in 1674 at Marlborough, the son of a High Church rector, from the grammar school there was sent by charity in 1689 to Magdalen College, Oxford. He shared rooms with Addison, who dedicated to his 'dearest Henry' An Account of the Greatest English Poets (1694); and, gaining successively a denyship and a fellowship, he took his B.A. (1693) and D.D. (1708). He had held the Staffordshire vicarage of Cannock, when in 1709 he delivered the two sermons—one at Derby assizes, the other at St Paul's—which have given him a place in history. The rancour with which he assailed the Revolution

Settlement and the Act of Toleration, whilst asserting the doctrine of non-resistance, roused the wrath of the Whig government, and he was impeached before the House of Lords. Ardent crowds, shouting 'High Church and Sacheverell!' and now and then wrecking a meeting-house, attended him to Westminster. He was found guilty, and suspended from preaching for three years. The Godolphin ministry fell that same summer, and in 1713 Sacheverell was selected by the House of Commons to preach the Restoration sermon, and specially thanked on the occasion. He was presented to the rich rectory of St Andrew's, Holborn, after which little is heard of him save that he squabbled with his parishioners, and was suspected of complicity in a Jacobite plot. He died 5th June 1724. See Hill Burton's History of the Reign of Queen Anne (1880), and F. Madan's Bibliography of Dr Sacheverell (1887). [Sak-kev'-er-el.]

Sachs, HANS, born 5th November 1494 at Nuremberg, was bred a shoemaker, and early wrote verses. On finishing his apprenticeship he travelled through Germany, practising his craft in various cities, and frequenting the schools of the meistersinger. On his return to Nuremberg he commenced business as a shoemaker; and, after a long, prosperous, and happy life, died 19th (or 25th) January 1576. During the Reformation period Sachs celebrated Luther's praises in an allegorical tale (1523) entitled Die Wittenbergisch Nachtigal, while his poetical fly-sheets furthered in no small measure the Protestant cause. In his second period his poetry deals more with common life and manners, and is distinguished by its heartiness, good sense, homely morality, and fresh humour. It is, however, deficient in high imagination and brilliant fancy, and contains much prosaic and insipid verse. His best works are Schwänke, or Merry Tales, the humour of which is sometimes unsurpassable; serious tales; allegorical and spiritual songs; and Lenten dramas. His meistergesänge, now of little value, raised him to the first rank amongst his contemporaries. His Complete Works were edited by Götzke and Von Keller (1886). The selections of Merry Tales and Proverbs in Verse by Goedeke and Tittmann (1883-85) and by Engelbrecht (1879) can be recommended, as well as Tittmann's edition of the Lenten Dramas. Besides Drescher's Studien zu Hans Sachs (1891), there are biographies by Ranisch (1765), Stein (1889), Kawerau (1889), Lützelberger (2d ed. 1890), Schweitzer (French, 1889), and Genée (1894). [Zaha.]

Sachs, JULIUS VON (1832-97), historian of botany, born at Breslau, in 1867 became professor of Botany at Freiburg, in 1868 at Würzburg. There he carried on important experiments, especially as to the influence of light and heat upon plants, and the organic activities of vegetable growth.

Sackville, LORD GEORGE (1716-85), youngest son of the first Duke of Dorset, was wounded at Fontenoy (1745), and dismissed the service for not charging at Minden (1759). Colonial Secretary 1775-82, in 1770 he took the surname Germain, and in 1782 was created Viscount Sackville.

Sackville, THOMAS, EARL OF DORSET, poet and statesman, was born in 1536 at Buckhurst in Sussex, the only son of Sir Richard Sackville, Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1554 he married, and in 1558 entered parliament. With Thomas Norton he produced the blank-verse tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex (afterwards called Gorboduc), which in 1562 was acted before Queen Elizabeth, who was Sackville's second cousin. This work, after the style of Seneca, claims particular notice as the earliest tragedy in the English language. Dramatic energy it has none, but the style is pure and stately, evincing eloquence and power of thought. Sackville's other chief production was the Induction to a Myrrour for Magistrates (1563), a noble poem, almost rivalling the Fuære Queen in the magnificence and dignity of its allegoric personifications. His prodigality brought Sackville into disgrace, and he travelled in France and Italy 1563-66, but returned on his father's death, and in 1567 was knighted and created Lord Buckhurst. He was now employed as a diplomatist in France and the Low Countries; in 1586 announced her death-sentence to Mary Queen of Scots; and in 1589 was made K.G., in 1599 lord high treasurer, and in 1604 Earl of Dorset. He died 19th April 1608. See Cunliffe in the Cambridge English Lit. (vol. iii. 1909), and Works, ed. Sackville-West (1859).—CHARLES SACKVILLE, born January 24, 1638, succeeded as sixth Earl of Dorset in 1677, having two years before been made Earl of Middlesex. He was returned by East Grinstead to the first parliament of Charles II., and became an especial favourite of the king, and notorious for his boisterous and indecorous frolics. He served under the Duke of York at sea, was employed on various missions, but could not endure the tyranny of James II., and was one of the most ardent in the cause of William. His later years were honoured by a generous patronage of Prior, Wycherley, Dryden, &c. He died at Bath, Jan. 19, 1706. He wrote lyrical and satirical pieces, but is remembered only for one bright and delightful song, 'To all you Ladies now at Land.'

Sacrobosco, JOHANNES DE (OR JOHN HOLYWOOD), mathematician, seems to have been born at Halifax, to have studied at Oxford, and to have been professor of Mathematics at Paris, where he died in 1244 or 1256. He was one of the first to use the astronomical writings of the Arabians. His treatise, De Sphæra Mundi, a paraphrase of part of Ptolemy's Almagest, passed during 1472-1647 through forty editions.

Sacy, ANTOINE ISAAC, BARON SILVESTRE DE, Arabist, born in Paris, 21st September 1758, whilst employed in the Mint made himself master of the chief Semitic languages. When the excesses of the republicans caused him to retire from government service, he devoted himself wholly to Oriental studies. In 1795 he became professor of Arabic in the Institute of Oriental Languages, in 1806 also of Persian. He was also a member of the Corps Législatif (1808), perpetual secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions, founder and member of the Asiatic Society, and member of the Chamber of Peers. He died 21st February 1838. See Lives by Reinaud (1838) and Derenburg (1895).—His son, SAMUEL USTAZADE SILVESTRE DE SACY (1801-79), was long one of the leading writers on the Journal des Débats. In 1855 he became a member of the Academy, in 1864 of the Council of Public Instruction, and in 1867 of the senate. He published a collection of his literary articles (1858), and he edited (1861-64) the letters of Madame de Sévigné. [Sassæe.]

Sade, DONATIEU ALPHONSE FRANÇOIS, MARQUIS DE (1740-1814), born in Paris, fought in the Seven Years' War, and was in 1772 condemned to death at Aix for nameless vices. He made his escape, but was afterwards imprisoned at Vincennes and in the Bastille, where he wrote his fantastically scandalous romances, Justine (1791), La Philosophie dans le Boudoir (1793), Juliette (1798), and Les Crimes de l'Amour (1800). He died mad at Charenton. See study by Janin. [Sahd.]

Sá de Miranda (1495-1558), Portuguese poet, founder of the Petrarchian school, was born at Coimbra, and died near Ponte do Lima.

Sádi, SAADI, OR SA'ADI, the assumed name of the Persian poet, SHEIKH MUSLIM ADDIN, who was born at Shiraz about 1184, a descendant of Ali, Mohammed's son-in-law. He studied at Bagdad, whence he made the first of fifteen pilgrimages to Mecca. He travelled much, and near Jerusalem was taken prisoner by the Crusaders, but was ransomed by a merchant of Aleppo, who gave him his daughter in marriage. He died in 1263 or 1292. Although European critics hardly endorse the judgment of his countrymen, that he was 'the most eloquent of writers, the wittiest author of either modern or ancient times, and one of the four monarchs of eloquence and style,' yet there is no doubt that he merited the honours showered upon him. The catalogue of his works comprises twenty-two different kinds of writings in prose and verse, in Arabic and Persian, of which odes and dirges form the predominant part. The most celebrated of his works, however, is the Gulistan, or Flower-garden, a kind of moral work in prose and verse, intermixed with stories, maxims, philosophical sentences, puns, and the like. Next comes the Bostan, or Tree-garden, in verse, and more religious than the Gulistan. Third stands the Pend-Nameh, or Book of Instructions. The first complete edition was by Harrington (Calcutta, 1791-95). The Gulistan has been translated into English by Gladwin, Ross, Eastwick, and Platts. The Bostan, published complete in Calcutta in 1828, has been partly translated by Sir Edwin Arnold (1889). [Sah-dee.]

Sadler, MICHAEL THOMAS (1780-1835), a linen manufacturer, born at Snelston, near Ashborne, sat in parliament 1829-32, and did much to reduce the monstrous hours of children in factories. He died at Belfast. See memoir by Seeley (1842).

Sadler, SIR RALPH (1507-87), born at Hackney, from 1537 was employed in diplomacy with Scotland. He was left one of the twelve councillors of Edward VI.'s minority, fought at Pinkie, sat in the commission on Queen Mary at York, was her jailer at Tutbury, and was perhaps sent with the news of her execution to her son. His Papers, valuable for Border and Scottish history, were edited by Sir Walter Scott (1809).

Sadoleto, JACOPO (1477-1547), born at Modena, went to Rome in 1502, and took orders. Leo X. made him apostolical secretary, an appointment he retained under Clement VII. and Paul III. By Leo he was made Bishop of Carpentras in 1517, and by Paul in 1536 a cardinal. In 1544 he was legate to Francis I. Sadoleto ranks as one of the great churchmen of his age. He had sincerely at heart the reform at least of the discipline of the church. He corresponded with many Protestant leaders, and sought to find a basis for reunion. See Joly's Étude sur Sadoleto (1856).

Sagasta, PRAXEDES MATEO (1827-1903), born at Torrecilla, became an engineer, but taking part in insurrections in 1856 and 1866, had twice to flee to France. He had a place in Prim's Cabinet (1868), supported Amadens, held office under Serrano, and was Liberal minister in 1881-83, 1885-90, 1894-95, and 1897-98—the last the year of the disastrous war with the United States.

Said Pasha (1822-63), viceroy of Egypt from 1854, gave the concession for the Suez Canal.

Saint Arnaud, JACQUES LEROY DE (1796-1854), born at Bordeaux, fought for the Greeks 1822-26, but made his reputation in Algeria, and in 1851 carried on a bloody but successful warfare with the Kabyles. Louis Napoleon recalled him; and as war minister he took an active part in the coup d'état of 2d December. He was rewarded with the marshal's baton. In the Crimean war he commanded the French forces, and co-operated with Lord Raglan at the Alma, but nine days afterwards died on his way home to France. See his Lettres (1864) and work by Cabrol (1895).

Sainte-Beuve, CHARLES-AUGUSTIN, the greatest literary critic of modern times, was born at Boulogne-sur-Mer, 23d Dec. 1804, son of a commissioner of taxes, who died three months before the birth of his son, leaving his wife in straitened circumstances. Till his fourteenth year Sainte-Beuve attended school in Boulogne, then went to the Collège Charlemagne in Paris, and next (1824-27) followed a course of medical study. M. Dubois, one of his teachers at the Collège Charlemagne, founded a literary and political paper called the Globe, and to it, along with Jouffroy, Rémusat, Ampère, and Méricime, Sainte-Beuve became a contributor. For three years he wrote the short articles collected as Premiers Lundis. In 1827 a eulogistic review of the Odes et Ballades of Victor Hugo led to the closest relations between the poet and his critic; and for a time Sainte-Beuve was the zealous advocate of the romantic movement. In 1828 he published Tableau de la Poésie Française au Seizième Siècle; and in 1829 Vie et Poésies de Joseph Delorme and Les Consolations, poems fraught with morbid feeling. In 1829 in the Revue de Paris he began the Causeries or longer critical articles on French literature. After the Revolution of July 1830 he again wrote for the Globe, now in the hands of the Saint-Simoniens; but his new colleagues soon passed the limits of his sympathy, and for the next three years he was on the staff of Carrel's National, the organ of extreme republicanism. In 1830-36 he became a sympathetic listener of Lamennais; but with the ultra-democratic opinions of Lamennais after his breach with Rome he had no sympathy. His solitary novel, Volupté (1834), belongs to this period. In 1837 he lectured on the history of Port-Royal at Lausanne; in book form these lectures contain some of his finest work. At Lausanne he produced his last volume of poetry, Pensées d'Août. A journey into Italy closes the first period of his life. In 1840 he was appointed keeper of the Mazarin Library. During the next eight years he wrote mainly for the Revue des Deux Mondes; in 1845 he was elected to the French Academy. The political confusions of 1848 led him to become professor of French Literature at Liège, where he lectured on Chateaubriand et son Groupe. In 1849 he returned to Paris, and began to write for the Constitutionnel an article on some literary subject, to appear on the Monday of every week. In 1861 these Causeries du Lundi were transferred to the Moniteur, in 1867 back to the Constitutionnel, and finally in 1869 to the Temps. In 1854, on his appointment by the emperor as professor of Latin Poetry at the Collège de France, the students refused to listen to his lectures, and he was forced to demit the office; the undelivered lectures contained his critical estimate of Virgil. Nominated a senator in 1865, he regained popularity by his spirited speeches in favour of that liberty of thought which the government was doing its utmost to suppress. He died 13th October 1869. It was his special instruction that he should be buried without religious ceremony. It is by the amount and variety of his work, and the ranges of qualities it displays, that Sainte-Beuve holds the first place among literary critics. He is unapproachable in his faculty of educing the interest and significance of the most various types of human character and the most various forms of creative effort. His work marks an epoch in the intellectual history of Europe. By its delicacy, subtlety, and precision it extended the limits of the study of human character and of the products of human intelligence. See Sainte-Beuve's own 'Ma Biographie' in Nouveaux Lundis, vol. xiii.; the strongly prejudiced book of the Vicomte d'Haussonville, C. A. Sainte-Beuve, sa Vie et ses Œuvres (1875); and the Souvenirs of his last secretary, M. Troubat (1890). The works of Sainte-Beuve are: Tableau de la Poésie Française et du Théâtre Français au XVI^e Siècle, Poésies Complètes, Volupté, Port-Royal (7 vols. 1860), Chateaubriand et son Groupe Littéraire sous l'Empire (1860), Critiques et Portraits Littéraires, Portraits Contemporains, Portraits de Femmes, Causeries du Lundi (15 vols.), Nouveaux Lundis (13 vols.), Souvenirs et Indiscrétions, Premiers Lundis, Les Cahiers de M. Sainte-Beuve, Chroniques Parisiennes, Lettres à la Princesse, Étude sur Virgile, Le Général Jomini, Talleyrand; P. J. Proudhon, sa Vie et sa Correspondance; and Correspondance (2 vols.). See French works by Levallois (1872), Haussonville (1875), Pons (1879), and Morand (1895). [Saint-Beuv.]

Sainte-Claire Deville, HENRI ÉTIENNE (1818-81), born in St Thomas, West Indies, in 1851 became professor of Chemistry in the Normal School at Paris, and shortly afterwards in the Sorbonne. It was he who first produced aluminium (1855) and platinum in commercial quantities, and demonstrated the general theory of the dissociation of chemical compounds at a high temperature. He also discovered (1849) anhydrous nitric acid; examined the forms of boron and silicon; devised methods for fusing platinum, iridium, cobalt, &c.; and produced artificially sapphire, aluminium, &c. Besides many papers, he published De l'Aluminium (1859) and Métallurgie du Platine (1863). See French Life by Gay (1889). [Saint-Clair De-vee'.]

Saint-Èvremond, CHARLES MARCUETEL DE SAINT-DENIS, SEIGNEUR DE (1613-1703), born at St Denis le Guast near Coutances, fought at Rocroi, Freiburg, and Nördlingen, was steadily loyal throughout the Fronde, but in 1661 fled by way of Holland to England on the discovery of his witty and sarcastic Letter to Créqui on the Peace of the Pyrenees. He was warmly received by Charles II., and in London he spent almost all the rest of his days, delighting the world with his wit, a fast friend of the beautiful Duchesse de Mazarin. His satire, La Comédie des Académistes (1644), is a masterpiece in its kind, and his dissertation on Racine's Alexandre reveals the true critic's insight. The letters betwixt him and Ninon de Lenclos are charming. His writings were collected by Des Maizeaux with a Life (1705). There are good selections by C. Giraud (1805) and Lescure (1881). See studies by Gilbert and Gidel (1866), Merlet (1870), Pastorello (1875), and Macé (1894). [Sans-Ayvr'-monr'.]

Saint-Germain, COMTE DE, an adventurer who claimed to be 2000 years old, found his way into the first circles of Europe, and died in Sleswick in 1784. See German Life by Oettinger (1846).

St-Hilaire. See BARTHÉLEMY, GEOFFROY.

Saintine, or BONIFACE, JOSEPH XAVIER (1798-1865), a Frenchman, the author of plays, poems, and tales without number; one only is famous now—Piociota, the Story of a Prison Flower (1836).

St John, HENRY. See BOLINGBROKE.

Saint-Just, LOUIS ANTOINE LÉON FLORELLE DE, born at Decize near Nevers, 25th August 1767, and educated by the Oratorians at Soissons, studied law at Rheims, but early gave himself to letters. At nineteen he set off for Paris, with some of his mother's valuables, and was, at her request, imprisoned for selling them. He published (1789) a poor poem, L'Organt, and in 1791 an essay of a different promise, L'Esprit de la Révolution. Returned for Aisne to the Convention (1792), he attracted notice by his fierce tirades against the king; and as a devoted follower of Robespierre was sent on missions to the armies of the Rhine and the Moselle. He made bombastic speeches before the Convention, and began the attacks on Hébert which sent him and Danton to their doom. In 1794 he laid before the Convention a comprehensive report on the police, and soon after proposed Robespierre's preposterous civil institutions, by which boys were to be taken from their parents at seven and brought up for the state. Saint-Just fell with Robespierre by the guillotine, 28th July 1794. See Fleury, Saint-Just et la Terreur (1851), Life by Ernest Hamel (1859), and Kritschewsky's Rousseau und Saint-Just (1896). [Sans Zheest.]

St Leger, COL., founded in 1776 his stakes at Doncaster. [Sil'lin-jer.]

St Leonards, EDWARD BURTENSHAW SUODEN, LORD (1781-1875), the son of a London hairdresser, was called to the bar in 1807, made a vast practice as a real-property lawyer, entered parliament as a Tory in 1828, and was Lord Chancellor of Ireland in 1834 and 1841-46, and of England in 1852. His law-books are authoritative.

Saint-Marc Girardin. See GIRARDIN.

Saint-Martin, LOUIS CLAUDE (1743-1803), philosopher, a vigorous opponent of sensationalism and materialism, was born at Amboise, and died near Chatillon. See Essai by Caro (1852).

Sainton-Dolby, CHARLOTTE HELEN (1821-85), a great contralto concert and oratorio singer, was born in London, studied at the Royal Academy of Music, in 1860 married the violinist Prosper Sainton (1813-90), retired in 1870, and in 1872 opened a singing academy. She herself wrote cantatas.

Saint-Pierre, JACQUES-HENRI BERNARDIN DE, was born at Havre, 19th January 1737, and after a voyage to Martinique served some time in the Engineers, but quarrelled with his chiefs and was dismissed, and next year was sent to Malta, with the same result. His head was turned by the writings of Rousseau, and he made public employment impossible by the innumerable utopian criticisms with which he deluged the ministers. With dreams of a new state to be founded on the shores of the Sea of Aral, he travelled to Russia, and returned in dejection to Warsaw. He abandoned a government expedition to Madagascar at the Île de France (Mauritius), to spend there almost three years of melancholy and observation. His Voyage à l'Île de France (1778) gave a distinctly new element to literature in its close portraiture of nature. His Études de la Nature (3 vols. 1784) showed the strong influence of Rousseau; a fourth volume (1788) contained the immortal Paul et Virginie, an exquisite idyll of love growing up unconsciously in two natural hearts. His next works were Vœux d'un Solitaire (1789) and the novel, La Chaumière Indienne (1791). His Harmonies de la Nature (1796) was but a pale repetition of the Études. Besides these Le Café de Surat and the Essai sur J.-J. Rousseau alone merit mention. A member of the Institute from its foundation in 1795, he was admitted to the Academy in 1803, but he made himself ridiculous by childish quarrels with his fellow-members. Napoleon heaped favours upon him, and he lived comfortably till his death at Eragny near Pontoise, 21st January 1814. His Œuvres Complètes (1813-20) and Correspondance (1826) were edited by Aimé Martin. See the extravagant Life by the latter (1820), with other works by Fleury (1844), Prévost-Paradol (1852), Arvéde Barine (1891; trans. 1893), and F. Maury (1892). [Sans Pee-err'.]

Saint-Réal, CÉSAR VICHARD, ABBÉ DE (1631-92), born at Chambéry, visited London, and in 1679 returned to his birthplace as historiographer to the Duke of Savoy. His Conjuration que les Espagnols formèrent en 1613 contre Venise (1674) is to this day a French classic. [Sans Ray-aj.]

Saint Saëns, CHARLES CAMILLE, composer, born in Paris, October 9, 1835, at sixteen wrote his first symphony, which was performed with success, and was followed by numerous other instrumental works. In 1858-70 he was organist of the Madeleine. His operas, La Princesse Jaune (1872) and Le Timbre d'Argent (1877) were failures. Samson et Dalila, a sacred drama, was produced at Weimar (1877), and has become the best known of his operas. Others are Henri VIII. (1883), Proserpine (1887), Ascanio (1890), and Phryné (1893). Saint Saëns was one of the very greatest executants on the piano and organ. Many of his instrumental works, which include three symphonies, four symphonic poems, two orchestral suites, several concertos for piano and orchestra and violin and orchestra, and a considerable quantity of chamber music, show consummate mastery, if not genius. His faults are inequality, incongruity, and occasional eccentricity. He is a distinguished musical critic; his selected papers, Harmonie et Mélodie, were published in 1885. He was made a member of the Académie des Beaux Arts in 1881, and an LL.D. of Cambridge (1893). [Sans Sonr.]

Saintsbury, GEORGE EDWARD BATEMAN, born at Southampton, October 23, 1845, was educated at King's College School, London, and Merton College, Oxford. In 1868-70 he was a schoolmaster at Manchester, Guernsey, and Elgin, but soon after established himself as one of the most active critics of the day; in 1895 he became professor of English Literature at Edinburgh. All his work is characterised by clearness of thought, fullness of knowledge, and force, if not always grace of style. He has been an active contributor to the greater magazines (of Macmillan's he was for some time editor) and to encyclopedias. Among his books are a Primer (1880) and a Short History (1882) of French literature; Dryden (1881); Marlborough (1835); History of Elizabethan Literature (1887); Essays in English Literature, 1780-1860 (1891); Essays on French Novelists (1891); Corrected Impressions (1895); History of Nineteenth-Century Literature (1895); The Flourishing of Romance and Rise of Allegory (1897); A Short History of English Literature (1899); books on Scott, Matthew Arnold, and the early renaissance; and histories of criticism (3 vols. 1900-4) and of English prosody (3 vols. 1906-10).

Saint-Simon, CLAUDE HENRI, COMTE DE, founder of French socialism, was born of the ducal line in Paris, October 17, 1760. He served in the American war of independence; during the French Revolution he was imprisoned as an aristocrat, but made a little fortune by speculating in confiscated lands. His marriage (1801) was terminated by a divorce; and his lavish expenditure reduced him to utter poverty. Beginning to be in straits, he published his Lettres d'un Habitant de Genève à ses Contemporains (1803); but the first enunciations of socialism occurred in L'Industrie (1817), followed by L'Organisateur (1819), Du Système Industriel (1821), Catéchisme des Industriels (1823), and his last and most important work, Nouveau Christianisme (1825). But for the kindness of friends and a small pension allowed him by his family in 1812 he would have died of starvation. In 1823 he tried to shoot himself, and lost an eye in the attempt; he died May 19, 1825. Saint-Simon's works are wanting in sober-mindedness, judgment, and system; but notwithstanding all his vagaries, the man who attracted so many of the brightest young men of France and originated Comtism and French socialism must be regarded as a seminal thinker of high rank. In opposition to the destructive spirit of the Revolution, he sought after a positive reorganisation of society. He desired that the feudal and military system should be superseded by an industrial order controlled by industrial chiefs, and that the spiritual direction of society should pass from the church to the men of science. According to Saint-Simon, the essence of religion and the transforming principle of the new society are alike contained in the words 'Love one another.' An admirable edition of the works of Saint-Simon and his disciple Enfantin was issued in 1865-78. See monographs by Hubbard (1857), A. J. Booth (1871), Paul Janet (1878), Weill (1894-96), and Charléty (1896). [See See-mo-nay.]

Saint-Simon, LOUIS DE ROUVROY, DUC DE, was born at Paris, January 16, 1675, son of a page and favourite of Louis XIII. who became duke in 1636, but soon after fell from favour. The boy entered the king's household troops in 1691, and fought at Neerwinden (1693). He succeeded his father in 1693, married in 1695, and served in the army of the Rhine under his father-in-law, the Marshal de Lorges, from 1694 till the peace of Ryswick. Dissatisfied, he left the service in 1702, and repaired to Versailles, without for some years enjoying any measure of the royal favour. He embroiled himself in endless disputes about precedence and privilege, but recovered the king's favour by his efforts to bring his friend Orleans to a more reputable life. The king's death in 1714 opened up a bitter struggle between Orleans and the Duc de Maine, eldest of the king's bastards, in which Saint-Simon supported his friend with warmth and boldness. His influence decreased as that of Dubois rose; but he was sent to Spain in 1721 to demand the hand of the Infanta for the young king, Louis XV. After the death of Orleans in 1723, he retired to his château of La Ferté Vidame near Chartres. He lost his wife in 1743, his two sons in 1746 and 1754; and himself died, utterly bankrupt, 2d March 1755. He seems to have begun his journal before 1699, and to have prepared the Mémoires (1752) in their final form. This precious MS. was impounded in 1761 by the Duc de Choiseul for the Foreign Office. A volume of garbled extracts appeared in 1780; in 1830 the first authentic edition appeared. The first adequate edition was by Chéruel in 1856-58. But the final edition is that in Les Grands Écrivains, by M. A. de Boislisle (30 vols. 1879 et seq.). There is an abridged English translation by Bayle St John (1857). M. Prosper Faugère published the Écrits Inédits (8 vols. 1880-92). See monographs by Chéruel (1865), Baschet (1874), Clifton W. Collins (1880), Edwin Cannan (1885), Crozals (1891), and Boissier (1892).

Saint-Victor, PAUL DE (1825-81), born in Paris, made his début in 1851 as a dramatic critic in the Pays. In 1855 he carried his pen to the Presse, later to La Liberté, and last to the Moniteur Universel. He made himself famous by his knowledge, insight, and brilliant style. Among his works were Hommes et Dieux (1867), Les Femmes de Goethe (1869), Les Deux Masques (1879-83), Victor Hugo (1885), and Anciens et Modernes (1886). From 1870 he was General Inspector of Fine Arts. See study by Delzant (1887).

St Vincent, JOHN JERVIS, EARL, admiral, born at Meaford Hall, Stone, Staffordshire, January 9, 1735, entered the navy in 1749, became a lieutenant in 1755, and so distinguished himself in the Quebec expedition in 1759 that he was made commander. In 1778 he fought in the action off Brest, and in 1782 captured the Pégase of 74 guns, whereupon he was made a K.B. In 1793 he commanded the naval part of the successful expedition against the French West India Islands. In 1795, now admiral, he received the command of the Mediterranean fleet. On 14th February 1797, with fifteen sail, he fell in, off Cape St Vincent, with the Spanish fleet of twenty-seven. Jervis completely defeated the enemy, and captured four ships. The genius of Nelson contributed greatly to the success of the day. Jervis was created Earl St Vincent, and parliament granted him a pension of £3000. After repressing a mutiny off Cadiz, he was compelled by ill-health to return home. As commander of the Channel fleet he subdued the spirit of sedition, and as First Lord of the Admiralty in 1801-4 reformed innumerable abuses. He resumed the Channel command 1806-7, and died 13th March 1823. He was buried at Stone. See poor Life by Brenton (1838), and good one by Tucker (1844).

Sala, GEORGE AUGUSTUS HENRY, journalist and novelist, born in London of Italian ancestry, 24th November 1828, studied art and did book-illustrations, but in 1851 became a contributor to Household Words, as afterwards to the Welcome Guest, Temple Bar (which he founded and edited 1860-66), the Illustrated London News (to which he contributed the 'Echoes of the Week' 1860-86), and Cornhill. As special correspondent of the Daily Telegraph he was in the United States during the civil war, in Italy with Garibaldi, in France in 1870-71, in Russia in 1876, and in Australia in 1885. Twice Round the Clock (1859) is his best-known work; while his novels include The Baddington Peerage (1860), Captain Dangerous (1863), and Quite Alone (1864). Among his books of travel are A Journey due North (1859), Dutch Pictures (1861), A Trip to Barbary (1866), From Waterloo to the Peninsula (1866), Rome and Venice (1869), Paris Herself Again (1879), America Revisited (1882), A Journey due South (1885), and Right Round the World (1888). Bankrupt shortly before, he died at Brighton, a Catholic, 8th Dec. 1895. See his Things I have Seen (1894) and Life and Adventures (1895).

Saladin, in full SALAH-ED-DIN YUSSUF IBN AYUB (1137-93), sultan of Egypt and Syria and founder of a dynasty, was born at Tekrit, on the Tigris, of which his father Ayub, a Kurd, was governor under the Seljuks. He entered the service of Nur-eddin, emir of Syria, held command in the expeditions to Egypt (1167-68), and was made grand-vizier of the Fatimite calif, whom in 1171 he overthrew, constituting himself sovereign of Egypt. On Nur-eddin's death (1174) he further proclaimed himself sultan of Egypt and Syria, reduced Mesopotamia, and received the homage of the Seljuk princes of Asia Minor. His remaining years were occupied in wars with the Christians and in the consolidation of his extensive dominions. In 1187 the Christian army suffered a terrible defeat near Tiberias; then Jerusalem was stormed (3d October), and almost every fortified place on the Syrian coast was taken. Thereupon a great army of crusaders, headed by the kings of France and England, captured Acre in 1191; Richard Cœur-de-Lion defeated Saladin, took Caesarea and Jaffa, and obtained a three years' treaty. Saladin died at Damascus. His wise administration left traces for centuries in citadels, roads, and canals. His opponents recognised his chivalry, good faith, piety, justice, and greatness of soul. See Lives by Reinaud (1874) and Stanley Lane-Poole (1899).

Saldanha, JOÃO CARLOS, DUKE OF, born at Arinhaga, 17th November 1790, fought on the patriotic side when the French invaded Portugal. In 1817-22 he took part in the struggle between Brazil and Montevideo, and was viceroy of Brazil till she declared herself independent. He sided with Dom Pedro against Dom Miguel as a moderate constitutionalist, and during 1846-56 was alternately at the head of the government (supported by England) and in armed opposition. He was twice ambassador at Rome, and prime-minister in 1870. Ambassador to England from 1871, he died in London, 28th Nov. 1876. He had been created duke in 1846. See the eulogistic Memoirs by Carnota (Lond. 1880). [Sal-dan'-ya.]

Sale, GEORGE (c. 1697-1736), oriental scholar, was born in Kent, educated at King's School, Canterbury, and bred to the law. He helped to get up the Universal History, and was an author of the General Dictionary, but is best known by his unrivalled translation of the Koran, with notes and introduction (1734; new ed. 1882-86).

Sale, SIR ROBERT HENRY, born 19th September 1782, entered the H.E.I.C. army in 1795, fought at Seringapatam (1799), the capture of Mauritius (1810), and throughout the Burmese war (1824-25). In the Afghan war of 1838 he distinguished himself at Ghazni. In 1840 he was despatched to watch Dost Mohammed, and returning had to fight his way through the passes. In Jellalabad he was invested for six months (1841-42); and, relieved by Pollock, returned with his force to Kabul. He was killed at Mudki, fighting against the Sikhs, 18th December 1845. See Gleig, Sale's Brigade in Afghanistan (1846). Lady Sale, née Florentia Wynch (1790-1853), whom he married in 1809, and who was captured by the Afghans and kept prisoner until Pollock's arrival, wrote a Journal of the Disasters in Afghanistan (1843).

Salierni, ANTONIO (1750-1825), operatic composer, born near Verona, died at Vienna.

Salisbury. See JOHN OF SALISBURY.

Salisbury, ROBERT ARTHUR TALBOT GASCOYNE-CECIL, MARQUIS OF, was born at Hatfield House, 3d February 1830, ninth in descent from Lord Burghley's second son, Robert Cecil (c. 1563-1612), who by James I. was made Viscount Cranborne (1604) and Earl of Salisbury (1605); the seventh earl received the marquise in 1789. As Lord Robert Cecil he passed in 1847 from Eton to Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated in 1849. He next went on a round of travel, extending to Australasia. On his return he was elected a fellow of All Souls (1853), and entered parliament at twenty-three as Conservative M.P. for Stamford. In 1858 he opposed the abolition of church-rates; in 1859 supported Disraeli's Reform Bill by arguments which he had set forth in the 'Oxford Essays' for 1858. From this time he became a frequent speaker—studious, pugnacious, vigorous, sarcastic, often brilliant; he never spoke more warmly than in defence of the church or on education. Foreign affairs engaged his attention hardly less. In June 1865 he became Viscount Cranborne and heir to the marquise by the death of his elder brother; and he was one of the most effective opponents of Mr Gladstone's Reform Bill of that year. In the Derby ministry (1866) Lord Cranborne became Indian Secretary; but Lord Derby and Disraeli proceeding to concoct a Reform Bill, Lord Cranborne (like others) resigned, and fought against the measure with extreme pertinacity. In 1868 he succeeded his father as third marquis, and was the strongest opponent of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In 1869 he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford. In 1870 he supported the Peace Preservation Bill, but disapproved the Irish Land Act. The bill for abolishing religious tests in the universities gave him arduous employment. In January 1874 parliament was dissolved, and the Conservatives came in with a great majority. Lord Salisbury again became Secretary for India; but before the end of the year he had again come into collision with his chief on the Public Worship Regulation Act, being described by Disraeli as 'a great master of gibes and flouts and jeers.' As envoy to the Constantinople Conference (1876-77) Lord Salisbury, by acting against the spirit of his instructions, came into direct collision with Lord Derby (then Foreign Secretary); when in 1878 Lord Derby resigned Lord Salisbury succeeded him. He signalled the change by publishing a circular despatch assertive of the British objections to the San Stefano Treaty; but soon after a famous secret agreement with Russia crept into the newspapers. In the Berlin Congress both Disraeli (now Lord Beaconsfield) and Lord Salisbury took part. The 'Midlothian campaign' (1879) was followed by a dissolution in March 1880, and that by a heavy defeat for the Conservatives. On the death of Beaconsfield (1881), Lord Salisbury succeeded to the leadership of the Conservative Opposition; in June 1885 he became prime-minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and settled the 'Pensjeh incident.' This was but a short-lived administration, for Mr Gladstone (q.v.) returned to power, only, however, to be wrecked by his Home Rule Bill, and after a general election Lord Salisbury again took office (August 1886). The general election of July 1892 returned a Gladstonian majority; but in opposition Lord Salisbury and the Conservatives maintained their alliance with the Liberal Unionists, and the Home Rule Bill of 1893 was defeated in the Lords. In June 1895 the Rosebery administration fell; and in the ensuing general election, fought mainly on Irish Home Rule, the Unionists were returned with a crushing majority of 152. Lord Salisbury became for the third time prime-minister, with a Liberal-Unionist and Conservative Cabinet. Within the next two years a succession of foreign complications brought the country several times to the verge of war, only averted by the firm, and at the same time conciliatory, attitude of the British government. Turkish massacres in Armenia led to the reopening of the Eastern Question in an acute form, nearly resulting in a European conflagration. Hostilities with the United States seemed imminent owing to the interference of the latter country in a boundary dispute between British Guiana and Venezuela. Dr Jameson's filibustering expedition into the Transvaal at New Year 1896 led to critical relations with the republic, and revealed antagonism on the part of Germany. The jealousy of France at the British occupation of Egypt was actively aroused by Lord Salisbury in April 1896 entering upon the reconquest of the Soudan. And the Cretan insurrection, with the consequent crushing defeat of Greece by Turkey (1897), severely tested the Concert of the Powers. He resigned the Foreign Secretaryship in 1900; and having remained at the head of the Government during the Boer war of 1899-1902, retired from public life in July 1902, receiving the Victorian Order. He died 22d August 1903. He was naturally a student and a scientist; a masterly and most impressive orator, he yet neglected the art of persuasion; and even in apparently well-weighed speeches some startlingly injudicious sentence often broke loose. Lord Salisbury married in 1857 Georgiana, daughter of Sir Edward Alderson, and had issue five sons and three daughters. See F. S. Pulling, Life and Speeches of the Marquis of Salisbury (2 vols. 1885); and Lives by H. D. Traill (1891), S. H. Jeyes (4 vols. 1894-95), and F. D. How (1902).

Salisbury, WILLIAM (c. 1520-c. 1600), born in Denbighshire, and educated at Oxford, published a Welsh and English Dictionary (1547), and translated the New Testament into Welsh (1567).

Sallust. CAIUS SALLUSTIUS CRISPUS, Roman historian, was born of plebeian family at Amiternum in the Sabine country in 86 B.C. He had risen to be tribune in 52, when he helped to avenge the murder of Clodius upon Milo and his party. Such was the scandal of his licentious life that he was expelled in 50 from the senate—though his attachment to Caesar's party doubtless strengthened the reasons for his expulsion. In 47 he was made prætor and restored to senatorial rank. He served in the African campaign, and was left as governor of Numidia. His administration was sullied by oppression and extortion, but the charges brought against him failed before the partial tribunal of Caesar. With the fruit of his extortion he laid out famous gardens on the Quirinal and the splendid mansion which became an imperial residence of Nerva, Vespasian, and Aurelian. Here he lived, devoted to literary labours, and died 34 B.C. In this retirement he wrote his famous histories, the Catilina, a brief account of Catiline's conspiracy; the Jugurtha, a history of the war with Jugurtha, king of Numidia; and the Historiarum Libri Quinque (78-67 B.C.), of which, unhappily, but a few fragments survive. As an historian Sallust is not accurate in fact or chronological sequence. He was one of the first Roman writers to look directly for a model to Greek literature. In his labour to be concise like Thucydides he is not seldom obscure, and his diction is overlaid with rhetorical ornament, the narrative overloaded with general reflections. Editions are by Gerlach (1832), Kritz (1828-53), Dietsch (1859), Jordan (3d ed. 1887), and Jacobs-Wirz (10th ed. 1894). Excellent editions of the two complete works are by Merivale (1852), Long (1860; new ed. by Frazer, 1890), and Capes (1884); and there is a good translation by Pollard (1882).

Salmastius, CLAUDIUS, or CLAUDE DE SAUMAISE (1588-1653), born at Semur in Burgundy, studied philosophy at Paris and law at Heidelberg (1606), where he professed Protestantism. In 1629 appeared his chief work, Pliniana Exercitationes in Solinum (1629), after whose publication he mastered Hebrew, Arabic, and Coptic. In 1631 he was called to Leyden to occupy Joseph Scaliger's chair. Unavailing efforts were made (1635-40) to induce him to return to France. He was probably the most famous scholar of his day in Europe, though he had neither Casaubon's balanced judgment nor Scaliger's grasp or insight. In England Salmastius is best known through his controversy with Milton, savagely coarse on both sides. At the request of Charles II., Salmastius published (1649) his Defensio Regia pro Carolo I., answered in 1651 by Milton in his Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio. See the Vita prefixed to his letters (1656), and Masson's Milton, vol. iv.

Salmon, GEORGE (1819-1904), mathematician and theological author, born in Dublin, graduated at Trinity College in 1839, and became a fellow in 1841, regius professor of Divinity in 1866, and provost in 1888, being also F.R.S., D.D., LL.D., and D.C.L. His contributions to mathematical learning include treatises on Analytic Geometry, Modern Higher Geometry, Conic Sections, The Higher Plane Curves, and Geometry of Three Dimensions. His theological writings comprise College Sermons (1861), The Reign of Law (1873), Non-Miraculous Christianity (1881), Gnosticism and Agnosticism (1887), Introduction to the New Testament (7th ed. 1894), and Infallibility of the Church (1888).

Salomon, JOHANN PETER (1745-1815), violinist and composer, born at Bonn, served Prince Henry of Prussia 1765-80, and then settled in London. At his Philharmonic Concerts (1791-94) were produced Haydn's Twelve Grand Symphonies.

Salt, SIR TITUS (1803-76), born at Morley near Leeds, was a wool-stapler at Bradford, started wool-spinning in 1834, and was the first to manufacture alpaca fabrics in England. Round his factories in a pleasant valley, 3 miles from Bradford, on the Aire, rose the model village of Salt-airs (1853). Mayor of Bradford in 1848, and its Liberal M.P. in 1859-61, he was created a baronet in 1869. See Life by Balgarnie (1877).

Salt, WILLIAM (1805-63), Staffordshire antiquary, was a London banker.

Saltus, EDGAR EVERTSON, born in New York

City, 8th June 1858, studied at Paris, Heidelberg, and Munich, and in 1880 graduated at Columbia College law-school. His writings include a Life of Balzac (1884); The Philosophy of Disenchantment (1885) and The Anatomy of Negation (1886), both treated with whimsical humour; and a series of striking stories—Mr Inoult's Misadventure (1887), Eden (1888), The Pace that Kills (1889), Madam Sapphira (1893), When Dreams come True (1895), &c.

Salviati, ANTONIO (1816–90), who was born at Vicenza, and died at Venice, revived in 1860 the glass factories of Murano.

Salvini, TOMMASO, tragedian, born at Milan, 1st Jan. 1830, fought in the revolutionary war (1849), and became well known as a member of Ristori's company. In Paris he played in Racine, in London as Othello. He scored successes in Brussels and Madrid, and repeatedly visited Britain and America. In 1884 he retired to his villa near Florence. See his Leaves from my Autobiography (1893) and Ricordi (1895). [Sal-vee'-nee.]

Sambourne, EDWARD LINLEY, born in London, 4th January 1845, at sixteen was apprenticed to marine engine-works at Greenwich, but in April 1867 began his lifelong connection with Punch. He illustrated Kingsley's Water-babies, Andersen's Fairy Tales, &c., and died 3d August 1910.

Samson, the last of the twelve judges in the Book of Judges. His exploits have suggested to Goldziher (Hebrew Mythology, Eng. trans. 1877) the idea that elements of solar mythology may have come into his story.

Samson (c. 480–565), a Welsh saint, who died Bishop of Dol in Brittany.

Samson (1135–1211), in 1182 became abbot of Bury St Edmunds. See JOCELIN.

Samuel (Heb. Shemû'el, probably 'name of God'), last of the judges, first of the prophets, and next to Moses the greatest personality in the early history of Israel as a nation, was an Ephraimite, native of Ramathaim or Ramah in Mount Ephraim. As a child he was dedicated to the priesthood, and, becoming a temple attendant under Eli the high-priest at Shiloh, received the prophetic gift and foretold the fall of Eli and his house, a prediction soon fulfilled in the national disaster at Ebenezer. The story of Samuel contained in 1 Sam. vii.–xvi. combines two widely different accounts of his career. According to one of these, Israel lay under the Philistine yoke for twenty years, when a national convention was summoned to Mizpah by Samuel, known from Dan to Beersheba as a prophet of the Lord. While prophet and people were engaged in religious exercises the Philistines came upon them, but only to sustain a decisive repulse. The prophet thenceforward enjoyed a peaceful and prosperous rule as judge over Israel till his advancing years compelled him to associate his sons with him in the government. Dissatisfaction with their ways gave the elders of Israel a pretext for asking Samuel to give them a king such as every other nation had. Although seeing the folly of this, and well aware that it was equivalent to a rejection of Jehovah, he, after some remonstrance, granted their prayer, and at Mizpah Saul was chosen to the sovereignty. The other and older account gives a wholly different impression of the prophet's career. He comes before us as a 'man of God,' a man 'held in honour,' and a seer whose every word 'cometh surely to pass,' but occupying a position hardly so prominent as that of judge of Israel. Saul is divinely made known to him as God's instrument to deliver Israel, and the seer secretly anoints him. A month later Saul's relief of Jabesh-Gilead resulted in his being chosen king. The accounts of Samuel's conduct during Saul's reign are also discrepant.

Sanchez, THOMAS (1550–1610), Jesuit casuist, became director of the school at Granada. In his De Sacramento Matrimonii (1592) the legal, moral, and religious questions that arise out of marriage, and the relations of the sexes, are treated in portentous detail. [Span. pron. San-tcheth.]

Sanchuniathon (also Sanchoniathon or Souniathon), supposed author of a Phœnician history of Phœnicia and Egypt, said to have been a native of Berytus, and repented by Philo to have lived during the reign of Semiramis, queen of Assyria. Orelli (1826) and C. Müller (1849) published the fragments of Sanchuniathon, and the discussion raised on their genuineness and value is hardly yet at rest. If there was a real Sanchuniathon, his age must be placed in the last centuries before Christ at the earliest. The Phoinikika was not only a cosmogony but a history of Phœnicia and the surrounding nations. Eusebius further contains a fragment of a treatise, Peri Ioudaïōn, but it is doubtful whether this is the work of Philo of Byblus or of Sanchuniathon. A forgery, said to contain the whole nine books of Sanchuniathon, and to have been found in a Portuguese convent, was published by Wagenfeld (1837), but was soon consigned to disgrace and oblivion by Movers, K. O. Müller, and Grotefend. See Renan, Mémoire sur Sanchoniathon (1858); also vol. i. (1877) of Abbott's trans. of Duncker's History of Antiquity.

Sancroft, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Fressingfield, Suffolk, 30th January 1617, in 1642 was elected fellow of Emmanuel, Cambridge. In 1651 he was expelled from his fellowship for refusing to take the 'Engagement,' and in 1657 crossed over to Holland. After the Restoration his advancement was rapid—king's chaplain and rector of Houghton-le-Spring (1661); prebendary of Durham and master of Emmanuel (1662); Dean first of York and next of St Paul's (1664), as such having a principal hand in the rebuilding of the cathedral; Archdeacon of Canterbury (1668), and Archbishop (1678). A Tory and High Churchman, Sancroft refused to sit in James II.'s Ecclesiastical Commission (1686), and in 1688 was sent to the Tower as one of the Seven Bishops. But after the Revolution, having taken the oath of allegiance to James, he would not take it to William and Mary, so was suspended (August 1689), and, retiring to his native village, died there 24th Nov. 1693. Of his eight works one only retains any interest—Fur Predestinatus (1651). See Life by D'Oyly (1821) and Miss Strickland's Lives of the Seven Bishops (1866).

Sand, GEORGE, the nom de guerre of Armandine (or Amantine) Lucile Aurore Dupin, 'Baronne' Dudevant, born in Paris, 2d July 1804. Her father, Maurice Dupin, an officer, was the son of a natural daughter of Marshal Saxe; her mother was a Parisian milliner. Aurore's father died when she was very young, and she lived principally at Nohant in Berri with her grandmother, Madame Dupin, on whose death the property descended to her. At eighteen she was married to M. Dudevant, the natural son of a colonel and baron of the empire, who also had some small fortune. Two children were born—a boy, Maurice (1825–89), who afterwards took his mother's assumed surname and became a man of letters, and a girl, Solange, who married the sculptor Clésinger. After nine years of married life, she resigned her property to her husband as the price of an amicable separation, and went to Paris to make her living by literature in the Bohemian society of the period (1831). For the best part of twenty years her life was spent in the company and partly under the influence of divers more or less distinguished men. At first her interests were with poets and artists, the most famous Alfred de Musset (q.v.) and Chopin (q.v.), with the former of whom she took a journey to Italy; while the second was more or less her companion for several years. In the second decade her attention shifted to philosophers and politicians, such as Lamennais, the socialist Pierre Leroux, and the republican Michel de Bourges. After 1848 she settled down as the quiet 'châtelaine of Nohant,' where she spent the rest of her life in wonderful literary activity, varied by travel. In her work some have marked three, others four periods. When she first went to Paris, and with her companion Jules Sandeau, from the first half of whose name her pseudonym was taken, settled to novel-writing, her books—Indiana, Valentine, Lélia, and Jacques—partook of the Romantic extravagance of the time, informed by a polemic against marriage. In the next her philosophical and political teachers engendered the rhapsodies of Spiridon, Consuelo (one of her best books), and the Comtesse de Rudolstadt. Between the two groups came the fine novel Mauprat; Lucrezia Floriani is an extraordinary study. Now she began to turn towards the studies of rustic life—La Petite Fadette, François le Champi, La Mare au Diable—which some constitute a third division and regard as her greatest works. A fourth group would comprise the miscellaneous works of her last twenty years—some of them, such as Les Beaux Messieurs de Bois Doré, Le Marquis de Villemer, Mlle. la Quintinie, of high merit. Not a title of her enormous list of novels can be mentioned here, while there has to be added to it a considerable Théâtre, the charming Histoire de ma Vie, some nondescript work, such as the Hiver à Majorque and Elle et Lui (on her relations with Musset), and a delightful collection of letters, published after her death, 7th June 1876. See Lives by Thomas (new ed. 1888), Caro (1888), Amic (1893), Devaux (1895), Gribble (1907).

Sand, KARL LUDWIG (1795-1820), the Jena theological student and member of the Burschenschaft, beheaded for stabbing Kotzebue (q.v.).

Sanday, WILLIAM, D.D., LL.D., born at Holme Pierpoint, Nottingham, 1st August 1843, and educated at Repton and Balliol and Corpus Colleges, Oxford, became a fellow of Trinity (1866), principal of Hatfield's Hall, Durham (1876-83), Ireland's professor of Exegesis at Oxford (1883-95), and then Margaret professor of Divinity and canon of Christ Church. He has written on the gospels, epistles, &c.

Sandby, PAUL (1725-1809), 'father of the water-colour school,' born at Nottingham, in 1741 obtained a post in the military drawing department at the Tower of London, and in 1746-51 was draftsman of the survey of the Scottish Highlands. He made seventy-six drawings of Windsor and Eton and forty-eight of Wales. He was an original member of the Royal Academy and a fashionable teacher of painting. His water-colours are outlined with the pen, and only finished with colour.—His brother, THOMAS SANDBY (1721-98), deputy-ranger of Windsor Park from 1746, became also R.A. and first professor of Architecture to the Royal Academy. See monograph by W. Sandby (1892).

Sandeau, JULES (1811-83), born at Anbusson, went early to Paris to study law, but soon gave himself to letters. He was associated with George Sand in Rose et Blanche (1831). His first independent novel was Madame de Sommerville (1834), his first hit Marianna (1840), followed by a long series of novels—La Maison de Penarban, Mademoiselle de Kérouare, Le Docteur Herbeau, Catherine, Madeleine, Jean de Thommeray, &c., besides many shorter stories. As a dramatist he collaborated with Emile Augier, their most celebrated play Le Gendre de M. Poirier. He became keeper of the Mazarin Library in 1853, an Academician in 1858, and librarian at St Cloud in 1859. See Life by Claretie (1883), and Sainsbury's Essays on French Novelists (1891). Sandeman, ROBERT. See GLAS.

Sandeman, SIR ROBERT GROVES (1835-92), was born at Perth, the son of an Indian officer, and became eminent as an officer and administrator on the north-west frontier of India, especially in Baluchistan. See Life by T. H. Thornton (1895).

Sanders, DANIEL (1819-97), German lexicographer, born at Altstrelitz in Mecklenburg, was schoolmaster there 1843-52, and thenceforth devoted himself to making dictionaries of the German language and works on the language and literature. See Life (Neustrelitz, 1890).

Sanders, or SAUNDER, NICHOLAS (c. 1530-81), born at Charlwood Place near Reigate, was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford. A fellow in 1548, and regius professor of Common Law in 1558, in 1559 he went abroad, at Rome was created D.D. and ordained priest, and in 1561 accompanied Cardinal Hosius to the Council of Trent. He had been theological professor at Louvain for thirteen years, and had twice visited Spain (1573-77), when in 1579 he landed in Ireland, there, after two years' wanderings, to perish in the mountains. Of his fourteen works the best known are De Visibili Monarchia Ecclesie (1571) and De Origine ac Progressu Schismatis Anglicani (completed by Rishton, 1585; trans. 1877).

Sanderson, ROBERT, greatest of English casuists, was born 19th September 1587, either at Sheffield or at his father's seat, Giltwhaite Hall near Rotherham. From Rotherham grammar-school he passed in his thirteenth year to Lincoln College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow (1606), reader of logic (1608), and thrice sub-rector (1613-16), in the last year being also chosen senior proctor. In 1631 he became king's chaplain, was created D.D. in 1636, in 1646-48 filled the regius chair of Divinity at Oxford, and was parson of Boothby-Pagnell for upwards of forty years (1619-60), even through all the Great Rebellion. In 1660 he became Bishop of Lincoln. To him are due the second preface to the Prayer-book and perhaps the General Thanksgiving. He died at Buckden, Hunts, 29th Jan. 1663. His works (6 vols. 1854) comprise, besides sermons, the Logice Artis Compendium (1615), De Obligatione Conscientie Prælectiones (1647; new ed. by Whewell, 1851), Nine Cases of Conscience Resolved (1628-78), and Episcopacy not Prejudicial to the Regal Power (1661). See Life by Izaak Walton.

Sandrart, JOACHIM VON (1606-88), painter, copper-engraver, and historian of art, was born at Frankfurt, and died at Nuremberg.

Sandwich, EDWARD MONTAGU, EARL OF (1625-72), fought for the parliament at Marston Moor, sat in parliament 1645-48, divided the command of the fleet with Blake from 1653, and forwarded the Restoration: hence his earldom. He was ambassador to Spain 1666-69, and was blown up in a sea-fight with the Dutch. The scandalous fourth earl (1718-92) invented sandwiches, which he could eat without leaving the gaming-table.

Sandys, SIR JOHN EDWIN, editor of Greek classics and historian of classical scholarship, born in 1844, became at St John's College, Cambridge, fellow, tutor, and public orator.

Sankey, IRA DAVID. See MOODY.

Sanger, JOHN (1816-89), circus proprietor, born at Chew Magna, Somerset, died at Ipswich.

Sannazar'o, JACOPO (1458-1530), Italian poet, attached himself to the court of Naples. His Arcadia, a medley of prose and verse, went through numerous editions (one in 1888). Other works are Sonetti e Canzoni and De Partu Virginis. See Life by Corniani (1806).

Sanson, the family which for many generations gave Paris her executioners. The name 'M. de Paris' was first given to the elegant Charles Henri Sanson, who in his old age executed Louis XVI. See Memoirs of the Sansons (Eng. trans. 1875).

Sansovino, or CONTUCCI, ANDREA (1460-1529), a religious sculptor, born near Montepulciano, worked in Florence, Portugal, and Rome. See German Life by Schönfeld (1881).—His pupil, JACOPO SANSOVINO or TATTI (1477-1576), sculptor and architect, was born at Florence, and lived from 1527 in Venice. [San-so-vee no.]

Sant, JAMES, subject and portrait painter, born at Croydon, 23d April 1820, was elected A.R.A. in 1861, R.A. in 1870, and in 1871 was appointed painter-in-ordinary to Queen Victoria.

Santa-Anna, ANTONIO LOPEZ DE (1797-1876), born at Jalapa, in 1821 joined Iturbide, but in 1822 overthrew him, and in 1833 himself became president of Mexico. His reactionary policy in 1836 cost the country Texas. He invaded the revolted province, but was routed by Houston, and imprisoned for eight months. In 1838 he lost a leg in the gallant defence of Vera Cruz against the French. From 1841 to 1844 he was either president or the president's master, and was recalled from exile in 1846 to be president during the unlucky war with the United States, in which he was twice defeated in the field. He was recalled from Jamaica by a revolution in 1853, and appointed president for life, but in 1855 he was driven from the country. Under Maximilian he intrigued industriously, and ultimately had to flee. In 1867, after the emperor's death, he tried to effect a landing, was captured, and sentenced to death, but allowed to retire to New York. He returned at the amnesty in 1872.

Santerre, ANTOINE JOSEPH (1752-1809), a wealthy brewer in Paris, received a command in the National Guard in 1789, and took part in the storming of the Bastille. It was in his brewery that the émeute of 20th June 1792 was preconcerted, when he marched at the head of the mob who invaded the National Assembly and turned out the Girondists. On 10th August he was made commander-in-chief of the National Guard, and was in charge at the king's execution. Appointed general of division, he marched against the Vendean royalists, but was miserably beaten (18th Sept. 1793), so was recalled and imprisoned. See Life by Carro (1847). [San-ay-tayrrr.]

Santillana, ISIDRO LOPEZ DE MENDOZA, MARQUIS OF (1398-1458), Spanish scholar and poet.

Santley, SIR CHARLES (c. 1907), was born in Liverpool on 28th February 1834, and trained partly in Milan (1855-57), made his début in Haydn's Creation in 1857, and from 1862 devoted himself to Italian opera. Latterly he again became better known at concerts and in oratorio. See his Reminiscences (1909).

Saphir, MORITZ GOTTLIEB (1795-1858), Hungarian Jewish humorist, died in Vienna.

Saporta, GASTON, MARQUIS DE (1826-95), French palæontologist, who wrote upon plants and algæ.

Sappho, the greatest poetess of antiquity, born in Lesbos, fled about 596 B.C. from Mitylene to Sicily, but after some years was again at Mitylene. Her famous plunge into the sea from the Leucadian rock, because Phaon did not return her love, seems to have no historical foundation. Tradition represents her as exceptionally innumeral—a view first disputed by Welcker (1816). But for depth of feeling, passion, and grace her lyrics stand unsurpassed. Only two of her odes, with a number of short fragments, are extant. See H. T. Wharton's edition of the text, with life, translation, bibliography, &c. (1885; 3d ed. 1895).

Sarasate, MARTIN MELITON, violinist, born of Basque parentage at Pampeluna in Spain, 10th March 1844, studied at Paris, and in 1857 began to give concerts. He appeared at London in 1874. He composed light pieces, chiefly Spanish dance tunes, and died 20th Sept. 1908. [Sa-ra-sah'te.]

Sardanapalus, the Greek form of ASSUR-BANIPAL, king of Assyria (669-640 B.C.), eldest son of Esar-Haddon, and grandson of Sennacherib. With all the ambition but without the genius of his father, he was a generous patron of art and letters, and his reign marks the zenith of Assyrian splendour. He extended his sway from Elam to Egypt; but the revolt of Babylon shook the empire.

Sardou, VICTORIEN, dramatist, was born at Paris, 7th September 1831. His first efforts were failures, but through his marriage with the actress Brécourt, who nursed him when sick and in the extremity of want, he became acquainted with Déjazet, for whom he wrote two successful pieces, Monsieur Garat and Les Près Saint-Gervais (1860). In a few years he had amassed a fortune. Pieces like Nos Intimes and Les Ganaches (1861), Les Vieux Garçons and La Famille Benoiton (1865), Nos Bons Villageois and Maison Neuve (1866), Rabagas (1872), Dora (1877), Daniel Rochat (1880), Odette (1882), and Marquise (1889) are a fair sample of his work. For Sarah Bernhardt he wrote Fédora (1883), Théodora (1884), La Tosca (1887), Cléopâtre Gismonda (1894), Spiritisme (1897), and with Moreau Madame Sans-Gêne. He attempted the higher historical play in La Patrie (1869), La Haine (1874), and Thermidor (1891)—the last quickly suppressed. Sardou was elected to the Academy in 1877, and died 8th November 1908. See English monograph by Roosevelt (1892).

Sargent, JOHN SINGER, subject and portrait painter, the son of an American physician, was born at Florence in Italy in 1856, and was elected an A.R.A. in 1894, an R.A. in 1897.

Sarpi, PIETRO, better known as FRA PAOLO, born at Venice, 14th August 1552, from 1575 was professor of Philosophy in the Servite monastery there. In early life he devoted himself to Oriental languages, mathematics, astronomy, &c., including the medical and physiological sciences, in which he attained to great proficiency, being by some regarded as entitled to share in the discovery of the circulation of the blood. In the dispute between Venice and Paul V. on the subject of clerical immunities Sarpi became the champion of the republic and of freedom of thought. On the repeal (1607) of the edict of excommunication launched against Venice he was summoned to Rome to account for his conduct. He refused to obey, was excommunicated, and was seriously wounded by assassins. He afterwards busied himself with writing his great Istoria del Concilio Tridentino (London, 1619). He died 15th Jan. 1623. His collected works were published at Naples (24 vols. 1789-90). See Lives by Campbell (1869), Bianchi-Giovini (1836), Pascolato (1893), and A. Robertson (1894), and T. A. Trollope's Paul the Pope and Paul the Friar (1861).

Sarrazin, GABRIEL, born at Laval, 11th September 1853, studied at Caen and Paris, travelled in Germany and England, and settled at St Tropez in Var. He has written Les Poètes Modernes d'Angleterre (1885), La Renaissance de la Poésie Anglaise (1889), Les Mémoires d'un Centenaire (1894), Le Roi de la Mer (1897), &c. [Sar-ra-zan.]

Sarsfield, PATRICK, born at Lucan near Dublin, had fought abroad under Monmouth, and at Sedgemoor against him, when in 1688 he was defeated at Wincanton, and crossed over to Ireland (he was member for Dublin county). Created Earl of Lucan by James II., he drove the English out of Sligo, was present at the Boyne and Aghrim, defended Limerick, and on its capitulation (1691) entered the French service. He fought at Steenkirk (1692), and was mortally wounded at Neerwinden, 19th July 1693. See Life by Todhunter (1895).

Sarti, GIUSEPPE (1729-1802), composer, born at Faenza, held posts at Copenhagen, Venice, Milan, and St Petersburg, and died at Berlin. He composed a dozen operas, masses, sonatas, &c.

Sarto, ANDREA DEL, Florentine painter, whose real name was Vannucchi, was born 17th July 1486; 'del Sarto' was an allusion to his father's trade of tailor. In 1509-14 he was engaged by the Servites in Florence to paint for their church of the Annunciation a series of frescoes; and a second series was next painted for the Recollets. In 1518, on the invitation of Francis I., he went to Paris, returned next year to Italy with a commission to purchase works of art, but squandered the money and dared not return to France. He died of the plague at Florence, 22d January 1531. Andrea's most celebrated single pictures are the several Madonnas, a Last Supper, the 'Fathers of the Church Disputing,' a Pietà, and two Annunciations—most of them at Florence. He was a rapid worker and accurate draughtsman, displaying a refined feeling for harmonies of colour; but, though called 'the Faultless,' lacks the elevation and spiritual imagination of the greatest masters. See Life by Von Reumont (1835).

Sartoris, ADELAÏDE. See KEMBLE.

Sass, HENRY (1788-1844), London art teacher.

Sassoferrato, of GIAMBATTISTA SALVI (1605-85), religious painter, was born at Sassoferrato in the March of Ancona, and worked at Rome.

Saul, the son of Kish, was the first king elected by the Israelites, conquered the Philistines, Ammonites, and Amalekites, became madly jealous of David, his son-in-law, and was ultimately at feud with the priestly class. At length Samuel secretly anointed David king. Saul fell in battle with the Philistines on Mount Gilboa.

Saulcy, FÉLICIEN CAIGNART DE (1807-80), numismatist, born at Lille, became an artillery officer, and ultimately keeper of the artillery museum in Paris. A member of the Academy and a senator, he travelled in Iceland, Greenland, Syria, and Palestine. Besides innumerable works on numismatics, he wrote a description of the Dead Sea (1852-54), a Voyage en Terre Sainte (1865), the illustrated Jerusalem (1881), and books on Julius Caesar in Gaul and on Jewish history. [Soc.-see.]

Saumarez, JAMES, LORD DE, English naval commander, born in Guernsey, 11th March 1757, served in the navy during the American war (1774-82). Now a commander, he distinguished himself in the fight between Rodney and De Grasse (12th April 1782); and for his capture (1793) of the French frigate La Réunion was knighted. He fought at L'Orient (1795) and Cape St Vincent (1797), and was second in command at the Nile. In 1801, a baronet and vice-admiral, he fought his greatest action, off Cadiz (July 12), defeating fourteen French-Spanish ships with six, and was made K.C.B. He commanded the English Baltic fleet sent (1809) to assist the Swedes. Created a peer in 1831, he died 9th October 1836. See Life by Sir John Ross (1838). [So'-ma-rez.]

Saunders, NICHOLAS. See SANDERS.

Saunders, JOHN (1810-95), born at Barnstable, in 1846 started The People's Journal, wrote Abel Drake's Wife (1862), Hirell (1869), and sixteen other works of fiction, and died at Richmond.—His daughter, KATHERINE (1841-94), married in 1876 to the Rev. Richard Cooper, wrote Gideon's Rock, The High Mills, &c.

Saunderson, NICHOLAS (1682-1739), the blind mathematician, born at Thurlstone near Penistone, lost his eyesight from smallpox when a year old, but received a good education in classics and mathematics. In 1707 he proceeded to Cambridge, and lectured on the Newtonian philosophy, optics, &c. In 1711 he became Lucasian professor of Mathematics. A Life is prefixed to his Algebra (1740); another treatise by him is on Fluxions (1756).

Saurin, JACQUES (1677-1730), French Protestant preacher, born at Nîmes, studied at Geneva, became minister of a Walloon church in London in 1701, and in 1705 settled at the Hague. His chief works are Sermons (1749; trans. 1775-76); Discours sur les Événements les plus Mémorables du V. et du N. T. (1720-28), often called Saurin's Bible; and État du Christianisme en France (1725). [So'-ran.]

Saussure, HORACE BÉNÉDICT DE (1740-99), professor of Physics in 1762-86 at Geneva, in 1768 commenced his epoch-making investigations in the Alps, Jura, and Vosges, Germany, England, Italy, Switzerland, Sicily, and the extinct craters of Auvergne, and traversed the Alps in nearly all directions. He was the first to reach the summit of Mont Blanc, in 1787. His invaluable observations on the minerals, botany, meteorology, &c. of the districts he visited were recorded in his Voyages dans les Alpes (1779-96). See Life by Senebier (1801); and Douglas Freshfield, De Saussure and the Alps (1892).—His son, NICOLAS THÉODORE (1767-1845), wrote Recherches Chimiques sur la Végétation (1804). [Soas-seer.]

Sauvage, FRÉDÉRIC, shipbuilder of Boulogne, is by the French regarded as the inventor of the screw-propeller, in virtue of his having in 1832 improved the pattern in use. [So'-vash.]

Savage, MARMION W. (1803-72), author of The Bachelor of the Albany (1847) and other novels, was born in Ireland, and died at Torquay.

Savage, RICHARD, poet, claimed to be the illegitimate child of Richard Savage, fourth and last Earl Rivers, and the Countess of Macclesfield, and to have been born 16th January 1697—a story for which he himself was the sole authority. He assumed the name Savage as early as 1717, professing his identity with an actual illegitimate son of Lord Rivers and Lady Macclesfield, baptised Richard Smith (who probably died at nurse). In the dedication to his comedy Love in a Veil (1718) he asserted the parentage, but in Curl's Poetical Register (1719) the story is for the first time fully given. Aaron Hill befriended him, and in 1724 published in The Plain Dealer an outline of his story which brought subscribers for his Miscellanies (1726); in 1727 he killed a gentleman in a tavern brawl, and narrowly escaped the gallows. His attacks upon Mrs Brett—his alleged unnatural mother, who had married Col. Henry Brett after her divorce (1697) from the Earl of Macclesfield—now became louder and more bitter—in his poem, The Bastard (1728). Mrs Brett took no notice of the claim; but her nephew, Lord Tyrconnel, seems to have silenced him with a bribe. The Wanderer was dedicated to him in 1729, but his bounty soon ceased. Savage's disreputable habits brought misery and hunger, and the queen's pension (1732) of £50 for a birthday ode was dissipated in a week's debauchery. On Queen Caroline's death (1737) Pope set agoing a subscription to find him the means of living quietly at Swansea; but after about a year he went to Bristol, was flung into jail for debt, and died there, 1st August 1743. Savage owes his reputation solely to the touching Apology in which Samuel Johnson immortalised his ill-fated friend (1744). He knew Savage in his own years of hunger in London, and, moved by pity to partiality, wrote what is perhaps the most perfect shorter Life in English literature. That the story contains improbabilities and falsehoods was proved by Moy Thomas in N. & Q. (1858). See Makower's Life of him (1909).

Savarin. See BRILLAT-SAVARIN.

Savary, ANNE JEAN MARIE RENÉ (1774–1833), Duc de Rovigo, born at Marcq in Ardennes, entered the army in 1790, and served on the Rhine, in Egypt, and at Marengo (1800). Napoleon employed him in diplomatic affairs. In 1804 he presided at the execution of the Duc d'Enghien, and in the wars of 1806–8 acquired high reputation. Now Duke of Rovigo (1808), he was sent to Spain, and negotiated the kidnapping of the Spanish king and his son. In 1810 he became minister of Police. After Napoleon's fall he wished to accompany him to St Helena; was confined at Malta, but escaped to Smyrna; and on his return to Paris (1819) was reinstated in his honours. In 1831–33 he was commander-in-chief in Algeria. See his Mémoires (1828).

Savigny, FRIEDRICH KARL VON (1779–1861), born of Alsatian family at Frankfort, in 1803 became a Law professor at Marburg, and published a treatise on the Roman law of property (Eng. trans. 1849) that won him European fame. In 1808 he was called to Landshut and in 1810 to Berlin, where he was also in 1810–42 member of the commission for revising the code of Prussia, &c. He resigned office in 1848. His greatest books were his great Roman Law in the Middle Ages (1815–31; trans. 1829) and System of Roman Law (1840–49), with its continuation on Obligations (1851–53). See books by Arndt (1861), Rudorff (1862), Bethmann-Hollweg (1867), and Landsberg (1890).—His son, KARL FRIEDRICH (1814–75), diplomatist, was a devout Catholic. [Sa-wen-ye.]

Savile. See HALIFAX (MARQUIS OF).

Savile, SIR HENRY (1549–1622), scholar, born at Bradley near Halifax, became fellow of Merton College, Oxford, travelled on the Continent (1578), was Queen Elizabeth's tutor in Greek and mathematics, became Warden of Merton in 1585, and Provost of Eton in 1596, and was knighted in 1604. In 1619 he founded chairs of Geometry and Astronomy at Oxford. His principal works are Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores (1596), containing the works of William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Roger Hoveden, and 'Ingulph' (q.v.); Commentaries concerning Roman Warfare (1598); Fower Bookes of the Histories and the Agricola of Tacitus (1581); and a magnificent edition of St Chrysostom (1610–13). [Sav'il.]

Savonarola, GIROLAMO, religious and political reformer, was born of noble family at Ferrara, September 21, 1452, and in 1475 entered the Dominican order at Bologna. He seems to have preached in 1482 at Florence; but his first trial was a failure. In a convent at Brescia his zeal won attention, and in 1489 he was recalled to Florence. His second appearance in the pulpit of San Marco—on the sinfulness and apostasy of the time—was a great popular triumph; and for his expositions of the Apocalypse and his half-prophetic outpourings his followers claimed for him the character of an inspired prophet. Under Lorenzo the Magnificent art and literature had felt the semi-pagan revival of the 15th century, whose spirit was utterly at variance with Savonarola's conception of spirituality and Christian morality. To the aristocratic adherents of the Medici Savonarola early became an object of suspicion; but till the death of Lorenzo (1492) his relations with the church were at least not antagonistic; and when, in 1493, a reform of the Dominican order in Tuscany was proposed under his auspices, it was approved by the pope, and Savonarola was named the first vicar-general. But now his preaching began to point plainly to a political revolution as the divinely-ordained means for the regeneration of religion and morality, and he predicted the advent of the French under Charles VIII., whom ere long he welcomed to Florence. Soon, however, the French were compelled to leave Florence, and a republic was established, of which Savonarola became the guiding spirit, his party ('the Weepers') being completely in the ascendant. Now the Puritan of Catholicism displayed to the full his extraordinary genius and the extravagance of his theories. The republic of Florence was to be a Christian commonwealth, of which God was the sole sovereign, and His Gospel the law; the most stringent enactments were made for the repression of vice and frivolity; gambling was prohibited; the vanities of dress were restrained by sumptuary enactments. Even the women flocked to the public square to fling down their costliest ornaments, and Savonarola's followers made a huge 'bonfire of vanities.' Meanwhile his rigorism and his assumed supernatural gift of prophecy led to his being cited in 1495 to answer a charge of heresy at Rome; and on his failing to appear he was forbidden to preach. Savonarola disregarded the order, but his difficulties at home increased; the new system proved impracticable; and although the conspiracy for the recall of the Medici failed, and five of the conspirators were executed, yet this very rigour hastened the reaction. In 1497 came a sentence of excommunication from Rome; and thus precluded from administering the sacred offices, Savonarola zealously tended the sick monks during the plague. A second 'bonfire of vanities' in 1498 led to riots; and at the new elections the Medici party came into power. Savonarola was ordered to desist from preaching, and was fiercely denounced by a Franciscan preacher, Francesco da Puglia. Dominicans and Franciscans appealed to the interposition of divine providence by the ordeal of fire. But when the trial was to have come off (April 1498) difficulties and debates arose, destroying Savonarola's prestige and producing a complete revulsion of public feeling. The Dominican prophet was brought to trial for falsely claiming to have seen visions and uttered prophecies, for religious error, and for sedition. Under torture he made avowals he afterwards withdrew. He was declared guilty of heresy and of seditious teaching, and the sentence was confirmed by Rome. On May 23, 1498, this extraordinary man and two Dominican disciples, were strangled and burned, professing their adherence to the Catholic Church. In morals and religion, not in theology, Savonarola may be regarded as a forerunner of the Reformation. His works are mainly sermons, theological treatises (the chief The Triumph of the Cross), some poems, and a discourse on the government of Florence. An edition appeared in 1633-40; and one by Baccini of his Sermons at Florence since 1889. The great Life of him is by Prof. Villari (1863; 2d ed., much altered, 1887; trans. by Linda Villari, 1888), who edited a selection of his sermons and writings (1898). See also English works by R. Madden (1854) and W. R. Clark (1878), Gherardi's Nuovi documenti (1887), and George Eliot's Romola.

Sawtre, WILLIAM, a Lollard burnt at Smithfield, 26th Feb. 1401, the first victim in England.

Saxby, MARGARET JESSIE, author since 1875 of many children's tales, some of them about Shetland, is the daughter of one Shetland ornithologist, Lawrence Edmonston, M.D. (1795-1879), and the widow of another, Henry L. Saxby.

Saxe, JOHN GODFREY (1816-87), poet, born at Highgate, Vt., was by turns lawyer, journalist, politician, lecturer, and journalist again. His poems, which fill several volumes, are mostly humorous and satirical.

Saxe, MAURICE, Marshal, natural son of Augustus II., Elector of Saxony and king of Poland, and Countess Aurora von Königsmark, was born at Goslar, 28th October 1696. At twelve he ran off to join the army of Marlborough in Flanders, and next the Russo-Polish army before Stralsund (1711). He fought against the Turks in Hungary under Prince Eugene, and studied the art of war in France. In 1726, elected Duke of Courland, he maintained himself against Russians and Poles, but was compelled to retire in 1729. He took a brilliant part in the siege of Philippsburg (1734); and in the war of the Austrian succession he invaded Bohemia and took Prague by storm. In 1744, now marshal of France, he commanded the French army in Flanders, showed splendid tactical skill, and took several fortresses. In 1745 he defeated the Duke of Cumberland at Fontenoy. In 1746 he gained the victory of Raucoux, and was made marshal-general. For the third time, at Laffeld (2d July 1747), he defeated Cumberland and captured Bergen-op-zoom. He then retired to his estate of Chambord, and died 30th Nov. 1750. His work on the art of war, Mes Réveries, was published in 1751. See Carlyle's Frederick the Great, and Lives by Karl von Weber (2d ed. 1870), Saint-René Taillandier (1865), Vitzthum von Eckstädt (1867), the Duc de Broglie (1891), and Brandenburg (1897).

Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, ALFRED ERNEST ALBERT, PRINCE OF, second son of Queen Victoria, was born at Windsor Castle, 6th August 1844; studied at Bonn and Edinburgh; entered the royal navy in 1858; was elected king of Greece in 1862, but declined the dignity; in 1866 was created Duke of Edinburgh; in 1874 married the Russian Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna (b. 17th Oct. 1853); in 1893 succeeded his uncle as reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; and died on the 31st of July 1900.

Saxo Grammaticus, 'the Scholar' (c. 1140-1206), Danish chronicler, finished the Gesta Danorum about 1185 (see Elton's translation of books i.-ix., 1894). He was a Zealander by birth, and was secretary to the Archbishop of Roskilde.

Say, JEAN BAPTISTE (1767-1832), political economist, born at Lyons, passed part of his youth in England, at the Revolution worked for Mirabeau on the Courrier de Provence, and was secretary to the minister of Finance. In 1794-1800 he edited La Décade, and in it expounded the views of Adam Smith. A member of the tribunate (1799), he erelong disapproved the arbitrary tendencies of the consular government and resigned (1804). In 1803 he issued his Traité d'Économie Politique (8th ed. 1876). In 1814 the government sent him to England to study its economics; he laid down the results in De l'Angleterre et des Anglais (1816). From 1819 he lectured on political economy, and in 1831 became professor at the Collège de France. He also wrote Catéchisme d'Économie Politique (1815) and Mélanges et Correspondance (1833).—His grandson, LEON SAY (1826-96), was a journalist, statesman, and political economist.

Sayce, ARCHIBALD HENRY, philologist, born at Shirehampton near Bristol, September 25, 1846, took a classical first from Queen's College, Oxford, in 1869, and became a clerical fellow and tutor. He was deputy-professor of Comparative Philology 1876-90, and then from 1891 professor of Assyriology. He was a member of the Old Testament Revision Company, and is D.D. and LL.D. Among his works are Comparative Philology (1874), The Science of Language (1880), The Ancient Empires of the East (1884), Hibbert Lectures on the Babylonian religion (1887), The Hittites (1889), Races of the Old Testament (1891), Egypt of the Hebrews, The Higher Criticism and the Monuments (1894), Herodotus (1895), and Patriarchal Palestine (1895). Besides his Assyrian Grammar (1872) and Assyrian Syllabary (1875), he has published many books and papers on the subject, and he edited George Smith's History of Babylonia (1877) and Chaldean Genesis (1880), also the second series of 'Records of the Past' (1888-92).

Sayers, TOM (1826-65), pugilist, was born in Pimlico, and became a bricklayer. From 1849, when he fought his first fight, he was beaten but once, though under the average of middle-weight champions. His last and most famous contest with Heenan, the Benicia Boy, in 1860, ended in a draw and a subscription of £3000 for Sayers.

Scævola, a Roman condemned by Lars Porsena to be burnt for trying to stab him, showed his contempt of pain by thrusting his hand into the fire, and was pardoned.

Scala, DELLA. See SCALIGER.

Scaliger, JULIUS CÆSAR, according to the (highly suspicious) story of his famous son, was born in 1484 in the castle of Riva on the Lago di Garda, second son of Benedetto della Scala, a descendant of the princely family of Verona of that name; was bred to arms under his kinsman the Emperor Maximilian; and gained marvellous distinction in the French armies attempting the conquest of Italy. Nevertheless he never neglected his studies, acquiring also a knowledge of medicine and Greek! A more likely account is that Julius was the son of a Verona sign-painter, Benedetto Bortone, and that he took his M.D. at Padua. Naturalised as a French citizen in 1528, he settled in Agen as a physician, and died 21st Oct. 1558, under suspicion of Calvinist leanings. His fame has been overshadowed by that of his greater son; and while his vast attainments are admitted, his judgments often show want of taste and good sense. Besides his Latin poems, Scaliger's chief works are on the Latin cases, poetics, Theophrastus, Aristotle (De Animalibus), and Hippocrates. In his later life he attempted to gain notoriety by an unscrupulous attack on Erasmus. In ridicule of the Latin stylists of Italy, Erasmus had published a satire, Ciceronianus. Construing this as a censure of Cicero himself, Scaliger attacked Erasmus (1531) in two orations which for scurrility are unparalleled even in that age. See books by Nisard (1860) and Magen (1850).

His third son, JOSEPH JUSTUS, born at Agen, 5th August 1540, studied at Bordeaux, and then under his father's care acquired that mastery of Latin prose and verse in which he surpassed all the scholars of his time. After his father's death he went to the University of Paris, learnt Greek, and devoured the Greek poets in an incredibly short time. Eventually he boasted that he spoke thirteen languages, ancient and modern. During his four years at Paris he turned Protestant. In 1565 he accompanied M. de Roche-Pozay to Italy, of whose scholarship and religion he received the worst impression. Of England, which they next visited, Scaliger formed an equally unfavourable opinion. Of the Scots he speaks more kindly, specially mentioning the beauty of their ballads. In 1570 he settled at Valence, and for two years studied under the jurist Cujacius. In 1572-74 he was professor in Calvin's college at Geneva. Returning to France, he found a home with the Roche-Pozays for the next twenty years, and in spite of the Huguenot wars produced a series of works which placed him at the head of European scholars. Among them are his learned but vainglorious editions of Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Eusebius; by his edition of Manilius (1579) and his Emendatione Temporum (1583) he founded modern chronology. From 1593 he held a chair at Leyden; and to his inspiration Holland owes her long line of scholars. Scaliger's last years were embittered by controversies, especially with the Jesuits, whose champion Scioppius denounced the scion of the Della Scalas as a baseborn impostor, a profligate, and an atheist. Scaliger's reply was ineffectual. He still continued his labours, but his spirit was broken, and he died 21st January 1609. By his combined knowledge, sagacity, and actual achievement Scaliger holds the first place among the scholars of all times. See Life by Bernays (Berl. 1855), works by Nisard (1852) and Tamizey de Larroque (1881), and Mark Pattison's Essays (1889).

Scarlatti, ALESSANDRO (1659-1725), composer, born at Trapani, at the court of Queen Christina of Sweden at Rome produced in 1680 his first opera. He was musical director at the court of Naples 1694-1703, conducted the conservatoire there, and founded the Neapolitan school of musical composition. He wrote nearly 120 operas, 200 masses, 10 oratorios, 500 cantatas, and innumerable motets and madrigals.—His son, DOMENICO (1683-1757), who lived in Rome, London, Lisbon, Naples, and Madrid, was a clever writer of sonatas for the pianoforte.

Scarlett, JAMES, BARON ABINGER (1769-1844), born in Jamaica, studied at Trinity, Cambridge, took silk in 1816, and in 1819 became Whig M.P. for Peterborough. Canning made him Attorney-general, and with a knighthood, in 1827; and in 1834, now Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, he was created Baron Abinger.—His second son, SIR JAMES YORKE SCARLETT, G.C.B. (1799-1871), educated at Eton and Trinity, commanded the 5th Dragoon Guards 1840-53, and on 25th October 1854 led the heavy-cavalry charge at Balaclava. He subsequently commanded all the cavalry in the Crimea, and in 1865-70 commanded at Aldershot.

Scarlett, ROBERT (c. 1499-1594), the Peterborough sexton who buried Catharine of Aragon and Mary Queen of Scots.

Scarpa, ANTONIO (1747-1832), anatomist, born at Motta, was professor at Pavia 1784-1812.

Scarron, PAUL, born at Paris, 4th July 1610, the son of a lawyer, became an abbé, and gave himself up to pleasure. About 1634 he paid a long visit to Italy, and in 1638 began to suffer from that terrible malady which ultimately left him paralysed. He obtained a prebend in Mans (1643), tried physicians in vain, and, giving up all hope of remedy, returned to Paris in 1646 to depend upon letters for a living. From this time he began to pour forth endless sonnets, madrigals, songs, epistles, and satires; in 1644 published Typhon, ou la Gigantomachie; and made a still greater hit with his metrical comedy, Jodelet, ou le Maître Valet (1645), followed by His Trois Dorothes and Les Boutades du Capitain Matamore (the plots taken from the Spanish). In 1648 appeared his Virgile Travesti (part i.) and the popular comedy, L'Héritier Ridicule. One of the bitterest satires against Mazarin during the Fronde was ascribed to Scarron, who, on the cardinal's triumphant return to Paris, addressed him in terms of unmeasured flattery, but did not recover his pensions. Le Roman Comique (1651-57), a reaction against the euphuistic and interminable novels of Mlle. de Scudéry and Honoré d'Urfé, gave the impulse out of which sprang the masterpieces of Le Sage, Defoe, Fielding, and Smollett. The income Scarron derived from his publisher, his pensions, and the fruits of his dedications enabled him to enjoy good living and to receive the visits of the greatest figures of the day in the world of fashion and letters. In 1652 he married a beautiful but penniless girl of fifteen, Françoise d'Aubigné, afterwards the famous Madame de Maintenon (q.v.), who brought an unknown decorum into his Bohemian household. Even his writings henceforward lose their grossness. Death relieved the sufferer 16th October 1660, and reduced his poor young wife to destitution. See books on him by Christian (1841), Morillot (1888), and Boislielle (1894); Jusserand's introduction to a new edition of Tom Brown's translation of The Comical Works of Scarron (1892); and his English Essays from a French Pen (1895).

Scarth, HARRY MENODEN (1814-90), born at Keverstone, Durham, and educated at Edinburgh and Christ's, Cambridge, became rector of Wrington and a prebendary of Wells. He wrote on Roman Bath (1864), Roman Britain (1883), &c.

Schadow, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (1764-1850), born at Berlin, became court sculptor and director of the Academy of Arts.—One son, RUDOLF (1786-1822), was also a sculptor; while another, FRIEDRICH WILHELM SCHADOW-GODENHAUS (1789-1862), was a painter of the Overbeck school, from 1819 professor at Berlin, and in 1826-59 head of the Düsseldorf Academy. See Hübner, Schadow und seine Schule (1860). [Shah-do.]

Schafarik, PAVEL JOSEF (1795-1861), Bohemian scholar, from 1833 lived at Prague.

Schaff, PHILIP (1819-93), Presbyterian theologian, born at Coire in Switzerland, was privat-docent in Berlin, when in 1843 he was called to a chair at the German Reformed seminary at Mercersburg, Penn. In 1869 he became professor in the Union Seminary, New York. A founder of the American branch of the Evangelical Alliance, he was president of the American Old Testament Revision Committee. Among his works are a History of the Christian Church (enlarged form 1882-94), The Creeds of Christendom (1877), The Person of Christ (1865), and a Bible Dictionary (1880). He also edited The Religious Encyclopedia, based on Herzog (1882-84), &c. [Schaff.]

Schäffle, ALBERT EBERHARD FRIEDRICH (1831-1903), born at Nürtingen in Württemberg, became professor of Political Economy at Tübingen in 1861, in 1868 at Vienna. In 1871 he settled at Stuttgart. Of his works The Impossibility of Social Democracy, The Quintessence of Socialism, and Labour Protection have been translated; but perhaps the most important are a general treatise on Political Economy and a work on the framework of society. [Schaff.]

Schaalcken, GODFRIED (1643-1706), Dutch painter, his specialty candle-light, was born at Dort, visited England, and died at the Hague.

Schall, JOHANN ADAM VON (1591-1669), born at Cologne, was sent out to China as a Jesuit missionary in 1622, and at Pekin was entrusted with the reformation of the calendar and the direction of the mathematical school. By favour of the Manchu emperor the Jesuits obtained liberty to build churches (1644), and in fourteen years they are said to have made 100,000 converts. But in the next reign Schall was thrown into prison, and died there. A large MS. collection of his Chinese writings is preserved in the Vatican. In Latin he wrote a history of the China Mission (1655).

Scharf, SIR GEORGE (1820-95), son of a Bavarian lithographer, George Scharf (1788-1860), who settled in London in 1816, was bred a draughtsman, painted a few oil pictures, travelled in Lycia, lectured on art, and was the first secretary of the National Portrait Gallery (from 1857). He was made C.B. in 1885 and K.C.B. in 1895.

Scharnhorst, GERHARD JOHANN DAVID VON (1755-1813), was the son of a Hanoverian farmer, and as a Hanoverian officer fought in the Flanders campaigns of 1793-95. In 1801 he was appointed director of the training-school for Prussian officers. Wounded at Auerstädt and taken prisoner at Lübeck, he was present at Eylau; from 1807 he reorganised the Prussian army, introduced the short-service system, and created a better spirit amongst officers and men, so making it possible to defeat Napoleon at Leipzig (1813). But before that he died at Prague of a wound received at Grossgörschen. See Lives by Klippel (1869-71) and Lehmann (1886-87). [Scharnhorst.]

Scharwenka, XAVER, pianist and composer, born at Samter near Posen, 6th January 1850, in 1881 started a music school in Berlin, and in 1891-98 was in New York. [Schar-ven'ka.]

Scheele, CARL WILHELM (1742-86), chemist, born at Stralsund (then Swedish), was apprenticed to a chemist at Gothenburg, and was afterwards chemist at Malmö, Stockholm, Upsala, and Köping. His whole life was devoted to chemical experiment, and he made many discoveries of the utmost importance. He discovered hydrofluoric, tartaric, benzoic, arsenious, molybdic, lactic, citric, malic, oxalic, gallic, and other acids, and separated chlorine, baryta, oxygen (1777), glycerine (1783), and sulphuretted hydrogen. He first described the pigment called Scheele's green, or arsenite of copper, and scheelite or tungsten. He showed in 1777, independently of Priestley, that the atmosphere consists chiefly of two gases, one supporting combustion, the other preventing it. In 1783 he described prussic acid. His papers were Englished by Beddoes (1786), and NordenSKIÖLD published his unedited German letters and papers (Stock. 1893). [Schay-leh.]

Scheemakers, PIETER (1691-1770), sculptor, Nollekens' master, was born and died at Antwerp, lived in London 1735-69, and executed eleven monuments at Westminster. [Skay-mah-kers.]

Scheffel, JOSEPH VIKTOR VON (1826-86), poet, born at Karlsruhe, was bred for the law at Heidelberg, Munich, and Berlin, but in 1852 started for Italy and began to write. His first and best book was Der Trompeter von Säckingen (1854, 216th ed. 1895), a verse tale of the Thirty Years' War. Ekkehard (1857; 143rd ed. 1895) is a prose story of the 10th century. Gaudecamus (1867) is a collection of songs and ballads; and he wrote also two romances—Hugideo (1884) and Juniperus (1868)—and poems. He settled at Karlsruhe in 1864, and died there. See Lives by Ruhemann (1886), Pröls (1887), and Pilz (1887). [Scheffel.]

Scheffer, ARY (1795-1858), the son of a German painter settled at Dordrecht, studied in Paris, and painted genre pictures; then became a Romantic, taking subjects from Goethe, Byron, and Dante; and after 1835 turned to religious subjects, painting 'Christus Consolator,' 'The Temptation of Christ,' 'St Augustine and Monica,' &c. He also painted portraits. See Memoir by Mrs Grote (1860). [Schef-fer.]

Scheffler, JOHANN. See ANGELUS.

Schelling, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH, born at Leonberg in Württemberg, 27th January 1775, studied at Tübingen and Leipzig, and from 1798 lectured on philosophy at Jena as successor to Fichte. In 1803-8 he was professor at Würzburg; then until 1820 secretary of the Royal Academy of Arts at Munich; again professor at Erlangen until 1827, when he returned to Munich; and finally from 1841 at Berlin. He died 20th August 1854. His works may be grouped into three periods, in the first of which (1797-1800), embracing the 'Philosophy of Nature' and 'Transcendental Philosophy,' he was under the influence of Fichte; the second (1801-3) culminates in the 'Philosophy of Identity,' Schelling's lights being Spinoza and Boehme; the third and least valuable represents the growth of his Positive (in opposition to the previous Critical or Negative) Philosophy. He began as an adherent of Fichte's principle of the Ego as the supreme principle of philosophy, and developed the pantheism characteristic of the idealism of Fichte and Hegel. In the Philosophy of Nature writings and in The World-Soul (1797-99) he supplements the Fichtian Ego or Absolute Ego by showing that the whole of Nature may be regarded as an embodiment of a process by which Spirit tends to rise to a consciousness of itself. The Transcendental Idealism (1800) speaks of the two fundamental and complementary sciences, Transcendental Philosophy and Speculative Physics. The promised Positive Philosophy which was to advance beyond merely negative or critical philosophy came to be simply the philosophy of Mythology and Revelation. See works by Noack (1859), Plitt (Life, 1870), Becker (1875), Watson (Chic. 1883), and Groos (1889).

Schenk, AUGUST (1815-91), Leipzig botanist.

Schenkel, DANIEL (1813-85), born at Dägerlen in Zurich, was appointed professor of Theology at Heidelberg in 1851. In his youth almost orthodox, he became a champion of ecclesiastical liberalism. Among his works were Das Wesen des Protestantismus (1846-51), Der Unionsberuf (1855), Christliche Dogmatik (1858-59), and Charakterbild Jesu (1864), an attempt to construct the human character of Jesus and entirely eliminate the supernatural. [Shen-kel.]

Scherer, EDMOND (1815-89), critic, born in Paris of Swiss and English parentage, spent two years in England after schooling at Paris and Strasburg, qualified for the Protestant ministry, and became professor of Exegesis at Geneva (1845). But he drifted away from his early faith, in 1850 was expelled from the church, and for ten years was mainly occupied in religious controversy. In 1860 he went to Paris and contributed to the papers. In 1871 he was elected deputy for Oise-et-Marne. Scherer takes a high place among modern literary critics. See monograph by Gréard (1890), and Saintsbury's Introduction to Scherer's Essays on English Literature (1891). [Shay-er.]

Scherer, WILHELM (1841-86), an Austrian student of German, from 1877 a Berlin professor.

Scherr, JOHANNES (1817-86), historian, novelist, and humorous writer, was born at Hohenrechenberg in Swabia. A strong democrat, in 1848 he was a member of the Würtemberg diet, and in 1849 fled to Switzerland, where (1860) he became lecturer in the Zurich Polytechnic. [Sherr.]

Schetky, JOHN CHRISTIAN (1778-1874), marine painter, was the son of a Transylvanian violoncellist who had settled in Edinburgh, and was trained there, at Rome, and Paris.

Schiaparelli, GIOVANNI VIRGINIO (1835-1910), born at Savigliano, Piedmont, was head of Brera observatory, studied meteors and double stars, and discovered the canals of Mars.

Schlefer, FRANZ ANTON VON (1817-79), Russian student of Osiak and other Siberian tongues, was born at Reval, and died at St Petersburg.

Schiller, F. C. S., born in 1864 and educated at Rugby and Balliol, became tutor at Corpus Christi, and wrote on humanistic philosophy and logic.

Schiller, JOHANN CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH, was born, the son of an army surgeon, at Marbach on Neckar, 10th Nov. 1759, and was trained in a Stuttgart ducal school for youths intended for the public service. He dropped law for medicine, and about 1776 became conscious of his own poetic powers. In 1781 he was appointed surgeon to a Würtemberg regiment, and in January 1782 his play Die Räuber was put on the stage at Mannheim; as being full of revolutionary feeling it made a tremendous sensation. For quitting Stuttgart without leave the Duke had him arrested, and forbade him to write plays or leave Würtemberg; so he fled from the capital and lay concealed in various places of retreat. At Bauerbach he finished two more plays, Fiesco and Kabale und Liebe (1783). For a few months he was dramatist to the Mannheim theatre. He next issued a theatrical journal, Die Rheinische Thalia, begun in 1784, in which were first printed most of his Don Carlos, many of his best poems, and the stories Verbrecher aus Verlorener Ehre and Der Geisterseher. In 1785 he went by invitation to Leipzig; and at

Dresden, where Körner was living, he found rest from emotional excitement and pecuniary worries. Here he finished Don Carlos (1787), his first mature play, though it suffers artistically from excessive length and lack of unity. Amongst the finest fruits of his discussions with Körner and his circle are the poems An die Freude and Die Künstler. After two years in Dresden and an unhappy love affair (not the first) he went to Weimar, where he studied Kant with great zeal. Now he met his future wife, Charlotte von Lengefeld, and began his history of the revolt of the Netherlands. In 1788 he was appointed to a professorship at Jena, and married; but soon broke down his health by overwork, lecturing, and writing the history of the Thirty Years' War. Die aesthetische Erziehung des Menschen deals with art as the supreme educative agent. In 1794 he became intimate with Fichte and Wilhelm von Humboldt, and began his great friendship with Goethe. In Ueber Naive und Sentimentale Dichtung ancient (classic) and modern poetry were distinguished and defined; and he started the short-lived magazine Die Horen (1795-97), which gave birth to the celebrated Xenien (1797), a collection of satirical epigrams, written by Schiller and Goethe conjointly. Schiller again began to write poems, principally for his annual Die Musenalmanach, such as Die Macht des Gesanges, Der Ideale, Würde der Frauen, and Der Spaziergang, and later, during 1797-98, his matchless ballad (Kraniche des Ibylus, Der Handschuh, Der Taucher, Ritter Toggenburg, &c.). The trilogy Wallenstein (1798-99), embracing Wallenstein's Lager, Die Piccolomini, and Wallenstein's Tod, is in every way a remarkable advance on Don Carlos; it ranks as the greatest of German plays. In 1799 Schiller settled in Weimar and zealously helped Goethe to elevate the German stage. In quick succession he finished Maria Stuart (1800), Die Jungfrau von Orleans (1801), Die Braut von Messina (1803), and Wilhelm Tell (1804). The first-named is an admirable drama; Die Jungfrau is one of Schiller's finest efforts; and Tell, the last drama the poet lived to finish, is a noble piece of work, some technical flaws notwithstanding. His health, long enfeebled, finally broke down; and he died 9th May 1805. Schiller's life was one long struggle against pecuniary difficulties, yet through all he remained true to himself and his high calling. As a lyric poet he can hardly be reckoned of the first rank; but as a dramatist he stands foremost of the Germans, and holds high rank amongst the dramatic writers of the world. The standard editions of his works are those by Gödeke (1868-76), Kurz (1868-69), Boxberger (4th ed. 1894), and Bellermann (1896). All preceding Lives of Schiller were superseded by Minor's (1890 et seq.). See also those by Pallaske (1858; 13th ed. 1891), Düntzer (1881), Weltrich (1885 et seq.), and O. Brahm (1888 et seq.). Schiller's Correspondence with Goethe, Körner, Humboldt, his wife, &c. contains abundance of biographical matter; the best edition is by Jonas (7 vols. 1892-96). There are biographies in English by Carlyle (1825), Bulwer-Lytton (1844), Sime (1882), and Nevinson (1889), and translations of Pallaske and Düntzer. The English versions of poems by Bulwer-Lytton (1844), Merivale (1844), Bowring (1851), and Lord Lytton (1887), and of the dramas Coleridge's Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death, deserve special mention.

Schilling, JOHANNES, sculptor, born at Mittweida in Saxony (1828-1910), studied in Italy, and settled in Dresden, where in 1868-1906 he was Art professor. His first great work was the four groups of the Seasons for Dresden; his masterpiece is the Niederwald monument of Germania (1833) opposite Bingen; and he also executed monuments of Schiller for Vienna, the Emperor Maximilian for Trieste, King John for Dresden, and the Emperor William for Wiesbaden.

Schimmelpenninck, MARY ANNE (1778-1856), born at Birmingham, the daughter of a Quaker manufacturer named Galton, in 1806 married a Dutch Bristol merchant, and in 1818 joined the Moravian communion. Her nine works (1813-60) include two on Port Royal, a Theory of Beauty, Sacred Musings, and an Autobiography.

Schinkel, KARL FRIEDRICH (1781-1841), architect, born at Neuruppin in Brandenburg, in 1820 became professor at the Berlin Royal Academy. See works by Kugler (1842), Quast (1866), Dohme (1882), Tuckermann (1879), and Krättschel (1892).

Schlagintweit, the name of five Munich brothers, all travellers or writers on sciences allied to geography. Three of them—HERMANN VON SCHLAGINTWEIT (1826-82), ADOLF (1829-57), and ROBERT (1833-85)—worked mostly in company. Hermann and Adolf published two books (1850-54) on the physical geography of the Alps. Next the three brothers were employed for nearly three years by the East India Company in scientific investigations in the Dekkan, the Himalayas, Tibet, Sikkim, Assam, &c. See their Results of a Scientific Mission to India and High Asia (4 vols. 1860-66). Adolf was put to death by the Emir of East Turkestan. Robert, who became professor of Geography at Giessen in 1863, travelled in the United States, and wrote on the Pacific Railway (1870), California (1871), the Mormons (1874), &c.—A fourth brother, EDUARD (1831-66), who took part in the Spanish invasion of Morocco of 1859-60 and wrote an account of it, fell at Kissingen, fighting on the Bavarian side against the Prussians.—EMIL (1835-1904), the fifth brother, became a lawyer, but wrote Buddhism in Tibet (Lond. 1860), Die Könige von Tibet (1865), Indien in Wort und Bild (1880-81), &c. [Shlah-gint-rite; g hard.]

Schlegel, AUGUST WILHELM VON, born at Hanover, 8th September 1767, studied theology at Göttingen, but soon turned to literature. In 1795 he settled in Jena, and in 1796 married a widow lady, Caroline Böhmer (1763-1809), who separated from him in 1803, and at once married Schelling. In 1798 he became professor of Literature and Fine Art at Jena, and in 1801-4 he lectured at Berlin. Most of the next fourteen years he spent in the house of Madame de Staël at Coppet, though he lectured on Dramatic Art and Literature (Eng. trans. 1815) at Vienna in 1808, and was secretary to the Crown-prince of Sweden 1813-14. From 1818 till his death (12th May 1845) he was professor of Literature at Bonn. He, years before going to Bonn, translated most of Shakespeare into German verse (as revised and completed by Tieck still the standard German version); translating next Dante, Calderon, Cervantes, and Camoens. He issued editions of the Bhagavad-Gita and the Ramayana. Like his brother Friedrich he was one of the leaders of the Romantic movement, though his own poems are rather lifeless. Inordinate self-esteem moved him to severe criticism of Schiller, Wieland, and Kotzebue, and involved him in unseemly polemics. Yet his lectures and criticisms (1801, &c.) and his history of the fine arts (1827) are still valuable. His writings were published in three separate collections—German, French, and Latin. See Mrs Alfred Sidgwick's Caroline Schlegel and her Friends (1889).—His brother, FRIEDRICH VON SCHLEGEL, born at Hanover, 10th March 1772, was educated at Göttingen and Leipzig. He abducted in 1798 Dorothea (1763-1839), daughter of Moses Mendelssohn, wife of the Jewish merchant Veit, and mother of Veit the religious painter, and next year utilised his experiences in a notorious romance, Lucinde. He then joined his brother at Jena, and with him wrote and edited the journal Das Athenaeum, in the interests of Romanticism. The Charakteristiken und Kritiken (1801) contain some of both brothers' best writing. From 1808 down to his death at Dresden, 11th Jan. 1829, Friedrich, who had become a devout Roman Catholic, was employed in the public service of Austria; it was he who penned the Austrian proclamations against Napoleon in 1809. His best-known books are lectures on the Philosophy of History (Eng. trans. 1835) and History of Literature (trans. 1859). There are also English versions of his Philosophy of Life (1847) and Lectures on Modern History (1849). Ueber Sprache und Weisheit der Indier (1808) was a pioneer for the study of Sanskrit in Europe. See his Letters to his brother (1890) and Hayn's Die Romantische Schule (1869). [Shlay-gel; g hard.]

Schleicher, AUGUST (1821-68), philologist, born at Meiningen, in 1850 became professor of Slavonic Languages at Prague, and in 1857 honorary professor at Jena. His Comparative Grammar of the Indo-Germanic Languages (4th ed. 1876; Eng. trans. 1874-77) is admittedly a great work. See Memoir by Lefmann (1870). [Shli-her.]

Schleiden, MATTHIAS JAKOB (1804-81), botanist, born at Hamburg, practised there as advocate, but in 1833 went to Göttingen and devoted himself to physiology and botany. In 1839 he became professor of Botany at Jena, and in 1863 at Dorpat. In 1866 he retired. He did much to establish the cell-theory. [Shli-den.]

Schleiermacher, FRIEDRICH ERNST DANIEL, born at Breslau, 21st November 1768, was educated at the Moravian schools of Niesky and Barby 1783-87; next, having broken from the dogmatic narrowness of the brethren, he studied philosophy and theology at Halle. From 1797, now a preacher in Berlin, he was closely allied with the devotees of Romanticism. In his Reden über Religion (1799), Monologen (1800), and Grundlinien einer Kritik der bisherigen Sittenlehre (1803) he expounded that hostility to the traditional moral philosophy and the Kantian ethic to which he had already (1801) given expression in the 'Confidential Letters on Schlegel's Lucinde.' The translation of Plato, begun by him and Schlegel, was carried through in 1804-10 by Schleiermacher alone. He was professor at Halle 1804-6, and in 1810 was called to a theological chair in the new university of Berlin. He was equally eminent as a preacher, and was the soul of the movement which led to the union in 1817 of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches in Prussia. He produced Die Weihnachtsfeier (1806; Eng. trans. Christmas Eve, 1889); a critical treatise on the first epistle to Timothy (1807); and his most important work, Der Christliche Glaube (1821-22; 6th ed. 1884). He died 12th February 1834. Afterward appeared a work on Christian ethics, a Life of Jesus, Sermons, and letters (partly trans. by Frederica Rowan, 1860). In 1825 Thirlwall translated his Essay on St Luke, and Dobson his Introduction to Plato's Dialogues in 1836; and a volume of Selected Sermons was issued in 1890. Dogma, he taught, is not religion, but a statement about religion which is the product of reflection; religion itself is feeling, the immediate sense of our dependence on the divine source of all things, on God. Christianity is only to be realised through experience of our relation to the historical Jesus Christ as the redeemer. He did not expressly deny all miracle, but his view of God excluded miracles in the fully supernaturalistic sense. See six volumes of his Correspondence (1852-87); 1 Lives by Schenkel (1868) and Dilthey (vol. 1. 1870); and works by Bender (1876-78), O. Ritschl (1888), Kefersstein (1889), Pfeiderer (The Development of Theology since Kant, 1890), and Diebow (1894). [Shl'er-mah-her.]

Schliemann, HEINRICH, born 6th January 1822 at Neubuckow in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, made a fortune at home and in St Petersburg, became an accomplished linguist, first visited Greece in 1859, from 1866 studied archaeology in Paris, and in 1870-90 excavated and explored the ruin-heaps of Hissarlik, the site of ancient Troy. He also excavated the site of Mycenæ (1876), in Ithaca (1869 and 1878), at Orchomenos (1881-82), and at Tiryns (1884-85). The results are described in Mykenæ (1877; Eng. trans. 1877), Ilios (1880; trans. 1880), Orchomenos (1881), Troja (1883; trans. 1883), Tiryns (1886; trans. 1886), &c. He died in Naples, 27th December 1890. See Schuchhardt's Schliemann's Ausgrabungen (1890; trans. 1891), and his own Selbstbiographie (1891). [Shlee-mann.]

Schlosser, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH (1776-1861), born at Jever in Oldenburg, became in 1819 professor of History at Heidelberg. His works include a Universal History (1815-24), a history of the eighteenth century (1823; 5th ed. 1864-66; Eng. trans. 1843-52), and a study of Dante (1855). See Lives by Gervinus (1861), Weber (1876), Erdmannsdörffer (1876), and Lorenz (1878).

Schmitz, LEONHARD, LL.D., born at Eupen, 6th March 1807, was educated at Aix-la-Chapelle. His marriage to an English lady in 1836 drew him to England, where he helped (1842) to translate Niebuhr's history. Other translations from Niebuhr followed (1849-53); and later, from his own pen, excellent manuals of the History of Greece, and of Rome, Ancient History, Ancient Geography, and Medieval History. He edited the Classical Museum 1843-49 and numerous Latin text-books, and was a large contributor to the Penny Cyclopædia and Smith's Dictionaries. In 1845-66 he was rector of Edinburgh High School, and in 1866-74 head of the International College at Isleworth. He died 28th May 1890.

Schnadhorst, FRANCIS, from 1873 to 1893 a great organiser of the Liberal party, was born at Birmingham in 1840; in 1887 he was presented with 10,000 guineas. Born in 1840, he died in 1900.

Schneider, FRIEDRICH (1786-1853), composer, was born near Zittau, and died at Dessau.

Schneider, HORTENSE CATHERINE, born at Bordeaux about 1835, made a great hit in Offenbach's Belle Hélène (1864) and Grande Duchesse (1867). In 1881 she married, and left the stage.

Schneidewin, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1810-56), classical scholar, died a professor at Göttingen.

Schnitzer, EDUARD. See EMIN PASHA.

Schnorr von Carolsfeld, BARON JULIUS, painter, born at Leipzig, 26th March 1794, studied at Vienna, and there became associated with the school of Cornelius and Overbeck, who went back for their inspiration to Raphael's predecessors; in 1817 he followed them to Rome. But though he agreed with them in principle, he avoided their extremes, and was the only one of them who remained a Protestant. In 1827 he was appointed professor of Historical Painting at Munich, and was commissioned to paint for the palace frescoes of the Nibelungenlied, Charlemagne, Barbarossa, &c. In 1846 he became professor at Dresden and director of the gallery. Schnorr's Bible pictures (1860) are accounted by many authorities his best things. He illustrated the Nibelungen, designed stained-glass windows, and produced not a few admirable easel pictures. He died 24th May 1872. See Art Journal (1865).

Schoen, or SCHONGAUER, MARTIN (1450-88), religious painter and engraver of Colmar.

Schöffler, PETER (c. 1425-1502), the partner in printing of Fust. See work by Roth (1892).

Schofield, JOHN McALLISTER (1831-1906), born in Chautauqua county, New York, in the Civil War distinguished himself at Franklin (1864) and Wilmington (1865), was Secretary of War 1868-69, and was commander-in-chief 1888-95.

Scholten, JAN HENDRIK (1811-85), critical theologian, born at Vleuter near Utrecht, was professor of Theology at Franeker from 1840, and in 1843-81 at Leyden. French and German translations carried his writings far beyond their country. The chief were on the Reformed theology, an introduction to the New Testament, on John's gospel, on the New Testament Canon, on the oldest gospel, and the Pauline gospel. See Kuenen's sketch of his life (1885). [Skolten.]

Schomburgk, FREDERICK HERMANN, DUKE OF (1615-90), born at Heidelberg of an ancient house taking its name from its castle of Schöberg on the Rhine, fought against the Imperialists in the Thirty Years' War. For the French he conducted a successful campaign in Spain (1650), and, though a Protestant, obtained a marshal's baton in 1675. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) he commanded under the Prince of Orange in the English expedition. William III. made him K.G., duke, and commander in Ireland in 1689. He fell at the Boyne, 1st July 1690.—His third son, MEINHART (1641-1719), commanded the right wing, and was made Duke of Leinster.

Schomburgk, SIR ROBERT HERMANN, born at Freiburg near Rossbach, June 5, 1804, surveyed (1831) in the Virgin Islands, where he was a merchant, and was sent by the Royal Geographical Society to explore British Guiana (1831-35). In ascending the Berbice River he discovered the magnificent Victoria Regia lily, described in his British Guiana (Lond. 1840) and magnificent Views in the Interior of Guiana (folio, 1841). In 1841-43 he was employed by government in Guiana to draw the long-controverted 'Schomburgk-line' as a provisional boundary with Venezuela and Brazil, and in 1844 was knighted. He was accompanied by his brother Richard (1811-90), who wrote Reisen in Britisch-Guiana, 1840-44 (Leip. 1847-48). In 1848 Sir Robert published a History of Barbadoes. In 1848-57 he was British consul in San Domingo, in 1857-64 in Siam. He died 11th March 1865 at Schöneberg near Berlin. [Schom-boork.]

Schönbein, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (1799-1868), chemist, born at Metzingen, Württemberg, from 1828 professor at Basel, discovered ozone, gun-cotton, and collodion, and experimented on oxygen. See Life by Hagenbach (1869). [Shun-bein.]

Schongauer. See SCHOEN.

Schönlein, JOHANN LUKAS (1793-1864), physician, born at Bamberg, in 1820 became professor at Würzburg, in 1833 at Zurich, and in 1839 at Berlin. See Life by Rothlauf (1874).

Schoolcraft, HENRY ROWE (1793-1864), American ethnologist, born in Albany county, N.Y., in 1817-18 visited the mining region west of the Mis-issippi (described in his Journal), and in 1820 went with General Cass to Lake Superior as geologist. In 1822 he became Indian agent for the tribes about the lakes, and in 1823 married a wife of Indian blood. In 1832 he commanded an expedition which discovered the sources of the Mississippi (Narrative, 1834). While superintendent for the Indians, he negotiated treaties by which the government acquired 16,000,000 acres. In 1845 he collected the statistics of the Six Nations (Notes on the Iroquois, 1848). For government he prepared his Information respecting the Indian Tribes of the U.S. (6 vols. 1851-57). His other works include poems, a Life of Cass, Algic Researches (1839), The Red Race of America (1847), Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes (1851), &c.

Schopenhauer, ARTHUR, pessimist philosopher, was born at Danzig, 22d February 1788. His father was a banker; his mother, Johanna Trostina (1766-1838), wrote twenty-four volumes of novels and novelettes, and on her husband's death settled in 1806 at Weimar. The boy was educated at Gotha, Weimar, Göttingen, and Berlin. He graduated at Jena with a treatise On the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason, in which he seeks to classify the principles of physics, logic, mathematics, and ethics. He inherited from his father irrepressible energy and cosmopolitan, freethinking sympathies, and from his mother facility of literary expression. In him feeling and reason were in perpetual conflict; his disposition was severe, mistrustful, and suspicious. Lastly, he believed that he had founded a philosophy which made him the successor of Socrates, yet saw himself and his thinking passed over, and what he regarded as the fatuous ravings of Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel praised as the highest wisdom. The cardinal articles of his philosophical creed were: first, Subjective Idealism—i.e. that the world is my idea, a mere phantasmagoria of my brain, and therefore in itself nothing; secondly, that the possibility of knowledge of the 'thing-in-itself' was demolished for ever by Kant; and thirdly, that to the intuition of genius the ideas of Art are accessible—the only knowledge not subservient to the Will and to the needs of practical life. Finally, Will, the active side of our nature, or Impulse, is the key to the one thing we know directly from the inside—i.e. the self, and therefore the key to the understanding of all things from the atom up through plants and animals to the starry systems. Will is the creative, the primary, while Idea is the secondary, the receptive factor in things. His chief book, The World as Will and Idea (1819), expounds the Logic, the Metaphysics, the Aesthetic, and the Ethic of his view. He gave out his occasional papers in the Pareira and Paralipomena (1851), which illustrate the eloquence of his pen. Seeing and Colours (1816) contains practically Goethe's theory of colours. From Weimar and university circles Schopenhauer had gone to Dresden (1814-18), and thence to Italy; his unsuccessful attempt as lecturer in Berlin University was made in 1820. He finally in 1831 left Berlin for Frankfurt-on-Main, where he died, 21st Sept. 1860. Frauenstädt edited his complete works (6 vols. 1876). There are English translations of The World as Will and Idea, by Haldane and Kemp (1883-86), and of the Fourfold Root and Will in Nature (1888); Selected Essays, by E. B. Bax (1891); and a Schopenhauer Series by T. Bailey Saunders (5 vols. 1890-93). The standard Life is by Gwinner (new ed. 1878). Miss Zimmern's Life (1876) and that by Prof. Wallace (1890) are both very good.

Schorlemmer, CARL (1834-92), chemist, born at Darnstadt, studied under Bunsen, and became in 1859 private assistant to Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe (q.v.) at Owens College, Manchester, and in 1874 professor there of Organic Chemistry.

Schouvaloff, COUNT PETER ANDRIEVITCH (1827-89), Russian ambassador, became head of the secret police in 1866; in 1873, sent on a secret mission to London, he arranged the marriage between the Duke of Edinburgh and the only daughter of Alexander II. In 1878 he was one of the Russian representatives at the Congress of Berlin.—His brother, COUNT PAUL (b. 1830), fought at Sebastopol and Inkermann, helped to organise the liberation of the Russian serfs (1861), fought in Turkey in 1878, and in 1885 was appointed ambassador to Germany, in 1895 governor of Warsaw. In 1897 he retired. [Shoo-va-lof.]

Schrader, EBERHARD (1836-1908), born at Brunswick, was professor of Theology at Zurich, Giessen, and Jena, and of Oriental Languages at Berlin (1875), with a seat in the Academy. He wrote on Biblical, Assyrian, Babylonian, and Aryan origins, and on the cuneiform inscriptions. [Shrah' der.]

Schreiber, LADY CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH (1812-95), translator in 1838-49 of the Welsh Mabinogion, was born at Uffington House, Stamford, a daughter of the Earl of Lindsey, and married in 1833 Sir Josiah John Guest, and in 1855 Charles Schreiber, M.P. She wrote on fans and playing-cards.

Schreiner, OLIVE, born in Basutoland, daughter of a missionary, startled the conventional English world of letters in 1883 by 'The Story of an African Farm: a Novel, by Ralph Iron,' a powerful series of half-finished pictures of rough life on a Boer farm, and of the spiritual problems that rend an inquiring soul. Dreams (1890) was a group of spiritual allegories; Trooper Peter Halket of Mashonaland (1897) an anti-Rhodesian pamphlet. In 1894 she married a Mr Crowright. [Shrīner.]

Schrevelius, CORNELIUS (1615-64), Dutch scholar, in 1642 became rector of Leyden University, published a Lexicon Græco-Latinum et Latino-Græcum (1654), and produced (uncritical) editions of the classics.

Schubart, CHRISTIAN DANIEL (1739-91), poet, born at Obersonthem in Swabia, became schoolmaster and organist, but wrote satirical poems and spoke unadvisedly, lost his post, and then lived as a public reader and pianist. He got into difficulty in Austria, was enticed back to Württemberg by the duke, whom he had irritated by an epigram, and was imprisoned 1777-87 at Hohenasperg. He is chiefly remembered for his tragic fate and for his influence on Schiller. See his Autobiography (1791-93), and monographs by D. F. Strauss (1849), Hauff (1885), and Nägele (1888).

Schubert, FRANZ PETER, composer, born in Vienna, January 31, 1797, a schoolmaster's son, at eleven entered the choristers' school of the court-chapel. During the five years spent here he tried almost every kind of composition, including a symphony in D (1813). He now became under-master in his father's school, and wrote his immortal song, the Erl King, and the Mass in F. He escaped from school drudgery by sharing the lodgings and meals of one or two young friends, and through the singer Vogl his songs became known to the Viennese. In 1819 his Schäfers Klage was performed at a concert in Vienna. In the summer he made an extended tour with Vogl, but found time to compose his well-known pianoforte quintet (op. 114). His comic operetta, the Zwillingbrüder, and the Zauberharfe were both produced in 1820. He got almost no money for his many songs, and was usually in great straits. In 1822 he completed his opera Alfonso and Estrella. To 1823 belongs the three-act opera of Fierabras, the beautiful Rosamunde music, and the Divertissement à la Hongroise. The compositions of 1826 included a quartet in D minor and the pianoforte sonata (fantasia) in G, the songs Hark! Hark! the Lark, Who is Sylvia? and the 'drinking song' in Antony and Cleopatra. His last year (1828) produced his noblest symphony (No. 9 in C), his Mass in E flat, the oratorio Miriam's War-song, the string quartet in C, three pianoforte sonatas, and several songs. He gave his first and only concert on March 26, and he died November 19, 1828. Schubert is remarkable for his ceaseless impulse to compose, the absolute spontaneity of his writings, and the poetic spirit with which he has imbued them. But his special and peculiar eminence lies in song-writing, in which he reached the highest limit of excellence. His orchestral writings show extraordinary delicacy of instrumentation; he composed more than 500 songs, ten symphonies, six masses, a host of sonatas and other works for the pianoforte, a number of string quartets, as well as several operas, cantatas, and overtures. See article by Sir George Grove in his Dictionary of Music, and German Lives by Kreissle von Hellborn (1866), Reissmann (1873), and Niggli (1880).

Schulenburg, COUNTESS EHBRENGARD MELUSINA VON DER (1667-1743), the 'Maypole' mistress of George I., in 1719 created Duchess of Kendal.

Schultz, HERMANN, theologian, born at Lichow in Hanover, 30th December 1836, became professor at Basel in 1864, Strasburg in 1872, Heidelberg in 1874, and Göttingen in 1876. He has written on Immortality (1861), Old Testament Theology (1869-72; trans. 1892), The Deity of Christ (on Ritschl's lines, 1881), Protestant dogmatic theology (1890), and Christian apologetics (1894). [Shooltz.]

Schulze-Delitzsch, HERMANN, born 29th August 1808 at Delitzsch in Prussian Saxony, in 1841 settled down there as judge. In the National Assembly at Berlin (1848) he represented his native town, and was chairman of a commission on the distress amongst the labouring classes; in 1849, for protesting that it was unjust to tax the people when their representatives were not allowed to deliberate together, he was tried on a charge of treason, but acquitted. On his return to Delitzsch he started the first people's bank, in which the subscribers received credit and dividends in proportion to their savings. By 1859 there were two hundred such banks in central Germany, in 1864 united under one organisation, with Schulze-Delitzsch as manager. The system spread into Austria, Italy, Belgium, and Russia; and when its founder died at Potsdam, 29th April 1883, there were in Germany 3500 branches, having twelve million members, with a share capital of £10,000,000 and deposits to more than twice that sum. In 1861, again in parliament, he laboured for constitutional reform; whilst, as a firm believer in self-help, he strongly opposed Lassalle's socialism. He wrote on his banks and on co-operation. See Life by Bernstein (1879) and a paper by John Rae in Good Words (1885). [Shool'z-eh Doyf-leetch.]

Schumann, ROBERT, composer, was born at Zwickau, 8th June 1810. At twenty-one, after a desultory course of law and philosophy and a good deal of travel, he settled down in Leipzig as a student of music. In 1833 his first important pianoforte compositions were published (Toccata, &c.), in 1834 he started the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and for more than ten years contributed many essays, some very fantastic, some of inestimable value. His greatest pianoforte works were written between 1836 and 1839 (Fantasia, Novellets, Kinder-scenen, Humoreske, &c.). In 1841 he turned his attention to instrumental work, and produced three symphonies and the romantic concerto in A minor. The three beautiful quartets prepared the way for the Quintet for pianoforte and strings. The pianoforte Quartet belongs to 1842. In 1843 he produced the choral works, Paradise and the Peri and scenes from Faust. In ill-health he now retired to Dresden. In 1847 the clouds lifted, and from 1848 to 1850 works of all kinds appeared in rapid succession—Genoëva (his only opera), incidental music to Byron's Manfred, songs, and much instrumental solo and concerted music. In 1850 he became musical director in Düsseldorf—a post for which he was unfitted by absent-mindedness. Much desultory work belongs to the years 1850-54; but it became more evident that he must retire from his post. In 1851 his former ailment broke out anew; his eccentricity gradually grew more marked; and he devoted himself largely to table-turning and spiritualism. His last two years were spent in a private asylum near Bonn, where he died, July 29, 1856. Characteristics of Schumann's works are great originality and fertility, freshness, force, and piquancy in rhythm, and a wealth and resource in harmony; his sonatas, symphonies, &c. do not always follow the recognised canon. Among writers of songs and ballads he is second to none. His wife, the pianist, Madame Schumann, née Clara Josephine Wieck (1819-96), the daughter of his first Leipzig teacher in music, whom he had married in 1841, laboured incessantly and successfully to obtain a hearing for his pianoforte compositions, taught at the Frankfort Conservatoire, and played in the chief cities of Europe. See Lives by Wasielewski (1858; 3d ed. 1880; Eng. trans. 1878), Reissmann (trans. 1886), Reimann (1887), Erler (1887); also the Life of Schumann told in his Letters (trans. by May Herbert, 1890), and Clara Schumann, by B. Litzmann (1903-9).

Schürer, EML (1844-1910), biblical scholar, born at Augsburg, 2d May 1844, in 1873 became professor of Theology at Leipzig, in 1878 at Giessen, in 1890 at Kiel, and in 1895 at Göttingen. From 1876 he edited the Theologische Literaturzeitung, from 1881 with Harnack; and wrote on Schleiermacher, on the Easter controversy, and the standard History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ (1886-90; trans. 1886-90; new ed. 1901-2).

Schurz, CARL (1829-1906), born near Cologne, joined the revolutionary movement of 1849, and in 1852 passed to the United States, where he engaged in politics, lectured, practised law, and as major-general of volunteers fought in the civil war. Journalism next engaged him till in 1869 he was elected to the senate. In 1877 he was made Secretary of the Interior, and from 1880 to 1884 was again editor. In 1885-92 he published Lives of Henry Clay and Lincoln. [Shoorz.]

Schuyler, PHILIP JOHN (1733-1804), a leader of the American Revolution, born at Albany, raised a company and fought at Lake George in 1755. He was a member of the colonial assembly from 1768, and delegate to the Continental congress of 1775, which appointed him one of the first four major-generals. Washington gave him the northern department of New York, and he was preparing to invade Canada when ill-health compelled him to tender his resignation. He still retained a general direction of affairs from Albany, but jealousies rendered his work both hard and disagreeable, and in 1779 he finally resigned. Besides acting as commissioner for Indian affairs and making treaties with the Six Nations, he sat in congress 1777-81, and was state senator for thirteen years between 1780 and 1797, U.S. senator 1789-91 and 1797-98, and surveyor-general of the state from 1782. With Hamilton and John Jay he shared the leadership of the Federal party in New York; and he aided in preparing the state's code of laws. See Lives by Lossing (enlarged ed. 1872) and G. W. Schuyler (1888). [Sk'ler.]

Schwann, THEODOR (1810-82), naturalist, born at Neuss, in 1838 became professor at Louvain, in 1848 at Liège. He made many discoveries on the digestion, muscular structure, and nervous system; and practically established the cell-theory by his Structure of Plants and Animals (Eng. trans. 1847). See Life by Henle (1882). [Shwann.]

Schwantaler, LUDWIG VON (1802-48), Munich sculptor, after a visit to Rome was charged by King Louis of Bavaria to execute bas-reliefs and figures for the public buildings, and in 1835 became professor at Munich Academy. Among his works are the colossal statue of Bavaria, statues of Goethe, Jean Paul Richter, Mozart, &c. See Art Journal (1880). [Shwan-tah'ler.]

Schwarz, BERTHOLD, a Franciscan monk of Freiburg (or Dortmund), whose real name was Konstantin Anklitzen, Schwarz ('black') being a nickname due to his chemical experiments. He it was who about 1320 brought gunpowder (or guns) into practical use. See monograph by Hansjakob (1891). [Shwarz.]

Schwarz, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (1726-98), Indian missionary, born at Sonnenburg in Brandenburg, studied at Halle, and joined the Danish mission at Tranquebar in 1750. In 1766 he went to Trichinopoly, in 1769 gained the friendship of the Rajah of Tanjore, and removed to his capital in 1778. See Life by H. N. Pearson (1834).

Schwarzenberg, ADAM, COUNT VON (1584-1641), was (1619) prime-minister of George William, Elector of Brandenburg, and was all-powerful during the Thirty Years' War.—KARL PHILIPP, Prince of Schwarzenberg (1771-1820), Austrian field-marshal, served against the Turks and the French republic. He was ambassador to Russia in 1808, fought at Wagram (1809), conducted the negotiations for the marriage between Napoleon and Maria Louisa, and as ambassador at Paris gained the esteem of Napoleon, who demanded him as general of the Austrian contingent in the invasion of Russia in 1812. In 1813 he was generalissimo of the united armies which won the battles of Dresden and Leipzig. In 1814 he helped to occupy Paris. See Life by Prokesch-Osten (new ed. 1861).—His nephew, FELIX LUDWIG JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1800-52), sent on a mission to London in 1826, became involved in the Ellenborough divorce suit, was Austrian ambassador at Naples 1846-48, then distinguished himself in the Italian campaign, as prime-minister called in the aid of the Russians against Hungary, and pursued a bold absolutist policy. See Life by Berger (1853).

Schwatka, FREDERICK (1849-92), Arctic explorer, born at Galena, Ill., was lieutenant of cavalry on the frontier till 1877, meanwhile being admitted to the Nebraska bar and taking a medical degree in New York. In 1878-80 he commanded an expedition which discovered the skeletons of several of Franklin's party, and filled up all gaps in the narratives of Rae and McClintock, besides performing a sledge-journey of 3251 miles. In 1883 he explored the course of the Yukon, in 1886 commanded the New York Times Alaskan expedition, and in Alaska in 1891 opened up 700 miles of new country. He published Along Alaska's Great River (1885), Nimrod in the North (1885), and Children of the Cold (1886). See also Schwatka's Search, by W. H. Gilder (1881).

Schwegler, ALBERT (1819-57), theologian and philosopher, born at Michelbach in Württemberg, studied theology at Tübingen, and was profoundly influenced by Hegel, Strauss, and Baur. His treatise on Montanism (1841) and his contributions to Zeller's journal brought him into collision with the church authorities in Württemberg, and caused him to abandon the clerical calling. In 1843 he became a lecturer at Tübingen, in 1848 professor of Classical Philology. His Das Nachapostolische Zeitalter (1846) was an exaggeration of Baur's views, representing Christianity as a mere outgrowth of Ebionitism. In philosophy we have his translation with commentary of Aristotle's Metaphysics (1847-48); Geschichte der Philosophie (1848; Eng. trans. by Dr Hutchison Stirling, 1872), and the posthumous Geschichte der Griech. Philosophie (1859), in which he broke away from Hegelianism. He left unfinished a Röm. Geschichte (1853-58; 2d ed. 1867-72; continued by Clason, 1873-76). [Shwa'gler.]

Schweinfurth, GEORG, born at Riga, 29th Dec. 1836, in 1864 made a journey up the Nile and along the Red Sea to Abyssinia. In 1869 from Khartoum he passed through the country of the Dinka, Niam-Niam, and Moubutu, and discovered the Welle (see his Heart of Africa, Eng. trans. 1874). Between 1874 and 1883 he explored various districts of Egypt and Arabia, especially their botany. In 1880 he was appointed director of the museums, collections, &c. in Cairo. In 1889 he settled in Berlin, but during 1891-94 made botanical expeditions in Erythraea. [Shvein-foort.]

Schwenkfeld, CASPAR VON (c. 1490-1561), founder of a Protestant sect, born at Ossig near Liegnitz, served at various German courts, and about 1525 turned Protestant, though he differed widely from Luther. His doctrines resembled those of the Quakers, and brought him banishment and persecution; but at Uhn, Augsburg, Nuremberg, and Strasburg he everywhere gained disciples. He died at Uhn. Most of his ninety works were burned by both Protestants and Catholics. Some of his persecuted followers (most numerous in Silesia and Swabia) emigrated to Holland. In 1734 forty families emigrated to England, and thence to Pennsylvania, where, as Schwenkfeldians, they have maintained a distinct existence, and number some 300 members. See monograph by Kadelbach (1861) and R. Barclay's Religious Societies of the Commonwealth (1876).

Scoppius, OF SCHOPPE, KASPAR (1576-1649), controversialist, born at Neumarkt, at Prague in 1598 abjured Protestantism; henceforth his career is a series of onslaughts on his former co-religionists, as likewise on Scaliger and James I. of England. He devoted himself at Milan to philological studies and theological warfare 1617-30, and died at Padua. He was really a great scholar, and rivalled Scaliger himself in learning. His chief work is Grammatica Philosophica (1628); others are Verisimilium Libri Quatuor (1596), Suspectæ Lectiones (1597), De Arte Critica (1597), Observationes Linguae Latinae (1609), Paradoxa Literaria (1628), and De Scholarum Ratione (1630).

Scpio, PUBLIUS CORNELIUS, AFRICANUS MAJOR (237-183 B.C.), fought against the Carthaginians at the Trebia and at Cannæ. In 210 he was sent as a general extraordinary to Spain. By a sudden march he captured Nova Carthago, the stronghold of the Carthaginians, checked Hasdrubal, and ere-long held the whole of Spain. He was consul in 205, and in 204 sailed with 30,000 men to carry on the war in Africa. His successes compelled the Carthaginians to recall Hannibal from Italy, and the great struggle between Rome and Carthage was terminated by the Roman victory at Zama in 202. Peace was concluded in 201. The surname of Africanus was conferred on Scpio, and popular gratitude proposed to make him consul and dictator for life—honours Scpio refused.

In 190 he served as legate under his brother Lucius in the war with Antiochus, and crushed his power in the victory of Magnesia. But on their return the brothers were charged with having been bribed by Antiochus, the colour being the too lenient terms granted. Popular enthusiasm supported Scpio against the ill-will of the senatorial oligarchy; but he soon retired to his country-seat at Liternum in Campania. His daughter was Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi. Scpio Africanus is commonly regarded as the greatest Roman general before Julius Cæsar; perhaps he owed as much to fortune as to genius.

Scpio Æmilianus, PUBLIUS CORNELIUS, AFRICANUS MINOR (185-129 B.C.), was a younger son of that Lucius Æmilius Paulus who conquered Macedon, but was adopted by his kinsman Publius Scpio, son of the great Scpio Africanus. He accompanied his father against Macedon, and fought at Pydna (168). In 151 he went to Spain under Lucius Lucullus, and in 149 the third and last Punic war began. The incapacity of the consuls, Manilius and Calpurnius Piso (149-148), and the brilliant manner in which their subordinate rectified their blunders, drew all eyes to him. In 147 he was elected consul and invested with supreme command. The story of the siege of Carthage, the despairing heroism of its inhabitants, the determined resolution of Scpio, belong to history. The city was finally taken in the spring of 146, and by orders of the senate levelled to the ground. Scpio was now sent to Egypt and Asia on a special embassy; but affairs meanwhile were going badly in Spain. Viriathus, the Lusitanian patriot, had inflicted the most disgraceful defeats on the Roman armies, and his example had roused the Celtiberian tribes, who in Numantia seemed invincible; but at length in 134 Scpio, re-elected consul, went to Spain, and after an eight months' siege forced the Numantines to surrender, and utterly destroyed their city. He then returned to Rome, where he took part in political affairs as one of the leaders of the aristocratic party, and although a brother-in-law of Tiberius Gracchus (q.v.), disclaimed any sympathy with his aims. The Latins, whose lands were being seized under the Sempronian law, appealed to Scpio, and he succeeded (129) in getting the execution suspended. But his action caused the most furious indignation, and shortly after Scpio was found dead in his bed, doubtless murdered by an adherent of the Gracchi.

Scogan, JOHN (fl. 1480-1500), a court jester whose jests are said to have been compiled by Andrew Boorde (q.v.).

Scopas (fl. 395-350 B.C.), Greek sculptor, founder, with Praxiteles, of the later Attic school, was a native of Paros, and settled in Athens. See Gardner, Six Greek Sculptors (1910).

Scoresby, WILLIAM, D.D. (1789-1857), Arctic explorer, born at Cropton near Whitby, went as a boy with his father, William Scoresby (1760-1829), a whaling captain, to the Greenland seas, and himself made several voyages to the whaling-grounds. He attended Edinburgh University, carried on investigations in natural history, botany, meteorology, magnetism, &c., and published the results in The Arctic Regions (1820) and Magnetical Investigations (2 vols. 1839-52). In 1822 he surveyed 400 miles of the east coast of Greenland. Having studied at Cambridge, and been ordained (1825), he laboured at Liverpool, Exeter, and Bradford. Failing health compelled him to retire (1849) to Torquay. He was elected F.R.S. in 1824. See Life by his nephew (1861).

Scory, JOHN, born at Acle in Norfolk, about 1530 was Dominican friar at Cambridge, and in 1551 became Bishop of Rochester. He was translated next year to Chichester, but on Mary's accession was deprived, renounced his wife, did penance, and had formal absolution (1554). Yet he fled abroad; and from the Continent addressed an 'Epistle to the faithful in prison in England.' Mary dead, he was made Bishop of Hereford (1559). He died at Whitbourne, 26th June 1585.

Scot, REGINALD (c. 1538-99), an early disbeliever in witchcraft, was a younger son of Sir John Scot of Scotshall in Kent. He studied at Oxford, gave himself up to study and gardening, and was collector of subsidies for the lathe of Shepway in 1586-87. He published The Hoppe-Garden in 1574 (3d ed. 1578), and is credited with the introduction of hop-growing into England. His famous Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584) is an admirable exposure of the childish absurdities which formed the basis of the witchcraft craze, and excited the antipathy of King James, who wrote his Demonologie (1597) 'chiefly against the damnable opinions of Wierus and Scot,' and had Scot's book burnt by the hangman. Answers and refutations were also written by Meric Casaubon and other divines. There was a second edition in 1651; a third in 1665, with additions by an inferior hand; and a fourth by Brinsley Nicholson, M.D. (1886).

Scott, a great Border house which has been traced back, somewhat dubiously, to one Uchtred Filius Scoti, or Fitz-Scott, a witness to David I.'s charter to Holyrood Abbey (1128), and thereafter to Richard Scot of Murthockston in Lanarkshire (1294), the cradle, however, of the race having been Scotstoun and Kirkurd in Peeblesshire. We find them possessors of Buccleuch in Selkirkshire in 1415, and of Branxholm, near Hawick, from 1420-46 onwards. The then Sir Walter Scott fought for James II. at Arkinholm against the Douglases (1455), and received a large share of the forfeited Douglas estates; his descendants acquired Liddesdale, Eskdale, Dalkeith, &c., with the titles Lord Scott of Buccleuch (1606) and Earl of Buccleuch (1619). Among them were two Sir Walters, one of whom fought at Melrose (1526), Ancrum (1544), and Pinkie (1547), and in 1552 was slain in a street fray at Edinburgh by Kerr of Cessford, whilst the other was the rescuer of Kimmont Willie from Carlisle Castle (1596). Francis, second earl (1626-51), left two daughters—Mary (1647-61), married to the future Earl of Tarras, and Anna (1651-1732), married to James, Duke of Monmouth, who took the surname Scott and was created Duke of Buccleuch. After his execution (1685) his duchess, who had borne him four sons and two daughters, retained her title and estates, and in 1688 married Lord Cornwallis. Her grandson Francis succeeded her as second duke, and through his marriage in 1720 with a daughter of the Duke of Queensberry that title and estates in Dumfriesshire devolved in 1810 on Henry, third duke of Buccleuch (1746-1812), a great agricultural improver. Walter Francis, fifth duke (1806-84), the founder of Granton, owned in Scotland 676 sq. m. (an area exceeding half the German sovereign states). The Harden branch (represented by Lord Polwarth) separated from the main stem in 1846; and from this sprang the Scotts of Raeburn, ancestors of the great Sir Walter. See works by Sir William Fraser (1879) and Mrs Oliver (1887).

Scott, ALEXANDER (c. 1525-84), an Edinburgh poet whose thirty-six short poems have been edited by Dr J. Cranston (Scot. Text Soc. 1895).

Scott, CHARLES BRODRICK, D.D. (1825-95), educated at Eton and Cambridge, was headmaster of Westminster 1855-83.

Scott, CLEMENT (1841-1904), dramatic critic, born in London, and educated at Marlborough, held a War Office clerkship in 1860-77, and wrote for the Daily Telegraph, Punch, Illustrated London News, &c. His books include Blossom Land, Poppy Land, and a work on the Lyceum.

Scott, DAVID, R.S.A., painter, born in Edinburgh, 10th or 12th October 1806, was apprenticed to his father as a line-engraver. In 1828 he exhibited 'The Hopes of Early Genius dispelled by Death,' and in 1829 was admitted R.S.A. In 1831 he designed his twenty-five 'Illustrations to the Ancient Mariner' (1837). In 1832-33 he visited Italy, and painted 'The Vintager,' now in the National Gallery. His impressions of the art of Italy were embodied in a series of papers in Blackwood's Magazine (1839-41). Returning to Edinburgh, he produced his 'Paracelsus Lecturing' (1838), now in the National Gallery of Scotland; 'Queen Elizabeth at the Globe Theatre' (1840); 'The Traitor's Gate' (1841), and the huge 'Vasco da Gama encountering the Spirit of the Cape' (1842), now in the Trinity House, Leith. Depressed by lack of recognition and failing health, he died 5th March 1849. His forty designs to the Pilgrim's Progress were published in 1850, and eleven of his Astronomical Designs (1848) were engraved in Nichol's Architecture of the Heavens (1850). The main value of his works lies in their imaginative quality, in their Blake-like power and originality as inventions. See Memoir by his brother, W. B. Scott (1850); Selections from his Works, edited by his brother (1866-67); and the monograph by J. M. Gray (1884).

His brother, WILLIAM BELL SCOTT, poet-painter, born September 12, 1811, settled in London in 1837, but exhibited only twenty pictures between 1840 and 1869. Their subjects were mostly historical or poetical. From 1843 till 1858 he was in charge of the government school of art at Newcastle, and till 1885 a South Kensington examiner. His principal work was the series of pictures of Northumbrian history at Wallington Hall; he also executed a series from The King's Quair, at Penkill Castle, near Girvan. He died there November 22, 1890. He published five volumes of poetry, a memoir of his brother (1850), Half-hour Lectures on Art (1861), Albert Dürer (1869), and The Little Masters (1879) in the 'Great Artists' series. See his Autobiography edited by Prof. Minto (1892).

Scott, DRED, a negro whose claim (1852-57) to be free as having long lived in the free state of Illinois was negated by the Supreme Court.

Scott, SIR GEORGE GILBERT, architect, born 13th July 1811, at Gawcott parsonage, Bucks, was articulated to a London architect 1827-30. 'Awakened' by the Cambridge Camden Society and an article of Pugin's (1840-41), he became a leading spirit of the Gothic revival, and as such built or restored 26 cathedrals, 9 abbey and 2 priory churches, 1 minister, 474 churches, 26 schools, 5 almshouses, 23 parsonages, 57 monumental works, 10 college chapels and 16 colleges, 27 public buildings, 42 mansions, &c. The Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford, St Nicholas' at Hamburg, St George's at Doncaster, the new Government Offices, Albert Memorial, and Midland Terminus in London, Preston Town-hall, Glasgow University, the chapels of Exeter and St John's Colleges, Oxford, and the Episcopal cathedral at Edinburgh, are specimens of his work. He was elected A.R.A. in 1855, R.A. in 1861; held the professorship of Architecture at the Academy; and was knighted in 1872. He died 27th March 1878, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See his Recollections (1879).

Scott, HEW, D.D. (1791-1872), compiler of the Fasti Ecclesie Scotticane (6 vols. 1866-71), was born at Haddington, and from 1839 was minister of West Anstruther. He left £9000.

Scott, MICHAEL (c. 1175-1230), the 'wondrous wizard,' was tutor and astrologer at Palermo to Frederick II., settled at Toledo 1209-20, and translated Arabic versions of Aristotle's works and Averrhoes' commentaries, returned to the Imperial court at Palermo, and refused the proffered archbishopric of Cashel (1223). His translation of Aristotle was seemingly used by Albertus Magnus, and was one of the two familiar to Dante (see Jourdain, Traductions Latines d'Aristote; and the Academy, January 1892). Dante (d. 1321) alludes to him in the Inferno (canto xx. 115-117) in a way which proves that his fame as a magician had already spread over Europe; and he is also referred to by Albertus Magnus and Vincent of Beauvais. Dempster (1627) may be right in maintaining that 'Scotus' was the name of his nation, not of his family, in which case he would be probably an Irishman; but by Boece (1527) he was falsely identified with a Sir Michael Scott of Balwearie in Fife, who went on embassies to Norway in 1290 and 1310. Camden (1580) asserts that he was a Cistercian monk of Holme Cultram in Cumberland; and Satchells that in 1629 he had examined at Burgh-under-Bowness a huge tome held to be his grimoire. In Border folk-lore he is credited with having 'cleft the Eildon Hills in three and bridled the Tweed with a curb of stone'; and his grave is shown in Melrose Abbey. See Life by the Rev. J. Wood Brown (1897).

Scott, MICHAEL (1789-1835), born at Cowlares, Glasgow, after four years (1801-6) at the university went to seek his fortune in Jamaica. He spent a number of years in the West Indies, but in 1822 established himself in business in Glasgow. In 1829-33 he published in Blackwood's the brilliant story, Tom Cringle's Log, which, like The Cruise of the Midge, another of his numerous contributions to 'Maga,' has been often republished. See Sir G. Douglas, The Blackwood Group (1897).

Scott, ROBERT. See LIDDELL.

Scott, THOMAS (1747-1821), commentator, was born, a grazier's son, at Braytoft near Spilsby, studied hard while a surgeon's apprentice and farm labourer, and received priest's orders in 1773. He held various minor charges, and from 1803 was rector of Aston Sandford in Bucks. His Force of Truth (1779) and Essays on the Most Important Subjects in Religion (1793) enjoyed celebrity, but his name is best remembered by his Bible, with Explanatory Notes (1788-92; 5th and best ed. 1822). His works were edited by his son, the Rev. John Scott (10 vols. 1823-25), who also published a Life (1822).

Scott, WALTER (c. 1614-94), of Satchells, served in Holland and at home 1629-86, and then wrote his doggerel History of the Scotts (1688; 5th ed. 1894).

Scott, SIR WALTER, was born in Edinburgh, 15th August 1771. His father, Walter Scott, was a Writer to the Signet; his mother, Anne Rutherford, was a daughter of Dr John Rutherford, professor of Medicine in Edinburgh University; so he came of the best blood on the Border—Scotts, Swintons, and Rutherfords. His great-grandfather was the grandson of Auld Wat of Harden, who married the Flower of Yarrow in 1567, and whose son, again, married Muckle Moud Meg of Elibank. At eighteen months Walter fevered in teething, and lost the power of his right leg. In his third year he was sent to his grandfather's farm at Sandyknowe, and learned and shouted the ballad of Hardyknute. At eight he was taken to Prestonpans, where he met a veteran named Dalgetty and George Constable, from whom (and from himself) he drew Monkbarns. Sent in 1779 to Edinburgh High School, he learned some Latin from Dr Adam, the rector. Dr Blacklock instructed his poetical taste, and he had his one famous meeting with Burns. He left the High School with a great knowledge of all that he had not been taught, but at Edinburgh University he did not improve his Latin, and declined to learn Greek. In 1785 he entered his father's office, and studied Scots law sedulously, and in 1792 was admitted an advocate. As a lawyer's clerk, superintending an eviction, he first entered the Highlands, where he already knew Invernahyle, of the '15 and the '45, and many another veteran. Even now the romance of his life had begun, and he loved the lady, Margaret Stuart, whom he loved till the end. His first publication was rhymed versions of ballads by Bürger (October 1796). The spring of 1797 was spent in yeomanry drill. In July he met David Ritchie, the Black Dwarf; and from Tweeddale he wandered to Gilsland, where he first saw Miss Charlotte Margaret Carpenter or Charpentier, a French émigré's daughter, whom he married at Carlisle on Christmas Eve 1797. Already (1792) he had made his first raid into Liddesdale, and every year till 1798 he repeated it, gathered legends and ballads, and studied characters. He wrote for a collection of M. G. Lewis's Glenfinlas and the Eve of St John, and translated Goethe's Goetz von Berlichingen. At the end of 1799 he was appointed Sheriff of Selkirkshire. In 1800 he suggested to James Ballantyne that he should remove from Kelso to Edinburgh, and promised him the printing of The Border Minstrelsy, of which the first two volumes appeared in 1802. In that year he began The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805), which made him at once the most popular author of the day. His share in the Ballantynes' business (now assumed) and in Constable's ultimately proved his ruin—partly through the Ballantynes' heedlessness and Constable's sanguineness, mainly through business wildly conducted by London connections of Constable's house, by 'bank accommodation' and bills eternally renewed. Scott's prosperity never had a sound commercial basis; he was never really free from money anxieties. In 1804 he removed to Ashiestiel, on the Tweed, wrote articles for the Edinburgh Review, and commenced Waverley. In 1806 he was appointed Clerk of Session, and withdrew from the bar. In 1808 Marmion appeared. Jeffrey's quibbling review of it in the Edinburgh and the Edinburgh's Whiggery caused Scott to busy himself in starting the Quarterly, whilst editing Dryden, Swift, and other classics. In 1810 The Lady of the Lake was finished, and surpassed even Scott's former triumphs. Scott now visited the western isles, and schemed out The Lord of the Isles. Now, too, he bought his first farm, and began to turn the cottage on it into the mansion of Abbotsford. Rokeby (1811) proved a comparative failure. In 1813 he declined the laureateship in favour of Southey. In 1814 he finished his Life of Swift, and published Waverley, of which, while it took the world by storm, he did not acknowledge the authorship. The first two months of 1815 saw the publication both of The Lord of the Isles and of Guy Mannering, followed closely by The Antiquary. In 1817 he had a violent illness, but no malady clouds Rob Roy or The Heart of Midlothian. In 1819 a return of his complaint endangered his life, and in paroxysms of agony he dictated The Bride of Lammermoor. His health was in part re-established; he opened a new vein of gold in Ivanhoe (1819), but failed to please his readers with The Monastery (1820). In 1820 he was created a baronet. Novels poured from his pen (The Abbot, Kenilworth, The Pirate, The Fortunes of Nigel, Peveril of the Peak, Quentin Durward, Redgauntlet, 1820-24); society flocked to Abbotsford; yet he never neglected his official duties. He managed George IV.'s reception in Edinburgh, he heard cases at Selkirk, he took part in raising volunteer corps, he conducted an enormous correspondence, he cared for the poor with a wise beneficence, he began the Life of Bonaparte, and still the novels flowed on. In 1825 he commenced his Journal. Woodstock was in hand when the commercial crash came (January 1826). Scott bore it like a stoic. From that hour all the energy not needed for public duties went into literature. His labour cleared his debts, though not in his lifetime. It is needless to repeat the tale of his last days—the death of Lady Scott (16th May 1826), Scott's desolation when his publisher disapproved of Count Robert of Paris, the insults heaped on him by the Jedburgh radical mob, his voyage to the Mediterranean, his continued work at The Siege of Malta, his return home, his death on 21st September 1832. He is buried in Dryburgh Abbey.

The greatness of Scott's heart, the loyal affection and kindness of his nature, are at least as remarkable as his astonishing genius. Nor was he less sagacious, in all affairs but his own, than he was sympathetic. As a man of letters he was more than generous: far from being envious, he admired contemporaries in whom the judgment of posterity has seen little to approve. Since Shakespeare there has never been a genius so human and so creative, so rich in humour, sympathy, poetry, so fertile in the production of new and real characters, as the genius of Sir Walter Scott. His style is often lax, and even commonplace; it rarely approaches distinction. It is at its best, absolutely perfect indeed, in his Scotch dialogue. Nor was he more careful of his plots; he was incapable of laying down the lines of a plot and sticking to them. Yet his genius triumphs in his own despite, and what he wrote for the amusement of a generation is fashioned for immortality. Scott's poetry suffers more from his 'hasty glance and random rhyme' than his prose; but his lyrics are the freshest, most musical, most natural and spirited of English verses. In his metrical romances, though 'the grand style' is absent, save in the more inspired passages, he has spirit, speed, ringing cadences, all the magic of romance, all the grace of chivalry. See the articles on Ballantyne, Constable, Edgeworth, Hogg, Hope-Scott, Kemp, Laidlaw, Leyden, Lockhart, Morritt, and Train; and see, too, Lockhart's great biography (1837-38; 2d ed. 1839), Hope-Scott's condensed version of the Life (1872), the Journal (1890), and the Familiar Letters (1893), Catalogue of the Abbotsford Library (Bannatyne Club, 1838), two books on Abbotsford by the Hon. Scott, WINFIELD, American general, born near Petersburg, Virginia, 13th June 1786. He was admitted to the bar in 1807, but obtained a commission as artillery captain in 1808. In 1812, as lieutenant-colonel, he crossed the Niagara River, fought at Queenstown, and was taken prisoner, but exchanged after three months. In 1813 he was wounded at Fort George, and in 1814 at Lundy's Lane; now a major-general, he framed the 'General Regulations' and introduced French tactics; he prevented several local outbreaks, and succeeded to the chief command of the army in 1841. In 1847, in command of the army for the invasion of Mexico, he took Vera Cruz, 26th March, and other towns, defeated Santa Anna and drove him to flight, and entered the capital in triumph, 14th September. Here he remained until February, when peace was signed. Scott belonged to the Whig party, and in 1852 was its unsuccessful candidate for the presidency. He retained nominal command of the army until Oct. 1861, and died at West Point, N.Y., 29th May 1866. See his rather vainglorious Memoirs (1864) and the Life by Gen. Marcus J. Wright.

Scribe, EUGÈNE, dramatist, son of a wealthy Paris silk mercer, was born 24th Dec. 1791, and died 20th Feb. 1861. Although educated for the legal profession, he gave his whole life to the 'manufacture' of stage-pieces; and from 1816 his productions were in such demand that he established a sort of dramatic manufactory, in which numerous collaborateurs worked under his supervision. His plots are interesting and his dialogue light and sparkling. The best known are Une Chaine, Le Verre d'Eau, Adrienne Lecouvreur (1849), and Batailles de Dames. Scribe also wrote novels and composed the libretti for sixty operas, including Masaniello, Fra Diavolo, Robert le Diable, Les Huguenots, Le Prophète, and L'Africaine. His

Œuvres Complètes fill 76 vols. (1874-85). See Life by Legouvé (1874). [Screeb.]

Scribner, CHARLES (1821-71), New York publisher, graduated at Princeton in 1840, and in 1846 joined in founding a publishing firm. Scribner's Magazine dates from 1857.

Scrivener, FREDERICK HENRY AMBROSE, LL.D., D.C.L. (1813-91), born at Bermondsey, studied at Trinity, Cambridge, and was headmaster of Falmouth School 1846-56, rector of Gerrans 1861-76, and then vicar of Hendon and a prebendary of Exeter. His Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament (1861; 4th ed. 1894) at once became a standard authority.

Scroggs, SIR WILLIAM (1623-83), born at Deddington, Oxfordshire, Chief-justice of the King's Bench from 1673, was notorious for cruelty and partiality during the 'Popish Plot' trials (see OATES). In 1680 he was impeached, but removed from office by the king on a pension.

Scrope, a north of England family that produced Richard le Scrope, Chancellor in 1378 and 1381-82; Richard le Scrope (c. 1350-1405), Archbishop of York, beheaded for conspiracy against Henry IV.; and Henry Lord Scrope, Warden of the West Marches under Queen Elizabeth. [Scrop.]

Scrope, GEORGE POULET, F.R.S. (1797-1876), born in London, on his marriage (1821) changed his name, Thomson, to his wife's. He wrote Considerations on Volcanoes (1825) and Volcanoes (1872). Liberal M.P. for Stroud 1833-67, he also wrote pamphlets in the farm labourers' interests.

Scudamore, WILLIAM EDWARD (1813-81), born at Wye, Kent, became a fellow of St John's, Cambridge; from 1839 was rector of Ditchingham, Norfolk; and wrote Steps to the Altar, Notitia Eucharistica, &c.

Scudder, HORACE ELISHA (1862-1902), storyteller, biographer, historian, editor, &c., was born at Boston, Mass.

Scudéry, MADELEINE DE, novelist, born at Havre in 1607, and left an orphan at six, received a careful education from an uncle, and, still young, became a notable figure at the Hôtel Rambouillet. Her half-crazy brother Georges (1601-67) left the service in 1630 to devote himself to literature, and wrote many pieces long since forgotten. His sister helped him in his writing, and Tallemant ascribes to her the entire responsibility of Ibrahim ou l'illustre Bassa, a romance, which he published in 1641. Similarly Artamène ou le Grand Cyrus (1649-53) and Clélie (1654-60) bore his name, although he contributed only the framework. In the Grand Cyrus (of 15,000 pages!) the incidents follow in the most helpless monotony and lack of verisimilitude, but the naïveté of the reflections completely disarms the critic. Clélie is a fantastic but pretentious attempt to construct an analysis and guide to the whole kingdom of Love. She died 2d June 1701. See Le Breton, Le Roman au Dix-septième Siècle (1890), and Life by Rathery (1873). [Skee-day-ree.]

Seabury, SAMUEL (1729-96), first Bishop of Connecticut, born at Groton, Conn., graduated at Yale in 1748, studied medicine at Edinburgh, and received orders in England in 1758. Three years a missionary of the S.P.G., in 1757 he became rector of Jamaica, Long Island, and in 1767 of Westchester, New York. The Whigs, however, imprisoned him for six weeks, so at New York he acted as a royalist army chaplain, and wrote pamphlets which earned for him the hostility of the patriots. In 1777 Oxford made him D.D. In 1783 the clergy of Connecticut elected Seabury bishop; and in 1784 he was consecrated at Aberdeen by three Scottish Episcopal bishops. See Memoir by W. J. Seabury (1909).

Seaman, OWEN, born 1861, was educated at Shrewsbury and Clare College, Cambridge, lectured on literature at Newcastle, joined the staff of Punch in 1897, and became editor in 1906. His parodies and vers de société, collected in some half-dozen volumes, rank him with Calverley.

Sebastian, Sr. was a native of Narbonne, a captain of the pretorian guard, and secretly a Christian. Diocletian, hearing that he favoured Christians, ordered him to be shot. But the archers did not quite kill him; a pious woman, Irene, nursed him back to life. When he upbraided the tyrant for his cruelty, Diocletian had him beaten to death (288) with rods.

Sebastian (1554-78), king of Portugal, a grandson of the Emperor Charles V., fell in battle against the Moors at Alcazar in Algeria; but soon doubt was thrown upon his death, and impostors began to crop up—first (in 1584) a son of a potter; then Mathews Alvares, a sort of brigand-insurgent; in 1594 a Spanish cook; then one Catizzone, a Calabrian, hanged in 1603. The popular belief that Sebastian would come again revived in 1807-8 during the French occupation, and again in 1838 in Brazil. See French works by D'Antas (1866) and São Mamede (1884).

Sébastieni, HORACE FRANÇOIS DE LA PORTA, COUNT (1772-1851), born near Bastia in Corsica, became one of Napoleon's most devoted partisans. He fought at Marengo, was wounded at Austerlitz, twice undertook missions to Turkey (1802-6), commanded an army corps in Spain, and distinguished himself in the Russian campaign (1812) and at Leipzig. He joined Napoleon on his return from Elba, but after 1830 was twice in the ministry, and was ambassador at Naples and London. He was made marshal in 1840.

Sebastiano del Piombo. See Piombo.

Sébillot, PAUL, folklorist, born at Matignon, Côtes-du-Nord, Feb. 6, 1843, abandoned law for painting, and from 1870 to 1883 exhibited in the Salon. But he gradually devoted himself to folklore, held a post in the ministry of Public Works, became Chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1889, and was secretary to the Congrès des Traditions Populaires (1889). Among his works are books on Breton folktales, traditions, and customs (1880-85), Contes de Terre et de Mer (1883), Gargantua dans les Traditions Populaires (1883), and Légendes et Superstitions de la Mer (1886-87). He edited the Revue des Traditions Populaires from its foundation (1885). [See-bee-yo.]

Secchi, ANGELO (1818-78), astronomer, born at Reggio and trained as a Jesuit, became professor of Physics at Washington, U.S., and in 1849 director of the observatory at the Collegio Romano. His labours were mainly in spectrum analysis and solar physics. [See-kee.]

Seckendorff, VEIT LUDWIG VON (1626-92), served the princes of Saxony and Brandenburg, was chancellor of the University of Halle, and wrote a Latin compendium of church history (1664) and a work De Lutheranism (1688).—His nephew, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH (1673-1763), was a field-marshal and diplomatist in the Austrian service.

Secker, THOMAS (1693-1768), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born, a Dissenter's son, at Sibthorpe, Notts, and studied medicine at London, Paris, and Leyden. But in 1722 he graduated at Oxford, and was successively Bishop of Bristol (1735) and Oxford (1737), Dean of St Paul's (1750), and primate (1758). He was a wise, kindly, hard-working bishop and a notable preacher. See Life by Porteous (1770).

Seddon, THOMAS (1821-56), landscape-painter—from 1853 in the East, was born in London, and died at Cairo. See Memoir by his brother (1859).

Sedgwick, ADAM, geologist, born at Dent vicarage, N.W. Yorkshire, 22d March 1785, graduated as fifth wrangler in 1808 from Trinity College, Cambridge, and became a fellow in 1810, Woodwardian professor of Geology in 1818, a canon of Norwich in 1834, and vice-master of Trinity in 1847. His best work was on British Palaeozoic Fossils (1854); with Murchison he studied the Alps and the Devonian system in England. He made a trenchant attack upon The Vestiges of Creation in the Edinburgh Review, and strongly opposed Darwin's Origin of Species. He died at Trinity, 25th January 1873. See his Life and Letters by Clark and Hughes (2 vols. 1890).

Sedgwick, CATHERINE (1789-1867), author of Redwood, The Linwoods, and other tales, was born at Stockbridge, Mass., and died near Roxbury. See Life by Mary E. Dewey (1871).

Sedley, SIR CHARLES (1639-1701), courtier and poet, born at his father's seat at Aylesford, Kent, was notorious at court for debauchery and wit. He joined William at the Revolution, out of gratitude to James, who had seduced his daughter and made her Countess of Dorchester. 'Since his Majesty has made my daughter a countess,' said he, 'it is fit I should do all I can to make his daughter a queen.' Sedley left The Mulberry Garden, Bellamira, and four more plays, but is remembered only for a few songs and vers de société.

Sédlitot, LOUIS AMÉLIE (1808-75), French orientalist, mathematician, and astronomer.

Sedulius, Christian Latin poet of the 5th century. Huener edited his works (Vienna, 1885).

Seeböhm, HENRY (1832-95), ornithologist and traveller in Greece, Asia Minor, Norway, Siberia, &c., was born at Bradford of Quaker German parentage, and was a steel manufacturer at Sheffield.—His brother, FREDERIC (1833-1912), was called to the bar in 1856, but became partner in a bank at Hitchin. He was author of The Oxford Reformers of 1498 (1867), Era of the Protestant Revolution (1874), The English Village Community (1883); 4th ed. 1890), Tribal System in Wales (1895), Tribal System in Anglo-Saxon Law (1902), &c.

Seeley, SIR JOHN ROBERT, was born in London, 10th Sept. 1834, third son of the publisher, Robert Benton Seeley (1798-1886). He was educated at the City of London School and at Christ's College, Cambridge, was bracketed with three others as senior classic in 1857, and next year was elected a fellow of his college. In 1863 he became professor of Latin in University College, London, in 1869 of Modern History at Cambridge. Ecce Homo appeared anonymously in 1865, and excited an extraordinary commotion in the religious world. It was followed by Natural Religion (1882). Other (acknowledged) works are Life and Times of Stein (1879), The Expansion of England (1883), A Short Life of Napoleon the First (1885), Growth of British Policy (1895), Goethe reviewed after Sixty Years (1894), and Introduction to Political Science (1896). Created a K.C.M.G. in 1894, he died of cancer, 13th Jan. 1895. See memoir by Prof. Frothingham prefixed to Seeley's Growth of British Policy (1895).

Seetzen, ULRICH JASPER (1767-1811), a German who in 1809 visited Mecca and Medina.

Séguier, WILLIAM (1771-1843), landscapepainter, picture-restorer, and first director of the National Gallery, was born in London, and died at Brighton.

Segur, a French family, distinguished in arms and letters, some of whose members were Huguenots. HENRI FRANÇOIS, Comte de Ségur (1689-1751), was a general in the war of the Austrian succession. His son, the Marquis de Ségur-Ponchat (1724-1801), fought in the Seven Years' War, and became marshal in 1783. His eldest son again, LOUIS PHILIPPE, Comte de Ségur d'Aguesseau (1753-1830), ambassador at St Petersburg, was a great favourite with Catharine II., served in the American war of independence, and hailed the Revolution with delight. Among his writings (33 vols.) are La Politique de tous les Cabinets de l'Europe (1793), Histoire de Frédéric-Guillaume II. (1800), Histoire Universelle (1817), Galerie Morale et Politique (1817-23), Mémoires (1825-26). His son, PHILIPPE PAUL (1780-1873), was a general of the first empire, and wrote a history (1824) of the Russian campaign of 1812, Histoire de Russie et de Pierre le Grand (1829), Histoire de Charles VIII. (1835), and Histoire et Mémoires 1789-1848 (1873). See Life by Taillandier (1875) and his Reminiscences (Eng. trans. 1895). [Say-geer; g hard.]

Sejanus. See TIBERIUS.

Selborne, ROUNDELL PALMER, EARL OF, born at Mixbury rectory, Oxfordshire, November 27, 1812, was educated at Rugby and Winchester and at Trinity College, Oxford. He won the Newdigate, took a classical first in 1834, and was elected to a Magdalen fellowship. He was called to the bar in 1837, and became Q.C. in 1849; sat for Plymouth 1847-52 and 1853-57, and for Richmond in Yorkshire 1861-82; became Solicitor-general in 1861 under Palmerston, being at the same time knighted; and was Attorney-general 1863-66. His dislike to Mr Gladstone's Irish Church policy prevented his accepting the Chancellorship in 1868; but as Baron Selborne he succeeded Lord Hatherley in 1872, and effected a fusion of law and equity by his Judicature Act (1873). He fell with his party in 1874, but occupied the woolsack in 1880-85, being made Earl of Selborne in 1882. A High Churchman and learned hymnologist, he published The Book of Praise (1863), Passages in Liturgical History (1878), A Defence of the Church of England (1886), Ancient Facts and Fictions as to Churches and Tithes (1888), and Hymns, their History and Development (1892). He died 4th May 1895. See his Memorials (1896-98).—His son, the 2d Earl, born 1859, and educated at Winchester and University College, Oxford, sat in parliament as Viscount Wolmer for Hampshire and Edinburgh, was Under-secretary for the Colonies 1895-1900, First Lord of the Admiralty 1900-5, and from 1905 till 1910 High Commissioner for South Africa.

Selden, JOHN, was born a wandering minstrel's son at Salvington near Worthing, 16th Dec. 1584. studied at Oxford for three years, and then removed to London to study law. As a conveyancer and chamber-counsel he acquired wealth, yet found time for profound and wide study. In 1610 appeared his Duello, or Single Combat; his Titles of Honour (1614) is still an authority. Analecton Anglo-Britannicon (1615) dealt with the civil government of Britain previous to the Norman Conquest. In 1617 appeared his erudite work on the Syrian gods, De Diis Syriis. His History of Tithes (1618), demolishing their divine right, brought upon his head the fulminations of the clergy, and was suppressed by the Privy-council. In 1621 Selden was imprisoned for advising the parliament to repudiate King James's doctrine that their privileges were originally royal grants; in 1623 he was elected member for Lancaster. In 1628 he helped to draw up the Petition of Right, and the year after he was committed to the Tower (for eight months) with Eliot, Holles, and the rest. In 1635 he dedicated to the king his Mare Clausum (an answer to the Mare Liberum of Grotius and the Dutch claims to fish off the British coasts). In 1640 he entered the Long Parliament for Oxford University, and opposed the policy that led to the expulsion of the bishops from the House of Lords and finally to the abolition of Episcopacy. He took no direct part in the impeachment of Strafford and voted against the Attainder Bill, and had no share in Laud's prosecution. He sat as a lay-member in the Westminster Assembly (1643), and was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower and (1644) an Admiralty commissioner. In 1646 he subscribed the Covenant, and in 1647 parliament voted him £5000. In 1647 he was appointed a university visitor, and sought to moderate the fanaticism of his colleagues. After the execution of Charles I., which he disapproved, he took little share in public matters. He died at Whitefriars, 80th November 1654, and was buried in the Temple Church. He had also written in Latin books on the Arundel Marbles (1624) and on Hebrew law (1634-50), besides posthumous tracts and treatises, of which the most valuable is his Table-talk (1689). His works fill three folio vols. (1726). See Singer's Biographical Preface, Aikin's Lives of Selden and Usher (1811), G. W. Johnson's Memoir (1835), and S. H. Reynolds's introduction to his edition of the Table-talk (Oxf. 1892).

Seleucidæ, the dynasty to whom fell that portion of Alexander the Great's Asiatic conquests which included Syria, part of Asia Minor, Persia, Bactria, &c. SELEUCUS I., surnamed Nicator, obtained Babylonia, to which he added Susiana, Media, and Asia Minor, but was assassinated in 280 B.C. He founded Greek and Macedonian colonies, and also built Antioch, Seleucia on the Tigris, &c.—SELEUCUS II. (246-226) was beset by Ptolemy of Egypt, his own brother, and the Parthians. See ANTIOCHUS.

Selim I. (1467-1520), Sultan of Turkey, in 1512 dethroned his father, Bajazet II., and caused him, his own brothers, and nephews to be put to death. In 1514 he declared war against Persia, and took Diarbekir and Kurdistan. He conquered in 1517 Egypt, Syria, and the Hejaz, with Medina and Mecca; won from the Abbasid calif at Cairo the headship of the Mohammedan world; chastised the insolence of the Janizaries; sought to improve the condition of the peoples he had conquered; and cultivated the poetic art. He was succeeded by his son, Soliman the Magnificent.—SELIM II. (1524-74), a degraded sot, succeeded his father, Soliman, in 1566; he owed whatever renown belongs to his reign to his father's old statesmen and generals. Arabia was conquered in 1570, Cyprus in 1571, but the Turkish fleet was annihilated by Don John of Austria in 1571 off Lepanto. During this reign occurred the first collision of Turks with Russians; three-fourths of the Turkish army were lost in the Astrakhan expedition.—SELIM III. (1761-1807), succeeding his brother in 1789, prosecuted the war with Russia; but the Austrians joined the Russians, and Belgrade surrendered to them, while the Russians took Bucharest, Bender, Akerman, and Ismail. Numberless reforms were projected; but the people were hardly prepared for them, and Selin's projects cost him his throne and life.

Selkirk, or SELGRAIG, ALEXANDER (1676-1721), whose story is supposed to have suggested the Robinson Crusoe of Defoe, was a native of Largo in Fife. After getting into several scrapes at home, in his twenty-eighth year he joined the South Sea buccaneers. In 1704 he quarrelled with his captain, and at his own request was put ashore on Juan Fernandez. Having lived alone here four years and four months, he was at last taken off by Thomas Dover (q.v.). He returned to Largo in 1712, and at his death was a lieutenant on a man-of-war. See Life by Howell (1829).

Selkirk, EARL OF. See DOUGLAS.

Sellar, WILLIAM YOUNG, born near Golspie in Sutherland, Feb. 22, 1825, was educated at Edinburgh Academy, Glasgow University, and Balliol. He graduated at Oxford with a classical first, in 1850 was elected a fellow of Oriel, next acted as assistant-professor at Durlham, Glasgow (1851-53), and St Andrews (1853-59), filled for four years the Greek chair at St Andrews, and was elected in 1863 to the Latin chair at Edinburgh. He died near Dalry in Galloway, 12th October 1890. He made his name widely known by his brilliant Roman Poets of the Republic (1863; enlarged 1881), which was followed by The Roman Poets of the Augustan Age—Virgil (1877) and Horace and the Elegiac Poets (1892), the latter edited by his nephew, Mr Andrew Lang, with memoir.

Sellon, PRISCILLA LYDIA (1821-76), founder in 1849 at Plymouth of the second Anglican sisterhood, its spiritual director Dr Pusey.

Selous, FREDERICK COURTENAY, born in London, 31st December 1851, and educated at Bruce Castle and Rugby, in Switzerland and Germany, first visited South Africa in 1871, and since has published A Hunter's Wanderings in Africa (1881), Travel and Adventure in South-east Africa (1893), and Sunshine and Storm in Rhodesia (1896). He fought in Matabeleland. [See loc.]

Selwyn, GEORGE (1719-91), wit, was educated at Eton and Hertford College, Oxford, whence, after making the grand tour, he was expelled (1745) for a blasphemous travesty of the Eucharist. He entered parliament in 1747, and sided generally with the court party; in 1751 succeeded his father in the Matson property, Gloucester; and for nearly half a century led the life of a man about town. At Paris he had the entrée of the best society, whilst among his intimates were the Duke of Queensberry, Horace Walpole, and 'Gilly' Williams. He died penitent. See Jesse's George Selwyn (1843), Hayward's review thereof (1854), and S. P. Kerr's book on him (1909).

Selwyn, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, bishop, born at Hampstead, 5th April 1809, was educated at Eton and St John's College, Cambridge, where he rowed in the first university boat-race (1829), and graduated as second classic in 1831. In 1841, then curate of Windsor, he was consecrated first Bishop of New Zealand and Melanesia. In 1867 he was appointed Bishop of Lichfield, where upon his initiative the first Diocesan Conference in which the laity were duly represented met in 1868. He died 11th April 1878. See Lives by Tucker (2 vols. 1879) and Curteis (1889).

Semir'amis, the mythical founder of Nineveh. See Lenormant, La Légende de Semir'amis (1873).

Semler, JOHANN SALOMO (1725-91), theologian, born at Saalfeld, in 1752 became professor of Theology at Halle. He exercised a profound influence as pioneer of the historical method in Biblical Criticism. He was distinctively a rationalist, but he sincerely believed in revelation. In insisting on the distinction of the Jewish and Pauline types of Christianity he anticipated the Tübingen school. See his Autobiography (1781-82) and Schmid's Theologie Semlers (1858).

Semmes, RAPHAEL (1809-77), commander of the Confederate States cruiser Alabama, entered the U.S. navy in 1826, but was called to the bar. He served again during the Mexican war, and in 1858 was made secretary to the Lighthouse Board. On the outbreak of the civil war he first commanded the Sumter; then, taking over the Alabama at the Azores (24th August 1862), proceeded to capture 65 vessels, nearly all of which were sunk or burned, and to destroy property estimated at $6,000,000. But it was by the heavy insurance for war-risks, and still more by the difficulty in getting freights, that the Alabama's career caused almost incalculable injury to the U.S. marine. On 19th June 1864 the Alabama was sunk in action off Cherbourg by the U.S. cruiser Kearsarge; but its commander escaped. After the war he edited a paper, was a professor, and practised law in Mobile. Besides Service Afloat and Ashore (1851) and Campaign of General Scott (1852), containing his experiences in the Mexican war, he wrote The Cruise of the Alabama (1864) and Service Afloat during the War between the States (1869). See Arthur Sinclair's Two Years on the Alabama (1896).

Semper, KARL, naturalist, was born at Altona, 6th July 1832, studied at Kiel, Hanover, and Würzburg, and, after travelling in the Philippines and South Sea Islands, became in 1868 professor of Zoology at Würzburg. He has written on the Philippines, on several problems of comparative anatomy, and The Natural Conditions of Existence as they affect Animal Life (trans. 1880).

Sempill, FRANCIS (c. 1616-82), Scottish minor poet, born at Lochwinnoch, Renfrewshire, perhaps wrote 'Maggie Lauder'.

Sen, KESHUB CHUNDER (1838-84), Indian religious reformer, a native of Bengal, about 1858 was attracted by the Brahmo Somaj (see RAMMOHUN ROY), and in 1866 founded the more liberal 'Brahmo Somaj of India.' He visited England in 1870. In 1878 a schism broke out in his church, caused largely by his autoerotic temper; and his last years brought disappointment. See Max-Müller's Biographical Essays (1884).

Sénancour, ÉTIENNE PIVERT DE (1770-1846), born in Paris, at nineteen left home to escape the course at Saint Sulpice, turned his steps to the Lake of Geneva, next year married a young girl who soon died, lost his patrimony through the Revolution, but returned to Paris about 1798, and made a modest living by his pen. His fame rests securely on three books: Réveries sur la Nature primitive de l'Homme (1799), Obermann (1804), and Libres Méditations d'un Solitaire Inconnu. In the first we see the student of Rousseau weighed down by the dogma of necessity. In Obermann the atheism and dogmatic fatalism of the Réveries have given place to universal doubt no less overwhelming. Nowhere is the desolating 'maladie du siècle' more effectively expressed than in this book, which is yet completely original in its inwardness, its sincerity, its delicate feeling for nature, and its melancholy eloquence. Sénancour, neglected in his day, found fit audience in George Sand, Sainte-Beuve, and Matthew Arnold. See Waite's complete translation of it, Obermann (1903), and Merlant's Sénancour (1907). [See non^d-koor.]

Sen'eca. ANNÆUS (c. 54 B.C.—39 A.D.), born at Corduba (Cordova) in Spain, studied eloquence at Rome, where again he spent some years as a rhetorician after 3 A.D. He died at Corduba. He had three sons—Novatus, Lucius Annaeus, and Mela (father of Lucan the poet). Besides an historical work, now lost, he wrote Oratorum et Rhetorum Sententiæ, Divisiones, Colores, Controuersior (partly lost), and Suasoriæ. The best edition is by H. J. Müller (1887).

Seneca, L. ANNÆUS, son of preceding, was born about 4 B.C., and educated for the bar in Rome. After years of devotion to philosophy and rhetoric, he entered the Curia, but in 41 A.D. lost the favour he had won with Claudius by getting involved in a state-trial and was banished to Corsica, whence he returned after eight years. Entrusted by Agrippina with the education of her son Nero, he acquired over the youth a strong and salutary influence, and by Nero (now emperor) was made consul in 57 A.D. His high moral aims gradually incurred the aversion of the emperor, and he withdrew from public life. An attempt of Nero to poison him having failed, he was drawn into the Pisonian conspiracy, accused, and condemned. Left free to choose his mode of death, he elected to open his veins, 65 A.D. In philosophy he inclined to the Stoic system, with Epicurean modifications. But his moral independence is an outstanding feature of his voluminous dicta, which, often profound, are always distinctly reflected in the steel-mirror of his style. His writings include De Ira, De Consolatione, De Providentiâ, De Animi Tranquillitate, De Constantiâ Sapientis, De Clementiâ, De Breuitate Vitæ, De Vita Beata, De Otio aut Secessu Sapientis, De Beneficiis, Epistolæ ad Lucillum, Apocolocyntosis (a scathing satire on the Emperor Claudius), and Questiones Naturales. Seneca was also a poet, if we may accept as his the epigrams and the eight tragedies (Hercules Furens, Thyestes, Phœdra, Œdipus, Troades, Medea, Agamemnon, Hercules Otæus, and part of a Thebæis) usually comprised among his opera omnia. These show vigorous imagination and psychological insight, but are rhetorical and 'correct' to a fault. There are editions of his prose writings by Fickert (1842-45) and Haase (1852-53); and of his tragedies by Gronovius (1661-81), Schröder (1728), Bohle (1819-22), Peiper and Richter (1867), and Leo (1878-79); and see the Minor Dialogues, translated by A. Stewart (1889).

Senefelder, ALOYS (1771-1834), born in Prague, and successively actor, author, and printer, about 1796 invented lithography, and after various trials in 1806 opened an establishment of his own in Munich, where he died. [Zay-neh-fel-der.]

Senior, NASSAU WILLIAM (1790-1864), political economist and 'prince of interviewers,' was born at Compton Beauchamp, Berks, the son of a Wiltshire vicar, and great-grandson of Aaron Senior. From Etou he passed to Magdalen College, Oxford, where in 1812 he took a distinguished first-class in classics. In 1819 he was called to the bar; in 1825-30, and again in 1847-62, was professor of Political Economy at Oxford; in 1832 was appointed a Poor-law Commissioner; and in 1836-53 was a Master in Chancery. He travelled much, and wrote much for the Edinburgh Review and other leading periodicals, his twenty works including, besides treatises on political economy, Biographical Sketches (1863); Essays on Fiction (1864); Historical and Philosophical Essays (1865); Journals, Conversations, and Essays relating to Ireland (1868); Journals kept in France (1871); Conversations with Distinguished Persons during the Second Empire (1878-80); and Conversations in Egypt and Malta (1882). See also Many Memories of Many People, by his daughter, Mrs Simpson (1898).

Sennacherib, King of Assyria, succeeded his father, Sargon, in 705 B.C. He invaded Judæa and besieged Hezekiah in Jerusalem; but the expedition ended in sudden disaster. He undertook the embankment of the Tigris, canals, water-courses, a gigantic palace at Nineveh, &c. He was slain by his two elder sons in 681 B.C.

Sepulveda, JUAN GINEZ (1490-1574), born near Cordova, became historiographer to Charles V., preceptor to the future Philip II., and a canon of Salamanca. He was a champion of humanism. His Latin works include histories of Charles V. and Philip II., a Life of Albornoz, and a History of Spain in the New World. [Say-pool-vay-da.]

Séquard. See BROWN-SÉQUARD.

Sequoyah, or GEORGE GUESS (c. 1770-1843), a Cherokee half-breed who in 1826 invented a Cherokee syllabic alphabet of eighty-five characters. See Life by G. E. Foster (1886).

Serao, MITLDE, Italian novelist, was born at Patras in Greece, 7th March 1856, the daughter of an Italian married refugee and a Greek lady, and in 1880 married Edoardo Scarfoglio, editor of a Neapolitan paper. She is a clever journalist, and her tales include Cuore Inferno (1881), Fantasia (1883; Eng. trans. 1891), Le Leggende Napoletane, Ricordo Joannus (1886), All' Erta Sentinella (1889), and Le Amanti (1894). [Say-rah'o.]

Serenus of ANTISSA, a Greek geometer who probably flourished in the 4th century A.D.

Serf, St. a Scottish saint who founded the church of Culross between 697 and 706, but who yet figures in the legend of St Kentigern (q.v.).

Sergius, the name of four popes—I. (687-701), II. (844-847), III. (897-911), and IV. (1009-12).

Serpa-Pinto, ALEXANDER ALBERT, Portuguese African traveller, was born in 1846 and died in 1900. See his How I crossed Africa (trans. 1881).

Serrano, FRANCISCO, DUKE DE LA TORRE (1810-85), Spanish statesman, fought against the Carlists and, nominally a liberal, favoured by Isabella, played a conspicuous part in various ministries. Banished in 1866, he in 1868 drove out the queen, and was regent until the accession of Amadeus of Savoy (1870). He waged successful war against the Carlists in 1872 and 1874; and again regent (1874), resigned the power into the hands of Alfonso XII. [Ser-rah'no.]

Serres, OLIVIA. See OLIVE (PRINCESS).

Sertorius, QUINTUS, a native of Nursia in the country of the Sabines, fought with Marius in Gaul (102 B.C.), supported him against Sulla, then led an adventurous life in Spain, where he headed a successful rising of natives and Roman refugees, holding out against Sulla's commanders for eight years till he was assassinated, 72 B.C.

Servetus, MICHAEL, or MIGUEL SERVETO, theologian and physician, born at Tudela in Navarre in 1511, studied law at Saragossa and Toulouse. He went to Italy (1530) in the company of Quintañá, confessor to Charles V., and next to Germany, meeting Luther and other Reformers. But his own views, especially in respect of the Trinity—he denied the eternity of the Son—expounded in De Trinitatis Erroribus (1531) and other books, were abhorrent alike to Reformers and Roman Catholics. In 1536 he began to study medicine at Paris, and in 1541 became physician to the Archbishop of Vienne. Having reprinted (1553) some theological tracts, he was denounced to the inquisitor at Lyons. Arrested, he escaped from prison, but, rashly venturing into Geneva, was again arrested at Calvin's instance, and, after a nine weeks' trial, burned, 27th October 1553. He had acquired fame as editor of Ptolemy and by his enunciation of the pulmonary circulation of the blood. See CALVIN, and books by Pünjer (Latin, 1876), Tollin (German, 1876-82), Willis (strongly partisan, 1877), and Osler (1910).

Servius, a commentator on Virgil, lived at Rome about 400 A.D.

Servius Tullius (578-534 B.C.), sixth king of Rome, distributed all freeholders (for military purposes primarily) into tribes, classes, and centuries, making property, not birth, the standard of citizenship. His reforms provoked patrician jealousy, and he was assassinated.

Sesostriis, Greek name of a celebrated Egyptian monarch said to have invaded Libya, Arabia, Thrace, and Scythia, subdued Ethiopia, placed a fleet on the Red Sea, and extended his dominions to India. He brought back large numbers of captives, who were employed on the building of temples and the construction of canals and mounds. Growing infirm and blind, after a reign of thirty-three years he committed suicide.

Setoun, GABRIEL, the pen-name of the Scottish novelist, Thomas Nicoll Hepburn, who was born at West Wemyss, Fife, 21st April 1861, and became an Edinburgh schoolmaster.

Settle, ELKANAH (1648-1724), born at Dunstable, went from Oxford to London to make a living by his pen. In 1671 he made a hit by his tragedy of Cambyses. To annoy Dryden, Rochester got his Empress of Morocco played at Whitehall by the court lords and ladies. In Absalom and Achitophel Dryden scourged 'Doeg' with his scorn, and Settle speedily relapsed into obscurity. In 1718 he was admitted to the Charterhouse.

Severn, JOSEPH (1793-1879), portrait and subject painter, the son of a Hoxton music-master, about 1816 made his famous friendship with Keats (q.v.), with whom in 1820 he sailed for Naples and Rome—his home thenceforward save for twenty years (1841-61) in London. During 1861-72 he was British consul there. See his Life and Letters by William Sharp (1892).

Seve'rus, LUCIUS SEPTIMIUS, Roman emperor, born near Leptis Magna in Africa, 146 A.D., rose to be prætor in 178, and commander of the army in Pannonia and Illyria. After the murder of Pertinax (193) he was proclaimed emperor, marched upon Rome, utterly defeated his two rivals in 195 and 197, and between these dates made a glorious campaign in the East, and took Byzantium. In 198 he met with the most brilliant success in his campaign against the Parthians. At Rome in 202 he gave shows of unparalleled magnificence, and distributed extravagant largess. A rebellion in Britain drew him thither in 208, when he marched, it is said, to the extreme north of the island. To check South Britain from the Caledonian invasions, he repaired Hadrian's wall (sometimes called after Severus), and died soon after at Eboracum (York), 4th Feb. 211.—See also ALEXANDER SEVERUS.

Severus, SULPICIUS. See SULPICIUS.

Sévigné, MADAME DE, was born at Paris of an ancient Burgundian family, February 6, 1626. Her maiden name was Marie de Rabutin-Chantal. While she was still an infant her father fell fighting against the English at Rhé; her mother died soon after, leaving her to be brought up by her maternal uncle, the Abbé de Coulanges. She was carefully educated, and at eighteen married the Marquis Henri de Sévigné, a spendthrift and libertine. Their daughter, Françoise Marguerite, was born in 1646; their son, Charles, in 1648. Her husband was killed in a duel by a rival in a sordid intrigue in 1651. Madame de Sévigné was then only twenty-five, brilliant in her beauty and fascination; yet all the flatteries of the most dazzling court in the world failed to touch her heart—the Prince de Conti, Turenne, Fouquet, Rohan, and her cousin Bussy-Rabutin (q.v.) sighed for her in vain. Her heart was occupied by devotion to her children and a warmth of friendship almost beyond example. She had to endure some vexation by a (lying) allusion to herself in Bussy-Rabutin's Histoire Amoureuse des Gaules. In January 1669 her daughter married the Comte de Grignan, lieutenant-général of Languedoc and then of Provence—an office which obliged him to leave Paris. The great grief of her life was this separation from her daughter, but it is mainly to it that we owe her letters. They grow sadder as, by the death of friend after friend, she begins to find herself alone, yet some of the latest stand among the first in literary value. She lived to see son and grandson married; in 1691 quitted her Breton manor-house, Les Rochers, for her daughter's Provençal château; and after nursing her daughter through a tedious illness was herself attacked by smallpox, and died at Grignan, 18th April 1696. Madame de Sévigné's twenty-five years of letters to her daughter reveal the inner history of the time in wonderful detail, but the most interesting thing in the whole 1600 (one-third letters to her from others) remains herself. She was religious without superstition; she had read widely and gained much from conversation. She possessed a solid understanding and strong good sense. But it needed the warm touch of affection to give her letters the freedom, the rapidity, the life of spoken words. The first edition of the Lettres was printed (1726) by Bussy's son, the Abbé de Bussy; the final edition is that in the 'Grands Écrivains' (14 vols. 1865-67; vol. i., with Life by Mesnard). See books by Walckenaer (1842-52), Aubenas (1865), the Comtesse de Puliga (English, 1873), Miss Thackeray (1881), Léon de la Brière (2d ed. 1882), Gaston Boissier (1887; trans. 1887), Combes (1885), Vallery-Radot (1888), Saporta (1889), and Janet Aldis (1907). Seward, ANNA, the 'Swan of Lichfield,' born in 1744 at Eyam rectory, Derbyshire, lived from ten at Lichfield, where her father, himself a poet, became a canon. He died in 1790, but she lived on in the bishop's palace, dear to her friends and correspondents, Mrs Piozzi, Hayley, Southey, Scott, and died 23d March 1809. She published her poetical novel, Louisa, in 1782; her Sonnets in 1799; her Life of Dr Darwin in 1804; but bequeathed to Walter Scott the care of her collected poems (1810). Her tedious letters fill 6 vols. (1811-13). See book by E. V. Lucas (1907).

Seward, WILLIAM HENRY, American statesman, born at Florida, N.Y., May 16, 1801, graduated at Union College in 1820, and was admitted to the bar at Utica in 1822. In 1830 he was elected to the state senate, where he led the Whig opposition to the dominant democratic party. In 1838 and 1840 he was governor of New York State; in 1843 he resumed his practice. In 1849 he was elected to the U.S. senate, and re-elected in 1855. In 1850, while urging the admission of California to the Union, he declared that the national domain was devoted to liberty by 'a higher law than the constitution.' He opposed the Compromise Bill of 1850, separated himself from those Whigs who followed President Fillmore in his pro-slavery policy, opposed the Know-Nothing party, and on the formation of the Republican party became one of its leaders. In 1860 he was a candidate for the presidential nomination, but, failing, became Lincoln's Secretary of State (1861-69). The civil war rendered the foreign relations of the United States unusually delicate, especially in view of the attitude of France and Britain. In the 'Trent affair' during the civil war he advised that the Confederate envoys should be given up to England. He protested against the fitting out of the Alabama and similar vessels in British ports, and declared that the United States would claim indemnities. He supported President Johnson's reconstruction policy, thereby incurring much censure from his own party. In 1870-71 he made a tour round the world, his narrative of which was published (1873) by his adopted daughter. He died at Auburn, N.Y., Oct. 10, 1872. See his Autobiography (1877), Life by his son (3 vols. 1895), and Memoir by Baker in his Works (5 vols. 1855-84).

Sewell, ELIZABETH MISSING (1815-1906), born at Newport, Isle of Wight, from 1844 published Amy Herbert, Laneton Parsonage, Margaret Percival, and over forty more High Church novels, devotional works, &c.

Sexton, THOMAS, Nationalist M.P. 1880-96 (Sligo, W. Belfast, N. Kerry), was born at Waterford in 1848, and was Lord Mayor of Dublin 1888-89.

Sextus Empiricus, who lived at Alexandria and Athens about 200-250 A.D., as physician was a representative of the Empirics, as philosopher the chief exponent of scepticism. In his two extant works—the Hypotyposes and Adversus Mathematicos—he left a prodigious battery of arguments against dogmatism in grammar, rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, music, astrology, logic, physics, ethics. See monographs by Jourdain (1858) and Pappenheim (1875).

Seyffert, MORITZ (1809-72), Latin scholar, was born at Wittenberg, and died at Potsdam.

Seymour, an historic family, originally from St Maur in Normandy (hence the name), who obtained lands in Monmouthshire in the 13th century, and in the 14th at Hatch Beauchamp, Somerset, by marriage with an heiress of the Beauchamps. In 1497 Sir John Seymour helped to suppress the Cornish insurrection, and accompanied Henry VIII. to France. His daughter, Jane Seymour (c. 1509-37), became the wife of Henry VIII. and mother of Edward VI.; and his fourth son, Thomas (c. 1508-49), created Lord Seymour of Sudeley, became Lord High Admiral of England and the second husband of Henry's widow (Catharine Parr), but ended his life on the scaffold. Sir John's eldest son, Edward (c. 1506-52), was successively created Viscount Beauchamp, Earl of Hertford, and Duke of Somerset, and as Protector played the leading part in the first half of the reign of Edward VI. (q.v.). Edward (c. 1539-1621), his eldest son by his second marriage, created by Elizabeth Earl of Hertford, married the Lady Catharine Grey, sister of the unfortunate Lady Jane Grey—a marriage which entailed on him a nine years' imprisonment and a fine of £15,000. His grandson, William (1588-1660), who in 1621 succeeded him in the earldom of Hertford, also fell into disgrace for attempting to marry Lady Arabella Stuart, cousin of James I.; but subsequently, playing a conspicuous part in the royalist cause in the Great Rebellion, obtained a reversal of the Protector's attainder, and in 1660 took his seat in the House of Peers as third Duke of Somerset. The ducal title next passed to his cousin, on whose death it was inherited by Charles Seymour (1662-1748), known as the 'proud Duke of Somerset,' who filled high posts in the courts of Charles II., William III., and Anne. He married the heiress of the Percies, by whom he had a son, Algernon (1684-1750), seventh duke, who in 1749 was created Earl of Northumberland, with remainder to his son-in-law, Sir Hugh Smithson, the ancestor of the present Percy line. On this duke's death the Somerset title was claimed by a descendant of the first duke by his first marriage, Sir Edward Seymour, who took his seat in the House of Peers as eighth duke. The earldom of Hertford, which became extinct in 1750, was in that same year conferred on this eighth duke's first cousin, Francis Seymour-Conway (1719-94), who in 1793 was advanced to the dignity of marquis. His grandson, Francis (1777-1842), Third Marquis of Hertford, was the prototype of Thackeray's 'Marquis of Steyne.' See also ALCESTER.

Sforza, a celebrated Italian family founded by a peasant of the Romagna called Muzio Attendolo (1369-1424), who became a great condottiere or soldier of fortune, and received the name of Sforza ('Stormer'—i.e. of cities).—His natural son, FRANCESCO SFORZA (1401-66), sold his sword to the highest bidder, fighting for or against the pope, Milan, Venice, and Florence. From the Duke of Milan he obtained his daughter's hand and the succession to the duchy; and before his death had extended his power over Ancona, Pesaro, all Lombardy, and Genoa.—His son, GALEAZZO (1444-76), was a tyrant and monster of debauchery, prodigality, and ferocity. The later dukes (from 1515) were practically dependants of France or of Charles V.; and in 1535 the main line of the Sforza house became extinct.

Shadwell, THOMAS (c. 1642-92), dramatist, born at Broomhill House, Brandon, from Cains College, Cambridge, passed to the Middle Temple, and made a hit with the first of his thirteen comedies, The Sullen Lovers (1668). He also wrote three tragedies. When Dryden flung his Abalom and Achitophel and The Medal into the cause of the court, Shadwell grossly assailed him in the Medal of John Bayes. Dryden heaped deathless ridicule upon his antagonist in MacFlecknoe and as 'Og' in the second part of Abalom and Achitophel. Though his works exhibit talent and comic force, all that the world now knows of him is that 'Shadwell never deviates into sense.' He succeeded his enemy in the laureateship in 1688.

Shaftesbury, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, EARL OF, was born 22d July 1621 at Wimborne St Giles, Dorset, the seat of his mother's father, Sir Anthony Ashley (1551-1628), a clerk of the Privy-council. He was the elder son of John Cooper of Rockborne in Hampshire, who next year was created a baronet. His mother died in 1628, his father in 1631; and ultimately he came into £6000 a-year. He went up as a gentleman commoner to Exeter College, Oxford, where he 'not only obtained the good-will of the wiser and elder sort, but became the leader even of all the rough young men.' He left without a degree, and in 1639 married Margaret, daughter of the Lord Keeper Coventry. She died in 1649; and nine months later he married Lady Frances Cecil, the Earl of Exeter's sister, who also dying in 1654, in 1655 he married pious Margaret Spencer, the Earl of Sunderland's sister, who survived him till 1693. By all three marriages he largely strengthened his family connections. Meanwhile in 1640 he had entered the Short Parliament for Tewkesbury, but he had not a seat in the Long. A royalist colonel (1643), after ten months' service he went over to the parliament, and commanded their forces in Dorsetshire, then from 1645 to 1652 lived as a great country gentleman. In 1653 he entered the Barebones parliament, and was appointed one of Cromwell's council of state, but from 1655 he was in opposition. He was one of the twelve commissioners sent to Breda to invite Charles II. home, and a carriage accident on the way thither caused him that lifelong internal abscess which in 1666 secured him a life-long attendant and friend in Locke. He was made a privy-councillor (1660), and next year Baron Ashley and Chancellor of the Exchequer. He served on the trial of the Regicides; supported the war with Holland; and after Clarendon's fall (1667) sided with Buckingham, with whom he formed one of the infamous Cabal, and like whom he was fooled as to the Catholic clauses in the secret treaty of Dover (1669-70). He seems to have opposed the 'stop of the exchequer' (1672), which yet he justified; that same year was made Earl of Shaftesbury and Lord Chancellor (he proved a most upright judge); but in 1673, espousing the popular Protestantism, supported the Test Bill, which broke up the Cabal. In October the Great Seal was demanded of him, and he ranged himself as a champion of toleration (for Dissenters only) and of national liberties. He opposed Danby's non-resistance Test Bill (1675), and in 1677, for his protest against a fifteen months' prorogation, was sent to the Tower, whence he was only released a year later on making a full submission. Though the 'Popish Plot' was not of his forging, he used that two years' terror (1678-80) with ruthless dexterity. Not even the Habeas Corpus Act, long known as Shaftesbury's Act, is a set-off against the judicial murder of Lord Stafford, his personal enemy. The fall of Danby was followed by his appointment as president of Temple's new Privy-council of thirty members (1679), and an attempt to exclude James from the succession, in favour of Shaftesbury's puppet, the bastard Monmouth. Shaftesbury now received his congé from the king, and driven into extremest opposition, indicted James as a recusant (1680), and brought armed followers to the Oxford parliament (1681). In July 1681 he was again sent to the Tower for high-treason, but the Middlesex Whig grand jury threw out the bill. Monmouth and Russell hung back from the open rebellion to which he urged them, and he fled to Holland in December 1682. On 22d January 1683 he died at Amsterdam. Transcendently clever, eloquent, and winning, he yet stands condemned by the many talents committed to him; self was the dominant principle to which alone he was true. He was the author of party government, ever ready to make capital out of religious animosities, 'atrocities,' perjuries, forgeries, anything. It is doubtful whether he was the pure, high-minded, and great statesman that Mr Christie would make him, or, what Charles pronounced him, 'the wickedest dog in England.' See Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel and Medal (1681), part iii. of Butler's Hudibras (1678), the hostile History of Burnet, the able apologetic Life by Christie (1871), the shorter study by Trail (1886), and other works cited at LOCKE and CHARLES II.

His grandson, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, third Earl of Shaftesbury, philosopher, was born in London, February 26, 1671. Locke superintended his early education at Clapham; and he spent three years at Winchester and three more in travel. A zealous Whig, he sat for Poole 1695-98, but ill-health drove him from politics to literature. On his two visits to Holland (1698-99, 1703-4) he formed friendships with Bayle and Le Clerc. He succeeded to the earldom in 1699, removed to Naples in 1711, and died there February 15 (4 o.s.), 1713. His somewhat superfine writings were all, with a single exception, published after 1708, and were mostly collected as Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711; enlarged ed. 1714). Here he expounded the system immortalised in the Essay on Man, and argued that ridicule is the test of truth, that man possesses a moral sense, and that everything in the world is for the best. He found a follower in Hutcheson (q.v.), founder of the Scottish school of philosophy. While at home he was mainly attacked as a deist, on the Continent he as a philosopher attracted the attention of Leibnitz, Voltaire, Diderot, Lessing, and Herder. See Fowler's Shaftesbury and Hutcheson (1882), J. M. Robertson's edition of the Characteristics (1900), a Life by Rand (1900), and W. R. Scott's Hutcheson (1900).

ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, philanthropist, was born in London, 28th April 1801, and from Harrow passed in 1819 to Christ Church, Oxford. He took a first-class in classics in 1822, and was made D.C.L. in 1841. As Lord Ashley he represented Woodstock 1826-30, and under Wellington was Commissioner of the India Board of Control (1828), under Peel a Lord of the Admiralty (1834). He represented Dorchester 1830-31, Dorset 1833-46, and Bath 1847-51, when he succeeded his father as earl. He promoted two bills for the better Treatment of Lunatics (1845), and was chairman of the Lunacy Commission from 1828 till his death. He worked hard for the acts preventing the employment of boy chimney-sweepers (1840) and limiting the hours of labour of women and young persons to ten hours a day (1847), for the Factory Acts and the Workshop Regulation Act. In 1846 he supported Peel's repeal of the Corn Laws. He joined the Ragged School movement in 1843, laboured for the better housing of workmen, and was active in every good work. He was a staunch evangelical, and strenuously opposed ritualism, rationalism, and socialism. He died 1st Oct. 1885. See his Speeches (1868) and Lives by Hodder (1886 and 1897).

Shah-Jehan, fifth of the Mogul emperors of Delhi, was from 1624 in revolt against his father, Jehangir, but on his death (1627) succeeded him. The chief events of his reign were a war in the Deccan, ending in the destruction of the kingdom of Ahmadnagar (1636) and the subjugation (1636) of Bijapur and Golconda; an attack on the Uzbegs of Balkh (1645-47); unsuccessful attempts to recover Kandahar from the Persians (1637, 1647-53); and a second successful war in the Deccan (1655). In 1653 the emperor fell ill, and was taken prisoner by his son Aurunzebe, and confined till his death, December 1666. He was a just and an able ruler; the magnificence of his court was unequalled; and he left buildings such as the Taj Mahal and the 'pearl mosque' at Agra and the palace and great mosque at Delhi.

Shairp, JOHN CAMPBELL, born at Houston House, Linlithgowshire, 30th July 1819, was educated at Edinburgh Academy and Glasgow University, thence went as Snell Exhibitioner to Balliol, and gained the Newdigate in 1842. In 1846 he became a master at Rugby, in 1857 deputy-professor of Latin at St Andrews, in 1861 Latin professor, and in 1868 principal. In 1877 he was appointed professor of Poetry at Oxford, and reappointed in 1882. He died at Oronsay, Argyllshire, 18th September 1885. His writings reveal strong poetic instincts and a keen, though kindly, critical faculty; they include Kilmahoe (1864), Studies in Poetry and Philosophy (1868), Culture and Religion (1870), The Poetic Interpretation of Nature (1877), Burns (1879), Aspects of Poetry (1881), Glen Dessaray (1886), and Sketches in History and Poetry (1887). See Prof. Knight's Principal Shairp and his Friends (1888).

Shakespeare, WILLIAM, was born at Stratford-on-Avon in April 1564, and baptised on the 26th. His father, John Shakespeare, was a fell-monger and glover, perhaps also a butcher, and certainly a dealer at times in corn and timber. In 1557 he married Mary Arden, daughter of a wealthy farmer; and was successively chamberlain, alderman, and high-bailiff of Stratford. William was the third child; one of four sisters outlived him; and one of three brothers, Edmund, became an actor, and died in 1607. Probably William was educated at the free school of Stratford, where beside English he would learn something of Latin—'small Latin and less Greek.' In 1578 John Shakespeare became very unprosperous. Perhaps the boy, removed from school, was apprenticed to a butcher; perhaps he was for a time an attorney's clerk. There is a bond given previous to marriage between William Shakespeare and Anne Hathaway, dated November 28, 1582. Anne Hathaway was the daughter of a yeoman of Shottley, and was eight years older than the bridegroom. The marriage may have been pressed forward by Anne's friends in order that a child—Shakespeare's eldest daughter, Susanna (baptised May 26, 1583)—might be born in lawful wedlock. Two years after the birth of Susanna twins were born, Hamnet and Judith. Hamnet died in his twelfth year; both daughters survived their father. Three or four years after his marriage Shakespeare quitted Stratford—after a prosecution, according to Rowe, for stealing deer from the park of Sir Thomas Lucy of Charle-cote. A tradition relates that Shakespeare's first employment in London was holding the horses of gentlemen outside the theatre. Except that we find his name joined with that of his father in an attempt made in 1587 to assign a small property to the mortgagee, we know nothing certain of Shakespeare's life from the date of his twin-children's birth until 1592, when he was an actor and a rising playwright. High eminence as an actor Shakespeare did not attain.

In 1593 appeared Shakespeare's first work, the narrative poem, Venus and Adonis, dedicated to the Earl of Southampton, the poet's patron and friend. It is an elaborate piece of Renaissance paganism, setting forth ideals of sensuous beauty in the persons of the amorous goddess and of the young hunter, whose coldness meets and foils her passion. Lucrece followed in 1594, also dedicated to Southampton; in it the lawless passion of Tarquin is confronted by the ardent chastity of the Roman wife. Both the Venus and the Lucrece became immediately popular. Shakespeare's earliest dramatic exercises consisted probably in adapting to the stage plays which had grown out of date. Many critics regard Titus Andronicus as an example of such work. Another of these plays is the First Part of Henry VI. It is not certain at what date Shakespeare's career as a dramatic author began; but 1589-90 cannot be far astray. The evidence by which the chronology of Shakespere's works is inferred is of various kinds, including entries of publication in the Stationers' Registers, statements about the plays and poems or allusions to them or quotations from them by contemporary writers, facts connected with the history of dramatic companies which presented plays of Shakespeare, allusions in the plays to historical events, and quotations by Shakespeare from publications of the day. We cannot fail also to observe the growth of Shakespeare's imaginative power, his intellectual reach, his moral depth, his spiritual wisdom. And his versification becomes more varied and freer in the later plays, or, if not freer, subject to subtler and less obvious laws. Love's Labour's Lost (c. 1590) is perhaps his first original play. Learned pedantry, fantastical extravagance of speech, the affectations of amorous poetry are satirised. The Comedy of Errors (c. 1591), a lively tangle of farcical incidents, is founded on the Menæchmi of Plautus. The Two Gentlemen of Verona (c. 1592), a romantic love-comedy, exhibits a marked advance in the presentation of character. This group closes with A Midsummer Night's Dream (c. 1593-94). No other comedy of Shakespeare has so large a lyrical element. Meanwhile Shakespeare was also engaged on the English historical drama. In the Second and Third Parts of Henry VI. (c. 1592) he worked upon the basis of old plays written probably by Marlowe and Greene. In King Richard III. (c. 1593) he still writes in Marlowe's manner, though the play is wholly his own, his chief source for his historical material being Holinshed's Chronicle. The influence of Marlowe is no longer supreme in King Richard II. (c. 1594), with which King John (c. 1595) in style has something in common. Shakespeare as a member of the Lord Chamberlain's company appeared on several occasions before Queen Elizabeth. Before long he became a theatrical shareholder, and had gathered sufficient wealth to purchase (1597) 'New Place,' a large house in Stratford, where he cherished friendly relations with his neighbours. During at least part of 1598-1604 he lodged with Christopher Mountjoy, a French tire-maker, at Monkwell Street, Cripplegate. Romeo and Juliet is founded in the main upon a poem, Romeus and Juliet (1562), by Arthur Brooke, which versifies the tale taken by the French Boistean from the Italian of Bandello; it has a lyrical sweetness, swiftness, and intensity such as we do not find elsewhere in its author's writings. Near to it in the chronological order probably stands The Merchant of Venice (c. 1596), between the earliest comedies and those which lie around the year 1600. The advance in characterisation from that of Shakespeare's previous comedies is remarkable. Shakespeare's mastery of comedy aids him in the historical plays which followed—the First and Second Parts of King Henry IV. (1597-98) and King Henry V. (1599). There is a tradition dating from 1702 that Queen Elizabeth commanded Shakespeare to exhibit Falstaff in love, and that he hastily wrote The Merry Wives of Windsor (1598-99). In The Taming of the Shrew (1597?), adapted and enlarged from an old play, The Taming of a Shrew, Shakespeare's genius shows itself chiefly in connection with the boisterous heroine, her high-spirited tamer Petruchio, and the drunken tinker. The same animal spirits and intellectual vivacity appear—but now refined and exalted—in Much Ado about Nothing (1598-99). About this time he rehandled Love's Labour's Lost. As You Like It (1599), dramatised from a prose tale by Lodge, and Twelfth Night (1600-1) are the last of the wholly joyous comedies of this period.

About 1600-1 Shakespeare's mirth becomes touched with seriousness or infected with bitterness, and soon he ceases to write comedy. Some have supposed that this is connected with events shadowed forth in Shakespeare's Sonnets—mentioned in 1598, but not published until 1609. The 1609 edition is dedicated to 'Mr W. H.' as 'the onlie begetter of these insuing Sonnets.' The poems form two groups—1-126 addressed to a beautiful young man of high station, 127-154 either addressed to or referring to a married woman of dark complexion, highly accomplished, fascinating, but of irregular conduct. Shakespeare's young friend seems to have fallen into the toils of the woman, to whom Shakespeare was himself attached by a passion which he felt to be degrading, yet which he could not overcome. The woman yielded herself to the younger admirer, who was socially Shakespeare's superior. Hence an alienation between the friends, but in the close all wrongs were forgotten. Many attempts have been made to identify the persons of Mr W. H. and the dark woman; and most conjectures identify the former either with William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, or with Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and the lady with Mary Fitton, a mistress of Pembroke.

After 1600 Shakespeare still writes comedy, but the gaiety of the earlier comedies is gone. All's Well that Ends Well (c. 1601-2) is least happy in its mirthful scenes. Measure for Measure (c. 1603) hardly deserves the name of comedy; it is a searching of the mystery of self-deceit in the heart of a man and the exhibition of an ideal of virginal chastity. Perhaps it is to this date (1603) that Troilus and Cressida belongs, in which certain passages are probably by another hand than Shakespeare's. Before he ceased for a time to write comedy Shakespeare seems to have begun the next great series of tragedies. Julius Caesar (1601) and Hamlet (1602) are tragedies in which reflection, as a motive-power, holds its own with emotion. Hamlet is perhaps founded on an older play, which produced a great impression about 1588-89. Shakespeare doubtless read the story, originally derived from Saxo Grammaticus, in the English prose of the Historie of Hamlet translated from the French of Belleforest. And now tragedy succeeded tragedy, each of surpassing greatness. Othello (c. 1604), founded on a tale in Cinthio's Hecatommithi, exhibits a free and noble nature taken in the toils of jealousy, and perishing in the struggle for deliverance. King Lear (1605), the story of which is derived from an old play on the same subject as well as from Holinshed's Chronicle, is the most stupendous tragedy in our literature. Macbeth (c. 1606) is the tragedy of criminal ambition—the source again Holinshed. In Antony and Cleopatra (1607) Roman manhood is sapped by the sensual witchery of the East. From Plutarch also came the material for Coriolanus (c. 1608). Timon of Athens (c. 1607-8) is only in part by Shakespeare.

The last plays of Shakespeare are comedies; but they might be aptly named romances, for romantic beauty presides over them rather than mirth. Pericles (1608), or rather Shakespeare's part of that play, might better be named the romance of Marina, the lost daughter of Pericles. Cymbeline (1609) is also a tale of lost children at length recovered, and of a wife separated from her husband but finally reunited to him. The Tempest may have been written in 1610; it is believed that a German play by Jacob Ayrrer and The Tempest must have had some common original. The Winter's Tale (1610-11) dramatises a novel by Robert Greene. Apart from the other historical English plays both in subject and in date stands King Henry VIII. (1612-13). The play is certainly in part by Fletcher. It lacks unity; but there is no lack of unity in the king, Wolsey, and Queen Katharine. Whether we have work by Shakespeare in another play partly written by Fletcher—The Two Noble Kinsmen—is more doubtful. In parts of Edward III. some critics believe that they can trace the handiwork of Shakespeare.

At what date Shakespeare ceased to appear on the stage as an actor we cannot certainly say. In 1607 his elder daughter, Susanna, married a physician of Stratford, John Hall, M.A. He sold his shares in the Globe Theatre probably between 1611 and 1613, but while residing chiefly at Stratford seems to have desired a town residence, for in 1613 he bought a house near the Blackfriars Theatre. 'The latter part of his life,' says Rowe, 'was spent, as all men of sense may wish theirs may be, in ease, retirement, and the conversation of his friends.' In February 1616 his younger daughter, Judith, married Thomas Quiney, a vintner of Stratford. Elizabeth Hall, Shakespeare's first-born grandchild, was twice married, but died without issue in 1670, the last descendant of the poet. In March 1616 Shakespeare fell seriously ill; according to a tradition the illness was a fever contracted after a merry meeting with Drayton and Ben Jonson. On April 23, 1616, which is supposed to be also his birthday, he died; and he was buried in the chancel of the parish church. During the life of Shakespeare's widow—who died August 6, 1623—a portrait bust was erected in the church, sculptured by the Dutchman Gerard Johnson (Geraert Janssen). Besides this somewhat rude portrait, we possess a portrait-print by Dreshout (q.v.) prefixed to the first folio edition of Shakespeare's works (1623), an ill-executed engraving. These are the only certain portraits. A death-mask, known as the Kesselstadt death-mask, presenting a remarkable and noble face, may possibly be genuine. Of many alleged painted portraits that known as the Chandos portrait has found perhaps the widest acceptance. During his life from 1597 onwards several of Shakespeare's plays were printed in quarto (see Halliwell-Phillipps's Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare, vol. i., 'Lifetime editions'). After his death the first collected edition appeared in 1623, in folio, under the superintendence of his fellow-actors Heninge and Condell; reprinted in 1632 (second folio), and again in 1663-64 (third folio) and 1685 (fourth folio). The first critical edition of the plays is that by Nicholas Rowe (1709). In 1725 appeared Pope's edition; some of his critical emendations are happy, and his preface contains admirable remarks on the Shakespearian drama. Theobald, whose edition appeared in 1733, was a better scholar than Pope, and very materially improved the text of his author. Hammer in the 'Oxford Edition' (1744), and Warburton in his edition (1747), based on Pope's, made small advance on their predecessors. The edition of Johnson (1765) is chiefly remarkable for its masterly preface. In 1766 Steevens reprinted twenty of the early quartos, and from 1773 onwards Johnson's editorial work was ably supplemented by that of Steevens. Capell's edition (1768) is the work of a true and laborious scholar. Much was done by Malone to ascertain the chronological order of the plays and to illustrate the history of the English theatre. In 1780 he edited the poems of Shakespeare and the doubtful plays of the 1664 folio. His edition of Shakespeare's works followed in 1790. Variorum editions, embodying the work of Johnson, Steevens, and Malone, appeared under the editorship of Reed in 1803 and 1813, and of James Boswell (the younger) in 1821. The criticism of Coleridge, and in a less degree that of Lamb and of Hazlitt, opened up new and better ways. Among valuable editions may be mentioned those of Singer, Knight, Collier, Dyce, Staunton, Halliwell, and the Cambridge Shakespeare by W. Aldis Wright, the editions of Delius, Grant White, Hudson, Rolfe, and Appleton Morgan (Bankside edition), with the magnificent Variorum edition of certain plays by Furness. Of French translations the best are those of Victor Hugo fils (1859-62) and Montégut (1868-73); of German, those by Wieland (in prose, 1762-66), Schlegel and Tieck (q.v., 1797-1833; new ed. by Brandl, 1896), Dingelstedt (1865-70), and Bodenstedt (1866-72; 4th ed. 1887).

Shamyl (i.e. Samuel), leader of the tribes in the Caucasus in their thirty years' struggle against Russia, was born in 1797, became a Sufi mollah or priest, and laboured to compose tribal feuds. He was one of the foremost in the defence of Hinry against the Russians in 1831, in 1834 was chosen head of the Lesghians, and by abandoning open warfare for surprises, ambushes, &c., secured numerous successes for the mountaineers. In 1839, and again in 1849, he escaped from the stronghold of Achulgo after the Russians had made themselves masters of it, to continue preaching a holy war against the infidels. The Russians were completely baffled, their armies sometimes disastrously beaten, though Shamyl began to lose ground. During the Crimean war the allies supplied him with money and arms, but after peace was signed the Russians compelled the submission of the Caucasus. On April 12, 1859, Shamyl's chief stronghold, Weden, was taken. For several months he was hunted from fastness to fastness, till in 1859 he was surprised, and after a desperate resistance captured. He was pensioned at Kaluga in the middle of Russia, but removed to Kieff in 1868 and to Mecca in 1870. He died at Medina in March 1871.

Sharp, ABRAHAM (1653-1742), mechanist and astronomer, born at Little Horton, Bradford, became a schoolmaster, acquired mathematics, was a bookkeeper in London, in 1684-91 assisted Flamsteed at Greenwich Observatory in constructing the large mural arc, &c., and in 1694 returned to his birthplace. He published tables of logarithms and Geometry Improved (1717). See Life by Cudworth (1889).

Sharp, GRANVILLE (1735-1813), born at Durham, ninth son of the Archdeacon of Northumberland, was apprenticed to a London linen-draper, in 1758 got a post in the Ordnance department, but resigned in 1776 through sympathy with America. He wrote sixty-one pamphlets, &c., on philological, legal, political, and theological subjects; but his principal labours were in defence of the negro. He defended the negro James Sommerset or Somerset, securing the decision (1772) that whenever a slave touches English soil he becomes free; and with Clarkson founded the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery. See Life by Hoare (1820) and a smaller one by Stuart (1836).

Sharp, JAMES, Archbishop of St Andrews, born at Banff, 4th May 1618, studied for the church at King's College, Aberdeen (1633-37). In 1643 he was appointed 'regent' of philosophy at St Andrews, and in 1648 minister of Craik. In 1651-52 he was carried off to London with several other ministers; in 1657 he was chosen by the more moderate party in the church to plead their cause before Cromwell. Sent by Monk to Breda, he had several interviews with Charles II. (1660). His correspondence for some months after his return from Holland is full of apprehensions of Prelacy; but its perfidy stands revealed in his letter of 21st May 1661 to Middleton, which proves that he was then in hearty co-operation with Clarendon and the English bishops for the re-establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland. The bribe was a great one, for in December he was consecrated Archbishop of St Andrews. The dexterous tool of Middleton or Lauderdale, an oppressor of those he had betrayed, he soon became an object of detestation to the populace and of contempt to his employers. On 3d May 1679 twelve Covenanters (see JOHN BALFOUR and HACKSTON) fell in with him on Magus Moor, dragged him from his coach, and put him to death. See Airy, Lauderdale Papers (1884).

Sharp, RICHARD (1759-1834), 'Conversation Sharp, a London hat manufacturer, Whig M.P., F.R.S., and versifier, was born in Newfoundland.

Sharp, WILLIAM (1749-1824), engraver, republican, and Southcottian enthusiast, was born and died in London. See Life by W. S. Baker (1875).

Sharp, WILLIAM (1855-1905), born at Paisley, settled in London 1879, and published Earth's Voices, Sospiri di Roma, Sospiri d'Italia, and other volumes of verse, half-a-dozen novels, and books on Rossetti, Shelley, Heine, Sainte Beuve, and Philip Bourke Marston. But he will chiefly be remembered as the author of the remarkable series of Celtic—or Neo-Celtic—tales and romances by 'Fiona Macleod'—a pseudonym he systematically refused to the last to acknowledge. These began in 1894 with Pharais; followed by The Mountain Lovers and The Sin-Eater (1895), The Washer of the Ford and Green Fire (1896), The Laughter of Peterkin (1897), The Dominion of Dreams (1899), The Divine Adventure (1900), Drostan and Iseult (1902), The Silence of Amor, By Sunlit Shores, and Wind and Wave (1902), The House of Usnia and Deirdré (1903), The Winged Destiny (1904), &c. See memoir (1910) by his wife.

Sharpe, CHARLES KIRKPATRICK (1781-1851), born at Hoddam Castle, Dumfriesshire, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, collected at Edinburgh pictures and curios, was a clever versifier and draughtsman, contributed two original ballads to Scott's Minstrelsy, and edited club-books, but is chiefly remembered by his correspondence (2 vols. 1858). See Memoirs prefixed thereto and to his Etchings and Prose Fragments (1869), and a third in Napier's Memoirs of Montrose (4th ed. 1856).

Sharpe, SAMUEL (1799-1881), biblical scholar, a nephew of Rogers the poet, in whose bank he worked till sixty, wrote on ancient Egypt and scriptural subjects. See Life by Clayden (1883).

Shaw, SIR EYRE MASSEY, K.C.B., was chief of the London Fire Brigade 1861-91.

Shaw, GEORGE BERNARD, a brilliant journalist, unconventional and irresponsible critic, original but paradoxical playwright, Fabian and unorthodox socialist, was born at Dublin in 1856, and came to London in 1876. The best known of several novels is Cashel Byron's Profession, with a boxer for hero. In 1892 appeared the first of his clever plays, Widowers' Houses, followed by Arms and the Man and Candida, in a collection which (1898) was called Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant. Three Plays for Puritans (1900), Man and Superman (1903), Major Barbara (1905), are amongst the others.

Shaw, HENRY WHEELER. See BILLINGS, JOSH.

Shaw, JACK (1780-1815), the life-guardsmen, was a pugilist of herculean strength, who fell at Waterloo, first killing ten cuirassiers.

Shaw, RICHARD NORMAN, London domestic architect, was born in Edinburgh, 7th May 1831, and was elected an R.A. in 1877.

Shaw, ROBERT BARKLEY (1839-79), born in London, and educated at Marlborough and Trinity, Cambridge, visited Yarkand and Kashgar 1868-69, and was British resident at Mandalay 1878-79.

Shaw-Lefevre, GEORGE JOHN, created first Baron Eversley in 1906, was born in 1822, the son of a government official, Sir John George Shaw-Lefevre (1797-1879). Educated at Eton and Trinity, Cambridge, he was Liberal M.P. for Reading 1863-85 and Central Bradford 1886-95, First Commissioner of Works 1881-83 and 1892-94, and Postmaster-general 1883-84. Sixpenny telegrams were introduced by him.

Shee, SIR MARTIN ARCHER (1769-1850), portrait-painter, born in Dublin, in 1788 settled in London, and became R.A. in 1800 and P.R.A. in 1830, when he was knighted. He wrote poems, a novel, a play, &c. See Life by his son (1860).

Sheepshanks, JOHN (1787-1863), art-patron, born at Leeds, succeeded to his father's extensive cloth manufacture, and devoted himself to collecting the works of modern British artists. These (223 oil-pictures and 103 drawings) in 1857 he presented to the nation, and they are now at South Kensington.—His brother, the Rev. RICHARD SHEEPSHANKS (1794-1855), was an astronomer.

Sheffield, JOHN, DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM (1684-1721), succeeded his father as third Earl of Mulgrave in 1658, served in both navy and army, and was Lord Chamberlain to James II. and a Cabinet-councillor under William III., who in 1694 made him Marquis of Normanby. Anne made him Duke of (the county of) Buckingham (1703); but for his opposition to Godolphin and Marlborough he was deprived of the Seal (1705). After 1710, under the Tories, he was Lord Steward and Lord President till the death of Anne, when he lost all power, and intruded for the restoration of the Stuarts. He wrote two tragedies, a metrical Essay on Satire, an Essay on Poetry, &c.

Sheffield, JOHN BAKER HOLROYD, EARL OF (1735-1821), born in Ireland, in 1769 bought Sheffield Place in Sussex, and in 1781 was created Baron Sheffield, in 1816 Earl. Known chiefly as the friend of Gibbon (q.v.) and editor of his miscellaneous works, he wrote pamphlets on the slave-trade, corn laws, navigation laws, &c. His elder daughter (1771-1863) married Lord Stanley of Alderley in 1796. See Adeane's Girlhood of Maria Josepha Holroyd (1896).

Sheil, RICHARD LALOR, born at Drumdowney, Kilkenny, 17th August 1791, son of a retired Cadiz merchant, from Stonyhurst passed in 1807 to Trinity College, Dublin, graduated B.A. in 1811, and entered Lincoln's Inn the same year. He was called to the Irish bar in 1814. He wrote a series of plays (mostly successful): Adelaide, or The Emigrants (1814); The Apostate (1817); Bellamira (1818); Evadne, partly based on Shirley's Traitor (1819); The Huguenot (1819); Montoni (1820); and an adaptation of Massinger's Forgotten Dowry (1824). His Sketches of the Irish Bar (1855; written with the younger Curran) appeared during 1822 in the New Monthly Magazine. In 1823 Sheil joined O'Connell's Catholic Association, aided his chief in forming the New Catholic Association (1825), and supported the cause by impassioned speeches which are masterpieces of oratory. He was M.P. for Milborne Port, Louth, Tipperary, and Dungarvan. After the defeat of Kepeal in 1834 he mostly supported the Whigs, and in 1838 received a commissionership of Greenwich Hospital. In 1839 under Melbourne he became Vice-president of the Board of Trade, and a Privy-councillor—the first Catholic to gain that honour. Under Russell in 1846 he was appointed Master of the Mint, and in 1850 British minister at Florence. Here he died 23d May 1851. See Memoir by McCullagh (1855) and his Speeches (1845-55).

Shelburne, WILLIAM PETTY, EARL OF, great-grandson of Sir William Petty (q.v.), was born in Dublin, 20th May 1737, and studied at Christ Church, Oxford. He served in the army, sat for High Wycombe, succeeded his father as second earl in 1761, and in 1763 was appointed President of the Board of Trade, and in Chatham's second administration (1766) a Secretary of State. Upon the fall of Lord North's ministry in 1782 Shelburne declined to form a government, but became Secretary of State under Rockingham. Upon Rockingham's death the same year the king offered Shelburne the Treasury. Fox resigned, and Shelburne introduced William Pitt into office as his Chancellor of the Exchequer. This ministry resigned when outvoted by the coalition between Fox and North (Feb. 1783). Shelburne was in 1784 made Marquis of Lansdowne, and at Lansdowne House and Bowood, Wilts, he collected a splendid gallery of pictures and a fine library. He died 7th May 1805. See Life by his great-grandson, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice (1875-76).

Sheldon, GILBERT (1598-1677), chaplain to Charles I., warden of All Souls College, Oxford, and from 1663 Archbishop of Canterbury, built the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford.

Shelley, PERCY BYSSHE, was born 4th August 1792, at Field Place near Horsham, Sussex. Bysshe Shelley (1781-1815), his grandfather, married two heiresses, acquired a great property, and in 1806 received a baronetcy. Percy was a boy of much sensibility, quick imagination, generous heart, and a refined type of beauty, blue-eyed, golden-haired. At ten he became a pupil at Sion House

School, Islesworth, where he made some progress in classics, listened with delight to lectures on natural science, and endured much rough handling from his schoolfellows. In 1804 he passed to Eton, where he read eagerly Lucretius and Pliny, became a disciple of the 18th-century sceptical and revolutionary writers, and wrote two crude romances, Zastrozzi (1808) and St Irvyne, or the Rosicrucian (1810). He assisted his cousin Thomas Medwin in a poem on The Wandering Jew (1810), and issued a long-lost booklet, Original Poetry by Victor and Cazire (1810; ed. by Garnett, 1898)—his collaborator his sister Elizabeth, and not his cousin Harriet Grove, whom he loved with a boy's passion. Her parents, alarmed by his scepticism, put a stop to their correspondence. In 1810 Shelley entered University College, Oxford. His chief friend, Thomas Jefferson Hogg (1792-1862), afterwards a barrister, has left a vivid account of Shelley's Oxford life. He aided Shelley in a slender volume of poems, retouched with a view to burlesque—Posthumous Fragments of Margaret Nicholson (q.v.). In 1811 Shelley issued a pamphlet, The Necessity of Atheism; the college authorities interfered, and both he and Hogg were expelled. For a time the friends lived together in London; then Hogg departed, and Shelley, left alone, found pleasure in the society of his sisters' schoolfellow, Harriet Westbrook, a pretty girl of sixteen, daughter of a retired coffee-house keeper. In summer Shelley was in Wales; letters reached him from Harriet complaining of domestic persecution and speaking of suicide, and another in which she threw herself on Shelley's protection. Shelley hastened to see her; she avowed her passion; and, taking coach for Edinburgh, they were married on 28th August 1811. By York they came to Keswick. Here Southey's lack of revolutionary ardour and indifference to metaphysical speculation displeased Shelley, who now corresponded with Godwin. To apply his ideas of reforming the world he visited Ireland, and on reaching Dublin printed an Address to the Irish People. He spoke at a large public meeting with O'Connell, and made the acquaintance of Curran, but was discouraged by the small results of his efforts. In 1812 he settled at Lynnmouth, where he wrote a pamphlet on behalf of liberty of printing, and was at work on his Queen Mab. His servant, having been found posting up at Barnstaple a revolutionary broadsheet, was imprisoned. Shelley crossed to Wales, and took up his abode at Tremadoc. In October he made Godwin's personal acquaintance. In 1813 he was established in London, where in June his wife gave birth to a daughter (Ianthe, married to Mr Esdalle, died 1876). Queen Mab—rhetorical, revolutionary, anti-religious—was printed for private distribution. In March 1814 he went through the ceremony of marriage with Harriet according to the rites of the English Church. Four months later they had separated for ever, and Harriet withdrew to Bath. It was stated by Miss Clairmont, daughter of Godwin's second wife, that Shelley declared in July 1814 that Harriet had yielded to a Major Ryan, and Godwin in 1817 stated in writing that he had evidence of her unfaithfulness; but no such evidence is in our possession to-day.

Shelley had become enamoured of Godwin's daughter, Mary, a girl of fine intellect and vigorous character; with her he went on a tour in Switzerland in 1814. In January 1815 his grandfather died, and by arrangement with his father Shelley obtained an income of a thousand a-year. In the autumn of 1815 Alastor, his first really admirable poem, was written. In January 1816 Mary gave birth to a son (William), and in May they travelled to Geneva accompanied by Claire Clairmont, whose intrigue with Byron was unknown to them. On the shores of the Lake of Geneva Byron and Shelley met; and in Mont Blanc and the Hymn to Intellectual Beauty we find a poetic record of the event. The suicide of Fanny, half-sister of Mary (see GODWIN, WILLIAM), gave Shelley a great shock; and Harriet, who had formed a connection with one who deserted her, was on 10th December found drowned in the Serpentine. Shelley now married Mary (30th December 1816). A long Chancery suit followed, Shelley seeking to obtain possession of his daughter Ianthe and his son Charles (1814-26), the Westbrooks resisting. Lord Eldon decided that Shelley's opinions disqualified him for bringing up his children, but he might appoint tutors to be approved by the court. Ere this Shelley had written fragments of his Prince Athanase, a portion of Rosalind and Helen, and his long narrative poem Laon and Cythna. When a few copies of the last had been issued the publisher withdrew it, and induced Shelley to alter certain lines and phrases; thus revised it was issued as The Revolt of Islam.

In the spring of 1818 there were serious fears of pulmonary disease, and in April 1818, with Mary, little William, an infant daughter Clara, Miss Clairmont and her child Allegra (Byron's daughter), Shelley left for Italy. In 1818 he completed Rosalind and Helen and translated Plato's Symposium. Little Clara died in September at Venice, where Shelley had renewed companionship with Byron. Memorials of this visit to Venice will be found in the admirable poem Julian and Maddalo. The first act of his great lyrical drama Prometheus Unbound was written at Este, September-October 1818. Seeking a warmer climate for the winter, he journeyed to Rome, and thence to Naples. His letters descriptive of Southern Italy are full of beauty. In the spring (1819) he was again in Rome, where he wrote the second and third acts of Prometheus. In June 1819 Shelley's son William died at Rome. The afflicted parents visited friends near Leghorn, and here Shelley wrote most of his tragedy The Cenci. The other works of this year were written at Florence—the prose Philosophical View of Reform; The Mask of Anarchy, a poetical appeal on the 'Peterloo' affair; a satire on Wordsworth—Peter Bell the Third; a translation of The Cyclops of Euripides; and some of his noblest lyrical poems, among them the Ode to the West Wind. On 12th November a son was born, Sir Percy Florence Shelley (1819-89). In January 1820 the Shelley household moved to Pisa. The charming poetical Letter to Maria Gisborne, a spirited translation of the Homeric Hymn to Mercury, the brilliant fantasy of The Witch of Atlas, the satirical drama Edipus Tyrannus, or Swellfoot the Tyrant, which deals with the affair of Queen Caroline, are the chief writings of 1820. The Epipsychidion, rather a homage to ideal womanhood than a poem addressed to an individual woman, was followed by the critical study entitled A Defence of Poetry. The elegy Adonais, suggested by the death of Keats, is Shelley's most finished piece of art. In the autumn of 1821 he composed his lyrical drama Hellas. Next year Byron and Trelawny (q.v.) were in Pisa. Shelley worked at his unfinished historical drama Charles I. His last great poem, also unfinished, The Triumph of Life, was written in a lonely house on the Bay of Spezzia. In June Shelley heard of the arrival in Italy of Leigh Hunt, and he and his friend Williams set sail for Leghorn. The meeting with Hunt was full of joy and hope. On Monday, 8th July 1822, Shelley and Williams left Leghorn, and the schooner was lost in a sudden storm. The bodies, washed up near Viareggio (19th July), were consumed by fire in the presence of Trelawny, Leigh Hunt, and Byron. The ashes of Shelley were placed in a casket and interred in the Protestant burial-ground at Rome.

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT SHELLEY, daughter of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft, was born August 30, 1797. Her life from 1814 to 1822 was bound up with that of Shelley. Her first and most impressive novel was Frankenstein (1818), her second Valperga (1823). In 1823 she returned to England with her son. Her husband's father, in granting her an allowance, insisted on the suppression of the volume of Shelley's Posthumous Poems, edited by her. The Last Man (1826), a romance of the ruin of human society by pestilence, fails to attain sublimity. In Lodore (1835) we read the story of Shelley's alienation from his first wife. Her last novel, Falkner, appeared in 1837. Of her occasional pieces of verse the most remarkable is The Choice. She wrote also many of the lives of Italian and Spanish literary men in Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopaedia. Her Journal of a Six Weeks' Tour (partly by Shelley) tells of the excursion to Switzerland in 1814; Rambles in Germany and Italy (1844) describes tours in 1840-43; her Tales were collected by Dr Garnett in 1890. She died February 21, 1851.

Shelley's works were edited by Harry Buxton Forman (4 vols. 1876-80); the poems by Forman (1892-93), W. M. Rossetti (3 vols. 1878; new ed. 1894), Dowden (1891), Woodberry (Boston, 1892), Hutchinson (1904); Shepherd collected his Prose Works (1888). See Lives by Prof. Dowden (1886; new ed. 1896), Medwin (1847), Hogg (1859), D. F. MacCarthy (Early Life, 1872), J. A. Symonds (1878; 2d ed. 1887), J. C. Jeaffreson (1885), W. M. Rossetti (1886), and W. Sharp (1887); Memorials from Authentic Sources, by Shelley's daughter-in-law, Lady Shelley (1859; new ed. 1876); Dr Garnett's selection from Shelley's Letters (1882); Elton's Shelley in France, Switzerland, and Savoy (1894); Mr Forman's Shelley Bibliography (1882); and the Lives of Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley by Mrs Julian Marshall (1889) and Mrs W. M. Rossetti (1890). An admirable Lexical Concordance to Shelley's poems is by Mr F. S. Ellis (1892).

Shelton, THOMAS. See CERVANTES.

Shenstone, WILLIAM (1714-63), born at the Leasowes, Hales Owen, Worcestershire, studied at Pembroke College, Oxford, in 1737 published anonymously Poems upon various Occasions, in 1741 The Judgment of Hercules, and next year The Schoolmistress. In 1745 he succeeded his father in the Leasowes. His success in beautifying his little domain attracted visitors from all quarters, and brought him more fame than his poetry, but involved him in pecuniary embarrassments. The Schoolmistress has secured for him a permanent if humble place among English poets. His other works are mostly insignificant; but his Pastoral Ballad has touches of exquisite tenderness. See Life by Dr Johnson prefixed to Shenstone's Essays on Men and Manners (new ed. 1865), and that by G. Giffillan to an edition of his Poems (1854).

Shepherd, RICHARD HERNE (1842-95), biographer of Tennyson, Thackeray, Dickens, Ruskin, Lamb, Carlyle, Swinburne, and Coleridge, was born at Chelsea.

Sheppard, JACK (1702-24), born at Stepney, a carpenter's son, himself at twelve was apprenticed to a carpenter. Falling into bad company, in July 1720 he committed the first of many robberies. In 1724 he was four times caught, but as often escaped, on his third evasion from Newgate forcing six great doors. The fifth time luck deserted him, and he was hanged at Tyburn in the presence of 200,000 spectators.

Shepstone, SIR THEOPHILUS (1817-93), administrator of the Transvaal 1877-79, became Kaffir interpreter in 1835, and a K.C.M.G. in 1876.

Sherard, or SHERWOOD, THOMAS (1659-1728), botanist, born at Bushby, Leicester, became consul at Smyrna in 1702.

Sheraton, THOMAS (1751-1806), cabinet-maker, wrote a Cabinet-maker's Book (1794; reprinted 1896).

Sherbrooke, ROBERT LOWE, VISCOUNT, born at Bingham rectory, Notts, 4th December 1811, from Winchester passed in 1829 to University College, Oxford. Called to the bar in 1842, he emigrated the same year to Australia, and soon attained a lucrative practice at the Sydney bar; he also took a leading part in the political life of the colony. Home again in 1850, and returned in 1852 for Kidderminster, he took office under Lord Aberdeen, as in 1855 under Lord Palmerston. In 1859 he was returned for Calne; and he represented London University from 1858. During 1859-64 he was vice-president of the Education Board, and introduced the Revised Code of 1862 with its 'payment by results.' Having helped to defeat the Whig Reform Bill in 1866, he was, with other 'Adullamites,' offered a post in the Derby government, but declined it. In 1863 his feud with the Liberals was forgotten in his strenuous aid towards disestablishing the Irish Church. Accordingly Mr Gladstone made him Chancellor of the Exchequer. His proposal to tax matches was very unpopular; but the annual surpluses were large almost beyond example. In 1873 he became Home Secretary; in 1880 went to the Upper House as Viscount Sherbrooke. He opposed the exclusive study of the classics. He published Poems of a Life in 1884, and died at Warringham, Surrey, 27th July 1892. See Life by A. Patchett Martin (1893).

Shere Ali (1825-79), a younger son of Dost Mohammed, succeeded as Ameer of Afghanistan in 1863. Disagreements with his half-brothers soon arose, which kept Afghanistan in anarchy; Shere Ali fled to Kandahar; but in 1868 regained possession of Kabul, with assistance from the Viceroy of India, Sir John Lawrence. In 1870 his eldest son, Yakub Khan, broke into rebellion, but was captured and imprisoned. Shere Ali's refusal to receive a British mission (1878) led to war; and, after severe fighting, he fled to Turkestan, there to die. Yakub Khan succeeded.

Sheridan, PHILIP HENRY, born in Albany, N.Y., March 6, 1831, of Irish parentage, in 1848 entered West Point, and graduated in 1853. In 1861 he was an infantry captain, but in 1862 was given a cavalry regiment, and did such excellent work that he was promoted to a division of the Army of the Ohio. At Perryville and at Stone River (Murfreesboro') he performed brilliant services. He fought at Chickamauga, and was engaged in all the subsequent operations, gaining credit for the gallantry with which his division drove the enemy over Missionary Ridge. In 1864 he was given command of the cavalry of the Army of the Potomac, took part in the Battle of the Wilderness, made a notable raid on Confederate communications with Richmond, and led the advance to Cold Harbour. In August Grant placed him in command of the Army of the Shenandoah. In September he attacked the enemy under Early, drove him beyond Winchester, again dislodged him from Fisher's Hill, and pursued him through Harrisonburg and Staunton. These battles made him a brigadier-general. But Early, reinforced by Lee, again appeared in the Shenandoah Valley, and on October 19 surprised the Northern army and drove it back in confusion. Sheridan was at Winchester, twenty miles away. Hearing the guns, he galloped to the field; and defeat was converted into victory. For Winchester he was promoted major-general and received the thanks of congress. He had an active share in the final battles which led to Lee's surrender at Appomattox Court-house, April 9, 1865. In 1870, now lieutenant-general, he was with Moltke at Gravelotte and other battles. In 1883 he succeeded Sherman as general-in-chief. He died at Nonquitt, Mass., August 5, 1888. Sheridan never lost a battle. Among the Northern generals he ranks next to Grant and Sherman. See his Personal Memoirs (1888) and Life by Davies (1895).

Sheridan, RICHARD BRINSLEY BUTLER, born in Dublin, 30th Oct. 1751, was the grandson of Swift's friend, Thomas Sheridan, D.D. (1687-1738), and the second son of Thomas Sheridan (1719-88), a teacher of elocution and author of a Life of Swift. His mother, Frances Sheridan, née Chamberlaine (1724-66), was the author of a novel called Sidney Biddulph and of one or two plays. Richard Sheridan was educated at Harrow, and, after leaving school, with a school-friend named Halhed wrote a three-act farce called Jupiter and tried a verse translation of the Epistles of Aristænetus. In 1771 the Sheridans removed to Bath, where they made acquaintance with the family of Linley the composer, and, after a romantic courtship, Richard married Elizabeth Linley in 1773. The young couple settled in London to a life much beyond their means. Sheridan now made more serious efforts at dramatic composition. On 17th January 1775 the Rivals was produced at Covent Garden, and after a slight alteration in the cast met with universal approval. In the same year appeared the poor farce called St Patrick's Day and also the Duenna. In 1776 Sheridan, with the aid of Linley and another friend, bought half the patent of Drury Lane Theatre for £35,000 from Garrick, and in 1778 the remaining share for £45,000. His first production was a purified edition of Vanbrugh's Relapse, under the title of a Trip to Scarborough, while three months later appeared his greatest work, the School for Scandal. The Critic (1779), teeming with sparkling wit, was Sheridan's last dramatic effort, with the exception of a poor tragedy, Pizarro. On the dissolution of parliament in 1780 Sheridan was elected for Stafford, and in 1782 became Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs under Rockingham, afterwards Secretary to the Treasury in the coalition ministry (1783). His parliamentary reputation dates from his great speeches in the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1794 he again electrified the House by a magnificent oration in reply to Lord Mornington's denunciation of the French Revolution. He remained the devoted friend and adherent of Fox till Fox's death, and was also the defender and mouthpiece of the Prince Regent. In 1806 he was appointed Receiver of the Duchy of Cornwall, and in 1806 treasurer of the navy. In 1812 he was defeated at Westminster, and his parliamentary career came to an end. In 1792 his first wife died, and three years later he married a Miss Ogle, the silly and extravagant daughter of the Dean of Winchester, who survived him. The affairs of the theatre had gone badly. The old building had to be closed as unfit to hold large audiences, and a new one, opened in 1794, was burned in 1809. This last calamity put the finishing touch to Sheridan's pecuniary difficulties, which had long been serious. He died 7th July 1816 in great poverty, but was given a magnificent funeral in Westminster Abbey. Sichel (2 vols. 1909); the editions of the works by Fraser Rae (1902) and of the major dramas by Nettleton (1907); also the articles DUFFERIN and NORTON.

Sheriff, LAWRENCE, a London grocer, founder in 1567 of the great public school, Rugby.

Sherlock, WILLIAM (1641-1707), born at Southwark, and educated at Eton and Peterhouse, Cambridge, became a London rector in 1669, a prebendary of St Paul's in 1681, Master of the Temple in 1684, and Dean of St Paul's in 1691. He wrote about sixty works, mostly controversial. His Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation (1690) opened up a fierce controversy, South charging him with Tritheism; his Alliance to Sovereign Powers (1691) also excited debate.—His son, THOMAS SHERLOCK (1678-1761), in 1704 succeeded him as Master of the Temple. In 1715 he became Dean of Chichester, in 1728 Bishop of Bangor, in 1734 of Salisbury, and in 1748 of London. He was a strong Tory. Hughes edited his works (1890).

Sherman, WILLIAM TECUMSEH, U.S. general-in-chief, born at Lancaster, Ohio, Feb. 8, 1820, the son of a judge, graduated at West Point in 1840. After serving in Florida and California, and seeing no prospect of promotion, he resigned in 1853, became a banker in San Francisco, and when the civil war began was head of the Louisiana Military Academy. In May 1861 he was commissioned colonel of the Thirtieth Infantry; at Bull Run he won his promotion to brigadier-general of volunteers. In August he was sent to Kentucky, but when he asked for 200,000 men to put an end to the war there, the authorities looked on his demand as wildly extravagant, and deprived him of his command. But soon in command of a division, he took a distinguished part in the battle of Shiloh (April 1862) and was made major-general. In Grant's various movements against Vicksburg Sherman was most active. In July 1863, now a brigadier in the regular army, he drove General J. E. Johnston out of Jackson, Miss. In November he joined Grant at Chattanooga, and rendered excellent service in the victory of the 25th; soon after he relieved Burnside, besieged at Knoxville. In March 1864 he was appointed by Grant to the command of the south-west. In April he commenced his campaign against Atlanta. He first encountered Johnston at Dalton, May 14, and drove him beyond the Etowah, and finally to Atlanta, which was evacuated on 1st September. After giving his army a rest Sherman commenced his famous march to the sea, with 65,000 men. Meeting with little serious opposition, he reached Savannah on Dec. 10. The works were soon carried, and on the 20th the city was evacuated. For his great services, now major-general, he received the thanks of congress. In February he left Savannah for the north, and by the 17th, compelling the evacuation of Charleston, had reached Columbia. Thence he moved on Goldsboro', fighting by the way two battles, and aiming either to cut off Lee's retreat or to join Grant before Richmond. But on April 9 Lee surrendered, and Johnston made terms with Sherman (disapproved as too lenient by Secretary Stanton). For four years Sherman commanded the Mississippi division; when Grant became president he was made head of the army. In 1874, at his own request, to make room for Sheridan, he was retired on full pay. He died in New York, February 14, 1891. Of many Lives of him the most valuable is his own Memoirs (1875; revised editions in 1885 and 1891).

JOHN SHERMAN, a brother, born 10th May 1823, was for a time attached to a corps of engineers, and then studied law with his brother Charles, whose partner he became in 1844. In 1855-61 he sat in congress, from 1859 as chairman of the committee of ways and means; and in the senate (1861-77) he was long chairman of the committee on finance. He was largely author of the bills for the reconstruction of the seceded states and for the resumption of specie payment in 1879. He was appointed by Mr Hayes in 1877 Secretary of the Treasury, and in 1878 had prepared a redemption fund in gold that raised the legal-tender notes to par value. In 1881 and 1887 he was again returned to the senate, was for a while its president, and afterwards chairman of the committee on foreign relations. In 1880-84-88 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the Republican nomination for the presidency; in 1897 he was made Secretary of State by McKinley, but retired on the war with Spain in 1898. He died 22d October 1900. The Sherman Act (1890) sanctioning large purchases of silver by the Treasury was repealed in 1893. See Life by Bronson (2d ed. 1888), his Selected Speeches (1879), the Sherman Letters, correspondence between the brothers (1894), and John's Recollections of Forty Years (1896).

Sherwood, MARY MARTHA (1775-1851), daughter of Dr Butt, chaplain to George III., was born at Stanford, Worcestershire. In 1803 she married her cousin, Capt. Henry Sherwood, and sailed for India. Her husband died at Twickenham (1849); so did she. Of her seventy-seven works the least forgotten are the Little Woodman, Little Henry and his Bearer, and the Fairchild Family. See Lives by her daughter (1854) and Darton (1910).

Shield, WILLIAM (1748-1829), composer, born at Swalwell in Durham, was apprenticed to a boat-builder, but studied music, composed anthems that were sung in Durham cathedral, and ere long was a conductor at Scarborough. He published a comic opera, The Flitch of Bacon, in 1778, and, now composer to Covent Garden (1778-97), produced also Bosina (1783), The Poor Soldier (1784), The Woodman (1792), &c. His songs include 'The Heaving of the Lead,' 'The Arethusa,' 'The Thorn,' 'The Ploughboy,' and 'The Wolf.' In 1792 he travelled in Italy. From 1817 he was Master of the King's Musicians. See Memorial (1891).

Shilleto, RICHARD (1809-76), Greek scholar, educated at Shrewsbury and Trinity College, Cambridge, was second classic (1832), but married, so for five-and-thirty years gave his best energies to 'coaching.' In 1867 he was elected fellow of St Peter's College, but published only one book of his edition of Thucydides. In 1844 he had edited Demosthenes' De Falsa Legatione.

Shillibeer, GEORGE (1797-1866), ex-Paris coach-builder, in 1829 started the first London buses.

Shiple, ORBY, born at Twyford House, Hants, 1st July 1832, had for twenty-three years been a ritualistic clergyman, and had written much, when in 1878 he went over to Rome.

Shipton, MOTHER, born near Knaresborough in 1488, and baptised as Ursula Southiel, at twenty-four married Tony Shipton, a builder, and died at over seventy years of age—so S. Baker in editing her 'prophecies' (1797). A book (1684) by Richard Head tells how she was carried off by the devil, bore him an imp, &c. See W. H. Harrison's Mother Shipton Investigated (1881).

Shirley, JAMES, dramatist, born in London, September 18, 1596, from Merchant Taylors' passed in 1612 to St John's, Oxford, but migrated to Catharine Hall, Cambridge. He took orders, and held a living at St Albans. Turning Catholic, he taught (1623-24) in the grammar-school there, but soon went to London and became playwright. The suppression of stage-plays in 1642 ended his livelihood, and he took to teaching again. The Restoration revived his plays, but brought him no better fortunes. He was buried Oct. 29, 1666. Beaumont and Fletcher and Ben Jonson were his models, but he has little of the grand Elizabethan manner. Most of his plays are tragi-comedies, and his best work is ever the tragic and pathetic portions. His chief plays were Love Tricks (1625); The Maid's Revenge (1626); The Brothers (1626); The Witty Fair One (1628); The Wedding (1628); The Grateful Servant (1629); The Traitor, his strongest tragedy (1631); The Changes, or Love in a Maze (1632); The Bird in a Cage (1632); Hyde Park (1632); The Young Admiral (1633); The Gesteater (1633); The Example (1634); The Opportunity (1634); The Lady of Pleasure, the most brilliant of his comedies (1635); The Imposture (1640); and a tragedy, The Cardinal, to the author himself 'the best of his flock' (1641). In 1646 he printed a volume of his poems. As a writer of masques he is second only to Ben Jonson; among his best were The Triumph of Peace (1633) and The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses (1659), the latter including 'The glories of our blood and state.' His thirty-five plays were edited by Gifford and Dyce (1833); and there is a selection of five, with The Triumph of Peace, by E. W. Gosse (1885).

Shirley, LAWRENCE. See FERRERS.

Shore, JANE, born in London, married early William Shore, a goldsmith. After her intrigue with the king began, about 1470, her husband abandoned her, but she lived till Edward's death in luxury, enjoying great power, yet 'never abusing it,' as More tells us, 'to any man's hurt, but to many a man's comfort and relief.' After the king's death she lived under the protection of Hastings, and on his death, it is said, of the Marquis of Dorset; but Richard III., to make his brother's life odious, plundered her of over two thousand marks, and caused the Bishop of London to make her walk in open penance, taper in hand, dressed only in her kirtle. She died about 1527.

Shorter, CLEMENT KING, born in London of Hunts ancestry, 19th July 1858, was in Somerset House 1877-91, edited the Illustrated London News, 1891-1900, and the English Illustrated Magazine, founded and edited the Sketch, and from 1900 was editor of the Sphere. He has written books on the Brontës, on Victorian literature, and on Borrow,

He married in 1896 Dora Sigerson, author of Verses (1894), The Fairy Changeling (1897), &c.

Shorthouse, JOSEPH HENRY (1834-1903), born at Birmingham, became a chemical manufacturer there. In 1881 his romance, John Ingle-sant (privately printed the year before), carried his name over England; though defective in structure, it revealed a subtle and sympathetic insight into old-world phases of the spiritual mind. It was followed by The Little Schoolmaster Mark (1883-84), Sir Percival (1886), A Teacher of the Violin (1888), The Countess Eve (1888), and Blanche, Lady Falaise (1891). See his Life by his wife (1905).

Shovel, SIR CLOUDESLEY, admiral, baptised probably at Cley-next-the-Sea in Norfolk on 25th November 1650, got the best schooling the country schools afforded, and at about thirteen entered the navy as a gentleman volunteer. He served against the Dutch and in the Mediterranean, burned four corsair galleys at Tripoli (1676), commanded a ship at the battle in Bantry Bay (1689), and was knighted. In 1690 he took part in the battle off Beachy Head; in 1692 he supported Russell at La Hogue, and burned twenty of the enemy's ships. He served under Rooke in the Mediterranean. In 1705 he was made rear-admiral of England. That year he took part with Peterborough in the capture of Barcelona, but failed in his attack on Toulon in 1707; on the voyage home his ship struck a rock off the Scilly Isles on the foggy night of 22d October 1707, and went down with 800 men—the total loss to the squadron 2000. His body was washed up next day and buried in Westminster Abbey.

Shrapnel, LIEUTENANT-GENERAL HENRY (1761-1842), an artillery officer who about 1793 invented the shrapnel shell.

Shrewsbury. See TALBOT.

Shuckburgh-Evelyn, SIR GEORGE, Bart., F.R.S. (1751-1804), mathematician, a Warwickshire M.P.

Shuckford, SAMUEL, D.D. (d. 1754), a London rector, author in 1727 of a history of the world to the time of Joshua, known as The Connection.

Shute, JOHN. See BARRINGTON.

Sibbald, SIR ROBERT, born of Fife ancestry at Edinburgh, 15th April 1641, in 1662 became a physician there, but gave much time to botany and zoology. He was knighted in 1682 and appointed Scottish Geographer-royal, in 1686 was for a short time a convert to Catholicism, and died in August 1722. He wrote History of Fife (1710), pamphlets on medical subjects, natural history, and antiquities, and Autobiography (1833).

Sibbes, RICHARD (1577-1635), Puritan divine, born at Tostock, Suffolk, and educated at Bury and St John's, Cambridge, was elected a fellow in 1601, and was Trinity Lecturer 1610-15, when he was deprived. But he became preacher of Gray's Inn, in 1626 Master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and in 1633 vicar of Trinity Church. His Bruised Reed, Soul's Conflict, Bowels Opened, Returning Backslider, &c. are collected in Nichol's Puritan Divines, with a Life by Grosart (1862-64).

Sibley, HENRY HASTINGS (1811-91), American statesman, the 'Father of Minnesota,' was born at Detroit, and died at St Paul.

Sibour, MARIE DOMINIQUE AUGUSTE (1792-1857), from 1848 Archbishop of Paris, was murdered during mass by an excommunicated priest. See Life by Poujoulat (2d ed. 1863).

Sibthorp, JOHN (1758-96), succeeded his father as Oxford professor of Botany in 1784.

Sicard, ROCHAMBOISE CUCURRON (1742-1822), an abbé, born near Toulouse, who in 1789 succeeded the Abbé de l'Épée in the Deaf and Dumb Institute at Paris. See Life by Berthier (1873).

Sick'ingen, FRANZ VON, born 2d March 1481 at Ebernburg near Kreuznach, fought in 1508 against the Venetians for the Emperor Maximilian, but in peace led the life of a free-lance. During 1513-19 he warred against Worms, Metz, Philip of Hesse, and Württemberg. Ulrich von Hutten from 1520 was his constant guest, and won him over to the cause of the Reformation. In 1521 he assisted the emperor in his French campaign; in 1522 he opened a Protestant war against the Archbishop of Trèves. That war miscarried; and, put to the ban of the empire and besieged in his castle of Landstuhl, on 2d May 1523 he received a musket-shot, of which six days later he died. See works cited at HUTTEN, and monographs by Uhnann (1872), Bremer (1885), and Hill (1887).

Siddal, ELIZABETH ELEANOR. See ROSSETTI.

Siddons, SARAH, actress, was born at Brecon, 5th July 1755, the eldest child of Roger Kemble (q.v.), manager of a small travelling theatrical company, of which Sarah was a member from her earliest childhood. In 1773 she married at Coventry her fellow-actor, William Siddons. While she and her husband were playing at Cheltenham she was engaged by Garrick, and made her first appearance at Drury Lane in December 1775 as Portia, with no great success. At the end of the season she was not re-engaged, and for six years she played in the provinces. But there her reputation grew so fast that in 1782 she returned to Drury Lane, and made her reappearance in October as Isabella in Garrick's adaptation of Southerne's Fatal Marriage. Her success was immediate, and from this time she was the unquestioned queen of the stage. In 1803 she followed the fortunes of her brother, John Philip Kemble, to Covent Garden, where she continued till her formal farewell of the stage as Lady Macbeth, 29th June 1812. Thereafter she appeared occasionally, but only for charitable objects or special benefits, and she sometimes gave public readings. She died 8th June 1831, and was buried in Paddington Churchyard, where a statue of her was erected in 1897. Endowed with a gloriously expressive and beautiful face, a queenly figure, and a voice of richest power and flexibility, she worked assiduously to cultivate her gifts until as a tragic actress she reached a height of perfection probably unsurpassed by any player of any age or country. In comedy she was less successful. See Lives by Boaden (1827; new ed. 1893), Thomas Campbell (1834), Mrs Kennard (1886), and Mrs Parsons (1909).

Sidgwick, HENRY, born at Skipton, 31st May 1838, from Rugby passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, and was a fellow 1859-69, praetor of Moral Philosophy 1875-83, and then professor. His Methods of Ethics (1874; 5th ed. 1893) examines the points of resemblance between the intuitional and utilitarian schools. In 1886 he published Outlines of the History of Ethics, based on his Encyclopaedia Britannica articles; in 1883 Principles of Political Economy; in 1891 Elements of Politics; in 1898 Practical Research Ethics. An active member of the Psychological Research Society, he died 30th August 1900. See his Life (1906).

Sidmouth, HENRY ADDINGTON, VISCOUNT, the son of Lord Chatham's physician, Dr Anthony Addington (1718-90), was born in London, 30th May 1757. He was educated at Winchester and Brasenose College, Oxford, quitted the bar for politics, and in 1788 was returned for Devizes. He was Speaker 1789-1801, when, upon Pitt's resignation, he was invited to form a ministry. His undistinguished administration, whose one great event was the peace of Amiens (1802), came to an end in 1804. Next year he was created Viscount Sidmouth, and thereafter was thrice President of the Council, once Lord Privy-seal, and from 1812 to 1821 Home Secretary, as such being unpopular for his coercive measures. He retired from the Cabinet in 1824, and died 15th Feb. 1844. He was a sincere Tory. See Life by Dean Fellow (1847).

Sidney, or SYDNEY, ALGERNON, grand-nephew of Sir Philip, and second son of the second Earl of Leicester, was born probably at Penshurst, Kent, and in 1622. He accompanied his father on his embassy in 1632 to Denmark, and in 1636 to France. In 1641-43 he commanded a troop of horse in Ireland, of which country his father was (nominally) Lord-lieutenant. Declaring for the parliament, he was wounded at Marston Moor (1644); in 1645 was appointed governor of Chichester, and returned by Cardiff to parliament; in 1646 attended his brother, Viscount Lisle, now Lord-lieutenant, to Ireland as lieutenant-general of horse and governor of Dublin; and in 1647, after receiving the thanks of the House of Commons, was appointed governor of Dover. In 1649, though nominated a commissioner, he took no part in the king's trial, which yet he justified on abstract grounds. A severe republican, he resented Cromwell's usurpation of power, and retired to Penshurst 1653-59. Then, made one of the Council of State, he undertook a political mission to Denmark and Sweden. After the Restoration he lived on the Continent, but in 1677 was pardoned and returned to England. In 1679 he twice stood unsuccessfully for parliament, and an attempt was made to involve him in the sham Meal-tub Plot. The attempt miscarried; still, he deemed it prudent to retire to France, and, to detach Louis XIV. from Charles, entered into negotiations with him through Barillon. That prior to this he had taken moneys from the French ambassador, either for himself or (more likely) for the republican cause, is admitted by Hallam and Macaulay, but disputed by Mr Ewald. Next year he was back in England, and possibly helped Penn with the Pennsylvania constitution, features of which were the ballot, universal suffrage, the abolition of a property qualification, religious equality, prison reform, and the abolition of capital punishment save for murder and treason. In June 1683, when the Rye House Plot was announced, the chance was seized to get rid of men felt to be dangerous, and, with Lords Russell, Essex, and Howard, Sidney was sent to the Tower. In November he was tried for high-treason before Jeffreys, and, on no evidence but the traitor Lord Howard's and his own unpublished Discourses concerning Government, was beheaded 7th December. His attainder was reversed in 1689; his Discourses appeared first in 1698. See Blencowe's Sidney Papers (1813), and Lives by Meadley (1813) and Ewald (1873).

Sidney, DOROTHEA. See WALLER.

Sidney, SIR PHILIP, was born 30th November 1554 at Penshurst, Kent, son of Sir Henry Sidney and Mary Dudley, daughter of the Duke of Northumberland (executed 1553). Philip went up in 1568 from Shrewsbury to Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1572-75 travelled in France, Germany, and Italy. A finished English gentleman, he now entered on his career at court, yet as a statesman he practically failed. At first a favourite of the queen, he was sent in 1577 as ambassador to the Emperor Rudolf and then to the Prince of Orange. Elizabeth displayed her ingratitude towards his father for his exertions as Lord Deputy in Ireland, and Philip wrote in his defence; he also addressed the queen against her projected match with the Duke of Anjou. Elizabeth frowned on him; and his mother's brother, the once powerful Leicester, fell into disfavour. Sidney retired (1580) to his sister Mary, now Lady Pembroke, at Wilton, where, probably, most of his Arcadia was written. In 1583 he was knighted, and married Frances, daughter of Sir F. Walsingham. His arrangement (1585) to accompany Drake on one of his buccanier expeditions was defeated by Elizabeth's caprice and Drake's treachery. It was poor amends that Sidney was ordered to accompany Leicester, chosen by the queen to carry her half-hearted support to the Netherlands in their struggle against Spain. After one small brilliant exploit, he received, on October 2, 1586, his death-wound under the walls of Zutphen; dying like a hero and a Christian on the 17th. His work in literature we may place between 1578 and 1582. Widely celebrated as it was in his lifetime, nothing was published till after his death. His brilliant character, his connections, his generous patronage of men of letters, with the report of those to whom his writings were communicated, united to give him his pre-eminent contemporary fame. This was, however, amply supported when the Arcadia (written probably 1578-80, but never finished) appeared, imperfectly in 1590, completely in 1598. This book long retained a vast popularity, though now it is almost unread. It is a pastoral romance, founded upon the Arcadia (1504) of Sannazaro, being an intricate love-story, intermixed with poems and written in melodious but elaborate prose, not free from the artificial 'conceits,' the euphuism, of that age. But here Englishmen found their earliest model for sweet, continuous, rhythmical prose—for the prose of art. To about 1580 may be assigned Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie (1591, afterwards named Defence of Poesie), written in clear, manly English in reply to an abusive Puritan pamphlet. In 1575 Sidney had met Penelope Devereux (c. 1562-1607), daughter of the first Earl of Essex; but it was only in 1581, the year following her marriage to the Puritan Lord Rich, who afterwards divorced her, that Sidney awoke too late to love for her, and to find also that she might have loved him. The 108 sonnets and 11 songs of Astrophel and Stella (1591) offer a marvellous picture of passionate love. That Sidney's fame falls far below his deserts is due in part to that inequality of his workmanship which he shares with other supreme writers of sonnet-sequences; nor did life allow him to acquire their finished art. Sidney's Poems and Apologie have been edited, the first by Grosart (1877) and John Gray (Sonnets, 1898), the second by Arber (1868), Flügel (1889), Cook (1890), and Shuckburgh (1891); Astrophel and Stella by Flügel (1889). An edition of the Complete Works was begun by Feuillerat in 1912. The Life by Fulke Greville (1652) was re-edited by Sir E. Brydges (1816). Modern Lives are by Zouch (1808), Fox Bourne (1862, 1892), and J. A. Symonds (1886).

Sidonius Apollinaris (c. 430-83), held high civil offices at Rome and in 472 became Bishop of Clermont. His letters are modelled on Pliny's; his poems comprise panegyrics on three emperors and two bombastic epithalamiums. See editions by Baret (Par, 1879), Lütjohann (Leip, 1888), and Mohr (Leip, 1895), and books on Sidonius Apollonaris by the Abbé Chaix (2 vols. 1867-68), Chate- lain (1875), and Kaufmann (1864).

Siebold, PHILIPP FRANZ VON (1796-1866), physi- cian and botanist, born at Würzburg, became sanitary officer to the Dutch in Batavia, and, accompanying the Dutch embassy to Japan, made Japan known to the Western world by his writings.—His brother, KARL THEODOR ERNST (1804-85), anatomist, was professor at Munich, and wrote on the Invertebrata (trans. 1857), parthenogenesis, salamanders, and the fresh-water fishes of central Europe. See Life by A. von Siebold (1896).

Siegen, LUDWIG VON (1609-75), born at Utrecht, became gentleman of the bedchamber to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and in 1642 invented the mezzotint process, which he disclosed to Prince Rupert at Brussels in 1654. [Zee'ghen.]

Siemens, ERNST WERNER VON, engineer and electrician, born December 13, 1816, at Lenthe in Hanover, in 1834 entered the Prussian artillery, and in 1844 took charge of the artillery workshops at Berlin. He developed the telegraphic system in Prussia, and discovered the insulating property of gutta-percha. Leaving the public service, he devoted himself to making telegraphic and electrical apparatus. In 1847 was established at Berlin the firm of Siemens & Halske (since 1867 Siemens Brothers); and branches were formed in St Petersburg (1857), London (1858), Vienna (1858), and Tiflis (1863). Besides devising numerous forms of galvanometers and other electrical in- struments, Siemens was one of the discoverers of the self-acting dynamo. He determined the electrical resistance of different substances, the Siemens Unit being called after him. In 1886 he gave £25,000 to found a technological institute; in 1888 he was ennobled. He died at Berlin, 6th December 1892. See his Scientific and Technical Papers (Eng. trans. 1892-95) and his Personal Recollections (trans. 1893).

His brother, SIR WILLIAM (KARL WILHELM) SIEMENS, born at Lenthe, April 4, 1823, in 1843 visited England, introduced a process for electro- gliding invented by Werner and himself, in 1844 patented his differential governor, and was natu- ralised in 1859. F.R.S. from 1862, he received many distinctions for his inventions in metallurgy, was president of the British Association (1882), was knighted in April 1883, and died in London, November 19. As manager in England of the firm of Siemens Brothers, he was actively engaged in the construction of telegraphs, designed the steamship Faraday for cable-laying, promoted electric lighting, and constructed the Portrush Electric Tramway (1883). The principle of his regenerative furnace was largely utilised, notably by himself in the manufacture of steel. Other inventions were a water-meter, pyrometer, and bathometer. See Life by Pole (1888) and Bamber's edition of his Scientific Works (1889).

Sienkiewicz, HENRIK, a Polish novelist, born in 1846, who has visited California and Africa, a number of whose works (The Deluge, With Fire and Sword, Quo Vadis? &c.) were translated into English. [Sheng-kee-ay' veetch.]

Sieyès, EMMANUEL JOSEPH, COMTE, born at Fréjus, May 3, 1748, studied theology and became canon at Tréguier (1775), then chancellor and vicar-general of Chartres, and as such was sent to the assembly of the clergy of France. His three pamphlets carried his name over France: Vues sur les Moyens d'Exécution (1788), Essai sur les Privilèges (1788), and, the most famous of all,

Qu'est-ce que le Tiers-État? (January 1789). He was elected deputy for Paris, and had much to do with the formation of the National Assembly. He gained great influence, and the division of France into departments was mainly his work. He took part in the declaration of the Rights of Man (August 26, 1789), and opposed the royal veto. He was elected to the Legislative Assembly, sat in the centre, and also voted for the king's death; but as the Revolution grew sank into 'philosophic silence.' He opposed the new constitution of Year III. (1795), and declined a seat on the Directory named by the new Corps Législatif, but had a share in the coup d'état of 3d September 1797. In 1798 he went on a mission to Berlin, in 1799 was elected to the Directory. Bonaparte returned from Egypt in October, and together they plotted the Revolution of 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799), the result of which was the institution of the Consulate of Sieyès, Bonaparte, and Roger Ducos. Sieyès drew up a constitution, a masterpiece of complexity, its aim to break the force of democracy by dividing it. Finding himself befooled by Bonaparte, he threw up his consulship, but received the title of count, 600,000 francs, and the estate of Crosne. Exiled at the Restoration, he lived in Belgium for fifteen years, returned in 1830, and died June 20, 1836. See works by Mignet (1836), Beauverger (1858), and Bignon (1894). [S'yaiiss.]

Signalon, XAVIER (1788-1837), Romanticist painter, born at Uzès, Gard, died in Rome.

Sigmund (1368-1437), emperor of Germany, son of Charles IV., in 1396, as king of Hungary, was terribly defeated by the Turks at Nicopolis, but later conquered Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Servia. In 1411 he was proclaimed emperor. He induced Pope John XXIII. to summon the Council of Constance to end the Hussite schism, supported the party of reform, but made no effort to uphold the safe-conduct he had granted to Huss, and permitted him to be burned. In consequence his succession to the throne of Bohemia was opposed by the Hussites. See works by Aschbach (1838-45), Lenz (1874), Bezold (1875), and Windecke (contemporary materials, 1886).

Sigmund I. (1466-1548), king of Poland from 1506. His court was filled with factions fomented by his wife, the daughter of the Duke of Milan, and the Reformation raised new troubles. In a war with Russia he lost Smolensk, but was partly compensated with the over-lordship of Moldavia. In 1537 occurred the first rebellion of the nobility against the kingly authority, and Sigmund was obliged to make concessions.— Under his son, SIGISMUND II. (1520-72), the Reformed faith spread rapidly. In 1569 Lithuania was joined to Poland, and Poland acquired Livonia.—His nephew, SIGISMUND III. (1566-1632), elected king of Poland in 1587, from 1592 to 1604 was also at least nominal king of Sweden. Con- stant disputes took place between him and the Diet, and he was a great persecutor of the Protestants. He supported the false Demetrius (q.v.). The Poles took Moscow and caused Ladis- laus, son of Sigmund, to be crowned czar, but in 1618 he finally resigned his claims.

Signorelli, LUCA, Italian painter, born about 1441 at Cortona, worked, especially in frescoes, at Loretto, Rome, Florence, Siena, Orvieto ('Last Judgment,' 1499-1503), and Cortona. He was one of the painters summoned by Pope Julius II. in 1508 to adorn the Vatican, and dismissed to make way for Raphael. He died about 1525 at Cor- tona. See Sidney Colvin in the Cornhill for 1875, and German works by R. Vischer (1879) and Kraus (1892). [Seen-ye-rel'-lee.]

Sigionio, CARLO (1524-84), a humanist of Modena. See Life by Franciosi (Ven. 1872).

Sigourney, LYDIA HUNTLEY (1791-1865), born at Norwich, Conn., taught in Hartford, in 1815 published Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse, and in 1819 married a Hartford merchant. Other works were a Sketch of Connecticut Forty Years Since (1824), Pocahontas and other Poems, Lays of the Heart, Letters to Young Ladies, &c. She visited Europe in 1840, and wrote Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands. See her Letters of Life (1866).

Silhouette, ÉTIENNE DE (1709-67), the parsimonious French minister of Finance in 1759 whose name got applied to the cheap blacked-in shadow-outlines.

Silius Italicus, GAIUS (25-101 A.D.), minor Latin poet, became a prominent forensic orator, was consul in 68, and then proconsul in Asia. Smitten with an incurable disease, he starved himself to death. His epic poem, Punica, has come down entire, and is a monument of patient imitation, not of poetic creation, Scipio and Hannibal its Achilles and Hector. Editions are by Ernesti (1791), Lemaire (1823), and Bauer (1891).

Silliman, BENJAMIN (1779-1864), born at Trumbull, Conn., graduated at Yale in 1796, was admitted to the bar in 1802, but soon after was made professor of Chemistry, and proceeded to study this subject at Philadelphia and in 1805-6 at Edinburgh and London. His chair he filled till 1853, and he also lectured on geology. In 1818 he founded the American Journal of Science, which he edited twenty-eight years. He published a text-book on chemistry (1830), other handbooks, and narratives of his visits to Europe. See Life by Fisher (1866).—His son, BENJAMIN (1816-85), was his assistant (1837-49) and successor (from 1854). His researches were chiefly in applied chemistry and in mineralogy. He was co-editor of the Journal of Science 1845-85, and published manuals of chemistry and physics and a volume on American Contributions to Chemistry (1875).

Silva, ANTONIO JOSÉ DA (1705-39), an Offenbachian Portuguese librettist, who was born at Rio Janeiro, studied law at Coimbra, and was executed at Lisbon as a relaxed Jew.

Silvester. See SYLVESTER.

Sime, JAMES (1844-95), author of a Life of Lessing, a study of Goethe, &c., was the son of a Wick Presbyterian minister, and, educated at Edinburgh and in Germany, was long literary adviser to Messrs Macmillan.—His brother, WILLIAM (1851-95), a Calcutta journalist, wrote novels and books of travel.

Simeon, CHARLES (1759-1836), an evangelical preacher, born at Reading, and educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, in 1782 was elected to his lifelong fellowship, and till his death was perpetual curate of Trinity Church. His impassioned evangelicalism at first aroused bitter opposition; but he came to exercise an enormous influence. He took a foremost part in founding the Church Missionary Society, and sent Henry Martyn to India. He paid several visits to Scotland, and he established a society for purchasing advowsons. His Horæ Homileticæ (1819-25; new ed. 1832-33) contain 2536 sermon-outlines. See Memoirs by Carus (1857). Recollections of Simeon's Conversation Parties by A. W. Brown (1862), and Study by Moule (1892).

Simmons, WILLIAM HENRY (1811-82), London engraver after Millais, Holman Hunt, &c.

Simms, WILLIAM GILMORE (1806-70), born at Charleston, S.C., had been both druggist and law-student when in 1828 he became editor of the City Gazette, and published Lyrical and other Poems (1827), The Vision of Cortes (1829), The Tricolour (1830), and Atlantis (1832). From this time he poured out poems (perhaps the best Southern Passages and Pictures, 1839), novels (The Yemassee, The Partisan, Beauchampe, &c.), histories, and biographies. The illustrated edition of his works (1882-86) fills 17 vols. See Lives by Cable (1888) and Prof. Trent (1892).

Simmel, LAMBERT, a baker's son, in 1487 persecuted the Duke of Clarence's son, Edward, Earl of Warwick (1475-99), then imprisoned in the Tower, and afterwards beheaded, by Henry VII. Backed by Margaret of Burgundy, his supposititious aunt, Simmel had some success in Ireland and was crowned at Dublin as Edward VI., but, landing in Lancashire with 2000 'Almains,' was defeated at Stoke-upon-Trent (16th June). He became a royal scullion and falconer.

Simon, JULES, French statesman, economist, and author, was born at L'Orient, 31st Dec. 1814, the son of a German Jew, Schweitzer or Suisse. He became lecturer on Philosophy at the Sorbonne in 1839, was returned to the Chamber of Deputies in 1848, refused the oath of allegiance to the empire, and by 1869 was a popular Republican leader. He was minister of Public Instruction in the Government of National Defence; but in 1873 his measures for secondary education were violently opposed by the clericals, and he resigned and became leader of the Republican Left. In 1874 he assumed the direction of the Siècle newspaper, in 1875 became life-senator, and in 1876 prime-minister, but resigned when President Macmahon and the Right resented his liberal attitude towards the press. He was a consistent advocate of Free Trade. Subsequently his Republicanism became conservative. From 1882 he was permanent secretary of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. He died 8th June 1896. Besides editing Descartes, Bossuet, Malebranche, and Antoine Arnauld, he wrote Histoire de l'École d'Alexandrie (1844-45), La Liberté de Conscience (1859), La Religion Naturelle (1856), L'Ouvrière (1863), L'École (1864), Le Travail (1866), La Politique Radicale (1868), Dieu, Patrie, Liberté (1883), Mémoires des Autres (1889), Notices et Portraits (1893); and studies on Thiers, Guizot, Remusat, Mignet, Michelet, Henri Martin, Victor Cousin, Caro, Reyband, Chevalier, and F. de Coulanges. See Life by Sèché (1898). [See-mon']

Simon, RICHARD, father of biblical criticism, born at Dieppe, May 13, 1638, entered the Oratory in 1659, lectured on philosophy, and catalogued the oriental MSS. in the library of the order at Paris. His criticisms upon Arnauld caused great displeasure among the Port-Royalists, and the scandal caused by the unwonted liberalism of his Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament (1678) led to his retiring to Belleville as curé. In 1682 he resigned his parish, and lived thereafter in literary retirement. He died at Dieppe, April 11, 1712. Few writers of his age played a more prominent part in polemics. His Histoire Critique (suppressed through Bossuet's and the Jansenists' influence after a few copies had passed into circulation; reprinted at Rotterdam, 1685; Eng. trans. 1682) often anticipates the later German rationalists, and is the first work which treated the Bible as a literary product. Other important writings are a history of the text of the Old Testament (1689) and a history of the commentators on the New (1693). See two French works by Bernius (1869-82).

Simonides (556-468 B.C.), Greek lyric poet, born in the island of Ceos, lived many years at Athens. From the Persian invasion of Greece he devoted his powers to celebrating the heroes and the battles of that struggle in elegies, epigrams, odes, and dirges. He won fifty-six times in poetical contests, and carried off the prize from Æschylus by an elegy on the heroes that fell at Marathon. He spent his last ten years at the court of Hiero of Syracuse.—The iambic poet SIMONIDES of Amorgos flourished about 660 B.C.

Simonis, EUGÈNE (1810-82), Belgian sculptor.

Simon Magus ('Simon the Magician') appears about 37 A.D. as having become a commanding personality in Samaria through his sorceries. When the apostles Peter and John conferred on Phillip's converts the gift of the Holy Ghost (including apparently the gift of tongues) Simon offered money for the power of conferring the same gift. Peter's reply is known, and Simon, rebuked, was submissive; here the narrative of the Acts (viii. 9-24) leaves him. Later Christian authors bring him to Rome, and make him the author of heresies; and Baur in 1831 first observed that in portions of the books that refer to Simon Magus the apostle Paul is caricatured under his guise. See Baur's Paul and Church in the First Three Centuries (both translated), and Harnack's Gnosticismus (1873) and History of Dogma (1886).

Simplicius, pope in 468-483.

Simpson, SIR JAMES YOUNG, physician, born at Bathgate, 7th June 1811, a baker's son, studied medicine at Edinburgh. He took his M.D. in 1832, and in 1837 became assistant to the professor of Pathology, in 1840 professor of Midwifery. He is chiefly remembered as having popularised the anæsthetic virtues of chloroform (1847). In obstetrics his improvements in practice were numerous and valuable. He was created a baronet in 1866, and died 6th May 1870. His works include Obstetric Memoirs (1856), Acupressure (1864), Homœopathy, Selected Obstetrical Works, Anæsthesia, Diseases of Women, and Archeological Essays (1872). See Lives by Duns (1873), his daughter (1897), and H. L. Gordon (1898).

Simpson, THOMAS, F.R.S. (1710-61), mathematician, born at Market Bosworth, was bred a weaver, but at Nineatun and Derby found opportunity to study, and in 1736 went to London and taught mathematics. During 1737-57 he published a long series of works on fluxions, chance, annuities, algebra, trigonometry, &c. In 1743 he became professor of Mathematics at Woolwich Royal Academy. See Life by Hutton prefixed to Davis's edition of the Fluxions (1805).

Simpson, WILLIAM (1823-99), special artist from 1860 to the Illustrated London News, born at Glasgow, was out in the Crimea 1854-55.

Simrock, KARL JOSEPH (1802-76), German poet and scholar, born at Bonn, entered the Prussian state service. He modernised or edited the Nibelungenlied (1827; 52d ed. 1892), Hartmann von der Ane's Armer Heinrich (1830), Walter von der Vogelweide (1833), Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzival (1842), Reineke Fuchs (1845), Die Edda (1851), Gottfried von Strasburg's Tristan und Isolde (1855), the Heliand (1856), Beowulf (1859), Der Wartburgkrieg (1858), Brandt's Narrenschiß (1872), &c. He translated parts of Shakespeare, wrote (with others) a book on Shakespeare's sources (1831), one on Italian stories, and one on legends of the Rhine, a collection of German Volksbücher (1844-67), Das Heldenbuch (1843-49), his own Gedichte (1844), and handbooks. From 1850 till his death he was professor of Old German at Bonn. See monograph by Hocker (1877).

Sims, GEORGE ROBERT, born in London, 2d September 1847, joined the staff of Fun in 1874, and soon commenced his 'Dagonet' ballads and other contributions to the Referee. Among his plays are Crutch and Toothpick (1879), Mother-in-law (1881), The Lights o' London (1881), The Romany Rye (1882), and, written in collaboration, In the Banks (1883), Harbour Lights (1885), The Golden Ladder (1887), and Little Christopher Columbus (1893). His novels include Rogues and Vagabonds, Memoirs of Mary Jane, Mary Jane Married, Memoirs of a Landlady, The Ten Commandments, &c. His Daily News letters on the housing of the London poor also deserve mention.

Simson, ROBERT (1687-1768), born in Ayrshire, studied at Glasgow, where in 1711 he became professor of Mathematics. His great work was his restoration of Euclid's lost treatise on Porisms (1776). He published Sectiones Conicæ (1735) and a restoration of Apollonius's Loci Planii (1749); his Elements of Euclid (1756) was the basis of nearly all editions for over a century. See a volume of Reliquia (1776) and Memoir by Trail (1812).

Sinclair, or ST CLAIR, the name of the Earls of Orkney (1879-1471) and afterwards of Caithness. They were hereditary Grand-master Masons of Scotland 1455-1736. Roslin Castle near Edinburgh was the seat of the St Clairs.

Sinclair, SIR JOHN, born at Thurso Castle, 10th May 1754, studied at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford, was admitted to both the Scottish and English bars (1775-82), and sat in parliament 1780-1811. In 1784 he published a History of the Revenue of the British Empire; and in 1786 was created a baronet. He established the Board of Agriculture in 1793, and carried out the Statistical Account of Scotland (1791-99), comprising a description of every parish in Scotland, mainly by help of the parish ministers. He wrote on all manner of topics, including a tragedy and treatises on health and longevity. He died at Edinburgh, 21st Dec. 1835. See Correspondence (1831) and Life (1837).—His third son, JOHN (1797-1875), was Archdeacon of Middlesex from 1842, author of Sketches of Old Times (1875), &c.; his fourth daughter, CATHERINE (1800-64), wrote tales and descriptive works—Modern Society, Scotland and the Scotch, Shetland and the Shetlanders, &c.

Sindhia, the title of the Mahratta princes of Gwalior. Their founder was RANAJI SINDHIA, who rose to high rank in the bodyguard of the Peshwa, and had a grant of half the province of Malwa.—His bastard son, MADHAVA RAO SINDHIA (d. 1794), joined the Mahratta confederation, and was crippled for life at Panipat (1761). In 1770, along with the Peshwa and Holkar, he aided the emperor of Delhi to expel the Sikhs. He came into collision with the British in 1779, and was thoroughly beaten by Hastings, but by the treaty of Salbai (1783) was confirmed in all his possessions. In 1784 he captured Gwalior, in 1785 marched on Delhi, and subsequently seized Agra, Alighur, and nearly the whole of the Doab. He raised and drilled an army in European fashion, with which he reduced Jodhpur, Udaipur, and Jaipur, three Rajput states, and humbled Holkar. See Keene's Madhava Rao Sindhia (1892).—His grandnephew and successor, DAULAT RAO SINDHIA (d. 1827), ravaged Indore and Poona, but was routed by Holkar (1802), and next year brought upon himself the vengeance of the East India Company. The Marhattas were routed at Assaye and Argaum by Sir Arthur Wellesley, and were scattered at Laswari by Lord Lake. Thereupon Sindhia ceded all his possessions in the Doab and along the right bank of the Jumna to the British. Gwalior was restored in 1805.—During the Mutiny BAJI RAO (d. 1886) took the field against the rebels; but most of his troops deserted him, and he fled to Agra. He was reinstated, and was succeeded by his adopted son.

Singer, ISAAC MERRITT (1811–75), born at Oswego, New York, patented in 1852 his single-thread chain-stitch sewing-machine, and settled in Paris, and then at Torquay, England. The Singer Company is the largest of sewing-machine manufacturing companies, with branches in the U.S., in Canada, in Scotland, and at Vienna.

Sismondi, JEAN CHARLES LÉONARD SIMONDE DE, was born at Geneva, 9th May 1773. The French Revolution drove his family (of Italian descent) into exile, but in 1800 Sismondi himself went back to Geneva, and obtained a municipal office. His Histoire des Républiques Italiennes du Moyen-Age (1807–18) placed him in the first rank of contemporary historians. In 1813 appeared his Littérature du Midi de l'Europe (Eng. by Roscoe), and in 1819 he began his Histoire des Français. His Richesse Commerciale (1803) is written from the standpoint of the Wealth of Nations; but his Nouveaux Principes d'Économie Politique (1819) incline to socialism. Amongst his other works are Histoire de la Renaissance de la Liberté en Italie (1832) and Histoire de la Chute de l'Empire Romain (1835). He died at Chêne near Geneva, 25th June 1842. See Life (1845) and Lettres Inédites (1863 and 1878).

Sitting Bull (c. 1837–90), chief of the Dakota Sioux, was killed in an attempt at rebellion.

Sixtus, the name of five popes.—The first was beheaded in 128 A.D.; the second was martyred in 257; the third was pope (432–440) when St Patrick began his mission in Ireland.—SIXTUS IV., or Francesco della Rovere, born July 22, 1414, was a famous Franciscan preacher, and was elected pope in 1471. His nepotism led to many abuses, and he is said to have connived at the Pazzi conspiracy against the Medici at Florence. He fostered learning, built the Sistine chapel and the Sistine bridge, enriched the Vatican library, and was a munificent patron of painters. In 1482 he entered into an alliance with the Venetians which led to a general Italian war. He died August 13, 1484. See Pastor's Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (Eng. trans. 1895).—SIXTUS V. (Felice Peretti), born December 13, 1521, was also a great Franciscan preacher and a professor of Theology at Rimini and Sienna. Created a cardinal in 1570, he was believed to have fallen into decrepitude—a circumstance which seems to have recommended him as successor to Gregory in 1585. But his rule was marked by vigorous measures of improvement. He repressed license and disorder, reformed the administration of the law and the disposal of patronage, carried on many public enterprises, and having found an empty treasury, secured a surplus of five million crowns. To the Jews he extended liberty. The great aim of his foreign policy was to combat Protestantism. He fixed the number of cardinals at seventy. Under his authority were published new editions of the Septuagint and Vulgate—the latter very inaccurate. He died 27th August 1590. See Ranke, and Lives (Italian, German, French) by Tempesti (1754), Lorentz (1852), and Hübner (1870; trans. 1872).

Skeat, WALTER WILLIAM, born in London, Nov. 21, 1835, and educated at King's College School and Christ's College, Cambridge, graduated as fourteenth wrangler in 1858, and became a fellow in 1860, and in 1878 professor of Anglo-Saxon. He was the first director of the Dialect Society (established 1873), and he contributed more than any scholar of his time to a sound knowledge of Middle English and English philology generally. His works include Piers Plowman (1867–85), The Lay of Havelok the Dane (1868), Barbour's Bruce (1870–77), Chaucer's Treatise on the Astrolabe (1872), &c., all edited for the Early English Text Society; editions of Chatterton's Poems (1875), Chaucer's Minor Poems (1888), and the Kingis Quair (S. T. Soc. 1884; new ed. 1911), A Mæso-Gothic Glossary (1868), his admirable Etymological English Dictionary (new ed. 1910) and its abridgment (1911); Principles of English Etymology (1887–91); his great Chaucer (6 vols. 1894–95); The Student's Chaucer (1895); A Student's Pastime (1896); Chaucerian and other Pieces (1897); The Chaucer Canon (1900); and papers on place-names (1901–11).

Skelton, JOHN, satirical poet, born about 1460, studied at Cambridge, perhaps also at Oxford, was tutor to Prince Henry, and became rector of Diss in Norfolk, but seems later to have been suspended for keeping a concubine. He had produced some translations and elegies in 1489, but now he struck into an original vein of satirical vernacular poetry, overflowing with grotesque words and images and unrestrained jocularity. In this kind his chief productions were The Bouge of Courtre, Colyn Couste, and Why come ye nat to Courtre. Of these the first is an allegorical poem; the second, an unsparing attack on the corruptions of the church; the last is a sustained invective against Wolsey. Wolsey tried to arrest his libeller, but Skelton took sanctuary at Westminster till his death, June 21, 1529. Of his other poems the chief are Phyllis Sparowe, The Tunning of Elynour Rummyng, Garlande of Laurell, and Magnificence, his one surviving interlude. The only good edition is Dyce's (1843).

Skelton, SIR JOHN, born in Edinburgh, 18th July 1831, was called to the Scottish bar in 1854, and in 1892 became chairman of the Local Government Board for Scotland, of which he had been secretary from 1868. He wrote a defence of Mary Stuart (1876), sumptuous Lives of her (1893) and Charles I. (1898), besides Mailland of Lethington (1887), Table Talk of Shirley (1895–96), &c. Made K.C.B. in 1897, he died July 19 of same year.

Skene, WILLIAM FORBES, D.C.L. (1809–92), Scottish historian, was born at Inverie, on Loch Nevis, the second son of Scott's friend, James Skene of Rubislaw (1775–1864). He was educated at Edinburgh and elsewhere (learning Gaelic in Laggan manse), and became in 1832 an Edinburgh Writer to the Signet. In 1831 he succeeded Hill Burton as Scottish Historiographer. Among his works are The Highlanders of Scotland (1837), The Dean of Lismore's Book (1861), Chronicles of the Picts and Scots (1867), Fordun's Cronica Gentis Scotorum (1871), The Four Ancient Books of Wales (1868), Celtic Scotland (3 vols. 1876–80), his chief work, and The Family of Skene of Skene (1887).

Sketchley, ARTHUR, the pseudonym of George Rose (1817–82), an Anglican clergyman who in 1855 went over to Rome. In 1866–82 he wrote nearly thirty books on 'Mrs Brown.'

Skinner, JOHN (1721-1807), author of 'Tullochgorum,' son of the schoolmaster of Birse, Aberdeenshire, graduated at Aberdeen, taught at Kenmay and Monymusk (where he joined the Episcopal Church), and from 1742 till his death was minister at Longside. In 1746 his house was pillaged and his chapel burned by the Hanoverian soldiery, although he was no Jacobite; in 1753 he was imprisoned for six months. He ultimately became dean of the diocese. He published An Ecclesiastical History of Scotland (1788), &c.; his Poems were collected in 1809 (3d ed. 1859), the best being 'The Ewie wi' the Crookit Horn' and 'Tullochgorum.' See Life by Rev. Dr Walker (2d ed. 1883).—His son, JOHN SKINNER (1744-1816), Bishop of Aberdeen, born at Linschart, Longside, graduated at Aberdeen in 1760, in 1763 was ordained and placed at Ellon, in 1774 was called to Aberdeen. He was made coadjutor-bishop in 1782, in 1787 bishop, and in 1788 primus. Prince Charles Edward's death (1788) solved the church's Jacobite difficulty; and the leading part in obtaining the Relief Act (1792) fell to the primus. He was succeeded as bishop by his son. See Life by Dr Walker (1887).

Skipsey, JOSEPH (1832-1903), the miner poet, long a pitman at Percy Main colliery near North Shields, from 1859 published several volumes of good strong verse.

Skoboleff, MICHAEL DMITRIEVITCH (1843-82), Russian general, fought against the Polish insurgents (1863), and in 1871-75 was at the conquest of Khiva and Khokand. In the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 he bore a conspicuous part at Plevna, in the Shipka pass, and at Adrianople; in 1881 he stormed the Turkoman stronghold Geoktepe. He died at Moscow. He was an ardent Pan Slavist. See Personal Reminiscences of him by Nemirovitch-Danchenko (Eng. trans. 1884), a French Life by Mme. Adam (1886), and a German one by Ossipovitch (1887).

Skrine, HENRY (1755-1803), of Warleigh near Bath, wrote three picturesque tours during 1795-1801.—His grandson, the Rev. JOHN HUNTLY SKRINE, born at Warleigh, 3d April 1848, and educated at Uppingham and Corpus, Oxford, became fellow of Merton in 1871, a master at Uppingham in 1873, and was warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond, in 1888-1902. He has written Joan the Maid (1895) and other poems and prose works. [Skreen.]

Slade, FELIX (1790-1868), of Halsteads, Yorkshire, antiquary and art collector, bequeathed to the British Museum his engravings and Venetian glass, and founded art professorships at Oxford, Cambridge, and University College, London.

Slatin, BARON RUDOLF C., K.C.M.G., born near Vienna in 1857, was an Austrian lieutenant, and had been to Khartoum (1875) when in 1878 he took service under Gordon in the Sudan. Governor of Darfur (1881), on the defeat of Hicks Pasha he surrendered (1883) to the Mahdi, and was kept under close surveillance till his escape in 1895. He wrote a vivid description of his experiences, Fire and Sword in the Soudan (trans. 1896); and attached as colonel to the intelligence department of the Egyptian army, he served in the Dongola and Omdurman expeditions (1896-98). He became Inspector-general of the Sudan in 1900. [Sla-teen.]

Sleeman, SIR WILLIAM HENRY (1788-1856), an East Indian official who did much for the suppression of thuggee and dacoity.

Sleidanus or PHILIPPI, JOHANNES (1506-56), born at Schleiden near Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1537 entered the service of Francis I. of France; but turning Protestant, was dismissed (1541), and served as ambassador of the Protestant princes of Germany. He wrote a Latin history of Charles V. (1555; best ed. 1785-86). Baumgarten edited his Letters (1881) and wrote a Life (1876).

Slezer, JOHN, born in Holland, was encouraged by Charles II. and James II. to make a collection of copperplate engravings of the towns, palaces, castles, and public buildings of Scotland, and was by William III. appointed captain of the artillery company and surveyor of his Majesty's magazines in Scotland. His Theatrum Scoticum was to a small extent subsidised by the Scottish parliament, but the publication of it reduced its author to such straits that, in spite of vain appeals to the government, he had to take refuge in the sanctuary of Holyrood, where he spent thirteen years. He seems to have died about the end of June 1714. There were four editions of the Theatrum—1693, 1718 (two editions), 1719—and a reprint, with memoir, in 1874.

Sloane, SIR HANS (1600-1753), physician and naturalist, born at Killyleagh, County Down, the son of an Ulster Scot, studied in London and in France, and settled in London as a physician. Already F.R.S., he spent over a year (1685-86) in Jamaica, collecting a herbarium of 800 species; and became Secretary to the Royal Society (1693), foreign associate of the French Academy (1708), a baronet and physician-general to the army (1716), President of the College of Physicians (1719-35), and (1727) President of the Royal Society and royal physician. His museum and library of 50,000 volumes and 3560 MSS. formed the nucleus of the British Museum. His great work was the Natural History of Jamaica (1707-25).

Slowacki, JULIUS (1809-49), Polish poet.

Smart, CHRISTOPHER, poet, born at Shipborne near Tunbridge, April 11, 1722, was elected a fellow of Pembroke, Cambridge, in 1745. A bookseller's hack, he made for some years a hard living betwixt improvidence, dissipation, and a wife and children. Latterly insane, he died in the rules of the King's Bench on the 21st of May 1771. Samuel Johnson assisted him in his monthly Universal Visitor. Smart's works include epigrams, birthday odes, and occasional poems; the Hylliad, a heavy satire; a bald prose translation of Horace (1756), a poor poetical translation of Phædrus (1765), and poorer metrical versions of the Psalms (1765) and Parables (1768). His poems were collected in 1791, but omit his one real poem, A Song to David (first printed 1763; new ed. 1895), which, marred by repetitions and defects of rhythm, yet shows a genuine spark of inspiration. See Browning's Parties and Gosse's Gossip in a Library (1892).

Smart, HAWLEY (1833-93), born at Dover, served in the army 1849-64, and from 1869 wrote over thirty sporting novels.

Smart, HENRY (1813-79), composer, nephew of Sir George Thomas Smart (1776-1867), organist to the Chapel Royal, was bred for the law, but became famous as an organist. His church music (e.g. Ave Maria) and part-songs (e.g. Lady, rise) are better known than an opera, The Gnome of Hartzburg; a cantata, The Bride of Dunkerron (1864); or a sacred cantata, Jacob. See Life by Dr Sparks (1880).

Smart, JOHN (1838-99), landscape-painter, was born and died in Edinburgh. He was elected an A.R.S.A. in 1874, an R.S.A. in 1877.

Smeaton, JOHN (1724-92), civil engineer, born at Austhorp near Leeds, entered his father's law-office, but about 1750 removed to London as a mathematical instrument maker. His improvements on mill-work gained him the Copley Medal in 1759. In 1755, now F.R.S., he built the great Eddystone lighthouse (the third), which stood till 1882. His chief other engineering works were Ramsgate Harbour (1774), the Forth and Clyde Canal, and bridges at Perth, Coldstream, &c. See Smiles's Lives of the Engineers (new ed. 1904-5).

Smedley, FRANCIS EDWARD (1818-64), was born at Marlow. Always a cripple, he took early to writing, his half-dozen works including Frank Fairleigh (1850), Lewis Arundel (1852), and Harry Coverdale's Courtship (1855). Bright chery books, these appeared originally in Sharpe's Magazine, of which he for a time was editor, and they were illustrated by Cruikshank and 'Phiz.'

Smee, ALFRED, F.R.S. (1818-77), electrician, was surgeon to the Bank of England, and devised the present system of printing the notes.

Smetana, FREDERICK (1824-84), pianist and composer, born at Leitomischl in Bohemia, played or directed concerts till in 1874 he lost his hearing. He made artistic use of Bohemian music, and composed symphonic work in Wallenstein's Camp, Richard III., Earl Haco, Libusa, &c., and operas (Dalibor, A Kiss, The Secret, &c.).

Smiles, SAMUEL, born at Haddington, 23d Dec. 1812, took his Edinburgh M.D. at twenty, and published Physical Education (1838). He practised in Haddington, and then settled as a surgeon in Leeds, but became editor of the Leeds Times, secretary of the Leeds and Thirsk Railway in 1845, and in 1854 secretary of the South-Eastern Railway, retiring in 1866. While at Leeds he met George Stephenson, and undertook a Life of him (1857). Self-Help (1859) had an extraordinary success, and has been translated into a score of languages. An Autobiography published after his death (16th April 1904) completed a series of works which brought him an LL.D. from Edinburgh (1878), and included Character (1871), Thrift (1875), Duty (1880), and Life and Labour (1887). Other works are Lives of the Engineers (1861), Industrial Biography (1863), Lives of Boulton and Watt (1865), The Huguenots in England (1867), The Huguenots in France (1873), Thomas Edward (1876), George Moore (1878), Robert Dick (1878), James Nasmyth (1883), Men of Invention and Industry (1884), John Murray (1891), Jasmin, the Barber-poet (1891), and Josiah Wedgwood (1894).

Smirke, SIR ROBERT (1781-1867), architect, son of Robert Smirke (1752-1845), painter and book-illustrator, was born in London. He became R.A. in 1811, was architect to the Board of Works, was knighted in 1831, and died at Cheltenham. Smirke's public buildings are usually classical, his domestic dwellings Gothic. London is full of his work. Covent Garden Theatre (1809) was his first great undertaking; the British Museum (1825-47) the greatest.—His brother, SYDNEY SMIRKE, R.A. (1799-1877), assisted him.

Smith, ADAM, political economist, was born at Kirkcaldy, 5th June 1723, the posthumous son of the comptroller of customs. He was sent in 1737 to Glasgow University, and as a Snell exhibitioner went thence to Balliol, Oxford, where he studied for seven years. In 1748 he came to Edinburgh, and formed one of the brilliant group which comprised David Hume, John Howe, Dr Hugh Blair, Lord Hailes, and Principal Robertson. In 1751 he got the chair of Logic at Glasgow, exchanged next year for that of Moral Philosophy. In 1759 appeared his Theory of Moral Sentiments, referring them all to sympathy. In 1763-65, as travelling tutor to the young Duke of Buccleuch, he was amidst the wits and philosophers of the reign of Louis XV., including Quesnay, Turgot, and Necker. From 1766 he lived with his mother at Kirkcaldy. In 1776 appeared the Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, establishing the system of natural liberty as opposed to the scheme of artificial regulations that then checked trade and commerce. Its startling doctrines, clear style, and abundant illustration from curious facts took at first; but people saw presently with horror how far the new doctrines went to play havoc with old prejudices; and the French Revolution set the mind of the country bigotedly against everything that breathed of innovation. Soon after Hume's death (1776) Smith established himself in London, and became a member of the club to which Reynolds, Garrick, and Johnson belonged. His appointment as Commissioner of Customs (1778) brought him back to Edinburgh, and there he died, 17th July 1790. Smith's works were edited by Dugald Stewart (1811-12), and contain, besides the Theory of the Moral Sentiments and the Wealth of Nations, essays on the first formation of languages, the history of astronomy, ancient physics, ancient logic, and the imitative arts; his Glasgow Lectures on Justice, Police, Revenue, Arms were edited from notes by a student in 1896. There are editions of the Wealth of Nations by M'Culloch (1850), Thorold Rogers (1880), and Prof. Nicholson (1884). See Lives by Dugald Stewart (1811), Farrer (1881), Haldane (1887), Rae (1895), and H. C. Macpherson (1899).

Smith, ALBERT (1816-60), born at Chertsey, and educated at Merchant Taylors', after in 1838 becoming M.R.C.S., studied in Paris. He commenced practice with his father, but taking to lecturing and light literature, published over a score of books, some of them illustrated by Leech. His novels include The Adventures of Mr Leabury (1844), Scattergood Family (1845), Marchioness of Brinville (1846), Christopher Tadpole (1848), and The Pottleton Legacy (1849); of his entertainments the most successful was 'The Ascent of Mont Blanc' (1852). See Life by E. Yates prefixed to Mont Blanc (1860).

Smith, ALEXANDER, poet, born 31st December 1830 at Kilmarnock, but brought up at Paisley and Glasgow, became a pattern-designer in Glasgow, sending occasional poems to the Glasgow Citizen. His Life Drama appeared in the London Critic (1851), and was reprinted (1852) in a volume of which 10,000 copies were sold. But he had scarcely found himself famous when he began to be fiercely assailed. Immature and extravagant the poem was certainly, and its unconscious echoes of Keats and Tennyson gave colour to the charge of plagiarism; still, Smith has a richness and originality of imagery that more than atone for all defects of taste and knowledge. In 1854 he was appointed secretary to Edinburgh University, and next year produced Sonnets on the War in conjunction with Sydney Dobell, his brother-poet of the 'Spasmodic' school. He afterwards wrote City Poems (1857); an epic, Edwin of Deira (1861); and in prose, Dreamthorpe (1863), A Summer in Skye (1865), and Alfred Hagart's Household (1866). He died 8th January 1867. See his Early Years by Brisbane (1869), and the Memoir by P. P. Alexander prefixed to his Last Leaves (1869).

Smith, ANKER, A.R.A. (1759-1819), engraver.

Smith, AUGUSTUS JOHN (1804-72), 'king' from 1834 of the Scilly Islands.

Smith, BERNARD (1630-1708), organ-builder.

Smith, Mrs BURNETT. See SWAN, ANNIE.

Smith, CHARLOTTE (1749-1806), née Turner, poet and novelist, at fifteen married a spendthrift West India merchant. Her chief work was The Old Manor House (1793).

Smith, COLVIN (1795-1875), portrait-painter, was born at Brechin, and died in Edinburgh.

Smith, ELI (1801-57), American missionary from 1829 in Syria, died at Beyrout.

Smith, SIR FRANCIS PETTIT (1808-74), simultaneous applier with Ericsson in 1834-36 of the screw-propeller to navigation, was born at Hythe, and became a grazing farmer, but in 1860 was appointed curator of the Patent Office Museum, South Kensington, and in 1871 was knighted.

Smith, GEORGE, Assyriologist, born in London, 26th March 1840, was a bank-note engraver who studied cuneiform inscriptions in the British Museum, and in 1867 became an assistant there. He helped Sir H. Rawlinson with his Cuneiform Inscriptions (1870), furnished (1871) the key to the Cypriote character, and discovered in 1872 on a broken tablet the Chaldean account of the Deluge. In 1873 he was despatched by the Daily Telegraph to Nineveh to find the missing fragment of the tablet. It and other results of his excavations were presented to the British Museum, which itself sent him out again next year—see his Assyrian Discoveries (1875; 7th ed. 1883). Whilst on a homeward journey from the Hittite country he died at Aleppo, 19th August 1876. Other works were Annals of Assurbanipal (1871), History of Assyria (1875), Eponym Canon (1875), History of Babylonia (ed. Sayce, 1877), and History of Sennacherib (ed. Sayce, 1878).

Smith, GEORGE (1714-76), of Chichester, landscape-painter, like his brother JOHN (1717-64). An elder brother, WILLIAM (1707-64), who was deformed, painted fruit and portraits.

Smith, GEORGE (1831-95), 'of Coalville,' philanthropist, brickfield and vagrant children the objects of his zeal. See Life by Hodder (1896).

Smith, GEORGE ADAM, D.D., born at Calcutta, 19th October 1856, and educated at Edinburgh, Tübingen, and Leipzig, became principal of Aberdeen University in 1909. He has written on Isaiah, the geography of Palestine, &c.

Smith, GERRIT (1797-1874), philanthropist, teetotaler, and vegetarian, born at Utica, died in New York. See Life by Frothingham (1878).

Smith, GOLDWIN (1823-1910), born at Reading, passed from Eton to Oxford University, took a first in classics in 1845, and in 1847 was elected a fellow of University College and called to the bar. He was assistant-secretary to the first and secretary to the second Oxford University Commission, and served on the Popular Education Commission in 1858. He was regius professor of History at Oxford 1858-66. During the American civil war he was a strenuous upholder of the North, and in 1864 lectured in the United States. In 1868 he was elected to the chair of English and Constitutional History in Cornell University. In 1871 he settled in Canada, edited the Canadian Monthly 1872-74, and founded and edited The Week and The Bystander. Among his works are Irish History and Irish Character (1861), Lectures on the Study of History (1861), Rational Religion (1861), Empire (1863), The Civil War in America (1866), Three English Statesmen (Pym, Hampden, Cromwell, 1867), Short History of England (1869), The Political Destiny of Canada

(1879), Cowper (1880), Lectures and Essays (1881), Jane Austen (1890), Political History of the United States (1893), Questions of the Day (1894), and Guesses at the Riddle of Existence (1897).

Smith, SIR HARRY GEORGE WAKELYN, Bart., G.C.B. (1788-1860), born at Whittlesey, fought in the Peninsular, Waterloo, Kaffir, and Sikh campaigns, by his strategy winning the battle of Alival (1846), and, as Cape governor, all but brought the Kaffir war to a successful issue.

Smith, HENRY BOYNTON, D.D. (1815-76), a New York Presbyterian divine.

Smith, HENRY JOHN STEPHEN (1826-83), mathematician, born in Dublin, and educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford, took a double-first in 1849, and was elected a fellow. In 1861 he became Savilian professor of Geometry. He was the greatest authority of his day on the theory of numbers, and also wrote on elliptic functions and modern geometry. See biographical sketches in his Mathematical Papers (ed. by Glaisher, 1897).

Smith, JAMES (1789-1850), of Deanston, Perthshire, manager of the cotton-mills there from 1807, was a mechanician, the inventor of 'thorough drainage,' and a philanthropist.

Smith, JAMES and HORACE, authors of The Rejected Addresses, were born, the former 10th February 1775, the latter 31st December 1779. Both were educated at Chigwell in Essex. James succeeded his father as solicitor to the Board of Ordnance; Horace made a fortune as a stockbroker. Both had written for the Pic-nic (1802), the Monthly Mirror (1807-10), &c., when, a prize being advertised for an address to be spoken at the opening of the new Drury Lane Theatre in 1812, the brothers produced a series of supposed 'Rejected Addresses.' James furnished imitations of Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge; Horace those of Scott, Byron, 'Monk' Lewis, and Moore. The copyright, offered to Murray for £20 and refused, was purchased by him for £131 in 1819, after the book had run through sixteen editions and had brought its authors over £1000. James received other £1000 for writing Charles Mathews' 'entertainments'; and Horace produced the Tin Trumpet (1836) and more than a score of novels—Brambletye House, Tor Hill, &c. Of Horace's Poems (1846) the best known is the 'Ode to an Egyptian Mummy.' James died 24th December 1839, and Horace 12th July 1849. See Beavan's James and Horace Smith (1899).

Smith, SIR JAMES EDWARD (1759-1828), botanist.

Smith, CAPTAIN JOHN (1580-1631), born at Willoughby, Lincolnshire, was apprenticed to a Lynn merchant, but went to France, and saw some soldiering under Henry IV. Next he served with distinction against the Turks in Hungary, but was captured and sold as a slave. In 1605 he joined an expedition to colonise Virginia; and, saved from death by Princess Pocahontas (q.v.), he was elected president of the colony in 1608, but returned to England in 1609. During 1610-17 he was again in North Virginia. He died in London. His works, reprinted by Arber in 1884, include Occurrences in Virginia (1608), A Description of New England (1616), New England's Trials (1620), History of Virginia (1624), and True Travels of Captain John Smith (1630). See Lives by Scheibler (1782), Sparks (1834), Simms (1843), Warner (1881), and Bradley (1905).

Smith, JOHN (1616-52), Cambridge Platonist, born at Achurch, Northants, became a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1644, and afterwards Hebrew lecturer, Censor Philosophicus, Greek Prælector, Dean, and Catechist. His Select Discourses was published in 1660 (4th ed. 1859).

Smith, JOHN (1652-1742), mezzotinter.

Smith, JOHN PYE, D.D., LL.D. (1774-1851), Congregational divine and geologist, born at Sheffield, was tutor, pastor, and principal at Homerton 1800-50.

Smith, JOHN RAPHAEL (1750-1812), miniaturist, portrait-painter, and especially mezzotinter, son of Thomas Smith (c. 1709-67), Derby landscapist, was bred a linen-draper, and died in Doncaster.

Smith, JOHN STAFFORD (1750-1836), composer.

Smith, JOSEPH, founder of the Mormons, was born at Sharon, Vt., 23d Dec. 1805, received his first 'call' as a prophet at Manchester, N.Y., in 1820. In 1823 an angel told him of a hidden gospel on golden plates, with two stones which should help to translate it from the 'Reformed Egyptian'; and on the night of 22d September 1827 the sacred records were delivered into his hands. The Book of Mormon (1830) contained a fanciful history of America from its colonisation at the time of the confusion of tongues to the 5th century of the Christian era, and claimed to have been written by a prophet named Mormon. Despite ridicule and hostility, and sometimes open violence, the new 'Church of the Latter-day Saints' rapidly gained converts. In 1831 it established its headquarters at Kirtland, Ohio, and built Zion in Missouri. Things culminated in 1838 in a general uprising in Missouri against the Mormons; and Smith was often arrested. In Illinois, near Commerce, was founded Nauvoo (1840), and within three years the Mormons in Illinois numbered 20,000, Smith meanwhile starting 'spiritual wives.' But on 27th June 1844, Smith and his brother Hiram then lying in Carthage jail, 150 masked men broke in and shot the brothers dead. See YOUNG (BRIGHAM), and Kennedy's Early Days of Mormonism (N.Y. 1888).

Smith, PLEASANCE, LADY (1773-1877), née Reeve, a veritable centenarian, who was born and died at Lowestoft, and married Sir James Edward Smith, M.D. (1759-1828), the founder and first president of the Linnean Society.

Smith, ROBERT (1689-1768), Plinian professor of Astronomy at Cambridge from 1716, and master of Trinity from 1742, published Harmonia Mensurarum (1722), A Complete System of Optics (1738), and Harmonics (1748). He founded two Smith Prizes for essays on mathematics or natural philosophy by recent B.A.'s.

Smith, ROBERT ANGUS, F.R.S., LL.D. (1817-84), author of Rain and Air, &c., was born near Glasgow, and settled at Manchester.

Smith, ROBERT PAYNE. See PAYNE-SMITH.

Smith, SIR SIDNEY, born at Westminster, 21st July 1764, entered the navy, and in 1780 was promoted Lieutenant for his bravery at Cape St Vincent. He became captain in 1782, was knighted in 1792, and aided Hood in burning the ships and arsenal at Toulon in 1793. He next watched the Channel for French privateers, but was taken prisoner in 1796, escaped in 1798, and was sent as plenipotentiary to Constantinople, whence he hastened to St Jean d'Acre on hearing of Bonaparte's threatened attack. On 16th March 1799 he captured the enemy's vessels, and held the town heroically until the siege was raised, 20th May. For this he received the thanks of parliament and a pension of £1000. He aided Abercromby in Egypt, destroyed the Turkish fleet off Abydos (1807), blockaded the Tagus, became vice-admiral of the blue in 1810, a K.C.B.

in 1815, and admiral in 1821. He died at Paris, 26th May 1840. See Life by Barrow (1848).

Smith, SYDNEY, wit and reformer, was born at Woodford, Essex, 3d June 1771. His father, Robert Smith (1739-1827), was a clever eccentric, who 'bought, altered, spoilt, and then sold about nineteen different places in England'; from his mother, Maria Olier (died 1802), the daughter of a French Huguenot, Sydney derived all his finest qualities. After five years at Southampton, in 1782 he was sent to Winchester, where he rose to be captain of the school, and whence, having first spent six months at Mont Villiers, in Normandy, in 1789 he proceeded to New College, Oxford. He obtained a fellowship, but of only £100 a-year, and in 1794 was ordained to the Wiltshire curacy of Netheravon near Amesbury. Going with the squire's son to Edinburgh for five years (1798-1803), he there officiated in an Episcopal chapel, married, and in 1802, with Jeffrey, Horner, and Brougham, started the Edinburgh Review. He next lived six years in London, and soon made his mark as a preacher, a lecturer at the Royal Institution on moral philosophy (1804-6), and a brilliant talker; but in 1809 was 'transported' to the living of Foston in Yorkshire, where there had not been a resident clergyman for 150 years, but where he continued for twenty as 'village parson, village doctor, village comforter, village magistrate, and Edinburgh Reviewer.' He farmed his glebe and built a parsonage, but was pinched in his means till in 1820 he came into £400 a-year. In 1828 Lord Lyndhurst presented him to a prebend of Bristol, and next year enabled him to exchange Foston for Combe-Florey rectory, Somerset. In 1831 Earl Grey appointed him a canon of St Paul's. Combe-Florey 'bound up well with London;' and at London he died, 22d February 1845. His writings include sixty-five articles, collected in 1839 from the Edinburgh Review; Peter Plymley's Letters (1807-8) in favour of Catholic emancipation; Three Letters on the Ecclesiastical Commission (1837-39); and other letters and pamphlets on the ballot, American repudiation, the game-laws, prison abuses, &c. Their author is chiefly remembered as the creator of 'Mrs Partington,' the kindly, sensible humorist who stands immeasurably above Theodore Hook, if a good way below Charles Lamb. His Life (1855) was written by his daughter Saba (1802-66), who in 1834 married Dr (Sir) Henry Holland; vol. ii. consists of selections from his Letters. See also Hayward's Essays (1858), Stuart J. Reid's Life of him (1884), G. W. E. Russell's (1905), and a French study by Chevrillon (1894).

Smith, SIR THOMAS (1514-77), statesman and Greek scholar, author of De Republica Anglorum, born at Saffron-Walden, became a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and was knighted in 1548.

Smith, THOMAS. See SMITH, JOHN RAPHAEL.

Smith, THOMAS ASSHETON (1776-1858), master from 1805 of the Quorn, and from 1817 to 1826 of the Burton Hunt, died near Bangor.

Smith, THOMAS SOUTHWOOD, M.D. (1788-1861), hygienist, author of Philosophy of Health, &c.

Smith, WALTER CHALMERS, LL.D. (1824-1906), poet, born in Aberdeen, studied at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and from 1876 to 1894 was a Free Church minister in Edinburgh. He wrote The Bishop's Walk, by 'Orwell' (1861); Obrig Grange, by 'Hermann Kunst' (1872); Hilda among the Broken Gods (1878); Raban, or Life Splinters (1880); North-Country Folk (1888); Kildrostan, a Dramatic Poem (1884); A Heretic (1890), &c. A collected edition appeared in 1902.

Smith, WILLIAM (1769-1839), the Father of English Geology, was born at Churchill, Oxfordshire, and in 1794, appointed engineer to the Somerset Coal Canal, began his study of the strata of England. His epoch-making Geographical Map of England (1815) was followed by twenty-one geologically-coloured maps of English counties (1819-24), in which he was assisted by his nephew, John Phillips (q.v.). He died at Northampton, and so was buried in the Oolite as he had been born on it. See Memoirs by Prof. Phillips (1844).

Smith, WILLIAM, F.S.A. (1808-76), till 1848 a famous London print-seller.

Smith, SIR WILLIAM, born in London, 20th May 1813, studied there, and in 1840 edited parts of Plato and Tacitus. His great Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities (1840-42; 3d ed. 1891) was followed by the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology (1843-49) and Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography (1853-57). He next prepared series of smaller classical dictionaries and 'Students' Manuals'—Greece, Rome, France, Hume, and Hallam. His Gibbon appeared in 1854. Another famous series comprises the Dictionary of the Bible (1860-63; new ed. 1893), Dictionary of Christian Antiquities (with Archdeacon Cheetham, 1875-80), and Dictionary of Christian Biography and Doctrines (with Dr Wace, 1877-87). Editor of the Quarterly from 1867, a D.C.L. of Oxford (1870), &c., Smith was knighted in 1892. He died 7th October 1893.

Smith, WILLIAM HENRY (1808-72), author in 1857-62 of the philosophical novels Thorndale and Gravenhurst, was born at Hammersmith, lived in the Lake Country, and died at Brighton.

Smith, RIGHT HON. WILLIAM HENRY, news-agent, bookseller, and Cabinet minister, was humbly born in London, June 24, 1825, but rose to be head of the largest wholesale newspaper agency. The business steadily expanded, and in 1849 secured the privilege of selling books and newspapers at railway stations. Mr W. H. Smith represented Westminster 1868-85 and the Strand from 1885, was Financial Secretary of the Treasury (1874-77), First Lord of the Admiralty (1877-80), Secretary for War (1885); in the second Salisbury ministry he was First Lord of the Treasury and leader of the Commons till his death, Oct. 6, 1891. His widow was made Viscountess Hambleden. See Life by Sir Herbert Maxwell (1893).

Smith, WILLIAM ROBERTSON, theologian and orientalist, born at Keig, Aberdeenshire, 8th November 1846, graduated at Aberdeen in 1865. He afterwards studied theology at Edinburgh, Bonn, and Göttingen; and in 1870 became professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis in the Free Church College, Aberdeen. His strictly objective article 'Bible' (1875) for the Encyclopædia Britannica was assailed on the ground of its heterodoxy—especially for admitting the non-Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy; but, after a prosecution for heresy, he was acquitted (1880). In consequence, however, of the article on 'Hebrew Language and Literature' (Ency. Brit. June 1880), he was removed from his chair by the Assembly of 1881. He delivered in Edinburgh and Glasgow in 1880-81-82 two series of lectures, substantially republished in The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1881) and The Prophets of Israel (1882). In 1881 he became associated with Prof. Baynes in the editorship of the Ency. Brit., and in 1887 succeeded him as editor-in-chief. At Cambridge he was successively Lord Almoner's professor of Arabic (1883), university librarian (1886), and Adams professor of Arabic (1889). His Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia was published in 1885. Of his Burnett lectures at Aberdeen (1889-91) the first series was published as Religion of the Semites (1889). He died at Cambridge, 31st March 1894. See Life by Black and Chrystal (1912).

Smith, WILLIAM S. See SMITH, SIR SIDNEY.

Smithson, JAMES MACIE, F.R.S. (1765-1829), a natural son of the first Duke of Northumberland (see PERCY), devoted himself to chemistry and mineralogy, and died at Genoa. In a fit of pique at the Royal Society's rejection of a paper by him in 1826, he bequeathed the reversion of £105,000 to found an institution at Washington 'for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.' See two works by W. R. Rhees (1879-80), and The Smithsonian Institution, by Goode (1898).

Smollett, TOBIAS GEORGE, grandson of Sir James Smollett of Bonhill, was born at Dalquhurn, Dumbartonshire, and baptised March 19, 1721. He was sent to Dumbarton grammar-school and Glasgow College, served an apprenticeship to a doctor-apothecary, and in 1739 went up to London with a tragedy, The Regicide, but failed to get it put on the stage. As a naval surgeon's mate he took part in the unfortunate expedition to Carthage in 1741; in 1744 he tried medical practice in London. In 1746 he wrote The Tears of Scotland, and in 1747 married a Jamaica heiress, Anne Lascelles. The Adventures of Roderick Random (1748) appeared anonymously, and was a great hit, as also was The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751). He now set up in Bath as a practitioner, publishing An Essay on the External Use of Water, but did not succeed. Returning to London to live by his pen, he published Ferdinand, Count Fathom (1753), and a translation of Don Quixote (1755), in 1756 became editor of the Tory Critical Review, and in 1756-57 wrote his Complete History of England—an effort that broke down his health. A continuation brings the history down to 1764; in Hume and Smollett's History of England the narrative from 1689 to 1760 is Smollett's. Countless troubles culminated in 1759, when Admiral Knowles brought an action against the Review, and Smollett was fined £100 and sent three months to the King's Bench Prison. In 1757 his farce, Reprisals, or the Tars of Old England, was brought out by Garrick. He was now compiling a universal history and translating Voltaire. The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves appeared in the British Magazine (1760-61), and was published separately in 1762. Smollett edited The Briton 1762-63 in support of Lord Bute's administration, sojourned two years on the Continent, and published in 1766 his Travels through France and Italy. He left England again in 1768 an invalid, and went to live in Italy, relying on his wife's small and uncertain income and on his pen. The Ode to Independence belongs to this period. The Adventures of an Atom, a prose satire, appeared in 1769; and the last and best of his novels, The Expedition of Humphrey Clinker, in 1771. On Sept. 17 he died at Leghorn, and was buried in the English cemetery. There are editions of his works by Anderson (1796), Moore (1797), Roscoe (1840), and Herbert (1877), with Lives prefixed; and short Lives by R. Chambers (1867), Hannay (1887), and Oliphant Smeaton (1897).

Smyth, CHARLES PIAZZI, born at Naples 8d January 1815, a son of Admiral Smyth, was assistant at the Cape Observatory 1885-45, and astro-nomer-royal for Scotland 1845-88. He wrote on the measurements of the Great Pyramid (as of metrological and astrological significance), and died 21st February 1900.

Smythe. See STRANGFORD.

Snell, JOHN (1626-79), born at Colmonell, Ayrshire, died at Oxford, and left lands in Warwickshire to support ten Glasgow students at Balliol. See W. J. Addison, The Snell Exhibitions (1901).

Snider, JACOB (1820-66), a Philadelphia wine-merchant, who busied himself in inventions connected with dyeing, brewing, sheathing of ships, &c., and came to England in 1859 to induce the government to adopt his system of converting Enfield muzzle-loading rifles into breechloaders. He died, worn out by delays, lawsuits, and debts.

Snorri Stur-lason (1179-1241), Icelandic historian, in 1215 was elected supreme judge of the island, but, meddling with the intestine troubles of Norway, incurred the ill-will of King Hakon, who sent instructions to Iceland for his arrest or assassination. He was accordingly murdered. Snorri was a poet of no mean order, and composed the Younger or Prose Edda and the Heimskringla; this last is a series of sagas of the Norwegian kings down to 1177 (trans. by Laing, 1844; new ed. by R. B. Anderson, 1889).

Snyders, FRANCIS (1579-1657), an Antwerp painter, first of still-life, then of animals. His wolf and boar fights are admirable. He helped Jordaens and Rubens with their animal figures.

Soane, SIR JOHN (1753-1837), architect, son of a mason, Swan, near Reading, gained the travelling scholarship of the Royal Academy, and spent 1777-80 in Italy. He became architect to the Bank of England, St James's Palace, and the Office of Woods and Forests, and Royal Academy professor of Architecture (1806). At his death he bequeathed his house in Lincoln's Inn Fields and the valuable art and antiquarian museum it contained, including pictures by Hogarth, Reynolds, and Turner, models by Flaxman, the MS. of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, &c., to the nation. See Memoir by Britton (1834) and Art Journal (1882).

Sobieski. See JOHN III. (of Poland); and for the 'SOBIESKI-STUARTS,' see ALBANIE.

Socin, ALBERT, Arabist, born at Basel, 1831 October 1844, was called to a chair at Tübingen in 1876, and at Leipzig in 1890. Author of more than a dozen works, he died 1st July 1899.

Socinus, LÆLIUS, or LELIO SOZZINI (1525-62), born of good family at Sienna, studied law, but, drawn to theology, by 1546 was one of a private theological society who had rejected the doctrine of the Trinity. Some of the members were executed; but Socinus fled to France, England, Holland, Germany, Poland, and finally Zurich.

His nephew, FAUSTUS, born at Sienna, 5th December 1539, became a heretic before he was out of his teens. He entered the service of the Grand-duke of Tuscany's sister, but in 1575 retired to Basel to prosecute his theological studies, and in 1579 went to Poland, where he obtained great influence, teaching that Luther and Calvin had not gone far enough, and that human reason was the only solid basis of Protestantism. The Protestants were alarmed, but Socinus held his own in public disputations till a malicious charge of sedition drove him from Cracow. He married the daughter of a Polish nobleman, his protector. She died in 1587, and in 1588 at the Synod of Bresz (on the borders of Lithuania) he combated all the chief Christian dogmas—the divinity of Christ, propitiatory sacrifice, original sin, human depravity, the doctrine of necessity, and justification by faith. In 1598, on the publication of his De Jesu Christo Servatore, his enemies stirred up the populace of Cracow against him; he was nearly murdered, and sought refuge in the village of Luclawice, where he died 3d March 1604. For Lælius see the Vita by Ilgen (1814); and for Faustus, a Life by Wallace (1850).

Socrates, Athenian philosopher, was the son of Sophroniscus, a sculptor, and Phænaretê, a midwife, and cannot have been born later than 469 B.C. He received the usual education of an Athenian youth, and learned also geometry and astronomy. The most important influence on his mental development was his intercourse with the sophists who frequented Athens. He took part in three campaigns, and distinguished himself by his bravery, extraordinary physical vigour, and indifference to fatigue or cold or heat. He was a good citizen, but the only political office he ever held was when in 406 he was one of the senate of Five Hundred. He held aloof from politics, considering that he had received a call to the pursuit of philosophy. It was from men and about men that he desired to learn, wiser than others only in being conscious of his own ignorance. He wrote no books. Out of his wide circle of acquaintances some came to be attached to him more closely by ties of affection and admiration; yet there was no formal bond of discipleship. From two of these friends, Xenophon and Plato, we learn all we can know with certainty about his personality and his way of thinking. Yet, while Plato often makes Socrates the mouthpiece of ideas that in all likelihood were not held by him, Xenophon, a soldier and by no means a philosopher, makes Socrates a very much more commonplace person than he must have been, else he could never have been the initiator of a great movement in philosophy. Though Plato is apparently not bound by any rigid considerations of historical accuracy, we may yet accept the picture he gives us of the habits and conversation of Socrates as a true portrait by a great imaginative artist. Socrates was odd and even ugly in aspect, and indifferent to ordinary comfort; but he was by no means an ascetic. The gossip about his wife Xanthippe comes to us mostly from late sources. Xenophon tells us that she had a shrewish temper, which Socrates bore patiently. There has been much diversity of opinion about the 'divine sign' of which Socrates used to speak as a supernatural voice that guided him now and then; certainly to the average Athenian there was something blasphemous in his attitude towards religion. He was charged in 399, under the restored democracy, with neglecting the gods of the state and introducing new divinities, and with corrupting the morals of the young. These charges were made the subject of a legal prosecution. Plato's Apology probably gives the substance of Socrates' defence—a bold vindication of his entire life. The vote of condemnation was carried only by a very small majority; but, provoked by what doubtless seemed to them obstinacy and insolence in the old man, the judges voted the penalty of death. His last day was spent with his friends, and in the evening he drank the hemlock. He had sought to base conduct on knowledge, and went about convincing men not so much of sin as of ignorance. But his conclusion was not mere scepticism or despair of knowledge. He always adopted the method of question and answer—the 'dialectic' method in its literal sense. Ethics was the only part of philosophy with which Socrates cared to occupy himself, and in ethics his main doctrine may be summed up in the formula, 'Virtue is knowledge; vice is ignorance.' We cannot say with certainty how far his opinions about the gods differed from those of the popular religion. From the language of Plato's Apology it seems pretty clear that Socrates did not hold the definite views about the immortality of the soul which are maintained in the Phædo, but left the question of a future life uncertain. He founded no special school of philosophy, but gave their starting-point to several distinct schools—the Megaric, Cynic, and Cyrenaic schools. Plato alone inherited his master's spirit in its fullness. See Zeller's Socrates and the Socratic Schools (Eng. trans. 1868) and books cited at PLATO.

Socrates, a Constantinople advocate, wrote an honest but feeble Ecclesiastiki Historia 306-439. Editions are by Hussey (1853) and W. Bright (1878); there is an Eng. translation in Bohn's Library (1851) and in Schaff's (N.Y. 1891).

Sodoma, or GIOVANNI ANTONIO BAZZI (1477-1549), religious and historical painter, born at Vercelli, painted in Rome, but more at Sienna, where he died. See Life by Cust (1906).

Solario, ANTONIO (c. 1382-1455), a Neapolitan painter, born at Civita in the Abruzzi, and nicknamed 'Lo Zingaro,' was originally a blacksmith.

Soldene, EMILY, operatic singer. See her Theatrical and Musical Recollections (1897).

Soliman. See SOLYMAN.

Solis, ANTONIO DE (1610-86), Spanish playwright and historian, was born at Alcalá de Henares.

Solis, JUAN DIAZ DE, Spanish navigator, was with Pinzon when he discovered (1499) the mouth of the Amazon. In 1515 he himself was sent out to find a sea-passage to the East Indies through the American continent. He discovered the Rio de la Plata, but was killed by the natives (1516). See the Life of him by Medina (1897).

Solomon, King of Israel (c. 1015-977 B.C.), was the second son of David and Bathsheba. His reign was outwardly splendid. The kingdom attained its widest limit; the temple and royal palaces were built on a scale of magnificence heretofore unknown. But the taxation entailed by the luxury of the court bred the discontent that led in the next reign to the disruption of the kingdom; and the king's alliance with heathen courts and his idolatrous queens and concubines provoked the discontent of the prophetic party. Solomon was credited with transcendent wisdom; in later Jewish and Mohammedan literature he was believed to control the spirits of the invisible world. There is no reason to suppose that he had anything to do with any of the works to which his name has been attached—Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and, in the Apocrypha, the Wisdom of Solomon.

Solomon, ABRAHAM (1824-62), subject-painter, his best-known picture 'Waiting for the Verdict' (1857), was born in London.

Solomon, EDWARD (1855-95), composer of Billee Taylor, The Nautch Girl, and other comic operas.

Solomon, SOLOMON JOSEPH, subject and portrait painter, born in London, 16th September 1860, studied in London, Paris, and Munich, and worked in Italy, Spain, and Morocco. In 1896 he was elected A.R.A., in 1906 R.A.

Solon, lawgiver of ancient Athens, born about 640 or 638 B.C., died about 558 or 559. He was a trader, and wital a poet. What is perhaps the finest of his elegies is quoted by Demosthenes; and several quotations—one of twenty lines—occur in Aristotle's Constitution of Athens (now known to us, since 1891, from a papyrus acquired by the British Museum). The Megarian war (610-600) saw the occasion of Solon's first political achievements. The sarcasms of his stirring Tyrtean verse induced the desponding Athenians to continue the struggle, and Solon was placed at the head of an expedition to Salamis which won the 'lovely island' for Athens. In his time there was great economic distress in Attica, aggravated by the harsh law of debt and the want of a middle-class between the nobility and the poor. A desperate conflict was imminent, when in 594 both parties concurred in inviting Solon to assume the archonship. On laying down office at the end of the year he was requested to reform the entire political constitution. Solon's object was to give the poorest class some control over the magistracy, and a limit was placed by him on the accumulation of land; no citizen could be enslaved for debt; absolute freedom in bequeathing property was ensured to any citizen who died childless; arbitrary power of fathers over their children was restrained, and arbitrary disinheritance forbidden; all debts public and private were cancelled; and a reform of the money standard was made. Solon's later years belong rather to legend than to history. We are told that he left Athens for ten years, visiting Cyprus, Asia Minor, and Egypt. At Athens the wild conflict of parties disturbed the application of the new constitution, and, seeing the failure of his plans with the deepest distress, Solon retired into private life, and died soon after the usurpation of Pisistratus. See the editions of the Constitution of Athens, by Kenyon (1891), Kaibel and Wilamowitz-Moellendorf (1891), and Sandys (1893), and Eng. translations by Kenyon (1891), Dymes (1891), and Poste (1891).

Solyman, or SULEIMAN II. (1496-1566), 'the Magnificent,' greatest of the Ottoman sultans, at twenty-four succeeded his father, Selim I. He removed incompetent and corrupt officials and instituted great internal reforms. But before this task was completed he invaded Hungary to enforce the payment of the tribute (1521). Then he attacked the Knights of St John at Rhodes, who inflicted a loss of nearly 100,000 men upon the Turks before surrendering (1523) after a six months' siege. In 1526 he again led an army into Hungary, slew King Louis at Mohacs, all but annihilated his army, and captured Budapest. By 1529 he was back again in Hungary; the emperor was turned out of Buda and driven to Vienna, which city the sultan besieged (September to October); but after a desperate assault he was obliged to retreat. He next conquered (1534) large portions of Armenia and Persia, sent out his fleets against the Christian powers of the Mediterranean, and by his lieutenants (Barbarossa and others) conquered all North Africa except Morocco. Tunis was recovered by Charles V. in 1535. In 1548, by a truce with the empire, Solyman was left in possession of the greater part of Hungary and Transylvania and granted a yearly tribute of 50,000 ducats. In 1565 his fleet and army sustained a severe reverse in an attempt to reduce Malta; and on 4th Sept. 1566, whilst besieging Szigeth in Hungary, Solyman died.

Somers, SIR GEORGE (1554-1611), an English navigator, whose shipwreck on the Bermudas led him to colonise them from Virginia in 1611.

Somers, JOHN, LORD (1652-1716), Whig statesman, was born at Worcester, an attorney's son, studied at Trinity College, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1676. Associated with the 'country party,' he was one of the counsel for the Seven Bishops (1688), and after the Revolution was successively Solicitor-general, Attorney-general, and Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, until in 1697 he became Lord Chancellor and Baron Somers of Evesham. He was William's most trusted minister, and was the object of frequent attacks, one of which in 1700 resulted in his being deprived of the seal, and another in 1701 in an impeachment by the Commons, rejected by the Lords. He was President of the Council 1708-10. The Somers Tracts (1748), state papers from his library, were re-edited by Sir Walter Scott (1809-15).

Somerset, LORD HENRY, song-composer, the second son of the eighth Duke of Beaufort (q.v.), was born 7th December 1849. He married in 1872 Isabel, eldest daughter of the third Earl Somers, who, born 3rd August 1851, is a prominent advocate of temperance, woman's work, &c.

Somerville, MRS MARY, daughter of Admiral Sir William Fairfax, was born 26th Dec. 1780 at Jedburgh, in the manse of her uncle and future father-in-law, Thomas Somerville, D.D. (1741-1830), author of My Own Life and Times. In 1804 she married a cousin, Captain Greig, Russian consul in London. He died in 1806, and it was not till her return north as a widow that she was free to resume the study of mathematics and natural science. In 1812 she married another cousin, Dr Wm. Somerville, inspector of the army medical board; they removed to London in 1816. In 1823 Lord Brougham invited her to popularise Laplace's Mécanique Céleste; and the Celestial Mechanism of the Heavens (1830) was received with the greatest admiration. She was awarded a pension of £300 in 1835. Other works were The Connection of the Physical Sciences (1835), Physical Geography (1848), and Molecular and Microscopic Science (1866). Her last years spent in Italy, she died at Naples, 29th Nov. 1872. See autobiography (1873).

Somerville, WILLIAM (1675-1742), squire of Edstone, Warwickshire, was born at Wolsley in Staffordshire. He wrote The Chase (1735) and other poetry.

Sonnenschein, WILLIAM SWAN, born in London, 5th May 1855, and educated at University College, founded in 1878 a publishing firm, converted 1895 into a limited company. His admirable Best Books (1887) and Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literature (1895) were continued in 1910 et seq.

Sontag, HENRIETTE, COUNTESS ROSSI (1806-54), singer, born at Coblenz, made her début at Prague at fifteen. After a brilliant operatic career she married Count Rossi in 1828, and left the stage; but, compelled by pecuniary difficulties to re-appear in 1849, she met with renewed success. She died of cholera in Mexico.

Sophia, Electress of Hanover (1630-1714), youngest child of Elizabeth (q.v.), queen of Bohemia, in 1658 married Ernest Augustus, Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, afterwards Elector of Hanover, and was the mother of George I. See her Memoirs, and the monograph by A. W. Ward (1903). For the wife of George I. (q.v.), see KÖNIGSMARK.

Sophocles (c. 496-c. 405 B.C.), Athenian tragic poet, at twenty-eight entered into competition with Æschylus, his elder by thirty years, and was preferred by the judges. He never forsook Athens, but repeatedly went on embassies to other Greek states, and in the Samian war of 440 was general jointly with Pericles. Of his seven extant plays, the probable order is Ajax, Antigone, Electra, Œdipus Tyrannus, Trachinix, Œdipus Coloneus, Philoctetes. Less than a tithe of the work of Sophocles remains to us; but of these seven plays each one stands prominently forth amongst the master-works of human genius. The characteristics of Sophocles are a dramatic structure all but faultless, and the combination of wonderful subtlety with intense fire, of a noble ideal with truth and naturalness. His subjects were necessarily drawn from Hellenic legend. In his treatment of them he never loses sight of the main principles of tragic art. His method turns largely on pathetic contrasts of situation and of character. Of other subjects known to have been treated by Sophocles those most suggestive of tragic interest are Alcmæon, Atreus, Danaë, Hermione, Thamyra, Thyestes in Sicyon, Iphigenia, Clytemnestra, Crensa, Læocoon, Meleager, Niobe, Enomaius, Peleus, Telephus, Tereus, Troilus, Phædra, Phineus. Sophocles has not impressed the world with superhuman grandeur, as Æschylus has done. Nor, like Euripides, has he charmed mankind by the witchery of style in particular scenes and descriptive passages. But to the greatest critics his merits as a dramatic artist have seemed supreme. The editio princeps was printed at Venice in 1502. Of the editors of the whole or part of the seven plays the most important names are Brunck, Gottfried Hermann, Wunder, Dindorf, Schneidewin, Hauck, Bergk, Lobeck (Ajax), Böckh, Meineke, Elmsley, Buttmann, Linwood, Kennedy, Wolff, O. Jahn. Modern English annotated editions are those of Blaydes and Paley (1859-80), Lewis Campbell (1873-81), and Jebb (Cambridge Press, 7 vols. 1884-97). Among English translations are those of Thomas Fraclin (1759; new ed. 1886), Robert Potter (1788), Dean Plumptre (1865), R. Whitelaw (1883), Lewis Campbell (complete, 1883; new ed. 1896), and Sir G. Young (1888) in verse; and those in Jebb's edition and by E. P. Coleridge (1893) in prose. See Hense, Studien zu Sophocles (1880); Lewis Campbell, Sophocles (1879); and his Greek Tragedy for English Readers (1891).

Sopwith, THOMAS (1803-79), a Newcastle mining engineer, geologist, and mathematician. See Life by Sir B. W. Richardson (1891).

Sorbonne, ROBERT DE (1201-74), Louis IX.'s confessor, founded the college of the Sorbonne.

Sorby, HENRY CLIFTON (1826-1908), LL.D., F.R.S., microscopist and geologist, was born at Woodbourne, Sheffield. He wrote on crystals, the structure of iron and steel, &c.

Sordello, an Italian poet named by Dante. Palazzi edited his poems (Ven. 1887).

Sorel, AGNES (c. 1422-50), mistress from 1444 of Charles VII. of France, was born at Fromenteau, Touraine. Her influence may have been partly beneficial. See Duquesne, La Belle Sorel (1909).

Sorel, ALBERT (1842-1906), historian of the Revolution, born at Houffleur, in 1894 was elected as Taine's successor to the Academy.

Sotheby, SAMUEL LEIGH (1806-61), London book auctioneer and writer on typography.

Sothern, EDWARD ASKEW (1826-81), comedian, born at Liverpool, in 1849 joined a company of players in Jersey, and soon afterwards the stock company at Birmingham. From 1852 he appeared in the United States, without much success, until in 1858 Our American Cousin, by Tom Taylor, was brought out in New York, with Sothern cast for the small part of Lord Dun-dreary. The piece was a poor thing, and the English peer known to playgoers was Sothorn's own creation. In 1861 it was produced at the Haymarket, and ran for over 400 nights; it was again and again revived in later years. Sothorn is remembered solely as Dundreary; his other chief part was David Garrick in Robertson's comedy. See Mémoir by T. E. Pemberton (1890).

Soto, FERDINANDO DE. See DE SOTO.

Sotomayor, CRISTOBAL DE, Spanish conquistador, lieutenant to Ponce de Leon, died in Porto Rico, 25th July 1511.

Soult, NICOLAS-JEAN DE DIEU, born at Saint-Anans-la-Bastide, Tarn, March 29, 1769, enlisted in 1785, and in 1794 became general of brigade. Masséna made him general of division (April 1799), and owed to him much of the glory of his Swiss and Italian campaigns. In 1804 Soult was appointed by Napoleon marshal of France. He led the right wing in the campaign closed at Austerlitz, did good service in the Prussian and Russian campaigns (1806-7), and after the peace of Tilsit was created Duke of Dalmatia. In Spain he pursued the retreating British, and, though repulsed at Corunna, forced them to evacuate the country. He then conquered Portugal, and governed it till the arrival of Wellesley at Coimbra made him retreat to Galicia. In 1809-10, as commander-in-chief in Spain, he gained a brilliant victory at Ocaña and overran Andalusia. In attempting to succour Badajoz he was defeated by Beresford at Albuera (1811). After Salamanca and the advance of the British on Madrid, Soult, mortified at the obstinacy of Joseph Bonaparte and the rejection of his plans, demanded his recall; but Napoleon, after Vittoria, sent him back to Spain. By brilliant tactics he neutralised the strategy of Wellington, but was defeated at Orthez and Toulouse. He turned a royalist after Napoleon's abdication, but joined him again on his return from Elba. After Waterloo he rallied the wreck of the army at Laon, but agreed with Carnot as to the uselessness of further resistance. He was banished and not recalled till 1819, but was gradually restored to all his honours. In 1838 he was sent as ambassador to the coronation of Queen Victoria. In 1845 he retired as 'Marshal-general of France.' He died at Soutberg, his château near his birthplace, Nov. 26, 1851. See Soult's Mémoires (1854), and works by Salle (1834) and Clerc (1893). [See.]

South, SIR JAMES (1785-1867), astronomer, the son of a Southwark druggist, practised medicine. In 1829 he was elected president of the Astronomical Society, and knighted the following year.

South, ROBERT, born at Hackney in 1633, from Westminster passed as a student to Christ Church in 1651. In 1658 he received orders from a deprived bishop, and in 1660 was appointed public orator. His vigorous sermons, full of mockery of the Puritans, delighted the restored royalists. He became domestic chaplain to Clarendon, prebendary of Westminster in 1663, canon of Christ Church in 1670, rector of Islip in Oxfordshire in 1678, and chaplain to Clarendon's son on his embassy to the Polish court of John Sobieski (1676). He suppressed his disapproval of James II.'s Declaration of Indulgence, 'acquiesced in' the Revolution, but blazed out with anger against the proposed scheme of Comprehension. In 1693 began his great controversy with Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, who had defended the Trinity against the Socinians. South flung his Animadversions anonymously into the fray, but the bitter irony and fierce sarcasms quickly betrayed his hand.

Sherlock published a Defence, to which South rejoined in his Tritheism charged upon Dr Sherlock. The controversy became the talk of the town, and the king himself interposed. South made interest for Sacheverell, and is said to have refused the see of Rochester and deanery of Westminster (1713). He died 8th July 1716. South's sermons are masterpieces of clear thought expressed in vigorous English, sometimes rising to splendid eloquence, and often seasoned with wit and sarcasm. He abhorred mysticism and extravagance, sneers at the new philosophy, and carried to a height unusual even among royalists the fatal Stuart theories of passive obedience and the divine right of kings. His sermons fill 11 vols. (1692-1744); in 1717 appeared his Posthumous Works, with Memoir; also his Opera Posthuma Latina (all republished by the Clarendon Press in 1823). See his Sermons on Several Occasions (new ed. 1878), Quarterly Review (1868), and Dean Lake in Classic Preachers (1877).

Southampton, HENRY WROTHERSLEY, EARL OF (1573-1624), friend and patron of Shakespeare, was mixed up with Essex's insurrection, took part in the colonisation of Virginia, was imprisoned in 1621 for opposition to the court, and died at Bergen-op-Zoom fighting for the Dutch.—His grandfather, THOMAS WROTHERSLEY, first earl, was Lord-chancellor 1544-47, and died in 1549.

Southcott, JOANNA (c. 1750-1814), born in Devonshire, joined the Methodists, but about 1792 declared herself to be the woman of Rev. xii. She came to London on the invitation of William Sharp the engraver, and published A Warning (1803), The Book of Wonders (1813-14), &c. At length she announced that she was to give birth on 19th October 1814 to a second Prince of Peace. Her followers received this announcement with devout reverence. But she merely fell into a trance, and died of dropsy, 27th December. Her followers, who continued to believe that she would rise again, still numbered over 200 in 1851, and became extinct about 1901.

Southerne, THOMAS (1660-1746), dramatist, born at Oxmantown, Co. Dublin, from Trinity College, Dublin, passed to the Middle Temple, London, and in 1682 began his career with a compliment to the Duke of York in The Loyal Brother. Dryden wrote the prologue and epilogue, and Southerne finished Dryden's Cleomenes (1692). He served a short time under the Duke of Berwick, and at his request wrote the Spartan Dame. His best plays were The Fatal Marriage (1694) and Oroonoko (1696), based on Afra Behu's novel. His comedies are thin, but made him fat.

Southey, ROBERT, born at Bristol, 12th August 1774, the son of an unlucky linen-draper, in 1788 was placed by an uncle at Westminster. There Picart's Religious Ceremonies led him 'to conceive a design of rendering every mythology the basis of a narrative poem'; and thence in 1792 he was expelled for writing an article against flogging in a school magazine. Next year he entered Balliol with a view to orders, and at Oxford had a visit from Coleridge, who infected him with his dream of a 'Pantisocracy' on the banks of the Susquehanna. The Pantisocrats required wives, and wives were forthcoming in three Miss Frickers of Bristol. The eldest, Sara, fell to Coleridge; the second, Edith, to Southey; and Mary, the third, to a Robert Lovel, who with Southey in 1794 published a booklet of poems, and died two years afterwards penniless. The Pantisocrats furthermore required money, and money was not forthcoming; so, having tried medicine, having lectured with some success, and having in November 1795 secretly married his Edith, Southey started on a six months' visit to Lisbon, where his uncle was chaplain to the British factory. He returned to England to take up law, but reading Coke to him was 'threshing straw'; so after sundry migrations in 1803 he settled at Gretna Hall, Keswick. The Coleridges were there already, and thither came Mrs Lovel: three households were to rest on Southey's shoulders. His school-friend Wynn allowed him £160 a-year from 1796 till 1807, when a government pension of a like amount was granted him (he was turning meanwhile a Tory), and on this he devoted himself to a life of strenuous, incessant authorship. Joan of Arc had already appeared in 1795, and Thalaba in 1801; there followed Madoc (1805), The Curse of Kehama (1810), Roderick (1814), History of Brazil (1810-19), Lives of Nelson (1813), Wesley (1820), and Bunyan (1830), A Vision of Judgment (1821), Book of the Church (1824), History of the Peninsular War (1823-32), Colloquies on Society (1829), Naval History (1833-40), and The Doctor (1834-47), in which comes the nursery classic of 'The Three Bears.' His works number nearly fifty, and to them must be added his contributions to the periodicals—to the Quarterly alone ninety-three articles (1808-38). These paid him handsomely, so that he died worth £12,000. His life flowed quietly on, its chief events his visit to Scott and Scotland (1805), his first meeting with Landor (1808), the visits from Shelley and Ticknor (1811, 1819), the laureateship (1813), the death of his first boy Herbert (1806-16), the surreptitious publication of his revolutionary drama, Wat Tyler (1817; written 1794), little tours in Belgium, Switzerland, Holland, and France (1815-38), an honorary D.C.L. of Oxford (1820), his return as M.P. for Downton (unsolicited and declined, 1826), and Peel's offer of a baronetcy, with the addition of £300 a-year to his pension (1835). It came at a time of sorrow, for his wife had six months before been placed in an asylum, and though she was brought back to Keswick, she was brought back only to die (1837). Southey never held up after that, though in 1839 he married the poetess Caroline Anne Bowles (1787-1854), for twenty years his friend and correspondent. He died 21st March 1843, and is buried in Crosthwaite churchyard. No poet so well known by name is so little known by his poetry. There are some short exceptions, of course—the 'Holly Tree,' 'Battle of Blenheim,' 'Stanzas written in my Library,' half-a-dozen more. His epics repel, not so much by prolixity or by their irregular, sometimes rhymeless metres, as by the unreality of their fact and fancy. With Southey's prose it is otherwise. He wrote out of the fullness of knowledge, and his was that rarest gift of good pure English. Yet even here he wrote far too much, and he was often unhappy in his choice of subjects. One book alone by him, the Life of Nelson, belongs to universal literature. His Life and Correspondence (1849-50), by his younger son, the Rev. Cuthbert Southey (1819-89), contains a delightful fragment of autobiography, coming down to 1789. It also gives hundreds of his letters to Cottle, Landor, Lamb, William Taylor, Rickman, Ebenezer Elliott, Kirke White, Bernard Barton, Charlotte Brontë, Crabb Robinson, Sir Henry Taylor, &c. A Selection from these was edited by his son-in-law, the Rev. J. W. Warter (1856), who also issued Southey's Commonplace Book (1849-51); his Correspondence with Caroline Bowles was edited by Prof. Dowden (1881). See the latter's Southey (1880); Dennis's Southey: Story of his Life (new ed. 1895); and the brief memoir by Sidney R. Thompson (1888).

Southwell, ROBERT, poet and Jesuit martyr, was born about 1562 at Horsham, Norwich, of an ancient family now represented by Viscount Southwell. He was sent at fifteen to Paris, and thence to Rome, being received into the Society of Jesus in 1578. He distinguished himself so highly in philosophy and theology as to be appointed prefect of the English College. He was ordained priest in 1584, and three years later, arriving in England with Garnet (q.v.), was first sheltered by Lord Vaux, and next became chaplain to the Countess of Arundel. Six years of quiet followed, in which he wrote his Consolation for Catholics and most of his poems. In 1592 he was betrayed, tortured, and thrown into the Tower. After three years' imprisonment he wrote to Cecil to demand an open trial; the inevitable sentence followed, and on 21st February 1595 he suffered bravely at Tyburn. His longest poem is Saint Peter's Complaint; his most famous, The Burning Babe, an exquisite little piece of sanctified fancy. Grosart edited his works for his Fuller's Worthies Library. [Suthell.]

Souvestre, ÉMILE (1806-54), novelist and playwright, born at Morlaix, wrote charming sketches of Brittany and its people—Les Derniers Bretons and Foyer Breton. Un Philosophe sous les Toits was crowned by the Academy in 1851. His plays were less successful; but his Causeries historiques et littéraires (1854) are interesting.

Souza, MADAME DE (1761-1836), born Adélaïde-Marie-Émilie Filleul at the Norman château of Longpré, emerged from a convent in 1784 to marry the Comte de Flahaut (1727-98). At the Revolution she found refuge, with her only son, in Germany and England, and here learned of her husband's execution at Arras. She turned to writing, her first book the delightful Adèle de Sénange (1794). In 1802 she married the Marquis de Souza-Botelho (1758-1825), Portuguese minister at Paris. Later novels were Émilie et Alphonse (1799), Charles et Marie (1801), Eugène de Rothelin (1808), and La Comtesse de Fargy (1822).

Sowerby, JAMES (1757-1822), born at Lambeth, commenced as portraitist and miniaturist, but is remembered by his illustrated English Botany (1792-1807; new ed. 1863-86), the text by Sir J. E. Smith. Other works dealt with Fungi, Conchology, and Mineralogy. Three sons who followed in his footsteps were James de Carle Sowerby (1787-1871), George Brettingham (1788-1854), and Charles Edward (1795-1842); a son of the second was George Brettingham (1812-84), author of many illustrated works on natural history.

Soyer, ALEXIS (1809-58), born at Meaux, was destined for the church, but became the most famous cook of his time. He had a post in Prince Polignac's kitchen in 1830, was nearly murdered by the revolutionists, escaped to London, and was chef in the Reform Club 1837-50. He went to Ireland during the famine (1847), and in 1855 to the Crimea to reform the food-system. His works comprised Culinary Relaxations (1845), Charitable Cookery (1847), The Modern Housewife (1849), Shilling Cookery-book (1854), and Culinary Campaign in the Crimea (1857). See memoirs by Volant and Warren (1858). [Swa-yay.]

Sozomen, a Constantinople lawyer who about 440 wrote a work on Greek church history, which is largely a plagiarism from Socrates (q.v.).

Spalding, JOHN (c. 1600-70), Aberdeen diarist, royalist, and commissary clerk; after him was named a book-club (1839-70; revived 1887).

Spallanzani, LAZARO (1729-99), born at Scandiano in Modena, held chairs at Reggio, Modena, and Pavia, worked at physiology, and about 1760 overturned the doctrine of spontaneous generation. He visited Turkey, Naples (when Vesuvius was in eruption, 1788), and Sicily, and wrote Viaggi alle due Sicilie (1792). In 1780 he demonstrated the true nature of digestion and the functions of spermatozoa and ovum. [Spal-lan-tzah'nee.]

Spanheim, FRIEDRICH (1600-48), born at Amberg, became in 1631 professor of Theology at Geneva, in 1641 at Leyden, and took part in the controversy with Amyraut.—His son, EZECHIEL (1629-1710), was professor of Rhetoric at Leyden, and tutor to the sons of the Elector Palatine. In 1665 he represented the Palatinate and Brandenburg in England, and in 1680-89 was ambassador at Paris. He wrote on ancient law and numismatics.—Another son, FRIEDRICH (1632-1701), was professor of Theology at Heidelberg (1655) and Leyden (1670), and defended Calvinism against Descartes and Cocceus. [Span-hime.]

Sparks, JARED (1789-1866), biographer, born at Willington, Conn., became tutor at Harvard, a conductor of the North American Review, and in 1819 Unitarian minister at Baltimore. In 1821-23 he edited the Unitarian Miscellany, in which he published his Letters on Trinitarian and Unitarian Doctrines. In 1821 he was chosen chaplain to congress, but in 1823 abandoned preaching, and for seven years edited the North American Review. In 1832 he commenced his Library of American Biography. He was in 1839-49 McLean professor of History at Harvard, and in 1849-53 president of the college. Other works were Life of John Ledyard (1828) and Life of Gouverneur Morris (1832). He also edited the Writings of George Washington (1834-37), Correspondence of the Revolution (1829-53), and Works of Franklin (1836-40). See Life by H. B. Adams (1892).

Spartacus, leader of the Roman slaves in the revolt of 73 B.C., was a Thracian by birth, and from a shepherd had become a leader of a band of robbers when he was captured and sold to a trainer of gladiators at Capua. He escaped with some seventy followers, and made for Vesuvius, where hordes of runaway slaves soon joined him. He overpowered a force sent against him from Capua, and passed from victory to victory, overrunning Southern Italy and sacking cities, while his numbers grew to a hundred thousand men. He knew the real weakness of his position, and strove to persuade his victorious bands to disperse; but, forced to continue the contest, he showed himself a consummate captain, and routed one Roman army after another. At length in 71 Crassus and Lucullus reduced him to extremities, and after making a heroic stand against Crassus upon the river Silarus, he was cut down.

Speckbacher, JOSEPH (1764-1820), a Tyrolean patriot, known as 'Der Mann vom Rinn,' who, like Hofer (q.v.), fought with distinction in 1809. See Lives by Mayr (1851) and Knauth (1868).

Spedding, JAMES, was born at Mirehouse near Bassenthwaite, 26th June 1808, younger son of a Cumberland squire. From Bury St Edmunds he proceeded in 1827 to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which at his death he had long been an honorary fellow. He held a post at the Colonial Office 1835-41; in 1842 accompanied Lord Ashburton to America as secretary; and in 1847 might have become Under-secretary of State, with £2000 a-year. But he had already devoted himself to the task of his life—the editing and the vindicating of Bacon (q.v.). He died in St George's Hospital, 9th March 1881, run over by a cab a week before. His publications were Works, Life, and Letters of Bacon (1857-74), Publishers and Authors (1867), Life and Times of Bacon (1878), Reviews and Discussions not relating to Bacon (1879), Studies in English History (in conjunction with J. Gairdner, 1881), and Evenings with a Reviewer (relating to Bacon, 1881). See brief Memoir by G. S. Venables prefixed to last, and also Edward FitzGerald's Letters (1889).

Speed, JOHN (1542-1629), antiquary, born in Cheshire, worked most of his days in London as a tailor. His extraordinary historical learning gained him the acquaintance of Sir Fulke Greville and Spelman, and opened up a door for the publication of his fifty-four Maps of England and Wales (1608-10; incorporated into The Theatre of Great Britain, 1611) and History of Great Britain under the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans (1611). His theological writings are unimportant.

Speke, JOHN HANNING, African explorer, born 4th May 1827 at Jordans, Ilminster, in the Indian army saw service in the Punjab. During peace he made expeditions into the Himalayas, collecting natural history specimens. In 1854 he joined Burton in a hazardous expedition to Somaliland; in 1857 the Royal Geographical Society sent out the two to search for the equatorial lakes of Africa. Speke, whilst travelling alone, discovered the Victoria Nyanza, and saw in it the head-waters of the Nile. In 1860 he returned with Captain J. A. Grant, explored the lake, and tracked the Nile flowing out of it. He was about to defend the identification against Burton's doubts at the British Association meeting at Bath, 15th September 1864, when, that very morning, he accidentally shot himself whilst partridge-shooting. He wrote Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile (1863) and What led to the Discovery of the Source of the Nile (1864).

Spelman, SIR HENRY (1562-1641), antiquary, born at Congham, Lynn, passed from Trinity College, Cambridge, to Lincoln's Inn. He was high-sheriff of Norfolk in 1604, was employed in public affairs at home and in Ireland, and was knighted; in 1612 he settled in London to pursue his studies. His ponderous Glossarium Archaeologicum (1626-64) was completed by his son and Dugdale; his Concilia Ecclesiastica Orbis Britannici (1639-64) he also left incomplete. Other works on Tithes and on Sacrilege (new ed. by Eales, 1888) are no less learned. Reliquiae Spelmannianae was edited, with a Life, by [Bishop] Edmund Gibson (1698).—Sir JOHN SPELMAN (d. 1643) inherited all his father's tastes and part of his learning, was knighted in 1641, and wrote, besides five other works, a Life of King Alfred (Lat. trans. 1678; Eng. original, ed. by Hearne, 1709).

Spence, JOSEPH, anecdotist, born at Kingsclere, Hants, 25th April 1699, from Winchester passed to New College, Oxford, and became a fellow in 1722, professor of poetry (1727), rector of Birchanger and Great Harwood, professor of Modern History (1737), and a prebendary of Durham (1754). He secured Pope's friendship by his Essay on Pope's Odyssey (1727), and began to record Pope's conversation and anecdotes of other friends and notabilities. In 1736 he edited Sackville's Corboduc, and in 1747 published his Polymetis. He was drowned at Byfleet, Surrey, August 20, 1768. The best edition of the Anecdotes is by Singer (1820; 2d ed. 1858), with memoir.

Spence, WILLIAM (1783-1860), entomologist.

Spencer, a family founded by the Hon. John Spencer, youngest son of the third Earl of Sunderland, by Anne, daughter of the great Duke of Marlborough (his brother became third duke). He inherited much property from his grandmother the duchess; and his only son, JOHN (1734-83), was made Earl Spencer in 1765.—GEORGE JOHN, second earl (1758-1834), Pitt's First Lord of the Admiralty in 1794-1801, was famous as a collector of rare books and the first president of the Roxburghe Club; his library was sold in 1881-83 for £50,581.—JOHN CHARLES, third Earl Spencer (1782-1845), educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, better known as Lord Althorp, entered parliament in 1804, and became a junior Lord of the Treasury when in 1806 his father took office as Home Secretary. He went out with the Whigs in 1807, and gave steady opposition to the long Tory reign. In 1830 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House of Commons, and the task of carrying the Reform Bill mainly devolved on him. In 1833 he carried the bill for reforming the Irish Church. He resigned on account of the Irish Coercion Bill, but resumed office in the Melbourne administration (July 1834). In November he passed to the House of Peers. See Memoir by Sir Denis Le Marchant (1876), Bagehot's Biographical Studies (1881), and Ernest Myers's Lord Althorp (1890).—His nephew, JOHN POYNTZ SPENCER, fifth earl (born 1835; died 1910), had sat but a few months for South Northamptonshire when the death of his father in 1857 sent him to the Upper House. He was Lord-lieutenant of Ireland 1868-74 and 1882-85. In 1880 he became Lord-president of the Council, and again in 1886, having embraced Mr Gladstone's Home Rule policy. He was First Lord of the Admiralty 1892-95.

Spencer, HERBERT, was born at Derby, 27th April 1820. His father, a schoolmaster, was greatly interested in entomology; and Spencer himself used to collect, describe, and draw insects when a boy. At seventeen he became a railway engineer, but about eight years afterwards he gave up this profession. He had already contributed papers to professional journals, and in 1842 he wrote a series of letters to the Nonconformist on 'The Proper Sphere of Government' (republished 1843). In 1848-53 he was sub-editor of the Economist, and developed the ethical and social views expounded in his first important work, Social Statics (1850; abridged and revised, 1892). The truth that all organic development is a change from a state of homogeneity to a state of heterogeneity, regarded by Spencer as the organising principle of his subsequent beliefs, was gradually developed and applied by him in a series of articles contributed to various journals and reviews. In these essays, especially those on The Development Hypothesis (1852), Manners and Fashion (1854), The Genesis of Science (1854), and Progress: its Law and Cause (1857), and in the volume of Principles of Psychology (1855), the doctrine of evolution began to be applied to various departments of inquiry. Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) supplied scientific proof for what had hitherto been speculation. In an essay on the Classification of the Sciences (1864) Spencer criticised Comte's serial arrangement of the sciences according to generality, and substituted for it a classification according to abstractness: (1) Abstract Science (logic and mathematics); (2) Abstract-concrete Science (mechanics, physics, chemistry, &c.); (3) Concrete Science (astronomy, geology, biology, psychology, sociology, &c.). In 1860 he had announced a System of Synthetic Philosophy, which, beginning with the first principles of all knowledge, proposed to trace how the law of evolution was gradually realised in life, mind, society, and morality. In pursuance of this comprehensive design Spencer published First Principles (1862), Principles of Biology (1864-67), Principles of Psychology (1870-72), Principles of Sociology (1876-96), and Principles of Ethics (1879-93). In the preface to the third volume of the Sociology (1896) the author explained that a fourth volume (Linguistic, Intellectual, Moral, Æsthetic) must remain unwritten by reason of age and infirmity; and he died 8th December 1903, his autobiography and a supplementary life being announced for publication the same year. The ultimate test of truth is the inconceivability of the negation by the individual thinker; the 'relativity of knowledge' is much insisted on. Assisted by elaborate ethnographical charts (Descriptive Sociology), Spencer attempted to trace the development of human ideas, customs, ceremonial usages, and political institutions. The genesis of religion is traced generally to ancestor-worship. Ethics has its root in physical, biological, psychological, and social phenomena; the best conduct is that which most fully realises evolution. The wide knowledge which all Spencer's writings display of physical science, and his constant endeavour to illustrate and support his system by connecting his positions with scientific facts and laws, have given Spencer's philosophy great currency among men of science. His development and application of the theory of evolution have profoundly influenced contemporary speculation and the recent developments of psychology and ethics, and he must also be regarded as one of the very few modern thinkers who have carried out the attempt to give a systematic account of the universe in its totality. Other works are a small volume on Education (1861), Study of Sociology (1872), Man versus the State (1884), and Factors of Organic Evolution (1887). His occasional papers have been collected as Essays: Scientific, Political, and Speculative (3 vols. 1858-74; new ed. 1891), and Various Fragments (1897). See F. H. Collins's Epitome of the Synthetic Philosophy (new ed. 1891), books on his system or himself by Hudson (new ed. 1895), A. D. White (1897), Macpherson (1900), J. A. Thomson (1906); German works by Fischer (1875), Michelet (1882 and 1891), and Kindermann (1888); his own Autobiography (1904) and his Life and Letters (edited by Duncan, 1908).

Spencer, WILLIAM ROBERT (1769-1834), minor poet, grandson of the third Duke of Marlborough, was educated at Harrow and Oxford, held a Commissionership of Stamps, and spent his last nine years in Paris. Among his sons were Aubrey-George Spencer, Bishop of Jamaica (1795-1872), and George-John-Trevor, Bishop of Madras (1801-66). He wrote vers de société, but is solely remembered by a few songs and ballads, the chief 'Beth Géler.' See Memoir prefixed to his Poems (1835).

Spencer, LILIAN (1838-95), née Headland, novelist, was the daughter of a London doctor, and in 1858 married a Bath one.

Spener, PHILIPP JAKOB (1635-1705), founder of Pietism, born at Rappoltsweiler in Upper Alsace, studied at Strasburg and Basel, and as a preacher at Strasburg and Frankfort sought with great effect to reawaken the dormant Christianity of the day. His Pia Desideria (1675) spread the movement far beyond the range of his personal influence, but raised not a little enmity. In 1686 he became court preacher at Dresden, and in 1691 was called to Berlin. The Elector of Brandenburg entrusted theological instruction in the new university of Halle to Francke and other disciples of Spenser. He published many volumes of sermons and theological works. See Lives by Hossbach (1828); 3d ed. 1861), Wildenhalm (1842-47; trans. 1881), and Grünberg (1893-1906). [Spay'ner.]

Spenser, EDMUND, was born in London, probably in 1552, of a good but poor family—a branch of the Spencers of Althorp. He was sent to Merchant Taylors' School, then newly founded, and in 1569 proceeded to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. After quitting the university in 1576 he stayed for some time with relations near Burnley, had the experience of an unsuccessful love-suit, pondered many questions of the day, and perfected his metrical skill. The Shepherds Calendar (1579) was the result, and made an epoch in English literature as the first clear note of the great Elizabethan poetry. Spenser had won the friendship of Sir Philip Sidney, to whom the Calendar was dedicated; and it was through the Earl of Leicester, Sir Philip's uncle, that in 1580 he was appointed private secretary to Lord Grey de Wilton, the new Lord Deputy of Ireland. Ireland thenceforward was to be Spenser's home. Lord Grey's special mission was to suppress the combined insurrection of the O'Neils in the north and the Fitzgeralds in the south, a mission executed with a severity so merciless as to lead to his recall in 1582. The evil condition of things is vividly illustrated in Spenser's View of the Present State of Ireland—written probably in the second decade of his Irish residence, and largely circulated in MS., though not printed till 1633. He strongly advocated the policy of coercion. In 1581 he was appointed Clerk of Degrees and Recognisances in the Irish Court of Chancery; in 1588 he became Clerk to the Council in Munster, and probably in that year took up his abode at Kilcolman Castle near Doneraile, County Cork. His occupancy of a part of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond must have stimulated native hatred; certainly he did much farther to excite it by the rigour with which he pressed his supposed rights. But all this time Spenser was going on with his great poem, The Faerie Queene, which had been begun before he crossed St. George's Channel. By 1589 the first three books were finished, and were shown to Sir Walter Raleigh, then residing at Youghal. Of Raleigh's visit to Kilcolman in 1589 and of their joint journey to the English court Spenser gives a charming account in his Colin Clout's Come Home Again, written after his return in 1591, though not published till 1595. In 1590 the three books of The Faerie Queene were published, and soon after Sundry Poems. No place was found for Spenser at court or in London, but he secured immense fame. Another great love-passion is described in his Amoretti and his Epithalamion. The lady's Christian name was Elizabeth; her surname is supposed to have been Boyle. Upon another visit to England he published (1596) the second and last instalment of The Faerie Queene, except a fragment consisting of two cantos and two stanzas. Under the roof of Lord Essex he composed what is probably his last complete poem, The Prothalamion, or a Spousal Verse. Again his suit for a post obtained no success; again he turned his face to Ireland; and there a fresh storm burst furiously on his head (1598). Hugh O'Neil's insurgents fired Kilcolman, and he and his had to flee for their lives. About the close of 1598 or the beginning of 1599 he reached London homeless, destitute, exhausted. On 18th January he died at a tavern in King Street, Westminster; the 'Poets' Poet' is buried in Poet's Corner. His wealth of language, his fine sense of melody, his abundance of fancy, his ardent patriotism, his profound sympathy with all things lovely and of good report, have retained for him a foremost rank in English literature. Speusippus (c. 304-336 B.C.), Athenian philosopher, who succeeded his uncle, Plato, as head of the Platonic school or Older Academy.

Spicer, HENRY (1743-1804), miniaturist.

Spielhagen, FRIEDRICH (1829-1911), German novelist, born at Magdeburg, studied at Bonn, Berlin, and Greifswald, and settled at Hanover (1859), and then (1862) at Berlin. His works include (besides poems, plays, books of travel, &c.) Clara Vere (1857), Problematische Naturen (1860), Durch Nacht zum Licht (1861), Die von Hohenstein (1863), In Reih und Glied (1866), Hammer und Amboss (1868), Sturmthat (1876), Uhlenhans (1884), Was will das werden? (1886), Susi (1895), and Faustulus (1897). See his autobiography (1890), and a study by Karpeles (1889). [Speel-hah-gen; g hard.]

Spinello Aretino (c. 1330-1410), Italian painter, spent nearly all his life between Arezzo (his birthplace) and Florence. His principal frescoes were done for San Miniato at Florence, for the campo santo of Pisa, and for the municipal buildings of Siena.

Spinola, AMBROSIO, MARCHESE DI (1569-1650), born at Genoa, in 1602 raised 9000 men, whom he maintained at his own cost, and served under Mendoza in the Netherlands. His reduction of Ostend secured him the command of all the Spanish and Italian troops in the Netherlands. Now began a long struggle with Maurice of Nassau; but the destruction of the Spanish fleet near Gibraltar induced Spain to conclude in 1609 a twelve years' armistice. At its termination the war began anew, and Spinola found himself once more pitched against his great opponent, who died, however, in April 1625, of a marsh fever caught whilst attempting to raise the siege of Breda. The town next month surrendered after an heroic resistance; but Spinola's health obliged him to resign the command, and, although he had spent his fortune in the maintenance of his troops, his claims were neglected by the Spanish government. See French Life by Siret (1851).

Spinoza, BARUCH or BENEDICT DE, philosopher, was born at Amsterdam, 24th November 1632, the son of Portuguese Jews. After mastering the Talmud, he was allowed to devote himself entirely to study. Physical sciences and the writings of Descartes soon drew him away from the synagogue, and ere long he was excommunicated (1656). He had learned the art of polishing lenses, and this now became the means of his subsistence. In 1661 he removed to Rijnsburg near Leyden, where he wrote an abridgment of Descartes; in 1663 to Voorburg; and in 1671 to The Hague. He refused a chair at Heidelberg, and would accept nothing but a small annuity from a friend. He died 21st Feb. 1677. His system developed itself out of Descartes, but for the Cartesian Dualism substitutes strict pure Monism. The one Substance (i.e. God) has the attributes of extension and thought, of matter and spirit, and each of them has an infinity of modes. The system, thoroughly pantheistic, is mainly contained in his Ethica (Ordine Geometrico Demonstrata), which is not a treatise of Ethics, but a complete philosophy. Chief doctrines are: the absence of free-will in man—himself only a Modus dependent on causes without and not within him; will belongs only to God; Good and Evil are relative notions. Our real existence is knowledge. The highest knowledge is the knowledge of God, and therein lies the highest delight of the spirit. Spinoza's Pantheism, long reviled, won the admiration of Lessing, Herder, and Goethe, and became the acknowledged basis of much of modern German philosophy. The Tractatus Theologico-politicus contains an acute and rationalistic view of revelation. He wrote also a Tractatus Politicus, a De Intellectus Emendatione, a compendium of Hebrew Grammar, and a Tractatus de Deo et Homine, first published in 1862. The best edition of Spinoza's works is by Van Vloten and Land (Hague, 1882-83). There are translations of his chief works by Elwes (1884), and of the Ethica by W. H. White (1883; new ed. 1894) and H. Smith (1886). See English monographs on Spinoza by Sir F. Pollock (1880; 2d ed. 1899), Dr Martineau (1882), Principal Caird (1888), and Pieton (1907); German by Sigwart (1839), Thomas (1840), Camerer (1877), Baltzer (1888), Bolin (1894), and Hoff (1895); French by Saintes (1842) and Brunschwig (1894).

Spoher, LUDWIG, composer, born at Brunswick, 5th April 1784, established a high reputation as a violinist, and became music-director at the court of Saxe-Gotha (1805), at a Vienna theatre (1813), and at Frankfurt (1817-19). In 1820 he appeared in London, and was Kapellmeister at the court of Hesse-Cassel 1822-57. He died 22d October 1859. The best of his numerous compositions are the operas Faust, Jessonda, and Zemira and Azor; the oratorios Die letzten Dinge, Des Heilands letzte Stunden, and Der Fall Babylons; nine grand symphonies, the finest Die Weihe der Töne; fifteen violin concertos; besides sonatas for violin and harp, fantasias, and rondos. See his Autobiography (trans. 1864), and Lives by Malibran (1860) and Schletterer (1881).

Spontini, GASPARO LUIGI PACIFICO (1774-1851), composer, born near Jesi in the March of Ancona, went to Paris in 1803, and in 1804 attracted notice by his opera Milton. The grand opera La Vestale (1807) was greeted with enthusiasm, and was adjudged Napoleon's prize of 10,000 francs. An equally warm reception was accorded to Ferdinand Cortez (1809). In 1810 Spontini was appointed director of Italian opera at the Opéra. A third opera, Olympia (1819), was less successful. In 1820 Frederick-William III. summoned Spontini to Berlin, where, however, only court influence supported him against the Berlin public and the Prussian press. Three other operas are Nourmahal (1822), Alcidor (1825), and Agnes von Hohenstaufen (1829), his greatest work. Spontini was dismissed by Frederick-William IV. in 1842. See Life by Robert (1883). [Spon-tee'-nee.]

Spottiswoode, ALICIA ANN (LADY JOHN SCOTT), composer and author of 'Annie Laurie,' 'Douglas, tender and true,' &c., married in 1836 Lord John Scott (1809-60), son of the Duke of Buccleuch, and resumed her maiden name in 1870 on succeeding to Spottiswoode, Lauder. Born 1811, she died 13th March 1900.

Spottiswoode, JOHN (1565-1639), Archbishop of St Andrews, was educated for the church at Glasgow. In 1601 he attended the Duke of Lennox to France, and in 1603 King James to London. Soon after he became Archbishop of Glasgow, and in 1615 of St Andrews. He laboured to confirm episcopal government, and forced the Perth Assembly (1618) to sanction the Perth Articles. He officiated at the coronation of Charles I. at Holyrood in 1633, and in 1635 was appointed Chancellor of Scotland. He reluctantly entered into the king's liturgical scheme, and so made himself hateful to the Covenanters. The king compelled him to resign the chancellorship in 1638, and the Glasgow General Assembly deposed and excommunicated him. He died in London. His chief work is the History of the Church of Scotland (1655; ed. by Russell for the Spottiswoode Society, 1847-51).

Spottiswoode, WILLIAM, LL.D., D.C.L., mathematician, born in London, January 11, 1825, was educated at Harrow and Balliol. He took a first-class in mathematics in 1845, and later the junior and senior university mathematical scholarships. For some time he lectured at Balliol, and, after succeeding his father as head of the printing-house of Eyre & Spottiswoode (1846), found time for much original work in abstract mathematics and experimental physics, as well as for travels in Eastern Russia (1856), Croatia and Hungary (1860). His contributions to the Proceedings of the Royal Society, &c., and his lectures on the Polarisation of Light (1874) are known to all students. He died June 27, 1883. See Nature (April 26, 1883).

Sprenkel, CHRISTIAN KONRAD (1750-1816), a Spandau schoolmaster, was born at Brandenburg, and died in Berlin. His Entdeckte Geheimniss der Natur (1793) awakened in 1841 Darwin's interest in the fertilisation of plants.—His nephew, KURT SPRENGEL (1766-1833), born near Anklam, was from 1789 professor of Medicine at Halle and from 1797 of Botany. He wrote a history of medicine (1792-1803) and a history of botany (1817-18). See Life by Rosenbaum (1844). [Sprenkel.]

Sprenker, ALOYS (1813-93), orientalist, was born at Nasseret in Tyrol, studied at Vienna, came to London, in 1843 sailed to Calcutta, worked as interpreter, librarian, and translator, and in 1857 became Oriental professor at Bern. In 1881 he settled at Heidelberg. He wrote a great Leben und Lehre des Mohammed (1861-65) and books on the ancient geography of Arabia, Babylonia, &c. [Sprenker.]

Sprenker, JACOB, Dominican and professor of Theology in Cologne, and HENRICUS INSTITOR (Latinised form of Krämer), compiled the famous Malleus Maleficarum (1489), which first formulated the doctrine of witchcraft, and formed a textbook of procedure for witch-trials. They were appointed inquisitors by Innocent VIII. in 1484.

Spruner von Mertz, KARL (1803-92), born at Stuttgart, entered the Bavarian army, and taught geography in the Munich cadet college. His name is associated with a great historical Handatlas (1837-52; 3d ed. by Menke, 1862-79).

Spurgeon, CHARLES HADDON, Nonconformist preacher, born at Kelvedon, Essex, 19th June 1834, in 1849 became usher in a school at Newmarket, and in 1854 pastor of the New Park Street Chapel, London. The Metropolitan Tabernacle, seating 6000, was erected for him in 1859-61 (burnt April 1898). Connected with it were almshouses, a pastors' college (1856), and an orphanage (1867). He died at Mentone, 31st Jan. 1892. He had a unique gift as an orator, combining fervour with quaint humour; his voice was of marvellous clearness and reach. Latterly (1887) he withdrew from the Baptist Union because no action was taken against persons charged with fundamental errors. His sermons, issued weekly from 1855, had an average issue of 30,000, and were translated into several foreign tongues. He published over a hundred volumes, including The Saint and his Saviour (1867), John Ploughman's Talk (1868), Treasury of David (a commentary on the Psalms, 1865-80), Interpreter (1874), Sermons in Candles (1891), and Messages to the Multitude (1892). See Spurgeon's Speeches, edited by Pike (1878); the Life by Shindler (1892), and the Autobiography, compiled by his wife and Joseph Harrald (1897-99).

Spurzheim, JOHANN GASPAR (1776-1832), a founder of phrenology, born near Treves, whence studying medicine at Vienna became the disciple of Gall (q.v.), with him lectured through Central Europe, and in 1807 settled in Paris. In 1813 they differed and separated; Spurzheim proceeded (1814) to England, where he lectured and wrote for four years, gaining a powerful adherent in George Combe (q.v.). After revisiting Paris 1817-25, he returned to England and taught with much greater success. In 1832 he sailed to the United States, but died at Boston, 10th November. He wrote in French and English on phrenology (1825-32), also on education (1821), and Essai sur la Nature de l'Homme (1820). See Memoir by Carmichael (1833). [Sports-Hémé.]

Squarcione, FRANCESCO (1394-1474), Mantegna's master, founded the Paduan school of painters.

Squier, EPHRAIM GEORGE (1821-88), archaeologist, born at Bethlehem, N.Y., in 1841-48 was a newspaper editor, latterly in Ohio. He explored the antiquities of the Mississippi Valley, and then of New York, and in 1849 was appointed chargé d'affaires to Central America, in 1863 U.S. commissioner to Peru. Among his works are Nicaragua (1852), Serpent Symbols (1852), Waikua (1855), Central America (1857), and Peru (1877).

Staal, MARQUERITE JEANNE, BARONESS DE (1684-1750), usually called Madame de Staal Delaunay, was born at Paris, the daughter of a poor painter named Cordier, whose name she dropped for that of her mother, Delaunay. At twenty-seven she was attached to the person of the imperious Duchesse de Maine at Sceaux; and her devotion to her interests brought her two years in the Bastille, where she had a love affair with the Chevalier de Menil. In 1735 she married the Baron de Staal. Her Mémoires (1755; eds. by Barrière, 1846; Lescure, 1878; trans. 1892) show intellect, observation, and a subtle irony, and are written in a style clear, firm, and individual. Her Œuvres Complètes appeared in 1821. See study by Frary (1863). [Stahl.]

Staal, MADAME DE, was born at Paris, 22d April 1766, the daughter (Anne-Louise-Germaine) and only child of Necker (q.v.). In her girlhood she wrote romantic comedies, tragedies, novels, essays, and Lettres sur Rousseau (1789). She married in 1786 the Baron de Staël-Holstein (1742-1802), the bankrupt Swedish ambassador. She bore him two sons (1790 and 1792) and a daughter (1797), but to protect her fortune separated formally from him in 1798. Her vast capacity for enthusiasm and the passionate intensity of her affections gave force and colour to her rich and versatile character, and combined to form a personality whose influence was irresistible. She shone brilliant and solitary in Paris, but the Revolution opened up new horizons for France; Necker's fall only hastened the dénouement of the tragedy; and she quitted Paris for Coppet in September 1792. From Coppet she went to England, where at Mickleham in Surrey she was surrounded by Talleyrand and others of the French émigrés. She joined her husband at Coppet in May 1793, and published her Réflexions sur le Procès de la Reine in the vain hope of saving Marie Antoinette. In 1795 she returned to Paris, where her husband had re-established himself as ambassador. She prepared for a political rôle by her Réflexions sur la Paix intérieure (1795), but was advised to return to Coppet. Her Influence des Passions appeared in 1796. Bonaparte allowed her to return to Paris in 1797, but received her friendly advances with such studied coldness that admiration soon turned to hatred. In 1800 she published her famous Littérature et ses Rapports avec les Institutions sociales. She was again back in Paris in 1802, when her salon was more brilliant than ever. At length the epigrams of Constant, her friendship with disaffected men like Moreau and Bernadotte, and the appearance of Necker's Dernières Vues exhausted the patience of Napoleon, and in the autumn of 1803 she received orders to keep forty leagues from Paris. Her husband had died, and in December 1803 she set out with her children for Weimar, where she dazzled the whole court, and met Schiller and Goethe. At Berlin she made acquaintance with August Schlegel. She next turned her steps towards Vienna, but learned of her father's death, and returned to Coppet, writing the touching eulogy, Du Caractère de M. Necker. Then she set out for Italy with Schlegel, Wilhelm von Humboldt, and Bonstetten, but returned to Coppet in June 1805 to write Corinne, a romance, which at once brought her European fame. She revisited Germany in the end of 1807, and began to turn for consolation to religion—she was a Protestant. Her famous De l'Allemagne was finished in 1810, passed by the censor, and partly printed, when the whole impression was seized and destroyed, and herself ordered from Paris to Coppet. The work was published by John Murray at London in 1813. But her exile had now become a bitter reality; she found herself encompassed with spies. She escaped secretly to Bern, and thence made her way to St Petersburg, Stockholm, and (1813) London. In England admiration reached its climax on the publication of De l'Allemagne, the most finished of all her works. Louis XVIII. welcomed her to Paris in 1814, and the two millions which Necker had left in the Treasury was honourably paid to her. The return of Napoleon drove her from Paris, and she spent the winter in Italy for the sake of the health of Albert de Rocca, an Italian officer in the French service, whom she had married secretly in 1811. She died in Paris, 14th July 1817. Her surviving son and daughter published her unfinished Considérations sur la Révolution Française (1818), esteemed by Sainte-Beuve her masterpiece, the Dix Années d'Exil (1821), and her complete works (1820-21). See Lives by Stevens (1880) and Lady Blennerhassett (Berl. 1887-89; Eng. trans. 1889), and shorter studies by Bella Duffy (1887) and Albert Sorel (1890; trans. 1892).

Stafford, WILLIAM HOWARD, VISCOUNT (1614-80), a Catholic nobleman, beheaded on Tower Hill as a victim of the perjuries of Oates (q.v.).

Stahl, FRIEDRICH JULIUS (1802-1861), born of Jewish parents at Munich, turned Protestant, studied law, and published Die Philosophie des Rechts (1830-37; 5th ed. 1878). In 1840 he became professor of Philosophy of Law at Berlin, and was a leader of the reactionary party in the First Chamber. Among his other works was Der Christliche Staat (1847), in which he advocated a sovereign despotism based on divine right.

Stahl, GEORG ERNST (1660-1734), born at Ansbach, became court-physician (1687) at Weimar, professor of Medicine (1694) at Halle, and body-physician (1714) to the king of Prussia. His Phlogiston theory was expounded in Experimenta et Observationes Chemicæ (1731), and that of Animism in Theoria Medica Vera (1707).

Stainer, JAKOB (1621-83), Innsbruck violin-maker, worked under the Amatis, won a high reputation, and died in a Benedictine monastery. See two works by Ruf (1872-92). [Sitt'ner.]

Stainer, SIR JOHN (1840-1901), Mus. Doc., organist and composer, born in London, became organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1859, and of St Paul's (1872), and Oxford professor of Music (1889). In 1888 he was knighted. Among his works are hymns, services, and the cantatas The Daughter of Jairus (1875) and St Mary Magdalen (1883); also a Treatise on Harmony (5th ed, 1881), a Dictionary of Musical Terms (with W. A. Barrett, 3d ed, 1888), &c.

Stair, a title derived from an Ayrshire village by the Dalrymple family, one of whom was among the Lollards of Kyle summoned before James IV.; his great-grandson embraced the Reformed doctrines.—JAMES DALRYMPLE (1619-95) studied at Glasgow University, served in the army, acted as Regent in Philosophy at Glasgow, joined the bar (1648), and was recommended by Monk to Cromwell for the office of a lord of session. He was confirmed in office and created a Nova Scotia baronet in 1664. The luckless marriage in 1669 of his daughter Janet to Baldoon suggested to Scott The Bride of Lammermoor. In 1670 Dalrymple was made president of the Court of Session and member of the Privy-council; but when the Duke of York came to govern at Edinburgh in 1679 he retired to the country, and prepared his famous Institutes of the Law of Scotland. His wife and his tenants were devoted to the Covenant, and he was soon involved in a fierce dispute with Claverhouse. He fled in 1682 to Holland, returned with the Prince of Orange, and, restored to the presidency, was created in 1690 Viscount Stair, and died at Edinburgh, 25th November 1695. See Memoir by J. G. Mackay (1873).—His eldest son, SIR JOHN DALRYMPLE (1648-1707), studied law, and was knighted in 1667. He came into violent collision with Claverhouse, and was flung into prison in Edinburgh and heavily fined, but early in 1686 became king's advocate, and in 1688 Lord Justice-clerk. Under William III. he was Lord Advocate, and as Secretary of State from 1691 had the chief management of Scottish affairs. On his shoulders, therefore, with Breadalbane and the king, mainly rests the infamy of the massacre of Glencoe. He was created Earl of Stair in April 1703. He took an active part in the debates and intrigues that led to the Treaty of Union, and died suddenly, 8th January 1707. See Omond's Lord Advocates of Scotland (1883).—JOHN DALRYMPLE, Marshal Stair, was born at Edinburgh, 20th July 1673. At eight he shot his elder brother dead by accident, so was exiled by his parents to Holland, studied at Leyden, fought under the Prince of Orange at Steenkerk, and by 1701 was lieutenant-colonel in the Scots Foot-guards, in 1706 colonel of the Cameronians. He was aide-de-camp to Marlborough in 1703, commanded an infantry brigade at Ramillies, was made colonel of the Scots Greys in 1706, and succeeded as second earl in 1707. He distinguished himself greatly at Oudenarde (1708) and Malplaquet. General in 1712, he retired to Edinburgh to intrigue for the Hanoverian succession. In 1714 he married the Viscountess Primrose, forcing her consent by concealing himself in her house and showing himself at her bedroom window. Under George I. he was ambassador to Paris, and checkmated the Pretender and Alberoni. Recalled in 1720, he devoted himself to agriculture, introducing turnips and cabbages. Made field-marshal (1742), he commanded the army till George II. took command in person, and he fought at Dettingen. He died 9th May 1747. See also the articles on Sir James Dalrymple, Lord Hailes, and Alexander Dalrymple, and J. Murray Graham's Stair Annals (1875).

Stallbaum, GOTTFRIED (1793-1861), professor at Leipzig, edited Herodotus, Plato (1821-25), &c.

Stambuloff, STEPHAN NIKOLOF, Bulgarian statesman, was born, the son of an innkeeper, in 1855, at Tirnova, studied there and at Odessa, and bore a part in the rising of 1875-76. He held office during the Russian occupation after the war of 1878, and, now an advocate in Tirnova, became conspicuous as a radical leader in the new National Assembly. He was the chief member of the regency after Prince Alexander's abdication (1886), and strenuously opposed all Russian partisans. After the election of Ferdinand he was premier 1887-94, and ruled with as little regard for the prince as for the Assembly. Forced then to retire, on 15th July 1895 he was attacked by assassins, and died on the 18th. See Life by A. Hulme Beaman (1895).

Standish, MYLES (c. 1584-1656), born at Duxbury, Lancashire, served in the Netherlands, and sailed with the Mayflower to Massachusetts in 1620. During the first winter his wife died. Longfellow has versified the traditional story of his second courtship. Standish was military head of the colony (against the Indians), and long its treasurer. See works by De Costa (1864) and Henry Johnson (1897).

Stanfield, CLARKSON (1794-1867), marine-painter, born of Irish Catholic parentage at Sunderland, left the navy in consequence of an injury to his feet, and about 1818 took to scene-painting. His first picture to attract notice was 'Market-boats on the Scheldt' (1826). He was a founder of the Society of British Artists, and was elected A.R.A. in 1832 and R.A. in 1835. Among his best-known pictures were 'Mount St Michael, Cornwall,' 'The Abandoned,' and 'Wreck of a Dutch East Indiaman.'

Stanford, SIR CHARLES VILLIERS, knighted in 1902, born at Dublin, 30th Sept. 1852, studied at Cambridge, Leipzig, and Berlin, and became organist at Trinity College (1872-93), professor in the Royal College of Music (1882), and Cambridge professor of Music (1887). Among his works are choral settings of Tennyson's Revenge (1886) and Voyage of Maeldune (1889); the oratorios The Three Holy Children (1885) and Eden (1891); the operas The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan (1881), Savonarola (1884), The Canterbury Pilgrims (1884), and Shamus O'Brien (1896); symphonies, violin and pianoforte pieces, &c.

Stanford, LELAND, American railway constructor, born at Watervliet, N.Y., 9th March 1824, in 1856 settled in San Francisco. He was made president of the Central Pacific Company, and superintended the construction of the line. Already governor of California, he was in 1885 elected U.S. senator. He gave California £20,000,000 to found, in memory of his son, a university at Palo Alto; and after his death in 1899 his wife increased this endowment to $30,000,000.

Stanhope, Lady Hester Lucy (1776-1839), eldest daughter of Earl Stanhope, went in 1803 to reside with her uncle, William Pitt, and as mistress of his establishment and his most trusted confidant, had full scope for her queenly instincts. On Pitt's death (1806) the king gave her a pension of £1200. The change from the excitements of public life was irksome to her; in 1809 she was tried by the death at Cornua of her brother, Major Stanhope, and of Sir John Moore, whom she had loved; and in 1810 she left England never to return. She wandered in the Levant, in 1814 settled on Mount Lebanon, adopted Eastern manners, and obtained a wonderful ascendancy over the rude tribes around her, who regarded her as a sort of prophetess; gradually she came so to consider herself. Her reckless liberalities involved her in constant straits for money, and her last years were passed in wretchedness. See the notes on her by Lamartine and Kinglake, and her Memoirs and Travels (6 vols. 1845-46) by Dr Merzou, a physician who visited her in her retreat.

Stanhope, James, Earl (1675-1721), was an eminent military commander and favourite minister of George I. — Charles (1753-1816), third earl, was distinguished for his scientific researches, and invented a printing-press which bears his name. — Philip Henry, only son of the fourth earl, born at Walmer, 31st January 1805, took his B.A. at Oxford in 1827, and seven years later was created D.C.L., having entered parliament in 1830. He was instrumental in passing the Copyright Act (1842), and was Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs under Peel (1834-35), and Secretary to the Indian Board of Control (1845-46). He edited Peel's memoirs. He was known as Lord Mahon till in 1855 he succeeded to the earldom. His principal work was A History of England, 1713-83 (1836-54); and his other works include Lives of Belisarius, Condé, and Pitt; War of the Succession in Spain, History of Spain under Charles II., Essays, and Miscellanies. He was President of the Society of Antiquaries (1846) and Lord Rector of Aberdeen University (1858). He helped to secure the appointment of the Historical MSS. Commission and the foundation of the National Portrait Gallery. He died at Bournemouth, 22d December 1875.

Stanislaus Leszczynski (1677-1766), born at Lemberg, was elected king of Poland in 1704, but in 1709 was driven out by Peter the Great to make room for Augustus II. (q.v.). He formally abdicated in 1736, receiving the duchies of Lorraine and Bar; and he died of a burning accident at Lunéville. See also Poniatowski.

Stanley. See DERBY (EARL OF).

Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn, born at Alderley rectory, Cheshire, 13th December 1815, was the second son of Edward Stanley (1779-1849), from 1837 Bishop of Norwich. Educated at Rugby under Arnold, and at Balliol, he won the Ireland and the Newdigate, and graduated with a first-class in 1837. In 1839 he was elected a fellow of University College and took orders. In 1840 he travelled in the East, during 1841-51 was a college tutor, and in 1851 became a canon of Canterbury, in 1856 professor of Ecclesiastical History and canon of Christ Church, and in 1863 Dean of Westminster. A voluminous writer in the periodical press, he was author of the Life of Arnold (1844), Sermons on the Apostolic Age (1847), Memoir of Bishop Stanley (1851), Commentary on Corinthians (1855), Memorials of Canterbury (1855), Sinai and Palestine (1856), Memorials of Cambridge (1857), Lectures on the Eastern Church (1861), Lectures on the Jewish Church (1863-65), Memorials of Westminster Abbey (1866), Essays on Church and State (1870), Lectures on the Scottish Church (1872), Addresses and Sermons delivered at St Andrews (1877; he was elected Lord Rector, 1874), Memorials of Edward and Catherine Stanley (1879), and Christian Institutions (1881). Outstanding events in his life were his travels in Egypt and Palestine (1852-53), and in Russia (1857); his accompanying the Prince of Wales on his Eastern tour (1862); his marriage (1863) to Lady Augusta Bruce (1822-76), of the Elgin family; a second visit to Russia (1874), when he celebrated the English marriage of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh; and his visit to America (1878). For all his large tolerance, charity, and sympathy, High Church Anglicans could never forgive him for championing Colenso and for preaching in Scottish Presbyterian pulpits. He was pre-eminently representative of the broadest theology of the Church of England. Christianity to him was sacred because of its moral and spiritual elements, and the divinely perfect life embodying these; but for systematic theology he had little reverence, and none at all for the pretensions of the priesthood; whilst he regarded as 'infinitely little' the controversies about postures, lights, vestments, and the like. The Evangelicals also deplored his lack of 'the root of the matter.' As a preacher he wielded a wide influence. His ancient lineage, his independent and exalted ecclesiastical office, his personal popularity, his alliance with a lady of mental ability and social charm, all combined to invest the Deanery with singular prestige and influence as a centre of society. He died 18th July 1881, and was buried by the Queen's commands beside his wife in Henry VII.'s Chapel. See Life by R. E. Prothero and Dean Bradley (1894); Letters and Verses, edited by Prothero (1895); and Recollections of A. P. Stanley, by Dean Bradley (1883).

Stanley, Sir Henry Morton, G.C.B. (1899), was born of poor parents at Denbigh, Wales, about 1840, and at first bore the name of John Rowlands. When about fifteen he worked his way as a cabin-boy to New Orleans, where he was employed by a merchant named Stanley, whose name he assumed. He served in the Confederate army, contributed to several journals, and in 1867 began his connection with the New York Herald. As its special correspondent he accompanied Lord Napier's Abyssinian expedition; and the first news of the fall of Magdala was conveyed to Britain by the New York Herald. Stanley next went to Spain for his paper, and in October 1869 received from Mr Gordon Bennett the laconic instruction, 'Find Livingstone.' But first he visited Egypt for the opening of the Suez Canal, and travelled through Palestine, Turkey, Persia, and India. In January 1871 he reached Zanzibar, and in March marched into the heart of Africa. On 10th November he 'found' Livingstone at Ujiji. The two explored the north end of Lake Tanganyika, and settled that it had no connection with the Nile basin. In March 1872 Stanley set out for the coast; he was awarded the medal of the Royal Geographical Society, and his How I found Livingstone had an enormous sale. An expedition under Stanley, who had followed the Ashanti campaign for the New York Herald, was fitted out jointly by the Herald and the Daily Telegraph to complete Livingstone's work, and in August 1874 he left England for Bagamoyo.

Thence he made for the Victoria Nyanza, circumnavigated the lake, formed a close friendship with King Mtesa of Uganda, next determined the shape of Lake Tanganyika, passed down the Luualaba to Nyangwe, and by a ten months' journey from Nyangwe traced the course of the Congo to the sea. Having published Through the Dark Continent (1878), in 1879 he again went out to found, under the auspices of the king of the Belgians, the Congo Free State. He took part in the Congo Congress at Berlin in 1884-85, and lectured in Britain and in America on his African work. In 1886 he was summoned from America to take command of the expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha (q.v.). In March he, his officers, Sudanese soldiers, &c. landed at the mouth of the Congo. On 15th June the expedition had reached Yambuya on the Aruwini, where he left a part of his 650 men under Major Barttelot, and with 388 men marched into the forest. Disaster overtook the rear column; but after long delay news came that Emin and Stanley had joined hands on the shores of the Albert Nyanza. The return journey was made overland to the east coast, and Bagamoyo was reached in December 1889. In 1890 he received in London a reception almost royal in its splendour. The Geographical Society gave him a special gold medal; Oxford, Cambridge, Edinburgh, and Durham conferred on him honorary degrees. That same year he married the clever artist, Miss Dorothy Tennant (who in 1907 became Mrs Henry Curtis). He lectured here and abroad, was naturalised as a British subject in 1892, stood unsuccessfully for parliament as a Unionist at Lambeth in 1892, successfully in 1895. He died 9th May 1904. See his Autobiography (1909). Other works are a novel, My Kahulu (1873), Coomassie and Magdala (1874), The Congo (1885), In Darkest Africa; or, The Rescue of Emin (1890), My Dark Companions and their Strange Stories (1893), and My Early Travels in America and Asia (1895).

Stanley, THOMAS (1625-78), son of Sir Thomas Stanley of Cumberlow, Herts, studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, practised law, and published translations from the Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian poets; but his great works were the History of Philosophy (1655-62) and an edition of Eschylus, with Latin translation and commentary (1663-64). The former, based on Diogenes Laertius, deals only with Greek philosophy, and was translated into Latin by Leclerc and others, and edited by Butler (1809-16). See the Poems, ed. Brydges (1814-15, with Life); Original Lyrics, ed. Miss Quiney (1907).

Stanley, VENETIA. See DIGBY (KENELM).

Stannard, MRS. See WINTER, J. S.

Stanton, EDWIN M·MASTERS (1833-69), U.S. lawyer and statesman, was born at Steubenville.

Stapledon, WALTER DE, bishop of Exeter 1308-26, and founder of Exeter College, Oxford, was born near Torrington, and was beheaded by the insurgent Londoners.

Stapleton, THOMAS, F.R.S., F.S.A. (1805-49), genealogist, was born at Carlton Hall, Snaith.

Starkie, THOMAS, Q.C. (1779-1849), writer on Evidence, was born at Blackburn.

Starley, JAMES (1829-81), inventor of the 'Coventry' tricycle and 'Ariel' geared bicycle, was born at Albourne, Sussex, came to sewing-machine works at Coventry in 1869, and there established the firm of Starley Brothers in 1876.

Status, PUBLIUS PAPINIUS (c. 45-96 A.D.), born at Naples, flourished as a court poet in the favour of Domitian till 94, when he retired to Naples. His Thebais, an epic on the struggle between the brothers Eteocles and Polynices of Thebes, is tedious as a whole, marred by over alliteration and allusiveness, but redeemed by exquisite passages. Of another epic, the Achilleis, only a fragment remains. His Silvee, or occasional verses, have freshness and vigour. Editions of the Thebais are by O. Müller (books i.-vi. 1870) and Helm (1892); of the Achilleis by Kolmann (1879); of the Silvee by Markland (1728) and Bährens (1876).

Staunton, HOWARD (1810-74), chess-player and Shakespearian scholar, studied at Oxford, and early settled down to journalism in London. His victory in 1843 over M. St Amand made him the champion chess-player of his day. He wrote The Chess-player's Handbook (1847), Chess-player's Companion (1849), Chess-tournament (1851), Chess Praxis (1860). His Shakespear (1858-60), with excellent textual emendations, was illustrated by Sir John Gilbert. He also published (1866) a photo-lithographic fac-simile of the first folio Shakespeare, and a book on The Great Schools of England (1865).

Stead, WILLIAM THOMAS, born at Embleton, Alnwick, 5th July 1849, the son of a Congregational minister, and educated at Wakefield, was a Darlington editor 1871-80, and then on the Pall Mall till 1889, from 1883 as editor. He got three months over the 'Maiden Tribute' (1885), founded his Review of Reviews, and worked for peace, spiritualism, the 'civic church,' and friendship with Russia. He wrote fervidly against the Boer war, but admired Cecil Rhodes. He was drowned in the Titanic disaster, April 1912.

Stedman, EDMUND CLARENCE (1833-1908), LL.D., poet and critic, born at Hartford, Conn., studied at Yale, was war-correspondent of the New York World 1861-63, and then turned a New York stockbroker and banker. He published Poems (1860), Victorian Poets (1875), Poets of America (1886), Nature of Poetry (1892), Victorian Anthology (1896), &c., and was joint-editor of the Library of American Literature (11 vols. 1890).

Steel, FLORA ANNIE, née WEBSTER, born at Harrow, 2d April 1847, married and lived in India 1867-89. She has written Wide Awake Stories (1885), Tales from the Punjab (1894), Red Rowans (1895), On the Face of the Waters (1896), &c.

Steele, SIR RICHARD, was born in Dublin in March 1672, the son of an attorney. Both his parents died when he was a child, and he fell to the charge of an uncle, Henry Gascoigne, secretary to the first Duke of Ormonde. Ormonde sent him to the Charterhouse (1684), where Addison was his schoolfellow, and whence in 1690 he went up to Oxford—Christ Church first and then Merton. In 1694 he suddenly enlisted in the Horse Guards. Already at college a dabbler in verse, in 1695 he published The Procession; it was on the funeral of Queen Mary, dedicated to Lord Cutts, who made him his secretary and an ensign in the Coldstream Guards. In June 1700 he severely wounded an Irishman Kelly in a duel; and a strange outcome of this was his devotional manual The Christian Hero (1701). With the public it was popular, but it was regarded by Steele's comrades as incompatible with his military calling, and with a view to 'enliven his character' he wrote a play—The Funeral: or, Grief à la Mode, acted at Drury Lane in December 1701. It was followed by The Lying Lover (1703) and The Tender Husband (1705). Now a captain in Lord Lucas' Regiment of Foot, he engaged in researches for the 'philosopher's stone.' In 1705 he married a widow, Margaret Stretch, with estates in Barbadoes; in 1706 was made gentleman-in-waiting to Queen Anne's consort, Prince George of Denmark; and in May 1707, a few weeks after his wife's death, was appointed by Harley to the post of Gazetteer with £300 a-year. He married in September the beautiful Miss Mary Scurlock, the 'Prue' of his correspondence. On 12th April 1709 appeared the first number of the tri-weekly Taller. In 1710 Steele became commissioner of stamps. The Taller came to an end in January 1711, to be succeeded in March by the more famous Spectator, which ceased 6th December 1712, to be followed, in March 1713, by the Guardian. In all these enterprises Steele enjoyed the aid of his old friend Addison; a supporter of the Hanoverian succession, in 1713 he was involved in a bitter quarrel with Swift, who, to Steele's indignant pamphlet, The Importance of Dunkirk consider'd, retorted grimly with The Importance of the 'Guardian' consider'd. Steele had now entered parliament for Stockbridge, dropping the Guardian for the professedly political Englishman. His Hanoverian pamphlet, The Crisis (1714), drew from Swift The Publick Spirit of the Whigs. Steele was impeached for seditious utterances in The Crisis, and expelled the House. But with Anne's death his party came into power. In his best pamphlet we have Mr Steele's Apology for Himself and his Writings (1714). Again a member of parliament and knighted, he continued to produce periodicals and pamphlets, one of which, The Plebeian, involved him in a painful controversy with Addison. He was made a patentee of Drury Lane Theatre, where in 1722 he produced The Conscious Lovers, his best comedy. He also established the Censorium, a sort of æsthetic music-hall. In December 1718 he lost his wife; and he himself died 1st September 1729 at Carmarthen in 'Prue's' native county. That Steele was incurably sanguine, that he constantly mistook his expectations for his means, is manifest from his lifelong embarrassments, but he made a noble and successful attempt to pay his debts before he died. Upon the whole he was a warm-hearted and benevolent man, a devoted husband, a loving father, and a loyal friend. His fame rests almost wholly on his essays. He was nearly always the forerunning spirit, and his ready sympathies and quick enthusiasm sometimes bore him to a height which Addison never attained. He rallied folly with admirable good-humour, rebuked vice with unvarying dignity, and earned for himself lasting gratitude by the chivalry and genuine respect with which, almost alone in his age, he spoke of women. An annotated selection from his Essays was issued in 1885 by the Clarendon Press. See memoir by Austin Dobson (1886), and Life by G. A. Aitken (1889).

Steell, Sir John, R.S.A. (1804-91), sculptor, born at Aberdeen, was educated as an artist at Edinburgh and Rome. Most of his chief works are in Edinburgh, including the equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington (1852), and that of Prince Albert (1876), for which Steell was knighted.

Steen, Jan (1626-79), genre-painter, was born and died at Leyden, and was for some time a brewer at Delft. The grave humour of his style is seen in such pictures as the 'Doctor Visiting his Patient,' a 'Cavalier giving Lessons on the Guitar to a Lady,' 'Domestic Life,' 'Tavern Company,' and 'The Oyster Girl.' See French Life by Westreheens (1856). [Stain.]

Steenstrup, Johannes Iapetus Smith (1813-97), zoologist, born at Vang in Norway, was professor of Zoology at Copenhagen 1845-85. His books treat of hermaphroditism, alternation of generations, flounders' eyes, and Cephalopods; and he explored the kitchen-middens of Denmark for pre-historic relics.—His son, JOHANNES, born at Sorø, 5th Dec. 1844, professor from 1877 of Northern Antiquities at Copenhagen, wrote a good book about Viking times, Normannerne (1876-82).

Steenwijk, Hendrik van (c. 1550-1603), Dutch painter of architectural interiors, settled at Frankfurt in 1579.—His son, HENDRIK (1580-1649), came, by Van Dyck's advice, to London in 1629, and died there. [Stain-wike.]

Steevens, George (1736-1800), born at Stepney, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. His reprint from the original quartos of Twenty Plays of Shakespeare (1766) brought him employment as Johnson's collaborator in his edition (1773). Jealous of Malone (q. v.), Steevens, with Isaac Reed, issued a doctored text (1793; 1803), which held authority till Boswell's publication of Malone's Variorum Shakespeare (1821).

Steffani, Agostino (1655-1730), priest, operatic composer, and diplomatist, the friend of Handel, was born at Castellfranco, and in 1688 settled at the court of Hanover.

Stein, Charlotte von (1742-1827), the friend of Goethe, married in 1764 the Duke of Saxe-Weimar's Master of the Horse. Her friendship with Goethe was broken suddenly (1788), but renewed before her death. Goethe's Letters to her were published in 1848-51, and by Heinemann in 1894-95. See works by Düntzer (1874), Bode (1910), and Calvert (English, 1877). [Stine.]

Stein, Mark Aurel, C.I.E., born in 1862 at Budapest, held educational and archeological posts under the Indian government. In 1900-1 and 1906-8 he made important explorations in Chinese Turkestan and Central Asia, discovering MSS. and objects of art. His books include Ancient Khotan and Ruins of Desert Cathay.

Stein, Heinrich Friedrich Carl, Baron von (1757-1831), born at Nassau, entered the service of Prussia in 1780, and became president of the Westphalian chambers (1796). In 1804 he was summoned to take charge of the Prussian excise, customs, manufactures, and trade, but was unable then to modify the traditional methods, and resigned in 1807. After the treaty of Tilsit Frederick-William III. had no alternative but to recall Stein, who in barely a twelvemonth wrought such changes as laid the foundations of Prussia's subsequent greatness. He abolished the last relics of serfdom, did away with the privileges of caste, freed land from the shackles of feudalism, created peasant proprietors, extirpated monopolies and hindrances to free trade, promoted municipal government, and supported Scharnhorst in his schemes of army reform. Napoleon insisted upon his dismissal, and Stein withdrew (1808) to Austria, but not before issuing his Political Testament. In 1812 he went to St Petersburg and forwarded the coalition against Napoleon. From the battle of Leipzig to the Congress of Vienna he was the ruling spirit of the opposition to the emperor. See German works by Pertz (1849-56), Arndt (1858), Lehmann (1875-77), and Neubauer (1894), and Seeley's Life and Times of Stein (1878).

Steiner, Jakob (1796-1863), geometer, born at Utendorf, Bern, from 1834 was a Berlin professor. See memoir by Geiser (1874).

Steinitz, William (1836-1900), born at Prague, was chess champion of the world 1862-94, when Lasker defeated him. He lived fourteen years in London, and in 1883 settled in the U.S.

Steinmetz, CARL FRIEDRICH VON (1790-1877), Prussian general, born at Eisenach, fought through the campaign of 1813-14, and in 1866 routed three Austrian corps (June 27-29). In the Franco-German war (1870) he commanded the right wing of the German advance; but he proved unequal to the task, and after Gravelotte was governor-general of Posen and Silesia.

Steinthal, HEYMANN, born at Gröbzig in Anhalt, 16th May 1823, in 1850 became lecturer on Philology at Berlin, and in 1863 extra-ordinary professor, lecturing also at the Jewish High School on Old Testament criticism, &c. He wrote much on the origin, development, and study of languages. He died 14th March 1899. [Stein'tahl.]

Steno, NICHOLAS (1688-87), born at Copenhagen, and trained to medicine, won fame as an inquirer into the anatomy of the glands, heart, and brain. In 1667 he settled in Florence, turned Catholic, and became physician to the grand-duke. He was the first to point out the true origin of fossil animals, explain the structure of the earth's crust, and distinguish clearly between stratified and volcanic rocks. But, drawn away from natural science, he was made a bishop, and in 1677 despatched to North Germany as vicar-apostolic. See Prof. Hughes in Nature (1882).

Stephanovich-Karajich, VUK (1787-1864), Servian poet, scholar, and patriot.

Stephanus Byzantius, a Greek geographical writer of the 5th century A.D.

Stephen, ST., one of the seven chosen to manage the finance and alms of the early church. Tried by the Sanhedrim for blasphemy, he was stoned to death—the first Christian martyr.

Stephen I., saint, martyr, and pope in 253-257 maintained against Cyprian that heretics baptised by heretics need not be rebaptised.—STEPHEN II. died two days after his election (752), and so often is not reckoned as a pope.—STEPHEN II. or III. (752-757), when Rome was threatened by the Lombards, turned to Pepin, king of the Franks, who forced the Lombards to withdraw, and gave the pope the exarchate of Ravenna, the real foundation of the temporal power.—STEPHEN III. (768-772).—STEPHEN IV. (816-817).—STEPHEN V. (885-891).—STEPHEN VI. (896-897) was strangled in prison.—STEPHEN VII. (929-931).—STEPHEN VIII. (939-942).—STEPHEN IX. or X. (1057-58).

Stephen, ST., first king of Hungary 997-1038, was baptised about 995, formed Pannonia and Dacia, inhabited by semi-independent Magyar chiefs, into a regular kingdom, organised Christianity, and laid the foundation of many institutions surviving to this day. He received from Pope Sylvester III. the title of 'Apostolic King,' and was canonised in 1087.

Stephen, king of England, was the third son of Stephen, Count of Blois, by Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror. Born in 1105, he was sent in 1114 to the court of his uncle, Henry I., received from him the countship of Mortain in Normandy, and acquired that of Boulogne by marriage. When Henry I. resolved to settle the crown on his daughter Matilda or Maud, Empress of Germany, and afterwards wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet, Stephen with the rest swore fealty to her, but on Henry's death (Dec. 1, 1135) he hurried over from Normandy, was hailed with enthusiasm, and was crowned on the 22d. He attempted to strengthen his position by help of Fleming mercenaries, and he made more enemies than friends by the favours he heaped on some of the great lords. King David of Scotland invaded the north on Matilda's behalf, was defeated near Northallerton (1138), but retained Cumberland. The first powerful enemy that the king made was Robert, Earl of Gloucester, an illegitimate son of Henry I.; next he arrayed against himself the clergy by his quarrel with the justiciar, Bishop Roger of Salisbury. The realm now fell into sheer anarchy; the barons plundered and burned at their pleasure. In 1139 Matilda landed at Arundel, in 1141 took Stephen prisoner at Lincoln, and was acknowledged queen, but her harshness and greed soon disgusted Englishmen. The men of London rose, and she fled to Winchester. In November 1141 Stephen regained his liberty, and 1142 saw him again in the ascendant. In 1148 Matilda finally left England, but her son Henry (see HENRY II.) in 1153 crossed over to England, and forced Stephen to acknowledge him as his successor. Stephen died at Dover, 24th October 1154.

Stephen, JAMES (1758-1832), born at Poole of an Aberdonian stock, was educated at Winchester, and became successively parliamentary reporter, an official in St Kitts, an advocate in prize cases before the Privy-council, member for Tralee, under-secretary for the colonies, and a master of the Court of Chancery. He was an abolitionist and author of The Slavery of the British West Indies (1824-30).—HENRY JOHN STEPHEN (1787-1864), his son, was a serjeant-at-law, the author of a Summary of the Criminal Law (1834), New Commentaries on the Laws of England (1841), &c.—The third son, SIR JAMES STEPHEN (1789-1859), born at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, passed in 1813 to Lincoln's Inn, and became counsel to the Colonial Office and Board of Trade, under-secretary of state for the colonies 1834-47, when he was knighted, and in 1849 regius professor of Modern History at Cambridge. He married a Venn, and was closely connected with the 'Clapham sect.' See Memoir prefixed to 4th edition of his Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography (1849); another work by him is Lectures on the History of France (1851).—The youngest son, SIR GEORGE STEPHEN, Q.C. (1794-1879), barrister, was knighted in 1837 for his services in the reform of the poor-laws, imprisonment for debt, and the police force; in 1855 emigrated to Victoria; and, like his father, wrote on the slavery question.

SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN, second son of Sir James Stephen, was born at Kensington, 3d March 1829, and educated at Eton, King's College, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge. Called to the bar in 1854, he became recorder of Newark-on-Trent (1859-69), Q.C. (1868), legal member of the Viceroy of India's Council (1869-72), professor of Common Law at the Inns of Court (1875-79), K.C.S.I. (1877), and judge of the High Court of Justice (1879-91), on his retirement being created a baronet. The Indian Evidence Act was due to him; and among his works are a General View of the Criminal Law of England (1863), Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity (1873), Digest of the Law of Evidence (1876), Digest of the Criminal Law (1877; 5th ed. 1894), History of the Criminal Law of England (1883), Story of Nunemar (1885), and Horæ Sabbaticæ (Saturday Review articles, 1892). He unsuccessfully contested Harwich (1865) and Dundee (1873) as a moderate Liberal. He died near Ipswich, 12th March 1894. See Life by his brother (1895).—That brother, SIR LESLIE STEPHEN, K.C.B. (1902), born at Kensington, 28th November 1832, was educated at Eton; King's College, London; and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he was fellow and tutor. Relinquishing his orders, he was editor of the Cornhill (1871-82), and of the first twenty-six volumes of the Dictionary of National Biography (1855-91, from 1890 conjointly with Mr Sidney Lee, q.v.). His works include The Playground of Europe (1871); he was president of the Alpine Club; the delightful Hours in a Library (1874-79); History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876); Johnson (1878), Pope (1880), and Swift (1882) in the 'English Men of Letters' series; Science of Ethics (1882); Life of Henry Fawcett (1885); An Agnostic's Apology (1893); Studies of a Biographer (1898-1902); George Eliot; and some lectures. He died 22d February 1904. See his Life and Letters by Maitland (1906).

Stephens (French ESTIENNE or ETIENNE), a Provençal family, one of whom, HENRY (c. 1460-1520) became a printer in Paris in 1501. His business was taken up by his second son, ROBERT (1503-59), who was in 1589 and 1540 appointed printer to the king in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He early became a Protestant, more than once got into difficulties with the university of Paris, and in 1550 retired to Geneva, where he printed several of Calvin's works. A scholar as well as a printer, he published (1532) a famous Latin dictionary (Thesaurus Lingue Latine). His Latin New Testament (1523), Latin Bible (1528), and Greek New Testament (1550) deserve mention. He also printed classic authors and Latin grammars. —CHARLES (1504-64) took charge of his brother's business in Paris when he withdrew to Geneva, and wrote and printed an encyclopædic work (Dictionary Historicum ac Poeticum, 1553), a collection of ancient treatises on agriculture (Prædium Rusticum, 1554), &c.—Robert's eldest son, HENRY (1528-98), celebrated for his knowledge of Greek, travelled in Italy, England, and the Netherlands, collating MSS. In 1556 he set up a press in Geneva, and issued many ancient Greek authors, including some twenty 'first editions,' as also his own Greek dictionary (1572). From about 1578 he led a restless and wandering life. In French he wrote the semi-satirical Apologie pour Hérodote (1566). The traditions of the family were kept up at Paris by PAUL (1566-1627), son of Henry (II.), and by Paul's son ANTOINE (1592-1674). See Greswell's Parisian Greek Press (1833); works by Renouard (1843), Bernard (1856), Clement (1890); Mark Pattison's Essays (1889).

Stephens, ALEXANDER HAMILTON (1812-83), born near Crawfordsville, Ga., was admitted to the bar in 1834, and sat in congress 1843-59. He advocated the annexation of Texas in 1838, in 1854 defended the Kansas-Nebraska act, at first opposed secession, but in 1861 became Confederate vice-president. He sat in congress again 1874-83, in 1882 was elected governor of Georgia, and wrote War between the States (1867-70).

Stephens, CATHERINE (1794-1882), operatic singer, born in London, in 1838 married the fifth Earl of Essex (1757-1839).

Stephens, GEORGE (1813-95), archaeologist, born in Liverpool, and educated at University College, London, settled at Stockholm in 1833, and became in 1855 professor of English at Copenhagen. His great works are his Old Northern Runic Monuments (1866-68-84), its abridgment (1884), and The Runes, Whence came they? (1894).

Stephens, JAMES (1824-1901), born at Killybegny, had a post on the railway, next went to Dublin, and became an active agent of the Young Ireland party. He was slightly wounded at the scuffle of Ballinacorney (1848), skulked for three months in the mountains, and then escaped to France. In 1853 he journeyed over Ireland, preparing the soil for the Fenian conspiracy; as its 'Head Centre' he exercised an enormous influence. He visited America in 1864, was arrested in Dublin on 10th Nov., but a fortnight later escaped from Richmond Bridewell so suspiciously that many hinted at government connivance. He found his way to New York, was deposed by the Fenians, sank into obscurity, and was allowed to return to Ireland in 1891. See O'Leary's Recollections of Fenianism (1896).

Stephens, JOHN LLOYD (1805-52), born at Shrewsbury, N.J., practised as a New York barrister, wrote two books of travel in the Levant, and was U.S. minister to Central America.

Stephens, WILLIAM RICHARD WOOD (1839-1902), born in Gloucestershire, took a first from Balliol in 1862, and became Dean of Winchester in 1894. He wrote Lives of St Chrysostom, Dean Hook, Lord Hatherley, Freeman, &c.

Stephenson, GEORGE, son of a colliery engineer and grandson of a Roxburghshire shepherd, was born at Wylam near Newcastle, 9th June 1781. From herding cows and hoeing turnips he rose to be fireman in a colliery, and contrived meanwhile to pay for lessons in reading, writing, and arithmetic. In 1815 he invented, contemporaneously with Davy, a colliery safety-lamp, the 'Geordie,' for which he received a public testimonial of £1000. In 1812 he had become engine-wright at Killingworth Colliery, and here in 1814 he constructed his first locomotive, 'My Lord,' running 6 miles an hour, for the colliery tram-roads; his invention next year of the steam-blast made it an ultimate success. In 1821 Stephenson was appointed engineer for the construction of the Stockton and Darlington mineral railway (opened 27th Sept. 1825), and in 1826 for the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, which, after inconceivable difficulties, was opened 15th Sept. 1826. The October before had seen the memorable competition of engines, resulting in the triumph of Stephenson's 'Rocket,' running 30 miles an hour. In 1834-37 he was engineer on the North Midland, York and North Midland, Manchester and Leeds, Birmingham and Derby, and Sheffield and Rotherham Railways; and during the railway mania his offices in London were crowded. In 1845 he visited Belgium and Spain; but his last years he spent in the quiet pursuits of a country gentleman, dying at his country-seat of Tapton near Chesterfield, 12th August 1848. See the Life by Smiles (1857; new ed. 1873) and his Lives of Engineers (new ed. 1874).

Stephenson, ROBERT, son of George Stephenson, born at Willington Quay, 16th October 1803, was apprenticed to a coalviewer at Killingworth. In 1822 his father sent him for six months to Edinburgh University. In 1823 he assisted his father in surveying the Stockton and Darlington Railway; and after three years in Colombia, he became manager of his father's locomotive engine-works at Newcastle. He attained independent fame by his Britannia Tubular Bridge (1850), those at Conway (1848) and Montreal (1859), the High Level Bridge at Newcastle (1849), the Border Bridge at Berwick (1850), &c. In 1847 he was returned for Whitby. He died 12th October 1859, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Smiles's Life of George Stephenson (1857) and Lives of the Engineers, vol. v., and Jeaffreson's Life of Robert Stephenson (1864).

Stepniak ('Son of the Steppe'), nom de guerre of Sergius Michalevitch Krachvinsky (1852-95), a leader of the Russian Revolutionary party. Becoming obnoxious to government as an apostle of freedom, he was arrested, and subsequently kept under such surveillance that he left Russia and settled (1876) in Geneva, and then (1885) in London. He is, however, believed to have been the assassin of General Mesentzeff, head of the Petersburg police (1878). Among his works were La Russia Sotteranea (Milan, 1881; Eng. trans. Underground Russia, 1883), studies of the Nihilist movement; Russia under the Tsars (trans. 1885); The Career of a Nihilist, a novel (1889); Nihilism as it is (1894); King Stork and King Log; and Russian Wit and Humour (1895). He was run over by a train in a London suburb.

Sterling, ANTOINETTE (1850-1904), concert-singer, born at Sterlingville, N.Y., studied at New York, Cologne, Baden-Baden, and London, made her debut in 1873, and married in 1875 an American, Mr John McKinlay.

Sterling, JOHN, was born at Kames Castle, Bute, 20th July 1806. His father, Captain Edward Sterling (1773-1847), was farming then, but by-and-by settled in London, and became the 'thunderer' of the Times. At sixteen John went to Glasgow University, and at nineteen to Cambridge, where he distinguished himself at the Union; he left without a degree in 1827, and soon was busy on the Athenæum. Influenced by Coleridge, and liberal in sympathies, he was nearly sailing on that crazy expedition to Spain which ended in the execution at Malaga of his friend General Torrijos and his own cousin Boyd. He married in November 1830, but soon fell dangerously ill, and spent fifteen months in St Vincent. In 1833 he took orders, and served eight months as Julius Hare's curate at Hurstmonceaux. His health again giving way, he resigned, and never advanced to priest's orders; indeed, the divergence between his opinions and the church's soon widened beyond even Coleridgean accommodation. He contributed to Blackwood's and the Westminster, planned tragedies, and wrote poems, one of which, The Election, was published in 1841. In August 1838 he founded the (later) Sterling Club, among whose members were Carlyle, Allan Cunningham, G. C. Lewis, Malden, Mill, Milnes, Spedding, Tennyson, Thirlwall, W. H. Thompson, and Venables. He died at Ventnor, 18th Sept. 1844. Julius Hare edited his Essays and Tales (1848) with a memoir, which seemed to Carlyle so inadequate that he himself undertook that masterpiece of biography which will preserve Sterling's name from oblivion.

Stern, DANIEL. See AGOULT.

Sterne, LAURENCE, was born at Clonmel, 24th November 1713. His father, Roger Sterne, ensign in a foot regiment, was grandson of an Archbishop of York who had played an active part as a Cavalier churchman. The family accompanied the father on his military wanderings; and it was not till Laurence was eleven years old that he was sent to Halifax grammar-school. At eighteen he entered Jesus College, Cambridge, as a sizar. In 1736, now B.A., he went to York, where his uncle, Dr Jacques Sterne, was archdeacon; and taking priest's orders in 1738, he became vicar of Sutton-on-the-Forest and a prebendary of York. In 1741 he married Miss Elizabeth Lumley, by whom he had one daughter, Lydia. In 1759 he wrote the first two volumes of The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, first published at York, but published anew at London in 1760. At once Sterne became a 'lion.' In April Dodsley brought out a second edition, and this was followed by Sermons of the 'Rev. Mr Yorick.' In January 1761 vols. iii. and iv. of Tristram were welcomed by the town, Sterne having meanwhile been presented to the living of Coxwold, thenceforth his infrequent home. Volumes v. and vi. of his novel were published in December 1761; and Sterne, whose health was failing, spent over two years in France. In 1765 vols. vii. and viii. appeared, and a second series of Sermons abounding in clerical humour. The autumn and winter of 1765 were spent in a tour through France and Italy. The ninth and last volume of Tristram came out in January 1767; and the rest of that year was occupied in the preparation of the first part of The Sentimental Journey through France and Italy (1768). Their author's health was now completely wrecked; and, attacked by pleurisy, he died in London on 18th March. There have been few writers of any age or country who have displayed such mastery over every form of humour. Yet it is impossible to overlook the imperfections of his art, alike in conception and in execution. The wild eccentricity of his manner and arrangement—a deliberate and usually successful bid for laughter—was also the convenient cloak of a singularly slipshod literary style. His indecencies, if less gross than those of Swift or Rabelais, are by reason of their prurience far more offensive. His pathos too often takes the form of overstrained sentimentalism. He was unscrupulous in his unacknowledged borrowings from the writings of others. Nevertheless is Sterne a classic of English prose fiction. See his Letters (1775-79); Ferriar's Illustrations of Sterne (1812; new ed. 1898); Lives by P. Fitzgerald (new ed. 1896), Traill (1882), W. L. Cross (1900), W. Sichel (1910), Lewis Melville (1911); the Autobiographical Fragment (in Scott's and other memoirs); and The Whitefoord Papers (1898).

56

Sternhold, THOMAS (1500-49), joint-author of the English version of psalms formerly attached to the Prayer-book, was born near Blakeney in Gloucestershire, or, according to Fuller and Wood, in Hampshire. He was Groom of the Robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. The first edition (undated) contains only nineteen psalms; the second (1549), thirty-seven. A third edition, by Whitchurch (1551), contains seven more by J. H. [John Hopkins], probably a native of Awre in Gloucestershire, who died rector of Great Waldingfield, Suffolk, in 1570. The complete book of psalms, which appeared in 1562, formed for nearly two centuries almost the whole hymnody of the Church of England, and was known as the 'Old Version' after the rival version of Tate and Brady appeared (1696). Forty psalms bore the name of Sternhold, and sixty that of Hopkins. The rest were the work of various authors. See J. Julian's Dict. of Hymnology (1892).

Stesichorus (c. 630-556 B.C.), greatest of the old Dorian lyric poets, was born at Himera in Sicily, and died in Catania. Only some thirty short fragments of his works remain.

Stebens, FREDERIC WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, BARON (1730-94), general of the American revolutionary army, born at Magdeburg, at fourteen served at the siege of Prague, and in 1762 was on the staff of Frederick the Great. While at Paris in 1777 he was induced to go to America, and his services were joyfully accepted by congress and his

Washington. He was appointed inspector-general, prepared a manual of tactics for the army, remodelled its organisation, and improved its discipline. In 1780 he received a command in Virginia, and took part in the siege of Yorktown. Congress in 1790 voted him an annuity of 2400 dollars and land near Utica, N.Y. See Sparks's American Biography and Life by F. Kapp (1860). [Stû-ben; German pron. Sto-ben.]

Stevens, ALFRED, sculptor, was born at Blandford, the son of a house-painter, in January 1818. In 1833-42 he copied old masters and otherwise studied in Italy, working the last year with Thorwaldsen. In 1845-47 he was teacher of architectural drawing in the School of Design, Somerset House; during the next ten years he was engaged in designing and decorating. From 1856 he laboured at one of the finest pieces of modelling in England, his Wellington monument in St Paul's Cathedral. He died at Haverstock Hall, 1st May 1875. See H. Stannus, Alfred Stevens and his Work (1892).

Stevens, THADDEUS (1792-1868), born at Danville, Vt., in 1816 settled as a lawyer at Gettysburg, Pa., was member of congress 1849-53, a Republican leader, and chairman at the trial of President Johnson (1868).

Stevenson, JOHN ANDREW, knighted in 1808, was the son of a Glasgow violinist, settled at Dublin, became vicar-chloral there, composed operas, an oratorio, songs, duets, &c., and garbled the Irish melodies for Moore by his symphonies and accompaniments.

Stevenson, JOSEPH (1805-95), Catholic archivist and historian, born at Berwick-on-Tweed, in 1849 became vicar of Leighton-Buzzard, but in 1863 turned Catholic, and in 1877 joined the Jesuits.

Stevenson, ROBERT, engineer, born at Glasgow, 8th June 1772, lost his father in infancy; and his mother in 1786 married Thomas Smith, first engineer of the Lighthouse Board. Stevenson took, then, to engineering, and in 1796 succeeded his step-father. During his forty-seven years' tenure of office he planned or constructed twenty-three Scottish lighthouses, employing the catoptric system of illumination, and his own invention of 'intermittent' and 'flashing' lights. He also acted as a consulting engineer for roads, bridges, harbours, canals, and railways. He died in Edinburgh, July 12, 1850. He published, besides articles, four volumes of professional reports, and a work on the Bell Rock Lighthouse. See the Life (1873) by his son, David Stevenson C.E. (1815-86).—Another son, ALAN (d. 1806), built the Skerryvore Lighthouse (1844).

Stevenson, ROBERT LOUIS BALFOUR, son of Thomas Stevenson, C.E., and grandson of Robert, was born at Edinburgh, November 13, 1850. He was at first intended for the family calling, but turned to law, studied at Edinburgh University, and was called to the Scottish bar. He soon found his true bent in letters, and quickly forced his way into the front rank of contemporary writers. Some experiences which supplied impulse were journeys in France by canoe and on foot, a voyage across the Atlantic in the steerage of an emigrant ship, the after-journey across the continent in an emigrant train, and his five years' residence in Samoa, where he settled for health's sake in 1889. From the first his work showed individuality and a perfect style. His earliest books were An Inland Voyage (1878), Edinburgh: Picturesque Notes (1878), Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes (1879), Virginius Puerisque (1881), and Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882). The New Arabian Nights (1882) was a collection of grotesque romances. Treasure Island (1883) was a success in a literary kind the secret of which seemed lost. Hardly less excellent was Kidnapped (1886); but The Master of Ballantrae (1889) and The Black Arrow (1888) fall into lower rank. A Child's Garden of Verse (1885) stands almost by itself as an imaginative realisation of the make-believe of childhood. Later volumes of verse were Underwoods (1887) and Ballads (1891). His Prince Otto (1885) has been pronounced the test of the true Stevensonian; the Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886) compelled exacting critics to commendation. Further works were The Silverado Squatters (1884), The Merry Men (1887), Island Nights' Entertainments (1893), and Catrina (a continuation of Kidnapped, 1893). With his wife he wrote The Dynamiter (1885), and with his stepson, Lloyd Osbourne, The Wrong Box (1889), The Wrecker (1892), and The Ebb Tide (1894). He defended Father Damien in 1890, and showed his versatility by a memoir of Professor Fleeming Jenkin (1887) and A Footnote to History (on Samoan politics, 1892). His health had long been broken; he died suddenly, 3d Dec. 1894, and was buried by his own desire on a mountain-top behind his Samoan home of Vailima. Weir of Hermiston, an unfinished romance, appeared in Cosmopolis in 1895; St Ives (completed by Mr Quiller Couch) in the Pall Mall Magazine of 1897. See the Life by Graham Balfour (2 vols. 1901), the Letters edited by Sidney Colvin (1895-99), who also super-vised the sumptuous 'Edinburgh Edition' (27 vols. 1894-98), Henry James's Partial Portraits (1888), Andrew Lang's Essays in Little (1890), Walter Raleigh's R. L. Stevenson (new ed. 1896), and a sketch by Margaret Moyes Black (1898).

Stevinus, SIMON (1548-1620), mathematician and physicist, born at Bruges, held offices under Prince Maurice of Orange; wrote on fortification, book-keeping, and decimals; and invented a system of sluices and a carriage propelled by sails.

Stewart, HOUSE OF. The Breton Alan Fitz-faald (died c. 1114) got from Henry I. the lands of Oswestry in Shropshire. His elder son, William Fitzalan (c. 1105-60), became ancestor of the Earls of Arundel. The second son, Walter (died 1177), coming to Scotland, received from David I. large possessions in Renfrewshire, Teviotdale, Lauderdale, &c., along with the hereditary dignity of Steward of Scotland, which gave his descendants the surname of Stewart, by some branches modified to Steuart or the French form Stuart. Walter, grandson of the first Stewart, was also Justiciary of Scotland. Alexander, fourth Stewart (1214-83), was regent of Scotland in Alexander III.'s minority and commanded at the battle of Largs (1263). From his second son's marriage with the heiress of Bonkyl sprang the Stewarts of Darnley, Lennox, and Aubigné. James, fifth Stewart (1243-1309), was one of the six regents of Scotland after the death of Alexander III. Walter, sixth Stewart (1293-1326), did good service at Bannockburn, and defended Berwick against Edward II. His marriage in 1315 with Marjory, Bruce's daughter, brought the crown of Scotland to his family. His son Robert, seventh Stewart (1316-90), on the death of David II. in 1371, ascended the throne as Robert II. He was twice married—first (1349) to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Adam Mure of Rowallan, and secondly (1355) to Euphemia, Countess of Moray, daughter of Hugh, Earl of Ross. Elizabeth Mure was related to him within the prohibited degrees, so in 1347 he had obtained a papal dispensation

(only discovered in the Vatican in 1789) for the marriage, legitimising the children already born. His third son, Robert (c. 1349-1420), was in 1398 created Duke of Albany; the fourth, Alexander, who in 1374 got the earldom of Buchan on the forfeiture of the Comyns, is infamous as the 'Wolf of Badenoch.'

Between 1371 and 1714 fourteen Stewarts sat upon the Scottish, and six of these also on the English, throne. A race unhappy as few, they were Robert II. (1316-90); Robert III. (c. 1340-1406), who died of grief, his elder son murdered, his second an English captive; James I. (1394-1437), for eighteen years a prisoner, afterwards murdered; James II. (1430-60), killed at the siege of Roxburgh; James III. (1451-88), murdered, with his son in rebellion against him; James IV. (1473-1513), slain at Flodden; James V. (1512-42), died broken-hearted; Mary (1542-87), beheaded, and for twenty years a captive; James VI. and I. (1566-1625); Charles I. (1600-49), beheaded; Charles II. (1630-85); James VII. and II. (1633-1701), for the last twelve years of his life an exile; and Mary (1662-94) and Anne (1665-1714), his daughters, who supplanted him, and died childless. All fourteen get separate articles.

By his second queen, Mary of Modena, James VII. and II. had one son, JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD, born at St James's Palace, 10th June 1688. The warning-pan fiction fastened on him the nickname of Pretender. Six months later he was conveyed by his fugitive mother to St Germain, where, on his father's death in 1701, he was proclaimed his successor. On an attempt (1705) to make a descent upon Scotland, the young 'Chevalier de St George' was not suffered to land; after his return he served with the French in the Low Countries, charging bravely at Malplaquet. But in Mar's ill-conducted rebellion he landed at Peterhead (December 1715), only to sneak away six weeks afterwards from Montrose. France was now closed to him by the treaty of Utrecht, and almost all the rest of his fainéant, dissolute, and prayerful life was passed at Rome, where he died, 1st January 1766. In 1719 he had married the beautiful Princess Clementina Sobieski (1702-35), who bore him two sons.

His elder son, CHARLES EDWARD LOUIS PHILIP CASIMIR, known variously as the 'Young Pretender,' the 'Young Chevalier,' and 'Bonny Prince Charlie,' was born at Rome, 31st December 1720. His education was irregular, but from childhood he raised the hopes of the Jacobites by the promise of a bright, chivalrous nature. He first saw service at the siege of Gaeta (1734); fought bravely at Dettingen (1743); and next year repaired to France, to head Marshal Saxe's projected invasion of England. But the squadron which was to have conveyed the transports with 15,000 troops to Kent fled before the British fleet; the transports themselves were scattered by a tempest; and for a year and a half Charles was kept hanging on in France, until at last, sailing from Nantes, he landed with seven followers at Eriska in the Hebrides on 23d July 1745, and on 19th August raised his father's standard in Glenfinnan. The clansmen flocked in; on 17th Sept. Edinburgh surrendered, though the castle held out; and Charles kept court at Holyrood, the palace of his ancestors. There followed the victory over Sir John Cope at Prestonpans (21st Sept.), the march upon London with 6500 men, the fatal turning at Derby (6th Dec.), the victory over Hawley at Falkirk (17th Jan. 1746), the crushing defeat by the Duke of Cumberland at Culloden (16th April), and Charles's five months' hidings and wanderings, with £30,000 set on his head, in the Hebrides and the western mainland, till on 20th September he got shipping from Moidart to Brittany. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) caused his forcible expulsion from France, and thereafter he lived at Avignon, Paris (incognito), Liège, Basel, Florence, and Rome. He seems to have paid two or three secret visits to London between 1750 and 1760; in 1766 succeeded to his father's empty titles; in 1772 married the ill-fated Countess of Albany (q.v.); and for forty years a miserable drunkard, died at Rome, 31st Jan. 1788. By his Scottish mistress, Clementina Walkinshaw (c. 1726-1802), he left a natural daughter, Charlotte (1753-89), whom he had created Duchess of Albany. He was buried at Frascati, but translated to St Peter's. See his Life and Times by Ewald (1875), Bishop Forbes's Lyon in Mourning (Scot. Hist. Soc. 1895-96), W. B. Blaikie's Itinerary of Prince Charles Edward (same soc. 1897), and Andrew Lang's Prince Charles Edward (1900); also COPELAND MACDONALD (FLORA).

His brother, HENRY BENEDICT MARIA CLEMENT, Duke of York, Cardinal, was born at Rome, 5th March 1725. After the failure of the '45 he became in 1747 a cardinal and priest, and in 1761 Bishop of Frascati. He enjoyed, through the favour of the French court, the revenues of two rich abbeys, as well as a Spanish pension. The French Revolution stripped him of his fortune, and he had to take refuge in Venice for three years. In 1800 George III. granted him a pension of £4000; he died, the last of the Stuarts, 13th July 1807. The crown-jewels, carried off by James II., were bequeathed by him to George IV., then Prince of Wales, who in 1819 gave fifty guineas towards Canova's monument in St Peter's to 'James III., Charles III., and Henry IX.' See books by Vaughan (1906), Haile (1907), Shield and Lang (1907).

Next to the exiled Stuarts came the descendants of Henrietta (q.v.), Charles I.'s youngest daughter, who in 1661 was married to the Duke of Orleans. From this marriage sprang Anne-Mary (1669-1728), who married Victor Amadeus, Duke of Savoy and king of Sardinia; their son, Charles Emmanuel III. (1701-73), king of Sardinia; his son, Victor Amadeus III. (1726-96), king of Sardinia; his son, Victor Emmanuel I. (1759-1824), king of Sardinia; his daughter, Mary (1792-1840), who married Francis, Duke of Modena; their son, Ferdinand (1821-49), who married Elizabeth of Austria; and their daughter, Maria Teresa (born 1849), who in 1868 married Prince Louis of Bavaria, and whom, as 'Mary III. and IV.,' the 'Legitimist Jacobites' of 1891 put forward as the 'representative of the Royal House of these realms.' Rupert, her son, born at Munich, 18th May 1869, is ninth in descent from Charles I.; he represented Bavaria in the procession celebrating the sixtieth year of Queen Victoria's reign in June 1897. The branch of the family which the Act of Settlement (1701) called to the throne on the death of Anne were the descendants of the Electress Sophia of Hanover, granddaughter of James VI. and I. by her mother, the Princess Elizabeth (q.v.), Electress Palatine and Queen of Bohemia. By that act the above-mentioned descendants of Henrietta of Orleans were excluded, and also the Roman Catholic descendants of the Princess Elizabeth's sons. King George V. is twenty-fourth in descent from Walter Fitzalan, eighteenth from Robert II., and tenth from James VI. and I.

ABABELLA STUART (1575-1615) was the daughter of the Earl of Lennox, Darnley's younger brother, and so a great-great-granddaughter of Henry VII., a third cousin to Queen Elizabeth, and a first cousin to James VI. and I. At twenty-seven she was suspected of having a lover in the boy William Seymour, who had Tudor blood in his veins; but on James's accession (1603) she was restored to favour, only, however, to contract a secret marriage in 1610 with him. Both were imprisoned, and both escaped—Seymour successfully to Ostend, but she was retaken, and died, insane, in the Tower. See Lives by Elizabeth Cooper (1866) and Mary E. Bradley (1889).

The cadets of the house of Stewart are: (1) descendants of Robert II.; (2) descendants of natural sons of his descendants; (3) descendants of natural sons of Stewart kings; and (4) legitimate branches of the Stewarts before their accession to the throne. To the first belong the Stuarts of Castle-Stewart, descended from Robert, Duke of Albany, Robert II.'s third son, through the Lords Avondale and Ochiltree. They received the titles of Lord Stuart of Castle-Stewart in the peerage of Ireland (1619), Viscount Castle-Stewart (1793), and Earl (1809). To the second class belong the Stuart Earls of Traquair (1633–1861), descended from a natural son of James Stewart, Earl of Buchan. To the third class belong the Regent Moray, the Marquis of Bute, and the Shaw-Stewarts; and to the fourth belong the Earls of Galloway (from a brother of the fifth High Stewart), the Lords Blantyre, the Stewarts of Fort-Stewart, and the Stewarts of Grandtully (from the fourth High Stewart; the last baronet died in 1890).

Stewart, ALEXANDER TURNEY (1803–76), millionaire, born at Lisburn near Belfast, emigrated to New York in 1823, where two years later he opened his first dry-goods store. His charities were numerous, yet at his death he left some $40,000,000. His body was stolen in 1878, and restored to his widow three years after on payment of $20,000 through a lawyer.

Stewart, BALFOUR, LL.D., F.R.S., physicist, born at Edinburgh, November 1, 1828, studied at St Andrews and Edinburgh, and in 1853 forsook a commercial career in Australia to become assistant to Prof. Forbes at Edinburgh. Director of Kew Observatory (1859), and professor of Physics at Owens College, Manchester (1870), he died near Drogheda, December 19, 1887. He made his first reputation by his work on Radiant Heat (1858), and was one of the founders of spectrum-analysis. Particularly valuable are his papers on terrestrial magnetism. He earned a high reputation by his text-books on physics—Treatise on Heat (1866; 6th ed. 1895), Elementary Physics (1870; 5th ed. 1895), and Conservation of Energy (1873; 7th ed. 1887). With Prof. Tait he published The Unseen Universe (1875), a book which had a phenomenal reception.

Stewart, SIR CHARLES. See CASTLEREAUGH.

Stewart, DUGALD, philosopher, born in Edinburgh, 22d November 1753, son of Matthew Stewart (q.v.), studied at Edinburgh and Glasgow. He became assistant (1772) to his father, and joint-professor (1775). In 1778, in the absence of Adam Ferguson, he taught also the moral philosophy class; in 1785, appointed professor of Moral Philosophy, he included in his subject psychology, metaphysics, logic, ethics, natural theology, politics, and political economy. In 1792 appeared vol. i. of his Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind, and in 1793 Outlines of Moral Philosophy. In 1806 he received from a Whig government a sinecure worth £600 a-year. From 1810 to 1820, when Stewart resigned, Dr Thomas Brown was conjoint professor. In 1810 Stewart published his Philosophical Essays; in 1814–27 vols. ii. and iii. of the Elements; in 1815–21 the History of Ethical Philosophy; and in 1828 the Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers. Stewart lived from 1809 at Kinneil House, Bo'ness, but died in Edinburgh, 11th June 1828. He was a conspicuous representative of the Scottish school. Sir W. Hamilton's edition of his Works (11 vols. 1854–58) comprises a Life by Prof. Veitch.

Stewart, SIR HERBERT (1843–85), a major-general who entered the army in 1864, served against the Zulus and the Boers, and was mortally wounded at Abu Klea.

Stewart, MATTHEW (1717–85), born at Rothesay, was minister of Rosneath, and Edinburgh professor of Mathematics 1747–72. He wrote Theorems (1746), Tracts Physical and Mathematical (1761), and Propositiones Geometricæ (1763). See Life by Playfair in Trans. Roy. Soc. Edin. (1788).

Stieler, ADOLF (1775–1836), Gotha geographer, editor of the well-known Atlas (75 plates; 1817–23; new ed. 95 plates, 1888). [See Life.]

Stier, RUDOLF EWALD (1800–62), German theologian, fervent and mystical, became superintendent in 1859 at Eisleben. Among his works are The Words of the Lord Jesus (Eng. trans. 1855–58), Words of a Risen Saviour (trans. 1859), Words of the Angels (1862), and Words of the Apostles (trans. 1869). See Life by sons (1868). [See.]

Stigand was made by Edward the Confessor his chaplain, in 1044 Bishop of Elmham, in 1047 Bishop of Winchester, and in 1052 also Archbishop of Canterbury. But his appointment was uncanonical, as Archbishop Robert still lived. On the death of Harold, whom he had crowned, Stigand supported Edgar Atheling. Hence William the Conqueror got him deposed in 1070. He died the same year a prisoner at Winchester.

Stilicho (c. 359–408 A.D.), a Roman general, by blood a Vandal, was sent as ambassador to Persia in 384, and rewarded with the hand of Serena, niece of the Emperor Theodosius. In 394 he departed from Constantinople for Rome in charge of the youthful Honorius, placed him on the throne of the western empire, and administered in his name the affairs of state. On the death of Theodosius (394) Stilicho's rival, Rufinus, instigated Alaric to invade Greece. Stilicho marched against Alaric, blocked him up in the Peloponnesus, but permitted him to escape with captives and booty. In 398 his daughter became the wife of Honorius. Alaric invaded Northern Italy, but was signally defeated by Stilicho at Pollentia (403) and Verona. When Radagaisus, at the head of 200,000 to 400,000 Goths, ravaged the country as far as Florence (406), Stilicho routed the invaders and saved the western empire a second time. Next Vandals, Alans, and Suevoi invaded Gaul; Stilicho's proposed alliance with Alaric against them was interpreted as treachery and he was credited with aiming at the imperial dignity. A Roman army mutinied, and Stilicho fled to Ravenna, where he was murdered, 23d August 408. Three months after Alaric was at the gates of Rome.

Stilling. See JUNG.

Stillingfleet, EDWARD, divine, born at Cranborne, 17th April 1635, studied at St John's College, Camoridge, in 1653 obtained a fellowship, and in 1657 became rector of Sutton in Bedfordshire. In 1659 appeared his Irenicum, a catholic (perhaps latitudinarian) attempt to find a basis of union for the divided church. His Origines Sacre (1662), followed by his Rational Account of the Grounds of the Protestant Religion (1664), a defence of the Church of England from the charge of schism, led to rich preferment. He became in 1665 rector of St Andrews, Holborn, chaplain to Charles II., a canon of St Paul's (1667), dean (1678), and after the Revolution bishop of Worcester. He died at Westminster, 27th March 1699. Other works were his Mischiefs of Separation (1680); Origines Britannicae, or Antiquities of the British Churches (1685); and a defence of the doctrine of the Trinity (1697). See Life by R. Bentley prefixed to works (6 vols. 1710).

Stirling, Mrs (1816-95), an actress, first known as Fanny Clifton, was born in Mayfair, London, the daughter of Capt. Hehl of the Life Guards. She was educated in France, made her debut in 1833, and played till 1886, her finest parts 'Peg Woffington' and the 'Nurse.' She married early the Drury Lane stage-manager, Edward Stirling, and in 1894 Sir Charles Hutton Gregory, C.E.

Stirling, JAMES HUTCHISON, LL.D., philosopher, was born at Glasgow, June 22, 1820, studied at the university, and practised 1843-51 as a surgeon near Aberdare, South Wales. He next went to Paris and Heidelberg, and devoted himself to philosophy. His Secret of Hegel (1865; 2d ed. 1898) opened up an unknown world to English readers, and gave a powerful impulse to the study of philosophy; in 1881 came his Complete Text-book to Kant. He delivered the first course of Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh—Philosophy and Theology (1890). Other works are an assault on Hamilton's doctrine of perception (1865); a translation of Schwegler's History of Philosophy (1867; 11th ed. 1891); Jerrold, Tennyson, and Macaulay (1868); As Regards Protoplasm (1869; complete ed. 1872); Lectures on the Philosophy of Law (1873); Burns in Drama (1878); Darwinianism: Workmen and Work (a criticism of the three Darwins, 1894). He died 19th March 1909.

Stirling, WILLIAM ALEXANDER, EARL OF, minor Scottish poet, born about 1567 at Menstrie House, Alva, studied at Glasgow and Leyden, travelled in France, Spain, and Italy, and published his Tragedie of Darius (1603), Aurora (sonnets, 1604), Cæsus (1604), The Alexandrian (1605), and Julius Cæsar (1607). He was knighted by 1609; in 1613 was attached to the household of Prince Charles; in 1614 was made Master of Requests for Scotland, and published part i. of his huge poem Doomsday (part ii. 1637). He received in 1621 the grant of 'Nova Scotia'—a vast tract in Canada and what now is United States; in 1631 he was made sole printer of King James's version of the Psalms. From 1626 till his death he was the (unpopular) Secretary of State for Scotland; and in 1627-31 he was also made Keeper of the Signet, a Commissioner of Exchequer, and a Judge of the Court of Session. The French pushed their conquests in America, and Alexander's grant of lands became valueless. In 1630 he was created Viscount and in 1633 Earl of Stirling, in 1639 also Earl of Dovan, but he died insolvent in London, 12th September 1640. His tragedies are not dramatic, but their quatrains are graceful. The songs, sonnets, elegies, and madrigals forming the Aurora are marred by conceits, yet show fancy and ingenuity. His amatory poems Stirling did not include in his collected Recreations with the Muses (1637). See the Glasgow edition of his poems (1870) and Memorials by Rogers (1877).

Stirling-Maxwell. See MAXWELL.

Stirner, MAX, the pseudonym of KASPAR SCHMIDT (1806-56), the anarchistic writer, who was born at Bayreuth, and lived and died at Berlin.

Stitny, THOMAS (c. 1325-1404), a Bohemian philosophical writer, a predecessor of Huss.

Stobæus, JOHANNES, born at Stobi in Macedonia, compiled about 500 A.D. an anthology from 500 Greek poets and prose-writers. It has preserved fragments from many lost works. The best edition is by Wachsmuth and Hense (Berl. 1884-94).

Stöcker, ADOLF (1835-1909), Berlin anti-Semite leader, born at Halberstadt, studied at Halle and Berlin, and was court-preacher 1874-90.

Stockmar, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, BARON (1787-1863), diplomatist, born of Swedish descent at Coburg, became physician and adviser to Prince Leopold (q.v.) of Coburg, the husband first of the Princess Charlotte and then king of the Belgians. He was made a baron in 1831. In 1836 he became the mentor of Prince Albert, and was the trusted friend of the young queen of England. As Coburg's representative at the Diet in 1848 he supported Prussia's claim to the headship of the German nation. See his Denkwürdigkeiten (Eng. trans. Notabilia, 1872), and Juste, Le Baron Stockmar (1873).

Stockton, FRANCIS RICHARD (1834-1902), born at Philadelphia, was engraver and journalist, and became assistant-editor of St Nicholas. He first attracted notice by his stories for children, but is best known as author of Rudder Grange (1879). Later works are The Lady, or the Tiger? (1884), The Squirrel Inn (1891), Pomona's Travels (1894), Mrs Cliff's Yacht (1896), The Great Stone of Sardinia (1897), The Girl at Cobhurst (1898), &c.

Stoddard, RICHARD HENRY (1825-1903), poet, born at Hingham, Massachusetts, attended schools in New York, and then worked some years in an iron-foundry. In 1849 he produced a volume of poems, only to suppress it; but in 1852 published a sturdier collection. In 1853-70 he served in New York custom-house, in 1870-73 was clerk to General McClellan, and for a year city librarian. His poems include Songs in Summer (1857), The King's Bell (1862), The Book of the East (1867), and Lion's Cub (1891); Under the Evening Lamp (1893) is biographical studies.

Stoddart, THOMAS TOD (1810-80), the angler-poet, lived at Kelsos from 1836. His Death-Wake, or Lunacy (1830) was reprinted in 1895, with an introduction by Andrew Lang.

Stokes, SIR GEORGE GABRIEL, LL.D., D.C.L., physicist, born at Skreen, Sligo, August 13, 1819, graduated in 1841 as senior wrangler from Pembroke College, Cambridge, and in 1849 became Lucasian professor of Mathematics. In 1851 he was made fellow, and in 1854-85 was secretary of the Royal Society, in 1885-92 president. In 1887-92 he was Conservative M.P. for Cambridge University, in 1889 was created a baronet. On Hydro-dynamics he wrote a Report for the British Association in 1846, and he made important contributions to the theory of light. He delivered in Aberdeen the Burnett Lectures, Light (1887); and in Edinburgh the Gifford Lectures, Natural Theology (1893). He died 1st February 1903. See his Mathematical and Physical Papers (1880-83).

Stokes, WILLIAM (1804-78), physician, in 1845 became regius professor of Medicine in Dublin, and wrote Theory and Practice of Medicine (1837), &c. See Life by his eldest son (1898).—That son, WHITLEY STOKES, born at Dublin in 1830, studied law at Trinity College, went to India in 1862, and was in 1879 president of the Indian law-commission and draughtsman of the present civil and criminal codes. He wrote many legal works and edited Irish and other Celtic texts. LL.D., D.C.L., C.L.E., and C.S.I., he died in April 1909.

Stolberg, CHRISTIAN, COUNT OF (1748-1821), one of the Göttingen poet band, born at Hamburg, was in the public service of Holstein 1777-1800. Besides his own poems, he translated Sophocles.—His brother, FRIEDRICH LEOPOLD, COUNT OF STOLBERG (1750-1819), a poet of the same school, was in the Danish service 1789-1800. Then turning Catholic, he published a history of Christianity. He produced poems, dramas, translations from the Greek, &c. See works by Menge (1862), Hennes (1876), Janssen (3d ed. 1882), and Keiper (1893).

Stone, MARCUS, historical genre-painter, second son of Frank Stone, A.R.A. (1800-59), was born in London, 4th July 1840, and was elected an A.R.A. in 1877, an R.A. in 1887.

Stonehenge, pseudonym of JOHN HENRY WALSH (1810-88), a native of Hackney, a surgeon at Worcester, editor from 1857 of The Field, and writer on dogs and sport.

Storace, STEPHEN (1763-96), composer of The Haunted Tower (1789) and other operas, was born in London of Italian parentage, and died there.—His sister, ANNA (1766-1817), was a vocalist.

Storm, THEODOR WOLDBSEN (1817-88), German poet and tale-writer, born at Husum in Sleswick, was a magistrate and judge there 1864-80. See Lives by Schütze (1887) and Wehl (1888).

Story, JOSEPH (1779-1845), born at Marblehead, Mass., graduated at Harvard in 1798, was admitted to the bar in 1801, elected to the state legislature in 1805, and became a leader of the Republican (Democratic) party. In 1808 he entered congress, in 1811-45 was a justice of the Supreme Court, and also from 1829 law professor at Harvard. His works include Commentaries on the Constitution of the U.S. (1833), The Conflict of Laws (1834), and Equity Jurisprudence (1835-36). See Life by his son (1851), who also edited his Miscellaneous Writings (1851).—That son, WILLIAM WETMORE STORY, D.C.L. (1819-95), born at Salem, Mass., was admitted to the bar, but went to Italy (1848) and became a sculptor. His writings include Poems (1847-56-86), Roba di Roma (1862), Castle of St Angelo (1877), He and She (1883), Fiammetta (1885), Excursions (1891), and A Poet's Portfolio (1894). See the Life by Henry James (1903).

Story, ROBERT HERBERT, D.D., born at Rosneath Manse, 28th Jan. 1835, and educated at Edinburgh, St Andrews, and Heidelberg, was minister of Rosneath 1860-87, as his father had been 1818-59. In 1886 he became Glasgow professor of Ecclesiastical History, and in 1898 principal of Glasgow University. He wrote Lives of his father, Robert Lee, and W. Carstairs, &c., and died 13th January 1907.

Stothard, THOMAS (1755-1834), designer and painter, the son of a London innkeeper, was apprenticed to a pattern-drawer. A series of designs for the Town and Country Magazine was followed by illustrations for Bell's Poets and the Novelist's Library. His earliest pictures exhibited at the Academy were 'The Holy Family' and 'Ajax defending the Body of Patroclus.' In 1791 he was chosen A.R.A., in 1794 R.A., and in 1813 Academy librarian. Some 3000 of his designs were engraved, including those to Boydell's Shakespeare, The Pilgrim's Progress, Robinson Crusoe, and Rogers's Poems. His 'Canterbury Pilgrims' and 'Flich of Bacon' are well known by engravings. See Life (1851) by Mrs Bray (q.v.), widow of his son, CHARLES ALFRED STOTHARD (1786-1821), antiquarian draughtsman; and another by A. C. Coxhead (1907).

Stoughton, JOHN, D.D., born in Norwich, 18th Nov. 1807, was Congregationalist minister at Windsor 1832-43 and Kensington 1843-75, and in 1872-84 professor in New College, St John's Wood. He edited The Evangelical Magazine, and wrote Church and State Two Hundred Years Ago (1862); Ecclesiastical History of England (9 vols. 1867-94); Homes and Haunts of Luther (1875); Italian Reformers (1881); Spanish Reformers (1883); studies of Wilberforce, Penn, and John Howard; and Recollections of a Long Life (1894). He died 24th Oct. 1897. See Life by daughter (1899).

Stow, JOHN (1525-1605), was a tailor in Cornhill, but about his fortieth year devoted himself to antiquarian pursuits. His principal works are his Summary of English Chronicles (1561): Annals, or a General Chronicle of England (1580); and, most important of all, the Survey of London and Westminster (1598), an account of their history, antiquities, and government for six centuries. Stow also assisted in the continuation of Holinshed's Chronicle, Speght's Chaucer, &c. See memoir by Thoms prefixed to the Survey (1842).

Stowe, HARRIET BEECHER. See BEECHER.

Stowell, WILLIAM SCOTT, LORD (1745-1836), eldest brother of Lord Eldon, born at Heworth, Durham, went up to Corpus, Oxford, in 1761, was a college tutor 1765-77, and in 1780 was called to the bar. In 1788 he was made a judge and privy-councillor, and knighted. Both as an ecclesiastical and admiralty judge he won high distinction, and he was the highest English authority on the law of nations. He sat for Oxford 1801-21, when he was made Baron Stowell; in 1828 he retired. He died at Earley Court, Reading. See Surtees's Lives of Lords Stowell and Eldon (1846).

Strabo, born at Amasia in Pontus, probably in 64 B.C., was of Greek descent on the mother's side. Strabo means 'squint-eyed'; whether the name was inherited is not known. He seems to have spent his life in travel and study, was at Corinth in 29 B.C., ascended the Nile in 24, seems to have been settled at Rome after 14 A.D., and died sometime after 21 A.D. Of Strabo's great historical work in forty-seven books—from the fifth a continuation to his own time of Polybius—we have only a few fragments; but his Geographica in seventeen books has come down to us almost complete. It is a work of great value in those parts especially which record the results of his own extensive observation. He makes copious use of his predecessors, Eratosthenes, Polybius, Aristotle, Thucydides, and many writers now lost to us, but he depreciates Herodotus and quotes few Roman writers. The style is pure. The editio princeps appeared at Venice in 1516. Good editions are by Müller and Dübner (1853-56) and Meineke (1852-53)

See Marcel Dubois' Examen de Strabo (1891) and Tozer's Selections from Strabo (1893).

Stradella, ALESSANDRO (c. 1645–81), composer, is generally said to have been born in Naples, but some say Venice. He produced airs, duets, cantatas, madrigals, sonatas, operas, and oratorios, including San Giovanni Battista, which contributed to form the taste of Purcell and Scarlatti. In 1677 he eloped from Venice to Turin with the mistress of one of the Contarini, who sent assassins to murder him. He was wounded, but recovered, and in 1682 was slain in Genoa by the brothers of a lady whom he had seduced. The story of the assassins who relented on hearing his music is a late fabrication. He did not compose 'Pieta, Signore.'

Stradivari, of STRADIVARIUS, ANTONIO (1649–1737), the famed Cremona violin-maker, was a pupil of Nicolo Amati. The record price for a 'Strad' (the 'Messiah') was £2000 in 1890. See French work by Fétis (1856).

Strafford, THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF, English statesman, was born in London, 13th April 1598. The eldest of the twelve children of Sir William Wentworth, he came of a great Yorkshire family, allied to royalty itself. He studied at St John's College, Cambridge; in 1611 was knighted and married; and having travelled in France and Italy, in 1614 became member for Yorkshire, and succeeded his father in the baronetcy and an estate of £6000 a-year. In 1615 he was appointed custos rotulorum for the West Riding, a post from which Buckingham sought two years later to oust him. During James I.'s reign he was a generally silent member in three brief parliaments, a strenuous student, and a frequent attendant at the Court of Star-chamber. His first wife, a daughter of the Earl of Cumberland, died in 1622, and in 1625 he married a daughter of Lord Clare. Conscious of his own splendid abilities, with no great belief in parliamentary wisdom, loyal in his devotion to crown and church, an eager advocate of domestic reforms, Wentworth in Charles's first parliament (1625) acted with the Opposition; from the second he was excluded by his appointment to be sheriff of Yorkshire. In July of that year (1626) he was curtly dismissed from the keepership of the rolls, and for refusing to pay the forced loan was imprisoned. So in the third parliament (1628) he headed the onslaught on the king's evil ministers. From its meeting in March until May he was the leader of the Lower House; on 7th July the Petition of Right, superseding a similar measure of his own, became law; and on the 22d he was created Baron Wentworth, in December Viscount Wentworth and President of the North. As such at York he set himself to strengthen government with an efficient militia and ample revenue, and to 'comply with that public and common protection which good kings afford their good people.' Towards these ends he used on occasion high-handed methods, which embroiled him, however, chiefly with the gentry. His second wife died in 1631, leaving a son, William, second Earl of Strafford (1626–95, died s.p.), and two daughters; and within a year he married privately the daughter of Sir George Rhodes. In January 1632 he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, but it was not till July 1633 that he landed at Dublin. He straightway proceeded to coerce Ireland into a state of obedience and well-being unknown alike before and afterwards. He raised the revenue from an annual deficit of £14,000 to a surplus of £80,000, and the customs from £12,000 to £40,000; transformed the army from a rabble of 1300 to an orderly force of 8000; swept the seas of corsairs; introduced the cultivation of flax; called into existence a docile parliament; did his utmost to cleanse the Augean stable of the Protestant Church; and, whilst seeking 'to draw Ireland into conformity of religion with England,' could boast that 'no hair of any man's head was touched for the free exercise of his conscience.' The aim of his policy (he and Laud called it 'Thorough') was to make his master 'the most absolute prince in Christendom'; and, says Prof. Gardiner, 'the choice for Ireland in the 17th century did not lie between absolutism and parliamentary control, but between absolutism and anarchy.' Wentworth taken at his worst should be Macaulay's Wentworth: by Macaulay's verdict has Wentworth been widely condemned. One turns from it to Wentworth's own correspondence, and there stand revealed his fatherly tenderness, his love of harmless amusements, his hatred of gaming and drunkenness, his contempt of courtiers, and the maladies which constantly beset him—fever, ague, gout, and the stone. But too masterful he was and self-reliant, too heedless of the means towards his end, intolerant of opposition to his will. Not till 1639 did Wentworth become the king's principal adviser, when he was made Earl of Strafford and Lord-lieutenant of Ireland (January 1640). It was too late. The rebellion, provoked in Scotland by Charles's unwisdom, was spreading to England; and Pym and his fellows judged rightly that Strafford was the one obstacle to their triumph. A week after the meeting of the Long Parliament in November he was impeached and lodged in the Tower. In the great trial by his peers, which opened in Westminster Hall on 22d March 1641, he defended himself with a fortitude, patience, and ability that moved even his accusers, whilst alarming them. The twenty-eight charges amounted at most to 'cumulative treason'; the gravest of them, his having counselled the king that 'he had an army in Ireland which he could employ to reduce this kingdom' (query England or Scotland), was supported by but one witness, his personal enemy, Vane. To the Lords the question was his guilt or innocence, to the Commons his condemnation. On 10th April the 'inflexibles' dropped the impeachment for a bill of attainder. It passed a third reading in both Houses; on 10th May it received the royal assent; and Strafford was executed on Tower Hill, 12th May 1641: he is buried at Wentworth-Woodhouse. See Knowler's edition of his Letters and Correspondence (1739), with the short Life by Sir George Radcliffe (q.v.); and the modern Lives by John Forster (1836; absurdly republished in 1892 as by Robert Browning, q.v.), J. B. Mozley (Essays, 1884), Elizabeth Cooper (1874), and H. D. Traill (1889).

Strange, SIR ROBERT, engraver, born at Kirkwall, 14th July 1721, had tried sailing and a law-clerkship in Edinburgh, when in 1735 he was apprenticed to an engraver there. Falling in love with a young Jacobite lady, Isabella Lumisden, he in 1745 espoused the cause of Prince Charles Edward, engraving not only his portrait but his bank-notes, and enlisting in the prince's life-guards. He fought at Culloden, narrowly escaped, married in 1747, and, after studying in Paris, settled in London (1750). On a second visit to the Continent (1760–65) he was made a member of the Academies of Paris, Rome, Florence, Bologna, and Parma; and George III. knighted him in 1787. He died 6th July 1792.

See the Life by Dennistoun (1855), and that by Woodward prefixed to Twenty Masterpieces of Strangford (1874). [Originally Strang.]

Strangford, PERCY-CLINTON-SYDNEY SMYTHE, VISCOUNT (1780-1855), succeeded as sixth viscount in 1801, was secretary of legation at Lisbon, and ambassador to Portugal, Sweden, Turkey, and Russia. He was made Baron Penuhurst in 1825. His translation of the Rimas of Camoens he published in 1803.—His eldest son, GEORGE SYDNEY (1818-57), seventh viscount, was one of the 'Young England' party, M.P. for Canterbury 1841-52, and author of Historic Fancies (1844).—His brother, PERCY-WILLIAM SMYTHE (1825-69), educated at Harrow and Merton College, Oxford, entered the diplomatic service, early acquired an unexampled command of languages, and was Oriental secretary during the Crimean war. In 1857 he succeeded as eighth and last viscount, thereafter lived mostly in London, immersed in philological studies, but wrote little more than a few Saturday, Pall Mall, and Quarterly articles. His Selected Writings (1869) and his Letters and Papers (1878) were published by his widow. See Foulblanque's Lives of the Lords Strangford (1878).

Straparola, GIOVAN FRANCESCO, born at Caravaggio, published in 1550-54 Piacevoli notti, a collection of seventy-four stories in the style of the Dcameron. See Eng. trans. by W. G. Waters (1894).

Stratford de Redcliffe, STRATFORD CANNING, VISCOUNT, born in London, 4th November 1786, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. In 1807 he became précis-writer to his cousin, George Canning, at the Foreign Office; in 1808 first secretary to the Constantinople embassy; and in 1810 minister-plenipotentiary. His duty was to counteract French influence at the Porte, and he negotiated the treaty of Bucharest (1812) between Russia and Turkey. He was minister in Switzerland 1814-17, commissioner at the Vienna Congress of 1815, minister to the United States 1819-23. In 1824 he was sent on a mission to Vienna and St Petersburg, and in 1825 went to Constantinople as ambassador, where he mediated on behalf of Greek independence. He resigned in 1828, and was made G.C.B.; in 1831 he was again sent to Constantinople to delimit Greece. When in 1833, after a mission to Portugal, he was gazetted ambassador to St Petersburg the czar declined to receive him. During the intervals in his diplomatic career he sat in parliament as a moderate Tory, but made no mark as orator or debater. As ambassador at Constantinople 1842-58 he built up that extraordinary influence which gained him the name of the 'Great Elchi.' He induced the sultan to inaugurate a series of reforms, especially in the condition of his Christian subjects, culminating in the liberal edict of 1856. His diplomatic skill in the negotiations with Prince Menschikoff (1853) and his exertions to preserve peace were rendered futile by the obstinacy of Nicholas and the weakness of Lord Aberdeen's government; the Crimean war ensued. Created a viscount in 1852, he returned home in 1853, and in 1869 was made K.G. He wrote an ode, Buonaparte (1813), Why I am a Christian (1873), and essays on the Eastern Question (ed. by Dean Stanley, 1881). He died in London, 14th August 1880. See the Life by Stanley Lane Poole (2 vols. 1888).

Strathnairn, HUGH ROSE, LORD (1801-85), son of the diplomatist Sir George Rose, was born and brought up at Berlin, entered the army in 1820, was military attaché to the Turkish army in 1840, was consul-general for Syria 1841-48, as secretary to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was chargé d'affaires at Constantinople in 1852-54, and was commissioner at the French headquarters during the Crimean war. Now K.C.B., he was sent to India in 1857 to command the Central Indian army, and virtually reconquered Central India; though his campaign was overshadowed by that of Sir Colin Campbell, it is generally admitted that his operations were more skillful and brilliant than his chief's, on whose death he became commander-in-chief in India. He held the same post in Ireland 1865-70, was raised to the peerage in 1866, and was made field-marshal in 1877. He died in Paris. See Sir O. T. Burne's Clyde and Strathnairn (1891).

Stratton, CHARLES SHERWOOD (1838-83), 'General Tom Thumb,' born at Bridgeport, Conn., a dwarf 31 inches high, whom Barnum exhibited in England in 1844.

Strauss, DAVID FRIEDRICH, born 27th Jan. 1808 at Ludwigsburg in Württemberg, studied for the church at Tübingen, where in 1832 he became repetent in the theological seminary, lecturing also on philosophy in the university as a disciple of Hegel. His Leben Jesu (1835; 4th ed. 1840; trans. by George Eliot, 1846) at once made him a man of mark. In it he sought to prove the gospel history to be a collection of myths, and by an analytical dissection of each separate narrative to detect a nucleus of historical truth free from every trace of supernaturalism. The book made a real epoch in theological literature, and produced a violent excitement in and out of Germany. Strauss, dismissed from his post at Tübingen, settled in 1836 at Stuttgart, where in 1837 he issued his Streitschriften against his opponents, and in 1838 Zwei friedliche Blätter. In 1839 he was called to be professor of Dogmatics and Church History at Zürich; but the appointment raised such a storm of opposition that it had to be dropped. Strauss, who had meanwhile published his Charakteristiken und Kritiken, now issued his second great work, Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, a review of Christian dogma (1840-41). In Der Romantiker auf dem Throne der Cäsaren (1847) he suggested a parallel between the orthodox William IV. of Prussia and Julian the Apostate, as having both attempted to restore dead faiths. His speeches, in candidating for the German revolutionary parliament of 1848, were published as Six Theologico-political Addresses. Besides two or three minor biographies, he published a Life of Ulrich von Hutten (1858-60; trans. 1874), followed up by Hutten's Dialogues (1860), a work on Reinmarus (1862), and six lectures on Voltaire (1870). A new Life of Jesus, composed for the German People, appeared in 1864 (trans. 1865), in which an attempt was made to reconstruct a positive life of Christ. Der Christus des Glaubens (1865) is a criticism of Schleiermacher, and Die Halben und die Ganzen a polemic against Schenkel and Hengstenberg. In Der alte und der neue Glaube (1872) Strauss endeavours to prove that Christianity as a system of religious belief is dead, and that a new faith must be built up out of art and the scientific knowledge of nature. He died at Ludwigsburg, 8th Feb. 1874. In 1841 he had married the opera-singer Agnese Schesteb (1813-70), but they separated. His collected works fill 12 vols. (1876-78). See Life by Zeller (1874; trans. 1874), and other works by Hausarth (1876-78) and Schlottmann (1878). [Strauss.]

Strauss, JOHANN (1825-99), composer, best known for his waltz-music, was born in Vienna, the son of Johann Strauss (1804-49), who also composed dance-music. 'Die schöne Blaua Donau' was typical of his work.

Strauss, RICHARD, born at Munich, 11th June 1864, son of a horn-player, attended the gymnasium and university, studied music with F. W. Meyer, and was influenced by Bülow. He became Kapellmeister at Meiningen, Munich, Weimar, and Berlin. His works include the operas Feuersnot (1901), Salome, Elektra, and Der Rosenkavalier (1910); the symphonic works Aus Italien, Macbeth (1887), Don Juan, Tod und Verklärung, Till Eulenspiegel, Also Sprach Zarathustra, Heldenleben, and the Sinfonia Domestica (1904); and many songs. From about 1887 Strauss showed overpowering originality. His realism, undamned by what to ordinary hearers seemed sheer ugliness, his apparent defiant formlessness combined with undoubted mastery of form, led to no little controversy over the legitimacy of the symphonic form, and generally of those modern tendencies of which his breadth of outlook and of grasp made him chief representative. See a book by Steinitzer (Berlin, 1911).

Street, GEORGE EDMUND (1824-81), R.A., P.R.I.B.A., born at Woodford, studied with Sir Gilbert Scott. He restored Christ Church in Dublin, designed the London Law Courts, and wrote two masterly studies, Architecture of North Italy in the Middle Ages (1855) and Gothic Architecture in Spain (1865). See Memoir by his son (1888).

Stretton, HESBA, the pen-name of Sarah Smith (d. 1911), who, born at Church Stretton, Shropshire, contributed to Household Words and All the Year Round. Jessica's First Prayer (1867) was followed by a long series of semi-religious stories.

Strickland, AGNES (1796-1874), born at Reydon Hall near Southwold, Suffolk, had issued several volumes of poetry ere, with her sister Elizabeth (1794-1875), she set about writing Lives of the Queens of England (1840-48; new ed. 1864-65; abridged ed. 1867). Other works of like nature followed. See Life by her sister Jane (1887).

Strickland, HUGH EDWIN (1811-53), geologist and naturalist, born at Reighton, E. Yorkshire.

Strindberg, AUGUST (1849-1912), born at Stockholm, studied medicine and philosophy, was teacher, actor, librarian, journalist, but after 1882 lived solely for literature, mainly abroad. His first novels (The Red Room, 1879; The New Kingdom, 1882, &c.) were attacks on Swedish conventional society, with pleas for socialist Utopias, and caused prodigious excitement. His later dramas (1887-93) are as caustic as his novels. The Confessions of a Fool (1893) and Anti-barbarus (1894) provoked bitter comment.

Strongbow, RICHARD, or Richard de Clafe, second Earl of Pembroke, in 1170 crossed to Ireland to push his fortune by permission of Henry II. He married the daughter of Dermot, king of Leinster, and died in 1176.

Struensee, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, COUNT (1737-72), son of a Halle pastor, in 1768 became physician to Christian VII. of Denmark. He soon gained the confidence of the weak young king and of his consort, Caroline Matilda (1751-75), George III.'s sister, and, with her monopolising all power, sought to free Denmark from Russian influence and to find an ally in Sweden. His reforms and retrenchments were unpopular; but it was solely by a court intrigue that in Jan. 1772 the queen was arrested, and her new-made count. From both a confession of criminal intimacy was extorted; and Struensee, found guilty of treason, was beheaded. Queen Caroline's marriage was dissolved; she was conveyed by a British frigate to Hanover, and died at Zell (Celle). See Memoirs (1849) of Sir R. M. Keith, British envoy; Wraxall's Life of Queen Caroline (1864); and Wilkins, A Queen of Tears (1903). [Stroo'-en-zay.]

Struthers, JOHN (1776-1853), author of The Poor Man's Sabbath (1804) and other poems, was born at East Kilbride, and bred a shoemaker, but in 1832 became Stirling's librarian at Glasgow.

Strutt, JOHN WILLIAM. See RAYLEIGH.

Strutt, JOSEPH (1742-1802), born at Springfield in Essex, at fourteen was apprenticed to an engraver, studied at the Royal Academy, and from 1771 devoted himself to research at the British Museum. He published Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England (1773); a work on the Anglo-Saxons (1774-76); Chronicle of England, down to the Conquest (1777-78); Dictionary of Engravers (1785-86); Dresses of the People of England (1796-99); and, his best-known work, Sports and Pastimes of the People of England (1801; enlarged 1903). See Life by Miller-Christy (1898).

Struve, WILHELM VON (1793-1864), German astronomer, born at Altona, became director of the Dorpat Observatory in 1817, and in 1839 of that at Pulkova near St Petersburg. He wrote three important works (1827, 1837, 1852) on double stars, and carried out many geodetic operations, such as the measurement of an arc of the meridian (1857-60).—His son, OTTO WILHELM (1819-1905), born at Dorpat, became his assistant and successor, and retired in 1890 to Carlsruhe. He discovered 500 double stars and (1847) a satellite of Uranus. [Stroo'-vel.]

Strype, JOHN (1643-1737), ecclesiastical historian, born in London, was educated at St Paul's School and Cambridge, and became incumbent of Low Leyton, Essex. His prolix and ill-arranged, but honest and invaluable, works (27 vols., Clar. Press ed., 1821-43) include Memorials of Cramer (1694); Life of Sir Thomas Smith (1698); Lives of Bishop Aylmer (1701), Sir John Cheke (1705), Archbishop Grindal (1710), Archbishop Parker (1711), and Archbishop Whitgift (1718); Annals of the Reformation (1709-31); Ecclesiastical Memorials, 1513-58 (1721)—his best work. He also edited Stow's Survey of London (1720).

Stuart, GILBERT and ALBANIE.

Stuart, SIR GEORGE CHARLES (1755-1828), painter, born at Narragansett, Rhode Island, in 1772 went to Edinburgh with a Scotch painter, Cosmo Alexander; but, his master soon dying, worked his passage home, and began to paint portraits at Newport. In 1775 he made his way to London, where he endured much hardship, till in 1778 his talent was recognised by West, and he became a fashionable portrait-painter. In 1792 he returned to America, and painted portraits of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and John Adams. He died at Boston. See Life by G. C. Mason (1879).

Stuart, JAMES (1713-88), 'Athenian Stuart,' author of The Antiquities of Athens (4 vols. fol. 1762-1816), was born in London.

Stuart, JOHN McDOWALL (1815-66), born at Dysart, in 1860 traversed Australia from S. to N.

Stuart, JOHN, LL.D. (1813-77), antiquary, born at Fargue, Aberdeenshire, in 1853 entered the Register House, Edinburgh, and in 1873 became principal keeper. He published The Sculptured Stones of Scotland (1856-67) and Book of Deer (1869), and contributed largely to the Proceedings of the Scottish Society of Antiquaries, of which he was secretary.

Stuart, LADY LOUISA (1757-1851), Sir Walter

Scott's witty correspondent, the third Earl of Bute's youngest daughter, died in London.

Stuart, MOSES (1780-1852), born at Wilton, Conn., studied at Yale, became Congregational pastor at New Haven in 1806, and was professor of Sacred Literature at Andover 1810-48. He published Hebrew grammars, commentaries, Hebrew Chrestomathy (1829-30), Future Punishment (1830), Conscience and the Constitution (1850), &c.

Stubbes, JOHN (c. 1541-1600), educated at Cambridge and Lincoln's Inn, wrote an answer to Cardinal Allen, and The Discoverie of a Gaping Gulf (1579), against the marriage of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou, for which he and Page, his printer, had their right hands struck off.—PHILIP STUBBES, his kinsman, was author of the Anatomie of Abuses (1583), a vehement denunciation of the luxury of the times. The work was reprinted by Turnbull in 1836, and by Furnivall for the New Shakespeare Society (1879-82).

Stubbs, WILLIAM, born at Knaresborough, 21st June 1825, studied at Ripon and Christ Church, Oxford, graduating with a classical first in 1848. He became a fellow of Trinity, vicar of Nave-stock, Essex (1850), diocesan inspector of schools (1860), Oxford regius professor of Modern History (1866), rector of Cholderton, Wilts (1875), a canon of St Paul's (1879), and Bishop of Chester (1884), of Oxford (1889). Of his learned and sagacious works the chief are Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum, on the Episcopal succession in England (1858); Mosheim's Institutes, revised (1868); Select Charters, from the earliest period to the reign of Edward I. (1870); the invaluable Constitutional History of England, down to 1485 (1874-78; 5th ed. 1896); The Early Plantagenets (1876); and several volumes of lectures on European and on English history (1886-1908). Besides these he had edited, in the Records publications, Benedict of Peterborough (1867), Roger de Hoveden (1868-71), Walter of Coventry (1872-73), Memorials of Saint Dunstan (1874), Gervase of Canterbury (1879-80), Chronicles of the Reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. (1882-83), William of Malmesbury (1887-89), &c. With Haddan, he began a collection of British Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents (1869-78). He died 22d April 1901; see his Addresses (1902).

Stukeley, WILLIAM (1687-1765), the 'Arch-druid,' born at Holbeach, studied at Corpus, Cambridge, and practised as a doctor at Boston, London, and Grantham. In 1729 he took orders, and in 1747 became a London rector. His twenty works (1720-26) dealing with Stonehenge, Avebury, and antiquities generally, enshrine much that is curious as well as credulous. See his Diary and Correspondence (Surtees Soc. 1884-87).

Sture, a Swedish family which during 1470-1520, when Sweden was nominally united with Denmark, gave it three wise and patriotic regents—Sten Sture the Elder (d. 1503); his nephew, Svante Nilsson Sture (d. 1512); and his son, Sten Sture the Younger (d. 1520). [Stoo'v'eh.]

Sturge, JOSEPH (1794-1859), Quaker, Liberal, Birmingham corn-merchant, born at Elberton, Gloucestershire. See Life by Miss Peckover (1890).

Sturgeon, WILLIAM (1783-1850), shoemaker's apprentice, private soldier, investigator of electro-magnetism, and professor at Addiscombe, was born at Whittington, North Lancashire.

Sturlason. See SNORRI.

Sturm, JACQUES CHARLES FRANÇOIS (1803-55), algebraist, was born at Geneva, and died, an Academician, in Paris.

Sturm, JOHANNES (1507-89), educational reformer, born at Schleiden near Aix-la-Chapelle, from the Liège school of the Brethren of the Common Life passed to Louvain University, and at Paris in 1530 lectured on Cicero. He favoured the Reformation, and in 1536 was invited by Strasburg to reorganise the education of the town. Both in religion and politics Sturm took a prominent part, siding with Zwingli against Luther; and he was sent on missions to France, England, and Denmark. Inspired by him, Strasburg became a great educational centre. In 1538 a gymnasium was established, with Sturm as its rector, and in 1564 an academy, the two together supplying a complete course of instruction. In 1581 he was driven from Strasburg by Lutheran intolerance, but ultimately permitted to return. See French monograph by Charles Schmidt (Strasburg, 1855), and German works by Laas (1872), Kückelhan (1872), Heil (1888), and Schnud (1889). [Stoorm.]

Sturt, CHARLES (1795-1869), Australian explorer, went as captain in the 39th to Australia, and during 1828-45 headed three important expeditions, from the last of which he returned blinded by hardship and exposure. He received in 1851 a pension from the first South Australian parliament, wrote two narratives of his explorations (1833-48), and died at Cheltenham, England.

Stuyvesant, PETER (1592-1672), governor of New York, was born in Holland, became governor of Curaçoa, lost a leg in the attack on St Martin, and in 1646 was appointed captain-general of the New Netherlands. He proved a vigorous but arbitrary ruler, a rigid Sabbatarian, and an opponent of political and religious freedom. Yet he did much for the commercial prosperity of New Amsterdam, which he would fain have held against the English in 1664, when it became New York. See Life by Bayard Tuckerman (N.Y. 1893).

Stylites, SIMEON (387-459 A.D.), earliest of the Pillar-saints (Gr. stylites), lived nine years in his Syrian monastery without leaving his cell, then at Telanessa near Antioch established himself on the top of a pillar 72 feet high. Here he spent thirty years, preaching daily to the crowds who gathered at its foot. [Sti-l'iteez.]

Suarez, FRANCISCO (1548-1617), Jewish philosopher, born at Granada, taught theology at Segovia, Valladolid, Rome, Alcalá, Salamanca, and Coimbra. A Molinist in his views of grace, he foreshadowed in his Tractatus de Legibus the modern doctrine of international law, and wrote a treatise condemning the extravagant divine-right theories of James I. of England. See Lives by Deschamps (1671) and Werner (1861).

Suchet, LOUIS-GABRIEL (1770-1826), marshal of France, born at Lyons, fought in Italy, and rose by 1798 to be general of brigade. He added to his reputation in Egypt and again in Italy, served as general of division under Joubert in 1799, and in 1800 was second in command to Masséna. He checked an Austrian invasion of the south of France (1800), took part in the campaigns against Austria (1805) and Prussia (1806), and as generalissimo of the French army in Aragon reduced the province to submission, securing a marshal's baton. In 1812 he destroyed Blake's army at Sagunto, and by his capture of Valencia earned the title of Duke of Albufera. He was created a peer of France by Louis XVIII., but joined Napoleon on his return from Elba. Deprived of his peerage after Waterloo, he did not return to court till 1819. See his Mémoires sur les Campagnes en Espagne (1829-34) and Life by Barault-Rouillon (1854). [See-shay.]

Suckling, SIR JOHN (1609-42), poet, was born at Whitton in Middlesex, the son of a secretary of state to James I. In 1623 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1628 went on his travels, and served for some time under Gustavus Adolphus. He returned about 1632, became famous at court for his wit and prodigality, and in 1639 raised a troop of 100 horse to aid the king against the Scots. Suckling was returned to the Long Parliament, joined in the abortive plot to rescue Stafford from the Tower, and in more desperate plots still against the liberties of the kingdom, but his schemes being discovered fled to the Continent. Impoverished and disgraced, he almost certainly poisoned himself at Paris. The works of Suckling consist of four plays, Aglaura, The Goblins, Brennoralt, and The Sad One, now forgotten; a prose treatise, An Account of Religion by Reason; a few Letters; and a series of miscellaneous poems, beginning with A Sessions of the Poets (1637), which is happily descriptive of the author's contemporaries. But the fame of Suckling rests on his ballads and songs such as the 'Ballad upon a Wedding' and 'Why so pale and wan, fond lover?' See the Rev. A. Suckling's Selections, with a Life (1836), reproduced by W. C. Hazlitt (1874; new ed. 1893); and the works as edited by A. H. Thompson (1910).

Sudbury, SIMON OF, Bishop of London, Archbishop of Canterbury 1375-81, and chancellor, was beheaded by Wat Tyler's rioters.

Sudermann, HERMANN, poet and novelist, born at Matzicken, East Prussia, 30th Sept. 1857, studied at Königsberg and Berlin, and in 1895 returned to Berlin from Dresden. The realistic drama Ehre (1888) made him famous; and his novels, Im Zwielicht (1885), Frau Sorge (1886); Eng. trans. Dame Care (1892), Geschwister (1887), Der Katzensteg (1889); trans. as Regina (1898), Iolanthes Hochzeit (1892), Es war (1894), Der Wunsch (trans. 1894, with memoir), &c., have been widely read. The censor forbade the representation of the tragedy Sodom's Ende (1890); it was followed by Heimat, Stein unter Steinen, Das Hohe Lied, Strandkinder (1909).

Sue, MARIE-JOSEPH-EUGÈNE, a master of melodramatic fiction, born at Paris, 10th Dec. 1804, served as an army and naval surgeon in Spain (1823) and at Navarino (1828), and worked up his experiences into the Byronic and absurd novels Kernock le Pirate, La Salamandre, &c., as well as the unhistorical Histoire de la Marine Française (1835-37) and Histoire de la Marine Militaire (1841). His first hit was the too famous Mystères de Paris (1842); its successor, Le Juif Errant (1845), was no less successful. Later works were Martin, l'Enfant Trouvé (1846), Les Sept Péchés Capitaux (1847-49), and Les Mystères du Peuple (1849), the last condemned by the courts as immoral and seditious. A republican deputy, he was driven into exile in 1851, and died in Savoy in 1859.

Suess, EDUARD, the greatest geologist of his time, was born at London in 1831, and was professor of Geology at Vienna in 1857-1901. Of his many works, Das Antlitz der Erde (1885-1909); translated by Sollas in 1904-10 as The Face of the Earth) was the most important. He was a Radical politician.

Suetonius, CAIUS SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS (75-160 A.D.), became Hadrian's secretary, a post he held till about fifty, when, compromised in a court intrigue, he forfeited it. His best-known work is The Lives of the First Twelve Cæsars, remarkable for terseness, elegance, and impartiality. Other works were De Illustribus Grammaticis (of which a complete copy existed in the 15th century), De Claris Rhetoribus, and fragmentary lives of Terence, Horace, Persius, Lucan, Juvenal, and Pliny. After the editio princeps (Rome, 1470), the best is that of Roth (1857; new ed. 1875). For Suetonius Paulinus, see BOADICEA.

Suffren. PIERRE ANDRÉ DE SUFFREN SAINT-TROPÈS (1729-88), a younger son of a Provençal noble, entered the French navy, fought in the action with the English off Toulon (1744) and in the vain attempt to retake Cape Breton (1746), was captured by Hawke next year, and served six years in Malta amongst the Knights Hospitallers. He was again captured in Boscawen's destruction of the Toulon fleet (1759), took part in the bombardment of Salée (1765), was again four years in Malta, and returned to France as captain in 1772. In 1777 he sailed to America, and fought at Grenada in 1779. After an action at the Cape Verd Islands, he fought a series of engagements with the English off Madras and Ceylon, and captured Trincomalee. Returning to Paris in 1784, he was received with great honours. See Laughton's Naval Studies (1887). [See-franz.]

Suhm, PETER FREDERIK (1728-98), Danish historian, was born and died at Copenhagen.

Suidas, the reputed author of a Greek Lexicon, about whom nothing is known, although he is placed about 975 A.D. The Lexicon is a sort of cyclopædia, giving an explanation of words, and notices of persons, places, &c. in alphabetical order, without literary or critical merit. There are editions by Küster (1705), Gaisford (1834), Bernhardt (1834), and I. Bekker (1854). [Sue-das.]

Suleiman Pasha (1838-92), Turkish general, entered the army in 1854, fought in Montenegro, Crete, and Yemen, and in peace taught in the Military Academy at Constantinople, of which he became director. He distinguished himself against the Servians in 1876. When the Russians declared war (1877) Suleiman checked them at Eski Zagra, but destroyed his army in heroic attempts to force them from the Shipka Pass. In October he became commander-in-chief of the army of the Danube, but suffered defeat near Philippopolis (Jan. 1878). Court-martialled, he was condemned to fifteen years' imprisonment, but the sultan pardoned him. [Soo-iv-man.]

Sullivan, SIR BARTHOLOMEW JAMES (1810-90), an admiral, famous as a pilot and surveyor, was created a K.C.B. in 1869. See Life by his son (1896).

Sulla (inaccurately SYLLA), LUCIUS CORNELIUS, by himself surnamed FELLIX, a scion of the illustrious house of the Cornelii, was born in 138 B.C., and carefully educated. As quaestor in 107 under Marius in Africa he induced the Mauritanian king to surrender Jugurtha (106). The war of the Cimbr and Teutones (104-101) saw Sulla again serving under the jealous Marius. In 93 he was prætor and in 92 prætor in Cilicia, where he restored Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia, from which Mithridates had expelled him. The private hatred of Marius and Sulla became political, as Sulla took the aristocratic side more strongly; but the breaking out of the Social War hushed all private quarrels for the time. Marius was aggrieved when the senate bestowed on Sulla, after his consulship in 88, supreme command in the Mithridatic war; and Marius rushed into treason and civil strife. Then followed the expulsion of Sulla from Rome, his triumphant return, the overthrow of the Marian party, and the first proscription. By the beginning of 87 Sulla was able to embark for the East. During his four years there he won the victories of Cheronæa (86) and Orchomenus (84). Next he crossed the Hellespont, crushed the army sent out by the Marian party (which, in his absence, had again got the upper hand in Italy), forced Mithridates to sue for peace, then landed in Italy in 83. The victory over the Samnites and Lucanians at the Colline Gate brought the struggle to a close (82), and Sulla was now master of Italy. Then followed his dictatorship, and the proscriptions (81)—a virtual reign of terror. During the next two years several important constitutional changes were carried, mostly reactionary, tending to increase the authority of the senate; but these, with a few exceptions, were doomed to fall within ten years. In 79 Sulla retired to his estate at Puteoli, where he indulged in every sensual excess. He died in 78.

Sullivan, Sir Arthur Seymour, born in London, 13th May 1842, studied music under Sterndale Bennett and Goss, and at Leipzig, and had his music to The Tempest performed at the Crystal Palace in 1862. He produced the cantata Kenilworth in 1864, the overtures In Memoriam (1866), Marmion (1867), and Di Ballo (1869), the oratorios The Prodigal Son (1868) and The Light of the World (1873), a Festival Te Deum for the Prince of Wales's recovery in 1872, and at Leeds in 1880 and 1886 The Martyr of Antioch and The Golden Legend. He is better known, however, by his hymn-tunes, his songs, and his tuneful and popular operas and operettas. The latter began with Cox and Box in 1866, and included, besides Haddon Hall (1892) and The Chieftain (1894), the long list given already in the article on W. S. Gilbert. His fertility and technical resource were also shown in the grand opera of Ivanhoe (1891). He was made Mus. Doc. of Cambridge in 1876 and of Oxford in 1879, made a member of the Legion of Honour in 1878, and in 1883 was knighted. He died 22d November 1900, and was buried in St Paul's. There are Lives by Laurence (1900) and Findon (1904).

Sullivan, Barry (1824-91), tragedian, born at Birmingham, first appeared at Cork in 1840, and in London as Hamlet in 1852. He visited America 1857-60, and Australia 1861-66. He was for a while lessee of the Holborn Theatre. See Barry Sullivan and his Contemporaries, by Sillard (1901).

Sully, James, LL.D., born at Bridgewater, 3d March 1842, son of a coalmaster, studied at Taunton, London, Göttingen, and Berlin, and in 1892-1903 was professor of Philosophy at University College, London. He has written a series of works on psychology (1874-86), one on pessimism (1877), and Studies of Childhood (1895).

Sully, Maximilien de Bethune, Duc de, Henry IV.'s great minister, the second son of the Huguenot Baron de Rosny, was born at the château of Rosny near Mantes, 13th December 1560. He accompanied Henry of Navarre in his flight from the French court (1576), took an active part in the war, and helped materially to decide the victory of Coutras (1587). At Ivry he captured the standard of Mayenne. He approved of the king's politic conversion, and throughout the reign remained his most trusted counsellor. His first task was to repair the ruinous finances of the realm. Before his time the whole administration was an organised system of pillage; but Rosny made a tour through the provinces, examined the accounts, discovered the delinquents, and dismissed or suspended them, besides compling them to disgorge. In 1596 the revenue was but nine millions of livres; in 1609 it was twenty millions, with a surplus, and the arsenals and fleet in good order. In 1606 he was created Duc de Sully. After Henry's assassination he had to resign the superintendence of finance, but was presented by Marie de Médicis with 300,000 livres. He retired to his estates, Rosny and Villebon, and died 22d December 1641. His Memoirs, if not rigidly historical, are of priceless value for the reign of Henry IV. The first and second volumes were printed in 1634; the third and fourth in 1662. These last contain the famous grouping of Europe, except Russia and Turkey, into a Christian republic of fifteen states, balanced by an international Amphictyonic Assembly. The singular form in which the Mémoires was cast—a narrative addressed to Sully himself—proved so intolerable to the 18th century that the Abbé de l'Écluse re-edited (1745) the whole in ordinary narrative, but modernised and spoiled the work. The original text may be found in the collection of Michaud and Poujoulat (vols. xvii.-xviii.). See books by Legouvé (1878), Gourdault (3d ed. 1877), Bouvet de Cressé (1878), Dussieux (1887), and Chailley (1888); also German studies by Ritter (1871) and Kükellhaus (1895). [Nearly Seel-lee.]

Sully-Prudhomme, René François Armand (1839-1907), poet, was born at Paris. His early Stances et Poèmes (1865) gained the praises of Sainte-Beuve; later volumes, Les Épreuves, Croquis Italiens, Les Solitudes, Impressions de la Guerre, Les Destinées, Les Vaines Tendresses, La France, La Révolte des Fleurs, extended his fame as a poet. His finest poems are steeped in a serene but penetrating melancholy. Masterpieces of subtlety are his didactic poems La Justice (1878) and Le Bonheur (1888). Other works are a metrical translation of book 1. of Lucretius (new ed. 1886), L'Expression dans les Beaux Arts, and Réflexions sur l'Art des Vers (1892). His Œuvres Complètes appeared in 1882-88. He was elected to the Academy in 1881.

Sulpicius Severus (c. 365-425), monkish historian, born in Aquitania, wrote a Chronica (ed. by Halm, Vienna, 1866), from the Creation to 408 A.D. and a Life of St Martin of Tours (ed. by Dübner, Par. 1890). See German monographs by Bernays (1861) and Holder-Egger (1875); and the complete translation by Dr A. Roberts (1895).

Sumner, Charles, American statesman, born in Boston, January 6, 1811, graduated at Harvard in 1830, and in 1834 was admitted to the bar. He found more congenial employment, however, as a lecturer on legal topics and a contributor to law journals and compilations. In 1837-40 he was in Europe, pursuing the study of jurisprudence. He first came into prominence by a civic oration (1845), 'The True Grandeur of Nations,' which was simply a vehement denunciation of war. A Whig, he took little interest in politics until the threatened extensions of negro slavery over newly-acquired territory. In 1848 he joined with others to form the Free Soil party. Nominated for congress, he was defeated by the Whig candidate, but in 1851 was elected to the national senate by the combined Free Soil and Democratic votes of the Massachusetts legislature. This post he held for life. At the outset he stood alone in the senate as the uncompromising opponent of slavery; in 1856, in the senate chamber, he was bludgeoned on the head by Preston S. Brooks, a South Carolina member of congress, and incapacitated for public life for nearly four years. In 1860 he delivered a speech on the admission of Kansas as a free state, published as The Barbarism of Slavery. The secession of the southern states left the Republican party in full control of both houses of congress, and in 1861 Sumner was elected chairman of the senate committee on foreign affairs. He supported the impeachment of President Johnson, and opposed President Grant's project for the acquisition of San Domingo. His continuous and acrimonious censures on Grant's administration brought about a rupture with the leading Republican politicians, which was rendered complete by his support of Greeley as candidate for the presidency in 1872. But his course had been too evidently dictated by principle to allow of his sinking in esteem with the mass of the party, and the breach was gradually closing when he died at Washington, 11th March 1874. Sumner's works fill fifteen volumes (1870-79). See his Memoirs and Letters by Pierce (4 vols. 1877-93), and shorter Lives by Lester (1874), Chaplin (1874), and Anna L. Dawes (1892).

Sumner, JOHN BIRD (1780-1862), born at Kenilworth vicarage, and educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, became rector of Mapledurham, Oxon (1818), Bishop of Chester (1828), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1848). Conciliatory and moderate, he wrote Apostolical Preaching, The Moral Attributes of the Creator, and Evidences of Christianity.—His brother, CHARLES RICHARD (1790-1874), was Bishop of Winchester 1827-69; his life was published in 1876.—His younger son, GEORGE HENRY, born 3d July 1824, in 1888 became bishop-suffragan of Guildford.

Sumter, THOMAS (1784-1832), a general in the American war of independence.

Sunderland, ROBERT SPENCER, EARL OF (1640-1702), in 1643 succeeded his father, who fell at Newbury, as second earl. In 1679 he became Secretary of State, and united with Essex and Halifax in opposing Shaftesbury, who wished to set Monmouth on the throne. He encouraged Charles II. to persevere in the French alliance, and, with the Duchess of Portsmouth, negotiated a treaty by which, for a French pension, Charles agreed to assemble no parliament for three years. Before the year was out a new triumvirate, consisting of himself, Hyde, and Godolphin, succeeded to the confidence of Charles. The French treaty was broken off, and Sunderland, now afraid of the Whigs, engaged the king in an alliance with Spain. After the dissolution of the last exclusion parliament he lost his office; but in 1682 he was, 'upon great submission made to the Duke [of York], restored to be Secretary.' Under James II. his influence grew greater than ever, and in 1685 he became prime-minister. He alone was entrusted with a knowledge of the king's intention to establish Catholicism, and he openly professed his own conversion. Yet we find him in correspondence with William of Orange. When William came over Sunderland went to Amsterdam, but in 1691 he was allowed to return to England, and in 1695 William spent a week at his seat, Althorp. He was made Lord Chamberlain, but resigned in 1697, after directing affairs as the acknowledged head of the government.—His son, CHARLES (1675-1722), third earl, was Secretary of State 1706-10. Under George I. he rose to be all-powerful; but in 1721, being accused of receiving a bribe of £50,000 worth of the fictitious South Sea stock, he was acquitted only from party considerations, and public indignation made him resign. His second son, Charles, succeeding in 1733 to the honours of his maternal grandfather, John Churchill, the earldom of Sunderland became merged in the dukedom of Marlborough. The third son, John, was father of the first Earl Spencer (q.v.).

Suppé, FRANZ VON (1820-95), Viennese composer of operettas, songs, masses, &c., was born at Spalato of Germauo-Belgo-Italian origin.

Suraja Dowlah (Sirāj-ad-Daula; in the Gentleman's Magazine of the time, Sir Roger Dowler!), the young Nawab of Bengal, having captived the fort connected with the English factory at Calcutta, caused, on 19th June 1756, the whole of the prisoners, 146 in number, to be confined in the military prison, eighteen feet square. In the morning there were only twenty-three survivors. Clive (q.v.) sent to avenge the atrocity of the Black Hole, retook Calcutta, and at Plassey (Palāsi) on 23d June 1757 inflicted a crushing defeat on Suraja Dowlah. See Holwell's Narrative of the Black Hole (1758).

Surcouf, ROBERT (1773-1827), French privateer, was born and died at St Malo. He preyed on the English shipping in the Indian seas during the war, his greatest exploits the capture of the Triton (1785) and Kent (1800). See Prof. Laughton's Studies in Naval History (1887).

Surrey, HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF, was born about 1517, the eldest son of Thomas Howard (q.v.), who in 1524 succeeded as third Duke of Norfolk. In 1532 he accompanied Henry VIII. to France; in 1542 he was made a Knight of the Garter, but sent to the Fleet for challenging a gentleman; and next year he was again committed for breaking windows in the streets at night. Soon released, he served in the camp near Boulogne, distinguished himself at Montreuil in 1544, and in 1555 held command at Guisnes and Boulogne, but, defeated by a superior French force, was superseded by the Earl of Hertford. For his bitter speeches against Hertford, Surrey was imprisoned at Windsor in July, and in December was, like his father, committed to the Tower on a charge of high-treason. His offence was merely that he had assumed the arms of his ancestor Edward the Confessor in conjunction with his own; but he was found guilty, condemned to death, and beheaded, 21st January 1547. His poems, circulated in manuscript during his lifetime, were first printed, with poems by Wyatt and others, in Tottel's Miscellany (1557). They consist of sonnets, lyrics, elegies, translations, paraphrases of the Psalms and Ecclesiastes, besides translations in good blank verse—the first in English—of books ii. and iv. of Virgil's Aeneid. He was the first in English to employ the sonnet. See the Life by Nott in his edition of Surrey and Wyatt (1815; reprint 1866), and that in French by Edmond Bapst (1891).

Surtees, ROBERT (1779-1834), born at Durham, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, and the Middle Temple, and in 1802 inherited Mainsforth near Bishop Auckland. Here he compiled his History of the County of Durham (1816-23), to vol. iv. of which (ed. by Raine, 1840) a memoir by George Taylor is prefixed. To Scott's Minstrelsy Surtees contributed two 'ancient' ballads he himself had made—Darthram's Dirge and The Death of Featherstonhaugh. The Surtees Society was founded in 1834 to publish unedited MSS. relating chiefly to the northern counties.

Surtees, ROBERT SMITH (1802-64), of Hamsterley Hall, Durham, wrote a series of inimitable sporting novels, of which the best known are Mr Sponge's Sporting Tour (1853); Handley Cross, or the Spa Hunt (1854); Ask Manma (1858); Plain or Ringlets? (1860); and Mr Facey Romford's Hounds (1865)—all having coloured etchings and other illustrations in John Leech's best style.

Suso, or SEUSE, HEINRICH (c. 1295-1366), a German mystic, born at Ueberlingen in Baden, who was a Dominican monk at Constance and Ulm, and a disciple of Eckhart (q.v.).

Sutro, ALFRED, son of a London doctor, has translated Maeterlinck, and since 1900 written a series of successful plays, including The Foolish Virgins, A Lonely Life, The Walls of Jericho, The Perfect Lover (1905).

Sutton, THOMAS (1552-1611), a rich London merchant, founder of the Charterhouse.

Suvoroff, or SUWARROW, ALEXANDER VASILIEVITCH (1729-1800), born at Moscow, had won fame in the Seven Years' War, two Polish and two Turkish wars, when in 1799 he was sent to Italy to assist the Austrians against the French. He defeated Moreau on the Adda, Macdonald at the Trebbia, and Joubert at Novi. Then he was directed to unite with Korsakoff to sweep the French out of Switzerland. After a terrible march over the Alps he found that Masséna had defeated Korsakoff, and, too weak to attack, he barely escaped over the mountains into Austria. He died at St Petersburg. He was small of stature and slight, but inured to hardship, brusque and eccentric. See Life by Lieut.-col. Spalding (1890).

Svendsen, JOHAN SEVERIN (1840-1911), composer, born at Christiania, in 1883 became court kapellmeister at Copenhagen.

Swetchine, MADAME. See SWETCHINE.

Swammerdam, JAN (1637-85), entomologist, born at Amsterdam, practised as a physician there and at Leyden, but gave far more attention to the study of insects, became straitened for means, and finally was carried away by the religious mysticism of Antoinette Bourignon (q.v.). His chief services to science were in the anatomy of bees and the metamorphoses of insects. His most important books were a treatise on animalcules (1669) and Biblia Naturæ (ed. Boerhaave, 1737-38).

Swan, ANNIE S., the maiden-name and pen-name of Mrs Burnett Smith, daughter of a farmer near Gorebridge in Midlothian and wife of a doctor. Between 1873 and 1888 she published nearly forty tales and stories, and has since continued writing novels as well as editing The Woman at Home.

Swanwick, ANNA (1813-99), born at Liverpool, studied Greek and Hebrew at Berlin, and interested herself in woman's education and philanthropy. From 1843 on, she translated much from Goethe (including Faust, one of the best translations), Schiller, and Æschylus, and has written An Utopian Dream (1888), Poets the Interpreters of their Age (1892), and Evolution and the Religion of the Future (1894).

Swartz, OLOF (1760-1818), Swedish botanist.

Swedenborg, EMANUEL, born in Stockholm, January 29, 1688, son of Jesper Svedberg, subsequently Bishop of Skara, was educated at Upsala, travelled in England, Holland, France, and Germany, and served Charles XII. in the College of Mines and as military engineer. The family was ennobled in 1719, and the name changed from Svedberg to Swedenborg. Emanuel wrote books on algebra, the calculus, longitude, decimal measures, tides, docks, sluices, and saltworks, and then devoted himself for ten years to the study of mining and smelting, and to the construction of a theory of creation, expounded in Opera Philosophica et Mineralia (3 vols. 1734). The first volume, Principia, or The First Principles of Natural Things, deduces matter from pure motion.

This was followed by his Argument on the Infinite (1734). His studies in human anatomy and physiology were embodied in his Economy of the Animal Kingdom (1741) and Animal Kingdom (1744-45). Here his course as a natural philosopher ended, and he entered on his career as spiritual seer. He resigned his office in the College of Mines in 1747, and in 1749 issued at London the Heavenly Arcana (1749-56). His life henceforward was spent chiefly between Stockholm, London, and Amsterdam, in writing and printing expositions of his experience and doctrines, mostly found in outline in the Heavenly Arcana, which is a revelation of the internal or spiritual sense of Genesis and Exodus. The early chapters of Genesis are a fragment of an older Word, and an allegorical history. The spiritual sense pervades the Scriptures as the soul does the body. By reason of its symbolism of the inward sense, the letter of Scripture is holy in every jot and tittle. The Jewish dispensation having reached its period, God appeared in Jesus Christ; He assumed human nature, 'glorified and made it divine.' The effluence from the Lord's divine humanity is the Holy Spirit. The church initiated by the Divine Advent came to an end in the 18th century, and Swedenborg witnessed the Last Judgment effected in the year 1757 in the World of Spirits. Then commenced a new dispensation, signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, of which Swedenborg was the precursor. The law of correspondence is universal; the natural world is the outbirth of the spiritual, and the spiritual world of the invisible mental world. By correspondences the constitution of heaven and hell is revealed. There are three heavens, consisting of three orders of angels, distinguished for love, wisdom, and obedience. As there are three heavens so there are three hells, and every angelic society has an infernal opposite. All in whom self-love is the ruling motive go to hell. There is no resurrection of the earthly body. God alone lives; creation is dead, man is dead, except through the divine presence. In the spiritual world there is no objective space between spirits; hence Swedenborg could from his chamber commune directly or by vision with spirits of men at a distance, with souls on the moon and planets. His other notable works (all first published in Latin) are Heaven and Hell, The New Jerusalem, Divine Love and the Divine Wisdom, Divine Providence, The Apocalypse Revealed, and Conjugal Love. His theological works translated number forty volumes. He died in London, 29th March 1772. He made no attempt to establish a sect; his followers, who call themselves 'the New Church signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation,' were organised as a distinct denomination in 1788 by Robert Hindmarsh (1759-1835), a Clerkenwell printer, who became one of the first ministers. The Swedenborgians, numbering over 6000 in Britain and about as many in the United States, accept Swedenborg's theological writings as a revelation. His remains were removed from London for reburial at Stockholm in 1908. See Lives by White (1867) and Wilkinson (1886).

Sweet, HENRY, epoch-making student of English, phonetics, and comparative philology, and Reader in Phonetics at Oxford, was born in London, 15th Sept. 1845—his works Old and Middle English texts, primers, and dictionaries, a historical English grammar, A History of English Sounds, and A History of Language.

Swetchine, MADAME (1782-1857), born Sophie

Soymanof at Moscow, married in 1799 the quiet, inoffensive General Swetchine, joined the Roman Catholic communion in 1815, and settled finally in Paris in 1818. For nearly forty years she maintained a famous salon. She was small and plain, but of a singular charm, and tempered religious enthusiasm with all the courtesy of the great world. Her letters and writings show subtle thought and elevation of tone, but hardly justify the adoration of her coterie. See Life by De Falloux (1858); his edition of her Letters (1861); and work by Naville (1863).

Swift, JONATHAN, greatest of English prose satirists, came of a Yorkshire clerical family on his father's side, while his mother was a Leicestershire lady. He was born in Dublin, 30th November 1667, seven months after his father's early death. At six he was sent to Kilkenny School, and in 1682 entered Trinity College, Dublin. After a desultory college career he came to England (1688), and next year became secretary to Sir William Temple (q.v.), a distant connection of his mother, at Moor Park, Surrey. His independent nature, however, rebelled against the subserviency of the occupation, and, returning to Dublin, he took orders (1694-95), and was presented to the living of Kilroot near Belfast. But country obscurity proved little to his taste, and in 1696 he accepted Temple's invitation to return and help him with his papers. By this time Swift's 'Stella'—Hester Johnson (born at Sheen, 13th March 1681), daughter of the companion of Temple's widowed sister—had grown up into a beautiful and intelligent girl, and the kindly solicitude of the young Irishman, who guided her education, developed into an enduring affection. The quiet retirement of Moor Park, where he remained until Temple's death in 1699, and the solitude of his Irish cure, had given him time to produce the Tale of a Tub and the Battle of the Books, both published in 1704, anonymously, like almost all Swift's works. The former is held by some to be the greatest of Swift's satires; in it the cant of religion, the pretensions of letters, hypocrisies of every form, are exposed with the keen enjoyment of the iconoclast. The Battle of the Books is an admirable travesty of the idle controversy then waging between Temple, Wotton, Boyle, and Bentley concerning the comparative merits of ancient and modern writers. As secretary to Lord Berkeley, Lord Deputy to Ireland, Swift enlivened the society of Dublin Castle; as vicar of Laracor near Trim (1700), and prebendary of St Patrick's Cathedral from 1701 to 1710, he divided his time between Laracor and London. His reputation as a wit, and his suspected authorship of the Tale of a Tub and the Battle of the Books, assured his position in society and in the clubs. He now wrote his humorous squibs on the unlucky almanac-maker, Partridge, under the pseudonym of Isaac Bickerstaff, and vindicated his position as a churchman by the Argument to Prove the Inconvenience of abolishing Christianity, Project for the Advancement of Religion, and Sentiments of a Church of England Man (all in 1708). 'Stella,' who had come to Ireland by Swift's advice, passed much of her time between Trim and Dublin. During 1710-13 Swift was chiefly in London, engaged in political work. The Whigs had done nothing for him; the Tories longed to win his pen to their cause; and Swift was the friend of Harley, the Lord Treasurer. So Swift became a Tory, and converted the Examiner into a deadly weapon against the Whigs. Swift's Examiners (Nov. 1710-June 1711), which may almost be said to have created the 'leading article' and established the power of the press, are plain, trenchant statements of policy and criticisms of opponents. He also urged his views in numerous brief and telling skits, broadsides, and pamphlets, such as his political masterpiece The Conduct of the Allies (1711) and Public Spirit of the Whigs (1714). His writings undoubtedly contributed to Marlborough's overthrow and to the peace of Utrecht in 1713. Swift was meanwhile preparing his History of the Last Four Years of Queen Anne, not published till 1757; and he also wrote a Proposal for Correcting the English Tongue (1712). His life during these three years is recorded in his Journal to Stella, the most faithful and fascinating diary the world has seen, in which all his hopes and fears, all that he did and thought, are set down in perfect honesty and with no thought of publication.

Swift had throughout declined to accept pay for his political labours. He waited for ecclesiastical preferment; but the queen would not bestow a bishopric on the author of the Tale of a Tub. A year after he was made Dean of St Patrick's at Dublin (1713) the queen died, the Whigs came into office, and his political influence in London was gone for ever. A romantic episode in his London life had been the passion he inspired in Esther Vanhomrigh (born not in 1692, but in 1687 or 1688), whom he called 'Vanessa,' and who, when he went to Ireland, followed him; he tried beyond doubt to repress Vanessa's passion. She died in 1723, and by her testamentary directions Swift's metrical version of their romance was published as Cadenus [i.e. Decanus] and Vanessa (1726). But what his real relations were with the two women, why he did not marry, or, if he did eventually go through the ceremony with 'Stella,' why he kept his marriage a profound secret, and why they never lived together, remain mysteries still. There can be no doubt that he was devotedly attached to 'Stella' to her dying day (28th January 1728). After the accession of King George, Swift retired to his deanery, and except for two journeys to England in 1726 and 1727, remained there for nearly thirty years. He devoted much of his energies to the wrongs of Ireland (the Ireland mainly of the Englishry) from no love of the land of his exile, but out of 'a perfect hatred of tyranny and oppression.' His Drapier's Letters (1724, see Wood, WILLIAM), Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures (1720), and Modest Proposal for utilising children as articles of food (1729) possess all the merits of his style and method. Besides his Irish tracts, a good deal of light verse, often exceedingly coarse, and his Polite Conversation (1738), a witty parody of small-talk, and Directions to Servants, a savage satire on menial incapacity, Swift's Irish period is notable for the completion of the most famous of all his works, Gulliver's Travels (1726). In this immortal satire we see Swift's genius in its full maturity; with all its deadly satire on the cant and shams of the world, it is also a wonderful story-book, and its daring fancy, yet strange sobriety, its bizarre situations, its plausibility, and its delightful playfulness make it a classic with children as well as grown-up men. Of his life during his later years a record is found in his voluminous correspondence with Pope, Gay, Arbuthnot, and Bolingbroke. His life had become very lonely and sad, and he dwelt in constant dread of that mental overthrow which he felt was coming. In 1740 his brain disease drove him to the verge of madness, but after two years clouded by periods of unspeakable torment he sank into a lethargy, and died 19th Oct. 1745. He was buried beside 'Stella' in St Patrick's Cathedral. Sir Walter Scott's edition of the Works (19 vols. 1814; 2d ed. 1824) includes most of what was valuable in those of Hawkeswood and Sheridan; Temple Scott and others edited the works in 14 vols. (1897-1910); F. E. Ball, the Correspondence (1910-12). Selections are by Traill (1884-85), Lewin (1886), H. Morley (1889-90), and Craik (1892). John Forster published vol. I. of a Life in 1875; and there are Lives by Craik (1882), Leslie Stephen (1882), Moriarty (1893), and Churton Collins (1893), besides Swift in Ireland by R. Ashe King (1896), and Unpublished Letters, edited by Birkbeck Hill (1899).

Swinburne, ALGERNON CHARLES, was born in Chester Street, London, April 5, 1837, the eldest son of Admiral Swinburne, of the ancient Northumbrian family. He was educated partly in France, passed from Eton to Balliol (1857), left without a degree, travelled on the Continent, visited Landor at Florence in 1864, and became associated with Dante Gabriel Rossetti and William Morris. His first book, two plays, The Queen Mother and Rosamund (1861), did not excite much attention; but the drama, Atalanta in Calydon (1864), proved that a new singer with an exquisite lyrical gift had arisen. Chastelard (1865) was less successful. In 1866 appeared the first series of Poems and Ballads; the finest pieces, 'Hesperia,' 'Itylus,' 'A Match,' 'The Garden of Proserpine,' the 'Hymn to Proserpine,' 'The Triumph of Time,' were a revelation to students of English verse. The magnificence of the rhythm, the new, strange sweetness of the music, were irresistible, but the tone of some passages roused adverse criticism. A Song of Italy appeared in 1867, and an Ode on the Proclamation of the French Republic in 1870. In Songs before Sunrise (1871) there is much admirable verse, though the political opinions may appear visionary and crude. In 1871 Robert Buchanan attacked Rossetti and Swinburne in The Fleshly School, drawing forth a counter pamphlet, Under the Microscope, from Swinburne. Bothwell, a long chronicle play, appeared in 1874; Erechtheus, a noble lyric drama, in 1875; and a second series of Poems and Ballads in 1878. Other poems are Songs of Two Nations (1875), The Modern Heptalogia (1880: parodies), Songs of the Springtides (1880), Studies in Song (1880), Mary Stuart, completing the Chastelard and Bothwell trilogy (1881), Tristram of Lyonesse (1882), A Century of Roundels (1883), Marino Faliero, and a Tragedy (1885), Lochrine; a Tragedy (1887), Astrophel and other Poems (1894), and a third series of Poems and Ballads, containing the superb sea-and-battle piece, The Armada (1889). The Sisters (1892) is a short tragedy of modern life; The Tale of Balen (1896) is Arthurian, from Malory. Swinburne's prose works include Essays and Studies (1875), Miscellanies (1886), and Studies in Prose and Poetry (1894), with separate studies of William Blake, George Chapman, Ben Jonson, Charlotte Brontë, Shakespeare, and Victor Hugo. Swinburne was the greatest metrical inventor in English literature. No poet has revealed the tunefulness and pliancy, the majesty and grace of the English speech in such a variety of lyrical forms. A collected edition of his works appeared in 1904-6; a novel, Love's Cross Currents, in 1905; and a play, The Duke of Gandia, in 1908. He died 10th April 1909.

Swithin, or SWITHUN, St, Bishop of Winchester 852-862. When in 971 the monks exhumed his body to bury it in the rebuilt cathedral, the translation, which was to have taken place on 15th July, is said to have been delayed by violent rains. Hence the current belief that if it rains on 15th July it will rain for forty days more.

Sybel, HEINRICH VON (1817-95), German historian, born at Düsseldorf, studied at Berlin under Ranke; became professor of History at Bonn (1844), Marburg (1845), Munich (1856), and Bonn again (1861); and in 1875 was made director of the state archives at Berlin. He published the political correspondence of Frederick the Great, shared in issuing the Monumenta Germaniæ Historica, and founded and edited the Historische Zeitschrift. His history of the First Crusade (1841) often ran counter to the accepted opinions of centuries; his next work was on the title 'German king' (1844). Then came his masterpiece, Geschichte der Revolutionszeit, 1789-95 (1853-58; 4th ed. to 1800, 1882), a history of the French revolution based upon official documentary evidence. He also wrote a great history of the founding of the German empire by William I. (1889-94; trans. 1891-92). He died at Marburg.

Sydenham, FLOYER (1710-87), an amiable man of letters whose privations brought about the foundation of the Literary Fund, graduated at Oxford, and in his fiftieth year began the publication of an excellent translation of Plato's Dialogues. It had no market, neither had his dissertation on Heraclitus (1775) or his Onomasticon Theologicum (1784). Arrested for unpaid meals, he died in prison.

Sydenham, THOMAS (1624-89), born at Winford Eagle in Dorsetshire, in 1648 graduated M.B. at Oxford, and shortly after became a fellow of All Souls. In 1666 he published his Methodus Curandi Febres (expanded 1668-76); and in 1676 took his M.D. at Cambridge. The friend of Locke and Boyle, he was a profound master of the Hippocratic method, but treated current medical theories with scant courtesy. He wrote in Latin on epidemics, venereal diseases, small-pox, gout, and hysteria. His last work, Processus Integri (1692) is an outline of pathology and therapeutics. Seemingly behind his age in science, he was really ahead of it in practice. See Greenhill's admirable edition of Sydenham's Opera Omnia, with Dr Latham's English rendering (Sydenham Soc. 1843-49); Dr John Brown's Locke and Sydenham; and Picard's Sydenham, sa Vie, ses Œuvres (1889).

Sylvester I., pope 314-335, is claimed to have baptised Constantine the Great, and to have received from him the famous Donation. He was canonised.—SYLVESTER II. (c. 940-1003), pope from 999, was born Gerbert at Aurillac in Auvergne, and from his attainments in chemistry, mathematics, and philosophy acquired the reputation of being in league with the Devil. He became abbot of Bobbio and archbishop of Ravenna. See French works by Olleris (1867), and German by Werner (1878) and Schnltz (1891-93).—SYLVESTER III. was anti-pope 1044-46 to Benedict IX.

Sylvester, JAMES JOSEPH (1814-97), mathematician, born in London, studied at St John's College, Cambridge (where as a Jew he was disqualified for a degree), and was professor in University College, London, in the University of Virginia, at Woolwich, in the Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore, and at Oxford (1883-94). See articles in Nature, vols. xxxix. and lv.

Sylvester, JOSHUA (1563-1618), achieved success neither as merchant nor poet. His own works are forgotten; his English version of the Divine Weeks and Works of Du Bartas (q.v.) had but a short-lived popularity. He died at Middelburg, Holland. Grosart reprinted his Works (1878).

Syme, JAMES (1799-1870), surgeon, born in Edinburgh, and educated at the university there, in 1818 announced a method of making waterproof, afterwards patented by Macintosh (q.v.). In 1823-33 he lectured on surgery. In 1831 appeared his treatise on The Excision of Diseased Joints; in 1832 his Principles of Surgery. In 1833 he became professor of Clinical Surgery. His life abounded in controversies. Syme, who had no superior either as operator or as teacher, wrote further on pathology, stricture, fistula, incised wounds, &c. See Memoir by Paterson (1874).

Symeon of DURHAM, monkish chronicler, lived at Jarow and Durham c. 1080-1130. Hinde edited his works (1868), and Arnold (1882-85).

Symington, WILLIAM (1763-1831), born at Leadhills, became a mechanic at the Wanlockhead mines. He had two years before invented an engine for road locomotion when, in 1788, he constructed for Patrick Miller (q.v.) a similar engine on a boat 25 feet long, having twin hulls with paddle-wheels between, which was launched on Dalswinton Loch. In 1802 he completed at Grangemouth the Charlotte Dundas, the first successful steamboat ever built. It was meant for a tug, but was not used solely for fear the wash should injure the sides of the Forth and Clyde Canal. Symington died in London.

Symmachus, CÆLIUS, pope 498-514.

Symmachus, QUINTUS AURELIUS, Roman orator, flourished 340-402 A.D., and became prefect of Rome in 384, consul in 391. He was devoted to the old religion, but his nobility of character was worthy of the highest Christian type. His extant writings, edited by Kroll in 1893, consist of Letters, three panegyrics on Valentinian I. and Gratian, and fragments of six orations. See Morin's Étude (1847) and Kroll's De Symmacho (1891).

Symonds, JOHN ADDINGTON, born at Bristol, 5th October 1840, was educated at Harrow and Balliol, won the Newdigate, and was elected a fellow of Magdalen in 1862. His Introduction to the Study of Dante (1872) was followed by Studies of the Greek Poets (1873-76), his great Renaissance in Italy (6 vols. 1875-86), and Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama (1884). He wrote also sketches of travel in Italy and elsewhere; monographs on Shelley, Sidney, and Ben Jonson; translations of the Sonnets of Michelangelo and Campanella (1878), of Benvenuto Cellini's autobiography, and of students' Latin songs of the 12th century (1884); a Life of Michelangelo (1892); some volumes of verse; and an account of his residence (for health's sake) at Davos Platz (1892). He died at Rome, 18th April 1893. See Life compiled from his letters by H. F. Brown (1895).

Synesius (c. 375-413 A.D.), Bishop of Ptolemais, born at Cyrene, studied at Alexandria under Hypatia (q.v.) and at Athens, then returned to the Pentapolis, resolved to spend his life in study and in the pursuits of a country gentleman. About 399 he was appointed a delegate from Cyrene to the emperor at Constantinople, where he remained three years, and wrote an allegory Concerning Providence. After his return, he married and wrote Concerning Dreams, The Praise of Baldness, Dion or Self-discipline, and Hymns. When Libyan nomads made raids upon the fertile Pentapolis, Synesius raised a troop of volunteers, and organised the defence of Cyrene. Till now he had been a man of letters, steeped in Greek literature and philosophy, but about 401 he turned Christian; and about 410 the people of Ptolemais begged him to become their bishop. At first unwilling, he by-and-by yielded and was consecrated at Alexandria. His 156 letters reveal to us a man of high spirit and awake to every call of duty, healthy in body and mind, passionately fond of intellectual pursuits and of sport. His Hymns show him as the poet of Neoplatonism. See books by Druon (1859), Volkman (1869), Miss Gardner (1886), and Crawford (1901).

Syrus, PUBLIUS or PUBLILIUS (fl. 43 B.C.), Latin writer of mimes, was probably a Syrian slave brought early to Rome, and educated and freed by an indulgent master. About seven hundred apophthegms are extant under his name.

AAPFE, EDUARD, GRAF VON (1833-95), an Austrian statesman and Irish viscount, the personal friend of Franz Joseph, was born at Vienna.

Tabari (839-923), born in Persia, travelled in Syria, Egypt, &c., wrote in Arabic invaluable Moslem annals (edited by De Goeje and others, 1878-91), and died at Bagdad.

Tabley, JOHN BYRNE LEICESTER WARREN, LORD DE, born 26th April 1835, and educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1859, unsuccessfully contested Mid Cheshire as a Liberal in 1868, and succeeded his father as third baron in 1887. He died 22d Nov. 1895. He published eight volumes of poetry (1863-75), two novels (1868-69), and a Guide to Book Plates (1880). Two plays, Philoctetes and Orestes, deserve mention. A selection appeared in 1893. See memoir by Sir M. Grant Duff prefixed to his Flora of Cheshire (1899).

Tacitus, CORNELIUS, the historian—whether his prenomens was Publius or Gaius can only be conjectured—was born perhaps at Rome between 52 and 54 A.D. He studied rhetoric in Rome, rose to eminence as a pleader at the Roman bar, and in 77 or 78 married the daughter of Agricola, the conqueror of Britain. By 88 he was already prætor and a member of one of the priestly colleges. Next year he left Rome, probably for Germany; and he did not return till 93. He was an eye-witness of Domitian's reign of terror, and we have his own testimony as to the blessed change wrought by the accession of Nerva and Trajan. Under Nerva he became consul suffectus, succeeding Virginius Rufus. We may assume that he saw the close of Trajan's reign, if not the opening of Hadrian's. The high reputation he enjoyed is attested by the eulogistic mention of him in Pliny's letters. His earliest work, the Dialogus de Oratoribus (76 or 77) treats of the decline of eloquence under the empire. It is doubtful whether the Agricola is a funeral éloge or a panegyric for political ends. As biography it has grave defects; but it will always be read for its elevation of style, its dramatic force, invective, and pathos. The third work, the Germania, is a monograph of the greatest value on the ethnography of Germany. Fourth in order comes the Historie, or the history of the empire from the accession of Galba in 69 A.D. to the assassination of Domitian in 97. Of the twelve books originally composing it only the first four and a fragment of the fifth are extant. Tacitus is at his strongest here, and his material was drawn from contemporary experience. His last work, the so-called Annales, is a history of the Julian line from Tiberius to Nero (14 A.D. to 68); of their sixteen books only eight have come down to us entire, four are fragmentary, and the others lost. His statuesque style is often obscure from condensation. He copied much from earlier historians. There are translations by Church and Brodrick, Quill, Townshend, and Ramsay. See Boissier's Tacitus and Other Studies (1906).

Taft, WILLIAM HOWARD, president of the United States, was born at Cincinnati in 1857, the son of President Grant's Secretary of War and Attorney-general; and having studied at Yale and qualified as a barrister at Cincinnati, held numerous appointments in Ohio, and in 1890 became Solicitor-general for the United States. In 1900 he was made president of the Philippine Commission, and in 1901 first civil governor of the islands. In 1904-8 he was Secretary of War for the United States, in 1906 provisional governor of Cuba; and, as Republican candidate, in 1909 he became president of the United States. In 1911 he strongly supported the movement for reciprocity with Canada.

Tagliani, MARIA (1804-84), a celebrated dancer, born at Stockholm of Italian parents, her father, Filippo Tagliani (1777-1871), being a ballet-master. She made her début in Paris in 1827. She married Count de Voisins in 1832, and retired with a fortune, afterwards lost. Her brother Paul (1808-84) and his daughter Maria were also famous dancers. [Tagliani-nee.]

Taillandier, SAINT-RENÉ (1817-79), born in Paris, had already filled chairs at Strasburg and Montpellier, when in 1863 he succeeded Saint-Marc Girardin at the Sorbonne. He was admitted to the Academy in 1873. He wrote much from 1843 on Germany and German affairs, translated the Goethe-Schiller correspondence (1863), and published works on Scotus Erigena (1843), Novallis (1847), religious philosophy (1860), the Countess of Albany (1862), Corneille (1864), Marshal Saxe (1865), Philippe de Ségur (1875), and King Leopold and Queen Victoria (1878). [Ta-yons-de-ay.]

Taine, HENRI (baptised HIPPOLYTE ADOLPHE), born at Vouziers in Ardennes, 21st April 1828, studied at Paris, and taught in various towns, then, settling in Paris, conquered fortune by the sheer strength and originality of his literary work. His treatise on Lafontaine's Fables (1853) is a masterpiece of critical analysis; his Voyage aux Eaux des Pyrénées (1855) and Voyage en Italie (1866) stand almost first of their class. In 1863 Taine was appointed an examiner at St Cyr, in 1864 professor of Æsthetics and the History of Art at the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris; he thus found a motive for his subtle and paradoxical books on the Philosophy of Art, the Ideal in Art, and the Philosophy of Art in Italy, Greece, and the Netherlands. He was elected to Loménie's chair in the French Academy in 1878. Some of his maturest critical work is in Essais de Critique et d'Histoire (1857) and Nouveaux Essais (1865); his most vigorous polemic is Les Philosophes Français du XIX. Siècle (1856), an attack on Cousin, Jouffroy, &c. The Notes sur l'Angleterre (1861) is for all its cleverness a warning example of the folly of splendid inductive theories without adequate knowledge. His famous Histoire de la Littérature Anglaise (1863-64; Eng. trans. by Van Laun, 1872-74) excited a clerical storm in France which cost him the Academy's prize of 4000 francs. The work by no means justifies its title, but it was in its time the most notable done by a foreigner. Taine's greatest work is Les Origines de la France Contemporaine (L'Ancien Régime, 1875; La Révolution, 1878-85; Le Régime Moderne, 1890-94); trans. 1891-94; it constitutes the strongest attack yet made on the men and the motives of the Revolution. Taine died 5th March 1893. Derniers Essais appeared in 1895, and Carnets de Voyage in 1897. See his Life and Letters (trans. 1904), and G. Monod, Les Maîtres d'Histoire (1895).

Tait, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Edinburgh, 22d December 1811, was educated at the Edinburgh Academy and Glasgow University, whence he passed as a Snell exhibitioner to Balliol College, Oxford. A fellow and tutor, he was one of the four who in 1841 protested against Newman's Tract 90; in 1842 he became head-master of Rugby, in 1849 Dean of Carlisle, and in 1856 Bishop of London. The 'Bishop of London's Fund' for building schools, churches, and parsonages attained under him to £350,000. A friend of compromise, he showed much tact in dealing with controversies as to vestments and confession; condemned the Essays and Reviews and Colenso's teaching, but intervened to secure fairplay. Having in 1863 been made Primate of all England by Mr Disraeli, he helped to compose the strifes raised by Irish disestablishment, but was less successful with the Public Worship Regulation Act and the Burials Bill. He did much to extend and improve the organisation of the church in the colonies; and the Lambeth Conference of 1878 met under his auspices. He died 3d December 1882. See Life by Davidson and Benham (1891), and Benham's Memoir (1879) of his wife and son, both of whom died in 1878.

Tait, PETER GUTHRIE, mathematician and physicist, was born, son of the Duke of Buccleuch's gardener, at Dalkeith, April 28, 1831, and educated at the Edinburgh Academy, Edinburgh University, and St Peter's College, Cambridge. Senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman (1852), he was in 1854 elected professor of Mathematics at Belfast, in 1860 of Natural Philosophy at Edinburgh. His most important experimental work was on thermo-electricity, on the effects of pressure, on thermal conductivity, and on impact. To mathematical physics belong memoirs, such as those on Mirage and the Kinetic Theory of Gases in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which Tait was secretary from 1879; to pure mathematics his papers on Knots and Quaternions. The death of his son Lieut. Fred. G. Tait (1870-1900, the famous golfer; see Life, 1901) in a reconnaissance in the South African war was a severe blow to him; he resigned his chair early in 1901, and died on the 4th of July. With W. J. Steele he wrote the Dynamics of a Particle (1856; 6th ed. 1889), with Lord Kelvin (q.v.) a Treatise on Natural Philosophy (vol. i. 1867; new ed. 1879); with Balfour Stewart The Unseen Universe (1875; 17th ed. 1890); Paradoxical Philosophy (1878) is all his own. He helped with the Lives of Forbes, Rankine, and Andrews; and among his other works may be named a treatise on Quaternions (1867; 3d ed. 1890), Recent Advances in Physical Science (1876), and text-books on Light (1884), Heat (1884), Properties of Matter (1885), and Dynamics (1896).

Tait, WILLIAM (1792-1864), the founder of Tait's Magazine.

Talbot, a family descended from Richard de Talbot, named in Domesday, and from Gilbert (d. 1346), the first baron. The sixth baron, Sir John Talbot (1390-1453), Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, was the famous champion of English arms in France during Henry VI.'s reign. The hero of forty fights, he was checked at Orleans by Joan of Arc, and taken prisoner at Patay (1429). Created Earl of Shrewsbury (1442), he fell at the siege of Castillon. John, second earl (1413-60), fell at Northampton fighting for the Red Rose. George, sixth earl (c. 1527-90), Bess of Hardwick's fourth spouse, long held Mary of Scotland a prisoner at Sheffield Manor. Charles, twelfth earl (1660-1718), was Lord-lieutenant of Ireland and Lord High Treasurer and Lord Chamberlain of Great Britain. He was made Duke of Shrewsbury in 1694; the dukedom died with him. Bertram Arthur, seventeenth earl (1832-56), died without issue, when the title passed to Henry John Chetwynd, third Earl Talbot (1803-68), of a 15th-century branch, whose grandson, Charles Henry John (b. 13th Nov. 1860), succeeded as twentieth Earl of Shrewsbury and fifth Earl Talbot in 1877. The Lords Talbot de Malahide represent a family settled in Ireland from 1167.

Talbot, WILLIAM HENRY FOX (1800-77), born at Lacock Abbey, Chippenham, and educated at Harrow and Trinity, Cambridge, sat for Chippenham in the first reformed parliament, but from 1833 devoted himself to the problem of fixing shadows. His great services to photographic art in 1842 secured him a Royal Society medal. He was one of the first decipherers of the Ninevite cuneiform inscriptions, and wrote Legendary Tales (1830), Hermes, or Classical and Antiquarian Researches (1833-39), Antiquity of the Book of Genesis (1839), English Etymologies (1846), and Pencil of Nature (on photography, 1846).

Talfourd, SIR THOMAS NOON (1795-1854), the son of a Reading brewer, was educated at the grammar-school there under Dr Valpy, and in 1821 was called to the bar, became a serjeant-at-law (1833), Whig member for Reading (1835-41 and 1847-49), and a justice of Common Pleas (1849), at the same time being knighted. He is remembered by his four nearly forgotten tragedies, of which Ion (1835) was brought out by Macready at Covent Garden, by his Copyright Act of 1842, and by his writings on Charles Lamb.

Tallacotius. See TAGLIACOZZI.

Taliesin, a 6th-century Welsh bard, to whom are ascribed many admirable poems, not older, however, in language than the 12th century. See Skene's Four Ancient Books of Wales (1868).

Tallemant des Réaux, GÉDÉON (c. 1619-1700), born at La Rochelle, married his cousin Elisabeth Rambouillet, whose fortune enabled him to give himself to letters and society. His famous Historiettes (written 1657-59; published 1834-40), 376 in number, are illustrative anecdotes rather than biographies. The most finished group is that of the famous circle of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. His brother, the Abbé Tallemant (1620-93), was an academician; so too was his cousin, Paul Tallemant (1642-1712). [Tal-mons de Ray'o.]

Talleyrand—in full, CHARLES MAURICE TALLEYRAND DE PÉRICORD—was born at Paris, 13th February 1754, son of the Comte Talleyrand de Périgord (1734-88) who fought in the Seven Years' War. He was educated for the church, made himself a fair scholar, and cultivated the character of a rake and a cynical wit. Abbot of St Denis (1775) and agent-général to the French clergy (1780), he was by Louis XVI. made Bishop of Autun in 1789. In that year the clergy of his diocese elected him to the States-general, and he was one of the members of Assembly selected to draw up the Declaration of Right. He took a cynical delight in attacking the calling to which he still nominally belonged, and proposed the measure confiscating the landed property of the church. In February 1790 he was elected president of the Assembly. In 1791 he consecrated two new bishops, declaring at the same time his attachment to the holy see, but, excommunicated by the pope, he gave up the clerical career. His report on public instruction was followed in the great changes on the educational system. Early in 1792 Talleyrand was sent to London, but failed to conciliate Pitt; in December he was placed on the list of émigrés. He remained in exile in London till January 1794, when the Alien Act drove him to the United States. After the fall of Robespierre he returned to Paris (1795), attached himself to Barras, and in 1797 was made foreign minister under the Directory; he was for a time the first man in France. He had already recognised the genius of Bonaparte and established intimate relations with him. For a time he was in disgrace for his willingness to sell his services towards a treaty between Great Britain and the United States. But under the Consulate he was restored to his post, and was privy to the kidnapping and murder (March 1804) of the Duc d'Enghien. He was greatly instrumental in consolidating the power of Napoleon as consul for life (1802) and as emperor (1804). When in 1805 Great Britain formed a European coalition against France, it was partially broken up by Talleyrand. To him as much as to Napoleon was owing the organisation (1806) of the Confederation of the Rhine. After being created Prince de Bénévent, he withdrew from the ministry. His voice was on the whole for a policy of wisdom during the later years of the first empire. He was opposed to the invasion of Russia; and this gives some justification for his desertion of Napoleon in 1814. He became the leader of the anti-Napoleonic faction; and through him communications were opened with the allies and the Bourbons. He dictated to the Senate the terms of Napoleon's deposition, and he became minister of foreign affairs under Louis XVIII. He negotiated the treaties by which the allies left France in possession of the boundaries of 1792, and in the Congress of Vienna he vindicated her right to be heard. He had not calculated on the Hundred Days, and offered no help to Louis; being taken back after the second restoration, he became, through pressure of the allies, prime-minister for a short time, but he was not a persona grata to the king, and was disliked by all parties in France. Under Louis XVIII and Charles X. he was little better than a discontented senator; but he was Louis-Philippe's chief adviser at the July revolution, went to London as ambassador, and reconciled the British ministry and court to France. He retired into private life in 1834, and died 17th May 1838. Talleyrand is a puzzle. That he was shamelessly corrupt, immoral, selfish, and mendacious is beyond doubt; nor was he a wise statesman in the true sense. But he was amazingly clever, infinitely dexterous, and an admirable judge of men; and in his tortuous diplomacy he generally sought his country's advantage as well as his own. The Talleyrand Memoirs, edited by the Duc de Broglie (1891; Eug.

trans. by Mrs A. Hall, 1891-92), are disappointing and by no means trustworthy. For his public career see the works of Mignet, Bastide, Louis Blanc, and Taine, the Lamartine, Guizot, and Rovigo Memoirs, Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer's Historical Characters, Puffin's Correspondence between Talleyrand and Louis XVIII. (trans. 1881), other Letters (1889-90), and monographs by Lady Blennerhasset (trans. from German, 1895), McCabe (1907), and Lohée (trans. 1912). Tallien, JEAN LAMBERT (1769-1820), French Revolutionist, born in Paris, made himself famous in 1791 by his Jacobin broadsheets, L'Ami des Citoyens. He was conspicuous in the attack on the Tuileries, had his share in the September massacres, was elected to the Convention, voted for the death of the king, was elected to the Committee of General Safety, and played a part in the downfall of the Girondists. On his mission to Bordeaux he quenched all opposition with the guillotine, and disgraced himself by shameful profligacy; but a passion for one of his victims, the Comtesse Thérèse de Fontenay (1775-1835), somewhat humanised him. He was recalled to Paris, yet in March 1794 was chosen president of the Convention. But Robespierre hated him, and Tallien, recognising his danger, rallied the enemies of the dictator, and headed the successful attack of 9th Thermidor. He helped to suppress the Revolutionary Tribunal and the Jacobin Club, and drew up the accusations against Carrier, Le Bon, and other Terrorists; but his importance ended with the Convention. He edited the Décade Égyptienne for Bonaparte at Cairo, on the voyage home he was captured by an English cruiser, and in England was made a hero of by the Whigs (1801). Consul at Alicante (1805), he lost an eye there by yellow fever, and died in Paris in poverty.

Tallis, THOMAS (c. 1515-85), 'the father of English cathedral music,' was organist of Waltham Abbey at the dissolution in 1540, when it is conjectured he became 'a gentleman of the Chapel Royal.' In Day's Psalter (1560) there are eight tunes by him, one of them that now used for Ken's Evening Hymn. The Cantiones (1575) contained eighteen motets by Byrd and sixteen by Tallis, who, one of the greatest contrapuntists of the English school, also wrote many anthems, responses, and Te Deums.

Talma, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH (1763-1826), tragedian, was born and died in Paris, and made his début in 1787. Hitherto actors had worn the garb of their own time and country; Talma made a point of accuracy in costume. He achieved his highest success in 1789 as Charles IX. in Chénier's play. See his Mémoires (ed. by A. Dumas, 1849-50).

Talmage, THOMAS DE WITT (1832-1902), born at Bound Brook, New Jersey, after holding three charges became in 1869 a Presbyterian pastor in Brooklyn. His sermons, published weekly and translated into many tongues, fill many volumes.

Tamerlane (i.e. TIMUR-I-LENG, 'Lame Timur') was born at Kesh, S. of Samarcand, in 1336, his father being a Mongol chief. In 1369 he seated himself on the throne of Samarcand. He subdued nearly all Persia, Georgia, and the Tartar empire, conquered (1398) all the states between the Indus and the lower Ganges, and returned to Samarcand with a fabulous booty. Having set out against the Turks of Asia Minor, he turned aside to win Damascus and Syria from the Mameluke sovereigns of Egypt. At length on the plains of Angora the Mongol and Turkish hosts met; and Sultan Bajazet was routed and taken prisoner. The conqueror died on the march towards China, 17th Feb. 1405. See Howorth's History of the Mongols (1876-88).

Tancred (1078-1112), son of the Palgrave Otho the Good, joined his cousin, Bohemund of Tarentum, Guiscard's son, in the first crusade, and distinguished himself in the sieges of Nicea, Antioch, and Jerusalem. His reward was the principality of Tiberias. For some time he ruled Bohemund's state of Antioch, and shortly before his death was invested with the principality of Edessa.

Tandy, JAMES NAPPER (1740-1803), born in Dublin, became a prosperous merchant there. A Presbyterian, he took an active part in corporation politics, and was the first secretary to the Dublin United Irishmen. In 1792 he challenged the Solicitor-general for his abusive language, and was proclaimed by the viceroy. For distributing a 'seditious' pamphlet against the Beresfords he was about to be tried in 1793, when the government learned that he had taken the oath of the Defenders. He fled to America, crossed to France in 1798, shared in the ill-fated invasion of Ireland, and at Hamburg was handed over to the English government. In Feb. 1800 he was acquitted at Dublin. Again put on trial (April 1801) at Lifford for the treasonable landing on Rutland Island, he was sentenced to death, but permitted to escape to France, and died at Bordeaux. See Madden's United Irishmen (1846).

Taney, ROGER BROOKE (1777-1864), born in Calvert county, Md., and admitted to the bar in 1799, was elected to the Maryland senate in 1816. He was an opponent of slavery as early as 1819. In 1824 he passed from the Federal to the Democratic party, and supported Andrew Jackson, who in 1831 made him attorney-general, and in 1833 secretary of the treasury. In 1836 the senate confirmed his appointment as chief-justice. His early decisions were strongly in favour of state sovereignty, but his most famous decision was in the Dred Scott case. See Memoir by Tyler (1872).

Tannahill, ROBERT, poet, was born at Paisley, the son of a hand-loom weaver, 3d June 1774, and composed many of his best songs to the music of his shuttle. In a few weeks of 1807 nine hundred copies of his Poems and Songs sold, the favourites, Gloomy Winter's noo awa, Jessie the Flower o' Dunblane, The Braes o' Gleniffer, Loudon's Bonnie Woods and Braes, and The Wood o' Craigielea. But when a publisher declined a revised edition the sensitive poet sank into despondency; and on 17th May 1810 his body was found in a canal near Paisley—he had doubtless committed suicide. See Life in Semple's edition of his poems (1876) and Brown's Paisley Poets (vol. i. 1889).

Tanner, CHARLES KEARNS DEANE, M.D. (1850-1901), Nationalist M.P. for Mid-Cork from 1885, and educated at Winchester and Queen's College, Cork. In 1895 he turned a Catholic.

Tanner, THOMAS (1674-1735), antiquary, born at Market Lavington vicarage, Wiltshire, became a fellow of All Souls, Oxford (1696), archdeacon of Norwich (1710), canon of Christ Church, Oxford (1723), and Bishop of St Asaph (1732). An enlarged edition of his Notitia Monastica (1695) appeared in 1744. Not less valuable is his biographical and bibliographical Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica (ed. Wilkins, 1748). His edition of Wood's Athene Oxonienses he had published in 1721.

Tantia Topee, Nana Sahib's Lieutenant in the Indian Mutiny, who, with the Rani of Jhansi, held the field after his chief had fled. He was captured 7th April 1859, and executed.

Tarlton, RICHARD, a famous comedian of Queen

Elizabeth's day, who died in 1589, and on whom was fathered a well-known jest-book.

Tarquinius, a royal line named after the Etruscan city of Tarquinii. LUCIUS TARQUINIUS PRISCUS is said to have reigned at Rome 616-578 B.C., to have modified the constitution, and to have begun the Servian agger and the Circus Maximus.—LUCIUS TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS (534-510), seventh and last king of Rome, extended his dominion more than any of his predecessors, and by establishing colonies founded Rome's greatness. But his tyranny, especially in the matter of Lucretia (q.v.), excited the discontent of both patricians and plebeians, and in consequence of a rising under his nephew, Brutus, he and all his family were banished.

Tartini, GIUSEPPE (1692-1770), Italian composer, born at Pirano in Istria, gave up the church and the law for music and fencing. Having secretly married the niece of the Archbishop of Padua, he fled to Assisi, but, after living in Venice, Ancona, and Prague, returned before 1728 to Padua. Tartini 'was one of the greatest violinists of all time, an eminent composer, and a scientific writer on musical physics.' His best-known work is the Trillo del Diavolo. [Tar-tee'nee.]

Tasman, ABEL JANSZON (c. 1602-59), Dutch navigator, in 1642 discovered Tasmania, having been despatched in quest of the 'Great South Land' by Antony Van Diemen (1593-1645), governor-general of Batavia. See Heeres' English edition of his Journal, 1642-44 (Amst. 1898).

Tassie, JAMES (1735-99), born at Pollokshaws, in 1766 settled in London, and reproduced over 18,000 of the most famous gems. He also executed many cameo portraits of his contemporaries, and the plaster reproductions of the Portland Vase.—His nephew and successor, WILLIAM TASSIE (1777-1860), won in 1805 the lottery for Boydell's Shakespeare Gallery. See Lives by J. M. Gray (1895).

Tasso, BERNARDO (1493-1569), poet and father of the great Torquato, was born at Venice of an illustrious family of Bergamo. His patron, the Duke of Salerno, fell in 1547 into disfavour with Charles V. and was outlawed, and the poet had to endure years of bitter poverty and exile. He was ultimately in the service of the Duke of Mantua. His Amadigi, an epic on Amadis of Gaul, is a melodious imitation of Ariosto's manner, but exaggerated in sentiment. He began another epic, Floridante (1587), finished by his son. Besides his numerous lyrics (1749) he left an interesting correspondence (1733-51). See Lettere di Bernardo Tasso (ed. Campori, 1869) and his Lettere inedite (ed. Portioli, 1871).

Tasso, TORQUATO, son of the preceding, was born at Sorrento, 11th March 1544, and shared his exiled father's wandering life, but in 1560 he was sent to study law and philosophy at Padua, where he published his first work, a romantic poem, Rinaldo. In the service of Cardinal Luigi d'Este he was introduced to the court of the Duke of Ferrara; and there, encouraged by the sisters of the duke, he began his great epic poem and masterpiece, La Gerusalemme Liberata. In 1571 he accompanied Cardinal d'Este to France, and on his return to Italy in 1572 became attached to the service of Duke Alfonso at Ferrara. For the court theatre he wrote his beautiful pastoral play, Aminta (1581). Tasso completed his great epic in 1575, and submitted it before publication to the critics of the day. Their fault-finding and Tasso's replies are recorded in his correspondence and in his Apologia. In 1576 he showed the first signs of mental disorder; he became suspicious and melancholy, and was oppressed by the idea that he had been denounced to the Inquisition. His first confinement lasted only a few days, and shortly afterwards he fled from Ferrara. Wandering through Italy, he made his way to Naples, to Rome, to Turin, where he was welcomed by the Duke of Savoy. His great longing was to return to Ferrara, and in 1579 he seized the occasion of Duke Alfonso's second marriage to present himself anew at court; but meeting with a cold reception, and wounded by some real or imagined slight, he broke into furious invectives against the duke, his courtiers, all the world. He was confined by order of the duke as insane (not, as is often alleged, for presumptuous love for the Princess Leonora) at Ferrara; and in his seven years' confinement produced many noble verses and philosophical dialogues and a vigorous defence of his Jerusalem, published without his leave and with many errors. The cruel contrast between his fate and the daily growing fame of his great poem had excited popular interest, and in July 1586 he was liberated on the intercession of Prince Vincenzo Gonzaga. He followed his new patron to Mantua, where he wrote his only tragedy, Torrismondo. Broken in health and spirits, he began again his restless wanderings, spending, however, most of these later years in Rome and Naples, helped and protected by many kind friends and patrons. He busied himself in rewriting his great epic, according to the modifications proposed by his numerous critics. The result, a poor simulacrum of his masterpiece, was published under the name Gerusalemme Conquistata (1593). Summoned to Rome by Pope Clement VIII. to be crowned on the Capitol as poet-laureate, he sickened on arrival, and died in the monastery of Sant' Onofrio on the Janiculum, 25th April 1595. Tasso is certainly the last Italian poet whose influence made itself felt throughout Europe. His Jerusalem, an idealised story of the first Crusade, is a typical product of his time, its blind idolatry of classic forms conflicting with newly-revived religious superstition. The earliest complete edition of it is that of Bonna (1581); a good modern one is Spagnotti's (Milan, 1895). The most famous English translation is that of Edward Fairfax (1600); others are by Bent, Broadhead, Robertson, Smith, Wiffen, and Sir J. K. James (1868; new ed. 1894). Italian biographies are by Serassi (1783; new ed. 1858), Cecchi (1877), and Ferrazzi Bassano (1880); and there are English ones by Black (1810), Dean Milman (1850), and Miss Hasell (1882). See also his own letters and prose writings (edited by Guasti, 1853-75).

Tate, NAHUM (1652-1715), son of a Dublin clergyman, was educated at Trinity College. He succeeded Shadwell as poet-laureate in 1690, and is described by Oldys as 'a free, good-natured, fuddling companion.' His writings include ten dramatic pieces, Panacea or a Poem on Tea, Miscellaneous Sacra, and the Innocent Epicure, or Art of Angling. But his name survives solely by Abraham and Achitophel (part ii.), and the metrical version of the Psalms (1696) done jointly with Nicholas Brady (q.v.), which gradually supplanted the older version of Sternhold (q.v.) and Hopkins.

Tate, SIR HENRY (1819-90), attained great wealth as a Liverpool sugar refiner, bestowed large sums on Liverpool University College and hospitals, gave the nation the 'Tate Gallery' of British art, and was made a baronet in 1898.

Tatian, a Christian apologist, by birth an Assyrian, studied Greek philosophy, wandered as a sophist round the Roman world, but about 150 A.D. at Rome was won to Christianity by Justin Martyr, in whose lifetime he wrote his Oratio ad Græcos (ed. by Schwartz, 1888), a glowing exposure of heathenism as compared with the new 'barbarian philosophy.' After Justin's death (166) Tatian fell into evil repute for heresies, and he retired to Mesopotamia, probably Edessa, writing treatise after treatise, all of which have perished. The notions of his which gave most offence were his excessive asceticism, his rejection of marriage and animal food, and certain Gnostic doctrines about a demiurge and the æons. He was assailed in turn by Irenæus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. He died, perhaps at Edessa, about 180. Of his writings one maintained a place of importance in the Syrian Church for two centuries. This was the Diatessaron, a kind of patchwork gospel freely constructed out of our four gospels (not a harmony in the modern sense), perhaps in Greek, perhaps in Syriac. See German works by Zahn, Sellin, Gebhardt, and Harnack; English ones by Prof. Hemphill (1888), Prof. Rendel Harris (1890), and J. H. Hill (1893).

Tatius, ACHILLES, Greek romancer, apparently of the 5th century A.D., who belonged to Alexandria. Suidas tells us that he became a Christian and a bishop after writing his romance of Leucippe and Cleitophon, but this is doubtful. His romance comes next to the Theagenes and Chariclea of Heliodorus in time, and perhaps in merit. The plot is sadly lacking in probability; there is wordy rhetoric about painting, sculpture, and natural history, and the delineation of character is feeble, though the Greek is elegant. It is printed in the Erotici Scriptores Græci and separately by F. Jacobs (1821). There is a French translation in Ch. Zévort's Romans Grecs (1856), and an English by the Rev. R. Smith (1855). See Dunlop's History of Fiction (ed. Wilson, 1888).

Tattam, HENRY, LL.D. (1788-1868), Syriac scholar, became Archdeacon of Bedford in 1845.

Tattersall, RICHARD (1724-95), born at Hurstwood, Lancashire, came early to London, entered the Duke of Kingston's service, became an auctioneer, and in 1776 took a lease of premises at Hyde Park Corner, which, having become a celebrated mart of high-class horses and a great racing centre, were transferred to Knightsbridge in 1867. See Memories of Hurstwood by Tattersall Wilkinson and J. F. Tattersall (1889).

Taubman-Goldie, SIR GEORGE DASHWOOD, son of Colonel Goldie Taubman, speaker of the House of Keys, was born in the Isle of Man, 20th May 1846, as a lieutenant R.E. travelled in Africa, and as founder and governor of the Royal Niger Company greatly extended English commerce and English influence. K.C.M.G. (1887), LL.D., and D.C.L., he was in 1905 made President of the Royal Geographical Society.

Tauchnitz, KARL CHRISTOPH TRAUOGOTT (1761-1836), born near Grünau, set up in 1796 a small printing business in Leipzig, to which he added publishing and typefounding. In 1809 he began his editions of the classics, whose elegance and cheapness carried them over the learned world. He introduced (1816) stereotyping into Germany.—His son, KARL CHRISTIAN PHIL. TAUCHNITZ (1798-1884), continued the business.—A nephew of the elder Tauchnitz, CHRISTIAN BERNHARD, BARON VON TAUCHNITZ (1816-95), also founded in 1837 a printing and publishing house in Leipzig. In 1841 he began his collection of 'British

Authors.' He was ennobled in 1860, and made a Saxon life-peer in 1877. [Tauchnitz.]

Tauler, JOHANN (c. 1300-61), German mystic, was born at Strasburg, and bred a Dominican. Driven from Strasburg by a feud between the city and his order, he settled at twenty-four at Basel, and associated with the devout 'Friends of God,' having before then been a disciple of Meister Eckhart (q.v.). His fame as a preacher spread far and wide, and he became the centre of the quickened religious life in the middle Rhine valley. He died at Strasburg. Sincere practical piety marks his Sermons. Following in the Footsteps of Christ is by some attributed to Tauler. See Life by Miss Winkworth (1857), and German books by Karl Schmidt (1841-75). Taunton, LORD. See LABOUCHERE.

Tauthphœus, BARONESS (1807-93), novelist, the daughter of James Montgomery of Seaview, co. Donegal, married in 1838 a Bavarian noble, and died at Munich. She wrote novels in English, mainly pictures of South German life, including The Initials (1850), Cyrilla (1853), Quits (1857), and At Odds (1863). [Towt-phœ'ous.]

Tavernier, JEAN BAPTISTE, BARON D'AUBONNE (1605-89), traveller, was born at Paris, the son of a Protestant engraver from Antwerp. He had seen most of Western Europe ere he undertook his first journey to the East (1631-33)—by Constantinople to Persia, thence by Aleppo and Malta to Italy. The second journey (1638-43) was across Syria to Ispahan, Agra, and Golconda; the third (1643-49), through Ispahan, much of Hindustan, Batavia, and Bantam, thence to Holland by the Cape; and the fourth (1651-55), fifth (1657-62), and sixth (1663-68) to many districts of Persia and India. Tavernier travelled as a dealer in precious stones. Louis XIV. gave him 'letters of nobility' in 1669, and next year he bought the barony of Aubonne near Geneva. In 1684 he started for Berlin to advise the Elector of Brandenburg in his projects for eastern trade. In 1689 he went to Russia, and died the same year at Moscow. His famous Six Voyages was published in 1676; the complementary Recueil in 1679. Editions of the Travels are of 1810 and 1882 (abridged). See Travels in India, trans. by Dr V. Ball (1890), and a French work by Joret (1886).

Taylor, JOHN JAMES (1797-1869), Unitarian divine, son of a minister in London, was ordained to Mosely Street Chapel at Manchester in 1821, and became professor of Ecclesiastical History in 1840 in Manchester New College. He removed with his college to London in 1853, becoming principal as well as professor, and was joint-minister with Dr Martineau 1858-60. Of his many books the chief were A Retrospect of the Religious Life of England (1845), Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty (1851), and The Fourth Gospel (1867). See his Letters (1872).

Taylor, ALFRED SWAINE, M.D., F.R.S. (1806-80), born at Northfleet, for forty-six years was professor of Medical Jurisprudence at Guy's Hospital. He wrote on poisons, &c.

Taylor, BAYARD, born in Chester county, Penn., Jan. 11, 1825, and apprenticed to a printer, wrote a volume of poems (1844), visited Europe, published Views Afoot (1846), and obtained a post on the New York Tribune. As its correspondent he made extensive travels in California and Mexico, up the Nile, in Asia Minor and Syria, across Asia to India, China, and Japan—recorded in El Dorado (1850), Central Africa and Land of the Saracens (1854), and Visit to India, China, and Japan (1855).

Later came Northern Travel (1858) and Greece and Russia (1859). In 1862-63 he was secretary of legation at St Petersburg; in 1878 became ambassador at Berlin, where he died 19th Dec. His poetical works include Rhymes of Travel (1848), Poems of the Orient (1854), Poems of Home and Travel (1855), The Poet's Journal (1862), The Masque of the Gods (1872), Lars (1873), The Prophet (1874), Home Pastorals (1875), Prince Deukalion (1878), and a translation of Faust (1870-71). Among his novels are Hannah Thurston (1863) and The Story of Kennet (1866). See his Life and Letters (1884).

Taylor, BROOK (1685-1731), mathematician, born at Edmouton, studied at St John's College, Cambridge, and in 1715 published his Methodus, the foundation of the Calculus of Finite Differences. Herein also is the formula called 'Taylor's Theorem.' In 1714-18 he was secretary to the Royal Society. His last years were given to philosophy and religion. Other works were Linear Perspective and Contemplatio Philosophica (with Life, 1793).

Taylor, SIR HENRY, poet, was born, the son of a gentleman-farmer, at Bishop-Middleham, in Durham, 18th October 1800, and, appointed in 1824 to a clerkship in the Colonial Office, laboured there for forty-eight years. D.C.L. (1862) and K.C.M.G. (1869), he died at Bournemouth, 27th March 1886. He wrote four tragedies, Isaac Comnenus (1827), Philip van Artevelde (his one great success, 1834), Edwin the Fair (1842), and St Clement's Eve (1862); and a romantic comedy, The Virgin Widow (1850), afterwards entitled A Sicilian Summer. In 1845 he published a volume of lyrical poetry, and in 1847 The Eve of the Conquest. His prose included The Statesman (1836), Notes from Life (1847), and Notes from Books (largely on Wordsworth, 1849). His Autobiography (1885), full of genial observation, contains pen-portraits of Wordsworth, Southey, Scott, Sydney Smith, Mill, Sir James Stephen, Spedding, Carlyle, Tennyson, and Aubrey de Vere. It was supplemented by his only less delightful Correspondence (1888), edited by Prof. Dowden. His collected works appeared in 1878.

Taylor, ISAAC, LL.D. (1787-1865), was born at Lavenham. His father, Isaac Taylor (1759-1829), was originally a London engraver, but became an Independent minister at Colchester and Ongar, and published a score of volumes. Charles Taylor (1756-1821), editor of Calmet's Bible Dictionary, was an uncle, and two sisters were Jane Taylor (1783-1824), author of the Contributions of Q. Q., and Ann Taylor (Mrs Gilbert of Nottingham, 1782-1866; Autobiography, 1871), joint-authors of Hymns for Infant Minds and Original Poems. After a course of study the second Isaac settled down to a literary life at Ongar. In 1818 a writer in the Eclectic Review, he lived to contribute to Good Words—a period of over forty years. His chief books were Natural History of Enthusiasm (1829), Natural History of Fanaticism (1833), Spiritual Despotism (1835), Physical Theory of Another Life (1836), and Ultimate Civilisation (1860).—His eldest son, ISAAC TAYLOR (1829-1901), born at Ongar, studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became in 1875 rector of Settrington, Yorkshire, and canon of York in 1885. His Words and Places (1864) made him known, whilst The Alphabet (1883) brought him a wide reputation. Other publications are The Family Pen, Memorials of the Taylor Family of Ongar (1867), Etruscan Researches (1874), Greeks and Goths (1879), Leaves from an Egyptian Note Book (1888), The Origin of the Argvans (1890), and Names and their Histories (1890).

Taylor, JEREMY, the third son of a Cambridge barber, baptised August 15, 1613, at thirteen entered Caius College, and became a fellow of All Souls, Oxford (1636), chaplain to Archbishop Laud, and in 1638 rector of Uppingham. His Episcopacy Asserted (1642) gained him his D.D. During the civil war Taylor is supposed to have accompanied the royal army as a chaplain. After the downfall of the cause he sought shelter in Wales, kept a school, and found a patron in the Earl of Carbery, then living at Golden Grove, Llandilo, immortalised in the title of Taylor's still popular manual of devotion (1655). During the last thirteen years (1647-60) of Taylor's enforced seclusion appeared all his great works, some of them the most enduring monuments of sacred eloquence in the English language. The first was The Liberty of Prophecy (1646), a noble and comprehensive plea for toleration and freedom of opinion. The Life of Christ, or the Great Exemplar (1650) is an arrangement of the facts in historical order, interspersed with prayers and discourses. The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living (1650) and The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying (1651) together form the choicest classic of English devotion. The fifty-two Sermons (1651-53), with the discourses in the Life of Christ and many passages in the Holy Living and Dying, contain the richest examples of their author's characteristically gorgeous eloquence. The more formal treatises were An Apology for Authorised and Set Forms of Liturgy (1646); Clerus Dominio (on the ministerial office, 1651); The Real Presence in the Blessed Sacrament (1654); Unum Necessarium (on repentance, 1655), which brought on him the charge of Pelagianism; The Worthy Communicant (1660); The Rite of Confirmation (1663); The Dissuasive from Popery (1664); and the famous Ductor Dubitantium (1660), the most learned and subtle of all his works, intended as a handbook of Christian casuistry and ethics. During the troubles Taylor was thrice imprisoned, once for the preface to the Golden Grove; the last time in the Tower for an 'idoltrous' print of Christ in the attitude of prayer in his Collection of Offices (1658). In 1658 he was given a lectureship at Lisburn in Ireland; at the Restoration was made Bishop of Down and Connor, as also next year of Dromore; and became vice-chancellor of Dublin University and a member of the Irish privy-council. In his first visitation (in spite of his Liberty of Prophecy!) he ejected thirty-six Presbyterian ministers, but neither severity nor gentleness could prevail to force a form of religion upon an unwilling people. His last years clouded by domestic sorrows, he died at Lisburn, 13th August 1667, and was buried in the cathedral of Dromore. He was above all things a preacher, and that especially of personal holiness. No poet ever excelled him in exquisite feeling for the sights and sounds of nature; he has no rival in lofty and impassioned prose save Milton. See Heber's edition of his works, with Life (1820-22; revised 1847-54), and Gosse's Life of him (1904).

Taylor, JOHN (1580-1654), the 'Water-poet,' born at Gloucester, became a Thames waterman, but, pressed into the navy, served at the siege of Cadiz. He went at the rebellion (1642) to Oxford to keep a public-house, gave it up for another in London, and here hawked his own doggerel poems, which yet are not destitute of natural humour and low, jingling wit. The chief event of his life was his journey afoot from London to Edinburgh (1618), described in his Pennine Pilgrimage (1618); similar books were his Travels in Germany (1617) and The Praise of Hempseed, a story of a voyage in a brown paper boat from London to Queenborough (1618). His Workes were published in folio in 1630; the best edition is the Spenser Society's (1868-78).

Taylor, JOHN EDWARD (1791-1844), founder in 1821 of the Liberal Manchester Guardian, was born at Ilminster, son of a Unitarian minister.

Taylor, NATHANIEL WILLIAM (1786-1858), born at New Milford, Conn., became in 1822 professor of Theology in Yale. His 'New Heaven theology,' long assailed as heretical, was a softening of the traditional Calvinism of New England, maintained the doctrine of natural ability, and denied total depravity; sin is a voluntary action of the sinner, but there is, derived from Adam, a bias to sin, which is not itself sinful. Porter edited his works in 1858-59.

Taylor, PHILIP MEADOWS, born at Liverpool, 25th Sept. 1808, held a mercantile post in Calcutta, but obtained a commission in the army of the Nizam of Hyderabad, whom he served from 1826 as a skilful, just, and kindly administrator. After the Mutiny the British government gave him charge of some of the ceded districts of the Deccan; in 1860 he came home a colonel, and was created a C.S.I. He died at Mentone, 13th May 1876. He has left vivid pictures of Indian history, life, and manners in his romances—Confessions of a Thug (1839; new ed. 1858), Tippoo Sultan (1840), Tara (1863), Ralph Darnell (1865), Seeta (1873), and A Noble Queen (1878). See his Story of my Life (1877; new ed. 1881).

Taylor, ROWLAND, born at Rothbury, became rector of Hadleigh (1544), archdeacon of Exeter (1551), and a canon of Rochester. Under Mary he was imprisoned over a twelvemonth as a heretic, and on 8th Feb. 1555 was burned near Hadleigh.

Taylor, THOMAS (1758-1835), 'the Platonist,' a Londoner bred at St Paul's School, entered Lubbock's bank as a clerk. He left his desk to teach private pupils and to become assistant-secretary to the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. During his last forty years he lived at Walworth, immersed in Plato and the Platonists, on £100 a-year from Mr Meredith, a retired tradesman. His fifty works include translations of the Orphic Hymns, parts of Plotinus, Proclus, Pansanias, Apuleius, Iamblichus, Porphyry, &c., Plato (nine of the Dialogues by Floyer Sydenham, 1804), and Aristotle (1806-12). The Spirit of All Religions (1790) expresses his strange polytheistic creed. See sketch by Axon (1890).

Taylor, TOM (1817-80), born at Sunderland, studied at Glasgow and Trinity College, Cambridge, came out third classic in 1840, and was elected a fellow. Professor for two years of English at University College, London, and called to the bar in 1845, he was secretary to the Board of Health 1850-72, and then to the Local Government Act Office. From 1846 he wrote or adapted over a hundred pieces for the stage, among them Our American Cousin, Still Waters Run Deep, The Ticket of Leave Man, and Twixt Axe and Crown. He edited the autobiographies of Haydon and Leslie, completed the latter's Life and Times of Reynolds, translated Ballads and Songs of Brittany (1865), and in 1874 became editor of Punch.

Taylor, WILLIAM (1765-1836), 'of Norwich,' son of a Unitarian merchant, entered his father's counting-house in 1779, and, sent next year to the Continent, mastered French, Italian, and German. The French Revolution indoctrinated him with democratic ideas and began the ruin of his father's business, and Taylor turned to literature. He introduced to English readers the poetry and drama of Germany, mainly through criticisms and translations, collected in his Historic Survey of German Poetry (1828-30). Another work was English Synonyms (1813). Borrow's Lavengro describes his scepticism and inveterate smoking; his correspondence with Southey, Scott, Godwin, &c. is in the Life by Robberds (1843). See, too, German monograph by Herzfeld (Halle, 1897).

Taylor, ZACHARY, born in Orange County, Va., 24th Sept. 1784, entered the army in 1808. In 1812 he held Fort Harrison on the Wabash against Indians, and in 1832 fought with Black Hawk. In 1836, now colonel, he was ordered to Florida, and in Dec. 1837 defeated the Seminoles at Okeechobee Swamp, and won the brevet of brigadier-general. In 1840 he was placed in command of the army in the south-west. When Texas was annexed in 1845 he gathered 4000 regulars at Corpus Christi in March 1846, marched to the Rio Grande, and erected Fort Brown opposite Matamoros. The Mexicans crossed the Rio Grande to drive him out. But the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma on 8th and 9th May repulsed them, and Taylor seized Matamoros. In September he captured Monterey. After seven weeks' vain waiting for reinforcements the march was resumed. Victoria was occupied on Dec. 29, but the line of communication was too long for the meagre force, while Polk's Democratic administration, fearing the rising fame of Taylor, who was a Whig, crippled him by withholding reinforcements. Taylor was falling back to Monterey when his regulars were taken from him to form part of a new expedition under General Scott. Santa Anna, the Mexican general, overtook his 5000 volunteers near the pass of Buena Vista; but Taylor, on 22d Feb. 1847, repulsed the 21,000 Mexicans with a loss thrice as great as his own. In 1848 the Whigs selected Taylor as their candidate for the presidency. He was elected in November and inaugurated next March. The struggle over the extension of slavery had begun. The Democratic congress opposed the admission of California as a free state, while the president favoured it. To avert the threatened danger to the Union Henry Clay introduced his famous compromise. Taylor remained firm and impartial, though his son-in-law, Jefferson Davis, headed the extreme pro-slavery faction. Before a decision was reached President Taylor died, 9th July 1850. See Lives by Frost (1848), Fry and Conrad (1848), and Gen. O. O. Howard (1892).

Tohaikovsky. See TSCHAIKOVSKY.

Tchernyshevsky, NIKOLAI GAVRILOVITCH (1828-89), born at Saratoff, was arrested in 1862 as an early propagator of Nihilism, and sent in 1864 to hard labour in Siberia. He died in Astrakhan. His works (4 vols. Vevey, 1868-70) include the novel, What's to be Done? written in prison.

Tecumseh (1768-1813), chief of the Shawnees, who headed the rising suppressed by Harrison in 1811, and passing into the English service, commanded the Indian allies in the war of 1812-13 as brigadier-general. He fell fighting at the Thames in Canada. See Life by Eggleston (1878).

Tegetthoff, WILHELM, BARON VON (1827-71), Austrian admiral, born at Marburg in Styria, with seven ironclads defeated twelve Italian ones off the island of Lissa, 20th July 1866—the first general engagement between ironclads.

Tegetmeier, WILLIAM B., an ornithologist who assisted Darwin, was born of German origin in 1816 at Colnbrook, S. Bucks, and bred for a doctor at University College, London.

Tegnér, ESAIAS, Swedish poet, born at Kyrkerud in Vermland, 13th Nov. 1782, the son of a pastor, graduated in 1802 at Lund University, and was appointed a lecturer. His stirring War-song for the Militia of Scania (1808) made his name known, and Svea (1811) made it famous. In 1812 he became professor of Greek. His best poems all belong to eight years—Song to the Sun (1817); Degree Day at Lund (1820); The Candidate for Confirmation (1820); Azel, a romance of the days of Charles XII. (1821); and his masterpiece, Frithiof's Saga (1825; trans. by G. Stephens, 1841). Bishop of Vexjö (1824), he died there, 2d Nov. 1846. See Life by Böttiger prefixed to his collected works (1847-51); also works by Brandes (Stockh. 1878), Kippenberg (Leip. 1884), and Christensen (3d ed. Leip. 1890).

Telford, THOMAS, engineer, was born, a shepherd's son, at Westerkirk, Langholm, 9th August 1757, at fourteen was apprenticed to a stonemason, in 1780 removed to Edinburgh, and in 1782 to London. In 1784 he got work at Portsmouth dockyard; in 1787 became surveyor of public works for Shropshire; and his two bridges over the Severn at Montford and Buildwas gained him the planning of the Ellesmere Canal (1793-1805). In 1801 he was commissioned by government to report on the public works required for Scotland; and he carried out the Caledonian Canal (1803-23), more than 1000 miles of road, and 1200 bridges, besides churches, manses, harbours, &c. Other works by him were the road from London to Holyhead, with Menai Suspension Bridge (1825), the Dean Bridge, Edinburgh (1832), and the St Katharine's Docks (1826-28) in London. He died at Westminster, 2d September 1834. See Life by himself (1838) and Smiles's Lives of the Engineers (vol. ii. 1861).

Tell, WILLIAM, of Burglen in Uri, reputed the saviour of his native district from the tyranny of Austria. Johannes von Müller tells at length, in his History of Switzerland (1786), how Albert II. of Austria strove to annex the Forest Cantons; how in 1307 his tyrannical steward Gessler compelled the Swiss to do reverence to the ducal hat erected on a pole in Altorf; how Tell, a famous marksman, was for non-compliance condemned to shoot an apple off his own son's head; and how afterwards Tell slew the tyrant, and so initiated the movement which secured the independence of Switzerland. Von Müller had no doubt of the truth of the story; but the tale of the 'master-shot' is found in Aryan, Samoyede, and Turkish folklore. Tell's very existence is disputed; his name first occurs in a ballad of 1470, and the full story in Tschudi's Swiss Chronicle (1572). Albert II. was a just, if severe, ruler; and Gessler's name is never once mentioned till 1513. See French work by Albert Rilliet (1868), and German ones by Kopp (1851), Meyer von Knonau (1873), and Rochholtz (1877).

Teller, WILHELM ABRAHAM (1734-1804), rationalist theologian, was born at Leipzig.

Tellez, GABRIEL (1572-1648), 'Tirso de Molina,' Spanish dramatist, born at Madrid, was prior of the monastery of Soria. His pieces are partly Comedias, partly Interludes and Autos Sacramentales (originally about 300), all displaying dramatic vitality, originality, wit, and power of character-painting. The best edition of his works is by Hartzensbush (1836-42). See monographs by Muñoz Peña (1889) and Cotarelo (1893).

Temple, FREDERICK, Primate, was born 30th November 1821, the son of an officer, at Santa Maura in the Ionian Islands, from Blundell's School, Tiverton, passed to Balliol College, Oxford, took a double-first in 1842, and became fellow and mathematical tutor. Successively principal 1848-55 of Kneller Hall Training College, inspector of schools, and head-master 1858-69 of Rugby, he wrote the first of the Essays and Reviews (1860), and in 1868-70 supported the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In 1869 he became Bishop of Exeter (a Broad Church successor to the High Church Dr Phillpotts), in 1885 of London, and in 1896 Archbishop of Canterbury; as such he next year officiated at the Diamond Jubilee and presided over the Lambeth Conference. His Sermons preached in Rugby Chapel appeared in 1861; he was Bampton lecturer in 1884; and he took an active part in temperance reform. He died 23d December 1902.

Temple, RICHARD GRENVILLE, EARL (1711-79), elder brother of George Grenville (q.v.), in 1752-61 held office under the elder Pitt, who had married his sister; bitterly opposed Bute; and broke with Pitt (Chatham) on the Stamp Act in 1766.

Temple, SIR RICHARD (1826-1902), born at Kempsey, Worcester, and educated at Rugby and Haileybury, entered the Bengal civil service in 1846, and was Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal 1874-77, Governor of Bombay 1877-80, and Conservative M.P. for the Evesham division 1885-92, for the Kingston division 1892-95. One of his nine works is an Autobiography (1896).

Temple, SIR WILLIAM, diplomatist and essay-writer, eldest son of Sir John Temple, was born in London in 1628. He studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, but at nineteen went abroad, after falling in love with Dorothy Osborne (1627-95). His father sat in the Long Parliament, while Sir Peter Osborne, a royalist, naturally disliked the match. But the lovers were constant in their affection, and their seven years of separation gave opportunity for Dorothy's delightful letters. Temple married her in 1655, lived in Ireland, was returned for Carlow to the Dublin parliament in 1660, was sent in 1665 on a mission to Germany, and then was created a baronet and appointed resident at Brussels. His great diplomatic success was the Triple Alliance (1668) of England, Holland, and Sweden against France. Temple also took part in the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle (1668), and was ambassador at the Hague—a post to which he returned (1674) after the war between England and Holland. In 1677 he helped to bring about the marriage of the Prince of Orange with the Princess Mary. He twice declined the offer of a secretaryship of state from Charles II., suggested the scheme of a reformed privy-council of thirty, and for a short while formed with Halifax, Essex, and Sunderland an inner council of four. But ere long he retired to his villa at Sheen (till 1686), thereafter to Moor Park in Surrey, where Swift was his secretary. At the Revolution he again refused the secretaryship. The rest of his days he gave to letters and gardening. His son, last survivor of seven children, was made secretary for war, but drowned himself. Temple published historical Memoirs (1691, 1709) and Miscellanea (1679, 1692), a collection of essays on government, trade, gardening, heroic virtue, poetry. The second part contains a famous essay 'Upon the Ancient and Modern Learning.' He died 27th January 1699. His collected works fill 4 vols. (1814), and he has been reputed one of the reformers of English style. See, besides older Lives by Boyer, Swift, and Temple's sister, Lady Giffard, the elaborate Memoirs by T. P. Courtenay (1836); Macaulay's brilliant essay thereon; and the 71 Letters of Dorothy Osborne, edited by E. A. Parry (1888; revised 1903).

Ten Brink. See BRINK.

Tencin, CLAUDINE ALEXANDRINE GUÉRIN DE (1681-1749), born at Grenoble, entered the religious life, but in 1714 came to Paris, where her wit and beauty attracted a crowd of lovers, among them the Regent and Cardinal Dubois. She had much political influence, enriched herself, and helped the fortunes of her brother, Cardinal Pierre Guérin de Tencin (1680-1758). But her importance died with the regent and the cardinal in 1723. In 1726 she lay a short time in the Bastille, after one of her lovers had shot himself in her house. Her later life was more decorous, and her salon one of the most popular in Paris. Fontenelle was one of her oldest lovers; D'Alembert one of her children. Her romances include Mémoires du Comte de Comminges (1735), Le Siège de Calais (1739), and Les Malheurs de l'Amour (1747). See her letters to her brother (1790) and the Duc de Richelieu (1806), and Barthélemy's Mémoires Secrets de Mme. de Tencin (1790). [Ten-saww.]

Teniers, DAVID, the Elder (1582-1649), Flemish master, was born and died at Antwerp. His subjects are in general homely, the interiors of public-houses, rustic games, weddings, and the like.—DAVID TENIERS, the Younger (1610-90), his son, rose quickly to distinction, enjoying the favour and friendship of the Austrian archduke, the Prince of Orange, and the Bishop of Ghent. In 1647 he took up his abode at Brussels. His seven hundred pictures possess, in superlative degree, the qualities that mark his father's work. None has realised more richly the charm of joyous open-air life. His scriptural subjects alone are unsatisfactory. [Flem. Ten-erss; Fr. Ten-e-ay.]

Ten'ison, THOMAS (1636-1715), Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, studied at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and was made Bishop of Lincoln by William III. in 1691, and primate of all England in 1694. He was a favourite at court, crowned Queen Anne and George I., and strongly supported the Hanoverian succession. His works comprise anti-papal tracts, sermons, and a criticism of Hobbes.

Tennant, WILLIAM (1784-1848), born at Anstruther, studied at St Andrews, and a lifelong cripple, became in 1813 schoolmaster in the neighbouring parish of Dunino. His humorous poem, Anster Fair (1812), was the first attempt to naturalise the Italian ottava rima—soon after adopted with splendid success by Hookham Frere and by Byron. He was teacher from 1819 at Dollar Academy, and from 1835 professor of Oriental Languages at St Andrews. Other poems were the Thane of Fife (1822) and Papistry Stormed (1827); dramas were Cardinal Beaton (1823) and John Bull (1825). See memoir by Conolly (1861).

Tennemann, WILHELM GOTTLIEB (1761-1819), professor at Marburg from 1804, wrote a Kantian Geschichte der Philosophie (1798-1819), and a shorter Manual of the History of Philosophy (1812; trans. 1852), long a text-book in Britain. [Ten'neh-mann.]

Tennent, SIR JAMES EMERSON (1804-69), born at Belfast, studied at Dublin, and after practising at the bar became M.P. for his native city in 1832. He first supported Earl Grey and then Peel, was secretary to the Indian Board, the government of Ceylon 1845-50, the Poor-law Board, and the Board of Trade 1852-67, when he was made a baronet. He wrote a great work on Ceylon (1859) and books of travel in Greece and Belgium.

Tenniel, SIR JOHN, caricaturist, was born in London in 1820, the son of a celebrated dancing-master. A self-trained artist, he was selected in 1845 to paint one of the frescoes—Dryden's 'St Cecilia'—in the Houses of Parliament. He is better known as a book-illustrator, and best as the cartoonist of Punch. He joined its staff in 1851, and year after year produced the political cartoons. His illustrations to Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking-glass (see DODGSON) are remarkable for their delicacy and finish; earlier book-illustrations were to Aesop's Fables, Moore's Lalla Rookh, the Ingoldsby Legends, Once a Week, &c. He was knighted in 1893.

Tennyson, ALFRED, LORD, was born 6th August 1809, at Somersby, Mid-Lincolnshire, the third of the rector's six sons, and was educated by his father and at Louth. His elder brothers were both poets—Frederick Tennyson (1807-98) and Charles Tennyson Turner (q.v.). The former lived in Italy and Jersey, turned a Swedenborgian and spiritualist, and wrote Days and Hours (1854), the Isles of Greece (1890), Daphne and other Poems (1891), and Poems of the Day and Year (1895). In 1826 Charles and Alfred published, anonymously, Poems by Two Brothers; and in February 1828 they joined Frederick at Trinity College, Cambridge, where amongst their friends were Spedding, J. M. Kemble, Trench, Monckton Milnes, Merivale, Alfred, Lushington, and Arthur Hallam. To this time belong The Lover's Tale (written 1827, published 1879) and Timbuctoo, the university prize poem of 1829. Alfred's Poems, chiefly Lyrical (1830) was followed by a similar small series in 1832: though readers of insight welcomed them, neither volume was warmly received by the critics. To the next nine years we owe many of his most lovely lyrics, published with the best of his earlier work in 1842. Henceforth his place was secure. The Princess; a Medley (1847) is a melodrama in blank verse, a jeu d'esprit on women's rights. November 1850 brought him the laureateship, in succession to Wordsworth; and in this year fell the anonymous publication of In Memoriam, that elegiac treasury in which the poet has stored the grief and the meditation of many years after Arthur Hallam's death; a series of lyrics which in pathos, melody, range of thought, and depth of feeling may stand with the Canzoniere of Petrarch and the Sonnets of Shakespeare. In June 1850 Tennyson married in Shiplake Church, Oxfordshire, a Lincolnshire lady, Emily Sarah Sellwood (1813-96), and settled at Twickenham. In 1853 they moved to Farringford at Freshwater in the Isle of Wight; in 1867-70 he also built from his own design a house, Aldworth, in Sussex, near Haslemere. Throughout life he made many short journeys—to the Pyrenees (1831, 1861), the Western Highlands, Staffa, and Iona (1853), Inverary (1858), Portugal (1859), Cornwall (1860), Derbyshire and Yorkshire (1862), Weimar and Dresden (1865), Dartmoor and Salcombe (1867), North Wales (1869), Suffolk (1876).

In Maud: a Monodrama (1855) Tennyson gave to the personal lyric its deepest and widest extension. He now took up seriously the old Celtic Arthurian legend already handled in 'The Lady of Shalott,' 'Sir Galahad,' and the supreme 'Morte d'Arthur'; and in 1859 appeared the first four of the twelve Idylls of the King, completed in 1870, 1872, 1885—his most important, perhaps his greatest work. The noble Dedication sets forth the main intention of the Idylls; they are a 'new-old' tale, 'shadowing Sense at war with Soul,' the individual conscience with its innate aim towards truth and purity, its temptations, falls, and conquests, its final victory, discovered only in the true life which follows our brief spell upon earth. In Enoch Arden and Aylmer's Field (1864), idylls or narrative poems, the poet's power had reached maturity; his art was perfect. He showed brilliant power to create character in the historical plays, Queen Mary (1875), Harold (1877), and Becket (1884), as in the less important dramas, The Cup (1881), founded on a Græco-Roman tale; The Falcon (1882); The Promise of May (1882); printed 1886, a modern domestic piece; The Foresters (1892), the poet's own version of the Robin Hood legend. His plays have generally been thought stronger in literary excellences than in truly dramatic qualities, though The Cup when acted met with a measure of success. Later volumes of idylls, lyrics, ballads (1880, 1885, 1886, 1889, 1890) show on the whole a more mature and certain art, a greatly wider range. History (mostly English, as the splendid Ballad of the Revenge); tales in dialect, that chiefly of Lincolnshire; a few beautiful classical pieces; narratives, idyllic and lyrical, of the profoundest pathos; poems treating great problems in religion and morality, philosophy and science—all are included. In January 1884 Tennyson was raised to the peerage as Baron Tennyson of Freshwater and Aldworth. He died 6th October 1892 at Aldworth, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Shortly before his death he had corrected the proofs of The Death of Ænone and other Poems, published a few weeks after. Lord Tennyson was succeeded in the peerage by his son Hallam (born 11th August 1852; governor of Australia 1902-4); his second son, Lionel, born 16th March 1854, died 20th April 1886.

The authoritative biography, prepared by the second Lord Tennyson, appeared in two volumes in the autumn of 1897. See also other books on Tennyson and his works by W. E. Wace (1881), Van Dyke (5th ed. 1896), E. C. Tainsh (1868; new ed. 1893), H. J. Roz (1912), besides essays and articles, mostly to be found in the bibliography appended to R. H. Shepherd's Tennysoniana (1866; new ed. 1879; bibliography separate, 1896). There is an analysis of In Memoriam by F. W. Robertson (1862); a Key to it by Dr Gatty (1881; 4th ed. 1891); a Concordance to Tennyson by Brightwell, for the works up to 1869; a Tennyson Handbook by Morton (1895), and a Tennyson Primer by Dixon (1896). Many of the poems have been translated; of Enoch Arden there are nine German versions, seven French, and two Dutch, besides Italian, Spanish, Danish, Hungarian, and Bohemian. See T. J. Wise's Bibliography (Athenæum, 1897).

Tenterden, CHARLES ABBOTT, BARON, born a barber's son at Canterbury, 7th October 1762, in 1785 became a fellow and tutor of Corpus, Oxford, was called to the bar in 1796, and soon had a large practice. In 1801 he became recorder of Oxford, in 1802 published Law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen, in 1816 accepted a puisne judgeship in the Court of Common Pleas, in 1818 was knighted and became Chief-justice of the King's Bench, and, raised to the peerage in 1827, strongly opposed the Catholic Relief and Reform Bills. He died 4th November 1832.

Terburg, or TER BORCH, GERARD (1608-81), painter, born at Zwolle, settled about 1654 at Deventer, where he became burgomaster. The life of his time, with its superfine manners and splendid costume, found in him a great exponent. See books by Miche (1888) and Hellens (1911).

Terence (PUBLIUS TERENTIUS AFER), Roman comic poet, born at Carthage about 185 B.C., became the slave of the Roman senator P. Terentius Lucanus, who brought him to Rome, educated him, and manumitted him. His first play was the Andria (166); its success introduced Terence to the most refined society of Rome. His chief patrons were Lælius and the younger Scipio. After spending some years in Rome he went to Greece, and died there in 159 B.C. We have six of his comedies—Andria, Eunuchus, Heauton Timoroumenos, Phormio, Hecyra, and Adelphi. Terence has no claim to creative originality, his plays, Greek in origin and Greek in scene, being directly based on Menander. But he wrote in singularly pure and perfect Latin. Notable editions are those of Bentley (1720), Parry (1857), Fleckeisen (1857), Wagner (Camb. 1869), Umpfenbach (1870), Dziatzko (1884), and Tyrrell (1903).

Teresa, or THERESA, ST, nobly born at Avila in Old Castile, March 28, 1515, in 1533 entered a Carmelite convent there. About 1555 her religious exercises reached an extraordinary height of asceticism, she was favoured with ecstasies, and the fame of her sanctity spread far and wide. She obtained permission from the Holy See to remove to a humble house in Avila, where she re-established (1562) the ancient Carmelite rule, with additional observances. In 1567 the general of the Carmelite order urged on her the duty of extending her reforms; in 1579 the Carmelites of the stricter observance were united into a distinct association; and within her own lifetime seventeen convents of women and sixteen of men accepted her reforms. She died Oct. 4, 1582, and was canonised in 1622. The most famous of her many works are her autobiography, The Way of Perfection, The Book of the Foundations (trans. by Dalton, 1853), and The Interior Castle (trans. by Dalton, 1852). Migne issued a French version of her works 1840-46, and there is a Spanish edition of 1861. English Lives are by Dalton (1851), Card. Manning (editor, 1864), Miss Trench (1875), Father Coleridge (3 vols. 1881-88), Mrs Cunningham-Graham (1894), and Dr A. Whyte (1897). See also Froude's Spanish Armada, &c. (1892).

Terriss, WILLIAM (1847-97), actor, was a barber's son, William Charles James Lewin, and came out at Birmingham in 1867. He was stabbed by a mad player, Prince. See Life by A. J. Smythe (1898).

Terry, EDWARD O'CONNOR, comedian, born in London, 10th March 1844, made his debut at Christchurch in 1863, and, after four years in the provinces, played in London 1867. He opened Terry's Theatre in 1887. He died in April 1912.

Terry, ELLEN (Alice, Mrs G. F. Watts, Mrs E. A. Wardell, Mrs James Carew), leading English actress, was born at Coventry, 27th Feb. 1848, a younger sister of Miss Kate Terry (Mrs Arthur Lewis), who, born in 1844, played 'Arthur' at Windsor Castle in 1852, took farewell of the stage as 'Juliet' in 1867, and returned to it in 1898. Miss Ellen Terry at eight played 'Mamilius' in The Winter's Tale; in 1863 she made her professional debut at the Haymarket. From 1864 (when she married) to 1874 she practically retired from the stage. In 1875 she made a great success as 'Portia' at the old Prince of Wales's Theatre, where she played also in Money, The Lady of Lyons, Masks and Faces, and Ours. In 1876 she joined the Court Theatre, where her chief character was 'Olivia' in Mr Wills's play. In Dec. 1878 she first appeared at the Lyceum in conjunction with Sir Henry Irving (q.v.), with whose brilliant successes her name is inseparably connected. See her autobiography, The Story of My Life (1908).

Tertullian. QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS TERTULLIANUS (c. 160-230 A.D.) was born at Carthage, and was liberally educated, so that he sometimes wrote in Greek. Converted to Christianity about 190, he received orders, and lived for some time at Rome. That he was married is shown by his two books Ad Uxorem, in which he argues against second marriages. Between 199 and 203 his opposition to worldliness in the church culminated in his becoming a leader of the Montanist sect. He had the heart of a Christian with the intellect of an advocate. His style is most vivid, vigorous, and concise, abounding in harsh and obscure expressions, abrupt turns, and impetuous transitions, with here and there bursts of glowing eloquence. He was the creator of ecclesiastical Latinity. Many of his sentences have become proverbial—e.g. 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church' and 'The unity of heretics is schism.' His works are divided into three classes: (1) Controversial writings against heathens and Jews, as in Apologeticus, Ad Nationes, Adversus Judæos; (2) against heretics, as in De Prescriptione Hæreticorum, Adversus Valentinianos, De Anima, De Carne Christi (against Docetism), De Resurrectione Carnis, Adversus Marcionem, Adversus Præsean; (3) practical and ascetic treatises, in which we can trace his increasing hostility to the church and his adoption of Montanist views. Hence the division of these treatises into Pre-Montanist and Montanist. To the former class belong De Baptismo, De Pœnitentia, Ad Martyres, De Spectaculis, De Idolatria, De Cultu Feminarum, De Oratione, De Patientia, and Ad Uxorem; to the latter, De Corona, De Fuga in Persecutione, De Monogamia, De Pudicitia, De Jejunio, and Adversus Psychicos; while De Virginibus Velandis marks the transition stage. Tertullian had a greater influence on the Latin Church than any theologian between Paul and Augustine. His Montanism, indeed, prevented its direct exercise, but Cyprian was the interpreter who gave currency to his views. There are editions by Oehler (1853-55) and in the Vienna Corpus Script. Ecclesiast. Lat. (part 1. 1890); and the translations of nearly all Tertullian's works in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library. See German works by Hauck (1877), Bonwetsch (1878), and Nöldechen (1888), and Van der Vliet's Tertullianus (1891).

Tesla, NIKOLA, born in 1857 at Smiljan in Croatia, the son of an Orthodox priest, studied at Graz and Paris, and in 1885 entered the Edison Works at Menlo Park, but left them to work out his own numerous inventions in electricity, electrical oscillations, incandescent lighting, &c. See Review of Reviews, December 1901.

Tetzels, JOHN (c. 1455-1519), born at Leipzig, in 1489 entered the Dominican order. A famous preacher, he was appointed in 1516 to preach an indulgence in favour of contributors to the building-fund of St Peter's at Rome. In opposition to him Luther (q.v.) published his theses. See (hostile) Lives by Hofmann (1844) and Korner (1880), and from the Catholic standpoint by Gröne (2d ed. 1860) and Hermann (2d ed. 1885).

Tewfik Pasha, MOHAMMED (1852-92), Khedive of Egypt, eldest son of Ismail Pasha, succeeded on his abdication in 1879. The chief events of his reign were Arabi's insurrection, the British intervention, the war with the Mahdi, the pacification of the Soudan frontiers, and the improvement of Egypt under English administration. He was succeeded by his son Abbas Hilmi (q.v.).

Thackeray, WILLIAM MAKEPEACE, was born at Calcutta, 18th July 1811. His grandfather, also a William Makepeace Thackeray, was the son of Archdeacon Thackeray (head-master of Harrow 1746-60), and in 1777 retired with a fortune from the East India Company's service. Richmond, his fourth son, also served the Company, and married another civilian's daughter, Anne Becher, a Calcutta beauty. When the future novelist was five years old his father died; and soon after his mother (who lived to survive her son) married Major Carmichael Smyth of the Bengal Engineers. The boy was sent home, and in 1822 entered the Charterhouse, where he remained six years. He went to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1829, but left after two years without taking his degree. It was at Cambridge that Thackeray first appeared in print, in a burlesque of Tompion's prize poem, Timbuctoo. On leaving Cambridge Thackeray visited Weimar and Rome, and, having lost most of his little patrimony, renounced the bar for the more immediately remunerative pursuit of literature. Early in 1833 he became a regular contributor to, and erelong editor and proprietor of, the National Standard, a weekly journal which came to an end in a year. Art, not literature, was Thackeray's real ambition at that time, and he went to Paris to study painting seriously. But money was wanted, and it could always be earned by the pen. In 1835 he made his famous application to illustrate Pickwick; in 1836 he married Isabella Shave (1818-94), the dowryless daughter of an Indian colonel. Six months later the failure of the Constitutional, the property of a company of which Thackeray's stepfather was chairman, carried with it the rest of his fortune. He moved to London in 1837, and work was abundant, the future promising; he was writing regularly in the Times, New Monthly, Fraser's Magazine, and Cruikshank's Comic Almanac. His eldest daughter was born in 1837; in 1838 a second, who died in infancy; and in 1840 a third, Mrs Leslie Stephen, who died in 1875. The illness which followed the birth of the third daughter affected Mrs Thackeray's mind, and she never recovered. This misfortune broke up the home, and the children were sent to Paris to their grandmother.

In 1840 appeared Thackeray's first book, The Paris Sketch-book, a series of reprints, followed in 1841 by the Comic Tales and Sketches, which included the Yellowplush Papers, Major Gahagan, and the Bedford Row Conspiracy. These publications were a failure. In the same year the Hoggarty Diamond and the Shabby Genteel Story appeared in Fraser, followed by Barry Lyndon and Men's Wives. In 1843 and 1846 appeared respectively the Irish Sketch-book and Cornhill to Cairo. The magazines, and more especially Punch, whose staff he joined in 1842, enabled him in 1846 to set up house again; and he brought his children over from Paris. The publication of Vanity Fair began, in monthly numbers, in 1847, at which time he was also bringing out the Snob Papers in Punch. Vanity Fair was not at first a success, but towards the end of the year luck changed, and by the time the novel was finished (July 1848) it had made the author's reputation.

It was followed in November by the first instalment of Pendennis, and that by Esmond (1852). Thackeray then sailed for America with his lectures on the 'Humorists,' which he had already delivered with great success in London. On his return in 1853 The Newcomes began to appear; and on its conclusion in 1855, after the publication of The Rose and the Ring, Thackeray again lectured in America on the 'Four Georges.' In 1857 he failed to get into parliament, standing for Oxford as a Radical. During this year and the next the Virginians came out. On 1st January 1860 the Cornhill Magazine made its appearance, with Thackeray as editor; to it he contributed Lovel the Widower and Phillip, and the Roundabout Papers, the desultory form of which showed his powers at their best. In 1862 he gave up the editorship of the Cornhill. Denis Duval, begun there, promised to be as great as anything he had done; but his health had been broken by a fever caught in Rome eight years before, and he was found dead in his bed on the morning of Christmas Eve, 1863. He is buried at Kensal Green. As a novelist Thackeray is unsurpassed in style, in his power of description and of character-drawing, and in the crowning gift of telling a story. His ideal of the novel was, like Fielding's, that it should be a prose epic. So much of his humour is tinged with irony that readers sometimes fail to observe what sources of natural laughter are in his books. Some say he attacks the very essence of human society and turns to ridicule its most useful and ornamental members. Others assert that what Thackeray calls 'snobishness' is neither an essential nor a necessary part of human nature. But if one turns from what Thackeray ridiculed to what he admired, it must be admitted that for a satirist his views of life are strangely sentimental. See the brief Life by Merivale and Marzials (1891); others by Hanway (1864), Taylor (1864), Trollope (1879), Melville (1899), and Whibley (1903); his Letters to an American Family (1904); Eyre Crowe, With Thackeray in America (1893) and Thackeray's Homes and Homes (1897); Sir W. Hunter, The Thackerays in India (1897); for specimens of Thackeray's drawings, The Orphan of Pimlico (1875); and the charming introductions by his daughter to the Biographical Edition of his works (13 vols. 1898-99).

His eldest daughter, ANNE ISABELLA, novelist, better known as 'Miss Thackeray' than by her married name, was born in 1837, and first appeared as an author in vol. i. of the Cornhill (1860) with 'Little Scholars.' To this sketch succeeded a dozen or more volumes of novels, tales, biographical essays, &c., of which may be mentioned The Story of Elizabeth (1863), The Village on the Cliff (1867), Old Kensington (1873), Miss Angel (1875, its heroine Angelica Kaufmann), Mrs Dymond (1885), Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, and Browning (1892), Lord Tennyson and his Friends (1893), Chapters from some Memoirs (1895), and her dainty modern recasts of such old-world stories as 'Bluebeard' and 'Cinderella.' In 1877 she married her cousin, Mr Richmond Thackeray Willoughby Ritchie, who was knighted in 1907, so that 'Miss Thackeray' became Lady Ritchie.

Thackwell, SIR JOSEPH, G.C.B. (1781-1859), born at Morton Court, Worcestershire, lost his left arm at Waterloo, and from 1838 served with high distinction against the Afghans and Sikhs. — His son, LIEUT. OSBERT D'ARBITOL THACKWELL (1837-58), was murdered at Lucknow.

Thais, an Athenian courtesan, famous for wit and beauty, who, according to a doubtful legend, induced Alexander the Great, when flushed with wine, to fire Persepolis. After his death she had several children by Ptolemy Lagi.

Thalberg, SIGISMUND (1812-71), pianist, was born at Geneva, the natural son of a prince, and studied music at Vienna. He made tours from 1830 through Belgium, Holland, England, Russia, Spain, Brazil, and North America, settling near Naples in 1858. His compositions comprise fantasias and variations; the operas Cristina and Florinda were failures. [Tal'baire.]

Thales, founder of the Ionic or physical school of Greek philosophy, and one of the Seven Wise Men, flourished at Miletus in Asia Minor towards the close of the 7th century B.C. According to him the original principle of all things is water, from which everything proceeds, and into which everything is resolved. [Thay-leez.]

Thebaw, born in 1858, succeeded as king of Burma in 1878, but in 1885 was deposed by the English, and sent a prisoner to India.

Theod, WILLIAM (1804-91), sculptor, was born at Trentham, the son of the sculptor William Theod, R.A. (1764-1817). He executed the Africa group on the Albert Memorial.

Thellusson, PETER, born in Paris, June 27, 1737, the Genevan ambassador's son, became a London merchant in 1762, and died July 27, 1797. After bequeathing fortunes to his family, he left the residue (estates worth £4500 a-year and £600,000 of personal property) to trustees, to accumulate during the lives of his three sons and of all their sons. The accumulated fund (expected to be some £19,000,000) was then to be used to purchase estates for the eldest lineal descendant of his three sons. The will was contested by the heirs at law, but affirmed in the House of Lords in 1805; though the Thellusson Act (1800) henceforth restrained testators from devising their property for accumulation for more than twenty-one years. Thellusson's last grandson died in 1856; and there was then a lawsuit as to whether the property should go to the eldest male descendant of Thellusson or to the eldest male descendant of Thellusson's eldest son. To the latter (Lord Rendlesham) it was adjudged by the House of Lords (1859); but, by reason of the heavy expenses, the sum inherited did not much exceed the original bequest. [Tel'us-son.]

Thelwall, JOHN (1764-1834), born in London, was tailor's apprentice, law student, man of letters, and Radical. See Life by C. Cestre (1906).

Themistocles (c. 525-459 B.C.), Athenian general and statesman, as archon in 493 convinced his countrymen that a powerful fleet was necessary for their welfare. Against the Persians he commanded the Athenian squadron (200 of the 324 Greek vessels), but agreed to serve under the Spartan Eurybiadas; on the eve of Salamis (480) it required all his energy to induce his timid superior to await the attack of the enemy. In his eagerness to precipitate a collision he sent a messenger to urge the Persian generals to make an immediate attack, as the Greeks had resolved on retreat. After the victory the Peloponnesians refused to continue the pursuit beyond Andros. Thence Themistocles sent a second message to Xerxes urging him to hasten back to Asia before the Greeks carried out their project of breaking down the bridge over the Hellespont. The victor of Salamis was now the foremost name in the mouths of men. The rebuilding of the walls of Athens by his advice on a vastly larger scale aroused uneasiness at Sparta, but Themistocles cajoled the ephors till the walls were high. But the Spartan faction in Athens was plotting his ruin, and in 470 he was ostracised. Argos was his first retreat, but the Spartans secured his expulsion (467), and he fled to Corcyra and thence to Asia. Artaxerxes received him with great favour, and listened to his schemes for the subjugation of Greece; and at Magnesia he lived securely till his death. His patriotism seems at times to have been but a larger kind of selfishness, but he was convinced that no one could realise the dream of a great Athenian empire but himself.

Thénard, Louis Jacques (1777-1857), chemist, humbly born at Louptière, Nogent-sur-Seine, in 1825 was made a baron. He discovered peroxide of hydrogen and investigated compound ethers.

Theobald, Lewis (1688-1744), early Shakespearean critic, born at Sittingbourne, was bred an attorney, but took to literature, publishing Electra (1714), followed by twenty equally forgotten dramas. He published thirty papers in Mist's Journal (1715), and started the Censor, a tri-weekly paper. His pamphlet, Shakspeare Restored, directed against Pope's edition (1726), Pope repaid by immortalising him as the original hero of the Dunciad. But Theobald's edition of Shakespeare (1733) extinguished that of his rival. See Churton Collins's Essays and Studies (1895). [Tib'ald.]

Theocritus, the pastoral poet of Greece, was born about 300 B.C. at Syracuse, was brought up in Cos, and lived for a long time at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus in Alexandria. In his pastoral poems he struck out an entirely new form of literature, which is for ever fresh. There is some question as to the authenticity of the thirty poems of his which we have. They fall under three classes—half-epic, mimic, and idyllic. Probably the half-epic poems were the earliest. He wrote a series of poems dealing with heroic legend, especially that of Hercules. Some of the poems are dramatic scenes. Theocritus's famous 15th Idyll, The Ladies of Syracuse, said to be copied from Sophron, describes delightfully the visit of a Syracusan lady and her friend, both living in Alexandria, to the festival of Adonis. Theocritus raised the rude pastoral poetry of the Doric race in Sicily into a new and perfect form of literature. His short poems dealing with pastoral subjects, and representing a single scene, came to be called Idylls (eidullia) or 'little pictures.' His countrymen are genuine country-folks, and show that combination of simplicity and love of nature with shrewdness in making a bargain which is found in the peasant everywhere. Every touch in these poems is natural and life-like. The power of Theocritus is seen in his influence over other poets. Virgil imitates him closely in his Eclogues; Tennyson was deeply influenced by him. There are editions by Valckenaer (1810), Wüstemann (1830), Meineke (1856), Paley (2d ed. 1869), Wordsworth (2d ed. 1877), and Fritzsche (3d ed. 1881); and verse translations by Chapman (1866), Calverley (1869), and Hallard (1894). Idylls 7 and 11 are exquisitely translated by Leigh Hunt (Jar of Honey). See also the prose translation by A. Lang (1889), with introduction.

Theodora, Byzantine empress, had, according to Procopius, already been actress, dancer, and shameless harlot when she won the heart of the austere and ambitious Justinian, to become in succession his mistress, his wife, and the sharer of his throne (527). Never thereafter did the breath of scandal touch her name; she was Justinian's trustiest counsellor, bore a chief share in the work of government, and saved the throne by her high courage at the crisis of the Nika riots (532). She lavished her bounty on the poor, especially the unfortunate of her own sex, and died at forty (548), worn out by the cares of state. Her character descended to history unspotted until the appearance (1623) of the Secret History of Procopius (q. v.), who in the full favour of the court had in his other writings extolled Justinian and Theodora. There is not a word of her profligacy in Evagrius or Zonaras. See French works by Débidour (1885) and Hous-saye (1890), Mallet in Eng. Hist. Rev. (vol. ii. 1887), and Bury's Later Roman Empire (1889).

Theodore of Mopsuestia (c. 350-429), born at Antioch, became first a monk, then a deacon there, and in 393 Bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia. He wrote commentaries on almost all the books of Scripture, of which only remain, in the Greek, that on the Minor Prophets; in Latin translations, those on the Epistles of Paul (ed. by Swete, Camb. 1880-82), besides many fragments. As an exegete he eschews the allegorical method, adopts the literal meaning, considers the historical circumstances, and assumes varying degrees of inspiration. When the Nestorian controversy broke out his polemical writings were attacked, and were condemned by Justinian (544). The fifth œcumenical council (553) confirmed the emperor's condemnation. See German work by Kihn (1880).

Theodore I. was pope 642-649; and THEODORE II. for three weeks in 897.

Theodore, a monk of Tarsus, sent by Pope Vitalian to be Archbishop of Canterbury in 668, established a Greek school there, and died in 690.

Theodore, 'king of Corsica,' otherwise Baron Theodore de Neuhoff (1686-1756), son of a Westphalian noble, was born at Metz, was successively in the French, Swedish, and Spanish service, was ruined in Law's speculations, and after leading an adventurer's life settled at Florence in 1732. As representative of the Emperor Charles VI. he headed a Corsican rising against the Genoese, and, landing in 1736 with support from Turkey and the Bey of Tunis, was crowned Theodore I. He was in a few months driven to flight, as on a second attempt in 1738, and on a third in 1743. After many wanderings he settled in London in 1749. Imprisoned by his creditors, he was liberated by a subscription supported by Horace Walpole. In Spain he had married an Irish lady, daughter of the Earl of Kilmallock. His only son by her, known as Colonel Frederick (c. 1725-97), wrote a book on Corsica, and shot himself in the porch of Westminster Abbey. See Percy Fitzgerald's King Theodore of Corsica (1890).

Theodore, or KASSAB (1816-67), king of Abyssinia, nephew of the governor of Kuara, in 1853 crushed the vice-regent Ras Ali, and, in 1855 overthrowing the prince of Tigré, had himself crowned as Negus of Abyssinia. At first he was guided by two Englishmen, Plowden and Bell; but after they were killed in a rebellion (1860) his rule became tyrannical. He had made several vain attempts to procure the alliance of England and France against his Mohammedan neighbours, and he now began to entertain hatred towards Europeans. A letter sent to Queen Victoria in 1862 went somehow unnoticed, and a fancied slight was also received from Napoleon III. Thereupon Theodore imprisoned the consuls along with other Europeans. The British government in 1864 sent envoys to treat for the release of the prisoners. The negotiations failed, and the envoys also were imprisoned. A British military expedition (16,000 under General (afterwards Lord) Napier landed in Abyssinia in the spring of 1867, and on 9th April reached Magdala. On the 10th an Abyssinian attack was repulsed. Theodore sued for peace and released the prisoners, but, as he declined to surrender, the fort was stormed on the 13th. It was then found that Theodore had shot himself. The expedition cost us nearly nine millions sterling. See Nöldeke's Studies from Eastern History (trans. 1892).

Theodoret (c. 390-457), church historian, born at Antioch, entered a monastery, and in 423 became Bishop of Cyrus, a city of Syria. As a foremost representative of the school of Antioch he became deeply involved in the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, and was deposed by the 'Robber Council' of Ephesus in 449. He was restored by the general Council of Chalcedon in 451. His works (edited by Schulze and Nösselt, 1769-74) consist of commentaries on Canticles, the Prophets, Psalms, and St Paul's Epistles; a History of the Church, from 325 to 429 A.D.; Religious History, being the lives of the so-called Fathers of the Desert; the Erasmistes, a dialogue against Eutychianism; A Concise History of Heresies, together with orations and nearly 200 letters. See works by Binder (French, 1844), Specht (German, 1871), Roos (Latin, 1883), Bertram (Lat. 1883), and Gildenpenning (Ger. 1889).

Theodoric, or THEODÉRIC (455-526 A.D.), surnamed THE GREAT, was the founder of the Ostrogothic monarchy. Shortly before he became king (474) the Ostrogoths had overrun Macedonia. After fourteen years of petty warfare, sometimes as the ally, sometimes as the enemy, of the Romans, Theodoric obtained from the Emperor Zeno permission to wrest Italy from Odoacer (q.v.). With 250,000 Ostrogoths he completed the conquest after a five years' war, and Odoacer was soon after murdered by Theodoric's own hand. The thirty-three years' reign of Theodoric secured for Italy a tranquillity and prosperity such as it had not enjoyed for centuries. The Goths and the Romans continued distinct nations, each judged by its own tribunals and laws. Christians and Jews enjoyed full liberty of worship, and protection from all encroachment on their civil rights. The official letters of Theodoric show his unwearied energy and enlightened zeal for his subjects' welfare. In the last three years of his life his fame was tarnished by the judicial murders of Boethius and Symmachus, and by acts of oppression against the church. To the Germans he is Dietrich von Bern, and one of the great heroes of legend, figuring in the Nibelungenlied. See Hodgkin, Theodoric the Goth (1891).

Theodosius THE ELDER, a Roman general, by birth a Spaniard, was sent to Britain in 367 A.D. to repel the inroads of the Caledonians. Having done so, he formed the country between Hadrian's Wall and the Forth and Clyde into a province, called Valentia in honour of the reigning emperors. After a victorious campaign on the Upper Danube he quelled a revolt in Africa, but was executed at Carthage in 376 on some probably baseless charge.

Theodosius I., THE GREAT (c. 346-395), son of Theodosius the Elder, was born at Cauca in north-west Spain, won fame by his exploits in Mœsia, but retiring, on his father's death, to his native fairn, was summoned thence by Gratian to become his colleague and emperor in the East (379). It was a critical time. The Goths, flushed with victory, were roaming the country at will. Theodosius made Thessalonica his headquarters, and within four years broke up the vast Gothic army, attached many of its members as allies, and restored tranquillity south of the Danube. A serious illness in 380 led to his baptism as a Trinitarian and to edicts against Arianism. He summoned the second general council (at Constantinople, 381). The murder of Gratian at Lyons, the advance towards Italy of Maximus, proclaimed emperor in Britain, and the arrival of Valentinian II. begging for help led to Theodosius's victory at Aquileia (388) and to the restoration of his youthful colleague. For some years Theodosius lived at Milan in friendship with St Ambrose. He had cancelled the severe measures meted out to Antioch after a riot (387); but in 390, when the governor of Thessalonica was lynched by a circus mob, Theodosius invited the citizens into the circus, and had 7000 of them massacred. Ambrose wrote upbraiding him with the deed, and even withstood his attempt to enter the church at Milan until after eight months' retirement and public penance. In 392 Valentinian II. was murdered, and in 394 Theodosius marched against the Franks and their puppet emperor Eugenius. After a stubborn fight he gained a complete victory, and for four months ruled as sole Roman emperor. He died in Ambrose's arms. See German Life by Gildenpenning and Ifland (1878).—His grandson, THEODOSIUS II. (401-450), succeeded his father Arcadius in 408 as Eastern emperor. He let things be managed by his sister Pulcheria and his empress Eudocia.

Theodosius of TRIPOLIS, a Greek mathematician and astronomer, born in Bithynia in the 1st or 2d century B.C.

Theognis, elegiac poet, was a Dorian noble of Megara, who flourished after 550 B.C. During the confusion which followed the overthrow of the tyrant Theagenes, he was driven from Megara, and visited Eubœa and Sicily. Under his name survive 1389 elegiac verses, social, political, and gnomic, showing shrewd sense and oligarchical principles—perhaps only partly his. See E. Harrison's Studies in Theognis (1903).

Theophilus, a legendary coadjutor-bishop of Adana in Cilicia, who sold himself to the devil, but was redeemed by the Virgin. See monograph by Dasent (1845).

Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch 169-177, wrote an important Apology of Christianity.

Theophrastus (c. 372-286 B.C.), naturalist and philosopher, born at Eresus in Lesbos, repaired to Athens, where he heard Plato and Aristotle; of the latter he became the intimate friend and successor. He inherited the whole Aristotelian library, including the philosopher's manuscripts. As head of the Peripatetic school he displayed great versatility, was the reputed author of 227 works, and was long a paramount authority. His writings are in great part lost; but we still possess his books on plants, on stones, on fire, and on winds and weather-signs—the last Englished and edited by Wood and Symons (1894). His Characters (ed. by Jebb, 1878; new ed. 1909) is a masterly delineation of moral types, which, however, some scholars deem a later compilation from a more discursive original of Theophrastus.

Theophylact, born at Eurius in Eubœa, became Archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria in 1078, and died after 1107. He wrote Bible commentaries, printed in Venice (1754-58).

Thespis, the reputed founder at Athens (c. 534 B.C.) of Greek dramatic representation.

Theuriet, ANDRÉ (1833-1907), born at Marly-le-Roi, Seine-et-Oise, received in 1857 a post under the Finance minister. That same year he published a striking poem in the Revue des Deux Mondes, followed by Le Chemin des Bois (1867), the so-called epic Les Paysans de l'Argonne, 1792 (1871), and Le Bleu et le Noir (1872). But he is best known by his novels—Mademoiselle Guignon (1874), Le Mariage de Gérard (1875), Raymonde (1877), Le Fils Maugars (1879), Tante Aurélie (1884), Deux Sœurs (1889), Nos Enfants (1892), La Chanoinesse (1893), &c. In 1897 he became an Académicien. See study by Besson (1890). [Tehr-i-eh'.]

Thevenot, JEAN DE (1633-77), born in Paris, travelled over Europe, the Levant, Mesopotamia, and India, and died on his way to Tabriz.

Thibaut, ANTON FRIEDRICH JUSTUS (1772-1840), born at Hameln, was professor of Civil Law at Kiel, Jena, and (1806) Heidelberg. His chief work is System des Pandektenrechts (1803; 9th ed. 1846). [Tee-bō.]

Thicknesse, PHILIP (1719-92), lieutenant-governor of Landguard Fort 1753-66, wrote Travels in France, Spain, &c., and curious Memoirs.

Thierry, AUGUSTIN, historian, born at Blois, 10th May 1795, joined the Paris Liberals in 1814, and published De la Réorganisation de la Société Européenne, inspired by Saint-Simon, whose secretary Thierry became. In 1817, however, they disagreed, and Thierry attached himself to Comte. In 1825 he published his masterpiece, the Norman Conquest of England, followed in 1827 by Lettres sur l'Histoire de France. In 1835 he became librarian at the Palais Royal, and published his Dix Ans d'Études Historiques. His last work was on the Tiers État (1853). He died 22d May 1856. He may be called the father of romantic history. See monograph by Aubineau (2d ed. 1879).—A younger brother, AMÉDÉE SIMON DOMINIQUE THIERRY (1797-1873), was likewise a Liberal and a historian, his chief works histories of Gaul and of Attila. [Te-air'-ree.]

Thiers, LOUIS ADOLPHE, born at Marseilles, April 16, 1797, was sent in 1815 to study law at Aix, where he made the acquaintance of Mignet, and cultivated literature rather than the law. At twenty-three he was called to the bar; and though his squat figure and plain face were not recommendations to Parisian society, his articles in the Liberal Constitutionnel gained him the entry to the most influential salons of the Opposition. Meanwhile he was rapidly preparing his Histoire de la Révolution Française (10 vols. 1823-27), which, though untrustworthy and inaccurate, gave him a prominent place among politicians and men of letters. In January 1830, along with Carrel and Mignet, he started the National, and waged relentless war on the Polignac administration. Its attempted suppression brought about the July Revolution; and Thiers entered on an active career as a politician. He was elected deputy for Aix, was appointed secretary-general to the minister of Finance, and became one of the most formidable of parliamentary speakers. Radical though he was as compared with Guizot, he in 1832 became minister of the Interior, and of Commerce and Public Affairs, and then Foreign Minister; his 'spirited foreign policy' is now seen to have been a great mistake. In 1836 he was appointed President of the Council, but in August he resigned, and led the Opposition. Again President of the Council and Foreign Minister (1840), he for six months was a terror to the peace of Europe. He refused Palmerston's invitation to enter into an alliance with Britain, Austria, and Prussia for the preservation of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, aiming like Napoleon at French supremacy in the Levant. Irritation at the isolation of France led to his resignation. L'Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire (20 vols. 1845-62), the most ambitious of all Thiers's literary enterprises, is a large rather than a great work; that it is inaccurate and unfair has been admitted even by French critics. Thiers would have hindered the revolution which in 1848 drove Louis-Philippe from the throne, but he accepted the Republic, and voted for the election of Prince Louis Napoleon as president. Yet at the coup d'état of 1851 he was arrested and banished, but next year allowed to return. He re-entered the Chamber in 1863, and his speeches were filled with taunts at the second Empire on account of its loss of prestige. After the Empire's collapse Thiers declined to become a member of the Government of National Defence, but voluntarily undertook (unsuccessful) diplomatic journeys to Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Italy. Twenty constituencies elected him to the National Assembly, and he became head of the provisional government. With great difficulty he persuaded the Assembly to agree to peace on terms practically dictated by Germany (1871). The Commune he suppressed with characteristic energy. In August he was elected president of the Republic. He was mainly instrumental in securing the withdrawal of the Germans, in paying the war indemnity, and in placing the army and the civil service on a more satisfactory footing. But he was detested by the Extreme Left; Reactionaries and Radicals combined to harass him; and in 1872 he tendered his resignation. It was not accepted; but when his opponents sought to limit the powers of the president he made an appeal to the country without increasing his following. What he interpreted as a vote of no confidence was carried May 24, 1873; and he resigned, giving place to Marshal MacMahon. In 1877 he took an active part in bringing about the fall of the De Broglie ministry. He died of apoplexy at St Germain-en-Laye, Sept. 3, 1877. Thiers was not a great statesman or a great historian. But he was a man of indomitable courage, and his patriotism, if narrow and Chauvinistic, was deep and genuine. He became a member of the Academy in 1834. His Discours parlementaires fill 15 vols. (1879-83). See works by Jules Simon (1878-85), Mazade (1884), and Rémusat (1889; trans. 1892). [Te-air'.]

Thirlwall, CONNOP, born at Stepney, Jan. 11, 1797, from Charterhouse passed in 1814 to Trinity College, Cambridge, and after a distinguished course was elected a fellow. He was called to the bar in 1825, but in 1827 took orders, having two years before translated Schleiermacher's Essay on St Luke. His return to Cambridge was marked by the translation, with his friend Julius Hare, of Niebuhr's History of Rome (1828-32); and their Philological Museum (1831-33) contained some remarkable papers, among them Thirlwall's 'On the Irony of Sophocles.' He petitioned and wrote (1834) in favour of the admission of dissenters to degrees. The Master of Trinity, Dr Wordsworth, called on him to resign his assistant-tutorship, which he did under protest. Almost immediately he was presented by Brougham to the Yorkshire living of Kirby-Underdale. Here he wrote for Lardner's Cyclopaedia his History of Greece (1835-47; improved ed. 1847-52). In 1840 Lord Melbourne raised him to the see of St David's. For thirty-four years he laboured with the utmost diligence in his diocese, building churches, parsonages, and schools, and augmenting poor livings. His eleven Charges remain an enduring monument of breadth of view—the first a catholic apology for the Tractarians. He joined in censuring Essays and Reviews, but was one of the four bishops who refused to inhibit Colenso. He supported the Maynooth grant, the admission of Jews to parliament, and alone amongst the bishops the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He resigned his see in May 1874, and died at Bath, 27th July 1875. Perowne edited his Remains, Literary and Theological (1877-78); Perowne and Stokes his Letters, Literary and Theological (1881); and Dean Stanley the beautiful series to a young lady—the Letters to a Friend (1881).

Thistlewood, or THISTLETHWAITE, ARTHUR (1770-1820), an ex-officer in the line, born near Lincoln, who, having imbibed revolutionary ideas in America and France, and ruined himself on the turf, planned the Cato Street Conspiracy to murder Castlereagh and the other ministers at Lord Harrowby's. He was hanged with four of his dupes. The conspirators met in a stable in Cato (Homer) Street, Edgware Road.

Tholuck, FRIEDRICH AUGUST, theologian, born at Breslau, 30th March 1799, studied there and at Berlin, and was early a champion of catholic-minded evangelical Christianity. In 1824 he became extra-ordinary professor of Oriental Languages at Berlin, and in 1826 professor of Theology at Halle; and there, save as chaplain (1828-29) to the Prussian embassy at Rome, he spent the rest of his life. At first he had difficulties in Halle, then a Rationalist centre; but ultimately he profoundly influenced the whole university in the direction of devoutness, if not of old-fashioned orthodoxy. He was a powerful preacher. Of German theologians he was the one most heartily accepted by English-speaking Protestants. He died 10th June 1877. His Die Wahre Weihe des Zweiflers (1823), in reply to De Wette's Theodore, was translated as Sin and Redemption and Guido and Julius. Other works are an Anthology of Eastern Mysticism (1825); commentaries (some of them translated into English two or three times over) on Romans, John's Gospel, the Sermon on the Mount, Hebrews, and Psalms; a reply to Strauss; Andachtsstunden (trans. Hours of Christian Devotion, 1875); and contributions to church history—on the Lutheran divines of Wittenberg (1852), student life in the 17th century (1852-54), and the first part of a Geschichte des Rationalismus (1865). His complete works appeared in 1863-73. See sketch by Kähler (1877) and Life by Witte (1884-86). [Toelook.]

Thom, WILLIAM (1799-1848), author of The Mithræic Bairn and other poems, was born at Aberdeen, worked as a hand-loom weaver there and at Inverurie, and died at Hawkhill, Dundee.

Thomas, Anglo-Norman poet. See THOMAS THE RHYMER.

Thomas the Rhymer is identified with Thomas Rymour of Ercildoune (now Earlston, Berwickshire), and in 1286 is said to have predicted the death of Alexander III. From this and other prophecies he became known as 'True Thomas'; Boece calls him Thomas Learmont. The legend bears that he was carried off to Elfland, and after three years allowed to revisit the earth, but ultimately returned to his mistress, the fairy queen. In a charter of Petrus de Haga of Bemersyde c. 1260-70 the Rhymer appears as a witness; and in another of 1294 Thomas of Ercildoune, 'son and heir of Thomas Rymour of Ercildoune,' conveys lands to the hospice of Soutra. The Rhymer's prophecies were collected and published in 1603. Sir Walter Scott believed him to be the author of the poem of Sir Tristrem (so too M'Neill), which was founded on a 12th century French poem by another Thomas, a poet of genius, almost certainly an Englishman. See The Romances and Prophecies of Thomas of Ercildoune, edited by Sir J. A. H. Murray (Early English Text Soc. 1875); Brandl's Thomas of Ercildoune (Berl. 1880); Sir Tristrem, edited by Scott (1804), by Kölbinger (1882), and by M'Neill (Scot. Thomas, AMBROISE, French composer, born at Metz, 5th August 1811, studied at the Paris Conservatoire 1828-32. His first success in opera was with La Double Échelle (1837), followed by Mina (1843), Betty (1846), Le Caid (1849), Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été (1850), Le Carnaval de Venise (1853), Mignon (1866), Hamlet (1868), and Françoise de Rimini (1882), with innumerable cantatas, part-songs, and choral pieces. He became a member of the Institute (1851), professor of Composition (1852), director of the Conservatoire (1871), and Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour (1880). He died 12th February 1896. [Toe-mah.]

Thomas, ANNIE, born at Aldborough in 1838, married in 1867 the Rev. Pender Cudlip. She has written Dennis Donne (1864), Essentially Human (1897), and over a hundred more novels.

Thomas, ARTHUR GORING, born near Eastbourne, 20th Nov. 1850, was bred for the civil service, but studied at the Paris Conservatoire 1875-77, and wrote the operas Esmeralda (1883) and Nadeshda (1885), the cantata Sun-voorshippers (1881), and many songs. He threw himself under a train, 20th March 1892.

Thomas, GEORGE (c. 1756-1802), born at Tipperary, deserted in India from the navy in 1781, and as general to the Begum Somru performed feats of arms against the Sikhs. See Compton's European Adventurers of Hindustan (1892).

Thomas, GEORGE HENRY (1816-70), Federal general, born in Virginia, graduated at West Point, entered the artillery in 1840, and served against the Indians of Florida 1841, at Monterey and Buena Vista 1846-47, and in Texas 1855-60. In 1861 he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and in Jan. 1862 won the battle of Mill Springs. Major-general in command of the centre of Rosecrans's army, he saved the battle of Stone River; and at Chickamauga again rendered the victory a barren one for the Confederates. In Oct. 1863 he was given the command of the Army of the Cumberland, and in Nov. captured Mission Ridge. In 1864 he commanded the centre in Sherman's advance on Atlanta, and then was sent to oppose Hood in Tennessee; in Dec. he won the battle of Nashville, and received the thanks of congress. He afterwards commanded the military division of the Pacific. See Lives by Van Horne (1852), Coppée (1893), and Piatt (1893).

Thomas, JOHN (1813-62), sculptor, was born at Chalford, Gloucestershire, and settled in London.

Thomasius, CHRISTIAN (1655-1728), Rationalist, philosopher, and international jurist, born at Leipzig, lectured on law there and at Berlin, and at Halle became professor of Jurisprudence. He was the first to lecture not in Latin but German, broke away completely from traditional pedantry and medieval terminology, and was a courageous opponent of trial for witchcraft and torture. See his Gedanken und Erinnerungen (1723-26), and works on him by Dernburg (1865), Wagner (1872), Nicoladoni (1888), and Landsberg (1894).—His descendant, GOTTFRIED THOMASIU (1802-75), was Lutheran pastor at Nuremberg, and from 1842 a professor at Erlangen. [To-mah'-ze-ooz]

Thomason, JAMES (1804-53), son of a curate of Mr Simeon at Cambridge, passed through Haileybury to the East India Company's service, and as governor of the North-west Provinces (1843-53) did admirable work in land settlement, education, Ganges Canal, &c. Thompson, BENJAMIN. See RUMFORD.

Thompson, ELIZABETH ALICE. See BUTLER.

Thompson, FRANCIS (1860-1907), born at Ashton-under-Lyne, and educated, a Roman Catholic, at Ushaw College, left Owens College and the study of medicine for London and destitution, until his Crashaw-like poetry brought him into association with Wilfrid and Alice Meynell. He published Poems (1893), Sister Songs (1895), New Poems (1897), a prose treatise, Health and Holiness (1905), and periodical criticism. Shelley appeared after his death by tuberculosis.

Thompson, SIR HENRY (1820-1904), born at Framlingham, studied medicine at University College, London, and became professor of Surgery there and at the Royal College of Surgeons. Knighted (1867) and made a baronet (1899), he wrote on the urethra, lithotomy, and calculus, and advocated cremation.

Thompson, SIR JOHN, K.C.M.G., P.C. (1844-94), born at Halifax, entered the Nova Scotia Legislature in 1877, became premier of Canada in 1892, and died at Windsor, on a visit to England.

Thompson, SILVANUS PHILLIPS, born at York in 1851, wrote on electricity and light, and became professor of physics and principal of the City and Guilds Technical College, Finsbury.

Thompson, WILLIAM HEPWORTH (1810-86), born at York, studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, became regius professor of Greek in 1853, and in 1866 master of Trinity. He edited Plato's Phædrus and Gorgias, and is chiefly remembered by a few incomparable sarcasms.

Thoms, WILLIAM JOHN (1803-85), antiquary and bibliographer, born in Westminster, after twenty years as a clerk in Chelsea Hospital became a clerk to the House of Lords, and its deputy-librarian 1863-82. He was F.S.A., secretary of the Camden Society 1838-73, founder of Notes and Queries (1849), and its editor down to 1872. He devised the word 'folklore,' and his books include Early Prose Romances (1828).

Thomsen, JULIUS (1826-1909), thermochemist, born at Copenhagen, was professor there.

Thomson, SIR CHARLES WYVILLE (1830-82), zoologist, born at Bonsyde, Linnithgow, studied at Edinburgh, and was professor at Cork, at Belfast, and from 1870 at Edinburgh. He conducted dredging expeditions in 1868-69, and was scientific head of the Challenger voyage (1872-76). He was knighted in 1876. He wrote The Depths of the Sea (1872) and The Voyage of the Challenger (1877).

Thomson, GEORGE (1757-1851), friend of Burns, born at Limekilns, was clerk to the Board of Trustees in Edinburgh for sixty years. Burns, Scott, and Campbell contributed to his Collection of Scottish Songs and Airs (5 vols. 1799-1818). See his Correspondence (ed. Hadden, 1898).

Thomson, JAMES, was born at Ednam manse, Kelso, 11th Sept. 1700, but brought up at Southdean, Jedburgh. He had studied for the ministry at Edinburgh, when in 1725 he removed to London, and in 1726 published Winter, the first of his poems on the Seasons; it was immediately successful. Summer and Spring followed in 1727-28, and in 1730 Autumn completed the work. In 1729 his Sophonisba was produced. One luckless line, 'O Sophonisba, Sophonisba O,' is still remembered for the parody, 'O Jimmy Thomson, Jimmy Thomson O,' which killed what little life the piece possessed. His other tragedies were Agamemnon (1738), Edward and Eleonora (1739), Tancred and Sigismunda (1745), and Coriolanus (1748). In 1731 Thomson was chosen to accompany the son of Lord Chancellor Talbot on the Grand Tour. The poem of Liberty (1732), inspired by his travels, was dedicated to the Prince of Wales, who in 1737 gave the poet a pension of £100 a year. He also obtained the sinecure post, worth £300 more, of surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands. In 1740 the Masque of Alfred was produced before the Prince and Princess of Wales. It contains Rule Britannia (claimed also for Mallet, q.v.). Thomson's finest work, The Castle of Indolence, was published in May 1748. He died at Richmond, 27th August following. Thomson's poems bear traces of minute observation of nature at first hand; he was not without a quaint if sometimes coarse humour; and he has long passages of pleasing melody. But no real feeling pulsates through his verse, and he is verbose beyond endurance. See editions by Logie Robertson (1891) and Tovey (2 vols. 1897); Prof. Léon Morel's James Thomson (1896); and short Lives by W. Bayne (1898) and G. C. Macaulay (1908).

Thomson, JAMES, LL.D., F.R.S. (1822-92), elder brother of Lord Kelvin, born at Belfast, in 1873-89 was professor of Engineering at Glasgow. He was an authority on hydraulics, invented a turbine, discovered the effect of pressure upon the freezing-point of water, and wrote papers on elastic fatigue, under-currents, and trade-winds.

Thomson, JAMES, the poet of despair, was born, a sailor's son, at Port-Glasgow, 23d Nov. 1834, and educated in an orphan asylum. There and at Chelsea he was trained for an army schoolmaster; but through his friend Bradlaugh contributed 1860-75 to the National Reformer, in which appeared many of his sombre, powerful, and sonorous poems, including 'The City of Dreadful Night' (1874). He became a lawyer's clerk in 1862, went to America as a mining agent (1872), was war-correspondent with the Carlists (1878), and from 1875 onwards depended largely on contributions to a monthly tobaccoists' organ. Diseased in body and mind, he suffered from the seductions of narcotics and stimulants, and died in University College Hospital, 3d June 1882. The City of Dreadful Night and other Poems, published in book form in 1880, was followed by Vane's Story (1881), Essays and Phantasies (1881), A Voice from the Nile (1884, with memoir by Bertram Dobell), Shelley, a Poem (1885), and Biographical and Critical Studies (1896). His pseudonym, Bysshe Vanolis, was partly from Shelley's second name, partly from an anagram of Novalis. See Salt's Life of James Thomson, 'B.V.' (1889), and B. Dobell's edition of his Poetical Works (1895).

Thomson, JOHN (1778-1840), landscape-painter, born at Dailly manse, Ayrshire, studied theology at Edinburgh, and in 1800 became his father's successor at Dailly. In 1805 he was transferred to Duddingston. See Baird's Life of him (1895).

Thomson, JOSEPH (1858-1895), born at Penpont, Dumfriesshire, 2d Feb. 1858, studied at Edinburgh, went in 1878-79 to Lake Tanganyika, and in 1883-84 he passed through the Masai country; for the Niger Company he visited Sokoto (1885), and for the Geographical Society he explored southern Morocco (1888). Among his works are To the Central African Lakes and Back (1881), Through Masai Land (1885), Travels in the Atlas (1889), and Life of Mungo Park (1890). See Life by his brother (1896).

Thomson, SIR JOSEPH JOHN, born near Manchester in 1856, and educated at Owens College and Cambridge, became in 1884 Cavendish professor of Experimental Physics at Cambridge, and in 1905 professor of Physics at the Royal Institution, London. His researches on the ionic theory of electricity, on radio-activity, and on the electric theory of inertia of matter are embodied in his Recent Researches in Electricity and Magnetism (1893); Elements of the Mathematical Theory of Electricity and Magnetism (1895); Discharge of Electricity through Gases (1897); Conduction of Electricity through Gases (1903); Electricity and Matter (1904). He was knighted in 1908.

Thomson, WILLIAM (1819-90), born at Whitehaven, from Shrewsbury passed to Queen's College, Oxford, and became its provost (1855), Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol (1861), and Archbishop of York (1862). His best-known work was Outline of the Laws of Thought (1848; 10th ed. 1875). See the Quarterly Review for April 1892.

Thomson, SIR WILLIAM. See KELVIN (LORD).

Thoreau, HENRY DAVID, the 'hermit of Walden,' born of Jersey stock at Concord, Mass., July 12, 1817, graduated at Harvard in 1837, became a teacher at Concord, and lectured. He soon gave up teaching, and joined his father in making lead-pencils, but about 1839 began his walks and studies of nature as the serious occupation of his life. In that year he made the voyage described in his Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers (1849). Thoreau early made the acquaintance of Emerson, and in 1841-43 and in 1847 was a member of his household. In 1845 he built himself a shanty in the woods by Walden Pond, where he wrote much of the Week, his essay on Carlyle, and his most popular book, Walden, or Life in the Woods (1854). After the Walden episode he supported himself by whitewashing, gardening, fence-building, and land-surveying. He also lectured now and then, and wrote for the magazines. He made three trips to the Maine woods in 1846, 1853, and 1857, described in papers collected after his death (1864). In 1850 he made a trip to Canada, which produced A Yankee in Canada (1866). He died at Concord, May 6, 1862. Thoreau began in 1835 to keep a daily journal of his walks and observations, from whose thirty volumes were published Early Spring in Massachusetts (1881), Summer (1884), and Winter (1887). Other publications are Excursions in Field and Forest, with memoir by Emerson (1863), Cape Cod (1865), Letters to Various Persons, with nine poems (1865), Familiar Letters (1894), and Poems of Nature (1896). The best edition of his works is the 'Riverside' (10 vols. Bost. 1893). See Lives by W. E. Channing (1873), F. B. Sanborn (1882), and H. S. Salt (1890 and 1896).

Thoresby, RALPH (1658-1725), merchant and historian of Leeds. See his Diary and Correspondence (ed. by Joseph Hunter, 1830-32).

Thornbury, GEORGE WALTER (1828-76), born in London, first wrote for the Bristol Journal, then, settling in London, published between twenty and thirty novels, books of travel, &c., among them Shakespeare's England (1856), Songs of the Cavaliers and Roundheads (1857), As the Crow Flies (1859), Life of Turner (1861), Historical and Legendary Ballads (1875), and vols. i.-ii. of Old and New London (completed by Walford, 1872-78).

Thornhill, SIR JAMES (1675-1734), painter to Queen Anne, executed paintings for the dome of St Paul's, Blenheim, Hampton Court, and Greenwich Hospital. Of his easel-pictures the best known is that of the House of Commons in 1730. He founded a successful drawing-school—Hogarth (q.v.) one of his pupils. Knighted by George I. in 1715, he was M.P. from 1719 for his native borough of Melcombe Regis.

Thornycroft, WILLIAM HAMO, sculptor, born in London, 9th March 1850, was elected A.R.A. 1881, R.A. 1888. 'Artemis' (1880), his first success, was followed by 'The Mower' (1884), and statues of Gen. Gordon in Trafalgar Square (1885), John Bright at Rochdale (1892), and Cromwell at Westminster (1899).—His grandfather, JOHN FRANCIS (1780-1861); his mother, MARY (1814-95); and his father, THOMAS THORNYCROFT (1815-85), were all sculptors.—His brother, SIR JOHN ISAAC THORNYCROFT, F.R.S. (b. 1843), knighted in 1902, is a naval architect and engineer.

Thorold, ANTHONY WILSON, D.D. (1825-95), born at Hougham, Lincolnshire, studied at Queen's College, Oxford. An Evangelical, he held three London livings from 1857, and became Bishop of Rochester in 1877, of Winchester in 1891. See Life by Simpkinson (1896).

Thorpe, BENJAMIN (1782-1870), edited numerous Anglo-Saxon texts, and wrote Northern Mythology (1852).

Thorpe, ROSE HARTWICK, was born at Misha-waka, Ind., 18th July 1850, and married in 1871. Her 'Curfew must not Ring To-night' (1870) was written in her school-days, and since 1881 she has published poems, stories, &c.

Thorwaldsen, BERTEL, sculptor, born at sea, 19th November 1770, was the son of an Icelandic carver of ships-figureheads on his way to Copenhagen. Bertel studied there and from 1797 at Rome, where his model for a 'Jason' was highly admired by Canova. No purchaser could, however, be found for it till in 1803 he received from 'Anastasius' Hope a commission for its production in marble. From this time prosperity and fame flowed in on him. In 1819 he returned to Denmark, and got a triumphal reception. He again lived in Rome 1820-38 and 1841-44. In the latter year, having revisited Copenhagen to complete some of his works, he died suddenly in the theatre, 24th March. All the works in his possession he bequeathed, with the bulk of his fortune, to his country; and the collection is a chief glory of Copenhagen. Among his works are 'Christ and the Twelve Apostles,' the reliefs 'Night' and 'Morning,' the 'Dying Lion' at Lucerne, and the Cambridge statue of Byron.

See Danish Lives of Thorwaldsen (in Danish spl. Thorwaldsen) by Thiele (1881-50; Eng. abridgment by Barnard, 1865) and Sigurd Müller (1893), with Eugene Plon's Thorwaldsen, sa Vie et ses Œuvres (Eng. trans. by Mrs Cashel Hoey, 1874).

Thou. JACQUES AUGUSTE DE (Latinised Thuanus), born at Paris, 8th Oct. 1553, of a great legal family, was bred for the church, but turned to law, became president of the parlement of Paris, and was a distinguished diplomat under Henry III. and Henry IV. His great Latin history of his own time (11 vols. 1604-14; ed. by S. Buckley, Lond. 1733) was placed on the Index; at his death, on 7th May 1617, he left also commentaries on his own life and some Latin verse. See Collinson's Life of Thuanus (1807), the French monograph by Philartète Chasles (1824), and Stirling-Maxwell's Miscellaneous Essays (1891).

Thrale. See PIZZICCI.

Thrasylus, Athenian general, was a strenuous supporter of the democracy. In 411 B.C. he helped to overthrow the Four Hundred, and was banished by the Thirty Tyrants, but restored the democracy in 403. He conquered Lesbos and defended Rhodes, but was slain in 389.

Thring, EDWARD, born at Alford House, Somerset, Nov. 29, 1821, from Eton passed to King's College, Cambridge, and was elected a fellow. He was curate at Gloucester and elsewhere, but in 1853 found the work of his life as head-master of Uppingham, which he made one of the best public schools of England, raising its numbers from almost nil to 330. He died October 22, 1887. His works include volumes of school songs, an English grammar, Thoughts on Life Science (anonymously, 1869), Theory and Practice of Teaching (1883), Uppingham Sermons (1886), Addresses (1887), Poems and Translations (1887). See the Life by Prof. G. Parkin (2 vols. 1898).—His brother, HENRY (1818-1907), was educated at Shrewsbury and Magdalene College, Cambridge, graduating as third classic in 1841. He was parliamentary counsel 1868-86, and was created a K.C.B. in 1873, Baron Thring in 1886.

Throgmorton, SIR NICHOLAS (1515-71), fought bravely at Pinkie, was ambassador to France, when he was imprisoned for siding with the Huguenots, and was repeatedly ambassador to Scotland during 1561-67. In 1569 he was sent to the Tower for promoting the scheme for marrying Mary Queen of Scots to the Duke of Norfolk.

Thrupp, FREDERICK (1812-95), sculptor, was born at Paddington, and died at Torquay.

Thuanus. See THOU, DE.

Thucydides, historian of the Peloponnesian war, was born near Athens probably in 471 B.C. He was one of the sufferers from the terrible plague of Athens, and one of the few who recovered. He commanded an Athenian squadron of seven ships at Thasos (424), when he failed to relieve Amphipolis; and, condemned therefore to death as a traitor, took refuge in exile and retired to his Thracian estates. He lived in exile twenty years (possibly visiting Sicily), and probably returned to Athens in 404. When he died is unknown; but he did not live long enough to revise book viii. or to bring his history down to the end of the war. Thucydides was the first of critical historians. There is hardly a literary production of which posterity has entertained a more uniformly favourable estimate than his history—for undeviating fidelity and impartiality, masterly concentration, the sagacity of his political and moral observations, and the unrivalled descriptive power exemplified in his account of the plague of Athens, and of the Athenian expedition to Sicily. It has been reserved for critics of the 19th century, mainly German critics, to impeach the credibility, to depreciate the matter, and to condemn the style of Thucydides—impeachments, however, usually concluding with the statement that after all Thucydides remains the greatest of historians. The most serious outcome of the discussion seems to be that Thucydides' knowledge of the topography of Plataea was defective. Thucydides' style, criticised by Dionysius and condemned by Mure, is in the speeches difficult beyond all dispute. The best editions are, in Latin that of Poppo (1821-40), in German Classen's (2d ed. 1870-78), and in English—at least for historical illustration—Arnold's (1830-35). Among English translations may be noticed those of Hobbes (1628), Dale (1848), Jovett (with commentary, 1881), and H. M. Wilkins (Speeches only, 2d ed. 1873).

Thumb, GEN. TOM. See STRATTON.

Thunberg, CARL PETER (1743-1828), Swedish botanist, visited Java, the Cape, and Japan.

Thurlow, EDWARD, BARON (1731-1806), born at Bracon-Ash, Norfolk, was as insolent and subordinate at Caius College, Cambridge, as at Canterbury grammar-school, and was sent down in 1751 without a degree. He was called to the bar in 1754; his speech in the Douglas Peerage case (1769) was the greatest effort of his life. In 1768 he was returned for Tamworth, and, as a zealous supporter of Lord North, became Solicitor-general (1770) and Attorney-general (1771); he won George III. by upholding his American policy. In 1778 he became Lord Chancellor and Baron Thurlow, and while retaining office under the Rockingham government opposed all its measures. Under Fox and North he was compelled to retire, but was restored by Pitt. Relying on the king's support, he once more began to undermine the power of his colleagues; but when Pitt intimated that he or Thurlow must retire, the king consented to his removal (1792). He died September 12, 1806. Thurlow was vulgar, arrogant, profane, and immoral; but 'no nan,' said Fox, 'was so wise as Thurlow looked.'

Thurot, FRANÇOIS (1726-60), born at Nuits in Côte d'Or, served first on a privateer; and, captured and kept a year in Dover, seized a small boat and crossed the Channel. By 1748 he was able to fit out a merchant-ship. He spent a few years in England betwixt music, mathematics, and dissipation, varied by smuggling and, it may be, piracy. At the war (1755) he was given the command of a squadron, with which he scoured the Channel, cruised along the east coast of England and Scotland, and fought an action with two frigates off the Forth. In October 1759 he sailed for Lough Foyle with a squadron, carrying 1200 soldiers. High gales made it impossible to enter; and three English frigates coming up, Thurot fought till he was struck down. His body, washed ashore, was buried at Kirkmalden-in-Fernes, Wigtownshire. See Prof. Lighton's Studies in Naval History (1887). [Tec-rol.]

Thurtell, JOHN (1794-1824), son of a Norwich alderman, served at sea and in the Peninsula, and was hanged at Hertford for the brutal murder, in Gill's Hill Lane, of a fellow-swindler, Wear. He comes in Borrow's Lavengro.

Tiberius (TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS NERO), second emperor of Rome, son of T. Claudius Nero and of Livia, was born 16th Nov. 42 B.C., four years before her complaisant husband yielded Livia to the triumvir Octavianus. He was nine when his father's death transferred him to the tutelage of his stepfather. Almost the whole of his first twenty years of manhood were spent in the camp—in Spain, Armenia, Gaul, Pannonia, and Germany. He brought back the standards lost with Crassus; in 15 B.C. he co-operated with his brother Drusus in subduing the Rhæti and Vindelici; warred with the Pannonians (12–9), and traversed Germany. Tiberius was compelled (11) by Augustus to divorce his wife, Vipsania Agrippina, daughter of Agrippa by his former wife Pomponia, in order to marry Agrippa's widow Julia, the profligate daughter of Augustus. He was then sent to crush a revolt in Dalmatia and Pannonia; and for his wars in Germany received a full triumph (9). But in 6 he retired to Rhodes, where he gave himself to study and to astrology. Before his return (2 A.D.) the infamous Julia was banished to Pandataria (2 B.C.), and the deaths of the young princes Lucius and Gaius paved the way for the adoption of Tiberius as heir to the imperial dignity. He spent the next seven years in active service in north Germany, in quelling insurrections in Pannonia and Dalmatia, and in taking vengeance upon the enemy who had annihilated the army of Varus in 9 A.D. Along with Germanicus he made two marches into the heart of Germany (9–10), returning to enjoy a splendid triumph (12). Tiberius succeeded Augustus in 14. According to Tacitus, the first eight years of his reign were marked by just government, frugality, and care for the interests of the provincials. During this period only twelve state trials for high-treason are recorded; during 23–28 the number rose to twenty. His minister Sejanus secured vast influence by playing on the morbid suspiciousness of his master; and in a six years' reign of terror 100 lives perished, mostly by direct mandate of the prince. In 26 Tiberius left Rome for Campania, and the year after took up his abode in Capræ, where Suetonius tells us he wallowed in brutish sensualities. He had left the whole control of government to Sejanus, but, awakened at length to his ambitious designs, struck him down without hesitation (31). Macro, the successor of Sejanus, had all his vices without his talents. The murder of Agrippa Postumus in 14, the mysterious death of Germanicus in the East (19), the poisoning of Tiberius's own son Drusus by Sejanus (23), the banishment of Agrippina and the untimely death of her young sons Nero and Drusus (31 and 33) were some of the dark tragedies that befell the house of Augustus. In his last years the emperor's mind was darkened by gloom, superstition, perhaps insanity. On 16th March 37 his worn-out frame fell into a sort of lethargy, in which he was suffocated by Macro. Dean Merivale in his Romans under the Empire defends Tiberius with moderate zeal, believing him the victim of much ancient misrepresentation; Prof. Beesly in a preposterous paradox (Catiline, Clodius, and Tiberius, 1878) repudiates the whole account by Tacitus as a deliberate and malignant libel.

Tibullus, ALBIUS (c. 54–19 B.C.), Roman poet, was born, it is believed, at Gabil. He acquired the friendship of the poet-statesman, M. Valerius Messala, and went on his staff, when Augustus commissioned him (30 B.C.) to crush a revolt in Aquitania. But though he distinguished himself in the campaign, he disliked a soldier's life as much as he enjoyed Roman society; and though again he started with Messala on a mission to Asia, he sickened on the voyage, and turned back at Corcyra. His tender, elegiac love-poems to living inamoratas, by their limpid clearness and unaffected finish, still justify Quintilian in placing Tibullus at the head of Roman elegiac poets. The heroine of his first book was the wife of an officer absent on service in Cilicia; of his second, a fashionable courtesan. The third book can hardly be his, while the fourth is also by another hand. The best editions are by Bährens (1873) and Hiller (Postgate's Corp. Poet. Lat., 1893). See Davies's Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius (1876), and Cranstoun's translation (1872).

Tichborne, a pre-Conquest Catholic family of Hampshire, who received a baronetcy in 1626. After the death of the eleventh baronet, Sir Alfred Joseph Tichborne (1839–66), a butcher from Wagga-Wagga in New South Wales, Thomas Castro, otherwise Arthur Orton of Wapping, came forward to personate an elder brother, Roger Charles Tichborne (1829–54), who had been lost at sea off America. His case collapsed on 6th March 1872, the 103d day of a trial to assert his claims; and the 'Clainant,' committed for perjury, on 28th Feb. 1874, the 188th day of this new trial, whose cost was £55,315, got fourteen years' hard labour. Released 1884, in 1895 he confessed the imposture, and died 1st April 1898. See Sir Alex. Cockburn's Charge (2 vols. 1875).

Tickell, THOMAS (1686–1740), poet, born at Bridekirk, Carlisle, was a fellow of Queen's, Oxford, 1710–26. His complimentary verses on Rosamond (1709) gained him the favour, his own virtues the friendship, of Addison, who, on becoming in 1717 Secretary of State, made him his under-secretary; from 1725 he was secretary to the Lords Justices of Ireland. He was skilful in occasional poetry, and was affectionately puffed in the Spectator. His translation of book i. of the Iliad appeared in 1715, about the same time as Pope's. Pope professed to believe it the work of Addison himself, designed to eclipse his version, and wrote the famous satire on Atticus. But though Addison corrected it, the translation was doubtless by Tickell. His longest poem is Kensington Gardens; his most popular, Colin and Lucy; his finest, the exquisite elegy prefixed to his edition of Addison's Works (1721).

Ticknor, GEORGE, born in Boston, 1st August 1791, the son of a wealthy New Englander, was admitted to the bar in 1813, but turned his thoughts to study and travel, and, starting for Europe in 1815, remained there for four years—at London, Göttingen, Paris, Geneva, Rome, Venice, Madrid, and Lisbon. Everywhere he mixed in the best society; and his journal is full of the best sort of interviewing. He was professor of French and Spanish and Belles Lettres at Harvard 1819–35, then again spent three years in Europe, collecting materials for his great History of Spanish Literature (1849). He also wrote Lives of Lafayette (1824) and Prescott (1864). He died at Boston, 26th January 1871. See his Life, Letters, and Journals (1876).

Ticknor, WILLIAM DAVIS (1810–64), born in Lebanon, N.H., became a publisher in Boston, in 1832, at first with John Allen, and then with James F. Fields. As Ticknor & Fields they published the Atlantic Monthly and the North American Review, and their office was the resort of Emerson, Whittier, Hawthorne, Holmes, Lowell, and Longfellow. Ticknor was one of the first Americans to remunerate foreign authors.

Tieck, JOHANN LUDWIG, Romanticist, born in Berlin, 31st May 1773, lived the life of a man of letters, at Berlin, Dresden, and near Frankfort-on-Oder; and died at Berlin, 25th April 1853. After two or three immature romances, he struck out a new line in clever dramatised versions of Puss in Boots, Blue Beard, &c. He followed up this first success (1797) by a tragedy, a comedy (1804), and Phantasio (1812-17), a collection of traditional lore in story and drama. Besides superintending the completion of A. W. Schlegel's translation of Shakespeare, he edited the doubtful plays and wrote a series of essays (Shakespeares Vorschule, 1823-29). Don Quixote he himself translated in 1799-1804. He holds an honourable place among Germany's dramatic and literary critics, in virtue of his Dramaturgische Blätter (2d ed. 1852) and Kritische Schriften (1848). Some of his fairytales and novels were translated into English by Carlyle and Thirlwall. See Lives by Köpke (1855), Friesen (1871), and Klee (1894); and Carlyle's Essays, vol. i. [Teek.]

Tiele, CORNELIS PETRUS, Dutch theologian, born at Leyden, 16th Dec. 1830, studied there and at Amsterdam, and became Remonstrant pastor at Rotterdam (1856), and professor of the History of Religions at Leyden (1877), and died in January 1902. He had published The Egyptian and Mesopotamian Religions (1869-72; trans. 1882), Outlines of the History of Religion (1876; trans. 1878), Babylonian and Assyrian History (1887), Western Asia (1894), &c. He was Edinburgh Gifford lecturer in 1896-98. [Teel-leh.]

Tiepolo, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1692-1769), last of the great Venetians, was a productive painter, rich in colour and clear (though inaccurate) in drawing. He died at Madrid. His 'Finding of Moses' (in 17th century costumes) in the Scottish National Gallery is famous. See Molmenti, Il Carpaccio e il Tiepolo (1885); and Chennevières, Les Tiepolo (1899). [Te-e'h-po-to.]

Tierney, GEORGE (1761-1830), a sarcastic Whig politician, born at Gibraltar, was one of Pitt's most persistent opponents, and fought a bloodless duel with him (1798). He held office under Addington, Grenville, Canning, and Goderich.

Tietjens. See TITIENS.

Tighe, MARY, née BLACHFORD (1772-1810), a Wicklow poetess, whose Psyche influenced Keats.

Tilden, SAMUEL JONES, statesman, born, a farmer's son, at New Lebanon, N.Y., 9th Feb. 1814, was admitted to the bar, and secured a large railway practice. By 1868 he had become leader of the Democrats in the state, and he attacked and destroyed Tweed and Tammany. In 1874 he became governor of New York; in 1876 he was Democratic candidate for the presidency, and won admiration by his temperate utterances and unselfish attitude. He died 4th August 1886, leaving great part of his fortune of $6,000,000 to found a free library in New York City. See Life by T. P. Cook (1876), and his Writings and Speeches, edited by John Bigelow (1885).

Tilgner, VICTOR (1844-96), Viennese sculptor, was born at Presburg.

Tillemont, LOUIS SÉBASTIEN LE NAIN DE (1637-98), ecclesiastical historian, was born in Paris, and educated by the Port-Royalists. He entered the priesthood in 1676, and after the dispersion of the Solitaires in 1679 lived mostly on his estate at Tillemont near Paris. His chief works are the laborious and solid Histoire Ecclésiastique des Six Premiers Siècles (1693-1712) and Histoire des Empereurs (1691-1738). [Teel-mont']

Tillett, BENJAMIN, born at Bristol in 1859, worked as brickmaker, bootmaker, and sailor, and became notable as organiser of the Dockers' Union in London and leader of the great dockers' strike in 1888. He was acquitted on a charge of riot at Bristol in 1893, but was expelled from Hamburg and from Antwerp (1896), whither he had gone to support dock strikes.

Tillotson, JOHN ROBERT (1630-94), Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Sowerby, Yorkshire, was elected a fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1651. Ranged among the Presbyterians at the Savoy Conference (1661), he submitted to the Act of Uniformity (1662), and in 1663 became rector of Keddington, SW. Suffolk, in 1664 preacher at Lincoln's Inn, where his mild, evangelical, but undoctinal morality was at first little relished. That same year he married a niece of Oliver Cromwell. In 1670 he became a prebendary, in 1672 dean, of Canterbury. Along with Burnet he attended Lord Russell on the scaffold (1683). In 1689 he was appointed Clerk of the Closet to King William and Dean of St Paul's, and in 1691 was raised to the see of Canterbury, vacant by the deposition of the Nonjuror Sancroft. He accepted this elevation with the greatest reluctance, nor could all the insults of the Nonjurors to the end of his life extort either complaint or retaliation. According to Burnet, 'he was not only the best preacher of the age, but seemed to have brought preaching to perfection.' His Posthumous Sermons were edited by his chaplain, Dr Barker (14 vols. 1694). His complete works appeared in 1707-12, with Life by Dr Birch, 1752; and an annotated selection of his sermons by Weldon in 1886.

Tilly, JAN TSERKLAES, COUNT (1559-1632), born at the castle of Tilly in Brabant, and brought up by the Jesuits, learned the art of war under Parma, fought in Hungary against the Turks, and was appointed in 1610 by Duke Maximilian of Bavaria to reorganise his army. He was given the command of the Catholic army at the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, and with Maximilian gained (1620) the battle of Prague, which dissipated the dreams of the Elector-Palatine. He separated the armies of Mansfeld and of the Margrave of Baden, beat the latter at Wimpfen (1622), and expelled Christian of Brunswick from the Palatinate, defeating him in two battles. Created a count of the empire, he defeated the king of Denmark at Lutter (1626), and with Wallenstein compelled him to sign the treaty of Lübeck (1629). Next year he succeeded Wallenstein as commander-in-chief of the imperial forces, and stormed Magdeburg (20th May 1631), when the atrocities he allowed his Croats and Walloons to perpetrate cast a foul stain upon his reputation. Gustavus Adolphus routed him at Breitenfeld (17th Sept.), drove him to retreat behind the Lech in Bavaria, and forced the passage of the river (5th April 1632), after a desperate conflict, in which Tilly received his death-wound. See French work by Villermont (1859), and German ones by Keym (1872) and Klopp (2d ed. 1891).

Timbs, JOHN, F.S.A. (1801-75), antiquarian miscellanist, was born in London.

Timoleon, a Corinthian, sent in 344 B.C. to Sicily at the prayer of the Greek cities there to repel the Carthaginians; after various partial victories, in 339, with 12,000 men, he routed a vast Carthaginian army, and made the aliens confine themselves to the west of the Halycus. He next drove out all the tyrants, and restored their freedom to the Greek cities, then settled quietly in Syracuse, enjoying the admiration of the whole Greek world until his death in 337. See Holden's edition of Life by Plutarch (1887).

Timon, the misanthrope, an Athenian, a contemporary of Socrates. According to the comic writers who attacked him, he was disgusted with mankind on account of the ingratitude of his early friends, and lived a life of almost total seclusion. Lucian made him the subject of a dialogue; Shakespeare's play is based on the story as told in Painter's Palace of Pleasure.—TIMON the Sillographer, Greek poet and philosopher, flourished about 280 B.C., lectured at Chalcedon, and spent his last years at Athens. He wrote Silloi, sarcastic hexameters upon Greek philosophers.

Tindal, MATTHEW (1656–1733), deistical writer, born at Beerferris rectory, S. Devon, was elected a fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. A Roman Catholic under James II., he reverted to Protestantism of a somewhat freethinking type, and wrote An Essay of Obedience to the Supreme Powers (1693), and Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other Priests (1706). The latter raised a storm of opposition; but even a prosecution failed to prevent a fourth edition in 1709. In 1730 Tindal published his Christianity as old as the Creation, which was soon known as 'the Deist's Bible'; its aim is to eliminate the supernatural element from religion, and to prove that its morality is its only claim to the reverence of mankind. Answers were issued by Waterland, Foster, Conybeare, Leland, &c.

Tindale, WILLIAM. See TYNDALE.

Tintoretto, or TINTORET, so called from his father being a dyer (Tintore), was actually named Jacopo Robusti, and was born at Venice, 29th September 1518. One of Ruskin's 'five supreme painters,' he was unquestionably a great master of composition, drawing, and colour. Some of his earlier pictures are very carefully finished, but his later ones are dashed off with fatal haste. His portraits are generally admirable. Of the innumerable pictures attributed to him not a few are by other hands. Venice contains many specimens of his art; there are a number in England, including 'St George and the Dragon' in the National Gallery at London. Other famous pictures are 'Belshazzar's Feast,' 'The Tiburtine Sibyl,' 'The Last Supper,' 'The Crucifixion,' 'The Worship of the Golden Calf,' 'The Last Judgment,' 'St Agnes,' 'The Miracle of St Mark,' 'The Resurrection,' 'The Slaughter of the Innocents,' and the largest picture on canvas by any great master, the 'Paradise' (1588) of the Ducal Palace at Venice, 34 feet high by 74 long, and containing over 100 figures. Tintoretto, who ranks as the head of the later Venetian school, died 31st May 1594. See books by Osler (1879), Stearns (1895), Holborn, Mrs Bell (1905), Miss Phillips (1911).

Tinworth, GEORGE, artist in terra-cotta, born in London, 5th Nov. 1843, the son of a poor wheelwright, in 1864 entered the Royal Academy schools. He soon began exhibiting figures and groups of figures at the Royal Academy, and in 1867 obtained an appointment in the Doulton art pottery. The works which made him famous were mainly terra-cotta panels with groups of figures in high relief illustrating scenes from sacred history. An important example is the redos in York Minster. See an Essay by E. W. Gosse (1883) and Strand Magazine (Nov. 1891).

Tippoo Sahib, or TIPÚ SULTÁN (1749–99), son of Hyder Ali (q.v.), during his father's was completely routed Bailey (1780 and 1782) and Bralthwaite (1782). In 1782 he succeeded his father as sultan of Mysore. In 1783 he captured and put to death most of the garrison of Bednur, but after the conclusion of peace between France and England he agreed to a treaty (1784) stipulating for the status quo before the war. During the peace he regulated the internal administration of Mysore, sent ambassadors in 1787 to France to stir up a war with Britain, and, falling in this, invaded (1789) the protected state of Travancore. In the ensuing war (1790–92) the British, under Stuart and Cornwallis, were aided by the Mah-rattas and the Nizam, and Tippoo was compelled (1792) to resign one-half of his dominions, pay an indemnity of 3030 lakhs of rupees, restore all prisoners, and give his two sons as hostages. But resuming his intrigues, he sent another embassy to the French; and it was resolved to punish him. Hostilities commenced in March 1799, and Tippoo was driven from the open field, attacked in his capital of Seringapatam, and after a month's siege slain at the storming, by Gen. Harris, of the fort (4th May). See L. B. Bowring's Haider Ali and Tipú Sultan (1893).

Tiraboschi, GIROLAMO (1731–94), born at Bergamo, became professor of Rhetoric at Milan, and in 1770 librarian to the Duke of Modena. His Storia della Letteratura Italiana (1772–82) is an accurate survey down to 1700. A continuation was written by Lombardi. [Teer-a-bos'kee.]

Tirso de Molina. See TELLEZ.

Tischendorf, LOBEGOTT FRIEDRICH KONSTANTIN VON (1815–74), biblical scholar, born at Lengenfeld in Saxony, in 1839 became a university lecturer at Leipzig, and in 1845 a professor. His labours in search of the best and most ancient MSS. of the New Testament, especially those in 1844, 1853, and 1859, resulted in the discovery of the 4th century Sinaitic Codex at the monastery on Mount Sinai; his journeys he described in Reise in den Orient (1846; trans. 1847) and Aus dem Heiligen Lande (1862). Among his works are the editions of the Sinaitic (1862; in fac-simile, 1863) and many other MSS., the Editio VIII. of the New Testament (1864–72), an edition of the Septuagint, and the Monumenta Sacra Inedita (1846–71). When were our Gospels Written? was translated in 1866. He was created count of the Russian empire, LL.D. of Cambridge, D.C.L. of Oxford, &c. See sketch by Volbeding (1862). [Tisk-en-dorf.]

Tissandier, GASTON (1835–99), French aéronaut, first partially solved the problem of steering balloons. His balloon (1883), propelled by a screw, and steered by a rudder of unvarnished silk, attained a speed of nine miles an hour. He wrote Histoire des Ballons (1887–90), &c.

Tissaphernes, Persian satrap from 414 B.C. of Lower Asia, in 395 was executed at Sardis.

Tite, SIR WILLIAM, F.R.S. (1798–1873), the architect of the Royal Exchange (1844), was knighted in 1869, and was M.P. for Bath from 1855.

Titian, or TRIZIANO VECELLIO, descended from a respectable but not wealthy family, was born about 1477, close to the castle of Cadore, in a mountainous region north of Venice. He was sent at ten to an uncle's in Venice, and was taught by Zuccato, a mosaicist, and Gentile Bellini, Giovanni Bellini, and Giorgione. He produced a masterpiece at twenty-three, and very soon had plenty of employment. In 1511 he was painting fresco at Padua, and in 1516 visited Ferrara. He married about 1524. In 1532 he became acquainted with the Emperor Charles V., who made him a count palatine and a Knight of the Golden Spur. In 1545 he visited Rome, where he was welcomed by Paul III., and in 1546 returned to Venice. At the age of seventy he undertook a winter journey across the Alps to the court of Charles V. at Augsburg. The later part of his life was chiefly occupied in working at Venice for Philip II. of Spain; and in 1576 he undertook a large picture for the Franciscans. On 27th August of that year he died of the plague, aged ninety-nine, and was buried with public honours. Titian was extremely fortunate in his patrons, including the Venetian government, in spite of his negligence and delays, and his love of pensions, privileges, and sinecures. He was a polished self-seeking courtier, an affectionate husband and father, and an amiable and sociable companion. Titian was much in request as portrait-painter. His religious pictures are numerous and magnificent, some of them on a large scale, and he frequently chose mythological subjects. Some of his finest works are poetical or allegorical. The supreme rank amongst painters is sometimes assigned to Raphael and sometimes to Titian. Titian's claim is founded especially on the technical excellence of his painting, which combines in a most extraordinary degree the richest surface with the most magnificent colour. The following is a chronological list of some of Titian's most important works: 'Sacred and Profane Love,' about 1500; the 'Pesaro Altarpiece,' at Antwerp, about 1503; 'Doge Marcello,' at the Vatican, 1508; 'Christ of the Tribute-money,' Dresden, 1508; 'The Three Ages,' Ellesmere Collection, 1518; 'Noli Me Tangere,' National Gallery, 1518; 'Bacchus and Ariadne,' National Gallery, 1520; 'Titian and his Mistress' (so called), 1513; 'St Peter Martyr,' 1530, destroyed by fire at Venice in 1867; 'The Repose in Egypt,' Louvre, 1530; 'A Summer Storm,' Buckingham Palace, 1534; 'The Battle of Cadore,' for the council-chamber at Venice, 1537, destroyed by fire in 1577; 'The Farnese Family Picture,' 1545; 'The Danae of Naples,' 1545; 'The Farnese Venus and Adonis,' 1547; portraits of Philip of Spain, 1550; 'Venus and Adonis,' National Gallery, 1554; 'Martyrdom of St Lawrence,' Gesuiti, Venice, 1558; 'Jupiter and Antiope,' Louvre, 1561; a second 'Peter Martyr,' 1567. He is represented in the National Gallery by five pictures, and in the Louvre by twenty-two. At Dresden are twelve, at Vienna thirty, and at Madrid forty in the Museum, with many at the Escorial. See Crowe and Cavalcaselle's Life of him (2d ed. 1881), and that by Gronau (trans. 1904); with minor works by Heath (1885), Lafenestre (1886), Phillips (1899), Ricketts (1910).

Titens, or TJETJENS, TERESA (1831-77), one of the greatest of operatic singers, was born at Hamburg of Hungarian parents, and made her debut at Altona in 1849. Her appearance in London in 1858 was a triumph. Among her most famous impersonations were Norma, Semiramide, Fidelio, Margarita, and Ortrud (in Lohengrin). She visited America in 1875. With a voice of great volume and rare purity, she was an unrivalled representative of strong dramatic parts, and was almost equally admirable in oratorio.

Titus (40-81 A.D.), eleventh of the twelve Cæsars, was in full called TITUS FLAVIUS SABINUS VESPASIANUS, and was eldest son of Vespasian. He early served with credit in Germany and Britain, and in Judæa under his father. On Vespasian's elevation to the throne Titus brought the Jewish war to a close by the capture of Jerusalem (70). For a time he gave himself up to pleasure. But when he assumed undivided power (79) his character changed. He put a stop to prosecutions for læsa majestas, and decreed heavy punishments against informers. He completed the Colosseum, built the baths which bear his name, and lavished his beneficence upon the sufferers from the eruption of Vesuvius (79), the three days' fire at Rome, and the pestilence. He was now the idol of his subjects, but he died suddenly, not without suspicion of his having been poisoned by his brother Domitian.

Titus, a companion of the apostle Paul, was a Greek, and remained uncircumcised. Ecclesiastical tradition makes Titus 'bishop' of Crete.

Tocqueville, ALEXIS CHARLES HENRI CHÉREL DE, born at Verneuil of an old Norman line, 29th July 1805, was called to the bar in 1825, and became an assistant magistrate at Versailles. Sent in 1831 to America to report on the penitentiary system, he wrote De la Démocratie en Amérique (1835; 15th ed. 1868; Eng. trans. 1835), which made a great sensation in Europe. He became successively a member of the Academy of Moral Sciences and of the Academy. In 1835 he visited England, where he received an enthusiastic welcome from the Whig party, and married Miss Mottley. In 1839 he was returned to the Chamber of Deputies by the Norman farmers. After 1848 he was the most formidable opponent of the Socialists and extreme Republicans, and as strenuously opposed Louis Napoleon; but he became in 1849 vice-president of the Assembly, and from June to October was minister of Foreign Affairs. After the coup d'état he retired to his Norman estate, Tocqueville, and agricultural pursuits, and there wrote L'ancien Régime et la Révolution (1856), now regarded as too favourable to the Revolution. He had also written a work on the reign of Louis XV. (1846-50). He died 16th April 1859. Tocqueville's Œuvres et Correspondance Inédites (1860) were translated as Memoirs, Letters, and Remains (1861). See work by Jaques (1876), Tocqueville's Conversations and Correspondence with Nassau Senior (1872), and his Souvenirs (1892; trans. 1896).

Todd, JAMES HENTHORNE, D.D. (1805-69), a Dublin clergyman, author of a Life of St Patrick.

Todhunter, ISAAC, D.Sc. (1820-84), mathematician, born at Rye, studied at University College, London, and St John's, Cambridge, where in 1843 he graduated senior wrangler and Smith's prizeman. Elected fellow of St John's, he became its mathematical lecturer, and wrote manuals of Algebra, Geometry, Conic Sections, Trigonometry, Mensuration, Mechanics, the Differential and Integral Calculus, Analytical Statics, Plane Co-ordinate Geometry, and Analytical Geometry.

Todi, JACOPONE DA (c. 1230-1306), born at Todi in the duchy of Spoleto, from an advocate turned Franciscan about 1268, and was imprisoned 1298-1303 for satirising Boniface VIII. To him is ascribed the authorship of the Stabat Mater.

Todleben, or TOTLEBEN, EDUARD IVANOVITCH (1818-84), Russian general and military engineer, was born of German descent at Mitau in Courland. He served as lieutenant of engineers in the Caucasus, and was with the Russian army in the Danubian Principalities in 1853. Till he was severely wounded (June 1855) he conducted with skill and energy the defence of Sebastopol; thereafter he completed the fortification of Nikolaieff and Cronstadt. During the Turkish war of 1877-78 Todleben was called to besiege Plevna, which, after a brilliant defence, he took. He died at Bad Soden near Frankfurt, and was buried at Sebastopol. He wrote an admirable account of the defence of Sebastopol (French ed. 1864). See French and German Lives by Brialmont (1884) and Krahnert (1888), with Kinglake's and Hamley's histories of the Crimean war. [Toot-lay-been.]

Toland, JOHN, deistical writer, born of Catholic parents near Redcastle, Londonderry, Nov. 30, 1670 entered Glasgow University in 1687, took his M.A. at Edinburgh in 1690, studied theology at Leyden, and resided some time at Oxford. In Christianity not Mystrious (1696) he maintained that the value of religion could not lie in any unintelligible element, and that no part of the truth could be contrary to reason. The work created a great sensation, and was burnt by the hangman in Ireland. In Amyntor (1699) and other works he debated the comparative evidence for the canonical and apocryphal scriptures. The Hanoverian pamphlet Anglia Libera secured him the favour of the Princess Sophia when he accompanied the ambassador to Hanover. His later life as literary adventurer is set forth in D'Israeli's Calamities of Authors. In Nazarenus (1720) he insisted, like Semler and the Tübingen school after him, that there were two opposed parties in the early church—one Judaistic and one Pauline or liberal. He also wrote a Life of Milton (1698), an Account of Prussia and Hanover (1705), Adelsidemon (1709), and Origines Judaicae (1709). His Pantheisticon was an offensive parody of the Anglican liturgy. He died March 11, 1722. See Life of Des Maizeaux prefixed to his miscellaneous works (1747, including a History of the Druids), a German monograph by Berthold (1876), and, for Toland's partial anticipation of Semler and Baur, the Theological Review, 1877.

Tollens, HENDRIK (1780-1856), Dutch poet, and author of the Dutch national hymn. His poems still retain a hold on the popular fancy.

Tolstoi, or TOLSTOY, a noble Russian family. Count Peter (1645-1729) was a trusted agent of Peter the Great; Count Peter Alexandrovitch (1701-1844), one of Suvorof's generals, was under Nicholas I. head of a government department; Count Alexei Constantinovitch (1818-75) was a foremost Russian dramatist, a lyrical poet and novelist (his historical novel, Prince Serebrenni, was translated into English in 1874); Count Dmitry Andreievitch (1823-89), reactionary minister of Education, was a champion of Russian orthodoxy and the Russifier of the Poles; his Romanism in Russia was translated in 1874.

COUNT LEO NIKOLAIEVITCH, poet, novelist, social reformer, and religious mystic, born 28th August (o.s.) 1828, at Yásnaya Poliana in the government of Tula. He studied at Moscow and Kazan, joined the army of the Caucasus, was attached to the staff of Prince Gortschakoff in Turkey, and was at the storming of Sebastopol in 1855. He now retired from the army, and, already famous as a poet and novelist, spent a short time in the most brilliant literary and social circles of St Petersburg. Having travelled in Germany and Italy, in 1862 he married, and from that time lived on his estates near Moscow amongst his peasantry. During his residence in the Caucasus he wrote Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth; Memoirs of Prince Nekudoff; and The Cosacks. After the Crimean war he wrote three sketches of Sebastopol; during his foreign sojourn, The Snow Storm and the Two Hussars; next came Family Happiness, The Three Deaths, and Poli-kushka. The first of his two great works, War and Peace (1865-68), gives a vivid picture of the Napoleonic campaigns against Russia and the national defence. The other, Anna Karenina (1875-78), is a melancholy tale of an ill-fated marriage. He now resolved to devote himself to the problems of life, remedying its grievances, and becoming the "friend of the unfriended poor;' and all his later books were written with didactic aim. Ivan Ilyitch, What People Live by, Where Love is there God is also, Two Pilgrims, The Dominion of Darkness, The Kreutzer Sonata, The Christianity of Christ, What I Believe, and Life—all insist on an ideal of life in which revolutionary discontent and religious confidence, morbidly ascetic Puritanism, and an almost Buddhist resignation (denying the right of self-defence by force) are strangely combined. Having made over his wealth to his wife, he lived as poorly as a peasant in his wife's house. In What is Art? (1898) he taught that only that art is good which moves the masses, and to good ends; what is written for the select can only be bad art. In The Kingdom of God is Within You (1893), Master and Man (1894), Patriotism and Christianity (1896), and Resurrection (1900), his departure from orthodoxy became increasingly manifest, the Holy Synod excommunicated him, and he denounced the worship of Jesus as blasphemous and the sacraments as gross sorcery. In 1910 he suddenly left home, designing to end his days in ascetic seclusion, and, exposed to inclement weather, fell ill, and died at Astapovo on the 20th November. The standard English Life of him is by Aylmer Maude (2 vols. 1909-10); see also Kropotkin's Ideals and Realities in Russian Literature (1905).

Tone, THEOBALD WOLFE, born a coach-maker's son in Dublin, 20th June 1763, studied at Trinity College, and was called to the bar in 1789, but acted as secretary of the Catholic Committee, helped to organise the United Irishmen, and had to flee to America and to France. He laboured incessantly to induce the Republican government to invade Ireland, and held a command in Hoche's expedition. In 1798 he again embarked in a small French squadron, which after a fierce fight was captured. Tone was taken to Dublin, tried, and condemned to be hanged as a traitor, but cut his throat in prison, 19th Nov. 1798. See his Autobiography (1826; new ed. by Barry O'Brien, 1892), the Life in Dr Madden's United Irishmen (3d series, 1846), and the Duke of Argyll in the Nineteenth Century for 1890.

Tonson, JACOB (1656-1736), started as bookseller in London in 1678, and published for Otway, Dryden, and Pope. See Charles Knight's Shadows of the Old Booksellers (1865).

Tonti, LORENZO, a Paris banker in 1653, born at Naples, who proposed the tontine or latest-survivor system of life-insurance.

Tooke, JOHN HORNE, born 25th June 1736 in Westminster, the son of John Horne, a poulterer, studied at Eton and St John's, Cambridge, entered the Middle Temple, but in 1760, to please his father, accepted the living of New Brentford. Travelling as a tutor (1763-65), he met John Wilkes at Paris, and conceived the strongest admiration for him; but they afterwards fell out, and in 1771 had a rasping epistolary controversy. Horne, who in 1770 had composed the famous (unspoken) speech of Lord Mayor Beckford to the king, encountered, not without success, the formidable 'Junius.' In 1773 he resigned his living, and resumed the study of law. About this time his spirited opposition to an enclosure bill procured him the favour (plus £5000) of the rich Mr Tooke of Purley in Surrey. To this were due both his assumption in 1782 of the surname Tooke and the sub-title of his Epea Pteroenta, or the Diversions of Purley (1786-1805), that witty medley of etymology, grammar, metaphysics, and politics; he commenced it during an imprisonment for promoting a subscription for the Americans' bar-barously murdered at Lexington in 1775.' In 1779 he was debarred from the bar as a clergyman; in 1790 and 1797 stood unsuccessfully for Westminster; in 1794 was tried for high-treason, but acquitted; and in 1801 obtained a seat for Old Sarum, but was excluded by special act from the next parliament. He died at Wimbledon, 18th March 1812. See Life by A. Stephens (1813) and Thorold Rogers's Historical Gleanings (1870).

Toole, JOHN LAWRENCE (1832-1906), the most popular low-comedian of his day, was born in London, the son of the civic toast-master, went to the City of London School, and in 1853 gave up the desk in a wine merchant's to become an actor. He first played at Ipswich, then served an apprenticeship in the provinces, at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dublin. He made his first appearance in London at the St James's Theatre in 1854. In 1874-75 he played in the United States, and in 1890 in Australia. In 1879 he became lessee of the Folly Theatre, which he enlarged, changing the name to 'Toole's Theatre.' See his Reminiscences, chronicled by Joseph Hatton (1888).

Topelius, ZACHRIS (1818-98), Swedish poet and novelist, born in Finland, was professor of Finnish History at Helsingfors 1854-78.

Töpffer, RODOLPHE (1799-1846), artist and novelist, born at Geneva, founded a boarding-school in 1825, which he conducted till his death, and in 1832 became professor of Rhetoric at Geneva Academy. He wrote La Bibliothèque de mon Oncle (1832), Nouvelles Genèveises (1841), Rosa et Gertrude (1846), &c. His own drawings in his Voyages en Zig-zag (1843-53) are almost better than the text. See Lives by Relave (1886), Blondel and Mirabaud (1887), and Glöckner (1891).

Toplady, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE (1740-78), hymn-writer, born at Farnham, and educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Dublin, in 1768 became vicar of Broad Hembury, Devon, and in 1775 preacher in a chapel near Leicester Fields, London. A strenuous defender of Calvinism, he was a bitter controversialist. His Church of England vindicated from Arminianism (1769) is forgotten; but no hymn is better known than 'Rock of Ages.' In 1759 he published Poems on Sacred Subjects; his Psalms and Hymns (1776) was a collection with but few of his own. See Life by T. Wright (1912).

Torquemada, JUAN DE (1388-1468), Spanish Dominican, cardinal, and Latin writer.

Torquemada, THOMAS DE (1420-98), prior of a Dominican monastery at Segovia, persuaded Ferdinand and Isabella to crave from the pope the institution of the 'Holy Office' of the Inquisition, and, appointed its head, began in 1483 the work which has left his name a byword for pitiless cruelty. [Tor-kay-mah'-da.]

Torrens, WILLIAM TORRENS McCULLAGH (1813-94), born near Dublin, was Independent Liberal M.P. 1847-85 for Dundalk, Yarmouth, and Finsbury. The Artisans Dwellings Bill (1864) was his, and so largely was the London School Board (1870). See his Twenty Years in Parliament (1893).

Torrey, JOHN, LL.D. (1793-1873), botanist and chemist, was born and died at New York.

Torricelli, EVANGELISTA (1608-47), born at Faenza, came in 1627 to Rome, where he devoted himself to mathematical studies. His Trattato del Moto (1641) led to his being invited by Galileo to become his amanuensis; on Galileo's death he was appointed mathematician to the grand-duke and professor to the Florentine Academy. His great discovery was the interpretation, by the pressure of the atmosphere, of the fact that water will not rise above 33 feet in a suction-pump. To him we owe the fundamental principles of Hydraulics; he greatly improved both telescopes and microscopes, and he made not a few mathematical discoveries. [Tor-ree-tchel'lee.]

Torrignano, PIETRO (c. 1470-1522), Florentine sculptor and architect, according to Cellini broke Michelangelo's nose in a quarrel. He came to England in 1509 to erect the tomb of Henry VII. and his queen in Westminster; then settling in Spain, he died in the prisons of the Inquisition.

Torrington, VISCOUNT. See BYNG.

Torstensson, LENNARD, Count of Ortala (1603-51), Swedish general, accompanied Gustavus Adolphus to Germany in 1630, and in 1641 was appointed to the command of the Swedish army in Germany. He invaded Silesia, and, when driven back by the imperialists, turned and defeated them at Breitenfeld (2d November 1641). Next winter he swept the Danes out of Holstein, and then drove the Austrians back into Bohemia. In 1645 he advanced to the walls of Vienna; in 1646 was compelled by illness to return to Sweden. See Watts de Peyster's Eulogy of Torstensson (New York, 1872).

Toru Dutt (1856-77), a Christian Hindu girl of precocious genius, born at Calcutta, studied French and English literature, spent 1869-73 in England and France, and at eighteen published a critical essay on Leconte de Lisle, with translations into English verse. She next studied Sanskrit, and translated several portions of the Vishnu-purana into English blank verse. In 1876 appeared her Sheaf gleaned in French Fields (2d ed., with Memoir by her father, 1880); in 1879 a romance, Le Journal de Mlle. d'Arvers. Mr Gosse prefixed a Memoir to her Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan (1882).

Tournafort, JOSEPH PITTON DE (1656-1708), botanist, born in Aix, travelled in Greece, &c., and died professor in the Collège de France. His system maintained its ground till the time of Linnaeus. [Toorn-for'.]

Tourneur, CYRIL, a dramatist of whom we know only that he served in the Low Countries, and died in Ireland, Feb. 28, 1626, leaving his widow destitute. In 1600 he published his Transformed Metamorphosis (discovered in 1872), a satirical poem, marred by pedantic affectations; in 1609 a Funerul Poem on Sir Francis Vere; in 1613 an Elegy on Prince Henry. His fame rests on two plays, the Revenger's Tragedy, printed in 1607, and the (earlier and poorer) Atheist's Tragedy, printed in 1611. The Revenger's Tragedy, a tangled web of lust and blood, shows tragic intensity, condensed passion, fiery strength of phrase, cynical and bitter mockery. Fleay thinks it the work of Webster. There is a complete edition by Churton Collins (1878); and of the two plays, with two of Webster's, by J. A. Symonds (1888).

Tourville, ANNE HILARION DE COTENTIN, COMTE DE (1642-1701), born at the Château Tourville near Coutances, entered the French navy, and won fame by his services against Turks and Algerines, and the combined fleets of Spain and Holland (1677). In 1690 he inflicted a disastrous defeat on the English and Dutch off Beachy Head, and cast anchor in Torbay. In 1692, Louis XIV. having resolved to invade England on behalf of James II., Tourville sailed from Brest with forty-two ships of the line. The English and Dutch, eighty-two ships strong, stood out to sea, and the great naval battle of Cape La Hogue ended in the complete defeat of the French by Admiral Russell (19th May). Tourville was nevertheless made a Marshal of France, and, attacking an English merchant fleet under inadequate convoy, inflicted enormous damage (1694). His Mémoires (1758) are not genuine. See Delarbre's Tourville (1889).

Toussaint l'Ouverture (the surname from his bravery in once making a breach in the ranks of the enemy) was born a slave in Hayti, 20th May 1746, joined the negro insurgents in 1791, and in 1797 was made by the French Convention commander-in-chief in the island. He drove out British and Spaniards, restored order and prosperity, and about 1800 began to aim at independence. Bonaparte having proclaimed the re-establishment of slavery, Toussaint declined to obey, but was treacherously arrested, sent to France, and flung into a damp, dark dungeon near Besançon, where he sank after ten months, April 27, 1803. See his own Mémoires (1853), and French Lives by Saint-Rémy (1850), Gragnon-Lacoste (1877), and Schölcher (1889).

Townley, CHARLES (1737-1805), a connoisseur who lived much in Rome, and whose collection of ancient statuary, medals, &c. was purchased by the British Museum for £28,200.

Townley, JAMES (1715-78), London clergyman and farce-writer, from 1759 head-master of Merchant Taylors' School. High Life below Stairs (1759) was his.

Townsend, JOHN (1757-1826), founder of the London Deaf and Dumb Asylum, was an independent minister at Kingston and Bermondsey.

Townshend, CHARLES, VISCOUNT (1674-1738), born at Raynham Hall, Norfolk, in 1687 succeeded his father, who, though a Presbyterian, zealously promoted the Restoration, and was made Baron in 1661, Viscount in 1682. Charles entered public life as a Tory, but soon, as a disciple of Lord Somers, co-operated with the Whigs. He was one of the commissioners for the Union with Scotland, was joint-plenipotentiary with Marlborough at the Hague, and negotiated with the States-general the Barrier Treaty. Dismissed in 1712 on the formation of the Harley ministry, Townshend maintained a correspondence with the court of Hanover, and obtained the confidence of George I., who at his accession made him Secretary of State. With Stanhope he formed a Whig ministry, which had Walpole, his brother-in-law, for Chancellor of the Exchequer, and passed the Septennial Bill (1716). In 1721 he again became Secretary of State, but Walpole proved inevitably the stronger, and the colleagues became rivals and enemies. Walpole said the firm should be Walpole & Townshend; and Townshend retired into private life in 1730. He introduced the turnip into Norfolk from Germany, and greatly improved the rotation of crops.

His grandson, CHARLES TOWNSHEND (1725-67), the 'Weathercock,' entered the House of Commons in 1747 as a supporter of the Pelham (Whig) administration. The Earl of Bute gained him by the offer of the post of Secretary at War; but on Bute's resignation in 1763 he was appointed First Lord of Trade and the Plantations. In the Chatham ministry of 1766 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the Lower House. When Chatham abdicated the post of first minister, Townshend carried those taxation measures in America that led to the separation of the American colonies. His wife, the Dowager Countess of Dalkeith, had just been made Baroness Greenwich, and Townshend was about to be entrusted with the formation of a ministry, when he died. In his own time he was ranked as an orator with Chatham. Burke calls him 'the delight and ornament of the House of Commons; Earl Russell 'a man utterly without principle, whose brilliant talents only made more prominent his want of truth, honour, and consistency.' See Life by P. Fitzgerald (1866). [Townshend.]

Townshend, CHAUNCEY HARE (1798-1868), a wealthy clergyman who lived latterly at Lausanne, and wrote on mesmerism. Charles Dickens edited his Religious Opinions (1869).

Toynbee, ARNOLD, born in London, an aurist's son, August 23, 1852, went first to a military college; then at Balliol, Oxford (1874-78), became the leader of an attached circle of students, studied political economy, and read in a miscellaneous fashion. On taking his degree he was appointed tutor to the Indian civilians of his college. Believing that the poor could only be adequately helped by those who had lived amongst them, he himself took up residence in Whitechapel; and he lectured much to working-men in the North. He died 9th March 1883. Toynbee Hall in Whitechapel was founded as a memorial in 1885. See memoir by Jowett prefixed to Toynbee's Lectures on the Industrial Revolution (1884), and sketch by A. Milner (1895).

Tracy, ANTOINE LOUIS CHARLES DESTUTT, COMTE DE (1754-1836), French soldier, Academician, and 'ideological' philosopher.

Tradescant, JOHN (1608-62), a naturalist, the son of Charles I.'s Dutch gardener. See ASHMOLE.

Trall, HENRY DUFF, D.C.L. (1842-1900), journalist, biographer, &c., was born at Blackheath, educated at Merchant Taylors' and St John's College, Oxford, and called to the bar in 1869. He wrote The New Lucian (2d ed. 1899) and edited Social England (6 vols. 1893-97).

Trajan (MARCUS ULPUS TRAJANUS), Roman emperor, was born at Italica near Seville about 56 A.D. Gaining distinction in the Parthian and German campaigns, he was made prætor and consul (91), was adopted (97) by Nerva as his colleague and successor, and became sole ruler in 98. In 101 Trajan set out on his campaign against the Dacians. The struggle was long and fierce; but the Romans at last gained a decisive superiority, and in a second campaign (105) completely subdued their opponents, whose country became the Roman province of Dacia. In 113 the emperor left Italy for his great expedition in the East, directed mainly against the Parthians. He made Armenia and Mesopotamia into Roman provinces, but met with some defeats, as at Ctesiphon on the Tigris. Meanwhile the Jews rose in Cyprus and Cyrene; other enemies took advantage of the emperor's absence; and Trajan, already in failing health, set sail for Italy, but died at Selinus in Cilicia, August 117. Though most of Trajan's reign was spent in the field, the internal administration was excellent. Informers were severely punished and peculating governors of provinces prosecuted. The beautifying of Rome was carried on; the empire was traversed in all directions by new military routes; canals, bridges, and harbours were constructed, new towns built, the Pontine Marshes partially drained, and the magnificent 'Forum Trajani' erected. Trajan's mildness and moderation were proverbial, though he persecuted Christianity as subversive of the state. See works by Francke (2d ed. 1840), Dierauer (1868), and De la Berge (1877).

Trebelli, ZELIA (1838-92), the greatest mezzo-soprano opera-singer of her day, was born of German parents called Gilbert at Paris, made her debut at Madrid in 1859, and entered on a series of triumphs in Berlin, London (1862), Scandinavia, Russia, and the United States (1884).

Tredgold, THOMAS (1788-1829), architect and engineer, born at Brandon near Durham, was at first a carpenter. He wrote for periodicals and the Encyclopædia Britannica; but his chief works are Principles of Carpentry (1820; revised ed. by Tarn, 1886) and Strength of Cast Iron (1821).

Tree, SIR HERBERT BEERBOHM, was born in London in 1853, and educated in Germany. He first appeared as actor in 1878, became manager of the Haymarket in 1887, opened Her [His] Majesty's Theatre in 1897, and was knighted in 1909.

Tregelles, SAMUEL PRIDEAUX, LL.D. (1813-75), New Testament scholar, born of Quaker parentage at Falmouth, at twenty-five formed the plan of a Greek New Testament on the principles which he afterwards carried out (1857-72; 7th part, containing the prolegomena, ed. by Hort and Streane, 1879). He published many more works on the same lines. For years an invalid, he died at Plymouth, having left the Plymouth Brethren for the Church of England. [Tre-gel'-lez; g hard.]

Treitschke, HEINRICH VON, historian, born at Dresden, 15th Sept. 1834, studied at Bonn, Leipzig, Tübingen, and Heidelberg, and became a professor at Freiburg-in-Breisgau (1863), Kiel (1866), Heidelberg (1867), and Berlin (1874); he succeeded Ranke in 1886 as Prussian historiographer. A member of the Reichstag 1871-88, he died at Berlin, 28th April 1896. His chief work was Deutsche Geschichte im 19. Jahrh. (1879-94). See monograph by Lenz (Berl. 1896).

Trelawny, EDWARD JOHN (1792-1881), sprung from a famous Cornish family, entered the navy at eleven. Harsh treatment made him desert, and he is said (by himself) to have joined a privateer, and to have lived a life of desperate enterprise in Eastern seas. In 1821 he made the acquaintance of Shelley at Pisa, and helped to burn the drowned poet's body. Next year he accompanied Byron to Greece, and remained there some time after Byron's death. He travelled in America, lived a while in Italy, eloped about 1841 with Lady Goring, and spent his last years in Monmouthshire or Sussex. He published The Adventures of a Younger Son (1830; new ed. 1890), based on his own youth; and Recollections of the Last Days of Shelley and Byron (1858), recast in 1878 as Records of Shelley, Byron, and the Author.

Trelawny, SIR JONATHAN (1650-1721), became bishop in turn of Bristol (1685), Exeter (1688), and Winchester (1707); he was one of the seven bishops tried under James II., and is the hero of R. S. Hawker's ballad, 'And shall Trelawny die?'

Trench, RICHARD CHENEVIX, Archbishop of Dublin, was born at Dublin, 9th September 1807, and passed from Harrow in 1825 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1829. After a voyage to Gibraltar (its object to fight in the cause of liberty) he became curate at Hadleigh, incumbent of Curldridge, and in 1841 curate to Samuel Wilberforce, afterwards Bishop of Winchester. During 1835-46 he published six volumes of poetry, reissued in 1865. In 1845 he became rector of Ichenstoke; in 1847 Theological professor in King's College, London; in 1856 Dean of Westminster; and in 1864 Archbishop of Dublin, an office which he resigned in 1884. He died 29th March 1886, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. In philology he contrived to fascinate his readers with the 'fossil poetry and fossil history imbedded in language.' His principal works are Notes on the Parables (1841), Notes on the Miracles (1846), Hulsean Lectures (1846), Sacred Latin Poetry (1849), The Study of Words (1851), Lessons in Proverbs (1853), New Testament Synonyms (1854), English Past and Present (1855), Life and Genius of Calderon (1856), Select Glossary of English Words (1859), Studies on the Gospels (1867), and Lectures on Medieval Church History (1877). See his Letters and Memorials (1888).

Trench, WILLIAM STEUART (1808-72), Irish land-agent, born at Ballegrave, Queen's Co., made a great hit with his Realities of Irish Life (1869).

Trenck, FRANZ, BARON OF FREIHERR VON DER (1711-49), was born at Reggio in Calabria, where his father was an Austrian general. At sixteen he entered the army, but soon had to leave it, as likewise the service of Russia. In the Austrian war of succession he raised (1741) at his own cost a body of Pandours, who were even more distinguished for cruelty than for daring. On 7th September 1742 he attacked Cham, a town in the neutral Palatinate, and annihilated it. In 1745 he offered to capture Frederick the Great, and did secure the king's tent and much booty. He was suspected, however, of treachery, and imprisoned, escaped, but was recaptured, and condemned to lifelong imprisonment on the Spielberg at Brünn, where he poisoned himself. See his Autobiography (1748; new ed. 1807), Life by Hübler (1788), and another German Life (3d ed. 1868).—His cousin, FRIEDRICH (1726-94), born at Königsberg, the son of a Prussian major-general, in 1742 entered the army, and two years afterwards attempted an intrigue with the Princess Amalie. The discovery of a correspondence with his Austrian cousin led to his imprisonment at Glatz, whence in 1746 he escaped to take service with Russia and Austria. Having returned to Prussia on family business, he was imprisoned at Magdeburg by Frederick the Great (1754), and on his attempting to escape was heavily ironed. He was released in 1763, and settled a while at Aix-la-Chapelle as a wine merchant. Having ventured to Paris in 1791, he was guillotined by Robespierre. His Autobiography (full of exaggerations, 1787) made him more famous than his cousin, and had been preceded by his collected works (with poems, 8 vols. 1786). See also Life by Wahrmann (1837).

Trendelenburg, FRIEDRICH ADOLF (1802-72), philosopher, born at Eulín, from 1833 professor at Berlin, also sat as a Conservative in the Prussian Second Chamber. His principal works are Elementa Logices Aristotelicæ (1837; trans. as Elements of Logic, 1881), Logische Untersuchungen (1840), Historische Beiträge zur Philosophie (1846-67), and Naturrecht (1860). See works by Bonitz (1872), Bratuschek (1873), and Orphal (1891).—His son, FRIEDRICH, born at Berlin, 24th May 1844, is a distinguished surgeon, from 1895 a professor at Leipzig. [Tren'-de-len-boory.]

Trevelyan, SIR CHARLES EDWARD (1807-86), fourth son of the Archdeacon of Taunton, was educated at the Charterhouse and Haileybury, entered the East India Company's service, and was assistant-secretary to the Treasury (1840-59), governor of Madras (1859-60), and Indian finance minister (1862-65). He was created K.C.B. in 1848 and baronet in 1874, and wrote on educational and philanthropic subjects.—His son, SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, by his first wife.

Hannah, Lord Macaulay's sister, was born at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, 20th July 1838. He passed from Harrow to Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated as second classic (1861). In 1865 he became Liberal M.P. for Tynemouth, in 1868 for the Border Burghs, and he was a Lord of the Admiralty (1868-70), parliamentary secretary to the Board of Admiralty (1880-82), Chief-secretary for Ireland and a Privy Councillor (1882-84), Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1884-85), and Secretary for Scotland (Feb.-April 1886). Defeated then at the general election as a Unionist, in 1887 he was returned for the Bridgeton division of Glasgow as a Gladstonian and Home Ruler, was re-elected in 1892, and was again Secretary for Scotland until 1895. He resigned his seat in 1897. He is author of Horace at the University of Athens (1861) and The Ladies in Parliament (1869); Letters of a Competition Wallah (1864); Cawnpore (1865); Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay (1876); Early History of Charles James Fox (1880); and The American Revolution (12 vols. 1899-1905).—His son, GEORGE MACAULAY TREVELYAN, born in 1876, and educated at Trinity, Cambridge, has written on Wycliffe, the Stuart Kings, George Meredith, and Garibaldi.

Trevelyan, Sir Walter Calverley (1797-1879), geologist, teetotaler, &c.

Treviranus, Gottfried Reinhold (1776-1837), born at Bremen, practised medicine there, and wrote a very important work on biology (6 vols. 1802-22).—His brother, LUDOLF CHRISTIAN (1779-1864), was professor at Rostock, Breslau, and Bonn, and wrote on the physiology of plants.

Trevisa, John de (1356-1412), a Cornishman, studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and became vicar of Berkeley and canon of Westbury. He Englished Bartholomew de Glanville, Higden, &c.

Trevithick, Richard (1771-1833), born at Illogan, Redruth, but brought up near Camborne, became a mining engineer, and in 1796-1801 invented a steam-carriage, which ran between Camborne and Tuckingmill at from four to nine miles an hour, and which in 1803 was run in London from Leather Lane to Paddington via Oxford Street. He was out in Peru and Costa Rica 1816-27. The development of the high-pressure engine was largely due to his experiments and inventions. See Life by his son (2 vols. 1872).

Trevor, Sir John (1633-1717), was in 1685 elected Speaker, and was also made Master of the Rolls. Though a minion of Jeffreys, he was re-elected Speaker in 1690. For accepting a bribe as first commissioner of the Court of Chancery, he was expelled from parliament in 1695; he still, however, retained the mastership of the Rolls.

Tribonianus, born in Paphlagonia, held various offices under the Emperor Justinian, and is famous through his labours on Justinian's Code and the Pandects. He died in 545.

Tricoupiis, Spyridon (1788-1873), Greek statesman and writer, born at Missoloughi, was private secretary to Lord Guilford in the Ionian Isles, studied in Rome, Paris, and London, and joined the patriots on the outbreak of the war of independence (1821). He was thrice envoy-extraordinary to London, was minister of foreign affairs and of public instruction (1843), vice-president of the senate (1844-49), and envoy-extraordinary to Paris (1850). His Speeches appeared in 1836; his History of the Greek Revolution in 1838-57.—His son, CHARILAOS (1832-96), was foreign minister (1866) and premier 1886-90 and 1891-93.

Trimmer, Sarah (1741-1810), born at Ipswich, daughter of Joshua Kirby (q.v.), was a great favourite with Dr Johnson, and in 1762 married Mr Trimmer (1739-92), to whom she bore twelve children. Her Easy Introduction to the Knowledge of Nature (1780) was the first of a score of works for the young, forgotten now except The History of the Robins. See her Life and Writings (1814).

Tristram, Henry Baker, LL.D., writer on the Sahara, Palestine, Moab, and Japan, was born at Eglingham vicarage, Alnwick, in 1822, became a canon of Durham in 1873, and died in 1906.

Trochu, Louis Jules, born at Palais (Morbihan), 12th May 1815, after serving as adjutant to Lamoricière, and to Bugeaud in Algeria, in the Crimea became general of brigade, and distinguished himself at the Malakoff (1855). As general of division he fought at Solferino, and after the peace entered the Ministry of War. But the unpalatable truths contained in his L'armée Française en 1867 set the court against him. In 1870 he received a command at Toulouse, on 17th August was made governor of Paris, and under the republic became chief of the National Defence. Regarded as cautious and timid, he probably saw but too well the hopelessness of his task. He resigned the governorship 22d Jan. 1871, but remained president of the National Defence till the meeting of the National Assembly, of which he was a member. He retired into private life in 1873, and died 7th Oct. 1896. Works by him in his own defence are Pour la Vérité et pour la Justice (1873) and La Politique et le Siège de Paris (1874). [Tro-shee.]

Trollope, Sir Henry, G.C.B. (c. 1754-1839), admiral, in 1796 with the Glutton defeated seven French vessels off Helvoetsluis, and next year brought information to Duncan that led to the victory of Camperdown. Long troubled by gout, he blew out his brains.

Trollope, Mrs (1780-1863), born Frances Milton at Stapleton near Bristol, and brought up at Heckfield vicarage, Hants, in 1809 married Thomas Anthony Trollope, barrister and fellow of New College. In 1827, he having fallen into dire embarrassment, she went out to Cincinnati, and during a three years' residence in the United States amassed the materials of her Domestic Manners of the Americans (1832), much resented by Americans. Left a widow in 1835, she settled in Florence in 1843. Of her novels the most successful was, perhaps, The Widow Barnaby (1839), with its sequel, The Widow Married (1840). Her works (115 vols., twelve of them travels) deserved their popularity, but are well-nigh forgotten. See Life by her daughter-in-law (1895).—Her eldest son, THOMAS ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE (1810-92), was educated at Winchester and Oxford, in 1841 settled in Italy, and died at Clifton. He wrote Girlhood of Catherine de' Medici, A Decade of Italian Women, History of Florence, Life of Pius IX., Sketches of French History, and a number of novels such as La Beata, Marietta, Lindisfarn Chase, Gemma, The Garstangs, and The Dream Numbers. His second wife, Frances Eleanor Trollope, wrote Aunt Margaret's Trouble (1866), Black Spirits and White (1877), That Unfortunate Marriage (1888), and, with her husband, The Homes and Haunts of the Italian Poets (1881). See his autobiographical What I Remember (1887-89).—The third son, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, born in London, 24th April 1815, was educated at Harrow, Winchester, and Harrow again, and in 1841 became clerk to a Post-officesurveyor in Ireland. Here he acquired the love of hunting which never left him, and married in 1844; and while filling Post-office situations in Ireland, the West of England, and South Wales, he found leisure to write a long series of novels. The Kellys and the O'Kellys (1848) was one of his three earliest. The first which drew attention, The Warden (1855), was followed by a continuation, Barchester Towers (1857), possibly the cleverest of all his books. In rapid succession came The Three Clerks, Doctor Thorne, The Bertrams, Castle Richmond, Framley Parsonage (1861, originally in Cornhill Magazine for £1000, with illustrations by Millais), Orley Farm (1861-62, also illustrated by Millais), Rachel Ray, The Small House at Allington (Cornhill), Can You Forgive Her? (1864-65), Miss Mackenzie, The Claverings, The Last Chronicle of Barset (1867, one of his best novels), Phineas Finn (1869), He knew he was Right (1869), John Caldigate (1879), Ayala's Angel (1881), The Fixed Period (1882), An Old Man's Love (1884), &c. Trollope, who was a zealous servant of the Post-office, resigned his post as surveyor in 1867, when he became the first editor of St Paul's; in 1868 he stood for Beverley. Post-office work took him to the West Indies, Egypt, and the United States; latterly he travelled in Australia and South Africa; and he wrote books of travel on all these countries. Other works by him were a sketch of Thackeray ('Men of Letters' series, 1879), a poorish Life of Cicero (1880), and a short Life of Palmerston (1882). He died in London, 6th Dec. 1882. His Autobiography (1883) was edited by his son, H. M. Trollope, who also published novels and other works.

Tromp, MARTIN HARPETZCOON, Dutch admiral, born at Briel in 1597, went to sea as a child with his father, was captured by an English cruiser, and compelled to serve two years as a cabin-boy. In 1624 he was in command of a frigate; lieutenant admiral, he defeated a superior Spanish fleet off Gravelines in 1639. The same year he defeated another fleet off the Downs, and captured thirteen richly-laden galleons. On May 19, 1652, he was worsted by an English fleet under Blake. In November he again encountered Blake in the Strait of Dover, this time successfully, but it is probably a myth that Tromp now sailed up the Channel with a broom at his masthead, to denote that he had swept the enemy from the seas. On 18th Feb. 1653 Blake, with Monk and Deane, defeated Tromp off Portland, after an obstinate three days' contest. On June 2 and 3 another terrific battle between Tromp and Deane took place off the North Foreland, the Dutch being defeated. In the final battle with Monk, 31st July 1653, off the coast of Holland, the Dutch lost thirty men-of-war, but their greatest loss was the heroic admiral, the victor in thirty-three sea-fights, shot through the heart. He was buried at Delft.—His second son, CORNELIS (1629-91), served first against the Algerine pirates, became rear-admiral after the battle off Leghorn, shared in the defeat by the Duke of York at Solebay (1665), but next year had an ample share of the glory of Ruyter's four days' fight (June 1-4) off the Downs. He covered himself with glory in the battles against the combined English and French fleets, 7th and 14th June 1673. In 1675 he visited England, and was created a baron by Charles II. See Jacob de Liefde's Great Dutch Admirals (trans. 1873).

Troyon, CONSTANT (1810-65), landscape and animal painter, the first of the great French 'Naturalists,' was born at Sévres, and was trained as a painter on porcelain. See monographs by Dumesnil (1888) and Hustin (1893).

Trübner, NICHOLAS (1817-88), Oriental publisher, born at Heidelberg, came to London in 1843, and started his business in 1852.

Trumbull, JONATHAN (1710-85), born at Lebanon, Conn., was judge, deputy-governor, and governor of Connecticut, and took a prominent part in the war of independence. To Washington's phrase, 'Let us hear what Brother Jonathan says,' has been traced the personification of the United States. See Life by Stuart (1857).—His son, JOHN (1756-1843), painter, was born at Lebanon, and studied at Harvard. His best works are portraits of Washington and others, 'The Battle of Bunker Hill,' 'Death of Montgomery,' and four paintings in the Capitol, Washington. A gallery of his historical pictures belongs to Yale College. See Autobiography (1841).

Truro, THOMAS WILDE, LORD (1782-1855), born in London, and educated at St Paul's, had been twelve years an attorney when, in 1817, he was called to the bar. He made an enormous practice, entered parliament as a Whig in 1831, was twice Attorney-general, and became Lord Chief-justice (1846) and Lord Chancellor (1850-52).

Tryon, SIR GEORGE, K.C.B. (1832-93), vice-admiral, born at Bulwick Park, Northamptonshire, entered the navy in 1848, was at Sebastopol, and became captain in 1866, admiral in 1884. He was commander-in-chief on the Australian station 1884-88, and in the Mediterranean from 1891 till the disastrous collision (22d June 1893) off the coast of Syria, when his flagship, the Victoria, by his mistaken order, collided with the Camperdown, capsized, and sank with her commander and four hundred of her crew. See Life by Rear-Admiral Penrose FitzGerald (1897).

Tschaikovsky, PETER ILYTCH (1840-93), Russian composer, born at the mining town of Votkinsk in Perin, held a legal post before in 1862 he took up the study of music under Rubinstein. Eugene Onegin is his best-known opera; he composed also symphonies, quartettes, concertos, &c.

Tschudi, AEGIDIUS or GILO (1506-72), was active on the Catholic side during the Reformation in the Swiss canton of Glarus. His Schweizerchronik, continued from 1470 by Johannes von Müller, was long the standard Swiss history. See works by Fuchs (1805), Vogel (1856), Blumer (1871-74), and Herzog (1888).—JOHANN JAKOB VON TSCHUDI (1818-89), naturalist, undertook (1838) a voyage round the world, but only completed an investigation into the natural history and ethnography of Peru, Brazil, Chili, &c. He settled in Austria, and in 1866-83 was Swiss ambassador at Piana. He wrote on the batrachians, Fauna Peruana (1844-46), the Quichua language, Peruvian antiquities, &c. [Tchoo-dee.]

Tucker, ABRAHAM (1705-74), born in London, studied at Merton, Oxford, entered the Inner Temple, settled down to a country gentleman's life at Betchworth, Dorking, and wrote his Light of Nature Pursued (7 vols. 1768-78; with Life, 1805).

Tucker, CHARLOTTE MARIA (1821-93), 'A [Lady] Off [E]ngland,' wrote many stories from 1854, and died in India. See Life by Agnes Giberne (1895).

Tudor, OWEN. See HENRY VII.

Tuke, WILLIAM (1732-1822), a York Quaker, founder of a retreat for the insane, was, contemporaneously with Pinel in France, the pioneer of the new era of humanity and science in the treatment of the insane.—His son, HENRY (1755-1814), a Quaker minister, wrote theological works, and had two sons—SAMUEL (1784-1857), who wrote on Quaker subjects, slavery, and his father's system for the insane; and DANIEL HACK (1827-95), physician at York and Falmouth, and writer on the psychology of insanity.

Tull, JETHRO (1674-1741), born at Basildon in Berkshire, and educated at St John's College, Oxford, invented a drill, introduced new farming methods in his native county, and wrote agricultural treatises.

Tulloch, JOHN (1823-86), born at Bridge of Earn, studied at St Andrews and Edinburgh, and after holding charges in Forfarshire, was in 1854 appointed principal and professor of Divinity in St Mary's College, St Andrews, and was in 1878 Moderator of the Assembly. His Burnett prize essay on Theism (1855) was followed by Leaders of the Reformation (1859), English Protestants and their Leaders (1861), The Christ of the Gospels and of Modern Criticism (1864), Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in the Seventeenth Century (1872), Pascal (1876), The Christian Doctrine of Sin (1877), Modern Theories in Philosophy and Religion (1884), and Movements of Religious Thought in Britain during the Nineteenth Century (1885). See Memoir by Mrs Oliphant (1888).

Tully. See CICERO.

Tunstall, CUTHBERT (c.1474-1559), born at Hackforth, Yorkshire, brother of Sir Brian Tunstall who fell at Flodden, became rector of Stanhope, Archdeacon of Chester, rector of Harrow-on-the-Hill, Master of the Rolls, Dean of Salisbury (1519), Bishop of London (1522), and of Durham (1530). In 1516-30 he went repeatedly on embassies to the emperor (making friends with Erasmus) and to France. He accepted the Royal Supremacy, but took alarm at the sweeping reforms under Edward VI., and was in 1552 deprived. The accession of Mary restored him; under his mild rule not a single victim died for heresy throughout the diocese. On Elizabeth's accession he refused to take the oath of supremacy and was deprived, September 29, 1559. Six weeks later he died, leaving little beyond a defence of transubstantiation and some Latin prayers.

Turner, SIR CHARLES, Canadian Conservative statesman, born at Amherst, N.S., 2d July 1821, the son of a Baptist minister, took his M.D. at Edinburgh, and practised with distinction after his return in 1843, but took to politics in 1855, and was premier of Nova Scotia 1864-67, president of the Privy-council 1870-72, minister of Inland Revenue 1872-73, of Customs 1873, of Public Works 1878-79, of Railways and Canals 1879-84, and of Finance 1887-88. He was high commissioner for Canada in England 1883-87 and 1888-96, and in April 1896 became premier of the Dominion, but in the general election that followed was defeated by the Liberals under Sir Wilfred Laurier (q.v.). He was created a baronet in 1888.

Turner, MARTIN FARQUHAR, D.C.L., F.R.S., was born at Marylebone, 17th July 1810, son of an eminent surgeon, and studied at the Charterhouse and at Christ Church, Oxford. Prevented by a stammer from taking orders, he yet was called to the bar (1835), but soon found his true vocation in a life of authorship. Of his works, forty in number, one, Proverbial Philosophy (1838-67), brought him and his publisher a profit of 'something like £10,000 apiece.' His inventions were less successful—safety horseshoes, glass screw-tops to bottles, steam-vessels with the paddles inside, &c. From his huge 'archives' he compiled My Life as an Author (1880). He died at Albury, his Surrey home, 29th Nov. 1889.

Turberville, GEORGE (c. 1530-1600), poet, and secretary to Sir Thomas Randolph, wrote epigrams, songs, sonnets, The Booke of Faulconrie (1575), The Noble Art of Venerie (1576), an unpublished translation of Tasso, &c.

Turenne, HENRI DE LATOUR D'AUVERGNE, VICOMTE DE, second son of the Duke of Bouillon and Elizabeth of Nassau, William the Silent's daughter, was born at Sedan, 11th Sept. 1611. Brought up in the Reformed faith, he learned the art of war under his uncle, Prince Maurice, and in 1630 received a commission from Richelieu. During the alliance of France with the Protestants in the Thirty Years' War he fought with distinction, and in 1641 was entrusted with the supreme command. For the conquest of Roussillon from the Spaniards in 1642 he was in 1644 made Marshal of France, and received the chief command on the Rhine. For a time he was superseded by Condé; and his restoration to supreme command was followed by his rout by the Imperialists at Marienthal (6th May 1645). But on August 3 this disgrace was avenged by Condé at Nördlingen; and Turenne concluded France's share in the war by the conquest of Trèves electorate and of Bavaria (with the Swedes, 1646-47), and by a successful campaign in Flanders. In the Fronde, Turenne joined the frondeurs, and after being defeated at Rethel (1650) he withdrew to Flanders. On Mazarin's return Turenne joined his party, while Condé deserted to the frondeurs. Turenne twice triumphed over his former chief (1652), and forced him to retire from France; afterwards he subdued the revolted cities, conquered much of the Spanish Netherlands, and defeated Condé at the Dunes (1658). In 1660 he was created Marshal-general of France, and in 1668 turned Catholic. His next campaign in Holland was triumphant (1672), and in 1673 he held his ground against both the Imperialist Montecuculi and the Elector of Brandenburg. In 1674 he crossed the Rhine, mercilessly ravaged the Palatinate, crushed Brandenburg at Colmar, laid waste Alsace, and then advanced into Germany again to meet Montecuculi. Here he was killed reconnoitring at Sasbach, 27th July 1675. Turenne left Mémoires (published 1782); and there are Lives by Ramsay (1738), Ragueneau (1738), Duruy (5th ed. 1889), and Hozier (1885); with works on his strategy and tactics by Neuber (1809), Roy (1884), and Choppin (1875-88).

Turgenev, or TOURGUÉNIEF, IVAN SERGÉITCH, Russian novelist, born of a noble family at Orel, 9th Nov. 1818, and educated at Moscow, St Petersburg, and Berlin, after a year in a government office (1840-41) retired into private life. He published poems in 1843; but it was A Sportsman's Sketches (1846; best trans. by C. Garnett, 1895) that made him famous—especially for their vivid pictures of serfdom. His outspoken liberalism in a Letter on Gogol (1852) led to imprisonment and seclusion on his own estate till 1855. Thereafter he lived mainly in Baden-Baden (1863-71) and Paris, where he died, 3d Sept. 1883. In Roudine (1855; trans. 1883), A Nest of Nobles (1855; trans. as Lisa, 1869), and Helene (1860; trans. as On the Eve, 1871) he depicts scenes and characters from the period of enthusiastic dreaming; in Fathers and Sons (1861; trans. 1867), Smoke (1867; badly trans. in 1868, better in 1872, best in 1896), and Virgin Soil (1876; trans. 1877 and 1878) he deals with the triumph of Slavophil ideas, while caustically criticising Young Russia. He left several collections of epic and lyric poems and a series of dramas; of his other tales First Love, Mumu, Annouchka, An Unfortunate Woman, Rudin, and Spring Floods have also been translated. See Henry James, French Poets and Novelists (1884) and Partial Portraits (1888); C. E. Turner, Novelists of Russia (1890); De Vogüé, Le Roman Russe (1886); Paul Bourget, Psychologie Contemporaine (1888); and German monographs by Zabel (1883) and Thorsch (1886). [Toor-gen-yef; g hard.]

Turgot, a monk of Durham, confessor to St Margaret (q. v.), and Bishop of St Andrews 1109-15.

Turgot, ANNE ROBERT JACQUES, born of old Norman stock in Paris, May 10, 1727, was bred for the church, but adopted the legal profession, and joined the Philosophes. Appointed Intendant of Limoges in 1761, he found the people poor, degraded, immoral, and superstitious. He introduced a better administration of imposts, and abolished compulsory labour on roads and bridges, securing the support of the central government and of the rural priests. Soon after the accession of Louis XVI. (1774) he was appointed comptroller-general of Finance, and at once entered upon a comprehensive scheme of reform, reducing the expenditure and augmenting the public revenue without imposing new taxes. He sought to break down the immunity from taxation enjoyed by the privileged classes. He established free trade in grain throughout the interior of France, and removed the fiscal barriers which prevented free intercourse between the provinces. He abolished the exclusive privileges of trade corporations. But these efforts towards a more economical, efficient, and equitable administration moved the privileged orders to combine for his overthrow. Louis XVI. was too weak to resist such pressure, Turgot was dismissed after holding office for twenty months, and France drifted rapidly into the great catastrophe of 1789. The fallen minister occupied himself with literature and science till his death in Paris, March 8, 1781. His chief work, Réflexions sur la Formation et la Distribution des Richesses (1766), was the best outcome of the Physiocratic school, and largely anticipated Adam Smith. See Condorcet, Vie de Turgot (1786); Neymarck, Turgot et ses Doctrines (1855); John Morley, Critical Miscellanies, vol. ii. (1877); Léon Say, Turgot (trans. by G. Masson, 1888); and W. Walker Stephens, Life and Writings of Turgot (1895). [T'ir-goh.]

Turle, JAMES (1800-82), was organist of Westminster Abbey for fifty-eight years.—His son, HENRY FREDERIC (1835-83), was editor of Notes and Queries from 1878.

Turnebus, the Latinised surname of Adrien Turnébe (1472-65), who, born at Rouen, attained a European reputation as professor of Greek and Philosophy in the Collège Royal in Paris.

Turner, CHARLES, A.R.A. (1778-1857), mezzotinter after Turner, Reynolds, Raeburn, &c., was born at Woodstock, and died in London.

Turner, CHARLES TENNYSON, born at Somersby, July 4, 1808, the second son of the vicar (see TENNYSON), graduated from Trinity, Cambridge, in 1832, and was for many years vicar of Grasby, Lincolnshire. He took the name Turner under the will of a relation; and died at Cheltenham, April 25, 1879. Besides the Poems by Two Brothers (1827), he wrote 341 sonnets (collected, with introductory essay by Spedding, 1880).

Turner, DAWSON (1775-1858), botanist and antiquary, a Yarmouth banker.

Turner, JOSEPH MALLORD WILLIAM, landscape-painter, is believed to have been born at 26 Maiden Lane, Covent Garden, 23d April 1775, but he himself said that he was born at Barnstaple. A barber's son, he got little education, and throughout life remained almost illiterate.

About 1788 he worked with the architect Hardwick, who recommended him to become a pupil of the Royal Academy; he began exhibiting at fifteen. At eighteen he was sent by a publisher into four English counties; at twenty he had visited Wales; by twenty-one he had made architectural drawings in some of the principal English cathedral cities. In 1799 he was elected A.R.A., at twenty-eight R.A., and at thirty-three professor of Perspective. Turner never married, he kept aloof from society, he affected secrecy and obscurity, he was economical to miserliness, and by hard work and economy he soon attained pecuniary independence, producing pictures with remarkable rapidity. That his travels in France, Switzerland, and Italy were a part of his life is indicated by the title of one of his publications, Turner's Annual Tour. So he went on in solitary toil till old age, and died 19th December 1851, in a temporary lodging at Chelsea, under the assumed name of Booth. He was buried in St Paul's. Turner's artistic gift was a special faculty, cultivated to the utmost by a long life of the hardest labour and to the neglect of everything else. His dominant impulses were to make things more beautiful, mysterious, and sublime than they are in nature. His system of light and shade was founded at first on the old masters, with their heavy darks; but afterwards he worked out another scheme, that of pale general tones with a few strong darks for opposition. He was also an excellent etcher in pure line. His etched Liber Studiorum, begun in 1807 and cut short in 1819, was to have consisted of 100 plates, of which seventy-one were completed. He ranks, with Claude and Corot, as one of the three most famous landscape-painters. Although by nature very reserved and disposed to keep aloof from mankind, Turner was sometimes friendly and nobly generous. He bequeathed his savings (£140,000) to found an asylum for distressed artists, an intention thwarted by the lawyers because the testator was ignorant of legal forms. He further bequeathed his pictures and drawings to the National Gallery on condition that they were to be kept together in rooms bearing his name.

In 1798 an effect in the view of Norham Castle did much to found his reputation. The 'Battle of the Nile' (1799) was his first naval picture. By 1802 he had ceased to pay deference to topographic truth, and painted his famous picture of Kilchurn Castle. From 1803 we have Continental subjects: 'The Vintage at Mâcon,' 'Calais Pier,' also first studies of the Alps. To 1806 belongs the imaginative picture of the 'Garden of the Hesperides.' In 1807 he painted his 'Sun rising in Mist' in rivalry with Claude. 'Apollo and the Python' was the work of 1811; 'The Frosty Morning' of 1813; 'Crossing the Brook' and 'Dido building Carthage' of 1815. The year 1823 produced an idealisation of Italy in the 'Bay of Baia,' and idealised views of Yorkshire in Whitaker's History of Richmondshire; 1824, The Rivers of England; 1825, The Provincial Antiquities of Scotland; 1827-38, the England and Wales series. In 1829 came the great imaginative picture, 'Ulysses deriding Polyphemus'; in 1832, an idealisation of Italy in 'Childe Harold's Pilgrimage'; in 1830-34, vignette illustrations of Rogers's Poems; in 1834, illustrations to Scott; in 1833-35, The Rivers of France; in 1834, 'The Golden Bough,' a poetical picture; in 1838, 'Phryne going to the Bath as Venus'; and in 1839, 'The Teméraire.' In 1840 he entered on his decline; but in 1843 he painted 'Opening of the Walhalla, 'The Approach to Venice,' and 'The Sun of Venice;' and in 1844, 'Rain, Steam, and Speed.' See RUSKIN; and books by Thornbury (1862; new ed. 1897), Monkhouse (1879), Hamerton (1878, 1889), C. A. Swinburne (1902), Sir W. Armstrong (1903), Wyllie (1906), Hind (1911).

Turner, SHARON (1768-1847), a busy London attorney who published History of the Anglo-Saxons (1799-1805), History of England 1066-1603 (1814-15-23), Sacred History of the World (1832), &c.

Turner, SIR WILLIAM, F.R.S., anatomist, born at Lancaster in 1832, in 1867 became professor of Anatomy at Edinburgh, knight (1886), President of the General Medical Council (1898), K.C.B. (1901), and Principal of Edinburgh University (1903).

Turnerelli, TRACY (1812-96), a sculptor's son, and himself a sculptor, offered in 1879 a golden wreath to Beaconsfield.

Turpin, or TILPINUS, Archbishop of Rheims 753-800, the supposititious author of the Historia Karoli Magni et Rotholandi, which really was written after 1131 by a French monk of Compostella, and continued about 1220. In the Chanson de Roland itself Turpin dies beside its hero, and is buried with him and Oliver at Blaye. See Gaston Paris, De Pseudo-Turpino (1865).

Turpin, DICK, born at Hempstead, Essex, in September 1705, was, successively or simultaneously, butcher's apprentice, cattle-lifter, smuggler, housebreaker, high wayman, and horse-thief. He was hanged at York, 10th April 1739, for the murder of an Epping keeper. The myth of his ride to York belongs, if to any one, to 'Swift John Nevison,' who in 1676 is said to have robbed a sailor at Gadshill at 4 A.M., and to have established an 'alibi' by reaching York at 7.45 P.M.

Turretin, a family of Genevese theologians, descended from FRANCESCO TURRETINI, who emigrated for conscience' sake from Lucca to Geneva in 1579.—His son, BENEDICT TURRETIN (1588-1631), became pastor at Geneva in 1612 and professor in 1618.—His son, FRANÇOIS (1623-87), was pastor to the Italian congregation at Geneva, and from 1653 professor of Theology. He took a principal part in originating the Helvetic Consensus, and wrote an Institutio Theologiae Elencticae (1679-85; Edin. 1847-48).—His son, JEAN ALPHONSE (1674-1737), by far the greatest of the name, became pastor of the Italian congregation, in 1697 professor of Church History, in 1705 of Theology. He laboured to promote a union of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, and succeeded in abolishing the Helvetic Consensus in 1725. His famous Discourse concerning the Fundamental Articles in Religion was translated in 1720. His Cogitationes et Dissertationes Theologicae appeared in 1737. See Life by E. de Budé (1880).

Tussaud, MADAME (1760-1850), foundress of the wax-work exhibition in London, was born Marie Grosholtz at Berne, and learned the art of modelling in wax in Paris. For a time she gave lessons in modelling to Madame Elizabeth. Imprisoned during the Revolution, in 1802 she settled in London. See Life by Hayley (1878).

Tusser, THOMAS (1527-80), in Fuller's phrase 'successively a musician, schoolmaster, serving-man, husbandman, grazier, poet, more skillful in all than thriving in any vocation,' was born at Rivenhall, Essex. For a time a chorister at St Paul's, he was educated at Eton and Cambridge; and after a residence at court as a retainer of Lord Paget, he married and settled as a farmer at Cattiwade in Suffolk, where he compiled his famous work, A Hundreth Good Pointes of Hus- bandrie (1557). Quarrelling with his landlord, Tusser left his farm, and became a lay clerk in Norwich Cathedral, but again became a farmer. Tottel published (1573) an edition of his book enlarged into Five Hundreth Pointes of Good Husbandrie, with a curious metrical autobiography. Editions are by Mavor (1812), Arber (1873), and the English Dialect Society (1879).

Tuttiett, M. G., born in the Isle of Wight, as 'Maxwell Gray' has written The Silence of Dean Maitlead (1886), The Great Refusal (1906), &c.

Twain, MARK. See CLEMENS, S. L.

Twalmley, THE GREAT, invented the 'New Floodgate Iron' (? a box-iron), and vaunted himself thereof before the inn-fire. See Boswell's Johnson, March 30, 1783. [T'wan'lay.]

Tweed, WILLIAM MARCY (1823-78), one of the most notorious 'bosses' of the Tammany Society, was born in New York, and bred a chairmaker, but became an alderman 1852-53, sat in congress 1853-55, and was repeatedly in the state senate. In 1870 he was made commissioner of public works for the city. His gigantic frauds exposed in 1871, he was convicted, and, after escaping to Cuba and Spain (1875-76), died in New York jail while suits were pending against him for recovery by the city of $6,000,000.

Tweedmouth, EDWARD MARJORIBANKS, LORD, First Lord of the Admiralty in 1905-8, was born 8th July 1849, was M.P. for Berwickshire 1880-94, and then succeeded as second Lord Tweedmouth. He died 15th September 1909. [Marchbanks.]

Twining, THOMAS (1734-1804), a London tea-merchant's son, studied at Cambridge, and became in 1768 rector of White Nettle in Essex, in 1770 also of St Mary's, Colchester. His translation of Aristotle's Poetics appeared in 1789. See two works by his great-nephew (1833-87).

Twiss, SIR TRAVERS, jurist, born in Westminster, 19th March 1809, became a fellow and tutor of University College, Oxford, professor of Political Economy (1842-47), of International Law at King's College, London (1852-55), and then of Civil Law at Oxford. In 1858 he became Chancellor of the Diocese of London, in 1862 Advocate-general of the Admiralty, and in 1867 Queen's Advocate-general, being knighted that same year. In connection with a manful resistance to blackmailing, he resigned his offices in 1872, but in 1884 drew up a constitution for the Congo Free State, and in 1885 was legal adviser to the African Conference at Berlin. His writings rank among the most authoritative on questions of public and international law. Among them are Progress of Political Economy (1847), Lectures on International Law (1856), The Law of Nations (1861), Law of Nations in Times of War (1863), Monumenta Juridica: The Black Book of the Admiralty (1871-76), an edition of Bracton (1878-83), and Belligerent Right on the High Seas (1884). He died 14th Jan. 1897.

Twysden, SIR ROGER (1597-1672), a Kentish baronet and historical antiquary, was imprisoned for seven years as a royalist.

Tye, CHRISTOPHER (c. 1500-73), musician, musical instructor to Edward VI., received his Mus. Doc. from Cambridge and Oxford in 1545-48. Under Elizabeth he was organist to the Chapel Royal, and produced fine services and anthems.

Tyler, JOHN, tenth president of the United States, born in Charles City Co., Virginia, March 29, 1790, in 1809 was admitted to the bar. Having sat in the state legislature 1811-16, he then entered congress. In 1825 he was elected governor of Virginia, and in Dec. 1826 U.S. senator. In the case of the United States Bank he resented the despotic methods by which Jackson overthrew it, supported Clay's motion to censure the president, and, declining to vote for expunging this motion from the minutes, in 1836 resigned his seat. In 1840 he was elected vice-president. President Harrison died in 1841, a month after his inauguration, and Tyler became president. In the first year of his administration he had to face a struggle with the Whig majority, headed by Clay, who regarded his election as a victory for them and for the project of a re-established national bank. But victory lay with the president, whose firmness destroyed the project. Besides the Ashburton Treaty, the most important act of his administration was the annexation of Texas in 1845. Failing in his efforts at a compromise between North and South in 1861, he gave his adhesion to the Confederate cause, and was a member of the Confederate congress until his death, Jan. 18, 1862. See his son's Letters and Times of the Tylers (1884-85).

Tyler, Wat, leader of the peasant revolt of 1381. According to tradition, a tax-gatherer offered an insult to the daughter of Walter the Tiler at Dartford; Wat brained him; and under Wat and Jack Straw the populace rose throughout Kent and Essex. They freed the priest John Ball from Maidstone jail, and marched on London, where on June 14 Wat was struck down by the Lord Mayor, Walworth. See RICHARD II.

Tyler, Sir Edward Burnett (knighted 1912), was born at Camberwell, 2d October 1832. After travels in Cuba and Mexico, he wrote Anahuac, or Mexico and the Mexicans (1861). F.R.S., LL.D., and D.C.L., he was in 1883 appointed keeper of the Oxford University Museum and Reader in Anthropology; in 1895 he was made professor. He was in 1888 Gifford lecturer at Aberdeen, and president of the Anthropological Society in 1891. His Researches into the Early History of Mankind (1865), Primitive Culture (1871; 4th ed. 1903), and Anthropology (1881) stand first among works of their class. See the Zeitschrift of 1907.

Tymm, Samuel (1808-71), antiquary and Lowestoft bookseller, was born at Camberwell.

Tynan, Katharine, born at Dublin, 3d Feb. 1861, and educated at a Drogheda convent, in 1893 married Mr H. A. Hinkson. Since 1885 she has written Ballads and Lyrics; Oh, what a Plague is Love! A Lover's Breast Knot, &c.

Tyndale, William, born about 1484 in Gloucestershire (probably in Stinchcombe parish), graduated B.A. of Oxford in 1512, then seems to have resided at Cambridge, and in 1521 became chaplain and tutor in a household at Old Sodbury in Gloucestershire. His sympathy with the New Learning aroused suspicion, and in 1523 he went up to London. He was already a competent Greek scholar. In 1524 he went to Hamburg, and in 1525 to Cologne, where he began with Quentel in 1525 the printing of his English New Testament. This had not proceeded beyond the gospels of Matthew and Mark when the intrigues of Cochlæus forced Tyndale to flee to Worms, where Peter Schoeffer printed for him 3000 New Testaments in small octavo. A quarto edition was completed soon after. The translation owed much to Luther, much also to Erasmus's Greek Testament with its Latin translation. Tunstall and Warham denounced the book; hundreds of copies were burned; but in both forms it made its way by the summer of 1526 to the hearts of Englishmen. By 1530 six editions had been dispersed, yet so systematic was the persecution that only five or six copies remain of them. In 1530 Tyndale published at Marburg his version of the Pentateuch (reprinted 1885), where the marginal glosses, almost all original, contain violent attacks on the pope and the bishops. Here he leans heavily on Luther. In 1531 appeared his version of Jonah, with a prologue (fac-simile, 1863). An unauthorised revision of Tyndale's New Testament was made at Antwerp in August 1534, and in November Tyndale himself issued there a revised version. One copy of this work was struck off on vellum for presentation to Anne Boleyn, under whose favour apparently was printed in 1536 by T. Godfrey a reprint of Tyndale's revised New Testament—the first volume of Holy Scripture printed in England. Tyndale revised his Testament in 1535, this time without the marginal notes. He had spent two years in Antwerp, and already the emissaries of Henry VIII. had often tried to get hold of him, when in 1535 he was seized through the treachery of one Henry Phillips. He lay sixteen months in the castle of Vilvorde, was tried in 1536, and on 6th October was first strangled, then burned. Tyndale's chief original works were A Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1527); Obedience of a Christian Man, his most elaborate book (1528); and Practice of Prelates (1530), a pungent polemic. Tyndale's Works were published, with those of Frith and Barnes, in 1573. His Doctrinal Treatises were published by the Parker Society in 1848, his Expositions in 1849, and the Answer to More's Dialogue in 1850. See biography by Rev. R. Demaus (revised ed. by Richard Lovett, 1886); also Francis Fry's Bibliography of Tyndale's version in English (1878).

Tyndall, John, LL.D., D.C.L., physicist, born 21st August 1820 at Leighlin-Bridge, County Carlow, was employed on the ordnance survey, and for three years was a railway engineer. In 1847 he became teacher of physics at Queenwood College, Hampshire, and in 1848 studied physics and chemistry at Marburg. Already F.R.S., he was in 1853 made professor to the Royal Institution. In 1856 he and Prof. Huxley visited the Alps, which resulted in a joint work on glaciers. In 1859 he began his researches on radiation; a later subject was the acoustic properties of the atmosphere. In 1874, as president of the British Association at Belfast, he gave an address which was denounced as materialistic. He was for some years scientific adviser to the Board of Trade and to the lighthouse authorities, but in 1883 retired from most of his appointments. Among his works are The Glaciers of the Alps (1860); Mountaineering (1861); Heat as a Mode of Motion (1863); Radiation (Rede Lecture, 1865); volumes on Light, Sound, Electricity, Faraday, and the forms of water in clouds, rivers, &c.; Fragments of Science (1871; 6th ed. 1879), Hours of Exercise in the Alps (1873); Essays on the Floating Matter of the Air (1881); and New Fragments (1892). He died 4th December 1893 through an overdose of chloral. See the brief sketch, Life and Work (1894).

Tyrconnel, Richard Talbot, Earl of (c. 1625-91), born in Ireland, came at the Restoration to London, and soon gained the favour of the royal family by a readiness for dirty work. James II. created him Earl of Tyrconnel, with command of the troops in Ireland, and in 1687 appointed him Lord-deputy of Ireland. He strove to undo the Protestant ascendancy, but the Revolution brought his schemes to nought; and he tried in vain to intrigue with William. On James's arrival in Ireland in 1689 the Earl was created Duke of Tyrconnel. After the battle of the Boyne Tyrconnel retired to France, returned in 1691, but died in August of that year.

Tyrrall, SIR WALTER. See WILLIAM II.

Tyrtaeus, a Greek elegiac poet about 650 B.C., whose war-songs inspired the Spartans during the second Messenian war. According to later tradition he was a lame schoolmaster of Athens, whom the Athenians sent to Sparta as the most inefficient commander they could select.

Tyrwhitt, THOMAS (1730-86), born in London, was educated at Eton and Queen's College, Oxford, and in 1762 became clerk of the House of Commons. This post he resigned in 1768, and devoted the rest of his life to letters. His chief work was the well-known edition of the Canterbury Tales (2 vols. 1775; 5 vols. 1778). Others were a dissertation on Babrius (1776), a refutation of the antiquity of the Rowley poems (1778), and an edition of Aristotle's Poetics (1794).

Tytler, SARAH, the pen-name of HENRIETTA KEDDIE, born at Cupar-Fife, 4th March 1827, the author of Cityenne Jacqueline (1865), &c.

Tytler, WILLIAM, of Woodhouselee (1711-92), an Edinburgh Writer to the Signet, published an exculpatory Inquiry into the Evidence against Mary Queen of Scots (1759; 4th ed. 1790), and edited the Poetical Remains of James I. of Scotland (1783).—His son, ALEXANDER FRASER TYTLER (1747-1813), admitted to the Scottish bar in 1770, became in 1780 professor of History at Edinburgh, in 1790 judge-advocate, and in 1802 a judge as Lord Woodhouselee. His writings include a Life of Lord Kames, a Dictionary of Decisions of the Court of Session, and Elements of General History (1801).—His fourth son, PATRICK FRASER TYTLER (1791-1849), was called to the Scottish bar in 1813. His History of Scotland, 1219-1603 (1828-43) is still valuable. Other works were Lives of the Admirable Crichton (1819), Sir Thomas Craig (1823), Wyclif (1826), Scots Worthies (1831-33), Raleigh (1833), and Henry VIII. (1837), and Discovery on the Northern Coasts of America (1832). See Life by Dean Burdon (1859).

Tzetzes, JOHANNES (c. 1120-83), a Byzantine author, wrote Utiac, consisting of three very dull poems, Ante-Homerica, Homerica, and Post-Homerica; (2) Biblos Istorike, or Chiliads, a collection (in worthless verse) of over 600 stories, mythical, legendary, &c.; and commentaries on Homer, Hesiod, and Aristophanes.

BALDINI, PETRUCCIO (c. 1524-88), Florentine illuminator on vellum, came to England in the reign of Edward VI., and wrote an Italian version of Boece's Description of Scotland (1558), Lives of English and Scotch Worthies (1591), &c.

Uchard, MARIO (1824-93), playwright and novelist, was born and died in Paris.

Udall, NICHOLAS (1504-56), author of the earliest English comedy, born in Hampshire, was admitted a scholar of Corpus, Oxford, took his B.A. in 1524, and became the stern master of Eton and of Westminster, and canon of Windsor. His translations from Erasmus and Peter Martyr, his Flores for Latin Spekyng (from Terence), or his lost plays (De Papatu, Ezekias) would never have preserved his name without his Ralph Roister Doister, in the manner of Plautus, licensed in 1566. Editions are by Flügel (Gayley's Representative Comedies, 1903) and Farmer (1907).

Ueberweg, FRIEDRICH (1826-71), philosopher, was born at Leichlingen in Rhenish Prussia, and became in 1862 professor at Königsberg. His chief works are his System of Logic (1857; Eng. trans. 1871) and his History of Philosophy (1863-66; 8th ed. 1894; trans. 1872), written from an empirical and eclectic standpoint. See monograph by Lange (1871). [Ee-ber-wygg.]

Ugolino, COUNT, a Pisan, member of the great Ghibelline house of Gherardesca, with Giovanni Visconti, head of the Guelphic party, laid a plot to secure arbitrary power. The plot was discovered, and they were banished; but Ugolino, uniting himself with the Florentines and Lucchesa, forced the Pisans in 1276 to restore to him his territories. During the war with the Genoese, in the battle at Malora (1284), Ugolino, by treacherously abandoning the Pisans, occasioned the annihilation of their fleet, with a loss of 11,000 prisoners; still, when Florentines and other enemies of the republic gathered together to destroy it, the Pisans had no resource but to throw themselves into his arms. Ugolino now gave free scope to his despotic nature, persecuting and banishing all who were obnoxious to him, till at length a conspiracy was formed against him. Dragged from his palace, 1st July 1288, he was starved to death in the tower of Gualandi, with his two sons and two grandsons. His fate is treated by Dante. [Oo-go-lee-no.]

Uhland, JOHANN LUDWIG (1787-1862), poet, born at Tübingen, studied law at the university there, and spent eight months in Paris (1810-11). His first collection of Gedichte was published in 1815; to it he kept adding all the rest of his life, a 60th edition appearing in 1875. Other productions are admirable essays, Ueber Walther von der Vogelweide (1822) and Ueber den Mythus von Thor (1836); Alle hoch- und nieder-deutschen Volkslieder (1844-45); Schriften zur Geschichte der Dichtung und Sage (1866-69); and two respectable dramas, Herzog Ernst von Schwaben (1818) and Ludwig der Bailer (1819). Uhland entered the representative assembly of Württemberg in 1819 as Liberal deputy from Tübingen, and was also a delegate to the Frankfort Assembly of 1848. He is the acknowledged head of the 'Swabian school' of German poets. Longfellow translated some of his ballads in Hyperion; and translations by Platt (1848), Skeat (1864), and Sandars (1869) have also appeared. See Lives by his widow (1874), Dederich (1886), Holland (1886), and H. Fischer (1887). [Oo-lant.]

Ullathorne, WILLIAM BERNARD (1806-89), Roman Catholic bishop of Birmingham 1850-87, was a Pocklington grocer's son, and had been a cabin-boy, a monk, and a chaplain to convicts. He published Letters, Lectures, &c. See his Autobiography (1892) and Letters (1892).

Ullmann, KARL (1796-1865), theologian, was born at Epenbach near Heidelberg, and except in 1829-36, when he was professor at Halle, spent most of his life as student and professor at Heidelberg, where he represented a 'Mediation school' of theology. He wrote The Sinlessness of Jesus (1841; trans. 1870), Reformers before the Reformation (1841; trans. 1841-42), &c. See monograph by Beyschlag (1867). [Ooill-mann.]

Ulloa, ANTONIO DI (1716-95), Spanish statesman and mathematician, born at Seville, twice visited America, and in 1746, having been brought a prisoner to England, was elected F.R.S.

Ulphilas, or WULFILA (c. 311-381), translator of the Bible into Gothic, was born among the Goths north of the Danube. Consecrated a missionary bishop to his fellow-countrymen by Eusebius of Nicomedia in 341, after seven years' labour he was forced to migrate with his converts across the Danube. For over thirty years he laboured in Lower Moesia, visited Constantinople in 360 in the interest of the Arian party, and again in 381, only to die a few days after his arrival. As Ulphilas's Bible is several centuries older than the earliest written remains of any other Teutonic language, the value of Gothic in the study of Teutonic philology is very great. See Lives by Waitz (1840) and Bessel (1860), the Hulsean Essay by C. A. Scott (1885), H. M. Gwatkin's Studies of Arianism (1882), and G. H. Balg's Ulfilas (New York, 1891). [Ool'-fee-las.]

Ulpianus, DOMITIUS (c. 170-228 A.D.), Roman jurist, born at Tyre, held judicial offices under Septimius Severus and Caracalla, and, on the accession of Alexander Severus (222), became his principal adviser and praefectus praetorio. He was murdered by his own soldiery. He was a voluminous writer. In Justinian's Digest there are 2462 excerpts from Ulpian; the originals are almost wholly lost. See Abdy and Walker, The Commentaries of Gaius and the Rules of Ulpian (3d ed. 1885).

Ulrici, HERMANN (1806-84), born at Pforfen in Lower Lusatia, in 1834 became a professor at Halle. In philosophy he belonged to the theistic school of Fichte the younger. His first work was a history of Greek poetry (1835), followed by an ingenious essay on the dramatic art of Shakespeare (1839; trans. 1846). Other works are on the Hegelian philosophy (1841), the fundamental principle of philosophy (1845-46), and a system of logic (1852). His books Glauben und Wissen (1858), Gott und die Natur (1862), Gott und der Mensch (1866), and Leib und Seele (1866) appealed to a wider circle of readers. [Ool'-ree'tsee.]

Ulugh-Beg, grandson of Tamerlane, succeeded in 1447 to the throne. He was a successful warrior, but was defeated and slain (1449) by his rebellious son. He founded the observatory at Samarcand, and was himself a diligent observer. His astronomical works were written in Arabic, translated into Persian, and partly done into Latin by Greaves (1650) and Hyde (1665).

Unwin, MARY. See COWPER, WILLIAM.

Urban I., pope in 222-230, said to have been a martyr.—URBAN II. (1088-99), cardinal-bishop of Ostia, was elected pope in 1088, during the schismatic pontificate of Ghibert, styled Clement III. He laid Henry IV. of Germany under the ban and drove him out of Italy, triumphed by the same means over Philip I. of France, and aroused the crusading spirit by his eloquence at Piacenza and the Council of Clermont (1095).—URBAN III. (1185-87) consumed his reign in a struggle with the Emperor Frederick I.—URBAN IV. (1261-64), Jacques Pantaléon, the son of a cobbler of Troyes, was bishop of Verdun and patriarch of Jerusalem.—URBAN V. (1362-70), William de Grimoard, Abbot of St Victor at Marsailles, was elected at Avignon, but set out for Rome in 1367, only to return a few months before his death.—URBAN VI. (1378-89), Bartolommeo Prignano, born at Naples in 1318, was Archbishop of Bari. The French cardinals set up against him the Bishop of Cambray as Clement VII., who took up his residence at Avignon.—URBAN VII. died twelve days after his election (1590).—URBAN VIII.

(1623-44), Maffeo Barberini, born at Florence in 1568, supported Richelieu's policy against Austria and Spain, proceeded against Galileo, canonised Loyola and Philip Neri, and wrote sacred poetry.

Ure, ANDREW, M.D., F.R.S. (1778-1857), chemist, born at Glasgow, studied at the university, became professor of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy in Anderson's College, astronomer in the city observatory, and in 1834 analytical chemist to the Board of Customs in London. He made researches on Caloric, and produced a Dictionary of Chemistry (1821), a translation of Berthollet on Dyeing (1824), System of Geology (1829), Philosophy of Manufactures (1835), The Cotton Manufacture of Great Britain (1836), and Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines (1839; 7th ed. 1875-78).

Urfé, HONORÉ D' (1568-1625), author of the once famous pastoral romance, Astrée (1610-27).

Urquhart, SIR THOMAS, of Cromarty (1611-60), eldest son of Sir Thomas Urquhart, studied at King's College, Aberdeen, and travelled in France, Spain, and Italy. On his return he took up arms against the Covenanting party in the north, but was worsted and forced to fly to England. Becoming attached to the court, he was knighted in 1641. The same year he published his Epigrams Divine and Moral. On succeeding his father he went abroad. At Cromarty, though much troubled by his creditors, he produced his Trissotetrus; or a most exquisite Table for resolving Triangles, &c. (1645). In 1649 his library was seized and sold. He again took up arms in the royal cause, and was present at Worcester, where he lost most of his MSS. At London, through Cromwell's influence, he was allowed considerable liberty, and in 1652 published The Pedigree and The Jewel. The first was an exact account of the Urquhart family, in which they are traced back to Adam; the second is chiefly a panegyric on the Scots nation. In 1653 he issued his Introduction to the Universal Language and the first two books of that English classic, his version of Rabelais (q.v.). The third was not issued till after his death, which is said to have occurred abroad, in a fit of mirth on hearing of the Restoration. His learning was vast, his scholarship defective. Crazy with conceit, he yet evinces a true appreciation of all that is noble, and has many passages of great power. See his Works in the Maitland Club series (1834); Willcock's Sir John Urquhart (1899); and Whibley's Introduction to the Rabelais ('Tudor Trans.' 1900). [Ur'chart, eh guttural.]

Ursula, St. a saint and martyr, especially honoured at Cologne, the reputed place of her martyrdom. The legend is found in the 12th-century Chronicle of Siegbert of Gemblours, and fills 230 folio pages in the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum. Here Ursula, daughter of a British king, is sought in marriage by a heathen prince. She made it a condition that her suitor should turn Christian, and that she should be allowed three years to make a pilgrimage with her maidens, 11,000 in number. They sailed up the Rhine to Cologne, travelled thence to Rome, and, returning to Cologne, were slain by a horde of Huns. The Magdeburg Centuriators exposed this ridiculous story; the Jesuit Crombach defended it (1647). The 11,000 was perhaps a misreading, Undecim Millia, for Undecimilla, the name of one of the virgins; the bones shown in a Cologne church are a miscellaneous collection of men's, women's, and children's bones of all ages. See German monographs by Schade (3d ed. 1854), Kessel (1863), and Stein (1879); and Baring-Gould's Myths of the Middle Ages.

Usher, or USSHER, JAMES, was born in Dublin, January 4, 1581. His father was a gentleman of good estate; his uncle, Henry Usher (c. 1550-1631), was his predecessor as Archbishop of Armagh. At thirteen Usher entered Trinity College, Dublin; at nineteen he argued publicly with success against the Jesuit Henry Fitzsymons; in 1600 he took his M.A., and was chosen catechist reader in his college; in 1601 he received orders. About 1603 he became Chancellor of St Patrick's, in 1607 professor of Divinity, in 1620 Bishop of Meath, in 1623 Privy-councillor for Ireland, and in 1625 Archbishop of Armagh. He left Ireland for England in 1640, continued to live in England, declined to sit in the Westminster Assembly, and for about eight years was preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was constant in his loyalty to the throne, yet was treated with favour by Cromwell, who on Usher's death at Reigate, 21st March 1656, gave him a splendid burial in Westminster Abbey. He was distinguished less by his vast learning and sagacity than by his charity, sweetness of temper, and humility. He was Calvinistic in theology and moderate in his ideas of church government. Of his numerous writings the greatest is the Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti (1650-54), which gave us the long-accepted chronology of Scripture, the Creation being fixed at 4004 B.C. His Discourse of the Ancient Religion of the Irish and British (1632) and Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates (1639) opened up new ground; he edited SS. Polycarpi et Ignatii Epistole (1644); the Calvinistic Body of Divinity (1645) was published without his consent; his De Græca Septuaginta Interpretum Versione Syntagma (1655) was the first attempt at a real examination of the Septuagint. His complete writings were edited by Elrington and Todd (17 vols. 1841-64). See the Life of Archbishop Usher prefixed thereto, that by Dr Carr (1895), and W. Ball Wright's The Usher Memoirs (1889).

Uwins, THOMAS, R.A. (1782-1857), portrait and subject painter in oils, water-colour, and crayons, was born at Pentonville, and died at Staines. See work by his widow (1858).

VACHEROT, ÉTIENNE (1809-97), Academician, born at Langres, in 1839 succeeded Cousin as professor of Philosophy at the Sorbonne, but lost the post through the anti-clerical views in his Histoire critique de l'École d'Alexandrie (1845-51). La Métaphysique et la Science (1858) was his chief work; La Démocratie (1859) brought him three months' imprisonment. In 1871 he was returned to the National Assembly. [Vash-ro'.]

Valckenaer, LODEWYK KASPAR (1715-85), born at Leeuwarden, in 1741 became professor of Greek at Franeker, in 1766 at Leyden. He edited many Greek texts. [Val-keh-nahr'.]

Valdés, ARMANDO PALACIO, a Spanish novelist, born 1853, some of whose novels were Englished, as The Marquis of Peñalba, Maximina, Sister Saint Sulpice, Froth, and The Grandes.

Valdez, or VALDES, JUAN DE (1500-44), Spanish reformer, became an object of suspicion to the Inquisition, and settled in Naples. But he sought the regeneration of the Church from within, and never inclined to Lutheranism. Among his works are Spiritual Milk, The Christian Alphabet, and Commentaries, some of them translated into English (1865-83). See monographs by Stern (1869) and Carrasco (1880), and Life by Wiffen prefixed to his translation of Valdez CX. Considerations (1865).

Valentine, BASIL, a pseudonym framed to imply occult mastery over the metals (Basilius, 'royal'; Valentinus, from valeo), and given to the author of a series of alchemistic works, who seemingly flourished in Germany at the end of the 15th century. But Kopp (in his Alchemie) and Schorlemmer have proved that the actual author was Johann Thölde, who in 1612 published the Halographia under his own name, and in 1644 under that of Basil Valentine. The Triumphal Chariot of Antimony was translated in 1661.

Valentinian (321-375), Roman emperor, born at Cibalis in Pannonia, rose rapidly in rank under Constantius and Julian, and on the death of Julian was chosen as his successor (364). He resigned the East to his brother Valens, and himself governed the West with watchful care down to his death.—His second son, VALENTINIAN II. (372-392), received from his elder brother, Gratianus (q.v.), the provinces of Italy, Illyricum, and Africa. During his minority the Empress Justina administered the government; about three years after her death Valentinian was murdered by Arbogastes, commander-in-chief of his army.—His grand-nephew, VALENTINIAN III. (c. 419-455), the son of Constantius III., was seated on the throne of the West by Theodosius II., emperor of the East, in 425. A weak and contemptible prince, he never really ruled during his thirty years' reign; his mother, Placidia, governed till her death (450), and then the eunuch, Heraclius. Valentinian's treatment of Bonifacius made him throw himself into the arms of the Vandal, Genseric (q.v.), and thus lost Africa to the empire. He stabbed Aëtius (q.v.) to death (454), but next year was himself slain by Maximus, whose wife he had ravished.

Valera, DON JUAN VALERA y ALCALÁ-GALIANO, born at Cibra in Cordova, 18th Oct. 1824, held diplomatic posts at Naples, Dresden, St Petersburg, Lisbon, Washington, and Brussels, and was deputy, minister of commerce, minister of public instruction, councillor of state, senator, and member of the Spanish Academy. His literary studies (1864) and essays (1882) brought him reputation; but his fame depends on his romances, Pepita Jiménez (1874); trans. 1891), Las Ilusiones del Doctor Faustino (1876), El Comendador Mendoza (1877); trans. 1893), Doña Luz (1878; trans. 1892), and La Buena Fama (1895). A poet also, he died in April 1905. [Va-lay'-ra.]

Valerianus, P. LICINIUS (c. 193-260), was proclaimed Roman emperor by the legions in Rhætia after the murder of Gallus (253), and assumed as colleague his eldest son, Gallienus. Throughout his reign trouble hovered on every frontier of the empire; and marching against the Persians, he was completely defeated at Edessa (260). He languished till death in hopeless captivity, subjected to every Oriental cruelty.

Valerius Flaccus. See FLACCUS.

Valerius Maximus wrote c. 29 A.D. historical anecdotes, Facta et Dicta (ed. by Kempf, 1888).

Valette, JEAN PARISOT DE LA (1494-1565), nobly born at Tonlouze, became Grand-master of the Knights of St John in 1557. His life thenceforward is a series of exploits in warfare with the Turks, culminating in his heroic and successful defence of Malta, from 18th May till 8th September 1565, against vastly superior numbers.

Valla, LAURENTIUS (1405-57), humanist, born at Rome, taught the classics at Pavia, Milan, &c., incurred many enmities, but in 1535 found a protector at Naples in Alfonso V. He was expelled from Rome for attacking the temporal power in his De Donatione Constantini Magni, was prosecuted by the Inquisition in Naples, but in 1448 was again in Rome as apostolic secretary to Nicholas V. His Latin versions of Xenophon, Herodotus, and Thucydides were admirable; and he greatly advanced New Testament criticism by his comparison of the Vulgate with the Greek original. His De Elegantiâ Latinæ Lingvæ was long a class-book. See Italian monograph by Mancini (1891), German one by Wolff (1893), and Symonds's The Renaissance in Italy (1877).

Vallière. See LA VALLIÈRE.

Valpy, Richard, D.D. (1754-1836), born in Jersey, studied at Pembroke College, Oxford, took orders in 1777, and was head-master of Reading grammar-school 1781-1830, and rector of Stradishall in Suffolk from 1787. His Greek and Latin grammars carried his name far and wide.—His brother, EDWARD (1764-1832), head-master of Norwich School from 1810, published Elegantie Latinæ (1803) and a Greek Testament (1810).

Vambéry, Arminius, traveller and philologist, born at Szerdahely in Hungary, 19th March 1832. At twelve he was apprenticed to a ladies' dress-maker, but afterwards took to teaching. In 1846 he entered a school at Coronation, where he struggled to support himself, undaunted by want and privation. A desire for Eastern travel led him to Constantinople, where he taught French in the house of a minister, and in 1858 issued a German-Turkish dictionary. Having travelled in 1862-64 in the disguise of a dervish through the deserts of the Oxus to Khiva and Samarcand, he wrote Travels and Adventures in Central Asia (1864). In his writings and lectures Vambéry supports the idea that the rule of England in the East is most beneficent, that of Russia least so. A professor in Budapest, he has published works on the Eastern Turkish and Tatar languages, the ethnography of the Turks, the origin of the Magyars, &c.; also, besides frequent contributions to English and other periodicals, Wanderings and Adventures in Persia (1867); Sketches of Central Asia (1868); History of Bokhara (1873); Central Asia (1874); The Origin of the Magyars (1882); Arminius Vambéry, his Life and Adventures (1883); The Coming Struggle for India (1885); and, with Heilprin, Hungary (1887). [Van-bay-rec.]

Vanbrugh, Sir John, dramatist and architect, the grandson of a Ghent Protestant refugee, and son of a Cheshire sugar-baker, was baptised in London, 24th Jan. 1664, and educated in France, and by his wit, handsome figure, and geniality won a footing in society. In 1695 he was made a commissioner for finishing Greenwich Hospital. His first plays (1697) were The Relapse and The Provok'd Wife. With Congreve he started an unsuccessful theatre in the Haymarket, and there brought out The Confederacy (1705). In 1702 he built Castle Howard in Yorkshire, in 1705 was commissioned to design Blenheim Palace; but the 'wicked woman of Marlborough' long refused to pay him. He was made comptroller of royal works in 1714, and knighted; was Clarendon king-at-arms 1705-25; and died at Whitehall, March 20, 1726, leaving his Provok'd Husband unfinished. The interest of his plays is well sustained; the characters are natural and racy, the situations striking, the dialogue bright and vigorous; but he is grossly indecent. See Leigh

Hunt's Comic Dramatists, and editions by W. A. Ward (1893) and A. E. H. Swaen (1896). [Van'bro.]

Van Buren, Martin, eighth president of the United States, born 5th Dec. 1782 at Kinderhook, N.Y., was called to the bar in 1802. In 1812 and 1816 he was elected to the state senate, and in 1815-19 was state attorney-general. In 1821 he entered the U.S. senate, and was elected governor of New York in 1828. He supported Jackson for the presidency, and in 1829 became secretary of state. In 1833 he was elected vice-president, and in 1835 president, but by a popular majority of less than 25,000, largely owing to his opposition to the 'slightest interference' with slavery. His four years of office were darkened by financial panic; but he did what he could to lighten it by forcing a measure for a treasury independent of private banks. He was strictly neutral during the Canadian rebellion of 1837. In 1840 his party were overwhelmingly defeated by the Whigs. He lost the nomination in 1844 by opposing the annexation of Texas; and his nomination by the Free Soil party in 1848 only secured the return of the Whig candidate. He died at Kinderhook, 24th July 1862. See Lives by W. L. Mackenzie (1846), E. M. Shepard (1888), and George Bancroft (1889).

Vancouver, George (c. 1758-98), British naval captain, visited Vancouver Island in 1792.

Vandamme, Dominique Joseph (1771-1830), born at Cassel in Nord, in 1799 fought at Austerlitz, in 1806-7 reduced Silesia, but was defeated and taken prisoner at Kulm in 1813. He held a command during the Hundred Days, after the second restoration was exiled, but returned from America in 1824. See Life by Du Casse (1870).

Vanderbilt, Cornelius (1794-1877), born on Staten Island, New York, at sixteen bought a boat and ferried passengers and goods. By forty he had become the owner of steamers running to Boston and up the Hudson; in 1849 he founded a line, vid Lake Nicaragua, to California, and during the Crimean war he established a line of steamships to Havre. At seventy he entered on a great career of railroad financing, gradually obtaining a controlling interest in a large number of roads. At his death he left some $100,000,000, having shortly before given $1,000,000 to found Vanderbilt University at Nashville.—His son, WILLIAM HENRY (1821-85), greatly extended the Vanderbilt system of railways.—His eldest son, CORNELIUS (1843-99), left some £25,000,000. See Croffut, The Vanderbilts (1886).

Van der Goes, Hugo, Flemish painter, dean of the painters' guild at Ghent 1473-75, died insane in a Soignies monastery (1482). The Holyrood Stuart triptych has been ascribed to him. [Goos.]

Van der Linde, Anton (1833-97), born at Haarlem, in 1870 exposed the Coster (q.v.) legend, and had to quit Holland. He became librarian and professor at Wiesbaden. He wrote too on chess.

Van der Neer, Aart (1603-77), Dutch landscape-painter, of Amsterdam.—His son, EGLON HENDRIK (1643-1703), was a genre-painter.

Vandevelde, Willem (1610-93), the Elder, from Amsterdam came in 1657 to England, and became painter of sea-fights to Charles II. and James II.—WILLEM VANDELVE (1638-1707), the Younger, a really great marine painter, followed his father to England; Smith catalogues 330 of his paintings.—ADRIAEN (1635-72), his brother, was a pastoral painter. See E. Michel, Les Van de Velde (1892). [Van-deh-vel'-deh.]

Van Dyck, SIR ANTHONY, born at Antwerp, 22d March 1599, the son of a silk and woollen manufacturer, in his fifteenth year began to study under Rubens, and in 1618 was admitted a master of the Guild of St Luke. In 1620 he made a brief visit to England, when he appears to have executed the full-length of James I. at Windsor. In 1623 he started to study in Italy, and spent some time in Venice. At Genoa he executed a series of noble portraits, two of which are at Edinburgh. In Rome he resided for nearly two years, producing a 'Crucifixion' for Cardinal Bentivoglio, for the pope an 'Ascension' and an 'Adoration of the Magi.' By 1628 he was back in Antwerp, where he painted his great 'Ecstasy of St Augustine' for the Augustinian monastery, and 'Christ crucified between Thieves' for the church of the Récollets at Mechlin, now in the cathedral. About this period he executed the series of portraits of eminent contemporaries published as engravings (1641). In some twenty of these plates the painter himself etched the heads, and approved himself one of the master etchers of the world. In 1629 he revisited England. Next at the Hague he painted the Prince of Orange and his family and other princely persons. In 1632 he again came to London, was warmly received by Charles I., who knighted him and made him his painter in ordinary, with a pension of £200. He was back in the Netherlands during 1634-35, when he painted Ferdinand of Austria (now at Madrid) and many more portraits, 'The Adoration of the Shepherds' in the church at Termonde, and 'The Deposition,' now in the Antwerp Museum. In England, his home for the next five years, he executed the group of the king, queen, and two children at Windsor, and painted nearly every distinguished person at court. About 1639 he married Lady Mary Ruthven, a granddaughter of the Earl of Gowrie. Lavish in his pleasures, he suffered from pecuniary straits, and frequently found difficulty in obtaining payment for the royal commissions. In 1640 he visited Antwerp for the last time, and then passed to Paris. He returned to England, and dying at Blackfriars, 9th December 1641, was buried in old St Paul's. Van Dyck is one of the most refined and graceful of painters. His portraits are full of expression, easy and natural. Most of the great English galleries contain examples of his art; there are seven in the National Gallery. See Smith's Catalogue Raisonné (1831); W. H. Carpenter's monograph (1844); the article by Lemcke in Dohme's Kunst und Künstler (1875); Wibral, Iconographie (1877); P. R. Head, Van Dyck and Hals (1879); and books on his life and paintings by Michiel (Par. 1881), Guiffrey (trans. 1896), Knackfuss (trans. 1899), and Lionel Cust (1900 and 1902).

Van Dyck, ERNEST MARIE HUBERT, Wagnerian tenor at Vienna, Baireuth, Paris, &c., was born at Antwerp, 2d April 1861.

Vane, SIR HENRY, was born at Hadlow, Kent, about 1615. His father, 'Old Sir Henry' (1586-1654), was a bustling and time-serving statesman, who rose to be principal secretary of state, but who, having, with his son, been a chief agent in Strafford's destruction, was deprived of his offices, and sided thereafter with the triumphant party. Passing in 1628 from Westminster to Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 'Young Sir Henry' seems there to have embraced those republican principles for which he afterwards became so famous. His travels to Vienna and Geneva (1631) confirmed his aversion to the Church of England, and in 1635 he sailed for New England. He was chosen governor of Massachusetts; but his advocacy of toleration, and bias to the Antinomian views of Anne Hutchinson (q.v.), soon robbed him of his popularity, and in 1637 he returned to England. In 1640 he entered parliament for Hull, was made joint treasurer of the navy, and was knighted. When the civil war broke out no man was more conspicuous in military and theological politics than Vane, the close friend of Pym and Hampden. He relinquished the profits of his office (equivalent now to £30,000 per annum); he carried to the Upper House the articles of impeachment against Laud; he was a 'great promoter of the Solemn League and Covenant' (though in his heart he abhorred both it and presbytery, and used them solely to attain his ends); with Cromwell he engineered the Self-denying Ordinance and the New Model (1644-45); and through the ten years 1643-53 he was unmistakably the civil leader—'that in the state,' said his enemy Baxter, 'which Cromwell was in the field.' But he had no share in the execution of the king, and he did not view with satisfaction the growing power of Cromwell and the army. On the establishment of the Commonwealth he was appointed one of the Council of State; but it was largely Cromwell's dislike to his redistribution bill (1653) that prompted the dissolution of the 'Rump.' Retiring to his Durlam seat, Raby Castle, he wrote his Healing Question (1656), whose hostility to the protectorate brought him four months' imprisonment in Carisbrooke Castle. On Cromwell's death he returned to public life, but in the July following the Restoration was arrested and sent to the Tower. Thence he was shifted to the Scilly Islands, thence brought back to be tried for high-treason, and on 14th June 1662 beheaded upon Tower Hill. His youngest son was raised to the peerage by William III., and from him the Duke of Cleveland is descended. Vane was a singular compound of a high-minded and far-seeing statesman and of a fanatical Fifth Monarchist. Rightly to comprehend him one should study his incomprehensible writings. See Lives by Sikes (1662), Upham (Spark's 'American Biography,' 1835), John Forster (1840), J. K. Hosmer (1888), and W. W. Ireland (1907).

Vanini, LUCILIO (1585-1619), freethinker, born at Taurisano, studied the new learning and science at Naples and Padua, and took orders, but his 'Naturalist' views soon brought him into collision with the church. Having taught in France, Switzerland, and the Low Countries, he had to flee in 1614 to England, where also he was imprisoned. Finally, at Toulouse, having first had his tongue cut out, he was strangled and burned. From his Amphitheatrum Eternæ Providentiæ (1615) and his De Admirandis Naturæ Arcanis (1616) it is plain that, if not an atheist, he taught pantheism of an extreme type. He was more notable for vanity and audacity than for learning or originality. See monographs by Fuhrmann (Leip. 1800), Vaisse (Par. 1871), and Palumbo (Naples, 1878), and John Owen's Skeptics of the Italian Renaissance (1893). [Van-ee'nee.]

Van Laun, HENRI (1820-96), a Dutchman, for fifty years a French master and examiner in England, translated Taine, Molière, &c.

Vanloo, JEAN BAPTISTE (1684-1745), born at Aix in Provence of Flemish parentage, studied at Rome, and after 1719 made a great reputation as a portrait-painter at Paris. He became a member of the Academy in 1731, and professor of Painting in 1735; and in 1737 visited London, where he painted Colley Cibber and Sir Robert Walpole.—CHARLES ANDRÉ VAN LOO (1705–65), his younger brother, born at Nice, likewise studied at Rome, settled in Paris, and became in 1735 a member of the Academy, as later a knight of the order of St Michael and chief painter to the king. [Van-lō.]

Vannucci. See PERUGINO.

Van Rensselaer, STEPHEN (1765–1839), eighth 'patron' of the vast estate near Albany, now forming three counties, was born in New York, was a leader of the Federalists in his state, and served in congress 1823–29. In the war of 1812 he held command on the northern frontier, and captured Queenston Heights; but the refusal of his militia to cross the Niagara enabled the British to recover the place, and the general resigned. He promoted the construction of the Erie and Champlain Canals. [Ren'sel-ler.]

Vansittart, NICHOLAS (1766–1851), was the son of a governor of Bengal, descendant of a family originally from Sittart in Jülich. He was called to the bar in 1791, entered parliament as a Tory in 1796, was Chancellor of the Exchequer 1812–23, and in 1823 was created Lord Bexley.

Van't Hoff, JACOBUS HENDRICUS, a great chemist whose researches have profoundly influenced modern chemical theory, was born at Rotterdam, 30th August 1852, and became professor at Berlin in 1896. He died in 1911.

Van Veen, OTTO (c. 1556–1634), painter, born at Leyden, settled first at Brussels, next at Antwerp, where Rubens was his pupil. The name Van Veen is also sometimes given to the Haarlem painter, MARTIN VAN HEEMSKERK (1498–1574).

Varley, JOHN (1778–1842), painter, born at Hackney, was a founder of the Water-colour Society. He believed in astrology, and wrote on perspective.—His brother, CORNELIUS (1781–1873), was also a water-colourist, and invented the graphic telescope.—His son, CROMWELL FLEETWOOD, F.R.S. (1828–83), advanced telegraphy. See Story's James Holmes and John Varley (1895).

Varnhagen von Ense, KARL AUGUST (1785–1858), born at Düsseldorf, in 1809 joined the Austrian army and was wounded at Wagram, in 1813 passed over to the Russian service, and went to Paris as adjutant. Here he was called to the Prussian diplomatic service, and accompanied Hardenberg to the Congress of Vienna (1814) and to Paris, becoming next resident minister at Carlsruhe (till 1819). He had married in 1814 the charming Jewess, Rahel (q.v.). His works include Lives of Goethe (1823), Marshal Keith (1844), Gen. von Bülow (1853), &c.; Biographische Denkwürdigkeiten (1843–59). His Correspondence and Diaries fill 22 vols. (1860–70). [Farn-hah'gen fon En'seh.]

Varro, MARCUS TERENTIUS, born at Reate in 116 B.C., studied at Athens, saw service under Pompey, and in the civil war was legate in Spain. He awaited the result of Pharsalia with Cicero and Cato at Dyrrachium, and was kindly treated by the conqueror, who appointed him librarian. Under the second triumvirate Antony plundered his villa, burned his books, and placed his name in the list of the proscribed. But he was soon exempted, and Augustus restored his property. A man of upright and honourable character, he survived till 27 B.C. His total works amounted to 620 books. Of the poems we know nothing but the names. But of the 150 books of the Satura Menippeæ, a medley of prose and verse, fragments (ed. Bücheler, 1882) remain. His prose writings embraced oratory, history, jurisprudence, grammar, philosophy, geography, and husbandry. The chief were Antiquitates Herum Humanarum et Divinarum; De Lingua Latina, of whose twenty-five books only v.–x. are extant (ed. K. O. Müller, 1823; Spengel, 1885); and Herum Rusticarum Libri III., almost entire (ed. Keil, 1884–91). His Disciplinarum Libri IX. was an encyclopædia of the liberal arts; his Imagines, or Hebdomades, a series of 700 Greek and Roman biographies.—PUBLIUS TERENTIUS VARRO (c. 82–37 B.C.), called Atacinus from his birth at Atax in Narbonensian Gaul, wrote satires and an epic on Cæsar's Gallic wars. His Argonautica was an adaptation of Apollonius Rhodius; his erotic elegies pleased Propertius.

Varus, PUBLIUS QUINTILIUS, consul in 13 B.C., next governor of Syria, in 6 A.D. was sent by Augustus to command in Germany. Utterly routed by Arminius (q.v.), he killed himself.

Vasari, GIORGIO (1511–74), born at Arezzo, studied under Michelangelo, and lived mostly at Florence and Rome. He was a greater architect than painter; but to-day his fame rests on his Vite de' più eccellenti Pittori, Architetti, e Scultori (1550; best ed. by Milanese, 1878–85; Eng. trans. by Blashfield and Hopkins (1897)). In spite of inaccuracies in the earlier biographies, it remains a model of art criticism and biography. [Va-zah'ree.]

Vatke, WILHELM (1806–82), German theologian, professor at Berlin from 1837.

Vattel, EMÉRIC DE (1714–67), born at Courret in Neuchâtel (then Prussian), entered the diplomatic service of Saxony, and 1746–64 was Saxon representative at Bern. His Droits des Gens (1758; trans. 1834) systematised the doctrines of Grotius, Puffendorf, and Wolf.

Vauban, SÉBASTIEN LE PRESTRE DE, born at Saint Léger near Avallon, 1st May 1633, enlisted under Condé, and followed him into the service of Spain. Taken prisoner in 1653, he was persuaded by Mazarin to enter the French king's service; by 1658 he was chief engineer under Turenne; and eight years of peace he devoted to works at Dunkirk and elsewhere. In 1667 he helped to reduce Lille; in 1672–78 in the Netherlands he took part in seventeen sieges and one defence. He introduced the method of approach by parallels at the siege of Maestricht (1673) with great effect; notable also were his defence of Oudenarde and the sieges of Valenciennes and Cambrai. During 1678–88 he surrounded the kingdom with a cordon of fortresses; and he planned the magnificent aqueduct of Maintenon. In 1703 he became marshal of France. He conducted the sieges of Philippsburg (1688)—introducing here his invention of ricochet-batteries—Mannheim, Mons (1691), Namur (1692), Charleroi (1693), Ath (1697), and Breisach (1704), and constructed the entrenched camp near Dunkirk (1706). After the peace of Ryswick in 1697 he had applied himself to study the faults in the government of France. His Dîme Royal (1707), in which he discussed the question of taxation and anticipated the doctrines which eighty years later overthrew the French monarchy, was condemned and prohibited. He died 13th March 1707. Honest, kindly, and of indomitable courage, Vauban never sustained a reverse; conducted fifty successful sieges; designed or improved more than 160 fortresses; and invented the socket instead of the plug bayonet (1687). See French works by Chainbray (1840), Michel (1879), and Ambert

(1882); and Major E. M. Lloyd's Vauban, Montallembert, Carnot (1887). [Vo-bow.]

Vaughan, CHARLES JOHN, born in 1816 at St Martin's vicarage, Leicester, from Rugby passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as senior classic and chancellor's medallist. A fellow of his college, he was vicar of St Martin's, Leicester, 1841-44; head-master of Harrow 1844-59; vicar of Doncaster 1860-69; Master of the Temple 1869-94; and Dean of Llandaff from 1879. He died 15th October 1897. An eloquent preacher of the liberal evangelical school, he published Sermons, Lectures, Prayers, &c. [Fawn.]

Vaughan, HENRY, the self-styled 'Silurist' as a native of South Wales, the land of the old Silures, was born 17th April 1622, at Newton-by-Usk, Llanisaintfraed, Breconshire, twin-brother of the alchemist and Rosicrucian, the Rev. Thomas Vaughan (1622-66). He entered Jesus College, Oxford, in 1638, and in 1646 published Poems, with the tenth Satyre of Juvenal Englished. He took his M.D., and practised first at, then near, Brecon. The collection of poems entitled Olor Iseanus was published by his brother without authority in 1651. In 1650-55 he printed his Silix Scintillans, pious meditations, and in 1652 The Mount of Olives, devotions in prose, and the Flores Solitudinis, also in prose. Thalia Rediviva: the Pastimes and Diversions of a Country Muse, a collection of elegies, translations, religious pieces, &c., was also published without authority (1678) by a friend. He died at his birthplace, 23d April 1695. Vaughan's poetry is very unequal; at his best he reaches an exquisiteness of phantasy and of expression beyond the reach of George Herbert. There is a complete edition by Grosart (1868-71), one of Silix Scintillans by Lyte in 1847, and editions of the Poems by E. K. Chambers (1896) and E. Hutton (1904). See Dr John Brown's Horæ Subsecivæ, and Prof. F. T. Palgrave in Cymmrodorion (1891).

Vaughan, HERBERT, Cardinal, born at Gloucester, 15th April 1832, the eldest son of Lieut-col. Vaughan of Courtfield, Ross, was educated at Stonyhurst and at Rome, entered the priesthood in 1854, and in 1872 was consecrated Bishop of Salford. In 1892 he succeeded Manning as Archbishop of Westminster, next year was raised to the cardinalate, and died 19th June 1903. He was founder of St Joseph's College for foreign missions at Mill Hill, Hendon, and proprietor of the Tablet and the Dublin Review.—His brother, ROGER WILLIAM BEDE VAUGHAN (1834-83), from 1877 was Archbishop of Sydney, having three years before become coadjutor. He wrote a Life of St Thomas Aquinas (1871-72).

Vaughan, ROBERT, D.D. (1795-1868), born in Wales, was Independent minister at Worcester and Kensington, professor of History in London University 1830-43, and president of the Independent College at Manchester 1843-57. He founded the British Quarterly in 1845, and edited it till 1867. Among his books are Life of Wycliffe (1828), History of England under the Stuarts (1840), and Revolutions in History (1859-63).

Vauquelin, LOUIS NICOLAS (1763-1829), chemist, was born and died at St André d'Hébertot in Normandy.

Vauvenargues, LUC DE CLAPIERS, MARQUIS DE (1715-47), born at Aix, entered the army in 1733, fought at Dettingen, but retired in impaired health in 1743 to settle at Paris. In 1746 he published, anonymously, his Introduction à la Connaissance de l'Esprit Humain, with Réflexions et Maximes appended. The best editions are by

Gilbert (1857) and Plon (1874). See Sainte-Beuve's Causeries du Lundi, vols. iii. and xiv.; also Paléologue's monograph (1890). [Vove-narg.]

Vedder, DAVID (1790-1854), sailor, custom-house officer, and versifier, was born at Deerness, Orkney, and died in Edinburgh.

Vedder, ELIJAH, American painter, born at New York, 26th Feb. 1836, studied at Paris and in Italy—Rome his ultimate residence. His subjects are mostly ideal—'The Lair of the Sea-serpent,' 'Fisherman and Djinn,' 'Death of Abel,' 'Greek Actor's Daughter,' 'Cumean Sibyl,' 'Nausicaa and her Companions'; and he has finely illustrated Edward FitzGerald's Omar Khayyám (1884).

Vega Carpio, LOPE FELIX DE, born at Madrid, 25th Nov. 1562, lost his parents early; was a student and graduate of Alcalá; served in the Portuguese campaign of 1580 and in the Armada; was secretary to the Duke of Alva, Marquis of Malpica, and Marquis of Sarria; had many amours, was twice married, and begot at least six children, three of them illegitimate; was banished from Madrid because of a quarrel, and lived two years at Valencia; took orders; became an officer of the Inquisition; and died 27th August 1635, a victim to hypochondria. He died poor, for his large income from his dramas and other sources was all but wholly devoted to charity and church purposes. The mere list of Lope's works presents a picture of unparalleled mental activity. His first work of any length was a poem, the Angelica, written at sea in 1588, but not printed till 1602. The Arcadia, the story, in a pompous, pastoral setting, of the pre-nuptial vagaries of the Duke of Alva, was written before the duke's marriage, July 1590, but it was kept back till 1598. The Dragontea, a shout of exultation in ten cantos over the death of the Dragon, Drake, appeared the same year, and was Lope's first publication with his name. But it was as a ballad-writer that he first made his mark. The more notable of his miscellaneous works are the Rimas (1602); Peregrino en su Patria (1604), a romance; Jerusalén Conquistada (1609), an epic in competition with Tasso; Pastores de Belén (1612), a religious pastoral; Filomena and Circe (1621-24), miscellanies in emulation of Cervantes; Corona Trágica (1627), an epic on Mary Stuart; Laurel de Apolo (1630); Rimas de Tome de Burquillos (1634), a collection of lighter verse, with the Gatomaquia, a mock-heroic. Dorotea (1632), in form a prose drama, is obviously the story of his own early love-adventures. All these works show the hand, not of a great artist, but of a consummate artificer. Lope was a master of easy, flowing, musical, graceful verse; but he rarely passes the frontier line into true poetry. Though he had written plays, he did not become a writer for the stage until after 1588. He gave the public what it wanted—excitement pure and simple; with a boundless invention, he could string striking situations and ingenious complications one after another without stop or stay, and keep the audience breathless and the stage in a bustle for three long acts, all without sign of effort. Imagination and creative power were not among his gifts; his dramatis personæ have seldom more individuality than a batch of puppets. Lope's plays may be roughly divided into the historical or quasi-historical and those that deal with everyday life. Of the latter the most characteristic are the 'Cloak and sword plays.' The Noche de San Juan, one of his very last plays; the Maestro de Danzár, one of his first; and the Azéro de Madrid, the source clearly of Molière's Médecin Malgré Lui, are excellent specimens. His peculiarities and excellences may be studied with advantage in the Perro del hortelano, Desprecio agradecido, Estrella de Sevilla, Esclava de su Galán, and Premio del bien hablar; and no student of Calderon should overlook the Acaide de Zalamea, a bold vigorous outline which was filled in by Calderon's famous play. The number of Lope's plays seems to have been 1500, exclusive of 400 autos. Of these the very names of all but between 600 and 700 have been lost, and often nothing but the name survives. We have about 440 plays and 40 autos in print or MS. A selection of 112 was edited by Hartzenbusch (4 vols. Madrid, 1853); and all were included in the complete edition of Lope's works, undertaken by the Spanish Academy in 1890. See Lord Holland's Life of him (2d ed. 1817), and those by Fitzmaurice-Kelly (1903) and H. A. Rennert (1904).

Vegetius (FLAVIUS VEGETIUS RENATUS) produced about 375 A.D. the Epitome Institutionum Rei Militaris (best ed. by Lang, Leip, 1885), mainly extracted from other authors, which during the middle ages was a supreme authority on warfare.

Veit, PHILIPP (1793-1877), painter, was born at Berlin. His mother, daughter of Moses Mendelssohn, had for her second husband Friedrich Schlegel, and Veit embraced the ideas of his stepfather. Like him he turned Catholic, and, settling at Rome in 1815, became conspicuous among the young German painters who sought to infuse into modern art the earnestness of medieval times. His first famous work was the 'Seven Years of Plenty' for the Villa Bartholdy. In 1830 he became director of the Art Institute at Frankfurt-on-Main. Here he painted the large fresco, 'Christianity bringing the Fine Arts to Germany.' [Fite.]

Veitch, JOHN, LL.D. (1829-94), born at Peebles, studied at Edinburgh, and became professor of Logic and Rhetoric at St Andrews in 1860, at Glasgow in 1864. His works include a Memoir of Sir W. Hamilton (1869), Tweed and other Poems (1875), History and Poetry of the Scottish Border (1877; new ed. 1893), Feeling for Nature in Scottish Poetry (1887), Merlin and other Poems (1889), Dualism and Monism (1895), and Border Essays (1896). See his Life by Mary Bryce (1896).

Veitch, WILLIAM, LL.D. (1794-1885), born at Spittal near Jedburgh, qualified for the Scottish ministry, but devoted himself to a life of scholarship at Edinburgh, his chief work the invaluable Greek Verbs Irregular and Defective (1843; 4th ed. 1878). He revised Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon, Smith's Latin Dictionary, &c.

Velazquez, DIEGO DE SILVA Y (in France and England usually spelt Velasquez), was born at Seville, 6th June 1599, son of Juan Rodriguez de Silva and Geronima Velazquez, studied under Herrera and Pacheco, and in 1623 brought to Madrid as a specimen of his work one of his Seville street studies, the famous 'Water-seller,' presented by Ferdinand VII. to the Duke of Wellington. Philip IV. commissioned him to paint his portrait, the first of some forty in which he painted the king; straightway the artist was appointed pintor de camera. He was thus relieved from the necessity of seeking the patronage of the church and painting martyrdoms and miracles. In 1623 Charles, Prince of Wales, during his wooing at Madrid, sat to him for his portrait; and in 1627, by the king's order, he painted 'The Expulsion of the Moriscos,' and was made usher of the chamber. He obtained leave of absence in 1629, and spent two years in Italy. He was in Italy again in 1648-50, this time with a commission from the king to purchase works of art. In 1652 he was appointed Aposentador Mayor, a high dignity. He died 6th August 1660. Velazquez may be said to have been all but a pictor ignotus until the beginning of the 19th century. His works remained for the most part royal property, only to be seen on palace walls; and the transfer of the royal pictures to the Museo del Prado at Madrid was virtually a revelation of Velazquez. Curtis reckons up 274 works attributed to him, of which 121 are in the United Kingdom. France and Austria possess twelve each, Italy ten, and Russia and the United States seven each. Good examples of his early work are the 'Water-seller,' 'Adoration of the Shepherds,' and 'Christ in the House of Martha' (National Gallery); and of his maturer powers the 'Boar-hunt,' and the portraits of Philip IV. (National Gallery), Innocent X. and Quevedo in Apsley House, and others in Lord Ellesmere's collection, Lord Lansdowne's, Mr Holford's, the Duke of Westminster's, and at Dulwich. The finest outside the Madrid Museo is the portrait of Admiral Pulido Pareja in the National Gallery. But it is only at Madrid that Velazquez can be seen in the full variety of his powers, a master in portrait, genre, landscape, animal pictures, every branch of painting except the marine. His court-pictures are the most conspicuous, but more characteristic and perhaps more interesting are the portraits of the jesters, dwarfs, and odd characters. It is sometimes said that sacred subjects and female beauty were beyond his reach. And yet no painter ever painted a more profoundly pathetic Crucifixion than that in the Prado, or two more charming figures than the 'Meninas.' See Stirling-Maxwell's Annals of the Artists of Spain (1848) and Velazquez and his Works (1855); C. B. Curtis, Velazquez and Murillo (1883); Justi, Velazquez und sein Jahrhundert (1888); trans. by Keane, 1889; and other works by R. A. M. Stevenson (1895), Walter Armstrong (1896), and A. de Bernete (Paris, 1898). [Spanish pron. Ve-lath-keth.]

Vendôme, LOUIS JOSEPH, DUC DE (1654-1712), born at Paris, saw his first service in the Dutch campaign of 1672. He next served with distinction under Turenne in Germany and Alsace, again in the Low Countries under Luxembourg, and in Italy under Catinat; in 1695 he received the command of the army in Catalonia. He shook off his indolence, and closed a series of brilliant successes by the capture of Barcelona (1697). After five years of sloth and sensuality he superseded Villeroi in Italy, much to the delight of the soldiers. He fought an undecided battle with Prince Eugene at Luzzara (15th August), then burst into the Tyrol, returning to Italy to check the united Savoyards and Austrians. On 16th August 1705 he fought a second indecisive battle with Prince Eugene at Cassano, and at Calcinato he crushed the Austrians (19th April 1706). That summer he was recalled to supersede Villeroi in the Low Countries. The defeat at Oudenarde (11th July 1708) cost him his command, but in 1710 he was sent to Spain to aid Philip V. His appearance turned the tide of disaster; he brought the king back to Madrid, and defeated the English at Brihuega, and next day the Austrians at Villaviciosa. After a month of gluttony beyond even his wont, he died at Tímaroz in Valencia, June 15, 1712.

Ven'ema, HERMANN (1697-1787), divine and professor of Theology at Franeker, wrote Institutes of Theology (trans. 1850).

Venn, HENRY (1725-97), evangelical divine, born at Barnes in Surrey, became a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge (1749), curate of Clapham (1754), vicar of Huddersfield (1759), and vicar of Yelling in Hunts (1771). His two books were The Complete Duty of Man (1763) and Mistakes in Religion (1774). He was a founder of the Church Missionary Society. See Memoir by his son (1834), Ryle's Christian Leaders of the Last Century (1869), and the study by W. Knight (1881).

Vera, AUGUSTO (1813-85), philosopher, born at Amelia in Umbria, studied at Rome and Paris, taught philosophy in France for thirteen years, lived in England 1851-60, and from 1862 was professor at Naples. He translated Hegel into French, made him known in Italy, and wrote on Plato's doctrine of immortality, on Strauss, on Cavour, on capital punishment, and, in English, Speculative Science (1856) and Speculative Logic (1875). See monograph by Mariano (1887).

Verboeckhoven, EUGEN JOSEPH (1798-1881), Brussels animal painter and etcher, noted for landscapes with sheep. [Ver-book-ho'ven.]

Vercingetorix. See CÆSAR.

Verdi, GIUSEPPE, Italian composer, born at Roncole near Busseto (Parma), October 9, 1813, studied at Milan. His first opera, Oberto (1839), is indebted to Bellini; the next, Un Giorno di Regno (1840), has been styled 'un Bazar de Reminiscences.' Nabucodonosor (1842) was his first hit, and I Lombardi (1843) was even better received—partly owing to revolutionary suggestions. Ernani (1844) also scored a success, due to the republican sentiment in the libretto adapted from Victor Hugo's Hernani. Rigoletto (1851), Il Trovatore (1852), and La Traviata (1853) are the best as they are the last of the Italian Opera school. I Vespri Siciliani (1855) and Simon Boccanegra (1857) were not so successful as Un Ballo in Maschera (1859); La Forza del Destino (1862) and Don Carlos (1867) added nothing to his fame. From time to time Verdi had tried to learn the lessons taught in the French Grand Opera school; but when Aida was produced at Cairo (1871) the complete change that had taken place in Verdi's method was obviously due to Wagner's influence. The departure from Italian traditions was even more distinctly seen when, after sixteen years of silence, his Otello was brought out in 1887. A brilliant comic opera, Falstaff, was produced in 1893, when he was made a marquis. He died in 1901. A Requiem Mass (1874) his only important non-operative work. See English Lives by Pouglin (1887) and Crowest (1897).

Vere, AUBREY THOMAS DE. See DE VERE.

Vere, SIR FRANCIS (c. 1560-1609), soldier, grandson of the 15th Earl of Oxford, obtained a company in the Bergen-op-Zoom garrison in 1586, and won his first laurels in the siege of Sluys, being knighted by Lord Willoughby. Him he succeeded in 1589 in the chief command in the Netherlands. His skill and energy at Breda, Deventer, and a hundred fights carried his fame far beyond the Netherlands. He shared the glory of the Cadiz expedition (1596), and next year the failure of the Island Voyage. Again in Holland, he governed Brill, and helped Maurice to victory at Turnhout (1597) and Nieuwpoort (1600), as well as in the heroic defence of Ostend.—His brother, HORACE, LORD VERE (1565-1635), took a hero's share in all his brother's battles. Knighted for his courage at Cadiz, he succeeded his brother as governor of Brill, and, sent in the Thirty Years' War to defend the Palatinate, was shut in at Mannheim and forced to surrender to Tilly (1623). He was created Baron Vere in 1625.—Another brother, ROBERT, died in the Netherlands on the battlefield in 1595. See Sir Clements R. Markham, The Fighting Veres (1888).

Verechagin, VASILII, painter, born 26th Oct. 1842, at Tcheropovets in Novgorod, entered the navy in 1859, but studied art under Gérôme at Paris. In 1867 he was with Kauffmann in the Turcoman campaigns, and he reaped a richer artistic harvest from a visit to India in 1874. Still more famous were his realistic pictures of the horrors of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877. In 1884 he made another journey to India, Syria, and Palestine; and produced a series of anti-conventional pictures of the life of Christ. He has painted also gigantic pictures of the execution of invidious sepoys by English soldiers and of Nihilists by the Russian authorities. He was blown up on Makaroff's flagship off Port Arthur, 14th April 1904. See his own travel-sketches (trans. 1887), and a book on him (trans. 1888) by his brother. [Vay-rest-tchah'-geen; g hard.]

Verga, GIOVANNI, novelist, was born at Catania in Sicily in 1840. Cavalleria Rusticana (whence Mascagni's libretto) was translated in 1893, as was Don Gesualdo, a piece of Italian Zolaism.

Vergennes, CHARLES GRAVIER (1717-87), Louis XVI.'s foreign minister, sought to humble England by promoting the independence of the United States. See Dinio's France et les États Unis (1889). [Ver-zhen'n']

Vergil. See VIRGIL.

Vergil, POLYDORE (1470-1555), otherwise named De Castello, was born at Urbino, and educated at Bologna. His first work was Proverborum Libellus (1498); his second, De Inventoribus Rerum (1499), also the earliest book of its kind, was translated into English, Spanish, and Italian. He was sent by the pope to England in 1501 as deputy-collector of Peter's-pence, and was presented to the Leicestershire living of Church Langton in 1503. In 1507 he became a prebendary of Lincoln, in 1508 archdeacon of Wells, and in 1513 a prebendary of St Paul's, having been naturalised in 1510. In 1515 he was imprisoned for slandering Wolsey. In 1525 he published the first genuine edition of Gildas, in 1526 the treatise De Prodigis. His Historie Anglice Libri XXVI. appeared at Basel in 1534; a 27th book (to 1538) was added in the third edition (1555). About 1550 he returned to Italy; and he died at Urbino. His History is a work of great research, vigorous and independent, written in clear and elegant Latin. It is the fullest original narrative for the reign of Henry VII.; as regards Wolsey he is prejudiced. See two Camden Soc. works by Sir H. Ellis (1844-46).

Vergniaud, PIERRE VICTURNIEN, born at Limoges, 31st May 1753, studied divinity, but settled as an advocate at Bordeaux in 1781, and was sent to the National Assembly in 1791. His eloquence made him the leader of the Girondists, but he was too indolent for political intrigue. In the Convention he voted for the king's death, and as president announced the result. In the struggle with the Mountain he made a splendid effort, but too late. He was guillotined 31st Oct. 1793. See works by Touchard-Lafosse (1848), Verdère (1866), and Vatel (1875). [Vern-yo']

Verheiden, JAKOB, published at The Hague in 1602 the Effigies et Elogia of the leading Reformers, the portraits (including the well-known one of John Knox based on that in Beza's Icones) being engraved by Hondius.

Verlaine, PAUL, Decadent, was born at Metz, 30th March 1844, and chose French nationality in 1873. To his Poèmes saturniens (1865), Les Fêtes galantes (1869), and La bonne Chanson (1870) succeeded a dozen years of silence, of Bohemianism, and of the hospitals. Sagesse (1881) breathed penitence and devotion in verse of singular sweetness. Les Poètes Maudits (1884), a volume of literary criticism, was followed by Jadis et Naguère (1885), Romances sans Paroles (1887), Amour (1888), Bonheur (1889), and Parallèlement (1890)—the last singing alternately sin and repentance, a strange medley of brutism and religiosity. Dédicaces appeared in 1894, Confessions; Notes autobiographiques in 1895. Verlaine died in Paris, 8th January 1896.

Vermigli. See PETER MARTYR.

Vermuyden, SIR CORNELIUS, the Dutch engineer who drained the Bedford Level 1634-52.

Verne, JULES (1828-1905), born at Nantes, after turning out some comedies and much hack-work, in 1863 struck a new vein in fiction—exaggerating the possibilities of present-day science, and giving ingenious verisimilitude to narratives of adventure carried out by means of marvellous inventions. His stories, which have been translated into nearly every European tongue, include Five Weeks in a Balloon, Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea, From the Earth to the Moon, Around the Moon, The Survivors of the Chancellor, Michael Strogoff, The Green Ray, The Fur Country, A Journey to the Centre of the Earth, Around the World in Eighty Days, and The Floating Island. The characters are the veriest automata; the interest depends solely on incident.

Vernet, CLAUDE JOSEPH (1714-89), landscape and marine painter, born at Avignon, worked in Rome 1734-53, then returned to Paris to make paintings for the king of the sixteen chief seaports of France.—His son, ANTOINE CHARLES HORACE VERNET, 'Carle Vernet' (1758-1836), born at Bordeaux, enjoyed a high reputation as a painter of horses, dogs, and large battle-pieces to the glorification of the great emperor.—His son, EMILE JEAN HORACE VERNET, 'Horace Vernet' (1789-1863), born in Paris, soon made himself popular by brilliant and vigorous work, marked by the characteristic faults of improvisation. His battle-pieces were incense to Chanvinism. He was director of the French school of art at Rome 1828-34, and travelled in Algeria and Russia. See works by Lagrange (1864), Durande (1865), and Rees (1880).

Verney, a great Buckinghamshire house, among whose members were Ralph Verney, Lord Mayor of London in 1465; the renegade, Sir Francis (1584-1615), who died at Syracuse; Sir Edmund, the royalist standard-bearer, who fell at Edgehill in 1642; and his son, Sir Ralph, who fought for the parliament, but, refusing the Covenant, lived in exile at Blois, was made a baronet in 1661, and died in 1688. His descendants held the titles of Baron Verney, Viscount Fermanagh, and Earl Verney, the second and last earl dying in 1791.—FRANCES PARTHENOPE, elder sister of Florence Nightingale, married in 1858 Sir Harry Verney, and died in 1890. She wrote some charming stories, Stone Edge (1868), Lettice Lisle (1870), &c., and the first half of Memoirs of the Verney Family (4 vols. 1892-99).

Vernier, PIERRE (c. 1580-1637), who was born and died at Ornans in Franche Comté, is credited with the invention (1631) of the auxiliary scale.

Vernon, EDWARD (1684-1757), admiral, born at Westminster, was the son of a Whig statesman, who was secretary of state 1697-1700. He entered the navy in 1701 and parliament in 1722; commanded at the storming of Portobelo (1739) and in the disastrous Cartagena expedition (1741). See Life by Douglas Ford (1907).

Vernon, ROBERT, F.S.A. (1774-1849), a great breeder of horses, in 1847 gifted to the nation the Vernon Gallery, which had cost him £150,000.

Vernon, THOMAS (c. 1824-72), line-engraver.

Veronese, PAOLO, the name by which Paolo Caliari (or Cagliari) is usually known, was born, a sculptor's son, at Verona, probably in 1528, and after some work there and in Mantua, in 1555 settled in Venice, where he soon made both wealth and fame, ranking with Titian and Tintoretto. The church of San Sebastiano in Venice contains many pictures of the period before his visit to Rome (1563). The influence of the Roman school on his style was marked, new dignity, grace of pose, and ease of movement being added to his rich Venetian colouring. He died 19th April 1588. Veronese is remarkable more for fertility than for depth or spirituality of imagination; but his design is generally noble, his composition rich, and his execution truthful. The most celebrated of his works, the 'Marriage Feast at Cana,' now in the Louvre, contains 120 figures, many of them portraits of contemporaries, with 16th-century details. There may also be mentioned 'The Calling of St Andrew,' 'The Feast of Simon,' and (in the National Gallery) the 'Presentation of the Family of Darius to Alexander,' and 'St Helena's Vision of the Invention of the Cross.' Veronese was the last of the great Venetian painters. See Synnond's Renaissance in Italy (1877); Crowe and Cavalcaselle; books by Yriarte (1888) and Mrs Bell (1904). [Vay-ro-nay'-zay.]

Veronica, St, according to myth our Lord on His way to Calvary, and offered Him her veil to wipe the sweat from His brow, when the divine features were miraculously imprinted upon the cloth. This veil is said to have been preserved in Rome from about 700, and was exhibited in St Peter's in 1854. Possibly Veronica is merely a corruption of vera icon, 'the true image' (i.e. of Christ). See Karl Pearson's German monograph (1887) and Dublin Review (1885).

Verrio, ANTONIO (1634-1707), mythological house-painter, came from Naples to London.

Verres, Roman propretor in Sicily (73-71 B.C.), infamous for extortions which desolated the island. The inhabitants entrusted his prosecution to Cicero, and Verres fled before the trial was over. He found shelter at Marseilles, but perished under Antony's proscription (43). [Ver-reez.]

Verrocchio, ANDREA DEL (1435-88), Florentine goldsmith, sculptor, and painter. Only one extant picture can be ascribed to him with certainty, a Baptism of Christ in the Florentine Academy. Of his bronze statues the 'David' and the 'Unbelieving Thomas' are in Florence, and the equestrian statue of B. Colleoni is at Venice. See book by Maud Cruttwell (1905). [Ver-rok'kee-o.]

Verstegan, RICHARD (died about 1635), was born in London, the grandson of a native of Guelderland, studied at Oxford, but as a zealous Catholic left without a degree, and settled in Antwerp as a printer. He was an accomplished Anglo-Saxon scholar. His best-known works are Theatrum Crudelitatum Hæreticorum (1587), with copperplates showing the hanging, quartering, &c. of the Catholic martyrs by the Protestants; Odes in Imitation of the Seven Penitential Psalms (1601); and A Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities (1605).

Vertue, GEORGE (1684-1756), born in London, was an eminently successful engraver of portraits, and, himself an antiquary, was appointed in 1717 engraver to the Society of Antiquaries. Horace Walpole bought his MSS., and made free use of them in his Anecdotes of Painting.

Very, JONES (1813-80), poet and essayist, was born and died at Salem, Mass.

Vesalius, ANDREAS (1514-64), anatomist, born at Brussels of a family that had come from Wesel, was surgeon to the imperial army in the Low Countries, and professor of Anatomy at Padua, Pisa, Bologna, and Basel. In 1544 he became physician to Charles V. He raised such ill-will by practising the dissection of human subjects and by opposing Galen that he withdrew from court, and perished at Zante on his voyage back from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. His De Corporis Humani Fabrica (1543) marks an epoch in anatomy. See German work by Roth (1892) and G. M. Cullen in the Dublin Medical Journal (1894).

Vespasian. TITUS FLAVIUS VESPASIANUS (9-79 A.D.), Roman emperor, born near Reate, served as tribune in Thrace, as quæstor in Crete and Cyrene; in the reign of Claudius commanded a legion in Germany and in Britain; was consul in 51, and next proconsul of Africa; and in 67 was sent by Nero to reduce the Jews to subjection. When the struggle began between Otho and Vitellius he was proclaimed emperor by the legions in the East. Leaving the war in Judæa to his son Titus, he reached Rome in 70, and soon restored the government and finances to order, besides showing an admirable example to a corrupt age by the simplicity of his life. After the fall of Jerusalem and his joint triumph with Titus, the temple of Janus was closed for nine years.

Vespucci, AMERIGO (1452-1512), born at Florence, was a provision contractor at Cadiz in 1495-98. He contracted for one (or two) of the expeditions of Columbus. He had some knowledge of cosmography, but was not a practical navigator (still less a pilot) when, at fifty, he promoted a voyage to the New World in the track of Columbus, sailed thither with its commander Hojeda (1499), and explored the coast of Venezuela. In 1505 he was naturalised in Spain, and from 1508 till his death was pilot-major of the kingdom. His name (America) was absurdly given to two continents through an inaccurate account of his travels published at St Dié in Lorraine in 1507, in which he is represented as having discovered and reached the mainland in 1497. This account was based on Vespucci's own letters, in which he claims to have made four voyages. Sir Clements Markham in his introduction to a translation of the letters (Hakluyt Society, 1894) proves one of these to be a pure fabrication, the others quite unsupported save by the falsificator's own assertion. But see also Coote, Vespucci's Voyage from Lisbon to India (1894). [Ves-poo'-chee.]

Vestris, MADAME, née Lucia Elizabeth Bartolozzi, a granddaughter of the engraver, was born in London, 7th March 1797. At sixteen she married the dancer Armand Vestris (1787-1825), member of an originally Florentine family that gave to France a series of distinguished chefs, actors, and ballet-dancers. In 1815 she separated from her worthless husband and went on the stage in Paris. She appeared at Drury Lane in 1820, soon became famous in The Haunted Tower, was even more popular as Phoebe in Paul Pryn, and in light comedy and burlesque was uniformly successful. She had been nine years lessee of the Olympic when in 1838 she married Charles Mathews (q.v.). She afterwards undertook the management of Covent Garden and the Lyceum. She died 8th August 1856.

Veillot, LOUIS (1813-83), Ultramontane editor of the Paris Univers, was born at Boyne, Loiret. He wrote novels, poems, books of travel, &c. See Life by E. Veillot (Par. 1883). [Veh-yo'.] Vezi, HERMANN (1829-1910), actor, born at Philadelphia, made his début at York in 1850.

Viardot-Garcia. See GARCIA.

Viaud, LOUIS-MARIE-JULIEN, 'Pierre Loti,' was born of a Huguenot line at Rochefort, 14th Jan. 1850, entered the navy in 1867, and was a year in disgrace for his too truthful letters in Figaro on the conduct of the French soldiers at Hué in 1883. Aziyadé (1879) was a series of pictures of life on the Bosphorus; Le Mariage de Loti (1880) carried the imagination captive with all the charm of the coral seas. Later came The Roman d'un Spahi (1881); Mon Frère Yves (1883); Pêcheur d'Islande (1886), dealing with Brittany and the frozen North; Propos d'Exil (1887); Madame Chrysanthème (1887); Japonneries d'Autonne (1889); Le Roman d'un Enfant (1890); Le Livre de la Pitié et de la Mort (1891); Fantôme d'Orient (1892); Le Désert (1894); La Galilée (1895); Ramuntcho (a Basque story, 1897); and Figures et Choses (1898). The simplicity yet intensity of his sensuous impressions, the sympathy with nature, the tenderness and melancholy in the Breton mists, suggest, but do not explain, the secret of the charm of Pierre Loti. In 1891 he was admitted to the Academy. La Galilée, Jerusalem, L'Inde sans les Anglais, Madame Prune (1905) illustrate Captain Viaud's versatility. [Vee-o'.]

Vicars, CAPTAIN HEDLEY SHAFTO JOHNSTONE (1826-55), Christian soldier, born in Mauritius, the son of an Irish officer, from Woolwich joined the 97th, served in Corfu, Malta, Jamaica, Halifax, and the Crimea, and fell repelling a Russian sally. See Memorials by Caroline Marsh (1856).

Vico, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1668-1744), born at Naples, studied law, but devoted himself to literature, history, and philosophy, and became in 1697 professor of Rhetoric at Naples. In virtue of his Scienza Nuova (1725; recast 1730) Vico is regarded as founder of the philosophy of history. See monographs by Cantoni (Turin, 1867) and Prof. Flint (1884). [Vee-co.]

Victor, CLAUDE PERRIN (1764-1841), born at La Marche (Vosges), served in the artillery, and distinguished himself at Montebello and Marengo. Napoleon made him marshal on the field of Friedland (1807), and later Duke of Belluno. In 1808-12 he commanded in Spain, and lost the battles of Talavera and Barossa; in the Russian campaign he covered the crossing of the Beresina. He fought at Dresden and Leipzig, lost the emperor's favour by neglecting to occupy the bridge of Montereau-sur-Yonne, and was wounded at Craonne. Louis XVIII. gave him high command and the presidency of the commission for trying his old companions who had deserted to Napoleon during the 'Hundred Days.' He was minister of War 1821-23. See his Mémoires (1846).

Victor I. was pope 190-202; Victor II., 1055-77; and Victor III., 1086-88.

Victor Amadeus II. (1666-1730), succeeded his father as Duke of Savoy in 1675, and was saved from the clutches of France by the military genius of Prince Eugene (q.v.), a distant cousin, who routed the French before Turin in 1706. By the Treaty of Utrecht (1713) he gained the principality of Montserrat and the kingdom of Sicily. Seven years later the Emperor of Austria forced him to exchange the crown of Sicily for that of Sardinia.

Victor Emmanuel I. (1759-1824) was king of Sardinia from 1814. His oppression of liberalism led to a rising in 1821, when he abdicated in favour of his brother Charles Felix.

Victor Emmanuel II., son of Charles Albert (q.v.) of Sardinia, was born March 14, 1820. He early showed military ardour, and in 1848-49 displayed great gallantry at Goito and Novara. Charles Albert abdicated in his favour, he ascended the throne of Sardinia, March 23, 1849; and in August peace was concluded between Sardinia and Austria. In January 1855 Sardinia joined the allies against Russia, and a contingent of 10,000 men landed in the Crimea. At the Congress of Paris (March 1856) the Sardinian envoys urged upon the attention of France and England the oppressive government of the states of Italy. In 1857 diplomatic relations were broken off with Austria. In 1859 Austria demanded the disarmament of Sardinia; this was refused, and next day the Austrians crossed the Ticino. A French army advanced to aid the Sardinians, and the Austrians were defeated at Montebello (20th May), Magenta (4th June), and Solferino (24th June). By the Treaty of Villafranca, Lombardy was ceded to Sardinia. In 1860 Modena, Parma, the Romagna, and Tuscany were peacefully annexed to Sardinia. Sicily and Naples were added by Garibaldi, while Savoy and Nice were ceded to France. The papal territories were only saved from annexation by the presence of a French force of occupation. In February 1861 Victor Emmanuel was proclaimed king of Italy at Turin, whence the capital of Italy was transferred to Florence. In 1866 the Austro-Prussian war, in which Italy took part as the ally of Prussia, added Venetia to the Italian kingdom. In the same year the French withdrew from Rome, but owing to an incursion by Garibaldi they returned. After the fall of the Empire in 1870 the French occupation of Rome was at an end, the king entered Rome (20th September), and the emancipation of Italy was complete. Victor Emmanuel, who was a hardy mountaineer and a keen huntsman, reigned as a strictly constitutional monarch; and dying in January 1878, he was succeeded by his eldest son, Humbert I. See works by Bersesio (1878-93), Massari (1880), and Cappelletti (1894).

Victor Emmanuel III., who succeeded in 1900 on the assassination of his father, Humbert (q.v.), was born in 1869, and as Duke of Naples married the Princess Helena of Montenegro in 1896.

Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and Empress of India, only child of Edward, Duke of Kent (fourth son of George III.), was born at Kensington Palace, 24th May 1819. Her mother, Victoria Maria Louisa (1786-1861), was daughter of Francis, Duke of Saxe-Coburg, and sister of Leopold, king of the Belgians. Her first husband, the Prince of Leiningen, died in 1814; and in 1818 she married the Duke of Kent. The duke died in 1820, leaving his widow in charge of an infant daughter only eight months old, who had been baptised with the names of Alexandrina Victoria. The duke had belonged to the Whigs; and the princess was thoroughly instructed in the principles of the British constitution. She ascended the throne on the death of her uncle, William IV., 20th June 1837; her uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, became king of Hanover, in virtue of the law which excluded women from that throne. She was crowned at Westminster, 28th June 1838. When Melbourne's government fell (1839) she refused to change, in accordance with precedent, the ladies of the bedchamber, the result being that Peel resigned and Melbourne's administration was prolonged till 1841. The young Queen was married 10th February 1840 to Prince Albert (q.v.), Prince of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. She bore him four sons and five daughters: the Princess Royal, Victoria, married to Frederick III. (q.v.) of Germany; Albert Edward, afterwards King Edward VII. (q.v.); Alice (q.v.), married to the Duke of Hesse; Alfred, Duke of Edinburgh and of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (q.v.); Helena, married in 1866 to Prince Christian of Denmark; Louise, married to the Marquis of Lorne (see ARGYLL); Arthur, Duke of Connaught (q.v.); Leopold, Duke of Albany (q.v.); Beatrice, married to Prince Henry of Battenberg (q.v.). The death of the Prince-Consort in 1861 led his widow to seclude herself for several years from public life; but, though she did not afterwards take so prominent a part in public life, she never neglected any of her essential duties as queen. Other severe trials were the deaths of the Princess Alice, of the Duke of Albany, and of the Duke of Clarence, her grandson. No former monarch so thoroughly comprehended that the powers of the crown are held in trust for the people; she was the most constitutional monarch Britain had seen; and she was singularly well-informed on foreign politics. Hardly less beneficial was the example set by Her Majesty and the Prince-Consort in the domestic virtues. In 1876 'Empress of India' was added to the royal titles of the Queen, who died 22d January 1901. Her jubilee (1887) and 'diamond jubilee' (1897) emphasised the loyalty of the colonies to the mother country. Her Letters (edited in 1907 by Mr Benson and Lord Esher) illustrated her shrewdness, sagacity, self-devotion and persistence, her high idea of the importance of her office, and her determination to bring its influence to bear both on home administration and the administration of foreign affairs. Her sympathy with Germany (as in the Sleswick-Holstein controversy) and her dislike to the Italian national risorgimento against Austria had to be taken account of by her ministers; as also her favour for some statesmen (Melbourne and Beaconsfield), her strong distrust of others (Palmerston and Gladstone). See Queen Victoria as I Knew Her, by Sir Theodore Martin (1908); Early Days of the Prince Consort (1867, prepared under the Queen's direction by Gen. Grey); Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands (1869); More Leaves (1884); The Life of the Prince-Consort (5 vols. 1873-80, prepared under the Queen's direction by Sir Theodore Martin); J. M'Carthy's Our Own Times (1879-97); and books on her by J. H. Ward (1887), R. R. Holmes (1897), Sir Sidney Lee (1902), and Mrs Crawford (1903).

Vida, MARCO GIROLAMO (c. 1480-1566), Bishop of Alba, born at Cremona, wrote Latin orations and dialogues, Christus (1535), De Arte Poetica (1527), and other poems on the silkworm and on chess. See monograph by Lancetti (1840).

Vidocq, EUGÈNE FRANÇOIS (1775-1857), 'the detective', was born, a baker's son, at Arras, and as a boy persistently robbed the till of his father's shop. After a spell in prison, he was an acrobat, then served in the army till disabled by a wound, and in 1796 was sentenced for forgery to eight years in the galleys. Escaping, he joined a band of highwaymen, whom he betrayed to the authorities. Now (1808) he offered his services as a spy on the criminal classes. In 1812 a 'Brigade de Sureté' was organised, with Vidocq as chief; its efficiency was marvellous, but suspicions grew rife that Vidocq himself originated many of the burglaries he showed such skill in detecting, and in 1825 he was superseded. He then started a paper-mill, and in 1832 a private detective office, which was soon closed by the authorities. His Mémoires (1828), even if by himself, are untrustworthy. [Vee-dock.]

Vieta, FRANCISCU, or FRANÇOIS VIÈTE (1540-1603), mathematician, was a Poitiers advocate, councillor of the Parlements of Brittany and Tours, and privy-councillor to Henry IV. [Vee-ay-ta.]

Vieuxtemps, HENRI (1820-81), violinist and composer, born at Verviers in Belgium, in 1870 became a teacher in the Brussels conservatoire. See Life by Radoux (1893). [V'ye-h-tonv.]

Vigfusson, GUDBRAND (1827-89), Scandinavian scholar, born in Iceland, studied and lived at Copenhagen 1849-64. He edited a long series of sagas, completed the Icelandic Dictionary (1873) undertaken by Cleasby (q.v.), and compiled the magnificent Corpus poetium boreale (with F. York Powell, 2 vols. Oxford, 1883). He came in 1864 to London and thence to Oxford, where in 1884 he was appointed lector in Icelandic. [Vee'f-joos-son.]

Vigilius, pope 537-555, a Roman.

Vignola, GIACOMO BAROZZI DA (1507-73), architect, worked chiefly and died in Rome.

Vigny, ALFRED VICTOR, COMTE DE, born at Loches (Indre-et-Loire), 27th March 1797, served fourteen years in the army. In 1822 he published anonymously a small volume of verse, followed in 1824 by Eloa, an exquisite piece of mystic phantasy. He next issued his collected Poèmes antiques et modernes (1826); Cinq Mars (1826), a historical romance; a translation of Othello (1829); and a drama, La Maréchale d'Ancre (1830). After that year he published only works in prose: Stello (1832), Grandeur et Servitude Militaires (1835), and a drama, Chatterton (1835). He left a volume of verse, Destinées (1864), and a Journal d'un Poète (1867). In 1845 he was elected to the Academy. He died 17th Sept. 1863. He had married an Englishwoman (Lydia Bunbury) in 1828, and the influence of English taste is marked in his work, which was elegant but cold. See monographs by A. France (1868), Paléologue (1891), and Dorison (1892); his Lettres inédites in the Revue de Paris (1897); and criticisms by Sainte-Beuve, Caro, Montégut, and Faguet. [Veen-ye.]

Villari, PASQUALE, historian, born at Naples in 1827, took part in the Neapolitan revolution of 1848, and was professor of History at Florence in 1866-1909. He has repeatedly sat in the Italian parliament, and in 1891-92 was minister of Public Instruction. His best-known works are Lives of Savonarola (1859; 2d ed. 1887) and of Machiavelli (1877-82; new ed. 1891), and The First Two Centuries of Florentine History (1895), all translated by his wife (born Linda White in 1836), an English lady who has written novels, tales, and sketches (Camilla's Girlhood, A Double Bond, In Change Unchanged, On Tuscan Hills and Venetian Waters, Here and There in Italy, &c.).

Villars, CHARLES LOUIS HECTOR, DUC DE, Marshal of France, was born at Moulins, 8th May 1653. He distinguished himself in the wars of the Low Countries, on the Rhine, and in Hungary, fighting against the Turks. From 1699 till 1701 he represented France at Vienna. In 1702, sent to succour the Elector of Bavaria, he crossed the Rhine, and defeated the Markgraf of Baden at Friedlingen; next year he again crossed the Rhine, but his scheme for advancing upon Vienna was defeated by the obstinacy of the Elector. He was next commissioned to put down the Camisards. He defended the north-eastern frontier against Marlborough; in 1708 he defeated the attempts of Prince Eugene to penetrate into France. In 1709 he was sent to oppose Marlborough in the north, but at Malplaquet was severely wounded. In 1711 he headed the last army France could raise, and with it fell upon the British and Dutch under Albemarle, who were entrenched at Denain (24th July 1712), carried their entrenchments, and turning upon Prince Eugene, drove him under the walls of Brussels; then as plenipotentiary he signed the peace of Rastatt (1714). He became the principal adviser on military affairs and on foreign policy, was a strong opponent of Law's financial measures, and for a time lost favour at court. But in the war of 1732-34 in Italy he showed that the weight of years had left his military genius and spirit untouched. He died at Turin, 17th June 1734. See his Mémoires (ed. by De Vogüé, 1884-87), and Lives by Anquetil (1784), Giraud (1881), and De Vogüé (1888). [Veel-yar.]

Villehardouin, GEOFROI DE (c. 1160-1213), the first of French historians, was born at the castle of Villehardouin in Aube, took part in the Fourth Crusade, and became marshal of 'Romania.' His Conquête de Constantinople, describing the events from 1198 to 1207, is of even greater value as literature than history. The best edition is by N. de Wailly (8d ed. 1882). [Vee-ar-doo-aw.]

Villemain, ABEL FRANÇOIS (1790-1870), born at Paris, became professor of Rhetoric at the Lycée Charlemagne, the Ecole Normale, and the Sorbonne (1816-26), was made a peer in 1831, and was minister of Public Instruction under Guizot. He was long perpetual secretary of the French Academy. He wrote on the history of French literature, studies of Pindar and Chateaubriand, Histoire de Cromwell (1819), and Lascaris, ou les Grecs du XV. Siècle (1825). [Veel-manv.]

Villeneuve, PIERRE CHARLES JEAN BAPTISTE SYLVESTRE DE, Nelson's antagonist, was born at Valensoles (Basses Alpes), December 31, 1763, commanded the rear division of the French navy at the battle of the Nile, and saved his vessel and four others. In 1805 he took command of the Toulon squadron. At Cadiz he was joined by the Spanish fleet, and, in order to lure the British fleet from the coasts of Europe, bore away to the West Indies. A month later he sailed back, still pursued by Nelson. Off Finisterre he fought an undecided battle with Sir Robert Calder, and, returning to Cadiz, was there blockaded by Nelson. This ruined Napoleon's scheme for the invasion of England, and Villeneuve, about to be superseded, determined to fight before his successor could reach Cadiz. In the battle of Trafalgar (21st Oct.) Villeneuve's flag-ship, the Bucentaure, was dismasted and forced to strike. The admiral lay a prisoner in England till April 1806. On the journey to Paris he stopped at Rennes to learn how the emperor would receive him; and on April 22 he was found dead in bed, having stabbed himself to the heart. [Veel-nehv.]

Villeroi, FRANÇOIS DE NEUVILLE, DUC DE

(1644-1730), was educated with Louis XIV. at court, where he was the glass of fashion, but was banished to Lyons for a love-affair. In 1680 he returned to court, and in 1693 became a marshal, having distinguished himself at Neerwinden. As commander in the Netherlands (1695-96) he showed great incapacity; and in Italy in 1701 he was defeated and taken prisoner by Prince Eugene. Again in command in the Netherlands, he was defeated by Marlborough at Ramillies. Madame de Maintenon got him made guardian to Louis XV. Orleans sent him to live on his estate in 1722 because of his intrigues; but he was subsequently governor of Lyons. [Veel-r'wah.]

Villiers. See BUCKINGHAM (DUKE OF).

Villiers, CHARLES PELHAM, Corn-law reformer, born Jan. 19, 1802, a younger brother of the fourth Earl of Clarendon. He was educated at Haileybury and St John's College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1827. He was returned for Wolverhampton as a Free Trader in 1835, and continued its member for upwards of sixty years, latterly as a Liberal Unionist, becoming the 'Father of the House of Commons.' He made his first motion in favour of Free Trade in 1838. In 1859-66 he sat with Cabinet rank as President of the Poor-law Board. He died Jan. 16, 1898.

Villiers de l'Isle Adam, AUGUSTE (c. 1835-89), a Breton count and French poet, descended from the last Grand-Master of the Knights of Malta, published Akadysseril, L'Ève Future, and a dozen more poems and dramas. He died penniless, of cancer, in a Paris hospital. See Life by Pontavice de Heussy (trans. 1894).

Villon, ANTOINE, painter of still-life, armour, dead game, &c., born at Lyons in 1833, was elected in 1897 to the Académie des Beaux Arts.

Villon, FRANÇOIS, born in or near Paris in 1431, adopted (he tells us) the name of his 'more than father,' Maître Guillaume Villon; his own was François de Montcorbier. In 1455 he was a needy master of arts; but having killed a priest in a street brawl, he lay for some months in hiding, and was sentenced to banishment. He was in trouble over a love-affair in 1456. Next year it came out that he was one of a gang of burglars who had broken into the Collège de Navarre and stolen 500 crowns, and that he was then at Angers planning another burglary. He was caught, put to the question, and with five others sentenced to be hanged; but he appealed, and the sentence was commuted to banishment. He found an asylum under the Duc de Bourbon at Roussillon in Dauphiné; but in 1461 he was back again at his old game, and passed the summer in prison at Meung-sur-Loire. In 1462 he was in trouble for theft and for brawling. Sentence of death was commuted to banishment in 1463; and here Villon passes from our sight. It is clear from his own words that he was a wreck, shattered by debauchery, prison-life, and torture. His works consist of the Petit Testament (1456), the Grand Testament (1461), and some forty or fifty short pieces, chiefly ballads. Of the Jargon ballads some are clearly his; his claim to the whole is doubtful. Readers of Villon generally begin with selected specimens, like 'The Ladies of bygone Days,' his mother's 'Prayer to Our Lady,' and the 'Epistle to his Friends,' and fascination is the consequence. Unrestricted acquaintance is almost sure to lead to disgust with his revolting realism and rascality. The first dated edition of Villon's poems is of 1489. By 1542 twenty-seven had been printed; that of 1533 was edited by Clément Marot. The best modern editions are those of Paul Lacroix, 'Bibliophile Jacob' (1854-66-77), Pierre Janmet (1867-84), Longnon (1892), and Moland (1893). A faithful English translation by Payne was printed by the Villon Society in 1878, and an expurgated edition was published 1881. See books by Vitu (1873 and 1884), Longnon (1877), Bijvanck (1883), and Schwob (1905); and the essay by R. L. Stevenson. [Ve-yon''.]

Vilmar, AUGUST FRIEDRICH (1800-68), literary historian and theological professor at Marburg.

Vincent, Sr, deacon and martyr, born in Spain, was martyred under Diocletian at Valencia, in 304.

Vincent de Beauvais (Latinised Vincentius Belvacensis), 13th-century encyclopaedist, gathered together, under the patronage of Louis IX. of France, the entire knowledge of the Middle Ages in his Speculum Historiale, Naturale, et Doctrinale, to which an unknown hand added a Speculum Morale. He died about 1264.

Vincent de Paul, Sr, was born at Pouy in Gascony, 24th April 1576, and admitted to priest's orders in 1600. On a voyage from Marseilles to Narbonne his ship was captured by corsairs, and he was sold into slavery at Tunis. His master, a renegade Savoyard, was persuaded by Vincent to return to the Christian faith; so, escaping, they landed in France in 1607. Having gone to Rome, he was entrusted with a mission to the French court in 1608, and became almoner of Henry IV.'s queen. He formed associations for helping the sick, and in 1619 was appointed almoner-general of the galleys. Meanwhile he had laid the foundation of the Congregation of Priests of the Missions, sanctioned by Urban VIII. in 1632, and called Lazarists from their priory of St Lazare in Paris. The Paris Foundling Hospital and the noble Sisterhood of Charity were of his founding. He died Sept. 27, 1660, and was canonised 1737. See Lives by Jores (1873) and Wilson (1873), French ones by Maynard (3d ed. 1886), Chantelauze (1882), Bougard (1889; trans. 1899), and Morel (1891). See OZANAM.

Vincentius Lerinensis, a monk of the island of Lerina (Lérins), who died in 450, and who defined the three marks of Catholicity—'quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus.' Canon Heurtley translated his Communitorium (1895).

Vinet, ALEXANDRE RODOLPHE (1797-1847), Swiss divine and critic, born at Onchy near Lausanne, became in 1835 professor of French Language and Literature at Basel, and in 1837 of Practical Theology at Lausanne. His Mémoire en Faveur de la Liberté des Cultes (1826) involved him in the struggle against state interference; and in 1845 resigning his chair, he joined the Free Church of Vaud; in 1846 he was compelled to resign his professorship of French Literature in Lausanne Academy. Vinet was an eloquent and evangelical preacher. His Chrestomathie Française (1829), his Études on the literature of the 19th century (1849-51), his Histoire of 18th-century literature (1853), Moralistes des XVI. et XVII. Siècles (1859), and Poètes du Siècle de Louis XIV. (1862) took high rank. Amongst the works translated into English are Christian Philosophy (1846), Vital Christianity (1846), Gospel Studies (1851), Pastoral Theology (1852), Homiletics (1853), Studies in Pascal (1859), Outlines of Philosophy and Literature (1865). Viollet-le-Duc, EUÈNE (1814-79), architect.

born in Paris, in 1840 became director of the restoration of the Sainte Chapelle, and from this time on was the great 'restorer' of ancient buildings in France. He served as engineer in the defence of Paris, and was an advanced republican politician. His best-known work was his great dictionary of French Architecture (1853-69). There have been translated into English works on military architecture, how to build a house, the annals of a fortress, the habitations of man in all ages, restoration, and Mont Blanc. See Lives by Sauvageot (1880) and Saint-Paul (2d ed. 1881). [V'yo-tlay-leh-Deek.]

Virchow, RUDOLF, born 13th October 1821 at Schivelbein in Pomerania, studied at Berlin, and in 1847 became a university lecturer, but next year fell into disfavour through his political fervour. In 1849 he was invited to Würzburg as professor, but in 1856 returned to Berlin as professor and director of the pathological institute. He founded and edited several medical journals, and became one of the foremost pathologists in Europe, reconstructing the science in not a few departments. He rendered important services to archaeology and anthropology in connection with such subjects as lake-dwellings and cave-men, skulls from Trojan graves and Egyptian tombs; whilst as a politician he was long one of the most influential leaders of the advanced Liberals of Prussia, being a member of the Prussian chamber from 1862, and of the Reichstag 1880-93. His most famous work is Cellular Pathology as based on Histology (1856; 4th ed. 1872; trans. 1860). Others are Famine Fever (trans. 1865), Freedom of Science (trans. 1878), Infectious Diseases in the Army (1879), Post-mortem Examinations (trans. 1878), and treatises on trichiniasis, hygiene and sewerage, barracks, &c. His 80th birthday was celebrated in 1901, and he died 5th September 1902. See books by Becher (1891) and Pagel (1906). [Feer-hoe.]

Virgil. PUBLIUS VERGILIUS MARO, greatest of Latin poets, was born at Andes near Mantua, 15th October 70 B.C. Cisalpine Gaul was mainly Celtic in population, but was already permeated by the Latin language and civilisation. The name Vergilius is apparently Celtic, and in Virgil's Celtic blood modern critics have found the origin of his romantic and melancholy temper and of his sense of the spiritual meaning of nature. His father owned a small property; the boy was sent to school at Cremona and Milan, and at sixteen went to Rome and studied rhetoric and philosophy. In 41 B.C. the victorious triumvirs were settling disbanded soldiers on confiscated lands throughout Italy. Virgil's farm was part of the confiscated territory; but by advice of the governor of the district, Asinius Pollio, he went to Rome, with special recommendations to Octavianus; and though his own property was not restored to him, he obtained ample compensation from the government, and became one of the endowed court-poets who gathered round the prime-minister Mæcenas. In 37 B.C. his Eclogues, ten pastorals modelled on those of Theocritus, were received with unexampled enthusiasm. Soon afterwards Virgil withdrew from Rome to Campania. The munificence of Mæcenas had placed him in affluent circumstances. He had a villa at Naples and a country-house near Nola. The Georgics, or Art of Husbandry, in four books, dealing with tillage and pasturage, the vine and olive, horses, cattle, and bees, appeared in 30 B.C., and confirmed Virgil's position as the foremost poet of the age. The remaining eleven years of his life were devoted to a larger task, undertaken at the urgent request of the emperor, the composition of a great national epic on the story of Æneas the Trojan, legendary founder of the Roman nation and of the Julian family, from the fall of Troy to his arrival in Italy, his wars and alliances with the native Italian races, and his final establishment in his new kingdom. By 19 B.C. the Æneid was practically completed, and in that year Virgil left Italy to travel in Greece and Asia; but at Athens he fell ill, and returned only to die at Brundisium, 21st September. At his own wish he was buried at Naples, on the road to Pozzuoli, his tomb for many hundreds of years after being worshipped as a sacred place. His sincerity and sweetness of temper won the warm praise of Horace, and the fastidious purity of his life in an age of very lax morality gained him the same name of the lady by which Milton was known at Cambridge. A few juvenile pieces of more or less probable authenticity are extant under his name. These are the Culex and the Moretum, both in hexameter verse; the Copa, a short elegiac piece; and fourteen little poems in various metres, some serious, others trivial. The Ciris is now agreed to be by a contemporary imitator. The supremacy of Virgil in Latin poetry was immediate and almost unquestioned; in the Eclogues the Latin tongue assumed a richness, harmony, and sweetness till then unknown. The promise shown in the Eclogues was more than fulfilled in the Georgics. The workmanship of the Æneid is more unequal; but in its great passages there is the same beauty, with an even fuller strength and range. Virgil's works were established classics even in his lifetime, and soon after his death had become, as they still remain, the school-books of western Europe. By the 3d century his poems ranked as sacred books, and were regularly used for purposes of divination. In the dark ages his fabled powers as a magician almost eclipsed his real fame as a poet; but with the revival of learning he resumed his old place. Of the many editions (since 1469) the most important are those of Heyne (1767-75; re-edited by Wagner) and Ribbeck (1859-68). The standard English edition is that of Conington and Nettle-ship (4th ed. 1881-83), and there are good smaller editions by Kennedy, Papillon, and Sidgwick. Among verse translations that of Dryden still holds a high place; others which deserve special mention are those of Lord Justice Bowen (incomplete), William Morris (Æneid), Calverley (Eclogues), and Rhoades. There are prose translations by Conington and by Mackail. See the estimates of Virgil by Sellar, Sainte-Beuve, and F. Myers; and Lord Tennyson's lines 'To Virgil.' For Virgil the Magician, see Comparetti, Virgil in the Middle Ages (trans. 1895).

Virginia. See CLAUDIUS (APPIUS).

Virriathus, a Lusitanian herdsman, headed a rising against the Romans, and from 151 to 141 B.C. repeatedly defeated Roman armies. He was murdered in 140.

Vischer, PETER (1455-1529), sculptor in bronze, was born and died at Nuremberg. He was reckoned by contemporaries as the next artist to Albert Dürer; the 'King Arthur' at Innsbruck is his masterpiece. His sons, Hans, Hermann, and

Peter Vischer the younger, were also distinguished as sculptors and workers in bronze. See German monograph by Bergan (1878). [Fish-er.]

Visscher, CORNELIS (1629-58), a Dutch copper-plate engraver, famous for his portraits and for engravings after Guido Reni, Brouwer, and Ostade.—His brother, JAN (1636-92), was similarly distinguished. [Vees-ker.]

Vit, VINCENTO DE (1811-92), editor of Forcellini's Lexicon Totius Latinitatis (1858-79), a Paduan by birth, was a canon of Rovigo and town-librarian, when in 1850 he joined the brotherhood of Rosinini (q.v.). His unfinished Onomasticon was to contain all proper names down to the 5th century.

Vitellius, AULUS (15-69 A.D.), Roman emperor, was a favourite of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. Appointed by Galba to the command of the legions on the Lower Rhine, he was proclaimed emperor at Colonia Agrippinensis (Cologne) in the beginning of 69; and his generals put an end to the reign of Otho by the victory of Bedriacum. During his brief reign Vitellius gave himself up to beastly gluttony. Meantine Vespasian was proclaimed in Alexandria, and Vitellius, defeated by his rival's followers in two battles, was dragged through the streets of Rome and murdered, 21st December 69.

Vitringa, CAMPEGIUS (1659-1722), born at Leeuwarden, became professor at Franeker, first of Oriental Languages and then of Theology. He left innumerable commentaries on Scripture and other works (mostly in Latin), of which his commentary on Isaiah (1714-20) and the De Synagoga Vetere (1696) were the most important.

Vitruvius Pollio, a North Italian, employed by Augustus as architect and military engineer, wrote about 15 A.C., in an obscure and clumsy style, ten books De Architectura. Prof. Ussing of Copenhagen, however, maintains (Memoirs of Danish Academy, 1896) that the work is a literary forgery of the 4th century A.D.

Vitry, JACQUES DE, a French cardinal legate, who died at Rome in 1240, and is known by his Letters and Exempla. See Prof. Crane's edition of the latter for the Folklore Society (1890).

Vittorino da Feltre (c. 1400-77), the 'humanist educator,' summoned by the Gonzagas to Mantua. See study by W. H. Woodward (1897).

Vitus, ST, the son of a Sicilian pagan, was converted by his nurse Crescentia and her husband Modestus, with whom he suffered martyrdom under Diocletian. He was invoked against sudden death, hydrophobia, and chorea or St Vitus' Dance.

Vives, JUAN LUIS, best known as LUDOVICUS VIVES (1492-1540), Spanish humanist, born at Valencia, studied philosophy at Paris, but, disgusted with the empty quibblings of scholasticism, turned to the study of the classics at Louvain, where he taught and wrote against scholasticism. Thence he was summoned (1523) to England to be tutor of the Princess Mary, and he taught at Oxford. He was imprisoned for opposing the divorce, and after 1528 lived mostly at Bruges. Amongst his works are De Disciplinis; an edition of Aristotle's De Anima; works on Virgil's Bucolics, on the support of the poor, and Christianity. See French monograph by Vadier (1898), and German by Kuypers (1897). [Vee-vays.]

Vivian, RICHARD HUSSEY VIVIAN, LORD (1775-1842), born at Truro, distinguished himself at Corunna, Toulouse, and Waterloo, and was created a baronet in 1828, a peer in 1841. See Memoir by the Hon. Claud Vivian (1897).

Voet, or VOETIUS, GIBBERT (1589-1676), Dutch Calvinist theologian.

Vogler, GEORG JOSEPH (1749-1814), composer, styled Abt Vogler, was born at Würzburg, the son of a violin-maker, was ordained priest at Rome in 1773, and made Knight of the Golden Spur and chamberlain to the pope. At Mannheim he established his first school of music; his second was at Stockholm. After years of wandering and brilliant successes at London and half over Europe as a player on his 'orchestration' (a modified organ), he settled as kapellmeister at Darmstadt, and opened his third school, having for pupils Weber and Meyerbeer. His compositions and his theories of music are now forgotten; but his name survives in Robert Browning's poem. See study by Schafhäuti (1887). [Foag-ler.]

Vogt, CARL (1817-95), naturalist, born at Giessen, studied at Bern under Liebig and at Neuchâtel under Agassiz (whom he helped with his work on glaciers), and in 1847 became professor of Zoology at Giessen, but lost the post as a revolutionist. In 1852 he accepted the chair of Geology at Geneva. He was a thorough-going Materialist and a champion of Darwinism. He continued a keen politician, and in 1878 was elected to the Swiss State Council. Among his many books are Lectures on Man (Anthrop. Soc. 1864), Zoologische Briefe (1851), books on pisciculture, man and the apes, mammals (1883), and comparative anatomy (1888-94). [Focht.]

Vogüé, CHARLES JEAN MELCHIOR, MARQUIS DE (1829-1910), Semitic archaeologist, born in Paris, with Waddington travelled in Syria in 1853-54 and 1861, was ambassador at Constantinople 1871-75, at Vienna 1875-79. He was elected to the Académie in 1902. [Vog-ee-ay.]

Voltaire, VINCENT (1598-1648), poet and letter-writer, born at Amiens, enjoyed the favour of Gaston d'Orléans, Richelieu, Mazarin, and Louis XIII. His brilliant sonnets and vers de société were the delight of the Hôtel Rambouillet. Ubicini (1855) and Roux (1856) edited his Poems; Uzanne his Letters (1880).

Volney, CONSTANTIN FRANÇOIS CHASSEBEUF, COMTE DE (1757-1820), born at Craon in Mayenne, studied at Paris medicine, history, and the Oriental languages, adopted the name of Volney, and travelled in Egypt and Syria (1788-87), publishing his valuable Voyage (1787). A zealous reformer, he was elected to the Constituent Assembly in 1789, but later was thrown into prison till the downfall of Robespierre. His reputation chiefly rests on his famous work Les Ruines, ou Méditations sur les Révolutions des Empires (1791), an essay on the philosophy of history. Like the other philosophes, he was decidedly anti-Christian, and was unjustly reputed a thorough-going atheist. He filled the chair of History in the short-lived École Normale, collected in the United States (1795-98) materials for his Tableau du Climat et du Sol (1808), and was admitted to the Academy. Napoleon made him senator, Count, and Commander of the Legion of Honour; Louis XVIII. made him a peer. See E. Berger's Étude (1852) and Sainte-Beuve's Causeries.

Volta, ALESSANDRO (1745-1827), physicist, nobly born at Como, in 1774-1804 was professor of Natural Philosophy at Pavia. He retired to his native town, but was summoned to show his discoveries to Napoleon, and received medals and titles at home and abroad. He mainly developed the theory of current electricity along purely physical lines; the term *volt-*taic is justly used in many cases instead of galvanic. He discovered the electric decomposition of water; invented a new electric battery, the electrophorus, and an electroscope; and made investigations on heat and gases. His works fill 5 vols. (1816). See monographs by Bianchi and Mochetti (1829-32), and by Volta (1875).

VOLTAIRE, FRANÇOIS MARIE AROUET DE, was born 24th November 1694 in Paris, where his father, François Arouet, held a post in the Chambre des Comptes. In his ninth year he entered the Collège Louis-le-Grand, the chief French seminary of the Jesuits. Leaving college at seventeen, he was destined for the bar, but law disgusted him. Alarmed by the dissipated life which he was leading, his father gladly saw him admitted into the suite of his godfather's brother, the Marquis de Châteauneuf, French ambassador to Holland; but in consequence of an intrigue Arouet was sent home in disgrace. By command of his exasperated father he entered an attorney's office, but his stay in it was short, and he soon obtained notoriety as the author of a satire on his successful rival in the poetic competition for an Academy prize. In 1716, on suspicion of lampooning the regent, the Duc d'Orléans, he was banished for several months from Paris; and in 1717-18, as the author of a worse lampoon, accusing the regent of detestable crimes, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Meanwhile he had written his tragedy Œdipe, and had begun a poem on Henry IV. On leaving the Bastille he assumed the name Voltaire, supposed to be an anagram of Arouet le (a) jeune. Œdipe was performed in 1718, and was triumphantly successful. His next dramatic attempts were almost failures, and he devoted himself to his poem on Henry IV. But the authorities refusing to sanction its publication on account of its championship of Protestantism and of religious toleration, Voltaire had the poem surreptitiously printed at Rouen (1723) and smuggled into Paris, as La Ligue ou Henri le Grand. He was pushing his way at court when an event occurred that drove him from France. The Chevalier de Rohan-Chabot addressing him as a parvenu, Voltaire retorted with spirit, and circulated caustic epigrams on the Chevalier, whose revenge was to have Voltaire beaten by his hirelings. Voltaire challenged the author of the outrage, and was once more thrown into the Bastille, and liberated only on the condition that he would proceed forthwith to England, where he landed in May 1726. Here Bolingbroke made him known to Pope and his circle. He made the acquaintance of Peterborough, Chesterfield, the Herveys, and the Duchess of Marlborough, and became intimate with Young, Thomson, and Gay. He acquired some knowledge of Shakespeare and Milton, Dryden and Butler, Pope's works, Addison's Cato, and the Restoration dramatists. He was strongly attracted to Locke's philosophy, and he mastered the elements of Newton's astronomical physics. Bolingbroke and the English Deists furnished him with many of his weapons. Queen Caroline accepted his dedication to her of the Henriade, the new form of La Ligue; and when permitted to return to France in 1729 he took with him his History of Charles XII. and the materials for his Letters on the English. He laid the foundation of his great wealth by purchasing shares in a government lottery and by speculations in the corn-trade, ultimately increased by the profits from large army contracts. He formed an intimacy with Madame du Châtelet (q.v.), and made her husband's château of Cirey in Champagne their headquarters (1734). Here he wrote dramas (Mérope and Mahomet among them), poetry, his Treatise on Metaphysics, much of his Siècle de Louis Quatorze and Les Mœurs et l'Esprit des Nations, with his Elements of the Philosophy of Newton. Since the appearance of his Letters on the English he had been out of favour at court. But his Princesse de Navarre, performed on the occasion of the Dauphin's marriage (February 1745), pleased Louis XV. by its adroit adulation. This and the patronage of Madame de Pompadour procured him the appointments of royal historiographer and of gentleman-in-ordinary to the king, as well as his election to the French Academy. In 1747 an imprudent speech at a court card-party drove him to take refuge with the Duchesse de Maine, for whose amusement he now wrote Zadig and others of the Oriental tales. When he was allowed to reappear at court, some injudicious flattery of Madame de Pompadour excited the indignation of the queen, and Voltaire had again to migrate. The death (Sept. 1749) of Madame du Châtelet allowed him at last to accept the repeated invitation of Frederick the Great. In July 1750 Voltaire found himself at Berlin as king's chamberlain, with a pension of 20,000 francs and board in one of the royal palaces. But he entered into some questionable financial operations with a Berlin Jew; Frederick was still more gravely offended by his satirical criticisms on Maupertuis; and in March 1753 Frederick and Voltaire parted, never to meet again. In Prussia Voltaire had published his Siècle de Louis Quatorze. On his way home he was arrested at Frankfurt, through Frederick's representative there, instructed to recover from Voltaire a volume of the king's poems. Voltaire avenged himself by writing a malicious sketch of Frederick's character and account of his habits, first printed after the writer's death. Voltaire settled in 1755 near Geneva—after 1758 at Ferney, four miles from Geneva. In 1756-59 appeared his Mœurs et l'Esprit des Nations, his pessimistic poem on the earthquake of Lisbon, and the famous Candide. The suspension of the Encyclopédie by the French government, and the condemnation by the parliament of Paris of a harmless poem of his own on natural religion, impelled Voltaire to declare war against 'L'Infâme.' In 1762 appeared the first of those writings assailing the Christian faith which flowed from his pen until the end of his life. In the same year occurred at Toulouse the judicial murder of Jean Calas (q.v.), falsely accused of having, from Protestant zeal, killed one of his sons to keep him from turning a Catholic. Voltaire exerted himself successfully to get the sentence annulled, and to rescue other members of the Calas family from punishment. This and similar efforts on behalf of victims of French fanaticism procured Voltaire the admiration of many to whom his attacks on Christianity were utterly repugnant. The atheism of Baron d'Holbach's System of Nature, issued in 1770, he vehemently opposed, and was accordingly treated as a reactionary deist. Among his works written in Switzerland were histories of Russia under Peter the Great and of the Age of Louis XV.; the Dictionnaire Philosophique; a Treatise on Toleration; and Fragments on the History of India; besides tales, philosophical treatises, and tragedies and comedies. He kept up an enormous correspondence. He looked keenly after his many investments, from which he ultimately derived what would now be £20,000 a-year. He farmed, reclaiming waste land, planting, rearing poultry, and breeding horses; and he established at Ferney a watch-making industry. In February 1778, when he was in his eighty-fourth year, he visited Paris ostensibly to superintend the arrangements for the performance of his last tragedy, Irene; and he was welcomed with frantic enthusiasm. The excitement and fatigue brought on illness; and he died 30th May 1778. Voluse-nus, FLORENTIUS (FLORENCE WILSON, or WOLSEY, 1504-46), Scottish humanist, born near Elgin, went to the University of Paris, and attained a mastery of Latin which ranks him with the first scholars of his time. After acting as tutor to a son of Cardinal Wolsey, he became principal of a school at Carpentras, near Avignon; and died at Vienne in Dauphiné. His chief work is his De Animi Tranquillitate. See Rampini in Scottish Review for October 1889.

Vondel, JOOST VAN DEN (1587-1679), Dutch poet, born at Cologne, kept a hosier's shop in Amsterdam. Of his thirty-three plays, Lucifer (1654) suggests in some points a parallel with Paradise Lost, on which Gosse (Studies in North Lit. 1879) and Edmundson (Milton and Vondel, 1885) based a preposterous charge of borrowing. The latter finds also in Samson Agonistes plagiarisms from Vondel's Samson. Lennep edited his complete works (1850-69). See studies by Baumgartner (1882) and Lötter (1889).

Voragine, JACOBUS DE (1230-98), a Dominican, born at Viareggio near Genoa, became Archbishop of Genoa. He wrote the Aurea Legenda or Golden Legend, a famous collection of lives of the saints, translated by Caxton in 1483. A good edition is that by Grasse (1846). He is also said to have produced the first Italian translation of the Bible. [Vo-raji-ney.]

Vörösmarty, MICHAEL (1800-55), Hungarian poet, was an advocate and in 1848 a member of the National Assembly. [Ver-esh'-mar-tee.]

Vortigern, the British prince reported by Bede, Nennius, and Geoffrey of Monmouth to have invited the Saxons into Britain to help him against the Picts, and to have married Rowena, daughter of Hengist.

Vos, CORNELIS DE (1585-1651), Dutch painter of portraits and religious and mythological pieces.—His brother, PAUL (1590-1678), painted animals and hunting scenes.

Voss, JOHANN HEINRICH (1751-1826), born at

Sommersdorf in Mecklenburg, studied at Göttingen, and in 1778 went from editing the Musen-almanach at Wandsbeck to be schoolmaster at Otterndorf. Here he translated the Odyssey. In 1782 he became rector of a school at Entin, whence in 1789 he issued his translation of Virgil's Georgics. His controversies with Heyne form his Mythologische Briefe (1794); in answer to Creuzer he wrote Antisymbolik (1824-26). In 1802 he settled in Jena, in 1805 was called to be professor at Heidelberg, where he translated Horace, Hesiod, Theocritus, Bion, Moschus, Tibullus, and Propertius; other translations were Aristophanes and (with the aid of his two sons) Shakespeare—a work far inferior to Schlegel's. Luise (1795, an idyl), is his best original poem. See Lives by Paulus (1826) and by Herbst (1876). [Foss.]

Voss, RICHARD, born 2d September 1851 at Neugrape in Pomerania, has published a long series of poems, dramas, and romances.

Vossius, GERARD JAN (1577-1649), born of Dutch parents near Heidelberg, studied at Leyden, and became in 1600 rector of the school at Dort, in 1615 of the theological college of Leyden. His Historia Pelagiana (1618) brought down upon him the wrath of the orthodox. Laud gave him a prebend worth £100 in Canterbury (without residence). In his De Historicis Latinis (1627) he made a prudent recantation. In 1632 he became professor of History in the Athenæum at Amsterdam. His chief works are Aristarchus, De Historicis Græcis, and Commentaria Rhetorica.—ISAAC VOSSIUS (1618-88), his son, born in Leyden, travelled in England, France, and Italy, collecting many valuable manuscripts, and was at the court of Queen Christina of Sweden, but returned to Holland in 1658. In 1670 he settled in England, and, although a libertine, was appointed by Charles II. a canon of Windsor. He edited the epistles of Ignatius (1646), Justin, Pomponius Mela, and Catullus, and wrote on chronology.

Vowell, JOHN. See HOOKER (RICHARD).

Voysey, CHARLES, born in London 18th March 1828, son of an architect, studied at St Edmund's Hall, Oxford, graduating in 1851, and had been curate in several livings (being ejected from his curacy in Whitechapel for a sermon against endless punishment), when in 1864 he was presented to the living of Healaugh, Yorkshire. His sermons on inspiration and his views in his serial The Sling and Stone (10 vols.) created controversy, and led to a prosecution (1869) on the part of the Archbishop in the York chancery. The judicial committee of Privy-council confirmed the sentence of deprivation (1871). He subsequently became founder and pastor of a Theistic church in London, and has published works on The Mystery of Pain, Death, and Sin, and on Theism.

Vulpus, CHRISTIANE. See GOETHE.

WAGEN, GUSTAV FRIEDRICH (1794-1868), art-critic, was professor of Art-history at Berlin. One of his best-known books is The Treasures of Art in Great Britain (3 vols. 1854).

Wace, HENRY, Dean of Canterbury since 1903, was born in London in 1836, studied at Brasenose, and became professor of Ecclesiastical History (1875-83) and principal of King's College, London (1883). He was Boyle lecturer—Christianity and Morality—(1874-75) and Bampton lecturer—The Foundations of Faith—(1879), and was made a prebendary of St Paul's (1881) and chaplain-in-ordinary to the Queen (1889). With Sir W. Smith he edited the Dictionary of Christian Biography (1877-87). Other of his books are The Gospel and its Witnesses (1883), Student's Manual of the Evidences of Christianity (1886), the Speaker's Commentary on the Apocrypha (1886), and Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry (1890).

Wadding, LUKE (1588-1657), historian of the Franciscan order, born at Waterford, became a Franciscan and professor at Salamanca. In 1618 he settled in Rome, where he founded an Irish Franciscan college, and wrote Annales Ordinis Minorum (1626-40; new ed. 1731-47) and Scriptores Ordinis Minorum, besides editing Duns Scotus.

Waddington, WILLIAM HENRY, French statesman, was born in Paris, 11th December 1826, son of a naturalised English cotton manufacturer, studied at Rugby and Trinity College, Cambridge, and took a classical first-class, with the Chancellor's medal, in 1849. He returned to France, and devoted himself to the study of antiquities, travelling in Asia Minor, Syria, and Cyprus. In 1865 he was elected to the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres. In 1871 he was returned to the National Assembly, and in 1876-85 he sat in the Senate. He was minister of Instruction (1876-77) and of Foreign Affairs (1877), plenipotentiary at the Berlin Congress (1878), president of the Council (1879), and ambassador at London 1883-92. He died 13th January 1894.

Wade, GEORGE (1673-1748), field-marshal, entered the army in 1690, and rose to be lieutenant-general of the Ordnance and a member of the Privy-council. He commanded as a general officer in the Highlands during the pacification after the '15; and to him is due the execution (1726-37) of the great military roads. He suppressed a riot in Glasgow and repaired Edinburgh Castle. In 1744 he was in the Netherlands, and in 1745 his army in Yorkshire was evaded by the Pretender on his southward march.

Wade, SIR THOMAS FRANCIS, K.C.B. (1818-95), son of Colonel Wade, C.B., was in the army in 1838-47. Chinese secretary at Hong-kong in 1855, he became secretary to the Legation at Peking in 1862, and in 1871 plenipotentiary. From 1888 he was professor of Chinese at Cambridge.

Waghorn, LIEUT. THOMAS, R.N. (1800-50), born at Rochester, showed how the overland route to India via Egypt, started in 1838, could be greatly shortened. On 31st October 1845 he arrived in London with the Bombay mail of the 1st October (via Austria and Bavaria and Belgium).

Wagner, RICHARD, was born in Leipzig, 22d May 1813, and educated at Dresden. At thirteen he translated twelve books of the Odyssey, at fourteen wrote a tragedy. Weber attracted the boy, but it was Beethoven's music which gave him his real inspiration; and in 1833 he began his career as an operatic composer with Die Feen (performed only in 1838). After some work in Heidelberg, Königsberg, and Riga, he resolved in 1839 to try his fortune in Paris with Rienzi, but had a sore struggle till 1842, when he left Paris with Rienzi still unperformed. But the success of the opera that year in Dresden led to his appointment as kapellmeister there (1843). Der Fliegende Holländer (1844) was not so enthusiastically received. Tannhäuser (1845) proved at first a comparative failure, and moved him to an elaborate exposition of his ideal (in Opera and Drama and many other essays). Lohengrin was finished early in 1848, and also the poem of Siegfried's Tod; but a too warm sympathy with the revolutionary party (1849) compelled him to flee from Saxony; and for nearly twelve years the bitterness of exile was added to the hardship of poverty. To this period mainly belong Wagner's polemical writings, so biting in their sarcasm and often unfair in their attacks. In 1852 the poem of the Nibelungen Ring trilogy was finished. In 1854 Rheingold (the Introduction or Vorbend) was ready, and Die Walküre (part i.) in 1856. The poem of Tristan was completed in 1857, and the music two years later. In 1861 he received permission to return to Germany, but for three years the struggle with fortune was harder than ever, till an invitation was sent him by Louis II. of Bavaria. The rest of his career was comparatively easy. In 1865 Tristan und Isolde was performed at Munich, followed by a comic opera, Die Meistersinger (1868). Siegfried (Nibelungen Ring, part ii.) was completed in 1869. Wagner had married in 1836, and separated from his wife in 1861. In 1870 he married Cosima, the daughter of Liszt, and formerly the wife of Von Bülow. A theatre, specially constructed for the performance of Wagner's later works, was begun in 1872 at Baireuth, and finished in 1876, two years after the completion of the Götterdämmerung (Nibelungen Ring, part iii.). The first work given was the entire Trilogy; and in July 1882 Wagner's career was crowned by the first performance there of Parsifal. He died at Venice, 13th February 1883. His aim was to reform the whole structure of opera, using the last or 'Beethoven' development of instrumental music as a basis, and freeing it from the fetters of conventionalism. The one canon was to be dramatic fitness. The interest of the drama is to depend not entirely on the music, but also on the poem, and on the acting and staging as well—an aim that Gluck and others had also laboured to attain. Other features in the Wagner music drama are the use of the Leading Motive (Leitmotiv)—found occasionally in Gluck, Mozart, and Weber, but here first adopted with a definite purpose—and the preference for mythological rather than historical subjects. Wagner's works show a progressive development. In the grand opera style of Meyerbeer, Spontini, &c. The Flying Dutchman in romantic opera strikes out for itself a new style, which, followed up in Tannhäuser, reaches its stage of perfection in Lohengrin. From this time dates the music drama, of which Tristan is the most uncompromising type. The trilogy (Walküre, Siegfried, Götterdämmerung, with the Rheingold as introduction) is a very unequal work. It is full of Wagner's most inspired writing and most marvellous orchestration; but it is too long and too diffuse. Parsifal, with its sacred allegory, its lofty nobility of tone, and its pure mysticism, stands on a platform by itself. See Glasenapp's Life of him (1894-1911; trans. Ellis, 1901 et seq.); Daurer in Grove's Dictionary; Jullien's Wagner (Paris, 1886); Hueffer, Richard Wagner and the Music of the Future (1874), and Richard Wagner ('Great Musicians' series, 2d ed. 1883); Correspondence between Wagner and Liszt (trans. 1888); Wagner's Letters to Dresden Friends (trans. 1890); Gustav Kobbe, Wagner's Life and Works (1890); Praeger, Wagner as I knew Him (1892); Houston Chamberlain, Wagner (trans. by G. Wagner, RUDOLF, physiologist (1805-64), was born at Baireuth, was professor at Erlangen and Göttingen, and author of System of Physiology (trans. 1844) and Comparative Anatomy (trans. 1845).—His son, ADOLF, political economist, born at Erlangen, 25th March 1835, has been professor at Vienna, Hamburg, Dorpat, Freiburg, and Berlin. In his numerous works he represents the historical school and supports state-socialism.

Wainewright, THOMAS GRIFFITHS, essayist, forger, and poisoner, was born at Chiswick in October 1794, and was brought up by his grandfather, Dr Ralph Griffiths (1720-1803), founder of the Monthly Review. He had held a commission in the Guards when, about 1820, he took to writing tawdry art criticisms and miscellaneous articles for the periodicals. He married on £200 a-year, and, soon outrunning his means, first committed forgery (1824), and then poisoned with strychnine his uncle (1829), his mother-in-law (1830), a sister-in-law (1830), and an acquaintance at Boulogne (1831). The sister-in-law (Wainwright's wife was an accomplice in her murder) had been fraudulently insured for £18,000, but two actions to enforce payment failed; and Wainwright, venturing back from France in 1837, was arrested for his old forgery, and sentenced to life transportation. In Van Diemen's Land he painted portraits, ate opium, and died in Hobart Town hospital about 1852. He is the 'Varney' of Lytton's Lucretia (1846) and the 'Slinkton' of Dickens's Hunted Down (1860). See his Essays and Criticisms, edited, with a memoir, by W. C. Hazlitt (1850); B. W. Procter's Autobiography (1877); and Oscar Wilde's Intentions (1891).

Waitz, GEORG (1813-86), historian, born at Flensburg, became professor at Kiel in 1842, member of the German National Assembly in 1848, and professor at Göttingen in 1849, where he formed a school of historians. In 1875 he became member of the Academy in Berlin and director of the Monumenta Germaniae historica. He wrote the great Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte (vols. i.-viii. 1843-78) and works on Schleswig-Holstein and Ulfilas. See books by Steindorff (1887) and Kluckhohn (1887). [Vyses.]

Waitz, THEODOR (1821-64), anthropologist, born at Gotha, became professor of Philosophy at Marburg. Besides his monumental Anthropologie der Naturvölker (6 vols. 1859-71), he wrote on psychology and pedagogy.

Wake, WILLIAM (1657-1737), born at Blandford, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, and after being Dean of Exeter (1701) and Bishop of Lincoln (1705), became Archbishop of Canterbury in 1716. He edited the Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers (1693).

Wakefield, EDWARD GIBBON (1796-1862), born in London, was in 1826 imprisoned for abducting a young lady and marrying her at Gretna Green. During his imprisonment he studied colonial questions, and afterwards assisted in the colonisation of South Australia, was private secretary to Lord Durham in Canada in 1838, and managing director of the New Zealand Association. He was one of the founders of the High Church colony of Canterbury.

Wakefield, GILBERT (1756-1801), born at Nottingham, became fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, renounced his Anglican orders, was classical tutor in Dissenting academies at Warrington and Hackney, and lay two years in Dorchester jail for a 'seditious' answer to Bishop Watson. He published editions of Bion and Moschus, Virgil, Horace, and Lucretius; Early Christian Writers on the Person of Christ (1784); Inquiry into the Expediency of Social Worship (which he denied, 1791); Examination of Paine's Age of Reason (1794); and Silva Critica, illustrating the Scriptures from profane learning (1789-95). He was a keen controversialist. His Memoirs (1792) are uninteresting; not so his Correspondence with Fox (1813). See Life by R. Garnett (1898).

Wakley, THOMAS (1795-1862), studied medicine, founded the Lancet (1823), and was a reformer of medical abuses, M.P. for Finsbury from 1835, and coroner from 1839. See Life by Sprigge (1897).

Walch, CHRISTIAN WILHELM FRANZ (1726-84),

from 1754 professor of Theology at Göttingen, wrote on church history and heresies. — His father, JOHANN GEORG WALCH (1693-1775), professor at Jena, edited Luther's works (1740-52), and wrote on controversies within and without the Lutheran church. See the Life by his son (1777). [Valkh, gntural.]

Walford, LUCY BETHIA, daughter of John Colquhoun (q.v.), was born at Portobello in 1845, and married A. S. Walford, Esq. From 1874 she published over thirty novels and stories.

Walker, CLEMENT, born at Cliffe in Dorset, sat for Wells in 1640, was imprisoned in the Tower by Cromwell in 1649 for his History of Independence (1646-60), and died there in 1651.

Walker, FREDERICK (1840-75), artist, was born in Marylebone, became a wood-engraver, made drawings for the Cornhill, Good Words, Once a Week, and other periodicals, and contributed to the exhibitions of the Society of Painters in Water-colours. He was made A.R.A. in 1871. Amongst his works are the water-colours, 'The Wayfarers,' 'The Rainbow,' and 'The Fishmonger's Shop,' and the oil-paintings, 'The Bathers,' 'The Vagrants,' 'The Old Gate,' 'The Plough,' and 'The Harbour of Refuge.' See Claude Phillips (Portfolio, 1894) and the Life by J. G. Marks (1896).

Walker, GEORGE (1618-90), defender of Londonderry, born of English parents in County Tyrone, became rector of Donoghmore. When the army of James II. approached Londonderry (December 1688), Walker by his fiery harangues stirred up the townspeople to make a desperate defence. The siege lasted from April till August 1689. The starving citizens were sustained by the rousing sermons of Walker, and his example at the head of sallies against the enemy. He was warmly received at court, thanked by the House of Commons, and created D.D. by Oxford and Bishop of Derry by the king. He fell at the battle of the Boyne.

Walker, HELEN (c. 1710-91), the prototype of 'Jeanie Deans,' was buried in Irongray churchyard, Dumfriesshire. Scott erected a monument to her memory and wrote an inscription.

Walker, JOHN (c. 1781-1859), chemist at Stockton-on-Tees, invented lucifer matches in 1827.

Walker, JOHN (1674-1747), son of a mayor of Exeter, fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and rector of a church in Exeter, wrote the famous Sufferings of the Clergy Sequestered in the Grand Rebellion (1714), called forth by Calamy's Account of the ejected Nonconformists. He estimates at from seven to eight thousand the number of clergy 'imprisoned, banished, and sent a-starving.'

Walker, JOHN (1732-1807), dictionary-maker, born at Colney Hatch, was by turns actor, schoolmaster, and peripatetic teacher of elocution, and passed from Presbyterianism to the Roman Catholic communion. His well-known Rhyming Dictionary (1775) has aided countless poets from Byron downwards. His Critical Pronouncing Dictionary (1791) passed through some fifty editions.

Walker, JOHN (1770-1831), Oxford antiquary, became fellow of New College, Oxford, and vicar of Hornechurch in Essex in 1819. His works were Curia Oxoniensis; Oxoniana; Curious Articles from the Gentleman's Magazine (1809); and Letters Written by Eminent Persons (1813).

Walker, THOMAS (1784-1836), was the son of a Manchester manufacturer, whom Erskine defended successfully on a charge of high-treason. He passed from Trinity College, Cambridge, to the Inner Temple in 1812, and became a Lambeth police-magistrate in 1829. He wrote on pauperism (1826), and was a conversationalist of rare humour. His famous weekly, The Original, ran only from May to November 1835.

Walker, WILLIAM, filibuster, born 8th May 1824 at Nashville, Tennessee, studied medicine at Edinburgh and Heidelberg, but took to law and then journalism at New Orleans and in California. In 1853 he failed to found a new republic in Northern Mexico, and in 1854 fought his way to California; with fifty-five followers, he started for Nicaragua to help the Democrats. In June 1855 he was repulsed; but in September, with 110 men, he took the capital, Granada. He was generalissimo of the new government, and raised an American force of 1400 men. In 1856 Costa Rica made war on the foreigners. Walker was elected president; and his government, recognised by the United States, restored slavery. Meanwhile his enemies were closing in on him, and at Rivas (May 1, 1857) he capitulated to a U.S. sloop-of-war. But in November he landed again with 150 men—only to surrender, in December, to a U.S. frigate. In 1860 he published The War in Nicaragua, and turned Catholic. In August he sailed for Honduras with 100 men, took Trujillo, was compelled to evacuate by a British man-of-war, and, given up to the Honduras authorities and tried, was shot 12th September 1860. See Doubleday's Reminiscences (1886) and Roche's Story of the Filibusters (1891).

Walker, WILLIAM SIDNEY (1795-1846), born at Pembroke, was a fellow of Trinity, Cambridge. He wrote a great work on Shakespeare's Versification (1852) and a Critical Examination of the Text of Shakespeare (1859). See his Poetical Remains (1852, with a memoir by Moultrie).

Walker, ARTHUR BINGHAM, born at Bristol, 17th December 1855, and educated at Oxford, holds a post in the G.P.O., and is a dramatic critic.

Wallace, ALFRED RUSSEL, born at Usk in Monmouthshire, 8th January 1823, was a land-surveyor and architect until 1845, when he devoted himself to natural history. He spent four years on the Amazon with Bates (q.v.), and eight amongst the Malay Islands, making zoological collections. Unaware of Darwin's researches and speculations, he there committed to writing a theory of development by natural selection, though not using the term. Valuable works by him are his Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro (1853), Palm Trees of the Amazon (1853), The Malay Archipelago (1869; 10th ed. 1892), and Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection (1870). On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism (1875; new ed. 1896) vindicates views seldom entertained by men of science. The Geographical Distribution of Animals (1876) practically founded a new science. Tropical Nature appeared in 1878, Australasia in 1879 (re-edited by Guillemin, 1893-94), Island Life in 1880, and Darwinism in 1889. O.M., F.R.S., and D.C.L., he has advocated land-nationalisation (1882), and written The Wonderful Century (1898), Man's Place in the Universe (1903), his own autobiography (1905), and The World of Life (1910).

Wallace, SIR DONALD MACKENZIE, born in 1841 in Dumbartonshire, studied at Edinburgh, was private secretary to two viceroys of India, and wrote on Russia (1877; new ed. 1905) and Egypt.

Wallace, LEWIS (1827-1905), born at Brookville, Indiana, served in the Mexican war and the civil war, and was governor of Utah (1878-81) and minister to Turkey (1881). General Lew Wallace is known by his remarkably successful religious novel Ben Hur (1880), The Boyhood of Christ (1888), and other books.

Wallace, SIR RICHARD, K.C.B. (1818-90), made a baronet in 1871 for philanthropic exertions in connection with the siege of Paris, inherited from his putative father, the Marquis of Hertford, a noble collection of paintings and other art objects, which in 1897 his widow bequeathed to the nation. They are preserved in Hertford House, opened to the public in 1900.

Wallace, ROBERT, D.D., M.P. (1831-1900), was born at St Andrews, studied there and at Edinburgh, and was successively minister at Newton-on-Ayr and Edinburgh (1860-76), and Professor of Church History in the University. He edited the Scotsman (1876-80), went to the English bar, and entered parliament for East Edinburgh in 1886 as a Radical.

Wallace, SIR WILLIAM, Scottish patriot, was born about 1274, second of the three sons of Sir Malcolm Wallace of Elderslie near Paisley. Blind Harry (see HARRY) associates the hero's boyhood with Dundee, his youthful manhood with Ayrshire; according to Fordun, he got part of his education from an uncle, the priest of Dunipace. He stands out clearly in 1297 as the chief of a patriotic force arrayed against Edward I. of England. Wytoun affirms that to avenge the murder of his young wife he attacked the English garrison at Lanark and slew William de Hazelrig; and it is certain that with a large company he lay in the Forest of Selkirk. On 11th September he defeated in the battle of Stirling Bridge Edward's general, Warren Earl of Surrey. The whole kingdom submitted to Wallace, who made friendly overtures to the Hanse towns of Lübeck and Hamburg. Crossing the Border, he harried the north of England as far south as Newcastle; and on his return he was appointed 'Governor of Scotland, in name of King John [Balliol], and by consent of the Scottish nation.' In 1298 Edward invaded Scotland with 88,000 men. Wallace was forced to give battle at Falkirk (22d July), where, deserted by the cavalry, his infantry were shot down by the English archers and totally routed. We know that Wallace visited France; and that on 3d August 1305 he was captured near Glasgow by Sir John Menteith, Edward's Scottish governor of Dumbarton. He was brought to London, tried for treason in Westminster Hall, condemned, and hanged, disembowelled, beheaded, and quartered, the quarters being sent to Newcastle, Berwick, Stirling, and Perth. See Stevenson's Documents illustrative of Wallace (Maitland Club, 1841), the Marquis of Bute's Early Days of Wallace (1876) and Burning of the Barns of Ayr (1878), A. Brunton's Wallace (1881), Henry Gough's Scotland in 1298 (1888), James Moir's Wallace (1888), C. Rogers's Book of Wallace (Grampian Club, 1889), and Prof. Murison's Wallace (1898).

Wallace, WILLIAM (1844-97), born at Cupar, became fellow and tutor of Merton, Oxford, in 1882 succeeded T. H. Green as professor of Moral Philosophy, and was killed by a bicycle accident. A Hegelian, he translated Hegel's Logic (1874; revised ed. 1892-94), published Hegel's Philosophy of Mind (a translation with essays), delivered Gifford Lectures at Glasgow, and wrote monographs on Schopenhauer and Epicureanism.

Wallace, WILLIAM VINCENT, operatic composer, was born at Waterford of Scotch parents, 1st June 1814. After being for some years leader of an orchestra in Dublin, he emigrated (1832), and gave concerts in Australia, New Zealand, India, and America. In 1845 he came to England. His first opera, Maritana (1845), was an immediate success. Matilda of Hungary followed in 1847. After a sojourn of years in Germany, he produced Lurline (1860), The Amber Witch (1861), Love's Triumph (1862), and The Desert Flower (1863). He died October 12, 1865, leaving another opera, Estrella, nearly completed.

Wallenstein, or WALDSTEIN, ALBRECHT WENZEL EUSEBIUS VON, was born at Hernanitz in Bohemia, 14th September 1583. When his father, a Czech Protestant noble, died, a Catholic uncle entrusted the boy's education to the Jesuits. Having tried his sword against the Turks, he married a Bohemian widow of vast estate, and sent troops to assist the Archduke Ferdinand against Venice. When in 1618 the Bohemians took up arms against the emperor, Count von Wallenstein raised troops and led them against his countrymen. The Bohemians humiliated, Wallenstein possessed himself of huge slices of their confiscated estates, and was in 1623 made Prince of Friedland in Mecklenburg. He equipped 20,000 men for the emperor, and by Ferdinand was named general-in-chief of all the imperial armies (1625). He chased Mansfeld through Hungary, and checked Bethlen Gabor of Transylvania. In 1627, with Tilly, he won Jutland and Mecklenburg from the Protestant princes; and the emperor sold him the dukedom of Sagan (in Silesia), created Friedland a hereditary duchy, and gave him the duchy of Mecklenburg. Stralsund defied all his desperate efforts to take it. His insatiable ambition, thirst of power, and arrogance gave dire offence to the princes of the empire, who, when Gustavus Adolphus invaded northern Germany, made the emperor dismiss the upstart (1630). But the failure of the Duke of Bavaria and his colleagues to check the invincible 'Snow-king' compelled Ferdinand to restore Wallenstein to supreme command, and on his own terms (1631). Having driven the Saxons out of Bohemia, he marched against the Swedes in Bavaria; repulsed the attempt of Gustavus Adolphus to storm his entrenched camp near Nuremberg; but was defeated by the Swedes at Lützen (1632), where their king fell. Wallenstein now thought himself the chief person in the empire, and plunged into intrigue to secure his position and found a dynasty. He sought to sow disunion amongst the Protestant princes as well as amongst the chiefs of the Catholic League, he hoodwinked them all and the emperor to boot, and he pretended a sincere desire to restore peace to distracted Germany. At length his enemies convinced Ferdinand that the all-too-powerful general was meditating treachery. A month after Christmas 1633 the emperor deposed the duke from his command, and in another month proclaimed him a traitor. Wallenstein, thinking to find a supporter in Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar, hastened to Eger; there traitors in his train, notably the Irishmen Butler and Devereux, and the Scotsmen Gordon and Lesley, after killing his faithful adherents, slew Wallenstein himself on the evening of 25th February 1634. He had been throughout a firm believer in astrology. See Lives by Ranke (4th ed. 1880), Förster (1834), Aretin (1846), Hurter (1855); monographs by Irmer (1888-89), Gadeke (1885), Hildebrandt (1885), Toyne (1911); Schmidt's Wallenstein-Litteratur (1878).

Waller, EDMUND, born at Coleshill near Amersham, Herts (now Bucks), 3d March 1606, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He was returned for Chipping-Wycombe in 1625, and for Amersham in 1627. At six-and-twenty he married a London heiress, who soon died, leaving him free to sing the praises of 'Sacharissa'—Lady Dorothy Sidney (daughter of the Earl of Arundel), who spurned his suit. Again returned for Amersham to the Long Parliament, he was chosen by the House to conduct the impeachment of Crawley for his judgment in the ship-money case. But his heart was with the king; and, plunging into a dubious plot on the king's behalf, he was arrested and expelled the House. He showed himself an abject coward, eager to confess, and his sentence of death was commuted to a fine of £10,000 and life-banishment. He lived at Rouen, in Switzerland, and in Paris, and was as popular among the impoverished exiles for his hospitality as for his wit. He was permitted to return in 1653; and his famous panegyric on Cromwell is almost his finest poem. He was ready with his congratulation, 'Upon His Majesty's Happy Return,' and he continued to the end a favourite at court. In 1661 he sat for Hastings, and later for Chipping-Wycombe and Saltash in Cornwall. He died 21st October 1687. Waller's poems, which are mostly of the occasional character, were widely circulated, but not published till 1645—again in 1664. His character is reflected in his poetry, which is easy, flowing, felicitous, but lacking in sincerity and strength. He revived the heroic couplet. Editions are by Fenton (1729) and Drury (1893). See Julia Cartwright's Sacharissa (1892).

Wallis, JOHN (1616-1703), mathematician, born at Ashford, Kent, was trained at Cambridge, and took orders, but in 1648 became Savilian professor of Geometry at Oxford. He sided with the parliament, was secretary to the Westminster Assembly, but strenuously favoured the Restoration. Besides the Arithmetica Infinitorum, he wrote on proportion, mechanics, the quadrature of the circle (against Hobbes), grammar, logic, theology, and the teaching of the deaf and dumb, and edited some of the Greek mathematicians. He was a founder of the Royal Society. His collected works appeared in 1791.

Walpole, HORACE, fourth Earl of Orford, was born 24th September 1717 (o.s.) in London, youngest son of Sir Robert Walpole. At Eton and at King's College, Cambridge, he had Gray the poet as a friend; and while still at the university was appointed by his father to patent places. Gray and he started on the grand tour, but quarrelled and separated at Reggio, where Walpole fell ill. He returned to England (1741) to take his seat for Callington in Cornwall. Although he interested himself in cases like the Byng trial of 1757, his function in politics was that of the chronicling spectator rather than the earnest actor. He exchanged his Cornish seat in 1754 for the family borough of Castle Rising, which he vacated in 1757 for the other family borough of King's Lynn. In 1745 his father died, leaving him with ample means; and he continued to live the life of collector and connoisseur, dabbling lightly in familiar verse and jeux d'esprit, trifling with history and art criticism, and corresponding voluminously. In 1747 he purchased, near Twickenham, the cottage which he gradually elaborated into the well-known 'Gothic Castle' and 'curiosity shop' of Strawberry Hill. This transformation and authorship, visits to Paris, the establishment of a private press, and correspondence with Sir Horace Mann and others constituted the occupations of his life. He died 2d March 1797, and was buried at Houghton. In 1791, by the death of his eldest brother's son, he had become fourth Earl of Orford. He never married. His essays in Moore's World exhibit a light hand, and he had gifts as a verse-writer. In such squibs as the Letter from Xo Ho to his friend Lien Chi at Peking (1757) he is at his best. His Castle of Otranto (1764) set the fashion of supernatural romance. His tragedy of The Mysterious Mother (1768) is strong but gruesome. Other works are Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors (1758), Fugitive Pieces in Verse and Prose (1758), Anecdotes of Painting in England (1761-71), Catalogue of Engravers (1763), Historic Doubts on Richard III. (1768), an Essay on Modern Gardening (1785), &c. He also published editions of Grammont's Memoirs (1772); Life of Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1764); of Lucan's Pharsalia, with Bentley's notes (1760); and of the Pindaric Odes of Gray (1757). Walpole's literary reputation rests chiefly upon his letters, which deal, in the most vivacious way, with party politics, foreign affairs, literature, art, and gossip. P. Cunningham (1857-59) collected 2665; Mrs P. Toynbee (16 vols. 1903 et seq.) 3061. See also his Memoirs edited by Eliot Warburton (1852), and the Life by Austin Dobson (1890).

Walpole, Sir Robert, afterwards Earl of Orford, the third son of Robert Walpole, M.P., was born 26th August 1676 at Houghton in Norfolk. Educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, through the death of his brothers he succeeded to the family estates on the death of his father (1700). In 1701 he was returned to parliament for Castle Rising, in 1702 for King's Lynn. In 1708 he became Secretary at War, and in 1710 Treasurer of the Navy. Shortly after this he was found guilty by the House of Commons of 'breach of trust and notorious corruption,' and in January 1712 was expelled the House and sent to the Tower; but the charge was due to party animosity. He had all along been a strong Hanoverian, and on the accession of George I. he was made a Privy-councillor. After the impeachment of Bolingbroke and others by his means, he became in 1715 Chancellor of the Exchequer and First Lord of the Treasury. In 1717 he resigned, after bringing in a Sinking-fund Bill. Out of office he has been charged with somewhat unscrupulous opposition. The Peerage Bill having been defeated mainly by Walpole, Sunderland gave Walpole (1720) the post of Paymaster-general, and after the collapse of the South Sea Scheme the public looked to Walpole to restore order in public affairs; in 1721 he became First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, and from this time to his final retirement in 1742 the life of Walpole may be said to be the history of England. Whereas heretofore ministers were regarded as equals amongst themselves, henceforward there was a prime-minister who gave unity to Cabinet government. By systematic bribery (less in money amount than has been supposed) he secured a Whig House of Commons; and he trained the Whig lords to rely upon the Commons. His first successful trial of strength (1724) was with Carteret; later he held his own against Bolingbroke and Pulteney; forced on the breach with Townsend, who retired (1730); and quarrelled with Chesterfield. He failed to pass a famous Excise Bill (1733), and lost credit by his peaceful foreign policy. In 1740 a motion was made in the House to petition the king to remove him from his counsels for ever—a motion negated by a large majority; but Walpole's power was shaken. He resigned 2d February 1742, when he was created Earl of Orford, with a pension of £4000 a-year. A committee appointed by the House of Commons gave a report against him on the charge of bribery, unsupported by evidence, and proceedings were ultimately dropped. He died 18th March 1745. He had strong common sense, but was essentially coarse-minded. See Coxe's Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole (1798), monographs by Ewald (1877) and John Morley (1889), works cited at HORACE WALPOLE, and Dr Jessopp's One Generation of a Norfolk House (1878), which deals specially with the Jesuit, Henry Walpole, hanged in 1595.

Walpole, Sir Spencer, LL.D., K.C.B. (1898), historian, son of the Right Hon. Spencer Horatio Walpole (1806-98), Q.C., and thrice Conservative Home Secretary, was born 6th Feb. 1839. Educated at Eton, he had a post in the War Office, was made inspector of fisheries in 1867, was lieutenant-governor of Man (1882), and secretary to the Post-Office from 1893, and died in 1907. He wrote Lives of Spencer Perceval (his grandfather, 1873) and Lord John Russell (1889), two volumes in the 'English Citizen' series, and the History of England from 1815 (1878-1904).

Walpurga, Sr., with her brother Willibald, companion of St Boniface (q.v.), went from England to Germany, was abbess of Heidenheim, and died about 778. Her day is 1st May; and hence she has been associated with some May-day superstitions. During 'Walpurgis Night,' between 30th April and 1st May, the witches rode on broomsticks and he-goats to the ancient places of sacrifice, to hold revel there with the devil—the Brocken in Goethe's Faust.

Walsh, William J., born in Dublin, 30th Jan. 1841, became professor at Maynooth College, its president (1881), and Roman Catholic Archbishop (1885). He has published essays and works on the Land Act, the university question, the education grievance, Gregorian music, bimetallicism, &c.

Walsingham, Sir Francis, born at Chiselmhurst, Kent, about 1536, studied at King's College, Cambridge. Burghley sent him on an embassy to France in 1570-73; and having discharged his diplomatic duties with consummate skill, he was appointed one of the principal secretaries of state to Elizabeth, sworn of the Privy-council, and knighted. In 1578 he was sent on an embassy to the Netherlands, in 1581 to France, and in 1583 to Scotland. He contrived to tap the letters of Mary Queen of Scots and the answers to them, many of the chief agents in the real fountain-head of Babington's conspiracy being spies in his pay. When Walsingham went to Fotheringhay as one of the commission to try Mary, she charged him with having forged the correspondence produced against her. His administration of foreign affairs was founded on the system of bribery, espionage, and deception, and no minister was better informed of the intrigues of foreign courts. Notwithstanding this diplomatic duplicity, his personal integrity and disinterested patriotism are undoubted. He favoured the Puritan party, and in his later days gave himself up to religious meditation. Elizabeth acknowledged his genius and important services, yet she kept him poor and without honours; and he died in poverty and debt on 6th April 1590. His daughter Frances became successively the wife of Sir Philip Sidney, of the Earl of Essex, and of Richard de Burch, fourth Earl of Clanricarde.

Walsingham, Thomas, precentor of St Albans abbey under Richard II., and afterwards prior of Wymundham, one of the historians of St Albans. See his Historia Anglicana (Rolls series, 1863-64).

Walter, John (1739-1812), founder of the Times, had been an underwriter at Lloyds, who lost his fortune through the capture by a French squadron of a fleet of merchantmen on which he had taken a large risk. The Times was established in 1788, and in 1803 the management of the paper was transferred to his son, JOHN WALTER (1784-1847), a man of exceptional talent, energy, and enterprise. He refused to accept the foreign news offered by the government, and organised a system by which intelligence from abroad was more correctly reported and more rapidly transmitted to London than heretofore. After almost insuperable difficulties, he succeeded in 1814 in printing the Times by steam. His son and successor, JOHN WALTER (1818-94), was for twelve years member (Liberal-Conservative) for Nottingham, and then for Berks 1859-85. The fourth JOHN WALTER having been drowned skating in 1870, a younger brother, ARTHUR (1846-1910), succeeded to the direction of the paper about 1890.

Walter, LUCY. See CHARLES II.

Walther von der Vogelweide (c. 1160-1230), greatest of the German Minnesinger, was born probably in Tyrol. In 1180-98 he was in high favour at the court of Austria; later he was at Mainz and Magdeburg; in 1204 he outshone his rivals in the great poetical contest at Wartburg. He first sided with the Guelphs, but made friends with the victorious Hohenstaufen, Frederick II., who gave him a small estate. See monographs by Uhland (1822), Menzel (1865), and Schönbach (2d ed. 1895), and a full bibliography by Leo (1880). [Vahl-ter.]

Waltner, CHARLES, born at Paris, 24th March 1846, originally a painter, became famous by his etchings after Rembrandt, Rubens, Van Dyck, Velazquez, &c.; among them Millet's 'Angelus' and Munkacsy's 'Christ before Pilate.'

Walton, BRIAN (1600-61), born in Cleveland district, Yorkshire, studied at Cambridge, and held cures in London and Essex. Sequestered in 1641, he found refuge in Oxford, and then in London devoted himself to his great London Polyglott Bible (6 vols. 1654-57), in which he had aid from Usher, Lightfoot, Pocock, and other scholars. He was consecrated Bishop of Chester in 1660. Nine languages are used in the Polyglott—Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Ethiopic, Greek, and Latin. Other works were an Introductio to Oriental languages (1654) and Considerator Considered (1660), a defence of the Polyglott. See Life by Todd (1821).

Walton, IZAAK, the 'Father of Angling,' was born at Stafford, 9th August 1593. In 1624 we find him settled in London as a linen-draper, and about 1644 he retired from business with a modest competence. In 1626 he married a great-grandniece of Crammer, and in 1647 Ann Ken, a half-sister of the future bishop. He spent most of his time 'in the families of the eminent clergymen of England;' lived latterly much at Winchester; and died there, 15th December 1683. The first edition of The Compleat Angler, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation, appeared in 1653; the fourth, grown from thirteen chapters to twenty-one, in 1676. The latter contained also Charles Cotton's 'Second Part of the Complete Angler.' The discourse of fishes, of English rivers, of fishponds, and of rods and lines is interspersed with scraps of dialogue, moral reflections, quaint old verses, songs, and sayings, and idyllic glimpses of country-life; the whole breathes such cheerful piety and contentment, such sweet freshness and simplicity, as to give the book a perennial charm. Not less exquisite are his Lives—of Donne (1640), Wotton (1651), Hooker (1662), Herbert (1670), and Sanderson (1678). In Westwood's Chronicle of 'The Compleat Angler' (1883) 97 editions are cited, including those by [Sir] John Hawkins (1760), Major (1824, 1835, 1844), Sir Harris Nicolas (1836), Bethune (New York, 1847), Jesse and Bohn (1856), and Dowling (1857). With Le Gallienne's (1896) and A. Lang's (1897) there are over 120. An original edition fetched £415 in 1896. Of the Lives there are editions by Zouch (1796), Major (1825), Bullen (1884), Sampson (1908).

Wappers, GUSTAVE (1803-74), Belgian painter, founded the 'national' school of painting.

Warbeck, PERKIN, a native of Tournay, appeared in 1490 at the court of the Duchess of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV. of England, and professed to be Richard Duke of York, younger of the two sons of Edward IV. murdered in the Tower. In 1491 he was welcomed at Cork, in 1492 at the court of Charles VIII. of France; and from Burgundy he made an ineffectual landing in Kent (July 1495). In Scotland, James IV. gave him his kinswoman, Catharine Gordon, a daughter of the Earl of Huntly, in marriage. In 1498 he attempted to besiege Exeter, then went on to Taunton, but ran away to the sanctuary at Beaulieu in Hampshire, surrendered on promise of pardon, and was imprisoned. Next year he escaped, but was caught, thrown into the Tower, and executed in Nov. 1499. See Gairdner's appendix to his History of Richard III. (3d ed. 1898).

Warburton, ELIOT, was born in 1810, at Anghrim, County Galway, son of the inspector-general of constabulary in Ireland. He studied at Cambridge, and was called to the bar, but soon devoted himself to literature, travel, and the improvement of his Irish estates. His eight works include The Crescent and the Cross (1844), a spirited description of travel in Eastern lands; Memoirs of Prince Rupert (1849); and Darien (1851). Sailing to Panamá, he was lost in the Amazon, burnt off Land's End, on 4th Jan. 1852.

Warburton, WILLIAM, born at Newark, the town-clerk's son, Dec. 24, 1698, had practised as an attorney, when he took orders in 1723. Rector of Brant-Broughton, Lincolnshire, he gave himself for eighteen years to severe study. His Alliance between Church and State (1736) first called attention to his powers, but The Divine Legation of Moses (1738-40) formed the sure foundation of his fame. Of this work books vii. and viii. never appeared; book ix. was published only in 1758. It displays no speculative power or profundity of thought, but merely vigour in verbal logic, and multifarious but inaccurate reading, dogmatism, and arrogance beyond belief. In 1739 he defended the orthodoxy of Pope's Essay on Man, became his friend and literary executor, and secured influential patrons. Successively preacher of Lincoln's Inn (1746), prebendary of Gloucester (1753), king's chaplain (1754), prebendary of Durham (1755), Dean of Bristol (1757), and Bishop of Gloucester (1759), he wore out his days in endless warfare with Hume, Jortin, the Deists, Voltaire, Lowth, and Wesley. In his early years he had aided Theobald in his Shakespeare, and in 1747 he himself issued an edition which brought him no credit. Other works were the credulous Julian (1750) and The Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion. He died June 11, 1779. A sumptuous edition of his works was published in 1788 by Bishop Hurd; another in 1811. See Lives by F. Kilvert (1860) and J. S. Watson (1863).

Ward, ADOLPHUS WILLIAM, LL.D., born at Hampstead, December 2, 1837, became in 1860 a fellow of St Peter's College, Cambridge; in 1866 professor of History and English Literature at Owens College, Manchester, and in 1890 its Principal; and in 1900 Master of Peterhouse. He translated Curtius's History of Greece (1868-73), and wrote Great Britain and Hanover (1899), The Electress Sophia (1903), an invaluable History of English Dramatic Literature (1875). Other works are Chaucer (1880) and Dickens (1882) in 'Men of Letters,' The Counter-Reformation (1888), edition of Pope and Crabbe, Marlowe's Faustus and Greene's Friar Bacon, Byrom's poems, and parts of the Cambridge History of Literature.

Ward, ARTEMUS. See BROWNE (C. F.).

Ward, EDWARD MATTHEW (1816-79), born in London, studied at the Royal Academy, Rome, and Munich. In 1843 he attracted notice by 'Dr Johnson Perusing the Manuscript of the Vicar of Wakefield.' Of his eight pictures for Westminster Palace (1852) one is 'The Last Sleep of Argyll.' He became A.R.A. in 1847, and R.A. in 1855. His notable pictures are 'Fall of Clarendon,' 'Charles II. and Nell Gwynn,' 'The Royal Family of France in Prison,' 'Charlotte Corday,' 'Jeanie Deans,' 'The Earl of Leicester and Amy Robsart,' 'Luther's First Study of the Bible,' 'Baxter and Jeffreys,' 'Doctor Goldsmith,' and 'James II. receiving the News of the Landing of William of Orange.' He died from a wound inflicted by his own hand. See his Life and Works, by Dafforne (1879).

Ward, HARRY MARSHALL (1854-1906), F.R.S., was educated at Owens College and Christ's College, Cambridge, and in 1895 became Cambridge professor of Botany.

Ward, Mrs HUMPHRY, was born 11th June 1851 at Hobart in Tasmania. Her father, Thomas Arnold (1823-1900), second son of Dr Arnold of Rugby, on turning Roman Catholic, resigned his school-inspectorship, and became professor at Dublin (1856). Afterwards at Birmingham and at Oxford he wrote a Manual of English Literature (1862), and edited Select Works of Wyclif (1869), Beowulf (1876), and for the Rolls series Henry of Huntingdon (1879) and Symeon of Durham (1882-85). With Addis he edited the Catholic Dictionary (1883). His daughter, MARY AUGUSTA ARNOLD, in 1872 married Thomas Humphry Ward, born at Hull, 9th Nov. 1845, editor of The English Poets (1880), Men of the Reign (1885), Men of the Time (12th ed. 1887), and Reign of Queen Victoria (1887). She began early to contribute to Macmillan's, and gave the fruits of her Spanish studies to Smith's Dictionary of Christian Biography. A child's story, Milly and Olly (1881), Miss Bretherton (1884), a slight novel, and the translation of Amiel's Journal Intime (1885) prepared the way for the spiritual romance of Robert Elsmere (1888), and its successor, The History of David Grieve (1892). Marcella, Sir George Tressady, Lady Rose's Daughter, Helbeck of Darwinsdale, Eleanor (a play), Diana Mallory (1908), Daphne (1909), Canadian Born (1910).

Ward, JAMES, LL.D., born at Hull, 27th Jan. 1843, was a Congregational minister, but going to Cambridge in 1872, became a fellow of Trinity, and in 1897 professor of Mental Philosophy.

Ward, NATHANIEL (1570-1653), born at Haverhill, Suffolk, studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was suspended from his cure by Laud for nonconformity in 1633. He was the pastor of Agawam or Ipswich in Massachusetts till 1645, when he returned to England and became minister of Shenfield, Essex. He wrote The Simple Cobbler of Agawam, a controversial work, in 1647.

Ward, NATHANIEL BAGSHAW (1791-1868), for forty years vaccinator to the National Vaccine Establishment, was also botanist and inventor of the 'Wardian Case' for ferns.

Ward, WILLIAM GEORGE (1812-82), son of a London M.P., was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, and became fellow and tutor of Balliol. A strong Tractarian, he published in 1844 The Ideal of a Christian Church, for which he was deprived of his degree and had to leave the university. He joined the Roman communion, and became editor of the Dublin Review. See W. G. Ward and the Catholic Revival, by his son, Wilfrid Ward (1889-93).

Warden, FLORENCE, the pen-name of Florence Alice James, née Price, daughter of a London business man, who, first a governess, then an actress (1880-85), married Mr G. E. James, and has published The House on the Marsh (1882), A Perfect Fool, and over a score of more novels.

Wardlaw, ELIZABETH, LADY (1677-1727), second daughter of Sir Charles Halkett of Pitfirrane, married in 1696 Sir Henry Wardlaw, Bart. of Pitreavie, Dunfermline. Her pseudo-archaic ballad, Hardyknute (1719), had been expanded and reprinted, when Percy in the second edition of his Reliques (1767) revealed the authorship. To her also Dr Robert Chambers in 1859 ascribed 'Sir Patrick Spens,' 'The Douglas Tragedy,' and many more of the best Scottish ballads—a paradox endorsed in Masson's Edinburgh Sketches (1892).

Wardlaw, RALPH (1779-1853), born at Dalkeith, settled as Congregationalist pastor in Glasgow, and in 1811 became professor of Theology to his church. He wrote on Socinianism, Ecclesiastes, the Sabbath, Christian Ethics, Prostitution, Miracles, the Atonement, and Independence. See Memoir by Dr W. L. Alexander (1856).

Warham, WILLIAM (c. 1450-1532), Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Church Oakley near Basingstoke, and educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, took orders, but also practised law, and became advocate in the Court of Arches. His services in Burgundy to Henry VII. about Perkin Warbeck obtained for him rapid preferment—Master of the Rolls (1494), Lord Chancellor (1503), Bishop of London (1503), and Primate (1503). In 1515 he had to resign the Great Seal to Wolsey. He was a close friend of the New Learning and its apostles, but had no stomach for fundamental reform, though he agreed to recognise the king's supremacy. See vol. vi. of Hook's Lives of the Archbishops (1868).

Warneck, GUSTAV (1834-1910), born at Naumburg, became pastor near Eisleben (1874), and professor at Halle (1897). Editor of a Missions-Zeitschrift, he wrote many works on missions, those translated being Modern Missions and Culture (1883) and History of Protestant Missions (1884).

Warner, CHARLES DUDLEY (1829-1900), born at Plainfield, Mass., practised law in Chicago till 1860, then settled as an editor at Hartford. In 1884 he became co-editor of Harper's Magazine, in which his papers on the South, Mexico, and the Great West appeared. In 1873 he wrote with 'Mark Twain' The Gilded Age. Other works are My Summer in a Garden (1870), Back-log Studies (1872), Being a Boy (1877), Washington Irving (1881), Captain John Smith (1881), books of travel, such as In the Levant (1893), &c.

Warner, SUSAN (1819-85), born at New York, published under the pen-name of Elizabeth Wetherell The Wide, Wide World (1851), next to Uncle Tom's Cabin the most successful American story. There followed Queechy (1852), The Hills of the Shatenue (1856), The Old Helmet (1863), Melbourne House (1864), Daisy (1868), and A Story of Small Beginnings (1872). Her other works were mostly religious. See Life by her sister (1910).

WARRE, EDMOND, D.D., born in London, 12th February 1837, was educated at Eton and Balliol, Oxford, where he took a first-class in Lit. Hum. and was elected a fellow of All Souls. He became assistant-master at Eton in 1860, head-master in 1884, and provost in 1909. He is C.B. (1905) and C.V.O. (1910).

WARREN, SIR CHARLES, the son of a major-general, was born at Bangor, 17th February 1840, studied at Sandhurst and Woolwich, and entered the Royal Engineers in 1857. He excavated at Jerusalem and surveyed in Palestine for the Palestine Fund (1867-70); delimited Griqualand, commanded in a Kaffir war, and administered there (1876-79); was in the Egyptian campaign (1882); commanded in the Bechuanaland expedition as major-general (1884-5); was Commissioner of Metropolitan Police (1886-88); commanded the troops in the Straits Settlements (1889-94); and was not lucky in the South African war (1899-1900). He has written Underground Jerusalem and other works on his Palestine explorations, and is G.C.M.G., K.C.B., F.R.S., and F.G.S.

WARREN, LEICESTER. See TABLEY.

WARREN, SAMUEL (1807-77), born in Denbighshire, studied medicine and law, was called to the bar, and made a Q.C. (1851), and was Recorder of Hull (1854-74), Conservative M.P. for Midhurst (1856-59), and then Master of Lunacy. He is chiefly remembered by his Passages from the Diary of a Late Physician (1832) and Ten Thousand a Year (1841), the amusing story of 'Tittlebat Titmouse,' both of which appeared first in Blackwood's. Other works were Now and Then (1847), The Lily and the Bee (1851), and several law-books.

WARTON, JOSEPH (1722-1800), born at Dunsfold, Surrey, was the son of the Rev. Thomas Warton (1688-1745), vicar of Basingstoke and Oxford professor of Poetry. In 1740 he passed from Winchester to Oriel, and, rector of Winslade from 1748, returned to Winchester as second master in 1755, and was its head 1766-93. His preferences were a prebend of St Paul's, the living of Thorley, a prebend of Winchester, and the rectories of Easton and Upham. His Odes (1746) marked a reaction from Pope. An edition of Virgil (1753), with translation of the Ecolgues and Georgics, gained him a high reputation. He was, like his brother Thomas, a member of the Literary Club. In 1756 appeared vol. i. of his Essay on Pope (vol. ii. in 1782), with its distinction between the poetry of reason and the poetry of fancy. Later works were editions of Pope (1797) and Dryden. See the panegyrical Memoir by Woolf (1806).—His brother, THOMAS WARTON (1728-90), born at Basingstoke, became in 1751 a fellow of Trinity, Oxford, and in 1757 professor of Poetry. He held also two livings. His Observations on the Faerie Queene (1754) established his reputation; but he is remembered by his History of English Poetry (1774-78-81; ed. by W. C. Hazlitt, 1871). In 1785 he became poet-laureate and Camden professor of History. His miscellaneous writings included burlesque poetry and prose, genial satires on Oxford, an edition of Theocritus, Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Rowley Poems, &c. See Life in Mant's edition of his poems (1802), and Dennis's Studies in English Literature (1876).

WARWICK, RICHARD NEVILLE, EARL OF, the King-maker, eldest son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, was born 22d November 1428. While yet a boy he married the daughter of the Earl of Warwick, and so at twenty-one got the earldom. The Wars of the Roses began with the battle of St Albans (1455), gained for the Yorkists chiefly by Warwick's help. He was rewarded with the captaincy of Calais, and scoured the Channel at his pleasure. In the campaign of 1459 the Yorkists failed owing to their inactivity. The leaders, including Warwick, fled to the coast of Devon, and thence to Calais. Warwick was in England again in 1460, and in July at Northampton the Yorkists gained a complete victory, taking Henry prisoner. Up to this time Warwick's conception of the war was merely the natural struggle of the one party with the other for power; and when the Duke of York made his claim to the throne, Warwick prevailed upon him to waive it till the death of the king. In December 1460 the duke was defeated and slain at Wakefield, and early in 1461 Warwick himself was defeated in the second battle of St Albans. But, with Edward, the Duke of York's son, he marched on London, and proclaimed him as Edward IV. Soon after the Yorkists gained a complete victory at Towton (1461), the Lancastrian cause was lost, and Henry was captured by Warwick and lodged in the Tower. But now Edward, jealous of Warwick, drove him into open revolt, but was himself compelled to flee to Holland, while the King-maker placed Henry once more upon the throne. But ere long Edward returned, and at Barnet routed Warwick, who was surrounded and slain, April 14, 1471. See Oman's study (1891), and the books on Lancaster and York by James Gairdner (1874) and Sir J. Ramsay (1892).

WASHINGTON, BOOKER T., born a negro slave at Hales Ford, Virginia, about 1858, was educated at Hampton Institute, became a teacher and a writer and speaker on negro problems, and in 1881 principal of the Tuskegee Institute for coloured persons, Alabama.

WASHINGTON, GEORGE, was born 22d Feb. 1732, at Bridges Creek, Westmoreland county, Virginia, of English stock from Northamptonshire and Yorkshire. In 1658 his grandfather, John Washington, appeared in Virginia, and soon acquired wealth and position. His second son, Augustine, died while his son George was still a boy, leaving a large family and inadequate means. George seems to have been a good, healthy boy, with a sober-mindedness beyond his years. In 1747 he went to Mount Vernon, the residence of his eldest half-brother, Lawrence, who had received the better part of the Washington property. Here the boy had access to books, and came to know the Fairfaxes, the family of his brother's wife; in 1748 Lord Fairfax employed him to survey his property in the Valley of Virginia. Surveying alternated for a while with hunting; he learned, too, the use of arms, and studied the art of war. In 1751 he accompanied his brother, who was dying of consumption, to the Barbadoes, and at his death next year was left guardian of his only daughter and heir to his estates in the event of her death without issue. The French were at this time connecting their settlements on the Great Lakes with those on the Mississippi by a chain of posts on the Ohio, within the sphere of English influence. Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia determined to warn the intruders off, and his second messenger was Washington. The French, however, paid no attention to these warnings; and an expedition was sent against them, of which Washington was (by the death of his superior early in the campaign) in command. Washington was driven back, shut up in a little fort, and forced to surrender. When an order was issued from headquarters that any field-officer holding a royal commission could command a colonial officer irrespective of rank, Washington resigned; but he was induced to serve on the personal staff of Braddock (q.v.), and saved the remnant of the van of Braddock's army. He was then placed at the head of the Virginia forces, on satisfactory terms as to rank (1756). For the remainder of the war he did what he could, giving advice (seldom followed) to English generals, and extorting supplies from a reluctant legislature. In 1758 he fell in love with a rich young widow, Martha Custis (1732-1802), whom he married in 1759. His niece was now dead, and the conjoint estates of Mount Vernon and of the widow Custis made him one of the richest men in the land. He kept open house, entertained liberally, led the hunting, and produced honest grain and tobacco. He represented his county in the House of Burgesses, and acted as vestryman of his parish.

On the quarrel with the mother-country (1765-70) he favoured peaceful measures first, and was thus one of the leaders in the anti-importation movements; but he soon became convinced that nothing save force would secure to his countrymen their rights. He represented Virginia in the First and Second Continental Congresses, and at once took a leading part. He was neither orator nor writer, but in rude common-sense and in the management of affairs he excelled. He was the one American soldier of national reputation, and was the inevitable commander-in-chief. He had remarkable powers as a strategist and tactician, but was pre-eminent as a leader of men. It was this dignified, well-dressed gentleman who took command of the New England farmers and mechanics assembled at Cambridge in the summer of 1775. It seems scarcely credible that these half-disciplined, half-armed men should have held cooped up in Boston a thoroughly-disciplined and well-equipped army; the retreat from Concord and the slaughter at Bunker Hill were largely due to the incompetence of the English commander. The only really able English commander was Cornwallis, and he was hampered by the stupidity of his superior. But an able man would not have allowed Washington to save his army in the autumn of 1776, and would have made such a crushing campaign as that of Trenton impossible. Washington, judging his opponents correctly, undertook movements which under other circumstances should have cost him his army—that army which, owing to short enlistments, was always crumbling to pieces, and whose very necessities of life were sometimes unattainable. The end of the war came, and the army desired to make him ruler. His own wish was to lead his fellow-countrymen into orderly government out of confusion and chaos, but he had fought the great war to secure their rights, not for his own aggrandisement: he retired to Mount Vernon, and sought to secure a strong government by constitutional means. In 1787 he presided over the convention of delegates from twelve states at Philadelphia which formulated the constitution; and the government under this constitution began in 1789 with Washington as first chief-magistrate or president. Unlike the old, the new administration was a strong consolidated government. Parties were formed, led by Washington's two most trusted advisers, Jefferson and Hamilton. At the outset Washington sought to enlist on the side of the new government the ablest men in the country, whether they had approved or disapproved the precise form of the constitution. As time went on, however, it became evident that those desiring greater liberty for the individual would no longer be content with passive opposition. A strong party sprang into life, and began a campaign which has never been surpassed for personal abuse and violence. Stung by their taunts, Washington lost his faith in American institutions, went over heart and soul to the Federalist party, and even doubted whether Republicans should be admitted into the army. The election which occurred soon after turned the government over to the care of Jefferson and the party which abetted what Washington regarded as 'nefarious views.' He did not live to see how wholly in the wrong he was, as he died (childless) at Mount Vernon on the Potomac, 14th December 1799. In Washington's life and work his Americanism stands forth; when those about him were provincials he was an American. He thought America should stand aloof from the conflicts of Europe, and he inaugurated a policy of neutrality which remained the policy of the country. For Washington's writings, see Winsor's History of America, vol. viii. Many were published, with a Life, by Marshall (1804; 3d ed. of the Life, 1832); and a new edition of his complete works was published by Worthington C. Ford (14 vols. 1888-93). See also Life by Washington Irving (1855-59; abridged by John Fiske, 1888); Lives by Redding (1835) and Edmonds (1839); A. Bancroft's essay (new ed. 1851); a German Life by Venedey (1862); and books about him by H. C. Lodge (1889), Frederic Harrison (1901), Norman Hapgood (1902), and J. A. Harrison (1906).

Waterford, LOUISA, MARCHIONESS OF (1818-91), is ranked by G. F. Watts as one of the greatest real artists of our time in virtue of her pictures ('Spring,' 'Christmas,' 'The Miracle of Healing the Two Blind Men') at Ford Castle, Northumberland, and her book-illustrations. She was the daughter of Lord Stuart de Rothesay and the sister of Lady Canning, and married in 1842 the third Marquis of Waterford (1813-49). See A. J. C. Hare's Two Noble Lives (1893).

Waterhouse, ALFRED, LL.D. (1830-1905), architect, was born at Liverpool, and became successively A.R.A. in 1878, R.A. in 1885. Among his works are the Manchester town-hall and assize courts, Owens College, Girton College, the new Natural History Museum at South Kensington, several London clubs, the new St Paul's School, and alterations on some of the Oxford colleges.

Waterhouse, JOHN WILLIAM, born in Rome in 1849, became A.R.A. in 1885 and R.A. in 1895. Among his pictures are 'Marianne' (1887), 'Ulysses and the Sirens' (1892), 'Circe Invidiosa' (1892), and 'The Lady of Shalott' (1894).

Waterland, DANIEL (1683-1740), born at Waseley rectory in Lincolnshire, became in 1704 a fellow of Magdalen, Cambridge, in 1727 canon of Windsor, in 1730 archdeacon of Middlesex and vicar of Twickenham. He wrote two Vindications of Christ's divinity (1719-23), and the Further Defence (1725), Critical History of the Arianian Creed (1724), Doctrine of the Eucharist (1737), and Scripture Vindicated (1734). Bishop Van Mildert edited his works, with Memoir (11 vols. 1823-28).

Waterlow, SIR ERNEST ALBERT, knighted 1902, was born in London, 24th May 1850, and became A.R.A. (1890), R.A. (1903), and P.R.S.W.

Waterton, CHARLES (1782-1865), naturalist, born at Walton Hill near Wakefield, and educated at Stonyhurst, was in America in 1804-24. His Wanderings in South America (6th ed. 1866) was re-edited by J. G. Wood, as in 1879 was his Natural History Essays (1838-57), with Life by Moore.

Watkin, Sir Edward William (1819-1901), born at Salford, was employed in his father's counting-house till 1845, when he became secretary to the Trent Valley Railway; thereafter he was director or manager of railways, especially of the South-Eastern. In 1864 he entered parliament. He did much to secure parks for the people (e.g. in Manchester), and was made a baronet in 1880. He strenuously promoted the Channel Tunnel.

Watson, John. See MACLAREN, IAN.

Watson, John Dawson (1832-92), painter, was a Yorkshireman, trained partly at Manchester and partly at the Royal Academy. He was a conspicuous member of the Society of Painters in Water-colour and an attractive designer and draughtsman. His illustrations to The Pilgrim's Progress and Robinson Crusoe are well known.

Watson, Richard (1737-1816), born at Hever-sham in Westmorland, became a fellow of Trinity, Cambridge (1760), professor of Chemistry (1764), regius professor of Divinity (1771), a prebendary and archdeacon of Ely, rector of Northwold in Norfolk and Knaptoft in Leicestershire, and in 1782 Bishop of Llandaff, retaining his other preferments on account of the poverty of the see. He visited his diocese but rarely, giving his mind rather to farming and planting at Calgarth Park on Windernere; and he introduced the larch to that district, for which Wordsworth did not thank him. A Liberal in politics and theology, he advocated equalisation of bishoprics, and maintained the right of the Prince of Wales to the regency in 1788. Besides essays, charges, &c., he published a famous Apology for Christianity in answer to Gibbon (1776), and an Apology for the Bible (1796), in reply to Paine. See his egotistic Anecdotes of the Life of Richard Watson (1817).

Watson, Robert (1746-1838), born at Elgin, fought for American independence, took his M.D. in Scotland, and was Lord George Gordon's secretary, president of the revolutionary Corresponding Society, state prisoner for two years in Newgate, Napoleon's tutor in English, and president of the Scottish College at Paris. He unearthed the Stuart papers at Rome, and ended by strangling himself in a London tavern. See Bishop Forbes in Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. for Dec. 1867.

Watson, William, poet, born, the son of a Wharfedale farmer, 2d August 1858, published The Prince's Quest (1880) and Epigrams of Art, Life, and Nature (1884), but first attracted notice by Wordsworth's Grave (1890). Odes and other Poems followed in 1894, The Father of the Forest in 1895, The Purple East (sonnets on the Armenian atrocities), the coronation ode (1902), For England, Sable and Purple, The Hope of the World.

Watson, William (Lord Watson), born at Covington manse in Lanarkshire in 1828, became advocate, Lord Advocate (1876-80), Conservative M.P. for Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities, and a Lord of Appeal (1880). He died in 1899.

Watt, James, born at Greenock, 19th Jan. 1736, the son of a merchant and town-councillor, came to Glasgow in 1754 to learn the trade of a mathematical instrument maker, and there, after a twelvemonth in London, set up in business. The hammermen's guild put difficulties in his way, but the university made him its mathematical instrument maker 1757-63. He was employed on surveys for the Forth and Clyde Canal (1767), the Caledonian and other canals; in the improvement of the harbours of Ayr, Port-Glasgow, and Greenock; and in the deepening of the Forth, Clyde, and other rivers. As early as 1759 his attention had been directed to steam as a motive-force, and in 1761-62 he made a series of experiments with a Papin's Digester. In 1763-64 a working model of the Newcomen engine from a college class-room was sent for repair. He easily put it into order, and, seeing the defects of the machine, hit upon the expedient of the separate condenser. Other improvements were the air-pump, steam-jacket for cylinder, double-acting engine, &c. He entered into a partnership with Matthew Boulton of Soho near Birmingham in 1774, when (under a patent of 1769) the manufacture of the new engine was commenced at the Soho Ironworks. Watt's soon superseded Newcomen's machine as a pumping-engine; and between 1781 and 1785 he obtained patents for the sun and planet motion, the expansion principle, the double engine, the parallel motion, a smokeless furnace, and the governor. He described a steam-locomotive in one of his patents (1784). He also invented a letter-copying press, a machine for copying sculpture, &c. Watt's claims to be the first discoverer of the composition of water were long maintained; see CAVENDISH (HENRY). He retired from business in 1800, and died at Heathfield Hall, his seat near Birmingham, 19th August 1819. He is buried in Handsworth Church, Birmingham. See two works by Muirhead (1854-59) and Smiles's Boulton and Watt.

Watt, Robert (1774-1819), born a small farmer's son, near Stewarton in Ayrshire, became a distinguished physician, accoucheur, and lecturer at Glasgow. He wrote on diabetes, consumption, and hooping-cough, and Rules of Life, but is known for his great Bibliotheca Britannica (4 vols. 1824).

Watteau, Antoine (1684-1721), born at Valenciennes, in 1702 came to Paris, in 1711 became a student at the Academy, and in 1717 a member. Always in ill-health, in 1718 he visited England to consult Dr Mead. A master of the Rococo age, he painted chiefly small landscapes, with a Fête Galante going on—mock-pastoral idyls in court-dress. The largest collection of Watteaus—that made by Frederick the Great—belongs to the German emperor; and many are in the hands of English collectors. See Catalogue raisonné by De Goncourt (1875), and monographs by Cellier (1867), Mollet (1883), Vollbeh (1885), Hannover (1888), Dargenty (1891), Mantz, Claude Phillips, Edgcombe Staley (1903), and Maucclair (trans. 1906). [Fr. pron. Vaal-to'.]

Watts, Alaric (1797-1864), born in London, was an usher at Fulham and Runcorn, and an editor at Leeds and Manchester; married in 1821 the Quakeress, Priscilla Wiffen (1800-73), sister of the Spanish scholars; founded the United Service Gazette (1833); and made a hit by his annual, the Literary Souvenir (1824-37). Latterly he was less successful. One piece alone in his two volumes of poetry is remembered—the alliterative jeu d'esprit, 'An Austrian army awfully arrayed,' &c. See Life by his son (1844).

Watts, George Frederick (O.M., 1902), born in London, Feb. 23, 1817, sent his first picture to the Academy in 1837, then during a three years' sojourn in Italy formed his style after the Venetian masters. He attracted notice by his Westminster Hall cartoon of 'Caractacus' in 1843, and again by pictures of 'Echo' and 'King Alfred' in 1847. A poet-painter, remarkable for his individuality, dignity, splendid coloration, and purity of atmosphere, he has painted noble portraits, fine landscapes, and historical pictures, but is best known by his magnificent moralities, emblems of profound and subtle import. Among his paintings are 'Paolo and Francesca' (1848), 'Fata Morgana' (1848), 'Love and Death' (1877), 'Watchman, what of the Night?' (1880), 'Hope' (1886), 'Ariadne' (1890), 'Sic Transit' (1892), 'The Infancy of Jupiter' (1896), and 'Love Triumphant' (1898). In 1894 he presented portraits of Carlyle, Browning, Manning, Matthew Arnold, Tennyson, &c. to the nation (now in the Tate Gallery). He declined a baronetcy in 1885, and died 1st July 1904. There are books on him by Macmillan (1903), Pantini (1904), G. K. Chesterton (1905), and Mrs R. Barrington (1905).

Watts, HENRY (1815-84), born in London, became demonstrator of chemistry at University College, and is best known by his Dictionary of Chemistry, based on Ure's (1863-68; supplements, 1872-75-81; revised by Morley and Muir, 1889-94).

Watts, ISAAC, hymn-writer and divine, was born 17th July 1674 at Southampton, where his father kept a boarding-school and wrote poetry. At sixteen he was sent to an academy in London, in 1696 became tutor in a family, and in 1702 succeeded an Independent minister in Mark Lane, becoming eminent as a preacher. In 1712 he was prostrated by illness; and a visit paid to Sir Thomas Abney at Theobalds for change of air resulted in his domestication there till his death, 25th November 1748. He was made D.D. by Edinburgh in 1728. Watts's theology was marked by uncommon charity and catholicity; but his many theological works are forgotten, like his Logic, which once was a text-book at Oxford. But his Divine and Moral Songs for Children (1715), in spite of many a metrical defect and much hopeless prose, show strength, sanity, and simplicity. His Horae Lyricae (1706), Hymns and Spiritual Songs (1708-9), and Psalms of David Imitated (1719) contain nearly 500 hymns, including such cherished treasures of devotion as 'There is a land of pure delight,' 'Jesus shall reign where'er the sun,' 'When I survey the wondrous cross,' and 'O God, our help in ages past.' See Lives by Dr Gibbons, Dr Johnson, Southey, Milner (1834), and E. Paxton Hood (1875).

Watts-Dunton, THEODORE, poet and critic, was born in 1832 at St Ives in Huntingdonshire, the son of a solicitor and naturalist, a pre-Darwinian evolutionist. To the name Walter Theodore Watts he added his mother's name, Dunton, in 1896. He received at Cambridge a somewhat elaborate private education, and in London became the centre of a very remarkable literary and artistic company. The intimate friend of Rossetti, William Morris, and Swinburne, he came to exercise a most important influence on the art and culture of the day. He became in later years intimate with Tennyson, and contributed reminiscences of him to the Life by the poet's son. But although he has written enough to fill many volumes—in the Examiner, Ward's English Poets, the Athenaeum (1876-98), the Encyclopædia Britannica, Chambers's Encyclopædia, the Nineteenth Century, the Fortnightly Review, the Magazine of Art, &c.—he has not yet collected his essays. His best-known poem is 'Natura Benigna,' in which is depicted the Romany girl, Rhona Boswell. In 1897 he published the 'Jubilee Greeting at Spithhead to the Men of Greater Britain,' a poem which had a very marked vogue in Great Britain and the colonies, and greatly widened his reputation. The same year he brought out The Coming of Love, a selection from such poems as had appeared in journals during the last twenty years. In 1898 appeared Aylwin, a brilliant romance of art and Gypsysdom. The chief note of his poetry is its individuality, the sources of its inspiration Nature and himself. His essays—literary mainly, but ranging also over folklore, ethnology, science generally—are marked as much by their independence and originality as by their suggestiveness, harmony, incisive vigour, and depth of insight. See works cited at Rossetti, and a book on him by James Douglas (1904).

Waugh, EDWIN, the Lancashire poet, born Jan. 29, 1817, at Rochdale, was apprenticed to a local printer and bookseller, but devoted himself to literature, living near Manchester. His first sketches of Lancashire life appeared in the Manchester Examiner. Among his numerous prose writings are his Factory Folk during the Cotton Famine, the Besom Ben Stories, The Chimney Corner (a series of exquisite village idylls), and the admirable descriptions of natural scenery in his Tufts of Heather, Irish Sketches, and Rambles in the Lake Country. His dialect-songs in periodicals, first collected in 1859 as Lancashire Songs, won the hearts of his countrymen by their power, pathos, and kindly humour. He died 30th April 1890. There is an edition of his works, with memoir, by G. Milner (8 vols. 1892-93). [Wau.] Waurin, JEAN DE, an old English chronicler, whose work, embracing the period from the first fabled settlement in Britain to 1471, was edited by Sir William and Mr E. Hardy (Rolls series, 1864-91). Vols. i.-iii. were translated 1864-91.

Wauters, ÉMILE, Belgian historical painter, was born at Brussels in 1846. [Wout'ers.]

Wayne, ANTHONY (1745-96), born at Easttown, Pa., raised in 1776 a volunteer regiment, and in Canada covered the retreat of the provincial forces at Three Rivers. He commanded at Ticonderoga until 1777, when he joined Washington in New Jersey. He fought bravely at Brandywine; led the attack at Germantown; captured supplies for the army at Valley Forge; carried Stony Point; and saved Lafayette in Virginia (1781). In 1793 he led an expedition against the Indians.

Webb, SIDNEY, born in London in 1859, held a post in the Civil Service, served in the London County Council, became a lecturer on economics, and wrote on Socialism in England. With his wife, who as Miss Beatrice Potter had made a name for herself as writer on co-operation and the Factory Acts, he wrote the history of trade-unionism, of liquor-licensing, and of English local government, and argued for the break-up of the poor-law.

Weaver, RICHARD (1827-96), revivalist, was born, the son of a collier, at Asterley in Shropshire, and originally followed his father's trade.

Weber, CARL MARIA FRIEDRICH ERNST VON, composer, was born of a noble but impoverished Austrian family, at Eutin near Lübeck, 18th Dec. 1786. Soon after his father with his wife (a singer) and boy began to wander from town to town at the head of a small dramatic company. As soon as he could sit at the piano the boy was plied with music lessons; but his serious training began in 1796. Portions of his second opera, Das Waldmädchen, produced at Freiberg before he was fourteen, he afterwards incorporated in Silvana. At Vienna in 1803 he was warmly welcomed as a pupil by the Abt Vogler, who obtained for him the conductorship of the opera at Breslau, where he gave evidence of rare talent for organisation. In 1806 he became secretary to a brother of the king of Württemberg, ran into debt and dissipation, was through his thriftless old father's fault charged with embezzlement, and with his father ordered to quit the country (February 1810). The next twelve months he spent at Mannheim and Darmstadt, composing the operetta Abu Hassan; at Munich in 1811 he was writing concertos. In 1813 he settled at Prague as opera kapellmeister, and about this time composed ten patriotic songs and the cantata Kampf und Sieg. In 1816 he was invited by the king of Saxony to direct the German opera at Dresden, superseding Italian opera. In 1817 he married Carolina Brandt, the famous singer. In 1818 he wrote his Mass in E flat and the Jubel cantata and overture, in 1819 the Mass in G for the royal golden wedding. Der Freischütz was completed in May 1820, and produced with great success at Berlin. His next opera, Euryanthe, was produced at Vienna in 1823; its comparative failure occasioned a long period of depression, from which he roused himself only to write his final masterpiece, Oberon, undertaken at the request of Charles Kemble for Covent Garden Theatre. March 1826 saw Weber in London, and the first performance of Oberon was the crowning triumph of his life. During the next few weeks he conducted frequently at the theatre and played at many concerts. Such labour proved too much for his exhausted frame. He died June 4, and was buried at St Mary's, Moorfields, whence in 1844 his remains were removed to Dresden. As founder of German romantic opera, Weber was the forerunner of Wagner. Other works were the music to Preciosa, an overture, two symphonies, three concertos, sonatas, &c., as well as scenes, cantatas, and songs. See Spitta in Grove's Dictionary, Sir Julius Benedict ('Great Musicians,' 1881), and German works by Jähns (1871-73) and Reissmann (1882). [Vayber.]

Weber, ERNST HEINRICH (1795-1878), from 1818 professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Leipzig, made important researches on the senses. —WILHELM EDUARD WEBER (1804-91), his brother, from 1831 professor of Physics at Göttingen, was one of the seven professors deposed in 1837 for their protest against the king's revocation of the liberal constitution. He was associated with Gauss in his researches on electricity and magnetism. See monograph by Riecke (1892).

Weber, GEORG (1808-88), director of the Bürger-schule in Heidelberg, wrote on Calvinism in Germany, the Reformation in England, the Reformation period, the history of Israel, the origin of Christianity, the history of literature, &c. He is best known by his Manual of Universal History (20th ed. 2 vols. 1888) and his Universal History (15 vols. 1857-80; 2d ed. 1882-90).

Webster, AUGUSTA (1837-94), poetess, the daughter of Vice-admiral Davies, was born at Poole, and in 1863 married Mr Thomas Webster, solicitor and fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. She wrote for the Examiner, and published translations of Prometheus Vinculus and Medea (1866), Dramatic Studies (1866), Portraits (1870), A Book of Rhyme (1881), and the dramas The Auspicious Day (1874) and The Sentence (1887).

Webster, DANIEL, born, a farmer's son, at Salisbury, N.H., 18th January 1782, studied at Dartmouth, Salisbury, and Boston, was admitted to the bar in 1805, and was sent to congress in 1813. Settling in Boston as an advocate in 1816, he distinguished himself in the Dartmouth College case, and as an orator became famous by his oration on the bicentenary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. Returning to congress in December 1823 as a Massachusetts representative he found few rivals there; in 1827 he was transferred to the senate. He had favoured free trade, but in 1828 he adopted Clay's 'American system,' and vigorously defended the new protective tariff. His whole career was marked by a deep reverence for established institutions and accomplished facts, and for the principle of nationality. The Whig party triumphed in 1840, and Webster was called into Harrison's Cabinet as Secretary of State; under Tyler he negotiated the Ashburton treaty with Great Britain, but resigned in May 1843. In 1844 he refused his party's nomination for president and supported Clay. Again in the senate, he helped to avert a war with England over the north-west boundary (1845); he opposed, too, the war with Mexico. In 1850 he said that he abhorred slavery, but was unwilling to break up the Union to abolish it. Careless in money matters, he accepted pecuniary assistance from political friends; but he repelled a charge of corruption (1866). Under Fillmore he was called to his former post as Secretary of State to settle differences with England. He was deeply disappointed at not receiving the Whig nomination for the presidency in 1852; on 24th Oct. of that year he died at Marshfield, his Massachusetts home. Daniel Webster was unquestionably the greatest of American orators. Though an able statesman, he showed too great deference to established institutions. Had his conscience matched his intellect he would have taken a nobler position on the slavery question, and might have attained the first rank among American statesmen. His speeches were published in 1851; his Private Correspondence in 1857. See Lives by G. T. Curtis (1869), Lodge (1884), and Brooks (1893); and Fisher's True Daniel Webster (1912).

Webster, JOHN, was writing for the stage between 1602 and 1624; is described on the title-page of one of his works as merchant-taylor; and was long supposed, on no sufficient authority, to have been at one time clerk of St Andrews, Holborn. In Lady Jane and The Two Harpies (both lost) he was the collaborator of Dekker, Drayton, Chettle, and others. In 1604 he made some additions to The Malcontent of Marston. In 1607 were printed The History of Sir Thomas Wyatt, a tragedy, and two comedies, Westward Ho and Northward Ho, all three the joint work of Webster and Dekker. With The White Devil (1612) Webster entered his kingdom. The Duchess of Malfi (1623) is a yet more supreme achievement. Appius and Claudius (first published 1654) is cold compared with these; The Devil's Law Case (1623) is largely disagreeable and sordid. An ode on the death of Prince Henry, with other fragments of verse, makes up the sum of Webster's writings. In 1624 a tragedy (now lost) on 'the recent murder of the son upon his mother, written by Forde and Webster,' was licensed. Not popular in his own day, Webster, in Mr Swinburne's happy phrase, 'found his first recognition at the pious and fortunate hands of Charles Lamb.' Since then his name has been claimed as the next in tragic art to Shakespeare's. Webster's works were collected by Dyce (1830), next by Hazlitt (1857-58). See also Swinburne's essay, and Stoll, John Webster (vol. i. 1905).

Webster, NOAH, lexicographer, born in Hartford, Conn., 16th Oct. 1758, graduated at Yale in 1778, and, after a spell as teacher, was admitted to the bar in 1781. But he soon resumed teaching, and made a great hit with a spelling-book. Political articles and pamphlets, lecturing, a few years' practice of law, and journalism at New York occupied him till 1798, when he retired to a life of literary labour at New Haven. He published an English Grammar (1807) and the famous American Dictionary of the English Language (1828; often re-edited, as by Noah Porter in 1890. He died 28th May 1843. See Life by Scudder (1882).

Webster, SIR RICHARD EVERARD, born 22d December 1842 at Swineshead Abbey, Lincolnshire, studied at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, became Attorney-general in 1885, and Lord Chief Justice, as Lord Alverstone, in 1900.

Wedderburn, ALEXANDER (1733-1805), Lord Chancellor, ennobled as Lord Loughborough and Earl of Rosslyn, was born in Edinburgh, the son of a Scottish judge. He passed as advocate, but was called to the English bar in 1757, entered parliament in 1762, took part in the Douglas case, and in 1771 left the Opposition to become Lord North's Solicitor-general. He supported the American war policy, and was made Chief-justice as Lord Loughborough (1780); but in 1784, disappointed of the Chancellorship, passed over to Fox. He next made friends with Pitt, and was made Chancellor (1793), but played him false. Addington gave him his earldom in 1801.

Wedgwood, JOSIAH, potter, born at Burslem, 12th July 1730, in 1763 took out a patent for a beautiful cream-coloured porcelain or Queen's ware. He busied himself in emulating the grace of the antique models; and the sculptor Flaxman was from 1775 employed to furnish designs for 'Wedgwood ware.' Thus he raised English pottery into a fine art, and at Etruria near Burslem amassed a fortune of half a million. It was mainly through his influence that the Grand Trunk Canal, uniting the Mersey, the Trent, and the Severn, was carried out. An F.R.S. and F.S.A., he died 3d January 1795. See Jewitt, The Wedgwoods (1865); the Life by Eliza Meteyard (1860); three other works by her (1872-73); and Mr Gladstone's Gleanings (1879).

Wedmore, SIR FREDERICK, art critic, born at Clifton, 9th July 1844, was educated mainly at Lausanne and Paris, and has published, besides Studies in English Art (1876-80), The Masters of Genre Painting (1879), and books on etching, on Balzac, on Meryon, on Whistler, and others.

Weed, THURLOW (1797-1882), born at Cairo, N.Y., served in the war of 1812, and in 1830 founded the Albany Evening Journal, a Republican paper, which he controlled for thirty-five years; in 1867-68 he edited the New York Commercial Advertiser. He was a leading party manager. See Autobiography (1882-84).

Weever, JOHN (1576-1632), author of Ancient Funerary Monuments (1631); 3d ed. by Tooke, 1767), was born in Lancashire, studied at Queen's College, Cambridge, and died in London.

Wegscheider, JULIUS AUGUST LUDWIG (1771-1849), a Halle rationalistic professor of Theology.

Well, GUSTAV (1808-89), from 1838 librarian and from 1861 professor of Oriental Languages at Heidelberg, wrote a Life of Mohammed from Arabic sources (1843), with histories of the califs (1846-62) and Islamic peoples (1866). [Vile.]

Weir, HARRISON WILLIAM, painter, illustrator, and wood-engraver, known for his drawings of animals, was born at Lewes in 1824, and died in 1906.

Weismann, AUGUST, biologist, born 17th January 1834 at Frankfort, the son of a teacher of classics, studied medicine at Göttingen, lectured at Freiburg, and in 1867 became professor of Zoology there. His first work was on the Develop- ment of the Diptera. In 1868-76 appeared a series of papers, translated in 1882 as Studies in the Theory of Descent. His Essays upon Heredity and Kindred Biological Problems (trans. 1889-92) raised a great controversy by denying that characters acquired by the individual are transmitted to offspring. He contends that natural selection is the dominant factor, and that use and disuse of parts and the action of the environment count for little or nothing. He has published, besides The Evolution Theory in 1904, a dozen works on cognate problems and on Darwin and his life-work (1909). [Vice-man.]

Weiss, BERNHARD, born at Königsberg, 20th June 1827, became professor there, at Kiel, and at Berlin (1877), and consistorialrat. His chief works are Biblical Theology of the New Testament (1868; 6th ed. 1895; trans. 1883); Introduction to the N.T. (1887; trans. 1887-88); and A Life of Jesus (1882; trans. 1884), in defence of the faith against assailants. To him we owe new editions of Meyer's N. T. commentaries. [Vice.]

Weltbrecht, GOTTLIB FRIEDRICH, born at Culm, 4th June 1840, became professor at Erlangen, and wrote a Life of Christ, and on faith, morals, &c. [Vite-brecht.]

Weizsäcker, KARL (1822-99), born at Oehringen near Heilbronn, succeeded Baur at Tübingen (1861), and wrote on the gospel history (1864), the Apostolic Age (1886-89), the Epistle of Barnabas (1863), &c., with a new translation of the New Testament (1875). — His brother, JULIUS WEIZSÄCKER (1828-89), historian, filled chairs at Erlangen (1864), Tübingen (1867), Strasbourg (1872), Göttingen (1876), and Berlin (1881). He had written on the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, when in 1860 he was called to edit the Deutsche Reichstagsakten. [Vites-saick-er.]

Welch, JOHN. See WELSH.

Welcker, FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB (1784-1868), born in Hesse-Darmstadt, filled a chair at Giessen, fought against the French 1814, was next professor at Göttingen, and finally (1819) at Bonn. He wrote on Æschylus, Greek tragedy, the Homeric cycle, and Greek mythology. See Life by Kekulé (1880). — His brother, KARL THEODOR (1790-1869), Liberal politician, filled chairs at Kiel, Heidelberg, Bonn, and Freiburg, and edited with Rotteck the Staatslexikon (1834-44). [Vel-ker.]

Weldon, JAMES EDWARD, born in 1854, son of the head-master of Tunbridge School, studied at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, where, coming out senior classic in 1877, he was fellow and tutor. Taking orders, in 1883 he became Master of Dulwich College, in 1885 head-master of Harrow, Bishop of Calcutta (1898-1902), Canon of Westminster, and Dean of Manchester (1906). He has translated from Aristotle, and published a story (Gerald Everstep's Friendship) and sermons.

Wellesley, RICHARD COWLEY WELLESLEY, MARQUIS, was born in Dublin, June 20, 1760. On the death of his father, the first Earl of Mornington (1735-81), he took his seat in the Irish House of Peers, and in 1784 was returned to Westminster. He supported Pitt's policy and Wilberforce's efforts to abolish the slave-trade, and in 1786 became a Lord of the Treasury. In 1797 he was made Governor-general of India and Baron Wellesley in the peerage of England. Under him (1797-1805) the revenue of the company was raised from seven to fifteen millions, and the foundations of British India were securely laid. He cleared the French out of the Peninsula, and in 1799 crushed Tippoo Saib; being made

Marquis Wellesley, and receiving the thanks of parliament. The Marhattas were overcome by him and his younger brother, afterwards Duke of Wellington. In 1808 he was ambassador to Madrid, and on his return was made Foreign Minister (1809-12) and K.G. He became Lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1821 and 1833. He died Sept. 26, 1842. See the Memoirs edited by Pearce (1846); the Despatches, &c., edited by Montgomery Martin (1840); and study by Malleison (1889). [Wells-ty.]

Wellhausen, JULIUS, Old Testament scholar, was born at Hameln, 17th May 1844, and became professor at Greifswald (1872), Halle (1882), Marburg (1885), and Göttingen (1892); known by his uncompromising carrying out of the views of Graf and Kuenen on Old Testament history. His books are Der Text der Bücher Samuelis (1872), Die Pharisäer und die Sadduceer (1874), Geschichte Israels (vol. i. 1878, rewritten as Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels, 1883; trans. 1885), Skizzen und Vorarbeiten (1884-92), Muhammed in Medina (1882), Die Komposition des Hexateuchs (1889), and Die Israeliten und Jüdische Geschichte (1894-95). He also edited the 4th and 5th editions of Bleek's Einleitung in das A. T. (1878, 1886). [Vell-how'zen.]

Wellington, ARTHUR WELLESLEY, DUKE OF, third of the four sons who reached man's estate of the first Earl of Mornington, was born 29th April 1769, probably at Mornington House, 24 Upper Merrion Street, Dublin, and not at Dangan Castle in Meath. He studied (without distinction) at Chelsea, Eton, and a French military school at Angers. In 1787 he received a commission as ensign in the 73d Foot, soon became lieutenant in the 76th, then in the 41st, and then in the 12th Light Dragoons. From captain in the 55th Foot, he went in 1792 to the 18th Light Dragoons. Then, being promoted into the 33d Foot as major, he purchased the lieutenant-colonelcy in 1793. In the meantime he had served as aide-de-camp to two viceroys of Ireland, and entered parliament for Trim. With his regiment Arthur Wesley (as he signed himself till 1798) joined the Duke of York, then retreating from Oudenarde (1794); and he showed brilliant skill in the defence of Abercrombie's brigade in the retreat from Boxtel. So great was his disgust at the way this expedition had been mismanaged that he applied for civil employment. He was, however, sent to the East Indies, and landed with his regiment at Calcutta in 1797. Next year his brother came out as governor-general. Bonaparte was then in Egypt, threatening to attack India, and Tipoo, sultan of Mysore, was coquetting with the French. Wellesley was despatched against Tipoo. In 1799 General Harris took command. Wellesley, in command of the left brigade, contributed mainly to the rout of Tipoo near Malvalli; had a share in the capture of Seringapatam; and took command of the place after its capture. In administering affairs and restoring order he showed great capacity; next (1799) he was appointed to command in Mysore, and in 1802 was promoted major-general. In the war with Sindhia and Holkar he commanded a force some 10,000 strong, with which he entered Poona, the Marhatta capital (1803). At Assaye in August he routed the combined forces of Sindhia and the rajah of Berar; in December he finished the campaign and broke the Marhatta power by the victory of Argaum. Now Sir Arthur Wellesley, K.B., he returned home in 1805, in 1806 entered parliament for Rye, and in 1807 was appointed Irish Secretary, but was sent to Copenhagen and drove the Danes out of Zealand. Despatched to the relief of Portugal, in August 1808 he defeated Junot at Rolica. On the 21st he again defeated the French at Vimiera, but was superseded by Sir Harry Burrard, who, contrary to Wellesley's advice, concluded the Convention of Cintra, which saved the French from capitulation. Wellesley resumed his Irish duties; but after the failure of Sir John Moore's campaign he was given the chief command in the Peninsula, and landed at Lisbon in April 1809. Then began that marvellous display of generalship, foresight, and tenacity which, ending in the expulsion of the French from Spain and the capture of Toulouse (1814), is known as the Peninsular war. He was made Lieutenant-general and G.C.B. (1808); Baron Douro, Viscount Wellington, Earl of Wellington, and Marquis; Field-marshal (1813); and Marquis Douro, Duke of Wellington, and K.G. (1814). He was also made Duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, Maguete of Portugal, and Grandee of the first class in Spain; Duke of Vittoria, Marquis of Torres Vedras, and Count Vimiera in Portugal; and received all the most distinguished foreign orders, including the Golden Fleece. A committee from the House of Commons presented the thanks of that assembly, and on 1st July 1814 he thanked it for a grant of £400,000. Ambassador to Paris until 1815, he then took Castlereagh's place at the Vienna Congress. When Napoleon quitted Elba, Wellington took command of the army in the Netherlands, arriving in Brussels on 4th April. By the end of May he had collected 150,000 men—British, Hanoverians, Brunswickers, Nassauers, and Dutch-Belgians—of whom only about one-third was available for field-service; but Blücher with 116,000 Prussians was ready to act in communication with him. On the 16th June Napoleon defeated Blücher at Ligny, whilst Ney was defeated by Wellington at Quatre Bras. But, owing to the defeat of Blücher, Wellington was compelled, in order to keep in communication with him, to fall back on Waterloo, where the French were totally routed on the 18th June. Wellington was now created Prince of Waterloo, and the estate of Strathfieldsays in Hampshire was presented to him by the nation; in Paris he held a most important position as commander-in-chief of the joint army of occupation. Returning to England in 1818, he joined Lord Liverpool's Cabinet as Master-general of the Ordnance. In 1826 he was made Constable of the Tower, and in 1827 Commander-in-chief. He represented Great Britain at the Congress of Verona. As a member of Lord Liverpool's administration he agreed to the St Petersburg protocol (1827), urging upon Turkey the Greek claim to autonomy, but without threats of intervention. On Canning's going beyond this he withdrew from the Cabinet, resigning the offices of Master-general of Ordnance and Commander-in-chief. Canning then concluded the treaty of London, binding France, England, and Russia to enforce the protocol. On the death of Canning in August 1827, and the fall of Goderich's Cabinet in January following, the duke became prime-minister. He disappointed the Tories by advising the Lords not to oppose the Test and Corporation Acts, and by a quarrel with Huskisson lost his support and that of all the Liberal members of his Cabinet. Becoming, with Peel, convinced that Catholic emancipation was necessary, he brought in a bill to grant it in 1829. He incurred thereby much odium; and the Earl of Winchilsea accused him of a design to introduce Popery. The duke thereupon called him out, and a bloodless duel was fought in Battersea Fields—his first and only one. Wellington failed to work harmoniously with his colleagues. By withdrawing, after Navarino, from intervention in the East, he lost the power of moderating Russian influence there. In Portugal he was favourable to Dom Miguel and the absolutists; and generally he showed little sympathy with national causes. He declared against parliamentary reform in 1830, and thus brought about the fall of his government, becoming so unpopular that the mob hooted him on the anniversary of Waterloo, and broke the windows of Apsley House. Again called upon by William IV. in 1834 to form a Cabinet, he recommended Peel as prime-minister, reserving for himself the post of Foreign Secretary. Sir Robert was in Italy, and the duke was temporarily sworn in as First Lord and Home Secretary. This dictatorship of three weeks greatly raised his reputation as a statesman. In January 1834 he had been chosen Chancellor of the University of Oxford. Sir Robert Peel resigned in 1835, but returned to power in 1841. Wellington joined his Cabinet, but with no office except that of Commander-in-chief, and supported Peel's Corn-law legislation. On his defeat in 1846 the duke retired from public life. He had been made Lord High Constable of England and again Master-general of Ordnance in 1838, and in 1842 Commander-in-chief for life. In 1848 he organised the military in London against the Chartists. At the opening of the Exhibition of 1851 he walked in the procession, but on 14th September 1852 faded peacefully away in his arm-chair at Walmer. He was buried with great pomp in St Paul's. He was Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and chief ranger and keeper of Hyde and St James's Parks. In 1806 he married the Hon. Catherine Pakenham; she died in 1831, leaving three sons and three daughters. See Lives by C. N. Wright (1841), Gleig, Brialmont, Yonge, G. L. Browne, G. Hooper, and Fitchett (1911); his despatches, edited by Gurwood, and by his son (1852-67), who published his speeches; Lord Roberts, The Rise of Wellington (a panegyric, 1895); A. Wells, CHARLES JEREMIAH (1800-79), poet, was born in London, and educated at Edmonton. His Stories after Nature (1822), fantastic tales in poetic prose, were written to show his friend Keats (with whom he had quarrelled) that he 'could do something.' The book fell still-born, and was followed in 1824 by the noble biblical drama, Joseph and his Brethren, which remained unknown until Swinburne praised it in the Fortnightly (1875). In 1830 Wells abandoned law for a country life, and in 1841 settled at Marseilles. See Watts-Dunton in the Athenæum (1876, 1879) and Buxton Forman in Miles's Poets of the Century.

Wells, HERBERT GEORGE, author of The War in the Air (1908), Tono Bungay (1909), Ann Veronica (1909), and The New Machiavelli (1911), was born 21st September 1866 at Bromley, Kent, son of Joseph Wells, cricket professional. He was a draper's apprentice in 1881-83, a schoolmaster's assistant in 1883-84, studied at the Royal College of Science, became B.Sc. and a London University science coach, but published, besides a Text-book of Biology (1893), some remarkable stories—The Time Machine (1895), The Stolen Bacillus, The Wonderful Visit, The Island of Dr Moreau, The Wheels of Chance (1896), The War of the Worlds (1898), &c. Anticipations, Mankind in the Making, and A Modern Utopia (1901-5) constitute a serious sociological trilogy.

Wells, HENRY TANWORTH (1828-1903), painter, born in London, was originally a miniaturist, and became A.R.A. in 1866, in 1870 R.A. Many of his portraits are famous.

Wells, SIR THOMAS SPENCER (1818-97), surgeon, served in the Crimea, and in 1883 became president of the Royal College of Surgeons and a baronet. He wrote on tumours and their treatment.

Welsh or Welch, JOHN (c. 1568-1622), Presbyterian minister of Ayr from 1590 till his imprisonment by James VI. in 1605 for defending the church's independence. He then preached to Huguenot congregations in France till 1622, when he went to London. From him and his wife, a daughter of Knox, Mrs Carlyle claimed descent. See Life by Young, edited by Anderson (1866).

Wemyss, FRANCIS WEMYSS CHARTERIS DOUGLAS, EARL OF, a father of the Volunteer movement, was born 4th August 1818, and educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. He sat in parliament for Gloucestershire 1841-46, followed Peel on the Corn-laws, and sat for Haddingtonshire 1847-83, then succeeding his father as ninth earl. As Lord Elcho he was a Lord of the Treasury in the Aberdeen ministry in 1852-55, and he became more pronouncedly Conservative. [Weems.]

Wendt, HANS HINRICH, born at Hamburg, 18th June 1853, became professor of Theology at Göttingen (1881), Kiel (1883), Heidelberg (1885), Jena (1893). He has written on the teaching of Christ (1886-90; trans. 1892), &c., and edited Meyer's Commentary on the Acts (1880-99). [Went.]

Wergeland, HENRIK (1808-45), Norwegian poet, has been called the 'Schiller of Norway.'

Werner, ABRAHAM GOTTLÖB (1750-1817), geologist, born at Wehrau in Silesia, became professor of Mineralogy at Freiburg in Saxony in 1775. He framed a classification of the rocks of the Harz Mountains, which he sought to apply to the whole earth's crust; and he was the apostle of the 'Neptunian theory'—that even igneous rocks were deposited as precipitates from water, as opposed to the 'Vulcanist theory.' See HUTTON, JAMES. [Vayr-ner.]

Werner, E., pseudonym of Elisabeth Bürstenbinder (b. 1838), a Berlin novelist, of whose works Sacred Vows, Fickle Fortune, Riven Bonds, &c. have been translated into English.

Werner, ZACHARIAS (1768-1823), born at Königsberg, was in the Prussian civil service 1793-1805, and wrote a series of extravagant 'fate-tragedies.' Thrice married and thrice divorced, he turned Catholic at Rome in 1811, and died a priest at Vienna. His chief works are Die Söhne der Thals (1803), Das Kreuz an der Ostsee (1804), and Martin Luther (1806). See Carlyle's Miscellanies; also Lives by Hitzig (1823), Schulz (1841), Düntzer (1873), and Poppenberg (1893).

Wesley, JOHN, was born June 17 (o.s.), 1703, second son of the rector of the Lincolnshire market-town of Epworth; the Duke of Wellington belonged to a branch of the same family. In 1720 he passed from the Charterhouse to Christ Church, Oxford (where his brothers Samuel and Charles also studied), and soon began to display an extraordinary conscientiousness and an ascetic tendency. He was ordained deacon in 1725, priest in 1728, and in 1726 became a fellow of Lincoln and Greek lecturer. In 1727 he left Oxford to assist his father, but returned as tutor in 1729. During his absence his brother Charles, James Hervey, Whitefield, and two or three others showed such unusual religious earnestness as to provoke the remark, 'Here is a new sect of Methodists sprung up.' In 1735 Wesley undertook a mission to Georgia under the S.P.G., being then a rigid High Churchman—indeed, he had seemed to be on the point of anticipating the work of Cardinal Newman by a century. His ecclesiastical intolerance and an unfortunate love-affair produced strife, and he returned to England in 1738. In London he met the Moravian missionary, Peter Böhler, and had much prayerful intercourse with him. Methodism dates its birth from 24th May 1738. At the meeting of a society in Aldersgate Street, one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans, when Wesley's heart strangely warmed. He felt that Christ had taken away his sins. The sweeping aside of ecclesiastical traditions, the rejection of Apostolical Succession, the ordination with his own hands of presbyters and bishops, the final organisation of a separate church, were all logically involved in what took place that night. The clergy closed their pulpits against Wesley; this intolerance, Whitefield's example, and the needs of the degraded masses drove him into the open air. During his itinerary of half a century 10,000 to 30,000 people would wait patiently for hours to hear him. He gave his strength to working-class neighbourhoods; hence the mass of his converts were colliers, miners, foundrymen, weavers, spinners, fishermen, artisans, yeomen, and day-labourers in towns. His life was frequently in danger, but he outlived all persecution, and the itineraries of his old age were triumphal processions from one end of the country to the other. During his unparalleled apostolate he travelled 250,000 miles and preached 40,000 sermons. Yet he managed to do a prodigious amount of literary work. He wrote short English, French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammars; a Compendium of Logic; extracts from Phædrus, Ovid, Virgil, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, Martial, and Sallust; an English Dictionary; commentaries on the Old and New Testaments; a short Roman History; a History of England; an Ecclesiastical History; a Compendium of Social Philosophy; and a Christian Library of 50 vols., for the benefit of his itinerant preachers. He edited the Imitation of Christ, and the principal works of Bunyan, Baxter, Edwards, Rutherford, Law, Madame Guyon, and others; endless abridged biographies; an abridged edition of Brooke's novel, The Fool of Quality; a Compendium of Physic—not to speak of collections of psalms, hymns, and tunes, his own Sermons and Journals, and a monthly magazine which still goes on. His works were so popular that he made £30,000, every penny of which he distributed in charity during his life. He founded an orphans' home at Newcastle, charity schools in London, and a dispensary in Bristol. Dean Stanley contends that Wesley was the founder of the Broad Church. Under his direction the Conference in 1770 adopted resolutions which provoked the indignation of his orthodox Calvinistic friends—that the heathen who had never heard of Christ could be saved if they feared God and worked righteousness according to the light they had. And he believed Marcus Aurelius would be saved; and spoke of the 'execrable wretches' who wrangled at the various church councils. He took upon himself with the utmost reluctance the responsibility of organising a separate church. But the most striking feature of his life as a theologian was his readiness in the last resort, whatever it cost him, to adapt his creed to facts. He died 2d March 1791. His Journal was edited by Curnock (1909 et seq.).

CHARLES WESLEY, born 18th December 1707, 'found rest to his soul' on Whitsunday 1738, and was throughout life indefatigable lieutenant to his greater brother. He died March 29, 1788. He is said to have written 6500 hymns. The poetical works of the two brothers, edited for the Wesleyan Conference, fill thirteen volumes (1868-72). Many of Charles Wesley's hymns are noble poetry, as 'Jesu, Lover of my Soul,' and 'O for a thousand tongues to sing.'

Wessel, or GANSFORT, JOHANN (1420-89), a pre-Reformation reformer, born at Groningen, was educated amongst the Brethren of the Common Life, and taught philosophy at Cologne, Louvain, Heidelberg, and Paris.

West, BENJAMIN, painter, was born at Springfield, Penn., 10th October 1738. At sixteen he practised portrait-painting, and produced his 'Death of Socrates.' In 1760 he was aided by some generous merchants to pursue his studies in Italy, where he found patrons, English and other. On his way home, he was induced to settle in London (1763). George III. was his patron for forty years. His 'Death of General Wolfe,' painted in the costume of the period, effected a revolution in the historic art of Britain. For Windsor Castle he painted a series of 28 religious pictures. Among his best-known works are 'Edward III. at Crécy,' 'The Black Prince at Poitiers,' 'Queen Philippa at Calais,' 'Penn's Treaty with the Indians,' 'Christ healing the Sick,' 'Death on the Pale Horse,' and the 'Battle of La Hogue.' In 1792 he became President of the Royal Academy. His drawing is correct and his composition skillful, though the colouring is monotonous. He died March 11, 1820, and was buried in St Paul's. See a poor Life by John Galt (1820).

Westall, WILLIAM (1834-1903), born in Lancashire, the son of a cotton-spinner, was educated at the Liverpool High School, and became business man and then journalist and novelist.

Westbury, RICHARD BETHELL, BARON (1800-73), born at Bradford-on-Avon, the son of a Bristol physician, was elected a fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, and in 1823 called to the bar. By 1841 he was leader of the Chancery bar with an income of £20,000. He became Q.C. in 1840, and advanced Liberal M.P. for Aylesbury in 1851, for Wolverhampton in 1852. Already in 1851 Vice-chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he became Solicitor-general in 1852, Attorney-general in 1856, and in 1861 Lord Chancellor, with the title of Baron Westbury. He promoted measures of law reform, but failed to carry his schemes for codifying the statutes and for combining law and equity. In 1865 he was forced to resign by the clamour against some official appointments; and he opposed Gladstone's Irish Church Bill and the Irish Land Act of 1870. He was noted for sarcastic sayings. See Life by Nash (1888).

Westcott, BROOKE FOSS, D.D., D.C.L., New Testament scholar, born near Birmingham, 12th January 1825, from King Edward's School passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, and, having graduated as first classic in 1848, was elected a fellow. He took orders in 1851, and was an assistant-master at Harrow 1852-69, became then a canon of Peterborough, regius professor of Divinity at Cambridge in 1870, canon of Westminster in 1883, and in 1890 Bishop of Durham. He was one of the New Testament revisers. The New Testament in Greek (1881) cost him and Dr Hort twenty-eight years' labour. Manuals of great value are his History of the New Testament Canon (1855), Study of the Gospels (1860), The Bible in the Church (1864), and History of the English Bible (1868). He also wrote on John's Gospel (1882), the Epistles of John (1883), and Hebrews (1889), on miracles, the resurrection, the Apostles' Creed, The Gospel of Life (1893; 2d ed. 1894), Christian Aspects of Life (1897), &c. He died 27th July 1901.

Westermarck, EDWARD, born at Helsingfors in Finland, 20th Nov. 1862, became lecturer on sociology there, and wrote a History of Human Marriage (3d ed. 1901). In 1907 he was made professor of Sociology at the University of London.

Westmacott, SIR RICHARD (1775-1856), sculptor and sculptor's son, born in London, studied at Rome, in 1805 was elected A.R.A., in 1816 R.A., and was knighted in 1835. In 1827 he became professor of Sculpture at the Academy.—His son, RICHARD WESTMACOTT (1799-1872), also a sculptor, studied in Italy 1820-26, became F.R.S., A.R.A., and R.A., and succeeded his father as professor of Sculpture. He wrote a Handbook of Sculpture (1864).

Wetherell, ELIZABETH. See WARNER, SUSAN.

Wetstein, JOHANN JAKOB (1693-1754), New Testament scholar, born in Basel, in 1720 became assistant to his father in a church there. In his study of the New Testament text (1730-52) his boldness brought him under suspicion of heterodoxy, and he was deposed for alleged Socinianism (1730). In 1733 he was called to a chair in the Remonstrants' College at Amsterdam.

Wetzer, HEINRICH JOSEPH (1801-53), joint-editor with Benedikt Welte of the great Roman Catholic theological encyclopaedia (12 vols. 1846-60; new ed. 1882 et seq.), became professor of Oriental Philology at Tübingen in 1830.

Weyden, ROGIER VAN DER (1400-64), Flemish painter, was born at Tournay, and by 1436 was official painter to the city of Brussels. See a work by Wanters (1856).

Weyman, STANLEY JOHN, born at Ludlow, 7th August 1855, was educated at Shrewsbury and Christ Church, Oxford, and became a barrister. In 1890 he published The House of the Wolf, in 1891 Francis Cludde; and in 1893 he made himself famous by A Gentleman of France. Later are Under the Red Robe (1894), A Minister of France (1895), The Red Cockade (1895), Shrewsbury (1897), Sophia (1900), and The Abbess of Vlaye (1904).

Whalley, EDWARD, regicide. See GOFFE.

Wharnccliffe, JAMES ARCHIBALD STUART WORTLEY MACKENZIE, LORD (1776-1845), served in the army, entered parliament in 1797, and was made a peer in 1826. A Tory, he opposed Catholic emancipation, but helped to pass the Reform Bill; he opposed Peel's Free Trade.

Wharton, GRACE, pen-name of Mrs Katherine Thomson (née Byerley; d. 1862), authoress of Lives of Raleigh (1830), the Duchess of Marlborough (1838), and the Duke of Buckingham (1860), Memoirs of the Jacobites (1845-46), &c. With her son, JOHN COCKBURN THOMSON, 'Philip Wharton' (d. 1860), she published Queens of Society (1860) and Wits and Beaux of Society (1860).

Wharton, HENRY THORNTON (1846-95), born at Mitcham, was educated at Charterhouse and Wadham, practised medicine in South Hampstead, and became known as 'Sappho Wharton' from his edition with translations of Sappho (1885; 3d ed. 1895).

Wharton, PHILIP WHARTON, DUKE OF (1698-1731), was the son of Thomas Wharton (1640-1714), an eminent Whig statesman, reputed author of Lillibullero, and Lord-lieutenant of Ireland 1708-10, who in 1706 was created Earl, and in 1714 Marquis, of Wharton. Philip was intended by his father for a great orator, a Whig, and a Presbyterian. As a boy he contracted a Fleet marriage, but, soon parting from his wife, in 1716 went to Geneva with a Huguenot tutor. He contracted debts, and, running away to Avignon, is said to have accepted from the Old Pretender the title of Duke of Northumberland. In the Irish House of Peers he displayed such splendid abilities in support of the government that he was in 1718 raised to the highest rank in the peerage. In the English Upper House he opposed the government measure on the South Sea Bill and the bill against Bishop Aterbury. His extravagance having forced him to accept a yearly allowance of £1200 from his creditors, he set up a political paper, the True Briton (1723-24), and spoke and wrote against the ministry and the court. In 1725 he visited Vienna and Madrid, where he was served with an order from the Privy Seal to return home. He treated it with contempt, and, going to Rome, appeared at the court of the Pretender, from whom he accepted the Garter. He now assumed the title of Duke of Northumberland, fought with the Spaniards against his countrymen at the siege of Gibraltar (1727), so lost his English title and estates, and was convicted of high-treason. He died wretchedly at a Bernardine convent near Tarragona. See his Life and Writings (1732) and the Life by J. R. Robinson (1896).

Whately, RICHARD, Archbishop of Dublin, was born in London, 1st Feb. 1787, fourth son of Dr Joseph Whately, prebendary of Bristol. In 1805 he entered Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1811 was elected a fellow. He became a college tutor and rector of Halesworth, and for the Encyclopaedia Metropolitana wrote what he afterwards expanded into treatises on Logic (1826) and Rhetoric (1828). In 1819 he published Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon Bonaparte, in 1822 delivered the Bampton Lectures on Party Feeling in Religion. In 1825 he was appointed Principal of St Alban's Hall, in 1829 professor of Political Economy, and in 1831 Archbishop of Dublin. A founder of the Broad Church party, he opposed the Tractarian movement, but to the Evangelicals he seemed a Latitudinarian, for he supported Catholic emancipation and concurrent endowment, and laboured for unsectarian religious instruction. His caustic wit, abrupt manners, and fearless outspokenness brought him no little unpopularity. He died 8th October 1863. He published Peculiarities of the Christian Religion (1825), Difficulties in the Writings of St Paul (1828), On the Sabbath (1830), Christian Evidences (1837), Dangers to Christian Faith (1839), and The Kingdom of Christ Delineated (1841); with editions of Bacon's Essays (1856) and of Paley's Evidences and Moral Philosophy. See the rambling Memoirs by W. J. Fitzpatrick (1864) and the Life by Miss E. Jane Whately (1866).

Wheatloy, HENRY BENJAMIN, born at Chelsea, 24 May 1838, became clerk to the Royal Academy (1861-79) and assistant-secretary (1879-1908) to the Society of Arts. He was one of the founders of the Early English Text Society, wrote Anagrams (1862), Samuel Pepys and the World he lived in (1880), How to Catalogue a Library, &c., and edited Peter Cunningham's London (1891), Wraxall's Memoirs (1884), and a complete edition of Pepys's Journal (1893-97).

Wheaton, HENRY (1785-1848), jurist, born at Providence, R.I., in 1812-15 edited the National Advocate in New York, where for four years he was a justice of the Marine Court, and from 1816 to 1827 reporter for the Supreme Court (Reports, 1826-27; also Digest of Decisions from 1789 to 1820, 1820-29). In 1827-35 he was chargé d'affaires at Copenhagen, and in 1835-46 minister at Berlin. Besides his Elements of International Law (1836), he wrote a Life of William Pinkney, Histories of the Northmen and of the Law of Nations, &c.

Wheatstone, SIR CHARLES, electrician, was born, the son of a musical instrument maker, near Gloucester, in February 1802, and in 1816 was placed with an uncle, a London music-seller, but found time for study in physics. By 1833 he had published five papers on sound. In 1834 he became professor of Experimental Philosophy at King's College. In 1837 he and W. F. Cooke took out a patent 'for improvements in giving signals and sounding alarms in distant places by means of electric currents transmitted through metallic circuits.' From this instrument has grown the telegraph system of the United Kingdom. For the Old World he was what Morse (q.v.) was for the New. In a paper to the Royal Society in 1838 he explained the principle of the stereoscope (see BREWSTER); in 1840 he showed that by means of electro-magnetism a number of clocks far apart might be regulated with absolute exactitude from one central clock; and in 1843 he brought out his new instruments and processes for determining the constants of a voltaic series. There were also his automatic telegraph in two forms, and numerous other inventions in electricity; the electrical device known as Wheatstone's Bridge was brought into notice (though not invented) by him. A vice-president and medallist of the Royal Society, he was knighted in 1868, and died at Paris, October 19, 1875. His Scientific Papers (1879) were published by the Physical Society, London. See Tollenache's Safe Studies (1884; new ed. 1891).

Whewell, WILLIAM, D.D., was born, a joiner's son, at Lancaster, 24th May 1794, and graduating in 1816 from Trinity College, Cambridge, as second wrangler and second Smith's prizeman, became a fellow and tutor of Trinity, and for many years acted also as a successful 'coach.' In 1820 he was elected F.R.S., in 1828-32 was professor of Mineralogy, and in 1838-55 professor of Moral Theology. In 1841 he became Master of Trinity, and in 1855 Vice-chancellor. He died of a fall from his horse, 6th March 1866. His knowledge was encyclopædic, with all the defects of an encyclopædia. His works included Astronomy and General Physics considered in Reference to Natural Theology (Bridgewater Treatise, 1833), History of the Inductive Sciences (1837), Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences (1840), Elements of Morality (1855), Plurality of Worlds (1853), and other writings on the tides, electricity, magnetism, the History of Moral Philosophy in England, &c., besides translations of Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea, Grotius's Rights of Peace and War and Plato. See Todhunter's Whewell (1876) and the Life by Mrs Stair Douglas (1881).

Whichcote, BENJAMIN (1609-83), Cambridge Platonist, born of a good Shropshire family, became in 1633 a fellow of Emmanuel College, and in 1644 Provost of King's. At the Restoration he lost his provostship, but held livings, finally in London. Discourses (1701-7) and Moral and Religious Aphorisms, collected from his MSS. (1703), are all his works; but he exerted great influence on pupils and contemporaries.

Whistler, JAMES ABBOTT McNEILL (1834-1903), painter and etcher, was born at Lowell, Massachusetts, son of an engineer, and studied first at West Point and then (1857) art at Paris. In 1859 he began to exhibit at the Royal Academy, and in 1874 and 1892 he held exhibitions of his own in London. He was made Chevalier (1889) and Officer (1891) of the Legion of Honour, has been president of the Society of British Artists, and is a member of the Munich Academy. Ruskin's attack on him and his art in Fors Clavigera (1877) led to a famous lawsuit, ending in a verdict for Whistler; his Gentle Art of Making Enemies (1890; new ed. 1892) contains articles by him on that and other questions. His most famous oil-paintings are those of his mother (1870), purchased for the Luxembourg in 1891; and of Carlyle, bought by the Glasgow Corporation in 1891. His eminence as an etcher and dry-pointer is even more widely recognised than as a worker in colour. See Life by Elizabeth R. and Joseph Pennell (1908).

Whiston, WILLIAM (1667-1752), mathematical divine, born at Norton rectory in Leicestershire, became in 1693 a fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, chaplain to the Bishop of Norwich, and in 1698 rector of Lowestoft. His Theory of the Earth (1696) brought him reputation, and in 1703 he became Lucasian professor at Cambridge. But for Arianism he was in 1710 expelled from the university. His Primitive Christianity Revived (1711-12) included the famous heretical essay on the Apostolic Constitutions. Whiston spent the remainder of his life in London, incessantly employed in writing, controversy, scientific crotchets, lectures, and the services of a 'Primitive Christian' congregation. Though an Arian he was a strong supernaturalist, even anointing the sick and touching for the evil. Of Whiston's translation of Josephus (1737) there is a good edition by Shilleto (1890); his Life of Samuel Clarke (1730) was admirable; and the Primitive New Testament (1745) is a curiosity. See his whimsical Memoir (1749-50).

Whitaker, JOSEPH, F.S.A. (1820-95), was born in London, the son of a silversmith, and became a bookseller. He started the Educational Register, Whitaker's Clergyman's Diary, The Bookseller in 1858, and in 1868 Whitaker's Almanac, by which his name is known throughout the empire.

Whitbread, SAMUEL (1758-1815), a London brewer's son, from Eton passed to Oxford, and in 1790 entered parliament. The intimate friend of Fox, under Pitt he was leader of the Opposition, and in 1805 headed the attack on Melville. He committed suicide while insane.

Whitby, DANIEL (1638-1726), born at Rushden near Higham Ferrers, became in 1664 a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, prebendary of Salisbury in 1668, and rector of St Edmund's there in 1672. From onslaughts on popery he turned in 1683 to seeking a basis of union with the Dissenters; his Protestant Reconciler was publicly burned at Oxford. In his Discourse on Election (1710) he accepted Arminianism; and later he published Arian treatises. His Last Thoughts appeared in 1727.

White, Sir George Stuart (1835-1912), governor of Chelsea Hospital (1904), received the Victoria Cross for gallantry in the Afghan campaign of 1880. Commander-in-chief in India in 1893-98, he defended Ladysmith in 1899-1900.

White, Gilbert (1720-93), author of the Natural History of Selborne, was born at Selborne in Hampshire, in 1744 obtained a fellowship at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1747 took orders, in 1752 became senior proctor, and in 1758 accepted the sinecure college living of Morton Pinkney, Northants. Six years before he had retired to Selborne, to indulge his taste for literature and natural history. His charming Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne (1789) made him an English classic. Among its countless editions are those of Jesse (1851), Frank Buckland (1875), Bell (1877), Jefferies (1887), and Burroughs (1895). His journal (1768-89) was found in 1880. See his Life and Letters (1901) by R. Holt-White.

White, Henry Kirke (1785-1806), the son of a Nottingham butcher, was apprenticed to an attorney. His contributions to the Monthly Mirror attracted attention; and in 1803 he published a small volume of poems, which secured him the friendship of Southey and the Rev. Charles Simeon, through whom he became a sizar of St John's College, Cambridge. He overtaken his strength and died of consumption. Southey edited his Remains (1807).

White, Joseph Blanco (1775-1841), was born at Seville of an Irish Catholic family. Ordained a priest in 1799, he lost his faith, and, coming in 1810 to London, edited a monthly Spanish paper 1810-14, then received an English pension of £250, was tutor to Lord Holland's son 1815-16, subscribed the Articles, and was admitted to Anglican orders. Made a member of Oriel College, he was tutor in Whately's family at Dublin (1832-35), but fled to Liverpool when he found it impossible longer to believe in the Trinity. He contributed to the Quarterly and Westminster, edited the short-lived London Review, wrote Letters from Spain (1822), Evidence against Catholicism (1825), Second Travels of an Irish Gentleman in Search of a Religion (1833), &c., and one immortal sonnet, 'Night and Death,' which first appeared in the Bijou for 1828 (two variants are in the Academy, 12th Sept. 1891). See his Autobiography (1845).

White, Richard Grant (1821-85), Shakespearean scholar, was born in New York, and after studying medicine and law, became a journalist, for fourteen years contributed to the New York Courier and Enquirer, and during the civil war wrote a remarkable series of letters for the London Spectator. He was also for twenty years chief of the U.S. revenue marine bureau at New York. His criticisms on J. Payne Collier's folio MS. emendations of Shakespeare (1852) revealed his intimate knowledge of Shakespeare, further shown in Shakespeare's Scholar (1854), an annotated edition (1857-65), Memoirs of Shakespeare (1865), the 'Riverside Edition' (1883), Studies in Shakespeare (1885), &c. Other works are Words and their Uses (1870), Everyday English (1881), and England Without and Within (1881).

White, Walter (1811-93), born at Reading, became clerk, assistant-secretary, and librarian to the Royal Society, and wrote books on touring in Yorkshire, Northumberland, Tyrol, the Wrekin country, Eastern England, &c.

White, William Hale, was born at Bedford about 1830, the son of William White (1797-1882), bookseller, and from 1850 to 1880 doorkeeper to the House of Commons (see his Inner Life of the House of Commons, a long series of articles to the Illustrated Times, collected in 1897). In 1848-51 Mr Hale White qualified at Cheshunt and New College for the Congregational ministry, but was expelled for his views on inspiration, whereupon he became a journalist and miscellaneous writer. His translation of Spinoza's Ethic (1883; new ed. 1894) was published under his own name; but he owes his literary eminence to the powerful study of domestic, social, moral, and theological problems of the novel series, The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford (1881), Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885), and The Revolution in Tanner's Lane (1887), 'edited by Reuben Shapcott.' Later works are Pages from a Journal (1900) and More Pages from a Journal (1910).

White, Sir William Henry, K.C.B. (1895) and F.R.S., born at Devonport, 2d Feb. 1845, at fourteen entered the dockyard as shipwright's apprentice, from 1867 was at the Admiralty staff, and in 1881 became Chief Constructor, but during 1883-85 was at the Elswick works of Lord Armstrong. Returning then to the Admiralty as Director of Naval Construction, he built in less than twelve years ships to an expenditure of nearly £50,000,000. He retired in 1902, having published several treatises on shipbuilding.

Whitefield, George, one of the founders of Methodism, was born in the Bell Inn, Gloucester, 16th Dec. 1714. At eighteen he entered as servitor Pembroke College, Oxford. The Wesleys had already laid at Oxford the foundations of Methodism, and Whitefield became conspicuous for zeal. He took deacon's orders in 1736, and preached his first sermon in Gloucester Cathedral with striking effect. In 1738 he followed Wesley in Georgia, returning to be admitted to priest's orders, and to collect funds for an orphanage. The religious level of the age was low, and Whitefield found amongst his brethren the most active opposition. But when the parish pulpits were denied him he preached in the open air, the first time with marvellous effect, on Kingswood Hill near Bristol. From this time onwards he spent his life in constant travel and incessant preaching, everywhere moving audiences by his irresistible earnestness and eloquence. About 1741 differences on predestination led to his separation as a rigid Calvinist from John Wesley as an Arminian. His supporters now built him a large 'Tabernacle' at Moorfields; and his preaching gathered immense audiences. But he founded no distinct sect, many of his adherents following the Countess of Huntingdon (q.v.) in Wales, and ultimately helping to form the Calvinistic Methodists. The Countess appointed Whitefield her chaplain, and built and endowed many chapels for him. He made seven evangelistic visits to America, and spent the rest of his life in preaching tours through England, Scotland, and Wales. One of the most famous of these missionary journeys was that which he made to Scotland in 1741. In that year he married a Welsh widow, Mrs James. He set out for America for the last time in 1769, and died near Boston, 30th Sept. 1770. His writings, which by no means answer to his fame, comprise sermons, journals, and letters, and, with the Memoirs by Dr Gillies, fill 7 vols. (1771-72). See Lives by Philip (1838), Andrews (1864), Harsha (1866), J. P. Gladstone (1871), Tyerman (1876).

Whitehead, Charles (1804-62), was born in London, the son of a wine merchant. He gave himself wholly to letters after publishing The Solitary (1831), a poem of reflection. His Autobiography of Jack Ketch (1834) showed humour, but when Chapman & Hall asked him for a popular book in instalments he declined, recommending young Dickens, who thus began the Pickwick Papers. His novel, Richard Savage (1842), earned the praises of Dickens and Rossetti. Other works are the Cavalier, a poetic drama; the Earl of Essex, a romance (1843); Smiles and Tears, essays and stories (1847); and a Life of Raleigh (1854). Whitehead fell into intemperance, went out to Melbourne in 1857, but again sank, and died miserably, leaving unfinished the Spanish Marriage, a drama. See A Forgotten Genius, by H. T. Mackenzie Bell (1884).

Whitehead, PAUL (1710-74), 'a small poet' in Johnson's phrase, was born, a tailor's son, in Holborn, was apprenticed to a mercer, married a short-lived imbecile with a fortune of £10,000, lay some years in the Fleet for the non-payment of a sum for which he had stood security, became active in politics and as a poetical satirist, was one of the infamous monks of Medmenham Abbey, and became deputy-treasurer of the Chamber. Among his satires are State Dunces (1733), inscribed to Pope, and Manners (1739), for which Dodsley was brought before the House of Lords.

Whitehead, ROBERT (1828-1905), born at Bolton-le-Moors, and bred an engineer, settled at Fiume in 1856, and there in 1866 invented the torpedo called after him.

Whitehead, WILLIAM (1715-85), a Cambridge baker's son, was helped to an education at Winchester and Clare Hall, was elected a fellow in 1742, made the grand tour as tutor to Lord Jersey's son, became in 1755 secretary of the Order of the Bath, and in 1757 poet-laureate. He wrote tragedies, farces, epistles, &c.

Whiteley, WILLIAM (1831-1907), born at Wakefield in 1831, came to London as a shopman in 1852, and began business in Westbourne Grove in 1863, where by-and-by his gigantic establishment and its branches became known as those of 'the Universal Provider.' He was shot by an assassin.

Whitelocke, BULSTRODE (1605-76), born in London, the son of a judge, passed through Eton and Oxford to the study of law, sat in the Long Parliament for Great Marlow, and took a half-hearted part on the popular side in the great struggle. In 1648 he was appointed a commissioner of the Great Seal. He would not act on the king's trial, but accepted a seat in the council of state, and was sent ambassador to Sweden (1653). He was nominated by Richard keeper of the Great Seal, but again steered prudently enough to be included in the Act of Oblivion. He died at Chilton in Wiltshire. Whitelocke's Memorials was first published in 1682 in a mutilated and falsified form; better in 1732. His Journal of the Embassy to Sweden was edited by Reeve (1855). See Memoirs by R. H. Whitelocke (1860).

Whitgift, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Grimsby in 1530 or 1533, in 1555 was elected fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, took orders in 1560, and became rector of Teversham, Cambridgeshire, Lady Margaret professor of Divinity (1663), Master of Pembroke, queen's chaplain, D.D., regius professor of Divinity and Master of Trinity (1567), Dean of Lincoln (1571), Bishop of Worcester (1577), Archbishop of Canterbury (1583), and privy-councillor (1586). He was a great pluralist. Having attended Queen Elizabeth in her last moments, and crowned James I., he died 29th Feb. 1604. With a Calvinistic bias, Whitgift yet was a champion of conformity, and vindicated the Anglican position against the Puritans. His ninety-four writings were edited for the Parker Society (1851-53). See vol. v. of Hook's Archbishops of Canterbury (1875), and Clayton's Whitgift and his Times (1911).

Whitman, WALT, born 31st May 1819 at West Hills, Long Island, N.Y., served first in a lawyer's and then in a doctor's office, and finally in a printer's. His next employment was that of itinerant teacher in country schools. He returned shortly to his printing, and in 1846 became editor of the Brooklyn Eagle. This and his other numerous press engagements were only of short duration, a certain restlessness making him pass rapidly from one employment to another. He seemed unable to find free expression for his emotions until he hit upon the curious, irregular, recitative measures of Leaves of Grass (1855), originally a small quarto of 94 pages, which grew in the seven succeeding editions to nearly 400 pages. This, with his prose book Spectern Days and Collect, constitutes his main life-work as a writer. Summoned to tend his brother, wounded in the war against the South, he became the brother-nurse to every wounded or sick mother's-son in the Northern army. The exertion, exposure, and high strain of those few years left Whitman a shattered and almost aged man. About the close of the war he received a government clerkship; was dismissed by Secretary Harlan as the author of 'an indecent book;' but almost immediately obtained a similar post. In 1874 he left Washington for Camden, N.J., where he lived till his death, 27th March 1892. Partially paralysed, he would have fallen into absolute poverty but for the timely help of his admirers beyond the Atlantic. Later on several wealthy American citizens liberally provided for the Good Grey Poet's simple wants. Whitman set himself the Atlantean task of uplifting into the sphere of poetry the whole of modern life and man, omitting nothing, concealing nothing. Hence the inclusion of subjects usually tabooed. He was in fact an idealist who bound himself to be a thorough-going realist. A selection from Whitman was published by Mr W. M. Rossetti in 1868 (new ed. 1910), his Complete Writings in 1902. See W. D. O'Connor, The Good Grey Poet (1866); lives or studies by Bucke (1885), W. Clarke (1892), J. A. Symonds (1893), John Burroughs (1896), W. S. Kennedy (1896), and H. B. Binns (1905).

Whitney, ELI (1765-1825), born at Westborough, Mass., was educated at Yale, went to Georgia as a teacher, but finding a patron in the widow of General Greene, resided on her estate and studied law. The cotton had then to be slowly separated from the seed by hand. Whitney set to work to make a cotton-gin. Reports of his success prompted rogues to break into his workshop and steal and copy his machine; he went to Connecticut to carry out his invention; but lawsuits in defence of his rights carried off all his profits and $50,000 voted him by the state of South Carolina. In 1798 he got a government contract for the manufacture of firearms, and made a fortune by this business, carried out at Whitneyville, Conn. He died at New Haven.

Whitney, JOSIAH DWIGHT (1819-96), geologist, born at Northampton, Mass., graduated at Yale, and in 1840 joined the New Hampshire survey. He explored the geology of the Lake Superior region, Iowa, the upper Missouri, and California, and in 1855 was made professor in Iowa University, in 1860 state geologist of California, and in 1865 professor at Harvard.—His brother, WILLIAM DWIGHT WHITNEY (1827-94), studied at Williams and Yale, and in Germany with Roth prepared an edition of the Atharva Veda Samhita (1856). In 1854 he became professor of Sanskrit at Yale, in 1870 also of Comparative Philology. He was an office-bearer of the American Oriental Society, edited numerous Sanskrit texts, and contributed to the great Sanskrit dictionary of Böhtlingk and Roth (1853-67). He received honorary degrees from many universities, and was member and correspondent of several foreign academies, as well as knight of the Prussian order 'Pour le Mérite.' He waged war with Max-Müller on fundamental questions of the science of language. Among his works were Material and Form in Language (1872), Darwinism and Language (1874), Oriental and Linguistic Studies (1873-75), Life and Growth of Language (1876), Essentials of English Grammar (1877), Sanskrit Grammar (1879), Logical Consistency in Views of Language (1880), and Mixture in Language (1881). He was also editor-in-chief of the Century Dictionary (1889-91).

Whittier, JOHN GREENLEAF, Quaker poet, was born near Haverhill, Mass., 17th Dec. 1807, the son of a poor farmer, and obtained education with difficulty. In 1829 he undertook the editorship of the American Manufacturer, in 1830 of the New England Weekly Review, in 1832 of the Haverhill Gazette, having published in 1831 Legends of New England and Moll Pitcher. With W. L. Garrison he fought the long battle of emancipation through contempt and defeat to lasting and complete victory. In 1840 he settled at Amesbury, a village near his birthplace. He died 7th Sept. 1892. His anti-slavery poems have, like his prose-writings, mostly served their purpose, with exceptions such as the pathetic and spirited 'Slaves of Martinique.' His nature-poetry is faithful, fresh, and beautiful, without being quite original; and his 'Barclay of Ury' and 'Barbara Frietchie' rank high among ballads of moral heroism; but it is when he soars into the spiritual and mystic spheres, as in 'My Psalm,' that his notes come clearest, sweetest, and truest. A final edition of Whittier's poems revised by himself appeared in 1888-89. A new volume, At Sundown, was announced after his death. See Lives by Underwood (new ed. 1883) and W. S. Kennedy (1882).

Whittington, RICHARD (c. 1358-1423), is supposed to have been the youngest son of Sir William Whittington of Pauntley in Gloucestershire, on whose death he set out at thirteen for London, and apprenticed himself to Sir John Fitz-Warren, a prosperous mercer, whose daughter he afterwards married. We find him a member of the Mercers' Company in 1392, in 1393 an alderman and sheriff, in 1397 and 1406 Mayor of London, member of parliament in 1416, and in 1419 for the third time mayor. He was knighted by Henry V. Lysons accepts the story of the sale of the cat by a friendly sailor to a Moorish king pestered with rats and mice. Unluckily the story occurs also in German, Italian, Russian, and Danish folklore. See Lysons's Model Merchant of the Middle Ages (1860) and Besant and Rice's Sir Richard Whittington (1881).

Whitworth, SIR JOSEPH (1803-87), born at Stockport, at the Exhibition in 1851 exhibited many tools and machines. In 1859 he invented a gun of compressed steel, with a spiral polygonal bore. Knighted in 1869, he founded Whitworth scholarships for encouraging engineering science.

Whymper, EDWARD (1840-1911), born in London, was trained an artist on wood, but became even more famous for his mountaineering than for his book-illustrations. In 1860-69 he scaled several hitherto unscaled peaks of the Alps, including the Matterhorn. In 1867 and 1872 he made valuable geological discoveries in Northern Greenland. His travels in the Andes (including ascents of Chimborazo) took place in 1879-80. See his Scrambles amongst the Alps (1871), Travels amongst the Great Andes of the Equator (1892), Guides to Chamonix, Zermatt (1897), &c.

Whyte-Melville, GEORGE JOHN, sporting novelist, was born in 1821 at Mount-Melville, St Andrews, the son of a Fifeshire laird. Educated at Eton, in 1839 he entered the Coldstream Guards; retired in 1849 as major; but during the Crimean war joined the cavalry of the Turkish contingent (1855-56). From 1850 onwards he published over a score of novels, four or five of them historical, but the best devoted to fox-hunting, steeplechasing, and country-house life generally. He met his death in the hunting-field, in the Vale of Aylesbury, 5th Dec. 1878.

Wieland, CHRISTOPH MARTIN, born near Biberach, 5th Sept. 1733, the son of a pietist pastor, in 1760 became an official there. Bodmer invited him (1752) to Zurich, and inspired him to write Der geprüfte Abraham and other books full of sentimentality and religious mysticism. But Wieland's bent was in the opposite direction, and in 1760-70, besides making the first German translation of Shakespeare (1762-66), he wrote the romances Agathon and Don Silvio von Rosalba, Die Grazien and other tales, the didactic poem Musarion, &c. Their elegance, grace, and lightness, and a strong flavour of French materialism, made Wieland popular with fashionable society. After holding for three years a professorship at Erfurt, he was called to Weimar to train the grand-duchess's sons, and there he spent most of the rest of his life, the friend of Goethe and Herder. He died 20th Jan. 1813. The Weimar period produced his heroic poem Oberon, by which he is best remembered; the historical romances Die Aderichten, Aristipp, &c.; a series of graceful verse narratives (1784-87); and German versions of Lucian, Horace, and Cicero's Letters; he also edited several magazines. See Lives by Gruber (1827-28) and Loebel (1858); books about him by Finck (1882), Keil (1885), and Hirzel (1891); and Wieland's Correspondence (1815-20). [Vee-lant.]

Wieniawski, HENRI (1835-80), composer, born at Lublin, was for twelve years solo-violinist to the czar, and taught at the Brussels Conservatoire.—His brother, JOSEPH (born 1837), pianist, taught in the Moscow Conservatoire, and was a conductor at Warsaw 1871-77. [Vee-nee-av'-skee.]

Wier, JOHANN (1516-88), one of the first opponents of the witchcraft superstition, born at Grave in North Brabant, studied medicine at Paris and Orleans, and settled about 1545 as a physician at Arnheim, whence he was called to Dusseldorf to be physician to the Duke of Jülich. To him he dedicated his famous De prestigis demonum et incantationibus ac veneficis (1563), a plea against the folly and cruelty of the witchcraft trials. The book roused the fury of the clergy; it still stands in the Index, but ranked its author amongst the benefactors of humanity. The duke protected Wierus till his death. His great treatise was followed by De Lamiis, and by the Pseudomonarchia Dæmonum, a description of the hierarchy of Hell. See study by Binz (1885).

Wiertz, ANTON JOSEPH (1806-65), painter, born at Dinant, in 1836 settled in Liège, and in 1848 at Brussels. His original aim was to combine the excellences of Michelangelo and Rubens; but about 1848-50 he began to paint speculative and mystical pieces, dreams, and visions, and the horrible outcomes of a morbid imagination. There were genre pictures also which were only eccentric—'Quasimodo,' 'The Young Witch,' and even pleasing pictures—'The Maid at her Toilet,' 'The Confession'; he also left some sculptures. In 1850 the state built him a studio in Brussels, and at his death this became the Musée Wiertz, one of the sights of the city. See monographs by Labarre (1866) and Claessens (1888). [Veerts.]

Wiffen, BENJAMIN BARRON (1794-1867), born at Woburn, Bedfordshire, of Quaker parentage, devoted himself to editing the writings of early Spanish reformers (1848-69); his valuable collections are now in Wadham College, Oxford.—His brother, JEREMIAH HOLME WIFFEN (1792-1836), librarian to the Duke of Bedford at Woburn Abbey, translated Garcilaso de la Vega, Tasso, &c.

Wiggin, KATE DOUGLAS, born at Philadelphia, 28th Sept. 1857, the daughter of R. N. Smith, a lawyer, was engaged in Kindergarten work in California from 1876, married in 1880 Mr Wiggin (d. 1889), and in 1895 Mr J. C. Riggs of Hollis, Me. Among her works are Half-a-Dozen Housekeepers (1878), The Story of Patsy, Kindergarten Chimes, The Bird's Christmas Carol (1888), Timothy's Quest, the Penelope series, Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm, The Old Peabody Pew, Susanna and Sue.

Wilberforce, WILLIAM, was born at Hull, 24th August 1759, the son of a wealthy merchant. Educated at St John's, Cambridge, in 1780 he was returned for Hull, in 1784 for Yorkshire, and was a close friend of Pitt, though he remained independent of party. In 1784-85, during a tour on the Continent with Dean Milner, he became seriously impressed; and in 1787 he founded an association for the reformation of manners. In 1788, supported by Clarkson and the Quakers, he entered on his nineteen years' struggle for the abolition of the slave-trade, crowned with victory in 1807. He next sought to secure the abolition of the slave-trade abroad and the total abolition of slavery itself; but declining health compelled him in 1825 to retire from parliament. Long a central figure in the 'Clapham sect' of Evangelicals, he died 29th July 1833, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He wrote a Practical View of Christianity (1797), helped to found the Christian Observer (1801), and promoted many schemes for the welfare of the community. See the Life by his sons (1838), and his Private Papers, edited by Mrs A. M. Wilberforce (1898).—His son, ROBERT ISAAC (1800-57), a fellow of Oriel and prebendary of York, joined the Catholic Church in 1854, and died on his way to become a priest at Rome; and the youngest son, HENRY WILLIAM (1807-73), also educated at Oriel, and an English clergyman, joined the Church of Rome in 1850, becoming afterwards a newspaper proprietor and magistrate in county Galway.—His third son, SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, was born at Clapham, Sept. 7, 1805. In 1826 he graduated from Oriel, Oxford, with first-class honours in mathematics and second-class in classics. In December he was ordained curate of Checkendon near Henley, and in 1830 became rector of Brightstone, Isle of Wight; in 1836 was a rural dean there, and in 1839 archdeacon of Surrey. In 1840 he was appointed rector of Alverstoke and canon of Winchester, in 1841 chaplain to the Prince-Consort, in March 1845 Dean of Westminster, and in October Bishop of Oxford. He shared in the troubles of the Hampden, Gorham, Essays and Reviews, and Coleiso cases, and suffered many domestic trials, yet so governed the diocese for twenty-four years as to earn the title of 'Remodeller of the Episcopate.' He instituted Cuddesdon theological college (1854), and was mainly instrumental in reviving Convocation (1852). The charm of his many-sided personality, his administrative capacity, his extraordinary faculty of work, his social gifts, and his gifts as an orator were too much forgotten in the versatile ecclesiastic, nicknamed 'Soapy Sam.' He suffered keenly from the secession to Rome of his brother-in-law, his two brothers, his only daughter, and his son-in-law. He edited Letters and Journals of Henry Martyn (1837), wrote along with his brother the Life of his father (1838), and himself wrote Agathos (1839), Rocky Island (1840), and History of the American Church (1844), and contributed to the Quarterly. In 1869 he was transferred to the see of Winchester, and on 19th July 1873 was killed by falling from his horse near Dorking. He is buried at Lavington, Sussex, which he inherited through his marriage in 1828 to Emily Sargent, Cardinal Manning's sister-in-law. See Life by Ashwell and his eldest son (1879-82), shorter Lives by that son (1888) and Daniell (1891), and the sketch by Dean Burgon in his Twelve Good Men (1888).—Of his two sons, the elder, ERNEST ROLAND (1840-1908), became (1832) first Bishop of Newcastle, and in 1895 of Chichester; ALBERT BASIL ORME, who became archdeacon of Westminster (1900) and chaplain to the Speaker of the House of Commons, is an eloquent advocate of temperance.

Wild, JONATHAN (c. 1682-1725), born at Wolverhampton, served an apprenticeship to a Birmingham buckle-maker. He married, but about 1706 deserted his wife, and came up to London, where, during a four years' imprisonment for debt, he consorted with criminals. Thereafter he turned a receiver of stolen goods and a betrayer of such thieves as would not share with him, until for theft and receiving he was hanged at Tyburn. See Fielding's History of the Late Mr Jonathan Wild (1743); Seccombe's Twelve Bad Men (1911).

Wilde, LADY (1826-96)—Jane Francesca Speranza, daughter of Archdeacon Elgee—in 1851 married Sir W. R. W. Wilde (1799-1869), a distinguished surgeon and President of the Irish Academy. As 'Speranza' she published Poems (1864), and in her own name many other works, such as Driftwood from Scandinavia (1884), Legends of Ireland (1886), and Social Studies (1893). For many years her salon was the most famous in Dublin; but, assailed by bereavement, poverty, and other trials, she spent her last years in London.

Wilde, OSCAR (1858-1900), was son of the above-named Sir W. R. W. Wilde. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1878 got the Newdigate prize for his poem Ravenna. In 1881 he published Poems; in 1891 The House of Pomegranates; in 1893 Lady Windermere's Fan (a play); in 1894 A Woman of No Importance, Intentions, &c., and Salome (from the French); in 1895 a novel, Dorian Gray; The Ballad of Reading Gaol (1898) and De Profundis (1905) bear the impress of two years' hard labour for vicious practices.

Wilfrid, St (634-709), Bishop of York, born in Northumbria, was trained at Lindisfarne, and after a visit to Rome became a strong supporter of the Roman views which triumphed at the Synod of Whitby (664). Chosen Bishop of York when abroad, on his return he found that Chad had been elected Bishop of Northumbria; but Archbishop Theodore established Wilfrid. He improved the minster of York, built a splendid church at Hexham, and raised a new minster at Ripon. Theodore divided Northumbria into four sees, and Wilfrid appealed to Rome. On the journey he was driven by a storm to the coast of Friesland, where he baptised thousands of pagans. Pope Agatho decided in his favour, but King Egfrid flung him into prison. He escaped to Sussex, was allowed to return by the new king, Aldfrid, in 686, and was finally allowed to keep the sees of Ripon and Hexham, but not York. See Eddius's Vita Wilfridi, edited by Raine (Rolls series, 1879); and Bishop G. F. Browne, Theodore and Wilfrith (1897).

Wilken, GEORGE ALEXANDER (1847-91), ethnographer, born in Celebes, a missionary's son, served eleven years in the Dutch Indian Civil Service, and in 1881 became lecturer at Leyden, in 1885 professor of Indian Archipelago Ethnography.

Wilkes, CAPTAIN CHARLES (1798-1877), American naval officer, in 1861 intercepted at sea the British mail-steamer Trent, and took off two Confederate commissioners accredited to France, thereby raising a risk of war with Britain.

Wilkes, JOHN, born at Clerkenwell, 17th Oct. 1727, the son of a distiller, studied at Leyden, and became a man of fashion and profligate. To please his parents, he married at twenty-two the daughter of the eminent and wealthy physician, Dr Mead. She was ten years his senior, and after a daughter had been born to them the ill-matched pair separated. One of the infamous 'Monks of Medmenham,' Wilkes took up politics as a supporter of Pitt, was returned for Aylesbury in 1757, and was also high-sheriff for Bucks and colonel of the Bucks Militia. Lord Bute having declined to appoint him ambassador to Constantinople or governor of Quebec, he attacked the ministry in the North Briton (1762-63), a weekly journal he had founded. Before the twenty-seventh number appeared he was threatened with prosecution, and had to fight a duel with Lord Talbot. In the forty-fifth number some strong comments were made upon the king's speech on opening parliament. Lord Halifax as secretary of state issued a general warrant for the apprehension of all concerned in the article as libellous. Wilkes was seized and committed to the Tower. Lord Chief-justice Pratt ordered his release on the ground of privilege as M.P.; and it was then determined that general warrants were unconstitutional. He obtained large damages at law, and became the hero of the hour. The Earl of Sandwich read extracts in the House of Lords from the purloined copy of Wilkes's verse 'Essay on Woman,' printed at his private press, which was declared to be an 'obscene libel'; and the House of Commons expelled him on 19th January 1764 as author of No. 45 of the North Briton. Before this he was wounded in a duel with Mr Martin. He was tried and found guilty during his absence from England for publishing the 'Essay on Woman' (1763), and was outlawed for non-appearance. Returning to England in 1768, he stood unsuccessfully for the City of London, but was triumphantly returned for Middlesex. His outlawry was reversed on a purely technical point, and he was sentenced to twenty-two months' imprisonment and a fine of £1000. In prison he penned a charge against the secretary of state of instigating the massacre in St George's Fields, and this was made the pretext for his expulsion from parliament. He had been four times re-elected, when the House declared him ineligible. In 1771 he was elected sheriff for London and Middlesex; in 1774 he became Lord Mayor, and re-entered parliament as M.P. for Middlesex. In 1782 the resolutions invalidating his previous elections were expunged. He became chamberlain of the City in 1779, retired from parliament in 1790, and died 20th December 1797. See J. S. Watson, Biographies of John Wilkes and William Cobbett (1870); Thorold Rogers, Historical Gleanings (1870); Dilke, Papers of a Critic (1875); Daly, Dawn of Radicalism (1886); Fraser Rae, Wilkes, Sheridan, Fox (1873); and Percy Fitzgerald, Life and Times of John Wilkes (1888).

Wilkie, SIR DAVID, born at Cults manse in Fife, 18th Nov. 1785, in 1799 was sent to study in the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, and returning home in 1804 painted his 'Pitlessie Fair.' The great success of 'The Village Politicians' (1806) determined him to settle in London; next year saw the 'Blind Fiddler.' In 1809 he was elected A.R.A., and in 1811 R.A. In 1817 he visited Scott at Abbotsford, and painted the family group now in the Scottish National Gallery. His fame mainly rests on such pictures as the 'Card Players,' 'Rent Day,' 'Jew's Harp,' 'Village Festival,' 'Blind Man's Buff,' 'The Cut Finger,' 'Distraint for Rent,' 'The Penny Wedding,' 'Reading the Will,' &c., in which the homely humours of humble life are expressed with charming purity and transparency, his style including breadth, skilful technique, and elaborate finish. His genius is commonly held to have culminated in 'The Chelsea Pensioners listening to the News of Waterloo' (1820-21) for the Duke of Wellington. Subsequently he changed his style, sought to emulate the depth and richness of colouring of the old masters, and chose elevated and even heroic subjects, to the height of which he could never raise himself. A tour in Italy and Spain (1824) stimulated the new and unwise ambition. To his later period belong the 'Princess Doria,' 'The Maid of Saragossa,' 'The Two Spanish Monks,' 'The Preaching of John Knox,' 'Columbus in the Convent,' 'Napoleon and Pius VII.,' and 'Queen Victoria at her First Council.' He also painted portraits, and was successful as an etcher. In 1830 he was made Painter in Ordinary to His Majesty, and in 1836 knighted. In 1840, seeking health, he visited Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, but died on his voyage home (1st June 1841) off Gibraltar, and was buried at sea. See books on him by Allan Cunningham (1843), J. W. Mollett (1881), and Lord R. Sutherland-Gower (1902).

Wilkins, JOHN (1614-72), Bishop of Chester, born near Daventry, graduated B.A. from Magdalen Hall in 1631. As domestic chaplain he found time for studies in mathematics and mechanics, and was one of the founders of the Royal Society. He sided with the parliament, and was appointed Warden of Wadham. In 1656 he married a widowed sister of Oliver Cromwell, and in 1659 was appointed by Richard Cromwell Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Dispossessed at the Restoration, he soon recovered court favour, and became preacher at Gray's Inn, rector of St Lawrence Jewry, Dean of Ripon, and Bishop of Chester (1668). As an ecclesiastic he was tolerant and moderate. In his Discovery of a New World (1638) he discusses the possibility of communication by a flying-machine with the moon and its supposed inhabitants; the Discourse concerning a New Planet (1640) argues that our earth is one of the planets; Mercury, or the Secret and Swift Messenger, shows how a man may communicate with a friend at any distance; Mathematical Magic dates from 1648; the Essay towards a Real Character and a Philosophical Language (1668) is founded on Dalgarno's treatise.

Wilkins. MARY ELEANOR, was born at Randolph, Massachusetts, in 1862, in 1901 married Dr C. M. Freeman of New Jersey, and has published The Adventures of Ann Post (1886), A Humble Romance (1887), Pembroke (1894), A New England Nun, Madelon (1896), Jerome (1897), The Debtor (1905), and other novels and stories.

Wilkinson, SIR JOHN GARDNER, Egyptologist, born at Hardendale in Westmorland, 5th Oct. 1797, and educated at Harrow and Exeter College, Oxford, in 1821-33 made a complete survey of Egypt, publishing Materia Hieroglyphica (1828), Survey of Thebes (1830), Topography of Thebes (1835), and his famous Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians (1837-41; new ed. by Birch 1879). Knighted in 1839, he visited Egypt again in 1841 and 1843, as well as Syria, Constantinople, Tunis, Sicily, Dalmatia, and Montenegro. He paid a fourth visit to Egypt in 1848, a fifth in 1855, presented his antiquities to Harrow, and died 29th Oct. 1875. He wrote also on Dalmatia, modern Egypt, ancient Egyptian architecture, &c.

Willard, FRANCES ELIZABETH, a worker for temperance and the enfranchisement of women, was born at Churchville, New York, Sept. 28, 1839. She studied at the North-western University, Evanston, Ill., was professor of Æsthetics there, in 1874 became secretary of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and edited the Chicago Daily Post. Her books include many on temperance, &c., My Happy Half-Century (autobiographical, 1894), and A Wheel within a Wheel (1895). She died at New York, Feb. 18, 1898. See Life by Florence White (1899).

William I. 'the Conqueror,' was born at Falaise in 1027 or 1028, the bastard son of Robert III., Duke of Normandy, by Arletta, a tanner's daughter. On his father's death in 1035, the nobles accepted him as duke; but his youth was passed in difficulty and danger. In 1047 the lords of the western part of the duchy rebelled, but Henry I. of France came to his help, and the rebels were defeated at Val-ès-dunes. In 1051 he visited his cousin, Edward the Confessor, and received the promise of the English succession. He married Matilda, daughter of Baldwin V., Count of Flanders, in 1053. In the next ten years William repulsed two French invasions, and in 1063 conquered Maine. Probably in 1064 Harold (q. v.) was at his court, and swore to help him to gain the English crown on Edward's death. When, however, Edward died, in 1066, Harold became king. William laid his claim before the pope and Western Christendom. The pope approved his claim, and on 14th October William defeated Harold at the battle of Hastings or Senlac. Harold was slain, and William was crowned on 25th December. The west and north of England were subdued in 1068; but next year the north revolted, and William devastated the country between York and Durham. The constitution under William assumed a feudal aspect, the old national assembly becoming a council of the king's tenants-in-chief, and all title to land being derived from his grant. Domesday Book contains the land settlement. He brought the English Church into closer relations with Rome. The Conqueror's rule was stern and orderly. Passionately fond of hunting, he devastated a large tract in Hampshire to form the New Forest, and heavily punished any breach of his forest laws. In 1070 there was a rebellion in the Fen Country, and under the leadership of Hereward the rebels for some time held out in the Isle of Ely. English exiles were sheltered by the Scottish king, Malcolm, who plundered the northern shires; but William in 1072 compelled Malcolm to do him homage at Abernethy. In 1073 he reconquered Maine. He made a successful expedition into South Wales. His eldest son, Robert, rebelled against him in Normandy in 1079; and, having entered on a war with Philip I. of France in 1087, William burned Mantes. As he rode through the burning town his horse stumbled, and he received an injury, of which he died at Rouen on 9th September. He left Normandy to his son Robert, and England to William. See Freeman's Norman Conquest, ii. iii. iv., and his William the Conqueror; F. M. Stenton's William the Conqueror (1908); Palgrave's England and Normandy, iii.; Stubbs's Const. Hist. i.; Gneist's Const. Hist. i.

William II., called Rufus, third, and second surviving, son of William the Conqueror, was born before 1066. On his father's death in 1087 he was crowned king. The next year many of the Norman nobles in England rebelled against him in favour of his eldest brother Robert, Duke of Normandy. Rufus appealed to the English people for help, promising them good government and a relaxation of the forest laws and of fiscal burdens. The rebellion was suppressed, but he did not keep his promises, and oppressed them sore. Treating ecclesiastical benefices like lay fiefs, Rufus sold them, and kept them vacant, seizing their revenues during vacancy. The see of Canterbury had been vacant four years when, in 1093, he fell sick, repented, and appointed Anselm thereto; when he recovered he quarrelled with Anselm for maintaining the liberties of the church. Rufus warred with Robert in Normandy, but peace was made in 1091; and in 1096 the duchy was mortgaged to him. In 1098 he reconquered Maine, but failed to hold the whole of it. Malcolm, king of Scotland, invaded Northumberland in 1093, and was slain at Alnwick. Rufus thrice invaded Wales, twice with ill-success. As he was hunting in the New Forest on 2d August 1100 he was slain accidentally, as is probable, by an arrow shot by one Walter Tirel. He was buried in Winchester Cathedral. See Freeman's Reign of William Rufus (2 vols. 1882).

William III., posthumous son of William II. of Orange (1626-50) by Mary (1631-80), eldest daughter of Charles I. of England, was born at the Hague, 4th November 1650. On the murder of De Witt in 1672 he was chosen Stadhouder of the United Provinces. The republic was at this time carrying on an apparently hopeless contest with Louis XIV. of France; but by the valour and wisdom of William the war was in 1678 terminated by the advantageous treaty of Nimeguen. In 1677 William had married his cousin, the Princess Mary (born 30th April 1662), elder daughter by Anne Hyde of the Duke of York, afterwards James II. When James's tyranny had estranged from him the affections of his subjects, the eyes of Englishmen were turned towards the Stadhouder as their only hope; and on the day that the Seven Bishops were acquitted William was invited to come over and redress their grievances. On 5th November 1688 he landed at Torbay with an English and Dutch army of 15,000. Men of all parties quickly came over to him; in December James fled the kingdom; and, the throne having been declared vacant by the Convention Parliament, on 13th February 1689 William and Mary were proclaimed king and queen. James's adherents held out in Scotland and Ireland, but the fall of Dundee at Killiecrankie (July 1689) and the surrender of Limerick (October 1691) ended all resistance. William thus was left free for his continental campaigns, in which he found himself outmatched by Luxembourg. The latter's death in 1695 was a turning-point in the war, which was ended by the peace of Ryswick (1697). In spite of his sterling qualities, and of the debt that they owed him, he and his subjects were never in sympathy; his foreign birth, his reserve, his ill-health were against him. The death (28th Sept. 1694) of his wife materially injured his position. His schemes were thwarted by parliament; continual plots for his assassination were hatched by James's adherents; and the death in 1700 of Charles II. of Spain, and the succession of Philip of Anjou, was another blow to his policy. He pursued it, however, with unflagging vigour till his death, caused by the stumbling of his horse over a molehill, 8th March 1702. He left no children, and the crown passed to Anne, Mary's sister. During his reign the National Debt was commenced, the Bank of England established, the modern system of finance introduced, ministerial responsibility recognised, the standing army transferred to the control of parliament, the liberty of the press secured, and the British constitution established on a firm basis. See Histories of Burnet and Macaulay; the autobiographical Memoirs of Queen Mary, edited by Doebner (1885); and H. D. Traill's William III. (1888).

William IV., the 'sailor king,' third son of George III., was born at Buckingham Palace, 21st August 1765. He entered the navy in 1779, and saw some service in America and the West Indies. In 1789 he was created Duke of Clarence and St Andrews and Earl of Munster, with an allowance of £12,000 a-year. He was formally promoted through the successive ranks to that of Admiral of the Fleet (1811), and in 1827-28 he held the revived office of Lord High Admiral. From 1790 to 1811 he lived with the actress Mrs Jordan (q.v.), who bore him ten children; on 13th July 1818 he married Adelaide (1792-1849), eldest daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen. The two daughters born (1819 and 1820) of this marriage died in infancy. By the Duke of York's death in 1827 the Duke of Clarence became heir-presumptive to the throne, to which he succeeded at the death of his eldest brother, George IV., 26th June 1830. A Whig up to his accession, he then turned Tory, and did much to obstruct the passing of the first Reform Act (1832). The abolition of colonial slavery (1833), the reform of the poor-laws (1834), and the Municipal Reform Act (1835) were results of that great constitutional change. William died 20th June 1837, and was succeeded by his niece, Victoria. See, besides the articles on his premiers, GREY, MELBOURNE, and PEEL, the Duke of Buckingham's Courts and Cabinets of William IV. and Victoria (1861), the Greyville Memoirs, and Percy Fitzgerald's Life and Times of William IV. (1884).

William the Lion, king of Scotland, was born in 1143, grandson of David I., and brother of Malcolm IV., whom he succeeded in 1165. Whence he derived his designation is one of the mysteries of history. His predecessors had long contested with England the sovereignty of Northumberland; but under Malcolm these claims were virtually abandoned, and the king of Scots received, as an equivalent, the earldom of Huntingdon and other estates, holding of the English crown. William attended Henry of England in his continental wars, and is supposed to have pressed for a portion of the old disputed districts. In his disappointment he invaded them, and on 13th July 1174 fell near Alnwick Castle into the hands of an English party. He was conveyed to Normandy, and there, by the treaty of Falaise, consented, as the price of his liberation, to perform homage for his kingdom. The treaty was revoked in 1189 by Richard I. of England in consideration of a payment of 10,000 marks. William had disputes with the church, but founded in 1178 the abbey of Arbroath. He died in 1214.

William the Silent, Prince of Orange (1533-84), was born, the Count of Nassau's son, at the castle of Dillenburg in Nassau. He inherited from his cousin René the independent principality of Orange (near Avignon) and the family estates in Holland; and by Charles V. before his abdication he was made commander-in-chief in the Netherlands and 'Stadtholder' of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, though only twenty-two years of age. He opposed the oppressive policy of Philip II., and resigned his offices (1567). Proclaimed a traitor by Alva and put under the ban by Philip, he professed Protestantism, was chosen by the Netherlands commander by sea and land, and was the soul of the successful rising against Spanish tyranny. Till the capture of Brieg by the Gueux (1572), the Spaniards were absolute masters of the Netherlands; the union of the northern provinces was accomplished in 1579; and in 1584 the free Netherlands had renounced for ever their allegiance to Philip or to Spain. But on 10th July 1584 William was shot at Delft by Balthasar Gerard. He was called 'the Silent' because of his ability to keep a state secret (specifically, Henry II.'s scheme to massacre all the Protestants of France and the Netherlands, confided to him by Henry when William was a hostage in France in 1560), not for lack of affability. See Motley's Histories; Lives by Barrett (1883), Ruth Putnam (1895), and F. Harrison (1897); Juste, Guillaume le Taciturne (1883); and German Lives by Klose (1864) and Kolligs (1885).

William I., seventh king of Prussia and first German emperor, second son of Frederick-William III., was born at Berlin, 22d March 1797. In 1814 he received his 'baptism of fire' on French territory at Bar-sur-Aube, and entered Paris with the allies. During the king's absence in Russia he directed Prussian military affairs. In 1829 he married Princess Augusta of Saxe-Weimar (1811-90). On the accession of his brother, Frederick-William IV., in 1840, he became heir-presumptive. In 1844 he visited England, and formed a friendship with Queen Victoria and the Prince-Consort. During the revolution of 1848 his attitude towards the people made him very unpopular. He was obliged to quit Prussia, and took up his quarters at the Prussian Legation in London. In two months, however, he received his recall. In 1849 he subdued the disaffection in Baden. He was appointed regent (1858) in consequence of the prolonged ill-health of the king, on whose death, 2d Jan. 1861, he succeeded as William I. He soon made plain his intention of consolidating the throne and strengthening the army. A few months after his accession he narrowly escaped assassination. Prince Bismarck was placed at the head of the ministry, with Roon, the author of the new army system, as war minister. The scheme was very unpalatable to the parliament, but the minister-president forced it upon the nation, with the necessary increased expenditure, by overriding the constitution. In 1864 the Sleswick-Holstein difficulty led to a war with Denmark, in which the Prussian and Austrian troops were victorious; but in 1866 the allies quarrelled over the spoils, and struggled for the supremacy over the German states. Austria was crushed at Sadowa, and Prussia gained in territory and prestige. The affair of the duchy of Luxemburg nearly led to a war between France and Prussia in 1867, but the difficulty was adjusted by the treaty of London. In 1870 the inevitable struggle between France and Prussia was precipitated. The Spanish throne having become vacant, Prince Leopold, son of the Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, was put forward as a candidate. As King William was the head of the House of Hohenzollern, this gave great umbrage to France. Although the candidature was withdrawn, Napoleon III. forced a quarrel on Prussia, by making impossible demands. William took the field on July 31, and in the deadly struggle which ensued, the French forces were defeated almost everywhere; Napoleon capitulated at Sedan; and by the end of September Paris was invested. At Versailles on 18th January 1871 William was proclaimed German emperor. Peace was signed on February 26. An Austro-German alliance of 1871 was strengthened in 1873 by the adhesion of the czar. The rapid rise of Socialism in Germany led to severe repressive measures, and in 1878 the emperor's life was twice attempted by Socialists, as again in 1883. The veteran monarch died, nearly ninety-one years old, 9th March 1888. William I., though holding tenaciously to the prerogatives of the kingly office, was of a simple and unassuming personal character. See Lives by A. Forbes (1889) and Barnett Smith (1887); Simon (trans. from French, 1886); German Lives by Schmidt and Otto, and Oncken; Whitman's Imperial Germany (1892); and books cited at BISMARCK.

William II., third German emperor and ninth king of Prussia, was born at Berlin, 27th Jan. 1859, son of the Crown-prince Frederick and the Princess Victoria (Princess Royal) of England. He underwent a systematic and thorough military training, and was early drilled in administrative methods and governmental usages. Succeeding his father, Frederick III., in 1888, he showed in all departments of imperial government an irrepressible and exuberant energy. He made a series of tours to foreign courts—St Petersburg, Copenhagen, Rome, &c., and repeatedly visited his grandmother at Windsor. His autocratic attitude led to the resignation (1890) of Prince Bismarck (who strongly disapproved concessions to state-Socialism); and he early showed himself to be restless, capricious, and strong-willed, with an overweening sense of the divine right of his imperial power. He often speaks very unadvisedly with his lips on public occasions. At once a lord of hosts, a yachtsman, a poet, a composer, a painter, and a preacher, he has had to endure the defeat or withdrawal of several favoured schemes as reactionary or impossible—a religious education bill, several anti-Socialist measures, and a vast increase of the fleet (£21,500,000 had been spent on the navy in 1898–1905). Features of the reign have been the succession of chancellors, the increase of the army, the growth of trade and commerce, colonial expansion, lese-majesty prosecutions, and the embitterment of relations with England. By the attitude of Germany towards Turkey before and after the Greek war the Concert of Europe was much hampered, even if the Triple Alliance has been formally maintained. As a grandson of the Queen, he was popular in England till his famous Transvaal telegram (1896) was held to reveal an enemy. By his marriage (1881) with a princess of Sleswick-Holstein (of the elder branch of the House of Oldenburg) he has had six sons and, in 1892, a daughter. See Charles Lowe, The German Emperor (1895).

William of Champeaux (1070–1122), the head of a famous school of logic in Paris, was the founder of scholastic Realism.

William of Malmesbury. See MALMESBURY.

William of Newbury (c. 1135–c. 1200), chronicler, one of the chief authorities for the reign of Henry II., was a native of Bridlington. His Historia Rerum Anglicarum extends from 1066 to 1198. It was edited by Hans Hamilton (1856).

William of Norwich, apparently the prototype of the Christian boys reported to have been crucified by Jews (see HUGH OF LINCOLN). The Life and Miracles of St William of Norwich, edited in 1897 by Jessopp and James, is a story from a 12th-century MS. of a boy said to have been martyred 22d March 1144 or 1145.

William of Tyre, historian, born about 1137, became archdeacon of Tyre in 1167, and archbishop in 1175. He was tutor to Baldwin, son of King Amalric, and one of the six bishops representing the Latin Church of the East at the Lateran Council (1179). His Historia Rerum in Partibus Transmarinis deals with the affairs of the East in 1127–84; a 13th-century French translation was edited by P. Paris (1880). Another work was Historia de Orientalibus Principibus.

William of Wykeham. See WYKEHAM.

Williams, ISAAC (1802–65), Tractarian, born near Aberystwith, from Harrow passed to Trinity College, Oxford; in 1822 made the acquaintance of Keble and Hurrell Froude; and in 1829 was ordained to an Oxfordshire curacy. Elected in 1831 a fellow of Trinity, he was subsequently curate to Newman, and at Bisle; and for seventeen years lived at Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire. He wrote religious poetry, but is best remembered as the author of Tract 80, on 'Reserve in Religious Teaching.' See Autobiography (1892).

Williams, JOHN (1796–1839), the martyr of Erromango, was born at Tottenham, and, sent by the London Missionary Society in 1816 to the Society Islands, laboured in Raiatea with marvellous success. Going in 1823 to Raratonga, he had ere long Christianised the whole Hervey group, and during the next four years visited many of the South Sea Islands, including Samoa. In 1834 he returned to England, superintended the printing of his Raratongan New Testament, and raised £4000 to equip a missionary-ship. In 1838 he visited many of his stations, and sailed for the New Hebrides, where he was killed and eaten by the natives of Erromango. He published his Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in 1837. See Memoir by Prout (1843).

Williams, JOHN CARVELL, born at Stepney, 17th September 1821, studied law, was for thirty years secretary of the Liberation Society, and in 1855–86 was Radical M.P. for South Nottingham.

Williams, SIR MONIER MONIER. Sanskrit scholar, was born at Bombay, 12th Nov. 1819, took his B.A. at Oxford in 1844, and was professor of Sanskrit at Haileybury 1844–58, master at Cheltenham 1858–60, and then Boden professor of Sanskrit at Oxford. He was knighted in 1886, at the opening of the Indian Institute, established mainly through his energy, and completed in 1896. His books include Sanskrit grammars (1846 and 1860) and dictionaries (1854 and 1872), editions of the Sikuntalā (1853) and other Sanskrit texts, Rudiments of Hindustani (1858), Indian Epic Poetry (1863), Indian Wisdom (1875; 4th ed. 1893), Hinduism (1877), Modern India (1878), Religious Thought and Life in India (1883), The Holy Bible and the Sacred Books of the East (1887), Buddhism (1890), and Reminiscences of Old Haileybury (1894). He died at Cannes, 11th April 1899.

Williams, Sir Roger, an Elizabethan soldier, fought bravely in the Netherlands under Norris and Leicester, rejected Parma's attempts to seduce him from his allegiance, and died 1595.

Williams, Roger (c. 1600–83), apostle of Toleration and founder of Rhode Island, was born in Wales, and educated at the Charterhouse and Pembroke College, Cambridge. He took Anglican orders, became an extreme Puritan, and emigrated to New England in 1631. He refused to join the congregation at Boston because it would not make public repentance for having been in communion with the Church of England; he therefore went to Salem, but was soon in trouble for denying the right of magistrates to punish Sabbath-breaking. For his opposition to the New England theocracy he was driven from Salem, and took refuge at Plymouth. Two years later he returned to Salem, only to meet renewed persecution and banishment (1635). He escaped to the shores of Narragansett Bay, where he purchased lands of the Indians, founded the city of Providence (1636), and established a pure democracy. Having adopted the tenet of adult baptism, he established (1639) the first Baptist church in America. In 1643 and 1651 he came to England to procure a charter for his colony, and published a Key into the Language of America (1643), The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience (1644), The Bloody Tenent yet more Woudy by Mr Cotton's Endeavour to wash it White in the Blood of the Lamb (1652), Spiritual Life and Health, and The Hiring Ministry none of Christ's. He returned to Rhode Island in 1654, and was president of the colony till 1658. He refused to persecute the Quakers, but had a famous controversy with them—recorded in George Fox digged out of his Burrowes (1676). See Memoirs by Knowles (1834), Gammell (1845), Elton (1853), Guild (1866), Dexter (1876), and Strans (1894). His Letters were edited by Bartlett (1882); his Works by the Narragansett Club (1866–74).

Williams, Rowland (1817–80), Liberal theologian, born at Halkyn in Flintshire, and educated at Eton, became fellow and tutor of King's College, Cambridge, in 1850 vice-principal and Hebrew professor at Lampeter College, and in 1859 vicar of Broad-Chalke near Salisbury; hither he retired in 1862 after the storm caused by his contribution, 'Bunsen's Biblical Researches,' to Essays and Reviews. His chief books are Rational Godliness (1855), Christianity and Hinduism (1856), Broad-Chalke Sermon-Essays (1867), The Hebrew Prophets (1868–71), Psalms and Litanies (1872). See Life by his widow (1874).

Williams, Sir William Fenwick, G.C.B. (1800–83), born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, the hero of Kars, had, as colonel of engineers, been engaged in defining the Turco-Persian boundary when in 1854 he was appointed British Military Commissioner with the Turkish army in Asia. He reached Kars in September, and found the Turks utterly demoralised; but with indomitable energy he corrected abuses, got rid of corrupt officials, and became idolised by the Turkish army. In June 1855 the Russians, under Mouravieff, appeared before Kars. After one of the most heroic defences on record, Williams had to surrender on 25th Nov. He was detained prisoner in Russia till the peace, when he was given a baronetcy and an annuity of £1000. See works on the siege by Sandwith (1856) and Laurence Oliphant (1856).

Williamson, Alexander William, F.R.S., LL.D. (1824–1904), chemist, born in London, in 1849–87 was professor of Chemistry at University College, London, and wrote Chemistry for Students.

Willibald (700–781), a Northumbrian, and brother of St Walpurga (q.v.), made the pilgrimage to Palestine, settled as monk at Monte Cassino, became the companion of St Boniface, and died Bishop of Eichstatt.

Willibrod, or Wilbrord, St (c. 658–730), born in Northumbria, became a Benedictine, and, sent about 690 as missionary to Friesland, was made Bishop of Utrecht, and laboured with the utmost zeal and success. See Life by Thijm (1863).

Willis, Nathaniel Parker (1806–67), born at Portland, Me., issued several volumes of poetry, established the American Monthly Magazine, in 1831 visited Europe, and contributed to the New York Mirror his Pencilings by the Way. Appointed attaché to the American legation at Paris, he visited Greece and Turkey, and returned to England in 1837. He contributed to the London New Monthly his Inkings of Adventure (collected 1836), and published Letters from under a Bridge (1840). In 1844 he engaged in editing the Daily Mirror, revisited Europe, and published Dashes at Life with a Free Pencil (1845). He returned to New York in 1846, and established the Home Journal, to which he contributed most of the following works: in 1850, People I have Met and Life Here and There; 1851, Hurrygraphs, Life of Jenny Lind; 1853, Fun Jottings, A Summer Cruise in the Mediterranean; 1854, A Health-trip to the Tropics, Famous Persons and Places; 1855, The Rag-bag; 1857, Paul Fane; 1859, The Convalescent. See Life (1885) by H. A. Beers, who edited Selections from his prose writings (1885).—His sister, Sara Payson Willis, 'Fanny Fern' (1811–72), was a popular writer. See her Life (1873) by her husband, James Parton.

Willis, Thomas (1621–73), physician, was for a time Sedleian professor of Natural Philosophy at Oxford, but became famous as a physician in Westminster. He wrote on the plague.

Willoughby, Sir Hugh, explorer, of whom little is certain save his unfortunate fate. In 1553 an expedition was fitted out by the merchants of London 'for the discovery of regions, dominions, islands, and places unknown,' and Willoughby was appointed its commander. On 10th May he sailed from Deptford with three vessels, one commanded by Richard Chancellor (q.v.). They crossed the North Sea in company, and sighted the coast of Norway. In September Chancellor's ship parted company in a storm with the two others, which reached Russian Lapland. Here Sir Hugh determined to pass the winter, but here with his sixty-two companions he perished of scurvy. Next year Russian fishermen found the ships with the dead bodies and the commander's journal (published in Hakluyt).

Willoughby, Robert, Lord, was with Henry V. at Agincourt, at Verneuil in 1424, relieved Alençon in 1425, but had to surrender Paris in 1436.

Wills, William Gorman (1828–91), play-writer, born in Kilkenny co., studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and started as an artist. His Man o'

Airlie (1806) was followed by Charles I. (1872), Jane Shore (1876), Olivia, Claudian (1885), &c. He also wrote novels. See Life by F. Wills (1898).

Wills, W. J. (1834-61). See BUNKE, R. O.

Willughby, FRANCIS (1635-72), naturalist, the son of Sir Francis Willughby, studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and then started on the memorable continental tour (1663-64) with John Ray (q.v.), collecting zoological specimens. Ray edited and translated his Ornithologia (1676-78) and edited his Historia Piscium (1686).

Wilmot. See ROCHESTER (EARL OF).

Wilson, ALEXANDER, ornithologist, born at Paisley, July 6, 1766, travelled as a pedlar, and published poems (1790) and Watty and Meg (1792). Prosecuted for a lampoon, he sailed for America in 1794. He got work in Philadelphia, travelled as a pedlar in New Jersey, and was a school-teacher in Pennsylvania. His skill in drawing birds led him to make a collection of all the birds of America. In October 1804 he set out on his first excursion, and wrote The Foresters, a Poem. In 1806 he was employed on the American edition of Rees's Cyclopaedia. He soon prevailed upon the publisher to undertake an American Ornithology, and in 1808-10 he brought out the first two volumes. In 1811 he made a canoe voyage down the Ohio, and travelled overland through the Lower Mississippi Valley from Nashville to New Orleans. He died at Philadelphia, August 23, 1813. Vols. viii. and ix. were published after his death by Ord, his assistant. The work was continued by Charles Lucien Bonaparte (1828-33); and an edition by Jardine (1832) has been more than once reprinted. See Lives by Crichton (1816), Ord (1828), Hetherington (1831), Jared Sparks (1851), Brightwell (1861), and Paton (1863), and a Sketch prefixed to Grosart's edition of Poems and Miscellaneous Prose (1876).

Wilson, ANDREW, Ph.D., F.L.S., lecturer on physiology to the Combe and other trusts, was born at Edinburgh, 30th September 1852, and educated there. He edited Health, and has published zoological manuals, Leisure Time Studies, Chapters on Evolution, and Some Reminiscences of a Lecturer (1898).

Wilson, ANDREW. See WILSON, JOHN, No. 3.

Wilson, SIR DANIEL, LL.D., archeologist, born in Edinburgh, 5th Jan. 1816, and educated at the university, had been secretary to the Scottish Society of Antiquaries when in 1853 he became professor of History and English Literature at Toronto. President of the university from 1881, he was knighted in 1888, and died 8th August 1892. Amongst his works are Edinburgh in the Olden Time (1847; new ed. 1892), Oliver Cromwell (1843), Prehistoric Annals of Scotland (1851; 2d ed. 1863), Prehistoric Man (1862; rewritten 1876), Chatterton (1869), Caliban: the Missing Link (1873), Spring Wild Flowers (poems, 1875), Reminiscences of Old Edinburgh (1878), Anthropology (1885), Left-handedness (1891), and The Lost Atlantis (1892).

Wilson, SIR ERASMUS, F.R.S., LL.D. (1809-84), was a skilful dissector at the College of Surgeons in London, but was best known as a specialist on skin diseases. He published Anatomist's Vademecum, Book of Diseases of the Skin, Report on Leprosy, and Egypt of the Past. The great wealth he acquired by his practice he bestowed largely in benefactions to the poor and to science, and in promoting Egyptian research. He brought Cleopatra's Needle to London in 1878 at a cost of £10,000. He was president of the College of Surgeons, and was knighted in 1881.

Wilson, FLORENCE. See VOLUSENUS.

Wilson, GEORGE (1818-59), chemist, younger brother of Sir Daniel Wilson, lectured on chemistry, and from 1855 was professor of Technology in Edinburgh University. He was also director of the Industrial Museum. He wrote Text-book of Chemistry (1850), Life of Cavendish (1851), Life of Dr John Reid (1852), Researches in Colour-blindness (1855), The Five Gateways of Knowledge (1856), Counsels of an Invalid (1862), and Religio Chemici (1862). See Memoir by his sister (new ed. 1862).

Wilson, HENRY (1812-73), vice-president of the United States, was the son of a farm-labourer at Farmington, N.H. Born Jeremiah Jones Colbath, he changed the name when he came of age, worked as a shoemaker, became prominent as an Abolitionist in the 30's, and was elected to the Massachusetts legislature and state senate. He was an active leader of the Free-soilers, assisted to form the new Republican party, sat in the U.S. senate 1855-73, and then became vice-president of the United States. During the civil war he was chairman of the military committee. He wrote Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America (1872-75). See Life by Russell and Nason (1872).

Wilson, HORACE HAYMAN (1786-1860), Sanskritist, born in London, in 1808 went to India as assistant-surgeon. His knowledge of chemistry led to his employment in the Calcutta mint as Leyden's assistant, his mastery of Sanskrit to his appointment as secretary of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. In 1833 he became Boden professor of Sanskrit in Oxford, and soon after librarian at the East India House. He published a verse translation of Kālidāsa's Meghadūta (1813), a Sanskrit-English Dictionary (1819), Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus (1827), Vishnu-Purāṇa (1840), a Sanskrit Grammar (1841), British India 1805-35 (1848), &c. His collected works were edited by R. Rost and F. Hall (1861-67).

Wilson, JAMES (1805-60), born at Hawick, settled in business in London, and became an authority on the Corn-laws and the currency, founded the Economist, entered parliament as a Liberal in 1847, and was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Vice-president of the Board of Trade, and member of the Council of India.

Wilson, JOHN, 'Christopher North,' was born at Paisley, 18th May 1785, the eldest son of a rich manufacturer. In 1797 his father left him £50,000, and he was sent to Glasgow University. In 1803 he went up to Magdalen College, Oxford, and became famous both for his intellectual gifts and as an athlete. In 1807 he settled in Westmorland, where he purchased Elleray, overlooking Windermere, and associated with Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, De Quincey, and the rest. In May 1811 he married and devoted himself to poetry, in 1812 publishing his Isle of Palms, and in 1816 The City of the Plague. In 1815 the loss of his patrimony through an uncle's unjust stewardship obliged him to give up Elleray and settle in Edinburgh. He was called to the Scottish bar, but on the starting in 1817 of Blackwood's Magazine he proffered his services; and he and Lockhart were the soul of 'Maga's' success. Lockhart was withdrawn in 1826 to London; and Wilson was, not formally but practically, editor. In 1820 he was elected to the Edinburgh chair of Moral Philosophy. He died 3d April 1854. His works, edited by his son-in-law, Prof. Ferrier (1855-58), include Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life (1822), The Trials of Margaret Lindsay (1825), and The Foresters (1825), as well as thirty-nine out of seventy of the 'Noctes Ambrosianæ.'

which appeared in Blackwood during 1822-35, and enjoyed an amazing vogue. (A selection by Skelton appeared in 1876.) See the Memoir by his daughter, Mrs Gordon (1862); an article by Watts-Dunton in the Athenaeum (July 8, 1876); Prof. Saintsbury's Essays (1891); and Mrs Oliphant's work on the Blackwoods (1897).

Wilson, JOHN (1800-49), born in Edinburgh, was first a compositor, then a precentor, and for years a favourite operatic tenor in London; and finally gave entertainments in Britain and America as an unsurpassed singer of Scotch songs.

Wilson, JOHN, F.R.S. (1804-75), Indian missionary, born, a farmer's son, near Lauder, and educated at Edinburgh University, went in 1828 to Bombay as a missionary; and here he laboured—from 1843 under the Free Church of Scotland—till his death. An active promoter of education, legal reform, toleration, and philanthropic movements of every kind, he was much consulted by government, especially during the crisis of 1857. He was twice president of the Bombay branch of the Asiatic Society, and was vice-chancellor of Bombay University. His chief writings were The Parsi Religion (1843) and Lands of the Bible (1847). See Life by Dr George Smith (1878).—His son, ANDREW (1830-81), was born at Bombay, and studied at Edinburgh and Tübingen. He was for three years editor of the China Mail, and later of the Bombay Gazette; wrote much for Blackwood and other serials; and is best known for his account of Gordon's Ever-Victorious Army (1868) and his book on the Himalayas, The Abode of Snow (1875).

Wilson, JOHN MACKAY (1804-35), born in Tweedmouth, after writing dramas and poems and lecturing, became in 1832 editor of the Berwick Advertiser, but had already formed habits of intemperance. His Tales of the Borders (6 vols. 1834-40) were originally issued in weekly numbers. After Wilson's death they were continued for his widow with Alexander Leighton (1800-74) as editor. Among the writers were Leighton, [Sir] Theodore Martin, Hugh Miller, 'Delta,' Thomas Gillespie, and James Maidment. A new edition by Leighton extended to 20 vols. (1857-59); his 1869 revision contained four volumes more.

Wilson, RICHARD (1714-82), landscape-painter, born at Penegoes rectory, Montgomeryshire, after a visit to Italy (1749-56), forsook portrait-painting for landscape. In London in 1760 he exhibited his 'Niobe,' and secured rank amongst the first painters of his time. Famous also was his 'View of Rome from the Villa Madama.' In 1776 he became librarian to the Royal Academy.

Wilson, SIR ROBERT THOMAS (1777-1849), born in London, having served in Belgium, against the Irish rebels (1798), and in the campaign of the Helder, commanded Abercromby's cavalry in Egypt, helped to conquer the Cape in 1806, and went with a mission to Prussia. In the Peninsula he helped to train the Portuguese army, and commanded a Spanish brigade at Talavera. He was attached in 1812 to the Russian army, in Germany and France was in the camp of the allies, and at Lützen commanded the Prussian reserve. Involved in Queen Caroline's affairs, he was dismissed the army, but reinstated. In 1841 he became general, in 1842-49 was governor of Gibraltar, and in 1818-31 sat as a Liberal for Southwark. He wrote a History of the British Expedition to Egypt, State of the British Military Force (1804), Campaigns in Poland (1810), and The Military Power of Russia (1817). See his Private Diary (1861) and the Life by Randolph (1863).

Wilson, THOMAS (1663-1755), born at Burton in Cheshire, studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and, chaplain to the Earl of Derby, became Bishop of Sodor and Man in 1697. For fifty-eight years he governed his diocese with constant care. His Principles of Christianity (1707), commonly called the Maux Catechism, and his Instruction for the Indians were combined in The Knowledge of Christianity made Easy. Better known are his Short Instructions for the Lord's Supper and Sacra Privata. Keble edited his works and wrote his Life.

Wilson, THOMAS WOODROW, born at Staunton, Virginia, in 1856, studied at Princeton and Johns Hopkins, practised law at Atlanta, lectured at Bryn-mawr and Princeton, became president of Princeton in 1910, and governor of New Jersey in 1911, and in 1912 was chosen Democratic candidate for the presidency of the United States.

Winchilsea, ANNE FINCH, COUNTESS OF, poetess, was daughter of Sir W. Kingsmill, and wife of Heneage Finch, who succeeded as fourth Earl of Winchilsea in 1712. Her longest poem, on 'Spleen,' in Cowley's manner, was printed in 1701; her 'Miscellany Poems' in 1713. She died in 1720.

Winkelmann, JOHANN JOACHIM, was born 9th Dec. 1717 at Stendal in Prussian Saxony. For a time a private tutor, rector of a school, and librarian, he devoted himself to the history of art, and turning Roman Catholic, was librarian to a cardinal at Rome (1755), having published a treatise on the imitation of the antique (1754). In 1758 he examined the remains of Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Pæstum, and went to Florence. The fruits of his studies appeared in his treatise on ancient architecture (1762), in the great work of his life, the epoch-making Geschichte der Kunst des Alterthums (1764), and in Monumenti Antichi Inciditi (1766). In 1763 he was made superintendent of Roman antiquities. After a visit to Munich and Vienna, he was murdered by a fellow-traveller at Trieste, 8th June 1768. The best edition of his works is that by Eiselein (1825-29). See Life by Justi (1866-73).

Windham, WILLIAM, statesman, born at London, May 3, 1750, studied at Eton, Glasgow, and Oxford, acquired notoriety (1778) as an opponent of Lord North, and in 1784 was returned for Norwich. In 1783 he was principal secretary to Lord Northington, Lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He followed Burke in his view of the French Revolution, and in 1794 became Secretary-at-war under Pitt. He went out with Pitt in 1801, and denounced Addington's peace of Amiens (1801) in a speech of splendid eloquence. This lost him his seat for Norwich, but he was elected for St Maves in Cornwall, and on the return of the Grenville party to power (Jan. 1806) became War and Colonial secretary. He helped Cobbett to start his Political Register (1802), carried a scheme for limited service in the army (1806), and in 1806 was returned by New Romney, and in 1807 by Higham Ferrers. He went out when the Portland administration was formed. He died June 4, 1810. Windham was a member of the famous Literary Club, and stood by Johnson's deathbed. His brilliant talents were neutralised by an intellectual timidity, a morbid self-consciousness, and a fondness for paradox. His speeches were collected in 1806, with Life by Amyot; his Diary 1784-1810 was edited by Mrs Henry Baring (1866).

Windischgrätz, PRINCE (1787-1862), Austrian field-marshal, suppressed the revolution of 1848-49 at Prague and Vienna, and defeated the Hungarians repeatedly, but was superseded after his defeat by them at Gödöllo. [Vin-dish-graytz.]

Windthorst, LUDWIG (1812-91), Catholic politician, was born near Osnabrück, and became distinguished as advocate and politician in Hanover. After the absorption of Hanover by Prussia, he became leader of the Ultramontanes in the German parliament, and chief opponent of Bismarck during the Kulturkampf.

Winer, GEORG BENEDIKT (1789-1858), New Testament scholar, born at Leipzig, became a professor of Theology there, at Erlangen in 1823, and at Leipzig again in 1832. His still unequalled Grammar of New Testament Greek (1821; 7th ed. by Länemann, 1867) has been often translated. No less admirable are his Biblisches Realwörterbuch (1820; 3d ed. 1847-48) and Handbuch der theologischen Literatur (1821; 3d ed. 1838-40). Other works are a Comparison of the Doctrines of the Churches (1824; trans. 1873) and a Chaldean grammar (1824; trans. 1845). [Vee'ner.]

Winfried. See BONIFACE.

Winfred, St., a noble British maiden, beheaded by Prince Caradog for repelling his unholy proposals. The head rolled down a hill, and where it stopped a spring gushed forth—famous still as a place of pilgrimage, Holywell in Flintshire. The head was replaced by St Beuno.

Winkelried, ARNOLD VON, knight of Unterwalden, at the battle of Sempach (9th July 1386), when the Swiss failed to break the compact line of Austrian spears, is said to have grasped as many pikes as he could reach, buried them in his bosom, and borne them by his weight to the earth. His comrades rushed into the breach, slaughtered the Austrians like sheep, and gained a decisive victory.

Winkworth, CATHERINE (1827-78), brought up near Manchester, translated many German hymns (her Lyra Germanica, 1855, has been often reissued) and the Life of Fliedner.—Her sister, SUSANNA (1820-84), also translated from the German and promoted the higher education of women.

Winslow, EDWARD (1595-1655), born at Droitwich, sailed in the Mayflower, and from 1624 was assistant-governor or governor of the Plymouth colony, which he described and defended in Good News from New England (1624), Hypocrisie Unmasked (1646), and New England's Salamander (1647). Sent by Cromwell against the West Indies, he died at sea.—His son, JOSIAH (1629-80), was assistant-governor 1657-73, and then governor. In 1675 he was chosen general-in-chief of the United Colonies.—His grandson, JOHN (1702-74), carried out the removal of the Acadians; and JOHN ANCRUM WINSLOW (1811-73), descendant of one of Edward Winslow's brothers, commanded the Kearsarge in her action with the Alabama.

Winslow, FORBES BENIGNUS (1810-74), London physician and specialist in insanity.

Winsor, JUSTIN (1831-97), born at Boston, Mass., studied at Harvard and Heidelberg; was librarian at Boston 1868-77, and then at Harvard; and published bibliographical works, Memorial History of Boston (1880-81), Narrative History of America (1884-90), and a Life of Columbus (1891).

Winstanley, HENRY, architect, perished with his (the first) Eddystone Lighthouse in 1703.

Wint, PETER DE (1784-1849), water-colourist, was born, of Dutch descent, at Stone, Staffordshire. His fame rests on his water-colour illustrations of English landscape, English architecture, and English country-life; among them are 'The Cricketers,' 'Lincoln Cathedral,' 'The Hay Harvest,' 'Nottingham,' 'Richmond Hill,' and 'Cows in Water.' 'A Cornfield' and 'A Woody Landscape' are oils at South Kensington. See Memoir by Armstrong (1888) and Redgrave's David Cox and Peter de Wint (1891).

Winter, JAN WILLEM DE (1750-1812), Dutch admiral from 1795, was defeated by Duncan at Camperdown in 1797.

Winter, JOHN STRANGE, is the pseudonym of Henrietta Eliza Vaughan Palmer (1856-1911), born at York, daughter of the Rev. H. V. Palmer. Married in 1884 to Arthur Stannard, C.E., she had written Cavalry Life (1881) and Regimental Legends (1883), when Bootles' Baby (1885) made her pen-name known. Thereafter she wrote about a hundred stories, many dealing with the soldier's life (Mignon's Secret, Wanted a Wife, &c.).

Winthrop, JOHN (1588-1649), born at Groton in Suffolk, was bred to the law, and in 1629 was appointed governor of Massachusetts colony. He was re-elected governor, with brief intervals, during his life, and had more influence probably than any other man in forming the political institutions of the northern states of America. The first part of his Journal was published in 1790, and the whole in 1825-26 (new ed. with additions, 1853). See Life and Letters, by R. C. Winthrop (1864-67).—His eldest son, JOHN (1606-76), governor of Connecticut, went to America in 1631, became a magistrate in Massachusetts, in 1635 went to Connecticut, and founded New London in 1646. In 1657 he was elected governor, and, except for one year, held that post till his death. He obtained from Charles II, a charter uniting the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven, and was named first governor under it; and he was the father of the paper-currency in America.—His son, JOHN, known as Fitz-John (1639-1707), served under Monk and in the Indian wars, was agent in London for Connecticut (1693-97), and governor of the colony from 1698. See Winthrop Papers (Mass. Hist. Soc. 1889).—JOHN, LL.D., F.R.S. (1714-79), physicist, descendant of the first Governor Winthrop, was born at Boston, and in 1738 became professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy at Harvard. In 1740 he observed the transit of Mercury. He published papers on earthquakes, comets, &c.—ROBERT CHARLES, LL.D. (1809-94), orator, descendant of the first Governor Winthrop, was admitted to the bar in 1831, and was in the state legislature 1834-40, then in congress, and in 1847-49 its Speaker. In 1850-51 he was senator from Massachusetts. He published Addresses and Speeches (1852-86); a Life of the first John Winthrop; and Washington, Bowdoin, and Franklin (1876). See Memoir by son (1897).—THEODORE (1828-61), the second John's descendant, born at New Haven, studied at Yale, was admitted to the bar (1855), but, volunteering in the civil war, fell in battle at Great Bethel. His novels include Cecil Dreeme (1861), John Brent (1861), and Edwin Brothertoft (1862).

Winzet, NINIAN (1518-92), born at Renfrew, and ordained priest in 1540, about 1552 became schoolmaster at Linlithgow, and then provost of the collegiate church there. At the Reformation (1560) he was deprived of his offices, came to Edinburgh, and as a Catholic wrote his Tractatus. Forced to quit Scotland in 1563, he held office in the University of Paris. In 1574 he removed to the English College of Douay, and in 1577 became abbot at Ratisbon. See Hewison's edition of his Works (Scottish Text Soc. 1891). [Win-yet.]

Wiseman, NICHOLAS PATRICK, Cardinal, was born 2d August 1802 at Seville, of an Irish family settled in Spain. He was brought up at Waterford and Ushaw, entered the English College at Rome, received holy orders in 1825, and became rector of the college. He published Horæ Syriacæ (1828), Lectures on Science and Revealed Religion (1836), and The Doctrines of the Catholic Church (1836). He established the Dublin Review (1836), and in 1840 was named Coadjutor Vicar-apostolic and president of St Mary's College at Oscott. In 1846 he was transferred to the London district. His appointment by the pope to be Roman Catholic archbishop of Westminster and cardinal called forth a storm of religious excitement, which led to the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Act, when he published his conciliatory Appeal on the Catholic Hierarchy. Among his many works were The Ideal Presence in the Eucharist (1836); Lectures on the Ceremonies of Holy Week (1839); Essays on Various Subjects (1853); Fabiola, or a Church of the Catacombs (1854); Sermons (1864); and tracts on literary subjects. He died 15th Feb. 1865. See Memoir by G. White (1865) and Life by Wilfrid Ward (2 vols. 1897).

Wiseman, RICHARD (d. 1679), surgeon to Charles II., was called 'the father of English surgery,' and wrote Seven Chirurgical Treatises. See monograph by Sir T. Longmore (1892).

Wishart, GEORGE, born early in the 16th century, belonged to a Kincardineshire family, his eldest brother King's Advocate. In 1538 he was schoolmaster in Montrose, where he incurred a charge of heresy for teaching the Greek New Testament. In 1539 he was in Bristol, and had to abjure heresy again. The next few years he spent on the Continent, and translated the Swiss Confession of Faith; in 1543 he was at Corpus College, Cambridge. In 1544 or 1545 he accompanied a commission sent to Scotland by Henry VIII. in connection with the marriage of his son Edward and Mary Stuart; and he preached the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith at Dundee and Montrose, in Ayrshire and East Lothian. At Cardinal Beaton's instance he was arrested on 16th January 1546, and burned at St Andrews on 12th March. Knox was first inspired by Wishart. It is still debated whether he was or was not a Scotsman of the name who was concerned in a proposal made to Henry VIII. for the assassination of Beaton. See David Laing, Works of John Knox (vols. I. and vi.); Lorimer's Precursors of the Reformation; C. Rogers's Life of Wishart (1876); and Maxwell's Old Dundee (1891).

Wislicenus, JOHANNES (1835-1902), chemist, born near Querfurt in Prussian Saxony, taught chemistry at Cambridge (U.S.), New York, Zurich, and Würzburg, and in 1885 became professor at Leipzig. He had done important work, and had edited a handbook of chemistry (1874-77).

Wither, GEORGE, poet, born at Bentworth, Hampshire, June 11, 1583, studied at Magdalen, Oxford, and at eighteen entered Lincoln's Inn. For his Abuses Stript and Whipt (1613) he found himself in the Marshalsea, and here wrote his Shepherds Hunting, a sweet pastoral. It is supposed that his satire addressed to the king (1614), together with the Earl of Pembroke's intercession, procured his release. In 1618 appeared The Motto, a curious piece of self-confession. His finest poem, Fair Virtue, or the Mistress of Philarete (1622), shows exquisite fancy. There followed his Hymns and Songs of the Church (1623), Psalms of David translated (1631), Emblems (1634), and Hallelujah (1641). Now a fiery Puritan, in 1642 he sold his estate to raise a troop of horse for the parliament, but was taken prisoner. Later Cromwell made him major-general in Surrey and Master of the Statute Office. At the Restoration he was stripped of his places and property, and, on suspicion of having written the Vox Vulgi, a satire on the parliament of 1661, was imprisoned. He was released in 1663, and died May 2, 1667. His books number almost a hundred, but almost all his really excellent verse belongs to the first ten years, collected in his Juventilia (1622); Spenser Soc. 1870-72). His poetry fell into almost complete oblivion, but the praises of Southey, Sir Egerton Brydges, Hallam, and especially Charles Lamb restored him to his true niche in the temple of fame. The Hymns and Songs of the Church were edited by Farr in 1856 (Spenser Soc. 1880-81), the Hallelujah in 1857 (Spenser Soc. 1878-79), and Vox Vulgi by Macray (1880). Philarete and Fidelia were reprinted in Arber's 'English Garner'; the Spenser Society also reprinted the 'Miscellaneous Works' (1871-78), Britain's Remembrance (1879-80), the Psalms of David (1880-82), the Parallogrammaton (1881-82), and Respublica Anglicana, or the Historie of the Parliament (1882-83).

Witherspoon, JOHN (1722-94), theologian, born at Yester near Haddington, was minister at Beith and Paisley, and in 1768 became president of the college and pastor at Princeton. He was a representative of New Jersey to the Continental Congress. His writings include Ecclesiastic Characteristics (1753), against the Moderates; a work on the stage (1757); and two on Justification (1756) and Regeneration (1764).

Witsius, HERMANN (1636-1708), Dutch theologian, became in 1675 a professor at Franeker, in 1680 at Utrecht, and in 1698 at Leyden. His great work is De Economia Fœderum Dei cum hominibus (trans. 1763). Other writings translated are Antinomians and Neonomians (1807), The Creed (1823), and The Lord's Prayer (1839).

Witt, DE. See DE WITT, GUIZOT.

Wodrow, ROBERT (1679-1734), Scottish church historian, born at Glasgow, passed through the arts classes there, and studied theology under his father, who was professor of Divinity; in 1703 he became minister of Eastwood. His History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland 1660-88 (1721-22), dedicated to George I., earned him a grant of 100 guineas. Posthumous works were Lives of the Scottish Reformers (Maitland Club, 1834-45); Analecta, or a History of Remarkable Providences (Maitland Club, 1842-43); Correspondence (Wodrow Soc. 1842-43); and Biographical Collections (New Spalding Club, 1890). See Memoir by Dr R. Burns prefixed to his edition of the History (1830), and those prefixed to the two last-named works. [Wod'ro.]

Woffington, MARGARET ('Peg'), actress, was born, a Dublin bricklayer's daughter, Oct. 18, 1720. From seventeen to twenty she played on the Dublin stage, and in 1740 appeared at Covent Garden as Sylvia in the Recruiting Officer. Her beauty and coquetry carried all hearts by storm. Her character was far from irreproachable, and probably Garrick never thought seriously of marrying her. But she atoned for her faults by goodness of disposition. On 3d May 1757 she broke down, and left the stage never to return; she died 28th March 1760, her last days given to charity and good works. See Lives by Daly (1888) and Molloy (1884).

Wöhler, FRIEDRICH (1800-82), German chemist, whose artificial production of urea in 1828 marked a new era in organic chemistry. [Feh-ter.]

Wohlgenuth, MICHEL (1434-1519), Nuremberg painter and engraver, was the master of Albert Dürer. [Vole'ge-moot.]

Wolcot, DR JOHN, 'Peter Pindar' (1738-1819), born at Dodbrooke, Devon, studied medicine for seven years, took his M.D. at Aberdeen (1767), and, going to Jamaica, became physician-general of the island. He returned to England to take orders, but soon started medical practice at Truro. Here he discovered the talents of young Opie, and with him in 1780 removed to London, to devote himself to writing audacious squibs and satires in verse. His sixty or seventy poetical pamphlets (1778-1818) include The Lousiad, The Apple-dumplings and a King, Whitbread's Brewery visited by their Majesties, Boszy and Piozzi, and Lyrical Odes on the Royal Academy Exhibitions. Witty and fluent, but coarse and ephemeral, they have long since outlived their great vogue. See Blackwood's Magazine for July 1868.

Wolf, FERDINAND (1796-1866), Romance scholar, born at Vienna, was a royal librarian there, and helped to found the Academy of Sciences. He wrote on the Provençal, Spanish, Portuguese, and Brazilian literatures. [Volph.]

Wolf, FRIEDRICH AUGUST, classical scholar, born at Hainrode near Nordhausen, 15th Feb. 1759, in 1777 went to Göttingen. In 1779, while teacher at Ilfeld, he established his fame by an edition of Plato's Symposium, and in 1783 he became professor at Halle. He edited Demosthenes' Oratio adversus Leptinem (1789), and in his Prolegomena ad Homerum (1795) he unfolded his bold theory that the Odyssey and Iliad are composed of numerous ballads by different minstrels, strung together by subsequent editors—views defended in his spirited Briefe an Heyne (1797). In 1801 Wolf confirmed the suspicions of the genuineness of several orations attributed to Cicero. After 1806 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, where he helped to reorganise the university, and was appointed a professor. He died 8th August 1824. The Darstellung der Alterthums-wissenschaft (1807) is his most finished work. See books by Hanhart (1825), Körte (1833), and Arnoldt (1861-62); and Mark Pattison's Essays (vol. i. 1889).

Wolf, or WOLFF, JOHANN CHRISTIAN VON (1679-1754), born at Breslau, studied at Jena, lectured at Leipzig on mathematics and philosophy, and became professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy at Halle. His system of philosophy quickly spread through Germany; but he was attacked by his pietistic colleagues in Halle, and formally accused. Ordered in 1723 to quit the Prussian dominions, he was appointed to a chair at Marburg. Frederick the Great recalled him (1740) to be professor of the Law of Nations, and he became in 1743 chancellor of the university, and was made Baron of the Empire by the Elector of Bavaria. Wolf systematised and popularised the philosophy of Leibnitz, but made it more pedantic and unspiritual. His Theologia Naturalis gave a great impulse to rationalism. See his autobiography, edited by Wuttke (1841).

Wolfe, CHARLES (1791-1823), born at Dublin, went to Winchester, and in 1814 took his B.A. at Dublin. His Burial of Sir John Moore (1817) was so admired that even whilst its author's name remained unknown, and it was ascribed to Campbell, Byron, &c., it had won for itself a secure place in the heart of the nation. Wolfe in 1817 became curate of Ballyclog in Tyrone, and then rector of Donoughmore. His Remains were published in 1825 by Russell, and the poems by Litton Falkiner in 1903 (each with a memoir).

Wolfe, JAMES, the conqueror of Quebec, was born at Westerham vicarage, Kent, 2d Jan. 1727, the eldest son of General Edward Wolfe (1685-1759). In 1742 he received an ensign's commission, in 1743 fought at Dettingen, in 1745-46 served against the Scotch rebels at Falkirk and Culloden, and in 1747 was wounded at Lawfeldt. In 1749-57 he was engaged in garrison duty in Scotland and England. In the mismanaged expedition against Rochefort (1757) he was quartermaster-general; in 1758, with the rank of colonel, he received from Pitt the command of a brigade in the expedition against Cape Breton under General Amherst; and to him was mainly due the capture of Louisburg. Pitt was now organising his grand scheme for expelling the French from Canada, and the expedition for the capture of Quebec he confided to Wolfe's command. As major-general, and commanding 9000 men, Wolfe sailed from England in Feb. 1759, and on 26th June landed opposite Quebec. The attack on Montcalm's strong position proved one of stupendous difficulty, and Wolfe was completely foiled. But at last, scaling the cliffs at a point insufficiently guarded, at day-dawn of 13th Sept. he found himself on the Plains of Abraham. After a short struggle the French were routed; Montcalm (q.v.) was killed; Quebec capitulated; and its fall decided the fate of Canada. Wolfe died in the hour of victory; his body was brought home and buried in Greenwich church. See Lives by Wright (1864) and Bradley (1895), and Montcalm and Wolfe, by Parkman (1884).

Wolff, JOSEPH, D.D. (1795-1862), a German Jew who turned Roman Catholic in 1812, but came to England and entered the Anglican Church in 1819, becoming a missionary to the Jews in the East. His adventurous journey to Bokhara (1843), to inquire into the fate of Conolly and Stoddart, is described in Mission to Bokhara (1845) and Travels and Adventures (1860). He died vicar of Isle-Brewers, Somerset.—His son, SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, G.C.B., G.C.M.G. (1830-1908), was educated at Rugby, and after holding several Foreign Office appointments, entered parliament in 1874, becoming one of the 'Fourth Party.' In 1892 he was made ambassador to Spain.

Wolff, KASPAR FRIEDRICH (1733-94), founder of embryology, was born at Berlin, was a surgeon in the Seven Years' War, and died a member of the Academy at St Petersburg.

Wolfram von Eschenbach, German poet, born near Anspach in Bavaria, lived some time in the Wartburg near Eisenach, at the court of the Count of Thuringia, where he met Walther von der Vogelweide, and died after 1215. Besides Parzival he left seven Love Songs, a short epic, Willehalm, and two fragments called Titurel. The Parzival is an epic, having for its main theme the history of the Grail, and is one of the most notable poems of the Middle Ages. From it Wagner derived the libretto of his Parsifal.

Wollaston, WILLIAM (1659-1724), author of the Religion of Nature, born at Coton near Stafford, studied at Sidney Sussex, Cambridge, took orders in 1681, and in 1682 became assistant-master at Birmingham, but in 1688 inherited an ample estate. The one forgotten work by which he is remembered was printed in 1722 for private circulation, but soon reached an issue of over 10,000 copies. It is a development of Samuel Clarke's system, its conclusions optimistic. See Life prefixed to 6th ed. (1738). [Wool'las-ton.]

Wollaston, WILLIAM HYDE, chemist and natural philosopher, was born at East Dereham, Norfolk, 6th August 1766, the second son of the Rev. Francis Wollaston (1731-1815), who was the grandson of the preceding, rector of Chiselhurst, and an astronomer. He went to Caius College, Cambridge, took his M.D. in 1793, and gained a fellowship. Starting practice as a physician at Bury St Edmunds in 1789, he soon removed to London; but being beaten in a competition for the post of physician to St George's Hospital in 1800, he vowed to devote himself to scientific research. His researches were pre-eminently fruitful both in chemistry and in optics. He discovered new compounds connected with the production of gouty and urinary concretions; and in the ore of platinum distinguished two new metals, palladium (1804) and rhodium (1805). By his method of rendering platinum malleable he made £30,000; and some other practical discoveries were also highly lucrative. His contributions to optics were the reflecting Goniometer, the Camera Lucida, the discovery of the dark lines in the solar spectrum and of the invisible rays beyond the violet, and an immensity of valuable observations on refraction. He did much to establish the theory of definite proportions, and demonstrated the identity of galvanism and electricity. He was elected fellow of the Royal Society (1793), its second secretary (1806), and a fellow of the Astronomical Society (1828). He died 22d Dec. 1828. See his thirty-nine memoirs in the Philosophical Trans. for 1809-29, and George Wilson's Religio Chemicæ (1862).

Wollstonecraft, MARY. See GODWIN.

Wolsey, GARNET JOSEPH, VISCOUNT, was born of an old Staffordshire line at Golden Bridge House, County Dublin, June 4, 1833, and entered the army in 1852. He served in the Burmese war of 1852-53, and was dangerously wounded; in the Crimea he lost the use of one eye, and received the cross of the Legion of Honour. He was in India during the Mutiny, and in the Chinese war of 1860. Next year he went to Canada, and in 1870 put down the Red River rebellion under Riel without losing a man. On the outbreak of the Ashantee war Wolsey, now K.C.M.G., was appointed to the command, and on his return received the thanks of parliament and a grant of £25,000. In 1875, become major-general, he was despatched to Natal; in 1876 was nominated a member of the Indian Council. In 1878 he was made high commissioner in Cyprus, and in 1879 held supreme civil and military command in Natal and the Transvaal. He was commander-in-chief of the expedition to Egypt in 1882, received the thanks of parliament, was gazetted Baron Wolsey of Cairo and of Wolsey in Stafford, and received a large money grant. He was made general in the same year, viscount after the Soudan campaigns of 1884-85, and field-marshal in 1894. In 1890-95 he was commander-in-chief in Ireland, and in 1895-1900 commander-in-chief. Besides his Story of a Soldier's Life (1903-4), he is author of Narrative of the War with China in 1860 (1862), the Soldier's Pocket Book, Field Manœuvres in the Wellington Prize Essays (1872), a novel (Marley Castle, 1877), a Life of Marlborough (2 vols. 1894), The Decline and Fall of Napoleon (1895), and of several essays. See Memoirs by C. R. Low (new ed. 1886) and J. J. Ellis (1892). [Wools-ley.]

Wolsey, THOMAS, Cardinal, was born at Ipswich in 1471, the son of a butcher, grazier, and wool-merchant. As a fellow of Magdalen, and master of its school, he remained nineteen years at Oxford, till in 1500 the Marquis of Dorset gave him the Somerset living of Limington. In 1501 he became chaplain to Archbishop Dean, and in 1506 a royal chaplain. In 1508 he was sent on embassies to Scotland and the Low Countries, and made Dean of Lincoln. Under Henry VIII. appointed king's almoner and member of the king's council (1511), he speedily made himself indispensable to the young king. In the war with France of 1513 he showed such energy and ability that Henry bestowed on him the bishopric of Tournai, and in 1514 the sees of Lincoln and York. In 1514 Wolsey advanced his interests by contriving an understanding between England and France, and was now one of the leading personages in Europe. He held in commendam the sees, successively, of Bath and Wells (1518), Durham (1523), and Winchester (1529), as also the abbey of St Albans. The year 1515 saw him Lord Chancellor of England and Cardinal; and in 1517 Leo. X. was forced to appoint him Cardinal-legate. On Leo's death in 1521 Wolsey's claim to the papacy was strongly supported by Henry, and he had the promise of the emperor's good offices. Charles, however, really supported his old tutor, Adrian of Utrecht, on whose death Charles again played false. Wolsey's foreign policy was to hold the balance between Charles and Francis I. of France, and to recover for England her place among the nations which had been lost since the Wars of the Roses. His home policy was to secure that the sovereign's will should be the one motive-power in the state. Hence he made such frequent and large demands on the purse of the country that all ranks of the people detested him as the author of the ills from which they suffered during Henry's rule. Notable among Wolsey's domestic acts is his dissolution in 1524-29 of above thirty monasteries with fewer than seven inmates. Wolsey's zeal for learning was shown in his foundation of a college in Ipswich and of Cardinal College at Oxford. In the question of Henry's divorce from Catharine of Aragon (1527) Wolsey had to use his best efforts to persuade Clement VII. to pronounce Henry's marriage illegal. In 1529, along with the legate Campeggio, he sat in judgment on the case, with a result that left Henry as far as ever from the attainment of his end. 'This was no fault of Wolsey's; but Henry was now in a mood that needed a victim, and the cardinal's enemies, reinforced by Anne Boleyn, had been long waiting their opportunity. Indicted for a breach of præsumptio in procuring bulls from Rome, he was deprived of the Great Seal. Found guilty of the charges brought against him, he nevertheless obtained his pardon, and was allowed to retain the see of York. But his enemies were not satisfied. On a charge of high-treason, he was arrested by the Earl of Northumberland. This last stroke seems to have completely broken Wolsey's proud spirit; and on the way to London to meet his trial he died at Leicester Abbey, Nov. 29, 1530. His arrogance and ostentation had offended all classes; disliked by the commons, he was detested by the nobility. It is only since the publication of the state papers of the period that Wolsey has received his due as a statesman of the first rank, whose ambition was coincident with the interest of his country as he conceived it. See CROMWELL (THOMAS); Lives of Wolsey by George Cavendish (q.v.), from which the splendid figure in Shakespeare's Henry VIII. is closely drawn; Fiddes (1724), Grove (1742), Galt the novelist (1812), Martin (1862), Creighton (1888); Lord Acton, 'Wolsey and the Divorce,' in the Quarterly Rev. for Jan. 1877; Brewer, Reign of Henry VIII.; and Gasquet, Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries (1888-89).

Wolter, CHARLOTTE (1834-97), tragic actress, was born at Cologne, became famous on the Vienna stage, and in 1890 married (the Austrian) Count O'Sullivan, who predeceased her. [Poll'-ter.]

Wombwell, GEORGE (1778-1850), originally a London bootmaker, became a noted founder and proprietor of menageries.

Wood, SIR ANDREW (c.1455-1539), Scottish naval commander, was a knight of Largo.

Wood, or A WOOD, ANTHONY, antiquary, born at Oxford, 17th Dec. 1632, studied at Merton College 1647-52, and being of independent means, devoted himself to heraldry and antiquarian studies. His History of Oxford the delegates of the university press had translated into Latin as Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis (1674). Wood was ill-satisfied with the translation, and made a new copy of his English MS., which was long after published in 1786-96. His great Athene Oxonienses was a history of all the writers and bishops who had their education in Oxford from 1500 to 1690, together with the Fasti or Annals for the said time (1691-92). He died 28th Nov. 1695. Other works were The Ancient and Present State of the City of Oxford (1773) and the ill-natured Modius Salium, a Collection of Pieces of Humour (1751). Wood prepared a third volume of his Athene, which was included in the second edition printed by Tonson (1721). The third edition is that by Philip Bliss (1813-20); a projected fourth by him reached only the first volume, containing the Autobiography (1848). This last was edited in 1892-1900 by Mr Andrew Clark for the Oxford Historical Society as vols. i.-v. of a complete edition of Wood's works.

Wood, SIR EVELYN, G.C.B., born at Cressing vicarage, Braintree, 9th Feb. 1838, entered the navy in 1852, and served in the Crimea in the Naval Brigade. As cavalry officer and brigademajor he fought in the Indian Mutiny, receiving the thanks of the Indian government and the Victoria Cross. As lieutenant-colonel he was with Wolseley during the Ashantee war. He was called to the bar in 1874, but commanded a column through the Zulu war. Created K.C.B. in 1879, he had a share in the Transvaal war (1880-81). As G.C.M.G. he received the thanks of parliament for his services in Egypt in 1882, and in the same year became commander-in-chief of the Egyptian army. From 1886 onwards he held home appointments. He has received innumerable distinctions, such as the knighthood of the Legion of Honour, and has written on The Crimea in 1854-56, on Cavalry, and From Midshipman to Field-marshal (1906). In 1897 he was made adjutant-general of the army, in 1903 field-marshal.

Wood, MRS HENRY (née Ellen Price), novelist, born at Worcester, 17th Jan. 1814, married early Mr Henry Wood, a ship agent living in France, and after his death settled in London, and commenced writing for The New Monthly Magazine and Bentley's Miscellany. Her temperance story, Danesbury House (1860), was followed by East Lynne (1861), which had an almost unexampled success. Having found her public, Mrs Wood poured forth upwards of thirty more novels, perhaps the best The Channings (1862), The Shadow of Ashlydyat (1863), Oswald Cray (1864), A Life Secret (1867), Dene Hollow (1871), Within the Maze (1872), and Pomeroy Abbey (1878). Her work never rises above the commonplace, though she revealed some power in the analysis of character in her anonymous Johnny Ludlow stories (1874-80). In 1867 she acquired the monthly Argosy, and her novels went on appearing in it long after her death, on 10th Feb. 1887. See Memorials of her by her son (1895).

Wood, JOHN GEORGE (1827-89), born in London, studied at Merton College, Oxford, till 1862 held minor clerical appointments, and wrote a Natural History (1852; 20th ed. 1896), My Feathered Friends, Common Objects, Petland, Insects at Home, Insects Aboard, Man and Beast, The Dominion of Man over Animals, &c. See Life by his son (1890).

Wood, WILLIAM (1671-1744), a London iron-founder, to whom was granted a share of the profits from coining 'Wood's Halfpence' for Ireland. Swift's Drapier's Letters (1724) denounced the job with such effect that the patent was cancelled and Wood was compensated with a pension.

Woodfall, HENRY SAMPSON (1739-1805), was the publisher of the Letters of Junius (q.v.). Associated with him were his brother, WILLIAM (1746-1803), and his successor, GEORGE (1767-1844).

Woods, MARGARET LOUISA, daughter of Dr Bradley, Dean of Westminster, was born at Rugby in 1856, and in 1879 was married to the Rev. Henry George Woods, from 1887 till his resignation in 1897 President of Trinity College, Oxford. Mrs Woods has published A Village Tragedy (a novel, 1887), Lyrics and Ballads (1889), Esther Vanhomrigh (a novel, 1891), Vagabonds (a circus story, 1894), Wild Justice (a dramatic poem, 1896), Weeping Ferry and other Stories (1897), &c.

Wood-Seys, ROLAND ALEXANDER, born at Stourbridge, 5th November 1854, settled in California as grower of olives and maker of olive-oil. He is known as a novelist under the pen-name of 'Paul Cushing,' and has written A Woman with a Secret (1885), The Blacksmith of Voe, The Shepherdess of Treva (1895), God's Lad (1900), &c.

Woodward, BERNARD BOLINGBROKE (1816-69), librarian to the Queen and miscellaneous writer.

Woodward, SAMUEL PICKWORTH (1821-65), naturalist, was assistant-palæontologist in the British Museum.

Woollett, WILLIAM (1735-85), born at Maidstone, was one of the greatest English engravers. His first important plate, from Richard Wilson's 'Niobe,' was published by Boydell in 1761. In 1775 he was appointed engraver to George III. See L. Fagan's Catalogue Raisonné of his one hundred and twenty-three engraved works (1885).

Woolman, JOHN (1720-72), Quaker preacher, was born at Northampton, N.J., a farmer's son, and was for some time a tailor. He spoke and wrote against slavery, and published several religious works. His Journal (new ed. 1898) was a favourite book with Charles Lamb. He died at York on a visit to England.

Woolner, THOMAS (1826-92), the poet-sculptor, was born at Hadleigh, and studied at the Royal Academy from 1842. Already in 1843 his 'Eleonor sucking the Poison from Prince Edward's Wound' attracted much attention; it was followed by 'The Death of Boadicea,' 'Puck,' 'Titania,' 'Eros,' and 'The Rainbow.' As a conspicuous member of the 'Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood' (see ROSETTI) he contributed poems to The Germ, which with others were published in a volume as My Beautiful Lady (1863; 5th ed. 1892). In 1862-64 he was in Anstralia. He executed statues or portrait-busts of most of his famous contemporaries (his bust of Tennyson now in Westminster Abbey being a noteworthy specimen), besides 'Elaine,' 'Ophelia,' 'Virgil,' 'Guinevere,' &c. Made A.R.A. in 1871 and R.A. in 1874, he was professor of Sculpture to the Academy 1877-79. He exhibited a hundred and twenty works. Other poems were Pygmalion, Silenus, Tiresias, and Nelly Dale.

Woolsey, THEODORE DWIGHT (1801-89), born at New York, was professor of Greek at Yale 1831-46, and then its president till 1871. He was president of the American New Testament revisers. Besides editions of Greek plays, &c., he wrote an Introduction to International Law (1860), Divorce Legislation (1869), and Political Science (1877).

Woolston, THOMAS (1669-1731), Deist, born at Northampton, became a fellow of Sidney Sussex, Cambridge, and took orders. In 1705 he published the Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion, affirming that Moses and all the Bible miracles were allegorical only. The Moderator between the Infidel and the Apostate (developed in a second series, 1721-23) was to show that the gospel miracles could not prove Christ to be the Messiah; and in 1721 his college deprived him of his fellowship. In his famous six Discourses on the Miracles of Christ (1727-29, with two Defences) he maintained that the gospel narratives, taken literally, were a tissue of absurdities. Sixty answers were made to the Discourses; and an indictment for blasphemy was brought against Woolston. He was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £100. He died within the rules of King's Bench. His works were collected in 1733 with a Life.

Worcester, EDWARD SOMERSET, MARQUIS OF (c. 1601-67), inventor of the steam-engine, was probably born in London, the eldest child of the first Marquis of Worcester (c. 1577-1646), and was brought up at Raglan Castle. About 1628 we find him engaged in mechanical pursuits with Caspar Kalkoff, his lifelong assistant. At the Rebellion he sided with the king, in 1642 was made General of South Wales, in 1644 was created Earl of Glamorgan, and in 1645 was despatched to Ireland to raise troops for the king. His mission miscarried; and, Charles disowning him, he was for a brief space imprisoned. In 1646 he succeeded his father, and in 1648 went into exile in France. In 1652, venturing back to England, he was sent to the Tower, but in 1654 was let out on bail, and at the Restoration recovered a portion of his vast estates—he claimed to have disbursed £918,000 'for king and country.' His Century of Inventions (written 1655; printed 1663) gives a brief account of a hundred inventions—ciphers, signals, automata, mechanical appliances, &c. No. 68 deals with a steam apparatus which could raise a column of water 40 feet, and which seems to have been at work at Vauxhall 1663-70—probably an improved form (with two chambers) of Della Porta's contrivance, forcing steam into a chamber containing water, with an opening below the water. See Life by Dircks prefixed to his reprint of the Century (1863). [Wooss'-ter.]

Worcester, JOSEPH EMERSON (1734-1865), lexicographer, born at Bedford, N.H., taught at Salem, Mass., and then turned author. All his works were laborious—gazetteers, manuals of geography and history, &c. He edited Chalmers's abridgment of Todd's Johnson's Dictionary, with Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary (1828), abridged Webster (1829), and printed his own English Dictionary (1830; enlarged ed. 1855), Critical Dictionary (1846), and great quarto Dictionary of the English Language (1860).

Worde, WYNKYN DE, born in Holland or in Alsace, was a pupil of Caxton, and in 1491 succeeded to his stock-in-trade. He made great improvements in printing and type-cutting, printed 408 books, and was still living in 1535.

Wordsworth, WILLIAM, born at Cockermonth,

7th April 1770, at eight was sent to school at Hawkshead on Esthwaite, and in 1787-91 was at St John's, Cambridge. Two visits to Franco (1790 and 1791-92) stimulated his early republicanism; and it has lately been shown by Legouis that from 1793 to 1795 he was an ardent disciple of Godwin and a zealous student of his Political Justice (parts of which, indeed, he paraphrased in his own Prelude). Of his two poems in 'heroic' metre, the Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches (1793), the latter reflects his Swiss and French experiences. The crisis of his life is the horror that fell on his soul as his high hopes of the Revolution declined, ere mental health and tranquillity returned, and conservative impulses triumphed. In 1795 Calvert, a young friend, left him £900, and Wordsworth resolved to devote himself to poetry as his life-work. Settling at Racedown near Crewkerne (1796), Wordsworth first saw Coleridge (q.v.), and on Coleridge's account moved (1797) to Alfoxden by the Quantocks. That beautiful district and a tour by the Wye bore fruit in his Lyrical Ballads (1798; expanded 1800); Legouis again has shown that here we have a counterblast to Godwin. After some months in North Germany, Wordsworth moved (1799) to Grasmere. In 1802 he married Mary Hutchinson (1770-1859). In 1805 he finished the autobiographical Prelude, left unpublished during his lifetime; in 1807 came two fresh volumes, containing many of his most memorable poems. Some of his most perfect work was due also to the journey of 1803 in Scotland, in the inspiring company of his sister Dorothy. In 1814 and 1832 he revisited Scotland, the last visit the farewell to Walter Scott; among Wordsworth's other friends were Coleridge, Lamb, Southey, Rogers, Sir George Beaumont, and Lord Lansdale. In 1814 appeared The Excursion; in 1815 the White Doe; in 1819 and 1820 the Duddon sonnets and other pieces. In 1820 and 1837 he made visits to Italy; in 1835 came Yarrow Revisited and Sonnets to Liberty and Order. In 1839 Oxford gave him the doctorate. He valued the appreciation of Keble; and in 1845 met Tennyson, whom he wrote of as 'the first of our living poets.' In 1843, after Southey's death, Wordsworth became Poet-laureate. A singular and almost unbroken felicity attended the last half of his life. He died at Rydal Mount (his home since 1813), April 23, 1850, and was buried at Grasmere.

To the second issue of Lyrical Ballads (1800) Wordsworth added a Preface with an Appendix. In the Preface he laid himself open to hostile criticism by bringing forward as the guiding principle of his poetry a too dogmatic insistence upon 'incidents and situations from common life, tracing in them . . . the primary laws of our nature,' to be related or described 'throughout, as far as was possible, in a selection of language really used by men.' The persons were 'generally' chosen from the labouring ranks, because 'our elementary feelings' are amongst them most simply shown, are capable of most forcible representation, and are 'incorporated with the beautiful and permanent forms of nature.' Hence also the language of these men, somewhat 'purified,' was used; being, from natural circumstances, simpler and truer than 'poetic diction' such as that of the 18th-century writers. This theory, as exemplified in the Ballads, raised a storm of derision from the critics, which long impeded Wordsworth's popularity. Yet it is but a small proportion of his poems, and those of early date, which are any way thus injured in effect. Pleasure, immediate, pure, durable, exquisite, but not exclusive of painful scenes, Wordsworth vindicates as always essential to poetry. His later poetry is usually said to fall greatly below the earlier. The undeniably fuller freshness of his first maturity seems to have blinded readers to the larger aim, the deeper sentiment, the sweeter truth, of work essentially loftier. The two early descriptive poems, in some degree, remind us that they belong to the 18th century. Their style is powerful, but at times knotty and contorted; the images crowded to obscurity. The Guilt and Sorrow (1793-94) in its gloom recalls that darkened period of Wordsworth's life, but in the Nay, Traveller (1795), we see already his exquisite inimitable touch in painting character and landscape. Wordsworth's single tragedy, The Borderers, follows. Action and variety are here too much suppressed in favour of analysis. The four volumes of Ballads and Poems, between 1798-1800 and 1807, with the Prelude, form unquestionably the most important, the most charming body of Wordsworth's work. Among these are many poems in which admirable simplicity of feeling is joined to the happiest language and metre. Such are the simple tales from lowly life, pathetic or meditative (Ruth, Lucy Gray, the Reaper, the Highland Girl), tender love-poems (Three Years, A Slumber, She was a Phantom of Delight), narratives or meditations in his very highest and purest manner (Tintern, The Brothers, Michael), the lovely series of bird-pictures, many sonnets supreme in our sonnet-literature, and the Ode on Immortality, which a just judgment places also supreme among our reflective lyrics. The Excursion (1814), wherein the didactic element asserts itself too freely; the White Doe of Rylstone (1815), idealism pure and exquisite in itself, yet pushed too far; two Odes on the Peace, somewhat overstrained and unlyrical, open the stage of Wordsworth's mature life. But presently the poet broke new ground in the Laodamia, Dion, Trajan's Pillar, poems which have a unique character from the high spiritualism of their treatment. With these may be joined the six odes to Lycoris, September and May. Here too fall the Duddon sonnets, Wordsworth's latest important study of the soul of landscape. The Ecclesiastical Sonnets, a singular monument of skilful historical narrative in that difficult form, though dating from 1820, may lead us to the poems of Wordsworth's genial old age. Here, whilst a serener pensiveness and a larger scope are shown, and earlier faults of style avoided, we feel that the subjects are often less vividly conceived and handled. Yet here also not a few short pieces occur, even to the poet's last years, so felicitous in thought and rendering as to show that the mighty hand had not lost its ancient cunning.

The chief editions of Wordsworth's poetry are the author's editions published by Moxon (1836-37, 1845, and 1849-50), the library edition by Prof. Knight (1882-86), that by Lord Morley (1888), the Aldine edition by Prof. Dowden (1893), and the complete edition, with prose works, life, and Dorothy's journals and letters, by Prof. Knight (16 vols. 1897 et seq.). Among selections are those of F. T. Palgrave (1865), Matthew Arnold (1879), and Prof. Knight (Wordsworth Soc. 1888). The prose works were collected by Grosart (1876). The chief Lives are by his nephew, [Bishop] Christopher Wordsworth (1851); F. W. H. Myers, in 'English Men of Letters' (1880); J. M. Sutherland (1887); Elizabeth Wordsworth (1891); and Prof. Knight (1889). The most important criticisms are those of Coleridge, De Quincey, George Brimley, Sir H. Taylor, Bagehot, Clough, M. Arnold, Stopford Brooke, Lowell, Masson, E. Dowden, R. H. Hutton, Shairp, Aubrey de Vere, Leslie Stephen, Dean Church, Pater, Swinburne, Sir W. Raleigh (1903). The Wordsworth Society's Proceedings were issued in 1880-85, the volume of Wordsworthiana in 1889. A Primer of Wordsworth by Laurie Magnus appeared in 1897. See also De Quincey's Recollections of the Lake Poets, J. S. Cottle's Early Recollections of Coleridge (1837), Memorials of Colerorton (1887), H. Crabb Robinson's Diary (1869), Dorothy Wordsworth's Recollections of a Tour made in Scotland, edited by Principal Shairp (1874), and Dorothy Wordsworth: the Story of a Sister's Love, by Edmund Lee (1886); also Prof. Knight's books, Through the Wordsworth Country (1887) and The English Lake District as interpreted in the Poems of Wordsworth (1878); and the important work of Émile Legouis, La Jeunesse de William Wordsworth (1896; trans. 1897). See also articles COLERIDGE, QUILLINAN, SOUTHEY, and WILSON (JOHN).

DOROTHY WORDSWORTH, only sister of the poet, was born on Christmas Day 1771. She set up housekeeping with her brother in 1795 at Race-down Lodge in Dorsetshire. Her Journals kept at Alfoxden and Grasmere, and the records of her journeys in Scotland, the Isle of Man, Germany, France, Switzerland, and Italy, reveal a mind as subtly sensitive to nature as the poet's own, and an exquisiteness of expression which he never surpassed. In 1832 she had an attack of brain-fever from which she never entirely recovered, yet she lingered till 25th January 1855. See her Journals, edited by Prof. Knight (1897).

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH (1774-1846), youngest brother of the poet, was elected fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1798. Successively rector of Ashby-with-Oby and Thirne in Norfolk (1804), dean of Bocking, Essex (1808), rector of St Mary's, Lambeth, and of Sundridge in Kent (1815), he exchanged these two last livings for the rectory of Buxted-with-Uckfield, Sussex, in 1820. He was master of Trinity College 1820-41. His Ecclesiastical Biography is a fine collection of selected and annotated lives (1809; 1839). His Who wrote Ioân Basilikê? (1824) and King Charles the First the Author of Ioân Basilikê (1828) are learned if not conclusive. His Christian Institutes (1836) is a good selection from the writings of the great English divines.—Of his sons, the eldest, JOHN WORDSWORTH (1805-39), became fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1830, took orders in 1837, and at his death was preparing an edition of Æschylus and a classical dictionary.—The second son, CHARLES WORDSWORTH, born 22d August 1806, graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1830. He became private tutor, among his first pupils being Gladstone and Manning, and in 1834 public tutor at Christ Church, and was ordained deacon in 1835, priest in 1840. In 1835-46 he was second master at Winchester, and then till 1854 warden of the new Episcopal college at Glenalmond in Perthshire. In 1852 he was elected Bishop of St Andrews, and for years strove for reunion between the churches. He died 5th Dec. 1892. He was one of the New Testament revisers. His many works include the well-known Greek grammar (1839), Shakespeare's Knowledge of the Bible (1854; 4th ed. 1892), Shakespeare's Historical Plays (1883), Public Appeals on Behalf of Christian Unity (1886), and Outlines of the Christian Ministry (1872; new ed. 1893). See his Annals of My Life (2 vols. 1891-93), and The Episcopate of C. Wordsworth (1899).—The youngest son, CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH, born Oct. 30, 1807, graduated from Trinity, Cambridge, in 1830. He travelled in Greece 1832-33, took holy orders, was elected fellow in 1830, and in 1836 public orator. He was an unsuccessful head-master of Harrow 1836-44, and became canon of Westminster, vicar of Stamford-in-the-Vale, Berkshire, archdeacon of Westminster in 1865, and in 1868 Bishop of Lincoln. He died March 20, 1885. His Athens and Attica (1836), Inscriptions Pompeianæ (1837), Greece: Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical (1839; revised by H. F. Tozer, 1883), Theocritus (1844), and even Conjectural Emendations (1884) were sound contributions to classical scholarship. In 1842 he edited the Correspondence of Bentley, but did not achieve success in his Memoir (1851) of his uncle, the poet. Other works were his Theophilus Anglicanus (1843), Hulsean Lectures on the Canon (1848) and on the Apocalypse (1849); Hippolytus (1853); The Greek New Testament (1856-60); The Old Testament in the Authorised Version (1864-71); Miscellanies, Literary and Religious (1878); and a Church History to 431 A.D. (1881-83). See Life by J. H. Overton and E. Wordsworth (1888).—His eldest son, JOHN WORDSWORTH (1843-1911), born at Harrow, graduated at New College, Oxford, in 1865. For a short time assistant-master at Wellington College, he became fellow of Brasenose in 1867, and was tutor 1868-83. He became a prebendary of Lincoln (1870-83), examining chaplain to his father (1870-85), Grinfield lecturer on the Septuagint (1876), Bampton lecturer (The One Religion, 1881), in 1883 the first Oriel professor of the interpretation of Scripture (with canonry of Rochester attached), and in 1885 Bishop of Salisbury. His chief books are Fragments of Early Latin (1874), University Sermons (1878), Old Latin Biblical Texts (1883; vols. ii. and iii. mainly by others), and a critical edition of the Vulgate New Testament (1889 et seq.). He had a share also in the Oxford Studia Biblica (1885).

Work, HENRY CLAY (1832-84), song-writer, born at Middletown, Conn., attracted notice during the civil war by his 'Marching through Georgia' and other war-songs. His songs included 'Lily Dale' and 'My Grandfather's Clock.'

Wornum, RALPH NICHOLSON (1812-77), founder of scientific art criticism, was born at Thornton, Northumberland, and was from 1853 keeper and secretary of the National Gallery.

Worsaae, JENS JACOB ASMUSSEN (1821-85), Danish archæologist, in 1838-43 was assistant in the Copenhagen Museum of Northern Antiquities. Between 1842 and 1854, when he was made honorary professor, he made repeated visits to other Scandinavian lands, to Great Britain, Germany, and France. These journeys bore fruit in numerous works, three of which have been translated as Primeval Antiquities of England and Denmark (1849), The Danes and Norwegians in England (1852), and Pre-history of the North (1886). He opposed the spread of German tendencies in the duchies, as in Jylland's Danskhed (1850). He was minister of education 1874-75. [Vor-saw-eh.]

Worth, CHARLES FREDERICK (1825-95), costumeur, born at Bourn in Lincolnshire, went to Paris in 1846, and achieved such success as a fashion-designer that his establishment became the first emporium for the latest fashions, employing nearly a thousand workwomen. [Vorrt.]

Wotton, SIR HENRY (1568-1639), traveller, diplomatist, scholar, and poet, was born of ancient family at Boughton Place, Maidstone. He had his education at Winchester and Oxford, then set out for a seven years' sojourn in Bavaria, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, and France. On his return Essex admitted him to his intimacy. On his friend's downfall he betook himself to France, next to Italy, and was sent by Ferdinand, Duke of Florence, on a secret mission to James VI. of Scotland. James on his accession to the throne of England knighted him and sent him ambassador to Venice (1604), where he was mainly employed for nearly twenty years, being next sent to the German princes and the Emperor Ferdinand II., returning to England a poor man in 1624. He was made Provost of Eton, and took orders. His tracts, letters, &c. were collected as Reliquiæ Wottonianæ (1651), prefaced by Izaak Walton's exquisite little Life. One of his few poems is 'The Character of a Happy Life.' See Life by A. W. Ward (1898), and by L. P. Smith (1907).

Wouwerman, PHILIP (1619-68), painter of battle and hunting pieces, born at Haarlem, passed his entire life there in the assiduous practice of his art. His pictures are mostly small landscapes, with plenty of figures in energetic action. His cavalry skirmishes, with a white horse generally in the foreground, are greatly admired. He had two brothers, also painters, PETER (1623-82) and JAN (1629-66), who chose similar subjects. [Wou-ver-man; not Woo-.]

Wrangel, FERDINAND PETROVITCH, BARON VON (1794-1870), Russian vice-admiral and explorer, was born in Livonia, voyaged much in Arctic waters and on Siberian coasts, and made valuable surveys and observations. The island he nearly reached in 1821 was sighted by Sir H. Kellett in 1849, and named after Wrangel by Long in 1867. See his Polar Expedition (trans. 1840). [Vrang-el.]

Wrangel, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH ERNST (1784-1877), Prussian field-marshal and count, born at Stettin, distinguished himself in the campaigns of 1807, 1813, and 1814, and in 1848 commanded the Federal troops in Sleswick-Holstein. He crushed the insurrection in Berlin (1848); in 1856 became field-marshal; in 1864 had supreme command over Prussian and Austrian troops in the Danish war; and, ennobled in 1866, served that year against the Austrians. See Lives by Brunckow (1876), Meerheimb (1877), and Maltitz (1884).

Wraxall, SIR NATHANIEL WILLIAM (1751-1831), born at Bristol, was for three years in the East India Company's service, travelled over Europe (1772-79), and had a confidential mission from Queen Caroline-Matilda of Denmark to her brother George III. He published his Cursive Remarks made in a Tour in 1775, his Memoirs of the Valois Kings in 1777, entered parliament in 1780 as a follower of Lord North, but went over to Pitt, and was made a baronet in 1813. His next books were the History of France from Henry III. to Louis XIV. (1795); Memoirs of the Courts of Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna (1799); and the famous Historical Memoirs of my own Time, 1772-84 (1815). For a libel here on Count Woronzow, Russian envoy to England, he was fined £500 and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Violent attacks on his veracity were made by the reviews, but Wraxall's Answers were accounted on the whole satisfactory. A continuation of Memoirs (1784-90) was published in 1836. See Wheatley's edition of the whole work (5 vols. 1884).

Wray, JOHN. See RAY.

Wrede, KARL PHILIPP (1767-1838), born at Heidelberg, shared in the campaigns of 1799 and 1800, as commander of the Bavarians invaded Tyrol, fought at Wagram along with the French, and was made a count by Napoleon. He led the Bavarians under Napoleon to Russia in 1812; then commanded a united Bavarian and Austrian army against the French, by whom he was defeated at Hanau. He was, however, victorious in several battles in France in 1814, and was made field-marshal and prince. He represented Bavaria at the Vienna Congress (1814). [Vrai-deh.]

Wren, SIR CHRISTOPHER, architect, born at East Knoyle in Wiltshire, 20th October 1632, was the son of Dr Christopher Wren, Dean of Windsor, and the nephew of Dr Matthew Wren (1585-1667), the High Church bishop successively of Hereford, Norwich, and Ely. He passed from Westminster to Wadham College, Oxford, became a fellow of All Souls, distinguished himself in mathematics and physics, and helped to perfect the barometer. In 1657 he became Gresham professor of Astronomy in London, but in 1661 returned to Oxford as Savilian professor of Astronomy. Before leaving London, Wren had, with Boyle, Wilkins, and others, laid the foundation of the Royal Society. In 1663 he was engaged by the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's to make a survey of the cathedral, with a view to repairs. The first work built from a design by Wren was the chapel at Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1663; and in 1663-66 he designed the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford and the Library, &c., of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1665 Wren visited Paris. The great fire of London (1666) opened a wide field for his genius. He drew designs for the rebuilding of the whole city, embracing wide streets and magnificent quays. He was chosen architect for the new St Paul's (1675-1710); and he designed more than fifty other churches in place of those destroyed by the Great Fire. Other works by him were the Royal Exchange, Custom-house, Temple Bar, the College of Physicians, Greenwich Observatory, Chelsea Hospital, the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, Hampton Court, Greenwich Hospital, Buckingham House, Marlborough House, and the western towers and north transept of Westminster Abbey. In 1672 Wren was knighted, and in 1680 made President of the Royal Society, in 1684 comptroller of the works at Windsor Castle, and in 1698 surveyor-general of Westminster Abbey. He was returned for Windsor in 1689, but unseated on petition. Wren died 25th Feb. 1723, and was buried in St Paul's. See Lives by Elnes (1852), Miss Phillimore (1881), and Stratton (1897); and Loftie's Inigo Jones and Wren (1893).

Wren, WALTER (1834-98), Indian Civil Service coach, cripple, and radical, was born at Buntingford, Herts.

Wright, FANNY. See DARUMONT.

Wright, JOSEPH (1734-97), A.R.A., called 'Wright of Derby,' passed his whole life in his native town, save a few years spent in London, in Italy, and at Bath. His portrait groups often show odd light effects. See the folio on him by Benrose (1886).

Wright, JOSEPH, D.C.L., professor of Comparative Philology at Oxford, editor of the Dialect Dictionary, and author of many philological works, was born at Bradford in 1855, and in youth employed in a wool-mill.

Wright, THOMAS (1810-77), antiquary, born of Quaker parentage near Ludlow, graduated from Trinity, Cambridge, and in 1836 commenced the career of a man of letters in London. He was elected F.S.A. in 1837, and helped to found the Camden Society, Archaeological Association, and Percy and Shakespeare Societies. From 1836 he published eighty-four works, including Biographia Britannica Literaria (1842-46); England in the Middle Ages (1846); England under the House of Hanover from Caricatures (1848); Sorcery and Magic (1851); The Celt, Roman, and Saxon (1852); Wanderings of an Antiquary (1854); Dictionary of Obsolete and Provincial English (1857); Political Poems 1327-1485 (1859-61); Archæological Essays (1861); Domestic Manners in Mediæval England (1861); Caricature and Grotesque (1865); Womankind in Western Europe (1869); Uriconium (1872); and Anglo-Latin Twelfth Century Satirical Poets (1877).

Wright, THOMAS BARBER (1788-1875), 'the Manchester prison philanthropist,' was a foundry-worker and foreman, but did so much good in jails that a public subscription (1852) enabled him to devote himself wholly to this work.

Wright, WILLIAM ALDIS, LL.D., D.C.L., born in 1836 at Beccles, became librarian, and in 1888 vice-master, of Trinity College, Cambridge. He has edited the Cambridge and Globe Shakespeares (with W. G. Clark), Generides, Robert of Gloucester, Edward FitzGerald's Letters, &c., and is well known by his Bible Word-Book (1866).

Wulstan, or WULFSTAN, (1) a monk of Winchester in the 10th century, author of a Life of Bishop Ethelwold and a poem on St Swithin's Miracles.—(2) An Archbishop of York in 1003, author of Anglo-Saxon homilies (see Napier's German monograph, 1882).—(3) A Bishop of Worcester and saint (1007-95), by some reputed the author of part of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. His Life was written by William of Malmesbury.

Wundt, WILHELM MAX, born 16th August 1832 at Neckarau in Baden, in 1875 became professor of Physiology at Leipzig. He is distinguished in the field of experimental psychology, and has written on the nerves and the senses, the relations of physiology and psychology, logic, &c. His Human and Animal Psychology and Outlines of Psychology were translated in 1896, his Ethics in 1901. [Wont.]

Wurtz, CHARLES ADOLPHE (1817-84), French chemist, born at Strasburg, wrote numerous works, of which The Atomic Theory (1880), Modern Chemistry (4th ed. 1885), &c. have been translated. See Life by Gautier (1884). [Veertz.]

Wuttke, HEINRICH (1818-76), historian, born at Brieg, became professor at Leipzig in 1848, and as a politician was bitterly hostile to Prussia. Besides books on the history of Silesia (1842-43 and 1847), the three years of war 1756-58 (1856), Poland and Germany (1847), and the battle of Leipzig (1863), he began a great history of writing (vol. i. 1872). [Woot-keh.]

Wuttke, KARL FRIEDRICH ADOLF (1819-70), a conservative theologian, born at Breslau, became professor extra-ordinary at Berlin in 1854, ordinary at Halle in 1861. His chief works are Christian Ethics (1860-62; trans. 1873), Die Geschichte des Heidenthums (1852-58), and Der Deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart (1865).

Wyatt, JAMES, R.A. (1746-1813), architect, born in Staffordshire, succeeded Sir W. Chambers in 1796 as surveyor to the Board of Works. He built Fonthill Abbey for Beckford, and was killed by a carriage accident.—His son, MATTHEW COTES WYATT (1777-1862), was a sculptor.

Wyatt, SIR MATHEW DICBY (1820-77), architect, was born at Rowde near Devizes, the son of a London police-magistrate, a member of a family that produced many architects and sculptors. He was secretary to the Royal Commissioners for the 1851 Exhibition, and in 1869 was knighted and made Slade professor of Fine Arts at Cambridge. He wrote Metal Work and its Artistic Design (1852), Industrial Arts of the Nineteenth Century (1858), Art Treasures of the United Kingdom (1857), Fine Art (1870), and Architect's Handbook in Spain (1872).

Wyatt, RICHARD (1795–1850), classical and poetical sculptor, born in London, studied at Paris and Rome, where he died.

Wyatt, SIR THOMAS, courtier and poet, was born in 1503 at Allington Castle in Kent, son of Sir Henry Wyatt, and studied at St John's College, Cambridge. He was warmly received at court, in 1536 knighted, and in 1537 made high sheriff of Kent. He contrived to retain the king's favour, and was employed on missions to Spain and the imperial court. In 1541 he got a grant of lands at Lambeth, and in 1542 was named high steward of the king's manor at Maidstone. He died 11th Oct. 1542. In 1557 his poems, with Surrey's, were published in Tottel's Miscellany (ed. by Arber, 1870). Some of the shorter pieces are models of grace, and the satires possess merit. His poems and Surrey's were edited by Dr Nott (1815–16), and there is an American edition (1889), whose editor, Prof. Simonds, seeks to show that Anne Boleyn was the object of Wyatt's love. See also a monograph by Alscher (Vienna, 1886).—His son, SIR THOMAS WYATT, the Younger, born about 1520, fought bravely at the siege of Landrecies (1544), and continued in service on the Continent till 1550. In 1554, with Lady Jane Grey's father, he led the Kentish men to Southwark; and failing to capture Ludgate, was taken prisoner, and executed, 11th April 1554.

Wycherley, WILLIAM, born at Clive near Shrewsbury about 1640, in early youth was sent to France, left Queen's College, Oxford, without a degree, and entered the Middle Temple. For some years he lived as a man about town and a courtier, but took early to work as a dramatist. Love in a Wood, or St James's Park, a brisk comedy founded on Sedley's Mulberry Garden, was acted with much applause in 1672. Buckingham gave him a commission in a regiment, and King Charles made him a present of £500. He served for a short time in the fleet, and was present at a sea-fight—probably one of the drawn battles fought between Rupert and De Ruyter in 1673. The Gentleman Dancing-master (1673) was a clever farcical comedy of intrigue. The Country Wife (1675), Wycherley's coarsest but strongest play, partly founded on Molière's École des Femmes, was followed in 1677 by The Plain Dealer, founded partly on Molière's Misanthrope. A little after 1679 Wycherley married the young widowed Countess of Drogheda, with whom he lived unhappily. At her death a few years after she left him all her fortune, a bequest which involved him in a law-suit whereby he was reduced to poverty and cast into the Fleet prison for some years. At last James II., having seen a representation of The Plain Dealer, paid his debts and gave him a pension of £200 a year. At sixty-four Wycherley made the acquaintance of Pope, then a youth of sixteen, to whom he entrusted the revision of a number of his verses, the result being a quarrel. Wycherley's money troubles continued to the end of his days. At seventy-five he married a young woman in order to balk the hopes of his nephew; and he died eleven days after his marriage, in Dec. 1715—according to Pope, in the Roman Catholic faith. In literary brilliance Congreve infinitely outshines him, but Wycherley is a far more dexterous playwright; The Country Wife, purged of its nastiness, proved a good acting play. See Ward's Wycherley ('Mermaid Series,' 1893); Leigh Hunt's edition of Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and

Farquhar (1840; new ed. 1865); Hazlitt's English Comic Writers (1819; new ed. 1869); and Ward's Dramatic Literature (2d ed. 1899). [Witcher-ley.]

Wycliffe, JOHN (also spelt Wyclif, Wiclif, Wickliffe, &c.), is believed to have sprung from a family which held the manor of Wycliffe on Tees, and to have been born at Hipswell near Richmond in Yorkshire about 1320. He distinguished himself at Oxford, where he was a popular teacher. In 1360 he was master of Balliol College, but resigned soon afterwards on taking the college living of Fillingham, which he exchanged in 1368 for Ludgershall, Buckinghamshire. Warden meanwhile for a short time of Canterbury Hall, he also held some office at court, where he was consulted by government and employed as a pamphleteer. In 1374 he became rector of Lutterworth, and the same year was sent (doubtless as a recognised opponent of papal intrusion) to Bruges to treat with ambassadors from the pope concerning ecclesiastical abuses. His strenuous activity gained him support among the nobles and the London citizens. But his maintenance of a right in the secular power to control the clergy was offensive to the bishops, who summoned him before the archbishop in St Paul's in 1377; but the council was broken up by an unseemly quarrel between the Bishop of London and the Duke of Lancaster. The pope now addressed bulls to the king, bishops, and University of Oxford, bidding them to imprison Wycliffe and make him answer before the archbishop and the pope. When at last proceedings were undertaken, the prosecution had little effect upon Wycliffe's position. The whole fabric of the church was now (1378) shaken by the election of an antipope. Hitherto Wycliffe had attacked the manifest abuses in the church, but now he began to strike at its constitution, and declared it would be better without pope or prelates. He denied the priestly power of absolution, and the whole system of enforced confession, of penances, and indulgence. Up to this time his works had been written in Latin; he now appealed to the people in their own language, and by issuing popular tracts became the first English prose writer. He organised a body of itinerant preachers, his 'poor priests,' who spread his doctrines widely through the country, and began his translation of the Bible, of which as yet there was no complete English version. The work was carried through rapidly, and widely circulated. He entered upon more dangerous ground when in 1380 he assailed the central dogma of transubstantiation. A convocation of doctors at Oxford condemned his theses; he appealed without success to the king. In 1382 Archbishop Courtenay convoked a council and condemned Wycliffe's opinions. Wycliffe's followers were arrested, and all compelled to recant; but for some unknown reason he himself was not judged. He withdrew from Oxford to Lutterworth, where he continued his incessant literary activity. His work in the next two years, uncompromising in tone, is astonishing in quantity, and shows no falling off in power. He died 31st Dec. 1384. The characteristic of his teaching was its insistence on inward religion in opposition to the formalism of the time; as a rule he attacked the established practices of the church only so far as he thought they had degenerated into mere mechanical uses. The influence of his teaching was widespread in England, and, though persecution suppressed it, continued to work up to the Reformation. Huss (q.v.) was avowedly his disciple; and there were 'Lollards' or Wycliffites in Ayrshire down to the Reformation.

Thirty years after Wycliffe's death forty-five articles extracted from his writings were condemned as heretical by the Council of Constance, which ordered his bones to be dug up and burned and cast into the Swift—a sentence executed in 1428. See Wycliffe's Bible (two versions in parallel columns, 1850); Select English works (1869-71); English works hitherto unprinted (1880); Latin works (Wyclif Soc. 1882-95, including the Opus Evangelicum, ed. Wykeham, WILLIAM DE (1324-1404), born at Wickham near Fareham, was sent to school at Winchester, and by Edward III. appointed surveyor of Windsor and other royal castles in 1356-59. He built Queensborough Castle in 1361, was Keeper of the Privy-seal and secretary to the king in 1364, and in 1367 became Bishop of Winchester and Chancellor of England. In 1380 he founded New College, Oxford, and in 1388-94 Winchester School. In 1394 he undertook the transformation of the nave of Winchester Cathedral, and personally supervised the work. The money he laid out on building would now represent half a million. In 1404 he finished his magnificent chantry at Winchester, and, dying the same year, was buried in it. Wykeham was not an ardent theologian; he founded his colleges 'first for the glory of God and the promotion of divine service, and secondarily for scholarship.' In politics he perhaps opposed the papal court. He has been called the 'father of the public-school system;' and he established (though he did not invent) the Perpendicular architecture. See Lives by Lowth (new ed. 1777), Chandler (1842), Moberly (new ed. 1893); Winchester College 1393-1893 by old Wykehamists (1894); and Winchester College by Leach (1899).

Wylie, JAMES AITKEN (1805-90), a Scottish divine, wrote The Papacy (1851), a History of Protestantism (1878), and a score of other works.

Wynants, or WIJNANTS, JAN (c. 1620-79), Amsterdam landscape-painter, was born at Haarlem.

Wyndham, SIR CHARLES, born in 1841, and bred for a doctor, first appeared on the stage at New York in 1861, and made his debut in London in 1866. 'Charles Surface' and 'David Garrick' are among his parts.

Wynn, CHARLOTTE WILLIAMS (1807-60), daughter of the Right Hon. Charles Watkyn Williams Wynn, M.P., D.C.L. (1775-1850), who held office in various governments 1822-35, was the friend of Southey, Hallam, Mackintosh, Bunsen, Maurice, and Carlyle. See her interesting Letters (1878).

Wyntoun, ANDREW OF, an old rhyming Scottish chronicler, was a canon regular of St Andrews, who about 1395 became prior of the monastery of St Serf on Lochleven, and wrote The Orrygnale Cronykil of Scotland, specially valuable as a specimen of old Scotch. It is brought down to 1406, and of its nine books the first five give a fragmentary outline of the history and geography of the ancient world. A two-text edition was published by F. J. Amours (S.T.S., 1903 et seq.).

Wyon, WILLIAM, R.A. (1795-1851), born at Birmingham, the son of a die-sinker of German descent, was famous as a medallist and chief engraver to the Mint. See Memoir by N. Carlisle (1837).—His cousin, BENJAMIN WYON (1802-58), was also a seal-engraver and medallist, as was his son, JOSEPH SHEPHERD (1836-73). Others of the family have been eminent in cognate arts.

Wyss, JOHANN RUDOLF (1781-1830), author of The Swiss Family Robinson, was professor of Philosophy at Bern from 1806. His lectures on the supreme good (1811) and Swiss tales (1815-30) would hardly have preserved his name; but Der Schweizerische Robinson (1812-13) has been frequently translated—into English in 1820. Wytenbach, DANIEL (1746-1820), born at Bern, became professor of Greek at Amsterdam in 1771, of Philosophy in 1779, and in 1799 of Rhetoric. He retired in 1816. He edited Plutarch's Moralia (1795-1830), and wrote on logic, a Life of Ruhnken, &c. See Latin Life by Mahne (1823).—His wife, JOHANNA GALLIEN (d. 1830), whom he married at seventy-two, lived after his death at Paris, was given the doctorate of philosophy by Marburg in 1827, and wrote Théogène (1815), Das Gastmahl des Leontis (1821), and Alexis (1823).

Xavier, FRANCISCO, the 'Apostle of the Indies,' was born at his mother's castle of Xavero or Xavier near Sanguesa, in the Basque country, April 7, 1506, the youngest son of Juan de Jasso, privy-councillor to the king of Navarre. At Paris, where he studied and then lectured, he was associated with Loyola (q.v.) in founding the Jesuit Society (1534). Ordained priest in 1537, he lived at Rome in the service of the society, and by John III. of Portugal was sent out as missionary to the Portuguese colonies in the East. He arrived at Goa in 1542, and laboured with equal zeal and success among the corrupt Europeans and the native population. After a year he visited Travancore, where in a month he baptised 10,000 natives. He then visited Malacca, the Banda Islands, Amboyna, the Moluccas, and Ceylon, where he converted the king of Kandy with many of his people. The mission he next founded in Japan (1548) flourished for a hundred years. He returned to Goa in 1552 to organise a mission to China. But the intrigues of the Portuguese merchants and difficulties caused by the governor of Malacca wore out his strength, and he died December 22, 1552, soon after reaching the island of San-chian near Canton. His body was ultimately buried in Goa. He was canonised in 1622. His only literary remains are Letters (1631) and a Catechism, with some short ascetic treatises. His Life by Père Bouhours (1684) was translated by James Dryden, brother of the poet. There are also Lives in Latin by Tursellinus (1596), in Italian by Bartoli and Maffei (1658), in French by Cros (1900), in German by De Vos (1877), in English by Venn (1862), H. J. Cole-ridge (1873), and Mary McClean (1896). [Spanish pron. Ha-vee-air'; English, usu. Zay-vi-er.]

Xenocrates (396-314 B.C.), philosopher, born at Chalcedon, from 339 presided over the Platonic Academy as successor to Speusippus, himself the successor of Plato. He wrote numerous treatises, of which the titles only have been preserved; and he introduced into the Academy the mystic Pythagorean doctrine of numbers. [Zen-oc'-ra-teez.]

Xenophanes (fl. 540-500 B.C.), founder of the Eleatic School of philosophy, emigrated from Colophon to Elea in southern Italy about 536 B.C. He held that a supreme intelligence or deity was identical with the world. [Zen-of-an-eez.]

Xenophon (c. 435-354 B.C.), Greek historian, essayist, and military commander, the son of Gryllus, an Athenian knight, came under Socrates's influence during the thirty-five years he spent at Athens. In 401 he accepted the invitation of Proxenus of Bœotia, a commander of Greek mercenaries, to join him at Sardis and take service under the Persian prince, Cyrus, ostensibly against the Pisidians, but really against Cyrus's own brother, King Artaxerxes Mnemon. After the failure of this bold scheme, and the death of the rebel prince at Cunaxa (401), Xenophon succeeded Proxenus in the command of the Ten Thousand Greeks. He became the life and soul of the army in its march of 1500 miles, as they fought their way against the ferocious mountain tribes through the highlands of Armenia and the ice and snow of an inclement winter; and with such skill did he lead them that in five months they reached Trapezus (Trebizond), a Greek colony on the Black Sea, and ultimately Chrysopolis (Scutari), opposite Byzantium (399). After serving awhile under a Thracian chief, he got his soldiers permanent service in the Lacedæmonian army engaged to fight against the Persians. Sentence of banishment from Athens for thus taking service with Sparta was passed against him. Forming in 396 the closest friendship with the Spartan king, Agesilaus, he accompanied him in his eastern campaign; was in his suite when he returned to Greece to conduct the war against the anti-Spartan league of Athens, Corinth, and Thebes (394); and witnessed the battle of Coronea. He went back with the king to Sparta, where he resided on and off until the Spartans presented him with an estate at Scillus, a town taken from Elis. Hither in 387 he went with his wife Philesia and his two sons, Gryllus and Diodorus; and here he spent some twenty years of his life, indulging his taste for literary work and the pursuits of a country gentleman. But the break-up of Spartan ascendancy after the battle of Leuctra (371) drove him from his retreat. The Athenians, who had now joined the Spartans against Thebes, repealed the sentence of banishment against him. But he settled and died at Corinth. His writings give us the idea of having been written with great singleness of purpose, modesty, and love of truth. They may be distributed into four groups: (1) Historical—the Hellenics (the history of Greece for forty-nine years), Anabasis (the story of the expedition with Cyrus), and Encomium of Agesilaus. (2) Technical and didactic—on Horsemanship, the Hipparchicus ('guide for a cavalry commander'), and the Cynegeticus ('guide to hunting'). (3) Politico-philosophical—The Lacedæmonian Polity, The Cyropaedia ('the education of Cyrus,' rather a historical romance), and Athenian Finance. (4) Ethico-philosophical—Memorials of Socrates (sketches and dialogues illustrating the life and character of his master), Symposion, (Economicus, Hieron, and Apology of Socrates). The Polity of Athens is probably an anonymous work written about 415 B.C. Xenophon's style and language is unaffected, simple, and clear, without any attempt at ornamentation. The editio princeps of the Greek text was that of Boninus (1516), followed by the Aldine in 1525. Later editions of the whole or part of his works are by Hutchinson, Weiske, Fischer, Schneider, Bornemann, Breitenbach, Krüger, Kühner, Sauppe, Dindorf, Schenkl, Hertlein, Cobet, O. Keller, Hng, and Holden. See books by Roquette (1884), Croiset (1873), Lange (1900); Bury's Greek Historians (1909). [Zen-of-an-eez.]

Xerxes I., king of Persia in 485-465 B.C., succeeded when his father, Darius, died preparing for a third expedition against Greece. He first subdued the rebellious Egyptians, then started with a vast army drawn from all parts of the empire, and an enormous fleet furnished by the Phœnicians. A bridge, consisting of a double line of boats, was built across the Hellespont, and a canal cut through Mount Athos. In the autumn of 481 B.C. Xerxes arrived at Sardis. Next year the army began its march towards the Hellespont; it took seven days and nights to pass the bridge of boats. Herodotus puts the number of fighting-men at 2,641,610, and the ships-of-war at 1207, besides 3000 smaller vessels. When this immense force reached Thermopylae, it was brought to a stand by Leonidas and his 300 Spartans. After these had been slain Xerxes marched on to Athens (480), and, finding it deserted, destroyed alike temples and houses. Meantime the fleet had sailed round from Eubœa. Xerxes witnessed the fight in the strait between Salamis and Attica. Confounded at the result, he fled to the Hellespont; and his hopes of conquest died with the fall of his general, Mardonius, on the fatal field of Plataea (479 B.C.). Xerxes was murdered by Artabanus in 465, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes. [Zerx-eez.]

Ximenes, CARDINAL (1436-1517), was born Francisco Ximenes de Cisneros, of an ancient family, at Torrelaguna in Castile, and was educated at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Rome, where he obtained from the pope a nomination to an archbishopship in Toledo. The archbishop refused to admit him, and for six years imprisoned him. On his release he was named Vicar-general of Cardinal Mendoza, but entered a Franciscan monastery at Toledo (1482). Queen Isabella chose him for her confessor in 1492, and in 1495 made him Archbishop of Toledo. As archbishop he maintained the austerity of the monk, applying to religion and charity the princely revenues of his see. As the queen's spiritual counsellor he was the guiding spirit of Spanish affairs; and on her death in 1504 he held the balance between the parties of Ferdinand and Philip of Burgundy, husband of Joanna, the mad heiress to the crown. Appointed regent in 1506, he conducted the affairs of the kingdom through a critical time with consummate skill. In 1507 he was created cardinal, and next year organised at his own expense and commanded the expedition for the conquest of Oran and extirpation of piracy. Ferdinand on his deathbed (1516) named Ximenes regent of Spain till the arrival of his grandson Charles; and the aged cardinal quickly overawed the hostile grandees into submission, and quelled a revolt in Navarre. He died at Roa on his way to greet Charles, just arriving in Spain. Ximenes was fanatical in his hatred of heresy, and as Grand-inquisitor caused the death of 2500 persons. The revolution he effected in breaking down the feudal power of the nobles has often been compared with the change wrought in France by Richelieu. His munificence as a patron of religion, of letters, and of art deserves the highest praise. He founded the University of Alcalá de Henares, and published the famous Complutensian Polyglot. See the Latin Life by Gomez de Castro (1659), the French one by Flécher (1700), and German ones by Hefele (2d ed. 1851; trans. 1860) and Huidobro (1901). [Spanish pron. Hee-may'nays.]

YARMOUTH, SOPHIA VON WALMODEN, COUNTESS OF, already known to our George II. in Hanover, on Queen Caroline's death (1737) was brought to England as the king's mistress, and created a countess. She died in 1765.

Yarrell, WILLIAM (1784-1856), naturalist, born at Westminster, originally a newspaper agent, devoted himself to zoological work. He wrote History of British Fishes (1835-36; 3d ed. 1859) and History of British Birds (1830-43; 4th ed. 1881-85).

Yates, EDMUND (1831-94), born at Edinburgh, the son of the actor-manager Frederick Henry Yates (1797-1842), from 1847 till 1872 had a berth in the Post-office, being for ten years chief of the missing-letter department. From 1854 he published under a score of novels and other works (Broken to Harness, Running the Gauntlet, Black Sheep, &c.); was editor of Temple Bar, Tinsley's, and other periodicals; and in 1874 founded, with Grenville Murray, a successful 'society' weekly, The World, which, for a libel on Lord Lonsdale, involved him in 1884 in two months' imprisonment. See his Recollections (1884).

Yeames, WILLIAM FREDERICK, historical and subject painter, born at Taganrog, S. Russia, 18th Dec. 1835, studied in London, Florence, and Rome, and became A.R.A. in 1866, R.A. in 1878.

Yeats, SIDNEY KILNER LEVETT, in the service of the government of India, has written Widow Lampart (1892), The Romance of Guard Mulligan and other Stories (1893), The Honour of Savelli (1895), The Chevalier d'Aurillac (1897), &c.

Yeats, WILLIAM BUTLER, born in Dublin, 13th June 1865, the son of an artist, was for three years an art student, but in 1888 settling in London, and taking to literature, published a succession of volumes of poems, plays, and collections of Irish tales, edited Blake (with E. J. Ellis), and became a champion of the Irish Neo-Celtic movement. His works in 8 volumes were published in 1908-12. Deirdre is the best known of the plays. See H. S. Kraus, W. B. Yeats and the Irish Literary Revival (1904).

Yelverton, MRS. the name claimed by Theresa Longworth, daughter of a Manchester silk-merchant, who was educated in a French convent, and was a nurse in the Crimea. The House of Lords on appeal (1867) decided against her claim to be the wife of Major Yelverton, afterwards Lord Avonmore (1824-83). She died in 1881.

Yerkes, CHARLES TYSON (1837-1905), railway financier, endowed in 1892 the Yerkes Observatory in connection with the Chicago University, but 45 miles N.W. of the city, which contains a 40-inch refractor, the largest telescope in existence.

Yonge, CHARLOTTE MARY, only daughter of W. C. Yonge of Otterbourne, Hants, was born 11th August 1823. She gained a large constituency of readers by her Heir of Redclyffe (1853) and its successors, publishing some 120 volumes of fiction, High Church in tone. Part of the profits of the Heir of Redclyffe was devoted to fitting out the missionary schooner Southern Cross for Bishop Selwyn; and those of the Daisy Chain (£2000) she gave to build a missionary college in New Zealand. She has also published historical works, a book on Christian Names (1863), a Life of Bishop Patten (1873), and a sketch of Hannah More (1888), besides translating much and editing the Monthly

Packet. She died 24th March 1901. There was an edition of her best tales in 1888-89. [Yung.]

York, CARDINAL. See STEWART.

York, DUKE OF, the title often of the second sons of the kings of England. Edward III.'s fourth son Edmund founded that House of York which fought the Wars of the Roses. James II. was recognised as Duke of York from 1660 till his accession in 1685. George I. conferred the title on his brother, Ernest Augustus; and George III. on his second son, Frederick Augustus (1763-1827), who showed his military incapacity in command of an expedition to the Netherlands against the French in 1793, and again in 1799, having in 1795 been made British commander-in-chief. He had to resign that post because of the shameful traffic in military appointments carried on by his mistress, Mrs Clarke (q.v.), but was reinstated (1811). In 1892 the dukedom was conferred on Prince George Frederick Ernest Albert, second son of Edward VII., who by the death of his brother, the Duke of Clarence, had become heir to the crown; in 1901 he was created Prince of Wales; and on 6th May 1910 succeeded his father as king, taking the style of George V. (q.v.).

Yorke, PHILIP, EARL OF HARDWICKE (1690-1764), a Dover attorney's son, in 1737 became Lord Chancellor, supported Walpole, and held office under the Duke of Newcastle. He presided at the trial of the rebel lords in 1745, and promoted the laws that proscribed tartan and abolished heritable jurisdiction in Scotland. His Marriage Act of 1754 abolished Fleet marriages.—His son, Philip, second Earl (1720-90), held public offices and wrote Athenian Letters and edited Walpoleiana.

York von Wartenburg, HANS DAVID LUDWIG (1759-1830), was the son of a Pomeranian captain, Von York or Jarck, claiming English descent. He entered the army in 1772, was cashiered for insubordination, and served in the Dutch East Indies, but rejoining the Prussian service, gained glory in the wars of 1794, 1806, 1812, and 1813-14. Ennobled 1814, he was made a field-marshal 1821.

Young, ANDREW (1807-89), an Edinburgh and St Andrews schoolmaster, wrote 'There is a happy Land.'

Young, ARTHUR (1741-1820), writer on agriculture, was born at Whitehall, but spent his boyhood, as indeed most of his life, at Bradfield near Bury St Edmunds, his father being rector and a prebendary of Canterbury. In 1763 he rented a small farm of his mother's, on which he made 3000 unsuccessful experiments; during 1766-71 held a good-sized farm in Essex (ruin the result); from 1776 to 1778 was in Ireland; resumed farming at Bradfield; and in 1793 was appointed secretary to the Board of Agriculture, with a salary of £400. Blind from 1811, he died in London, and was buried at Bradfield. Young, by his writings, was one of the first to elevate agriculture to a science. They include A Tour through the Southern Counties (1768), A Tour through the North of England (1771), The Farmer's Tour through the East of England (1770-71), Tour in Ireland (1780), Travels in France during 1787-88-89-90 (a very memorable view of the state of France just before the Revolution, 1792-94), The Farmer's Kalender (215th ed. 1862), and 'Agricultural Surveys' of eight English counties, besides many papers in The Annals of Agriculture, which he edited. See A. W. Hutton's edition of the Tour in Ireland, with bibliography by J. P. Anderson (1892); M. Bethan-Edwards's edition of the Travels in France (1890); and her edition of his Autobiography (1898).

Young, BRIGHAM, Mormon leader, born at Whiteingham, Vt., June 1, 1801, was a carpenter, painter, and glazier in Mendon, N.Y. He first saw the 'Book of Mormon' in 1830, and in 1832, converted by a brother of Joseph Smith (q.v.), was baptised and began to preach near Mendon. Next he went to Kirtland, Ohio, was made an elder, and preached in Canada 1832-33. In 1835 he was appointed one of the twelve apostles of the church, in 1844 president; and the Mormons, when driven from Nauvoo, were led by him to Utah in 1847. In 1840 he visited England and made 2000 proselytes. In 1848 the great body of Mormons arrived at Utah, and founded Salt Lake City; and in 1851 President Fillmore appointed Brigham Young governor. In 1853 a new governor, Cuming, was sent with a force of United States troops. The determination of the United States to abolish polygamy, and the appointment in 1869 of another 'Gentile' governor, reduced Young's authority. Practical and far-seeing (though a fanatic), he encouraged agriculture and manufactures, made roads and bridges, and carried through a contract for 100 miles of the Union Pacific Railroad. He died 29th August 1877, leaving $2,500,000 to seventeen wives and fifty-six children.

Young, CHARLES MAYNE (1777-1856), tragedian, son of a scoundrelly London surgeon, was driven from home with his mother and two brothers, and had for a while been a clerk in a West India house, when in 1798 he made his debut at Liverpool; in 1807 he appeared in London as 'Hamlet.' He was a really original actor, second only, in some parts superior, to Kean himself. In 1832 he retired with a fortune of £60,000. In 1805 he had married a brilliant young actress, Julia Anne Grimani (1785-1806).—Their son, JULIAN CHARLES YOUNG (1806-73), was rector of Southwick in Sussex 1844-50, and then of Ilmington, Worcestershire; he published a most amusing Memoir of Charles Mayne Young (1871), four-fifths of it his own Journal, and supplemented in 1875 by Last Leaves from that same Journal.

Young, EDWARD (1683-1765), author of Night Thoughts, was born at Upham rectory near Bishops Waltham, the son of a future dean of Salisbury, and in 1708 received a law fellowship of All Souls, Oxford. He came before the world as a poet in 1712 with an Epistle to George Granville on being created Lord Lansdowne, and continued through life a persevering toady. In 1719 he produced a tragedy, Busiris, at Drury Lane; in 1716 he was in Ireland in attendance on the dissolute young Marquis (afterwards Duke) of Wharton; and he was tutor in the family of the Marquis of Exeter. His second tragedy, The Revenge, was produced in 1721; his third and last, The Brothers, in 1753. His satires, The Love of Fame, the Universal Passion (1725-28), brought money as well as fame; and for The Instalment (1726), a poem addressed to Sir Robert Walpole, he got a pension of £200. In 1727 Young took holy orders, and was appointed a royal chaplain; in 1730 he became rector of Welwyn in Hertfordshire. The year after he married Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Lichfield and widow of Colonel Lee. The Night Thoughts (1742-44), occasioned by her death and other sorrows, in spite of much fustian sublimity and artificial melancholy, has never ceased to be popular, and many of its sententious lines have passed into proverbial use; some parts are real poetry. The Life in Johnson's Lives of the Poets was by Croft (1782). Doran and Mitford added a few facts in their editions of Young (1852-54). See George Eliot's Essays; Thomas, Le Poète E. Young (Paris, 1901).

Young, JAMES (1811-83), of paraffin fame, was the son of a Glasgow joiner, and himself for a while one, but attended classes in chemistry, &c., at Anderson's College, and in 1832 became assistant to Prof. Graham. In 1837 he obtained a post in University College, London. As manager of chemical-works near Liverpool (1839) and near Manchester (1843) he discovered cheaper methods of producing stannate of soda and chlorate of potash; and it was his experiments (1847-50) which led to the manufacture of paraffin-oil and solid paraffin on a large scale.

Young, ROBERT, LL.D. (1822-89), born at Edinburgh, was bred a printer, superintended the Mission Press at Surat 1856-61, and at Edinburgh prepared a long series of books—including an independent Translation of the Bible, Marginal Readings (10,000) for the English Testament, Hebrew Vocabulary, and Analytical Concordance.

Young, THOMAS, Puritan divine, born in Perthshire, studied at St Andrews, was Milton's tutor till 1622, and afterwards held charges at Hamburg and in Essex. He was the chief author in 1641 of an Answer to Bishop Hall by 'Smectynus,' a name compounded of the initials of Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow. Young died about 1650.

Young, THOMAS (1773-1829), physicist, born of Quaker parentage at Milverton, Somerset, studied medicine at London, Edinburgh, Göttingen, and Cambridge, and started as doctor in London in 1800, but devoted himself to scientific research, and in 1801 became professor of Natural Philosophy to the Royal Institution. His Lectures (1807) expounded the doctrine of interference, which established the undulatory theory of light. He was secretary to the Royal Society, and did valuable work in insurance, hæmodynamics, and Egyptology. See Life by Peacock (1855) and Prof. Tyndall's New Fragments (1892).

Yourieffskaia, PRINCESS. See DOLGORUKOVA.

Ypsilanti, ALEXANDER (1725-1805), of a Fanariot family, claiming descent from the Comneni, became hospodar of Wallachia, but was put to death on suspicion of fostering Greek ambitions.—His son CONSTANTINE became also hospodar of Moldavia and Wallachia. Deposed in 1805, he came back with some thousands of Russian soldiers, stirred up the Servians to rebellion, and made another plan for restoring Greece, but had to flee to Russia, and died in 1816.—His eldest son, ALEXANDER (1783-1828), served with distinction in the Russian army in 1812-13, and was chosen by the Greek 'Hetairists' as their chief in 1820. He headed a Rouman movement, but, defeated by the Turks, took refuge in Austria.—His younger brother, DEMETRIUS (1793-1832), also served in the Russian army, and aided his brother's schemes for emancipating the Christian population of Turkey. In Greece he took part in the capture of Tripolitza (Oct. 1820). His gallant defence of Argos stopped the victorious march of the Turks, and in 1828-30 he was Greek commander-in-chief.

Yriarte, CHARLES (1832-98), French author of Spanish ancestry, born in Paris, studied architecture, but from 1861 devoted himself to literature; his works deal with Spain, Paris, the Franco-German war, Venice (trans. 1879), Florence

(trans. 1882), Cæsar Borgia (1889), Isabella d'Este (1892), &c. [Spanish pron. Ee-ri-ar'teh.]

Yule, Sir Henry, C.B., K.C.S.I., LL.D. (1820-89), Orientalist, born at Inveresk near Edinburgh, the son of a major in the H.E.I.C., passed from Addiscombe into the Bengal Engineers in 1840. He served on the north-east frontiers, on irrigation works, in surveys in Arakan, and on a mission to Ava (1855), and was Secretary to Government in the Public Works department from 1858 till 1862, when he retired as colonel. He sat on the Indian Council 1875-89. He was corresponding member of the French Institute and president of the Royal Asiatic Society. He wrote numerous articles in the Journals of the Geographical and Asiatic Societies, and valuable Introductions for books on Central Asia, &c. His Cathay and the Way Thither (1866), notices of China before the 16th century, prepared the way for his magistral work, The Book of Ser Marco Polo (1871; 8d. ed. 1903). His next great work was the Anglo-Indian Glossary, or Hobson-Jobson (1886; 3rd ed. 1903).

ACCARIA, ANTONY (1502-39), founded the Barnabite preaching order, and was canonised in 1897.

Zaccone, Pierre (1817-95), was a fertile French playwright and sensational novelist of the Dumas type.

Zacharias, a Greek by birth, was pope from 741 to 752, and recognised Pepin the Short as king of France (752).

Zadkiel, the name assumed by Richard James Morrison (1794-1874), who in 1830 started an astrological almanac, which reached a yearly sale of near 200,000 copies. He was a retired commander in the navy, a Hebraist, mathematician, and astronomer, withal a real believer in his pseudo-science, as was proved by his action for libel against Sir E. Belcher (1863).

Zahn, Theodor, biblical scholar, born at Mörs in Rhenish Prussia, Oct. 10, 1838, became professor at Göttingen (1871), Kiel (1877), Erlangen (1878), Leipzig (1888), and Erlangen again (1891). Books on the Shepherd of Hermas, Ignatius, Constantine the Great, Sunday in the Ancient Church, &c. (1868-82), were followed by his splendid series on the New Testament Canon (1881-93), including Tatian's Diatessaron and an Introduction to the New Testament (1897). With Gebhardt and Harnack he edited the Patres Apostoli (1876-78).

Zanella, Giacomo (1820-88), Italian poet, born at Chiampio, became a priest, and in 1866 professor of Italian Literature at Padua.

Zangwill, Israel, born of Jewish family in London in 1864, went to school at Plymouth and Bristol, but was mainly self-taught, graduated with honours at London University, and, after some experience in teaching, became an active journalist. He has written poems, plays, novels, and essays, and became widely known by his Jewish tales—Children of the Ghetto (1892), Ghetto Tragedies (1894), The King of Schnorrers (1894), and Dreamers of the Ghetto (1898). Other works are The Master, Without Prejudice (essays), A Revolted Daughter (a play), Nurse Marjorie, The Melting-Pot (1908).

Zapolya, John (1487-1540), prince of Transylvania, was proclaimed king of Hungary in 1526, and after various changes of fortune secured his throne.—His son, John Sigismund (1540-71), had to content himself with Transylvania and E. Hungary.

Zarncke, Friedrich (1825-91), Germanist, born near Bruel in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, became a journalist at Leipzig (1850) and in 1858 professor of German Literature there. Besides editing Brandt's Narrenschiff (1854), he wrote on the Nibelungenlied (1857), medieval German universities (1857), the Old Saxon Heliand, medieval poetical proverbs (1863-65), and Prester John (1876-79).

Zechariah, minor prophet, born in Babylonia during the captivity, went back with the first band of exiles to Judæa. Of the Book of Zechariah only the first eight chapters are by him.

Zedlitz, Joseph Christian von (1790-1862), poet, born at Johannisberg in Austrian Silesia, fought in the 1809 campaign at Aspern and Wagram, and served the Austrian foreign office in Saxony and other German states. His dramas—Kerker und Krone, &c.—were long popular; but his name best survives in his lyrics of reflection and narrative and in his poetical tales, Waldfräulein and Altnordische Bilder.

Zeller, Eduard (1814-1908), born at Kleinbottwar in Württemberg, studied at Tübingen and Berlin, and settled at Tübingen in 1840 as privat-docent in theology. In 1847 he became professor of Theology at Bern, and in 1849 at Marburg, whence he was called to the chair of Philosophy at Heidelberg in 1862, at Berlin in 1872. Perhaps the ablest of the direct disciples of his father-in-law, Baur, he forsook theology and his early Hegelianism for historical work, carried on in an impartial and eclectic spirit. He retired in 1894 with the title of 'Excellency,' and is an honorary member of the Berlin Academy (of which he was long the secretary). He published Platonic studies in 1839, a trenchant work on the Acts of the Apostles (on Baur's lines, 1854; trans. 1876), books on Zwingli (1853), D. F. Strauss (1874), and Frederick the Great (1886); a history of German philosophy since Leibnitz (1872), and a manual of Greek philosophy (1883; trans. 1886); besides his magistral work, Die Geschichte der Griechischen Philosophie (1844-52; 5th ed. 1892), which has been translated as Socrates and the Socratic Schools (1868); Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics (1870); Plato and the Older Academy (1876); The Pre-Socratic Philosophy (1881); The Eclectics (1883); Aristotle and the Early Peripatetics (1897).

Zenghis Khan. See GENGHIS.

Zeno, Greek philosopher, flourished about 500 B.C. at Elea, a Greek colony in Lucania. A favourite disciple of Parmenides, he came with him to Athens, and on his return to Elea joined an unsuccessful conspiracy against the tyrant Nearchus. He held the usual doctrines of the Eleatic school respecting the unity and immutability of all things, distrust in knowledge acquired through the senses, and reliance on pure reason. Of his works but small fragments remain. See Zeller's Pre-Socratic Philosophy (trans. 1881).

Zeno (342-270 B.C.), founder of the Stoic philosophy, came in 320 from Citium in Cyprus to Athens, and attached himself first to the Cynic Crates. But, dissatisfied with the Cynics, he joined the Megaric school, then the Academics, and finally opened a school for himself in the 'Painted Porch' (Stoa Poikilê). In extreme old age he committed suicide. He taught the fundamental Stoic tenets, including the pantheistic god and the anti-Epicurean ethics. See Zeller, Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics (trans. 1870); Capes, Stoicism (1880); Jordan, Stoic Moralists (1880); and Pearson's Fragments of Zeno and Cleanthes (1891).

Zeno (474-491), Emperor of the East, was a weak ruler, and during his reign internal distractions and foreign troubles greatly increased.

Zeno of TARSUS succeeded Chrysippus as head of the Stoic school.—ZENO of SIDON, Epicurean philosopher, taught at Athens to 78 B.C.

Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, was born there probably of Arab descent, and became the wife of the Bedouin Odenathus, lord of the city, who in 264 A.D. was recognised by Gallienus as governor of the East. On her husband's murder (c. 271) nearly the whole of the eastern provinces submitted to her sway. When Aurelian assumed the purple, he marched against her, defeated her in several battles, besieged her in Palmyra, and ultimately captured her attempting flight (272). She saved her life by imputing the blame of the war to her secretary, Longinus (q.v.); he was beheaded and Palmyra destroyed. Zenobia, decked with jewels, was led in triumphal procession at Rome, and presented by her conqueror with large possessions near Tivoli, where, with her two sons, she passed the rest of her life in comfort and even splendour. Strikingly beautiful and of high spirit, she governed with prudence, justice, and liberality; and her literary acquirements were considerable. See W. Wright, Palmyra and Zenobia (1895).

Zephaniah, a Hebrew prophet who flourished towards the end of the 7th century B.C.

Zeppelin, COUNT, a German army officer, born 1838, served in the Franco-German war, and in 1897-1900 constructed his first air-ship or dirigible balloon of rigid type. Several of its improved successors came to grief, as in 1910 and 1911.

Zeuss, JOHANN KASPAR (1806-56), founder of Celtic philology, became professor in the Lyceum at Bamberg in 1847. [Zoiss.]

Zeuxis, the painter, born at Heraclea, flourished at Athens before 400 B.C.

Ziegenbalg, BARTHOLOMEW (1683-1719), missionary, born at Pulsnitz in Lusatia, on the call of Frederick IV. of Denmark went to establish (1706) Christian missions in the then Danish colony of Tranquebar, where he died. He published a Tamil grammar and a Bible in Tamil.

Ziegler, HEINRICH, theologian, born at Posen, 16th May 1841, became pastor at Liegnitz, and published two works on Irenæus (1868 and 1871) and Der Geschichtliche Christus (1891). [Tsee'ler.]

Zieten, or ZIETHEN, HANS JOACHIM VON (1699-1786), cavalry general, born at Wüstran near Potsdam, was dismissed from the Prussian cavalry for insubordination in 1727, but in 1730 rehabilitated. As colonel of hussars (1741) he increased the efficiency of the Prussian light cavalry. In 1744 he burst into Bohemia, and executed a dexterous retreat; in the Seven Years' War he covered himself with glory at Prague, Collin, Leuthen, Liegnitz, and Torgau. 'Old Father Zieten' thereafter lived in retirement at Berlin, in high favour with Frederick the Great. See Life by Winter (1886). [Zsee'ten.]

Zimisce, JOHN, Byzantine emperor in 969-976, fought stoutly against Saracens, Bulgars, and Russians. See study of his time by Schlumberger (L'Épopée Byzantine, 1897). [Zi-mis'-seez.]

Zimmermann, JOHANN GEORG, RITTER VON (1728-95), born at Brugg in Switzerland, studied medicine at Göttingen, and became town-physician at Brugg, where he published his sentimental book On Solitude (1755; rewritten 1785), which was translated from the German into almost every European language. He also wrote on 'national pride' and on medical subjects. In 1768 he went to Hanover with the title of physician to George III., and was summoned to Berlin to the last illness of Frederick the Great, and after his death published several worthless books about him. See book by Bodemann (1878).

Zimmern, HELEN, born in Hamburg in 1846, was brought to England in 1850. Her Epic of Kings (1882) was from a French version of Firdausi (q.v.); and she has published books on Schopenhauer (1876), Lessing (1878), and Miss Edgeworth (1883), Tales from the Edda (1883), The Hansa Towns (1889), Stories from Foreign Novelists, &c. [Zim'-mern.]

Zingerle, IGNAZ VINCENZ (1825-81), born at Meran, taught at Innsbruck Gymnasium, and, besides poems, wrote on ethnography and Tyrolean history, customs, and folk-tales. [Zing'er-leh.]

Zinzendorf, NICOLAUS LUDWIG, COUNT VON (1700-60), founder of the Moravian Brethren, was born at Dresden, studied under Francke (q.v.) at Halle, and held a government post at Dresden. He invited the persecuted Moravians to his Lusatian estates, and there founded for them the colony of Herrnhut ('the Lord's keeping'). His zeal led to troubles with the government, and in 1736-48 he was exiled. During this time he was ordained at Tübingen, and became bishop of the Moravian Brethren. He died at Herrnhut, having written over a hundred books. Many of his hymns are still sung by the Brethren. See works by Spangenberg (1775), Bovet (1860; trans. 1865), Plett (1874), Burkhardt (1876), Becker (1886), and Von Nalzer (1894).

Ziska, or ZIZKA, JOHN (c. 1360-1424), Hussite leader, nobly born at Trocnov in Bohemia, was brought up as page to King Wenceslas. He fought for the Teutonic Knights against the Poles, for the Austrians against the Turks, and for the English at Agincourt (1415). In Bohemia soon after the murder of Huss he became chamberlain to King Wenceslas, and joined the extremist party of hatred against Rome. After the outbreak at Prague (30th July 1419) Ziska was chosen leader of the popular party, with 4000 men defeated the Emperor Sigismund's 40,000, captured Prague (1421), and erected the fortress of Tabor, whence his party was called Taborites. In 1421 he lost his remaining eye at the siege of Raby, but continued to lead on his troops to a succession of twelve unexampled victories, with but one defeat, compelling Sigismund to offer the Hussites religious liberty. But he died of plague at the siege of Przbibitz ere the war was finished. Ziska was cruel, but less so than his enemies. See study by Tomek (1879; German trans. 1882).

Zittel, KARL ALFRED VON (1839-1904), a copious and distinguished authority on geology and palæontology, and the history thereof, taught at Vienna, Karlsruhe, and Munich, and was president of the Bavarian Academy.

Zöckler, OTTO (1833-1906), orthodox Lutheran theologian, born at Grünberg in Hesse, became professor at Giessen in 1863, and in 1866 at Greifswald. He published commentaries on both the Old and New Testament books, a history of asceticism and monachism, &c., and edited theological reviews. [Zoe'ker.]

Zoe, daughter of the Byzantine emperor Constantine VIII., caused the murder of her husband, Romanus III., made her paramour emperor as Michael IV. (1034), and after his death (1042) married Constantine IX. She died 1050. [Zoe'e.]

Zoega, JOHANN GEORG (1755-1809), born in Jutland of Italian descent, studied at Göttingen, and settled at Rome, where he turned Catholic. He wrote on Egyptian coins and Roman bas-reliefs, and made a great catalogue of Coptic MSS. See Life by Welcker (1819). [Zzo-ay ga.]

Zoepffel, RICHARD OTTO (1843-91), a theologian of the school of Ritschl, born at Arensburg in Livonia, became professor at Strasburg in 1877. He wrote Die Papstwahl (1871) and Johannes Sturm (1887). [Zzeyfel.] Zoff any, JOHN (1723-1810), a German portrait-painter, settled in London, where he became R.A. in 1768. He was a friend of Reynolds.

Zollus, Greek rhetorician, born at Amphipolis, flourished in the 3d c. B.C. From the bitterness with which he attacked Homer, his name has become proverbial for a malignant critic.

Zola, ÉMILE, was born in Paris, the son of an Italian engineer, 2d April 1840. He entered the publishing house of Hachette as a clerk, but soon became an active journalist. His work in criticism and politics was almost uniformly unfortunate; later he attempted the drama with equal lack of success. His true forte for short stories showed itself in the charming Contes à Ninon (1864), Nouveaux Contes à Ninon (1874), the collections entitled Le Capitaine Burtle and Nais Micoulin, and the splendid Attaque du Moulin (1880). In the later years of the Empire he had formed with Flaubert, Daudet, the Goncourts, and Turgenief a sort of informal society, out of which grew the 'Naturalist school.' In this direction Thérèse Raquin (1867) is a very powerful picture of remorse. But it was not until after the war that he began the great series of novels with a purpose called Les Rougon-Macquart; it comprises a score of volumes, all connected by the appearance of the same or different members of the family. The two 'mother-ideas' of Zola's naturalism have been heredity and a certain cerebral infirmity; and to apply his theory to the study of the document humain, he has mastered the technical details of most professions, occupations, and crafts, as well as the history of recent events in France. He began with a sort of general sketch called La Fortune des Rougon. La Curée and Son Excellence Eugène Rougon deal with the society of the later days of the Second Empire. La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret is an attack upon celibacy, and is, like La Conquête de Plassans, a vivid study of provincial life. Le Ventre de Paris deals with the lowest strata of the Parisian population. L'Assommoir depicts drunkenness; Pot-Bouille the lower bourgeoisie and their servants; Au Bonheur des Dames 'universal providers.' Une Page d'Amour and La Joie de Vivre are more generally human. Nana is devoted to the cult of the goddess Lubricity. L'Œuvre deals with art and literature. La Terre is an appallingly repulsive study of the French peasant, and Germinal of the miner; La Bête Humaine contains minute information as to the working of railways; Le Rêve displays a remarkable acquaintance with the details of church ritual; L'Argent exploits financial crashes; and La Débâcle recounts the great disaster of 1870. Dr Pascal (1893) is a sort of feeble summing-up. Lourdes (1894), dealing with faith-healing at that sacred spot, is hardly a novel, any more than is Rome (1896), a critical study of the Papal Curia, or Paris (1898)—the trilogy of 'Les Trois Villes.' Fécondité was the work of 1899. Zola espoused the cause of Dreyfus (q.v.), impeached the military authorities, and was sentenced to imprisonment (1898), but escaped for a year to England. He was accidentally suffocated by charcoal fumes 29th September 1902. See works on him by Sherard (1893), Toudouz (1896), and Vizetelly (1899).

Zollikofer, GEORG JOACHIM (1730-88), preacher, born at St Gall in Switzerland, settled at Leipzig in 1758.

Zonaras, JOANNES, a 12th-century historian at Constantinople, was private secretary to Alexius I. Comnenus, and died a monk at Mount Athos.

Zorilla, MANUEL RUIZ (1834-95), Spanish statesman, a strong Progressist or Radical, was banished for his share in the revolution of 1866, was a minister in 1868-70 and under Amadeus, and led a revolt in 1884. [Tho-reel'ya.]

Zoroaster (a Grecised form of Zarathushtra, modern Zaradusht), the founder or reformer of the ancient Parsee religion, appears as a historical person only in the earliest portion of the Avesta. His family name was Spitama; but where he was born is not known. As the centre of a group of chieftains, one of whom was King Vishtâspa, he carried on a political, military, and theological struggle for the defence or wider establishment of a holy agricultural state, whose laws and principles encouraged pastoral labour, tillage, and thrift, as against Turanian and Vedic aggressors. He lived in N.W. Persia not later than 800 B.C. The keynote of his system is that the world and history exhibit the struggle between Ormuzd and Ahriman (the creator or good spirit, and the evil principle, the devil), in which at the end evil will be banished and the good reign supreme. See work by Williams Jackson (1899). [Zo-ro-as'ter.]

Zo'simus, a pagan Greek historian, who held office at Constantinople under Theodosius II. (408-450). His Historia Nova deals with the Roman emperors to 410 A.D.—For Pope Zosinus (417-418), see PELAGIUS.

Zschokke, JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL (1771-1848), born at Magdeburg, was a strolling playwright, then a student at Frankfurt, lectured there and adapted plays, and finally opened a boarding-school at Reichenau in the Grisons. In 1799 he settled at Aarau, where he became a member of the Great Council. His books include histories of Bavaria and Switzerland, and a long series of tales—Der Creole, Jonathan Frock, Clementine, Oswald, Meister Jordan, &c. The most popular of all was Die Stunden der Andacht (1809-16; trans. as Hours of Meditation, 1843)—a Sunday periodical, expounding rationalism with eloquence and zeal. His collected writings fill 35 vols. (1851-54). A few of his tales (Goldmaker's Village, Lover's Stratagem, Veronica, &c.) have been translated into English. See his autobiographical Selbstschau (trans. 1847); Lives by Munch (1831) and Emil Zschokke (3d ed. 1876), and studies by Keller (1887) and Wernly (1894). [Tchok'keh.]

Zuccaro, TADDEO (1529-66), painter in Rome, left some pretentious but not valuable frescoes and easel-pieces of no especial merit.—His brother, FEDERIGO (1543-1609), during his travels painted portraits (Queen Elizabeth, Mary Stuart, &c.), but devoted most of his time to unsatisfactory frescoes at Florence, Venice, the Escorial, &c. He founded at Rome the Academy of St Luke (1595). [Dzook'ka-ro.]

Zukertort, JOHANN HERMANN (1842-88), born at Lublin in Poland, studied medicine at Breslau, but from 1867 devoted himself to chess. Settling in England in 1872, he founded and edited the Chess Monthly, won tournaments in Paris and London, was defeated by Steinitz in America in 1885, and died in London. He published two German chess manuals (1869-79).

Zumala-Carreguy, TOMAS (1789-1835), greatest of Carlist generals, was born at Ormaiztegua in the Basque province of Guipuzcoa. He fought against Napoleon, on the re-establishment of absolutism was made governor of Ferrol, but in 1832, with other Carlists, was dismissed the army. Head of the Basque Carlist insurrection (1833), he kept his opponents at bay, and gained a series of victories over the Christiano generals. This turned the weak head of Don Carlos, and led him to interfere with the plans of his general, who was anxious to strike for Madrid, but who, ordered to lay siege to Bilbao, was mortally wounded by a musket-ball. See Henningsen's Twelve Months' Campaign (1836) and Cornhill for January 1871. [Thoo-mah'la Kar-ray'ghee.]

Zumpt, KARL (1792-1849), classical scholar, born at Berlin, became in 1827 extra-ordinary, in 1836 ordinary, professor at the university there. His works include the Latinische Grammatik (1818; 13th ed. 1874), and editions of Curtius (1826 and 1849), Quintilian (1831), Cicero's Verrine Orations (1830-31), and De Officiis (1837). He wrote books on the Roman knights (1839), the population of ancient states (1841), the philosophical schools of Athens (1843), the Roman dwelling-houses (1844), Roman Religion (1845), and the legal standing of the Roman citizen (1846). See Latin Life by his nephew (1851). — That nephew, AUGUST ZUMPT (1815-77), lectured at Berlin, and devoted himself to Latin epigraphy. See the Life of him by Padoletti (1878). [Zzoompt.]

Zupitza, JULIUS (1844-95), Germanist, born at Oberglogau, studied at Breslau, and was professor of German or of English at Breslau, Vienna, and (from 1876) Berlin. He edited Cynewulf's Elene (1877), Aelfric's grammar (1880), Beowulf (1882), Guy of Warwick (1883-87), &c.

Zurbaran, FRANCISCO (1598-1662), Spanish religious painter, the son of a labourer in Estremadura, spent most of his laborious life at Seville. His masterpiece, an altarpiece, is in the museum there. The London National Gallery has a fine kneeling Franciscan holding a skull. [Spanish pron. Theor-ba-rah'n'.]

Zwingli, HULDRICH (Latinised Ulicus Zwinglius, and then Anglicised into Zwingle), Swiss Reformer, was born at Wildhaus in St Gall, Jan. 1, 1484, studied at Bern, Vienna, and Basel, and became priest at Glarus in 1506. Here he taught himself Greek, and twice (1512, 1515) as field-chaplain accompanied the Glarus mercenaries. Transferred in 1516 to Einsiedeln, whose Black Virgin was a great resort of pilgrims, he made no secret of his contempt for such superstition. In 1518 elected preacher in the Zurich minster, he roused the council not to admit within the city gates Bernhardin Samson, a seller of indulgences. He preached the gospel boldly, and in 1521 succeeded in keeping Zurich from joining the other cantons in their alliance with France. The Bishop of Constance sent his vicar-general, who was quickly silenced in debate by the Reformer (1523), in presence of the council and six hundred; whereupon the city adopted the Reformed doctrines as set forth in Zwingli's sixty-seven theses. A second disputation followed (1523), with the result that images and the mass were swept away. Zwingli married Anna Meyer (née Reinhard), a widow of forty-three, in 1524; on Easter Sunday 1525 he dispensed the sacrament in both kinds; and the Reformation spread widely over Switzerland. Zwingli first made public his views on the Lord's Supper in 1524; and the first stage of the controversy with Luther, destined to rend the Protestant Church, closed with the fruitless conference at Marburg (1529). He rejected every form of local or corporeal presence, whether by transubstantiation or consubstantiation. Meantime the progress of the Reformation had aroused bitter hatred in the Forest Cantons. Five of them formed in 1528 an alliance, to which the Archduke Ferdinand of Austria was admitted. Zurich declared war in 1529 on account of the burning alive of a Protestant pastor seized on neutral territory, but bloodshed was averted for a time by the first treaty of Cappel (1529). But the Forest Cantons made a sudden dash on Zurich with 8000 men, and were met at Cappel by but 2000. The men of Zurich made a desperate resistance, but were completely defeated, and among the dead lay the Reformer, Oct. 11, 1531. Zwingli preached substantially the Reformed doctrines as early as 1516, the year before the appearance of Luther's theses. Original sin he regarded as a moral disease rather than as punishable sin or guilt. He maintained the salvation of unbaptised infants, and he believed in the salvation of such virtuous heathens as Socrates, Plato, Pindar, Numa, Scipio, and Seneca. On predestination he was as Calvinistic as Calvin or Augustine. With less of fire and power than Luther, he was the most open-minded and liberal of the Reformers. Zwingli's Opera fill four folios (1545); later editions are by Schuler and Schulthess (1828-42; supp. 1861). The chief is the Commentarius de vera et falsa religione (1525); the rest are mainly occupied with the exposition of Scripture and controversies on the Eucharist, &c. There are old Lives by Myconius and Bullinger; modern ones by Hottinger (1841; trans. 1856), Christoffel (1857; trans. 1858), Spörri (1866), Mörikofler (1867-69), Volkmar (1870), A. Baur (1885-89), Stähelin (1895), and S. M. Jackson (1901). See also the publications of the Zwingli Society. [Z'wing-lee.]

INDEX OF PSEUDONYMS, &c.

THE following index, besides giving pseudonyms, historic sobriquets and nicknames, &c., supplies a key to such bibliographical puzzles as the authorship of Paul Ferroll, the Schönberg-Cotta Family, the Battle of Dorking, &c. It is, of course, eclectic; a complete list would take up the entire volume. The more obvious circumlocutions have therefore been omitted; thus it has not been thought necessary to explain the 'author of Waverley,' the 'Conqueror,' or the 'Pretender.' Nor are entries required here where the proper name is regularly associated with the epithet, as the 'Admirable Crichton,' 'Fabius Cunctator,' or 'Pedro the Cruel.' On the other hand, a few names have been admitted to the list that were not thought important enough to receive biographical articles. Occasionally the second entry explains, not equals, the first. Thus 'Claimant....Tichborne' means not that the Claimant was Tichborne, but that under the article Tichborne it is explained who the Claimant was.

THE END.

A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

In Ten Volumes, Imperial 8vo.
Price £5, cloth; £7, 10s. half-morocco.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA is acknowledged to be the best book of the kind at present before the public. It is in use as a standard authority and work of reference on all subjects, wherever the English language is spoken.

The New Edition was completed in 1892. Since then every article has been revised, alterations being made wherever necessary. The work therefore gives the latest discoveries, statistics, and events. The needs of the general reader, of the average intelligent man and woman, have been kept constantly in view. The topics are treated as simply and with as little technical detail as is consistent with their being at once correct and easily understood.

The reception the Work has met with from the press and from the public, justifies the Publishers in believing that, whether regard be had to fullness, accuracy, readableness, or literary form, the new edition of CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA is the best book of its kind and scope extant.

'This edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia is perhaps the cheapest book ever published.'—The Speaker.

'There is exhaustiveness in the selection of subjects, enterprise in securing specialists as contributors, and accuracy, clearness, competency, and conciseness in the treatment of the articles.'—Times.

'The best Encyclopædia ever brought out.'—Daily Chronicle.

'For practical utility these volumes could hardly be exceeded.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

A New Dictionary of the English Language.

CHAMBERS'S ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

PRONOUNCING, EXPLANATORY, ETYMOLOGICAL.

In 1 Vol., Imperial 8vo, Cloth, 12s. 6d.; Half-morocco, 18s.

The vocabulary is exceptionally copious. In addition to ordinary words, it contains such scientific and general terms as argon, power of the keys,

baptism for the dead,
patter-song,

Mrs Leo Hunter,
Whatman-paper,
patent-inside,
log-rolling,

Lake school,
pectoral theology,
gilt-edged securities,
new woman, &c.

Here also will be found the words used in Golf, Cricket, and other Sports; current slang words, whether English or American; such Scotticisms as are crystallised in Burns and Scott; the obsolete words and senses of words in Bacon, Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, the Authorised Version of the Bible, and the Prayer-Book; and the coinages of word-masters like Carlyle, Browning, and Meredith.

Idiomatic phrases not self-explanatory have been carefully explained, as

'in a Pickwickian sense,'
'to suck the monkey,'
'to find one's legs.'

'to knock into a cocked hat,'
'a pretty kettle of fish,'
'to know the ropes,' &c.

The Definitions are full and accurate, embracing the various shades of meaning in use in Britain and America.

The Etymologies are stated concisely, but clearly, and in proper historical order.

The Pronunciation is carefully indicated by re-spelling the words on an easily understood system.

The Illustrations are really explanatory of the definitions.

The Type is large and clear.

Lists of Prefixes and Suffixes and of Abbreviations are given, with a list of the words, phrases, and quotations from Latin and foreign Languages in general use in English books and newspapers.

In short, this is a Dictionary compiled expressly for the general reader, and is Copious and Exact,—Easy of Reference,—and Moderate in Price.
